

The Shackled City

A story by Ken "Lazybones" McDonald (km4101@netzero.net)

Note: the following material is copyright 2003-2006 by Kenneth McDonald. Copying and/or distribution is allowed only on the condition that no part of the material be used or sold for profit. All other rights are reserved by the author. Travels through the Wild West is a work of fiction, and any resemblance to real persons or events is purely coincidental. Dungeons & Dragons and the Forgotten Realms are trademarks owned by Wizards of the Coast. Material published in Dungeon magazine is copyrighted by Paizo Publishing.

Author's Note

This is a work of fiction that I serialized on ENWorld's Story Hour forum between June 2003 and September 2005. The story involves the adventures of a group of 1st level characters that I ran through the "Shackled City" Adventure Path of modules published in Dungeon magazine. Ultimately eleven adventures in this series were published: "Life's Bazaar" in issue #97, "Flood Season" in issue #98, "Zenith Trajectory" in #102, "The Demonskaar Legacy" in #104, "Test of the Smoking Eye" in #107, "Secrets of the Soul Pillars" in #109, "Lords of Oblivion" in #111, "Foundation of Flame" in #113, "Thirteen Cages" in #114, "Strike on Shatterhorn" in #115, and finally "Asylum" in #116. The complete series has also been released in a hardcover edition by Paizo Publishing.

This story is entirely a work of fiction, although as with my earlier Travels through the Wild West story I'm using standard D&D rules behind the narrative. I've taken a few liberties with the material; this story is set in the Forgotten Realms, and I have modified and added to the default plotline in a few places.

Book I: "Life's Bazaar"

* * * * *

Chapter 1

It was a stark and bracingly clear day, with the sun a bright orb in a sky that was one unbroken sheet of azure that stretched from horizon to horizon. A few wisps that weren't quite clouds hung in the distant sky where the land met the vast expanse of the Shining Sea, barely visible even from the rising hills that gradually rose from the border of the Forest of Mir until they graduated into the jagged heights of the Alamir Mountains.

It was a rough, untamed region. The mapmakers put it within the borders of Calimshan, and the city of Almraiven with its magical wonders and gleaming towers of bronze was only a few days' ride distant to the south. But the difference between the low country along the shore of the Shining Sea and the interior highlands was more than the sum of the miles that separated them, and the barrier of the Alamirs, for all their looming majesty, was only a slim separator from the chaos and violence of the city-states that perched like boils along the western shores of the Lake of Steam.

But for all that it bore a look of pristine isolation, the region was not entirely untouched by the taming hand of civilization. The long coastal road that ran hundreds of miles from Manshaka to Almraiven continued north along the shores of the Bay of Almraiven until it rose up into the Alamirs, forging a tenuous connection between Calimshan and the lands around the Lake. And there were settlements here, few and far between, but adapting to the demands of life in the region in often creative fashion.

One such sign of habitation was the winding road, little more than a track, that wound its way up into the hills from the lower country that abutted the Forest of Mir. This trail had a lengthy pedigree, originating hundreds of leagues distant in the Tethyrian city of Saradush, but here, out in the middle of nowhere, it seemed of little function save for accommodating the occasional wild creature traveling on its own private errand.

High above this landscape, coasting on the updraft that rose up out of the hills, a single eagle hung alone in the sky. As it followed a general southerly course, it flew over a pair of travelers making their way in the same direction along the road far, far below. For a moment the bird swept lower, as if curious, but then it changed course and headed abruptly westward, toward the unbroken sea of green that marked the expanse of the Forest of Mir.

One of the travelers looked up at the raptor as it flew off, tracing its movement with her eyes, one hand held to her brow to offer shade against the midday sun. She was tall and lean, clad in plain but well-made traveling clothes, a tunic of faded green cotton over breeches that were tucked into calf-high leather boots. Numerous pouches dangled from the belt that ringed her waist, as well as a sheathed dagger, and over it all she wore a long woolen cloak with a cowl pulled tight around her face despite the warmth of the sun. Wearing the cowl so kept her features encased in shadow, but revealed enough to show that she was fair-skinned, with a few stray wisps of rust-colored hair showing around the edges of her face.

“It’s just a bird, Zenna. Sheesh, relax, will you?”

The speaker was the tall woman’s companion, who cut quite a different figure. She was a gnome, her three feet of height barely bringing her up to the other woman’s waist. Her face was youthful, almost childlike, although there was a knowing twinkle in her bright green eyes. In contrast to the closed-off, almost suspicious manner of her fellow traveler, the gnome bore a friendly, open air about her. Her auburn hair fell loosely around her face, curling at the ends where it hung just shy of her shoulders. She was clad in attire similar to her companion, although her clothes were more muted in coloration, soft grays and dusky browns that blended well with the surrounding landscape. She too was armed, with a small sword on her hip that looked deceptively large on her frame, and the wide arm of a light crossbow jutted out from over her shoulder, above the compact traveling pack that she carried. The two walked together in a manner that bespoke long familiarity, the taller shortening her stride automatically to match the slower gait of her short companion.

Zenna turned and glanced down at the gnome woman. Her eyes, shaded by the edge of her cowl, were dark orbs that flashed with emotion.

“There is reason for my caution, Claresse, even if you will not admit it. This is more than just a lark; these are dangerous lands, in more ways than one.”

The gnome rolled her eyes. “Gads, you love the drama. I keep telling you, if they’d really wanted to find us, they would have long ago.” At the other’s suddenly penetrating look, she added, “Yes, yes, I’m wearing my pin. Anyway, I’m not a child, no more than you, anyway; I know to be careful. And call me by my chosen name, if you please; I show you the same courtesy, ‘Zenna’.”

Zenna’s features took on an expression that bespoke long sufferance with the mannerisms of her companion. “It is a vulgar name for a young woman.”

“I like it. ‘Mole’ suits me well, and it’s not inappropriate for an adventurer, don’t you think?”

“Very well, Mole; I wouldn’t want it said that my upbringing had not included instruction in proper manners for a young lady.”

The gnome laughed, knowing full well that this conversation was one they’d already had before and likely would again. Zenna’s lips tightened, and she opened her mouth to say something further, but Mole interrupted, “Let’s change the subject. So this place we’re going, this ‘Cauldron,’ it’s really built on the inside of a volcano?”

“Indeed. From what I’ve heard, it’s quite unique. The town is constructed in concentric layers, descending down into the rim of the caldera.”

“Aren’t they afraid that it’ll erupt someday? I mean, it doesn’t sound like the safest place to build a settlement, if you ask me.”

Zenna laughed, but it was an edgy, sardonic sound, in contrast to Mole’s easy and light laughter earlier. “Apparently it’s extinct, or sufficiently so that the residents aren’t preoccupied with the matter; there’s even a lake in the center. I think that the concern was more with security, given the nature of the region, and the site is defensible.”

Mole shot her friend a sly look. “And do you think you’ll find what you’re looking for, in this place?”

Zenna didn’t respond, though her jaw tightened slightly. Mole, regretting the provocation, immediately shifted the conversation yet again.

“So, how much further is it? My feet feel like we’ve already walked to Halruaa and back.”

“We might have been able to afford horses, if you hadn’t given away half your purse to those thieves in Saradush.”

“They were just children,” Mole said. “And it’s not like we’re broke; they needed it more than we did, and there’s always more gold to be had.”

“An interesting philosophy,” Zenna commented. “I’m sure there’s more than a few laborers, peasants, and tradesmen who might disagree with you. In fact...”

She broke off as Mole abruptly touched her arm softly. The young gnome was scanning the trail ahead, where the road twisted raggedly between a series of squat, uneven hills. The entire area was choked with thick, nearly dead brush that crowded up onto the fringes of the trail, along with the occasional stunted tree eking out a meager existence on the stony soil of the hills. A great deal of cover.

“What is it?” Zenna hissed, tensing as she scanned the area.

“There’s something there…” Mole began, already reaching back for her crossbow. She’d barely touched it, however, when the brush flanking the trail ahead stirred, and three men appeared. The trio were ragged-looking specimens, their dull brown garments further darkened by layers of dust and dirt, sporting careless beards and hard, almost feral looks that took on a particular intensity as they regarded the two women. All three bore weapons at their belts, and one also clutched a loaded crossbow that he brandished menacingly.

“You jees leef thet bow where eet ees,” said the crossbowman, the steel point of his quarrel lined up decisively with Mole’s chest.

One of his companions, a reedy man with a nasty scar that ran down the left side of his face, chortled, caressing the hilts of a pair of long knives tucked casually through his belt. The final stranger, who carried a scabbarded blade almost large enough to be called a sword, smiled at them, but the expression carried little in the way of warmth.

“Good day to you, ladies,” he said, and the calm way he spoke seemed to make the statement just that much more menacing.

Chapter 2

“What do you want?” Zenna said, as Mole stood frozen, her eyes locked on the crossbowman’s deadly quarrel, beside her. Zenna herself felt a cold terror grip her somewhere deep down inside her gut, but she willed it aside through a sheer force of will.

The man with the sword stepped forward, flanked by the crossbowman on his right and the scarred man with the knives to his left. A good ten paces separated the two groups, but there was no shelter close enough to offer a possible escape from that crossbow.

“Just our due, m’lady, just our due,” the leader said. He took another step closer, slowly, as if not to spook them.

Mole started shaking, and let out a tremulous sound that might have been a sob of terror. She leaned slightly over toward Zenna’s leg. Still looking as though she was paralyzed by fear, Zenna could just make out the words that drifted up in the lyrical speech of the gnome tongue.

Can you handle the crossbowman?

Zenna reached down and patted the gnome, as if to console her. “Look, we don’t have anything... we’re poor travelers, we’ll give you what little we have, just don’t hurt us...” Under her breath, she added, also in gnomish, Need distraction...

“Please don’t hurt us!” Mole shrieked, falling to her knees in the middle of the dusty trail. “Please!” she repeated, clutching her hands before her.

If the bandits—for they were clearly that—were moved by the display, they did not show it. The knife-wielder chuckled again, and licked his lips, his eyes drinking in the lines of Zenna’s figure. The crossbowman said nothing, but the bolt-head did not move, holding both of them in line as ready targets.

“This doesn’t have to get ugly,” the swordsman said. “Throw down your weapons, and you won’t be harmed.”

“Yeah, I’ve known women who believed men who said that,” Zenna said, her voice tinged with equal measures of bitterness and sarcasm.

“We can do this the hard way, or the easy way,” the bandit persisted. “The easy way, you might not like it, but you’ll walk away from it, I promise. Zeek here,” he said, with a slight nod toward the scarred man, “he likes the hard way.”

Suddenly Mole let out another loud shriek, drawing the attention of all three men to her. She fell to the side, as if collapsing, but at the last instant she tucked into a roll, springing back to her feet in a single smooth motion. Even as she regained her footing, her arm snapped up, and a gleaming object flew from her fingers toward the bowman.

The crossbowman had tracked her movements with his weapon, and as she rolled to her feet he sneered and tightened his grip on the trigger of the bow. But even as Mole began her maneuver, Zenna was taking action as well. Her stare became intensely focused as she drew her hands across her body in a complex pattern, weaving an invisible lattice with her slender, nimble fingers. Arcane syllables erupted from her lips, words not meant to be spoken by mundane folk.

The swordsman had drawn his blade, but as he recognized the signs of spellcasting, quickly threw himself aside.

The scarred man, on the other hand, drew both knives and leapt greedily toward Zenna.

A cone of blazing colors erupted from Zenna’s fingertips, engulfing both the charging knife-fighter and the crossbowman behind. The scarred man screamed as the lights overwhelmed his senses, knocking him unconscious. The crossbowman fired even as the color spray hit him as well, but Mole’s thrown knife had glanced off of his arm, doing no damage but throwing off his aim just enough so that the deadly bolt passed harmlessly between them. A moment later he, too, fell to the ground, out cold.

Two of the three bandits were down, but the third, the swordsman, had dodged out of the path of Zenna’s spell and now lunged at her from the side. The woman, her own vision dazzled from the effects of the color spray, did not appear to see him at first.

“Zenna, look out!” Mole cried. The gnome leapt into the path of the man, slicing at him with her shortsword. The bandit quickly dodged back, and the two faced off, their weapons of roughly equal size, but the human towering over the slight figure of the gnome.

Zenna blinked, then hurriedly drew back out of the way of the melee. The swordsman grinned as he took the measure of his foe, but his expression twisted into a frown as Zenna, now safely clear, started casting another spell. He quickly lunged forward, knocking aside Mole’s blade and thrusting his own weapon deep into her shoulder. Mole cried out and staggered back, a blossom of bright scarlet erupting over her tunic from the savage wound. The bandit was already rushing forward, hoping to finish the mage before she could unleash her magic upon him.

But Zenna completed her spell, and with a gesture the swordsman staggered, his sword dipping limply in his hand as a mental fog dropped over him. The daze only lasted a few moments, but even as he shook his head, trying to clear his thoughts, Mole came up behind him and with a vicious cry slipped half of the length of her sword into his back. The swordsman staggered forward a step and crumpled, but the attack had clearly cost the gnome, for she too fell, her sword slipping from her fingers to clatter uselessly in the packed dirt of the trail.

Zenna was there in an instant, bending over her friend. The wound was critical, she saw immediately, with blood continuing to gush out onto her shirt. Zenna, who was no stranger to battlefield wounds, quickly applied pressure to the wound with her hand, and clumsily tore off a length from her own undershirt to fashion a makeshift bandage. Her vision grew blurry as she worked to save her friend, and she realized that tears were flowing down her face.

“Damn you, Mole, don’t leave me...”

The gnome’s eyelids fluttered, and she looked up at her friend, the pain evident in her eyes. “I... I’m hurt bad, Izandra. I’m sorry...”

“You’ll be alright... we’re not far from Cauldron, I’ll get us there, you’ll see...”

Mole’s face twisted in pain as the wizard drew the bandage tight about her shoulder. Zenna—Izandra—feared that the thrust might have punctured her lung, but there was nothing she could do about it now. In Cauldron, there might be a priest that could provide magical healing; here there was no option except to wait for her friend’s death.

Mole took a ragged breath and looked up at Zenna. “Those others—they’ll recover shortly, and won’t be in a good mood when they do...”

Zenna nodded, and gently laid her friend down before she stood. With a grim expression, and her hand clutched so tightly on the hilt of her dagger that her fingers were white, she turned and walked away.

Shortly that problem was permanently solved.

Mole was pale, and her eyes had closed, but the bleeding at least appeared to have stopped. For a moment Zenna's heart clutched in her breast as she feared that Mole had died, but then she saw the soft rise and fall of the gnome's chest, and relaxed.

But that relief was only temporary, as she cast her gaze around her at the vast, empty hills that surrounded them. Mole needed healing, and she needed it soon.

Zenna worked quickly, first shrugging out of the light traveling pack that she wore under her cloak, and then dumping the contents of two of her larger belt pouches—holding a miscellany of basic gear—onto the ground. She opened the pack and quickly took out small packets of food, rope, a few spare shirts and assorted undergarments, and a compact lamp with a hooded shutter. She also took out a half-full waterskin attached to a leather thong, which she tucked into her belt. The backpack was now all but empty, and she quickly put it back on. She glanced down at the cloak. Without the concealing cowl, the full light of the afternoon sun illuminated her, revealing the details earlier obscured. She was young and attractive, her red hair framing soft, delicate features.

And also a pair of short, ivory-colored horns that jutted from her head just beyond where her forehead gave way to her cap of hair.

Quickly she bent down and recovered the cloak, sweeping it across her shoulders and snapping its clasp back into place before tugging the cowl back up to conceal her features. She then bent over the unconscious form of her friend, quickly divesting her of excess gear much the same way that she had just done for herself. Mole's pack and crossbow were quickly discarded. Zenna glanced down at the gnome's sword, now sticky with the congealed blood of her enemy, considering for a moment, but finally left it where it lay.

She bent low and wrapped her arms around the motionless form of her friend, and with a grunt lifted her as gently as she could. Mole wasn't that heavy, but Zenna wasn't very strong, and she knew that the burden would grow quickly with every step.

Without even a look back at the three corpses lying in the dirt, she started down the long road ahead, a road that she quietly hoped led swiftly to Cauldron.

Chapter 3

As the sun began to set behind the distant western horizon, the fifty-foot high city walls of the city of Cauldron, fashioned of massive slabs of black malachite, blazed with a glow that seemed almost magical. In the light of the setting sun the wall became a temporary shining crescent that ran halfway around the circumference of the great caldera. It was a dramatic sight, but one that the city's four and half thousand residents, accustomed to the view, generally ignored as they hastened to complete their day's business before the final waning of the day.

As the final remnants of sunlight faded and the city settled into shadows the glows of lamps and torches began to pop up throughout the city. From above it appeared as though the lights were clinging to the interior slope of the crater, for the town descended in concentric rings until one reached the lip of the dark lake that filled the center of the dormant volcano.

A hundred sounds filtered together within the confines of the bowl; the clop-clop of horses and the creak of wheels as teamsters hurried home after the final run of the day, the general sounds of a hundred different conversations as folk likewise returned from their daily labors, even the whisper of the evening breeze from the mountains as it passed over the walls and swirled for a bit within the crater before continuing on its way.

Zenna staggered with difficulty down the wide boulevard of Obsidian Street, the outermost of the four avenues that ringed the interior of the crater. The pain in her arms and legs had subsided to a mercifully dull ache, but every step she took felt increasingly difficult, as though she was walking up a hill that grew steeper with each passing stride. In her arms, clutched against her body, she bore the limp form of Mole, only the labored sound of her breathing offering reassurance that her friend still lived.

Around her passed shadows, the citizens of the crater town. Her own mixed heritage gave her the power to see as clearly in the dark as in the brightest day, but to her eyes the people around her were still shades, insubstantial beings rather than living, caring people. Thus far, at least, the people of Cauldron had proven less than considerate, not that Zenna had expected anything different. Since leaving her home, the tiefling girl's perceptions of the world had grown increasingly cynical. Faerûn was a cruel and heartless place, this sentiment only reinforced by the things that she saw and heard, and only those with strength and determination survived.

She could not know that the people of Cauldron had been confronted with their own difficulties in recent tendays, and that it was in part the stranger woman's own demeanor that drove them away, rather than offering to help. Those few people she'd asked for directions had been startled at the way she'd appeared, a cloaked figure with her cowl drawn well down to conceal her face, carrying a heavy burden close against her body, and speaking with a voice drawn to the edge of hysteria, turning away half-before the surprised townspeople could fully realize what was happening.

But Zenna, in her agitation, lacked the perspective to see this, instead projecting her own feelings onto the strangers around her.

At least she'd gotten into the city, she thought grimly. The guards had been suspicious of the lone woman arriving at the north gate as the sun was setting below the horizon, but at least they'd let her bring Mole into the guardhouse, and one of them, an old veteran who'd clearly seen his share of battlefield injuries, helped by cleaning the ugly wound in the gnome's shoulder and applying a fresh bandage. They'd directed her to the church of Helm, a short distance from the north gate, where she could find a cleric to help her injured friend.

Zenna bit back a curse as her boot scuffed on a loose paving stone, barely recovering from her stumble before she fell. If those guards had sent a rider to get a cleric, Mole would already be well, instead of just clinging to life. That part of her that was mired in cynicism wondered what the guards would have said if they'd seen her true form. The change self spell was among the first that she'd learned, allowing her to hide, at least for a brief time, the obvious features that betrayed her heritage. That brief duration, in fact, was what had driven her to haste, all but grabbing her friend from the surprised guardsmen and heading into the city to find the promised cleric.

A thin voice in the back of her mind whispered a warning, of how the clerics of the Vigilant One might respond to her appearance, but she squashed that thought ruthlessly. She could not afford to let that divert her, for Mole's sake.

But it was with a sob that she hurried on, carrying her stricken friend.

She passed before the mouth of a dark alley, and it was her distraction, rather than an inability to see through the shadows, that caused her to miss the watcher until she was almost right on top of him.

Surprised, she drew back suddenly, as the dark figure stepped out from his vantage in the lee of one of the high brick walls of the alleyway.

The stranger was a man, and with her darkvision Zenna could clearly see that he wore a mask—no, his face was painted, with a garish design that covered half of his face in black, the other in white. He wore his greasy black hair tugged back into a ponytail, and a silver stud glinted slightly in one earlobe. He was clad in a black tunic that could not fully conceal the bulk of armor underneath, and the hilt of a short stabbing sword jutted from his belt.

“Move on,” the man hissed. “This is none of your concern.”

Belatedly, Zenna became aware of a commotion further down the alley. Looking in that direction, she saw a pair of tall men, attired and disguised in similar fashion to the one before her. The two men were assaulting a third figure, who was sprawled out on the dirty cobbles between them, trying in vain to shield himself from the kicks that the other two were raining down on his torso.

Zenna felt two things simultaneously; a tremor of fear that clutched at her gut like a cold hand, and a surge of anger that was so intense that for a moment red flecks flared in her vision. The man watched her, his eyes wary, with a touch of nervousness as they flicked out over the main boulevard, but all Zenna saw was the sinister mien, the threat inherent in the man's posture, that hilt that his hand drifted toward...

The conflicting surges of emotion gave her strength. Clutching Mole against her body with one hand, she twisted the fingers of another in an arcane gesture, close against her body where the man would be unlikely to see in the gathering gloom. She felt a tingle as magical power flowed through her, the touch of the Weave that always sent a rush like the first flush of intoxication into her body. It was addictive, that feeling.

Zenna opened her mouth, and the cry she uttered was a stark scream, sounding too-loud in the quiet murmur of the evening.

“Guards! Guards!”

“Damn it,” the masked man muttered, coming forward quickly, his sword hissing as it issued from its scabbard. He lifted the weapon with its hilt forward, perhaps intending to quiet her with a quick blow to her head.

But Zenna's spell was already taking effect, and even as the echoes of her cry faded in the night, other sounds were audible from a short distance down the street. The sounds of heavy boots on the cobbles, the clank of metal on metal, the voices of men drawing nearer. On hearing them the man abruptly came up short, his attack arrested in mid-stroke. With only the briefest hesitation he darted into the alley, where his two compatriots had already interrupted their assault, listening.

"It's Gothrok's boys!" the watchman hissed, and with that the three turned as one and darted down the alley, where it sloped down sharply toward the next lower street below. Behind them their victim lay stirring on the ground, moving in obvious pain.

The sounds of the approaching guards faded—it had been merely an illusion, a ghost sound cantrip summoned by Zenna's magic—and the young woman started back down the street toward her destination. Before she'd gone more than a few paces, however, she hesitated. In her arms, Mole was quiet, but Zenna could feel the soft rise and fall of her chest. As the rush of excitement from the brief confrontation faded, her exhaustion returned tenfold, and only determination kept her from sagging against the front of the nearby building. For a moment, she thought she could almost hear Mole's voice, remonstrating with her in that way she always did.

Sighing, she turned back to the alley and the battered victim of the masked men's mugging.

Chapter 4

"Are you all right?"

"I... I think so."

The speaker was a young man, in his late teens, perhaps, his body lean and lanky. His hair hung in an unruly mess about his face, which was marred by a nasty bruise on his right temple that was already beginning to deepen in color. He wore a plain cotton robe that had been torn in the melee, and as he shifted, slowly and painfully pulling himself up to a kneeling position, Zenna was surprised to catch a glimpse of what looked like a chain shirt underneath.

"Oooh, they gave me quite a going-over," the young man said, probing his side with slender fingers before gently touching at his bruised face. Wincing, he clasped his left hand to his throat, where Zenna noticed that some sort of amulet or device was hanging on a slender chain around his neck. The young man's hand closed around it before she could identify it, but to her surprise a soft blue glow began to shine from beneath, through the gaps between his fingers. The young man's face became focused, and his voice took on a resonant, deeper tone, as if echoing from the insides of a spacious temple.

"Vigilant Helm, share your mighty blessing with your unworthy servant..."

The result of the injured man's words was immediately evident, as the blue glow flared briefly before sinking into his body, infusing him briefly before it faded. With a suddenness that surprised her, he got up quickly, his earlier discomfort gone utterly.

“A cleric... you’re a cleric,” Zenna said.

“Yes,” he said. “I’m sorry, I neglected to thank you for your help. My name is Ruphos Laro, acolyte of Helm. While I don’t think those toughs were planning on killing me, I’m sure they would have left me quite a bit more uncomfortable before they—what’s the matter?”

As he was speaking, Zenna, whose exhaustion and emotion had finally caught up with her, had sagged backward, only the wall of the alley keeping her from collapsing. She clutched at Mole with both her hands, trying to protect her friend, unable to keep a sob from slipping through her strained façade.

No, mustn’t be weak, she berated herself. But her strength, already taxed beyond limit, had finally faltered.

The young man was beside her in an instant, a worried look on his face. Zenna slid down to the ground, her legs folding painfully under her, and her cloak parted to reveal her burden.

“What’s this? A child?” Ruphos exclaimed, carefully extracting Mole from Zenna’s arms to get a better look at the injured gnome.

“No... my... friend... bandits...” Zenna managed. Tears were beginning to slip down her cheeks, defeating her best efforts to bite them back. “I tried to help her, I had to get her here... You’re a cleric, had to find a cleric...”

“Shhh,” the young man said softly. “I will help her.” Once more he touched his amulet—his holy symbol—and called upon the power of his god, holding Mole gently with his other arm. Zenna watched with fascination—she’d seen this before, of course, had seen her stepmother use healing spells many times, but it was impossible to deny the wonder and beauty of divine magic being wrought, each time somehow new and unique.

And then it was done. Mole stirred, and her eyes opened, searching around her with that inquisitive manner that the gnome girl carried about her like a second skin. “What happened?”

“You were injured, but your friend was able to bring you safely to me,” the cleric said. He reached over and extended his hand to touch Zenna’s face, preparing to extend the benefit of his powers to her. But Zenna, worried that he might see... that he might see too much, drew back suddenly. The cleric started in surprise, but shifted his attention to helping Mole up to her feet.

“You’ve lost a great deal of blood, and you’ll likely be weak for a time,” Ruphos told her. “You—both of you, should come with me to the Temple of Helm. My brethren can help tend to your needs, and see that you find someplace safe and comfortable where you can rest and recover from your travails.”

Zenna, bracing against the wall, struggled back to her feet. It was clear that the gesture cost her no small amount of energy, but she put on a determined look as she looked down at the cleric, still kneeling in the dirt of the alley.

“Thank you for what you did for my friend,” she said. “But really, we should—”

“What she means to say, is thank you, of course we’ll accept your generous offer of hospitality,” Mole broke in. “We’ve only just arrived in the city, and we appreciate any help you can provide us.”

Ruphos glanced at them both, his gaze settling finally on Zenna, who—reluctantly, it was clear—nodded.

Chapter 5

“So what happened back there?” Zenna asked, as the three of them continued down Obsidian Way, where the blocky outlines of the Temple of Helm could already be seen a few blocks ahead. Temples to the Vigilant One existed in cities and towns across Faerûn, and in contrast to regional variations in architecture and building styles, those temples all tended toward a simple, blocky structure that tended to make them easily recognizable wherever one traveled. Even in the near-darkness the two-story temple building was clearly distinct from its neighbors, its white marble setting a stark contrast to the black volcanic stone from which most of the city’s buildings were constructed.

The three had exchanged brief introductions, and Zenna had given a cursory summary of their recent troubles that was as much to inform Mole as to placate the cleric.

“It’s a long story... I’ll be happy to tell it to you, once we’re back at the temple. Things have been pretty tense here lately; there’s been... some abductions.”

Zenna glanced over at him; he looked troubled, but she could sense that he was holding something back. Not surprising; she and Mole had only just arrived in the city, and with a deep sword wound in the shoulder of one of them to boot. She looked around the darkened street, which was all but deserted now that night had arrived in earnest. She recognized it, now, the furtive looks and concern in the faces of the people she’d seen since arriving in the city. Cauldron wasn’t a happy place right now.

She could sense rather than hear Mole walking along beside her. Her friend was all but silent when she wanted to be, which was most of the time. With Ruphos present there had been no opportunity for any more lengthy discussion of what had happened to them, just a few knowing looks that promised more explanations later. The two had known each other and traveled together long enough so that they could coordinate their actions with little or no verbal communication, when necessary. Zenna frowned. Not that it stopped Mole from doing what she wanted, like when she had broken in to accept the cleric’s offer of hospitality at his temple. The mage wasn’t comfortable with it, not by a long shot, but there didn’t seem to be anything to be done about it now... they had arrived.

Now that they were here, the temple didn't seem as large as it had from a distance; a strange trick of shape and perspective. The façade of the main building that fronted the street was connected to a low wall that provided access to a courtyard adjacent to the structure. The main temple doors were flanked by a pair of statues, also apparently of white marble, carved into the representation of a pair of armored knights, their maces lifted high into the air. Ruphos did not head for the main entrance, however, instead turning to the side wall and opening a latch on a gate of thick iron bars that led into that courtyard. The courtyard, sheltered from the street by the wall, was deep with shadows, but Ruphos was familiar with the path and neither Zenna nor Mole had any trouble with the poor illumination. Ruphos, of course, didn't know that.

"Careful, the path is clear, but there's a few benches here that you can stumble into if you're not careful. Just follow me, the rectory's just over there."

Zenna, of course, could see the building perfectly, a squat stone structure with a roof covered in overlapping crescent-shaped tiles. She pretended not to see Ruphos's outstretched hand, offering them guidance, but Mole quickly took it, half-pulling the cleric down the path, chatting about some element of religious life or other. Zenna's thoughts were on other matters, like what they might encounter inside the temple complex.

Ruphos led them to a heavy wooden door recessed into the stone wall of the rectory building. As he opened the door a shaft of warm light spilled out into courtyard, but before Zenna could gauge what lay beyond, Ruphos and Mole were already going inside.

The room wasn't large, but looked comfortable and lived in. A considerable stone hearth in the far wall was cold, but a pair of oil lamps on the mantle above shed a cheery light. There were several comfy-looking armchairs flanking a wall-mounted bookcase holding several dozen titles, and a small table flanked by a trio of chairs beside a long wooden sideboard. Two doors led to other parts of the building, while to their right a narrow corridor appeared to give access to the temple itself.

"Everyone's probably at the temple, or still out in the town," Ruphos said cheerily. "With everything that's been happening, we've been putting in some long days of late, and we only have a handful of clerics on staff here." Now that he was home, in his element, some of his earlier gloom had departed. With his bruise faded, only the tears in his robe remained as evidence that he'd only minutes before been the victim of a violent assault. "I'll get you some food and drink, and a place to rest, but first we'd better go tell Jenya what happened."

There was no way to get out of it; well, not without an unpleasant display, so Zenna joined Mole and the young cleric as he led them down the passageway that connected the rectory with the temple. As they approached a thick stone arch Zenna could make out the smell of incense hanging heavily in the air, and the faint sound of a chime that reverberated for a moment then faded into nothingness. As she passed under the arch, she felt a momentary tingle pass through her body; a strange sensation that was gone before she could describe it.

The passage opened onto the back of the nave of the church. Despite the limited size of the structure, Zenna could not help but be a little impressed. Thick beams held up the roof, rising to a peak some twenty feet above. Wooden pews ran in twin rows from the entry hall to the altar area just in front of her, with an ornate wooden door to her left probably leading to the sacristy where the vestments and other sacred accoutrements of organized religion were kept. Though there were no worshippers present at the moment, everything was immaculate, clearly well-tended by the clerics of Helm that ran the temple. She estimated that perhaps a hundred worshippers could gather here at once; a paltry sum compared to the number that could fit in the Moontower in Iriaebor, or the great temples she'd heard about in Baldur's Gate and Waterdeep. Not that she'd seen them; while her parents went gallivanting off about the Realms, she'd been kept at home, under the watchful eyes of her parents' friends, where nothing ever happened...

She started as she realized that she'd let her thoughts drift, that Ruphos and Mole were already talking to other people, several of whom were looking at her curiously. She felt herself color as she stammered out an apology, and came forward. The others were a pair of young humans, a man and a woman a few years older than Ruphos, clad in similar robes.

Mole sidled over to her, and covertly jabbed her in the thigh with her elbow. "Ruphos was just telling Morgan and Illewyn about our little misadventure," she said. "Jenya, the acting High Priestess, isn't here right now, but she's..."

"Acting?" Zenna interrupted. "Was the former High Priest one of those abducted?"

She regretted her hasty words instantly, as the two young clerics looked at her intently, and even Ruphos looked a bit uncomfortable. Morgan, finally, whispered something to Ruphos, and the cleric nodded before turning back to her.

"Ah, in all the excitement, I'd forgotten... It's a rule in all places sacred to the Watcher—no one can enter the presence of the Vigilant One with a hat, mask, or cowl that conceals one's features. You'll have to take off your cowl."

Zenna felt her heart clench in her chest. She'd never been inside an actual temple of Helm, hadn't known about such a rule, but she'd feared something like this ever since Mole had suggested coming here. She looked down at her friend with an accusatory look, but the gnome only smiled.

"Go ahead, Zenna... it's all right."

The three clerics were all looking at her now. The older man, Morgan, had tucked his thumbs into his belt, to Zenna's eyes his hands threatening close to the iron mace that he wore dangling on his hip. Her mind was blank; she couldn't think of an excuse, a way to get out of doing what she'd dreaded since they'd first arrived in this place.

It would be all the same as before. Coming here had been a mistake.

She sighed and reached up, dropping back the cowl.

Chapter 6

The gathered priests drew in a collective breath of surprise as Zenna revealed her face, and the stubby horns that jutted from her temples that were instantly visible. Ruphos's eyes widened in astonishment, but Morgan's response was more dramatic.

"A fiend in the Sanctum!" he croaked, drawing back and clutching at his mace.

"Oh, do control yourself, Morgan," came a voice from the entry. All present turned toward the newcomer, a short, brown-eyed woman of perhaps thirty years. She was clad in a simple but functional clerical robe, and wore her long brown hair in an elaborate coif that fell down to her neck in a flowing cascade. She wore an expression that reflected impatience and brooked no challenge, and her frown was directed at the other clerics as much as the two strangers.

The woman strode with deliberation over to them, and rested her hands on her hips as she cast an evaluating gaze first upon Zenna, giving her horns the merest tilt of an eyebrow, then Mole, and finally Ruphos. Finally, she turned to Morgan, who was still clearly agitated, with his fingers white on the haft of his weapon. At least he hadn't lifted it from the hook on his belt.

"Have you forgotten, Brother Morgan, that the wards upon the Sanctum prevent any evil creature from entering its confines?" Zenna nodded to herself, remembering the tingle she'd felt on passing through the arch earlier. But the woman had already turned back to face Zenna, fixing her with an imposing stare for all that she had to look up to meet the eyes of the wizard.

"I apologize for the precipitous behavior of my priest. I am Jenya Urikas, acting High Priest of the Temple of Helm in Cauldron. I extend to you the hospitality of our church. I can see that you've come a great distance, and are clearly exhausted by your travels. Illewyn, take our guests to the rectory and see that they have food, drink, and the opportunity to wash off the dust of the road. Morgan, go to the festhall and get Malakar and Serrah; they were helping with the work on the Winter Fund and have likely forgotten the hour."

The two clerics nodded quickly. Under Jenya's expectant stare Morgan moved toward the door, looking back once with uncertainty—and finding Jenya still looking after him—before turning and heading out into the night.

"He's a good priest, but he takes the 'vigilance' part of our code a bit too close to heart," Jenya muttered, as the man left. Turning to Ruphos, she said, "I heard on the way over that there had been a bit of excitement. Come to my office, and tell me what happened. You ladies, please go with Illewyn; I'll come and meet with you again shortly."

With Mole and Zenna staring after her open-mouthed, Jenya took Ruphos decisively in hand and steered him toward the door in the rear wall of the nave. Belatedly, they realized that they hadn't even told the priestess their names. Illewyn noticed their reaction and smiled.

“Yes, she’s a force of nature,” the young cleric said. “But she’s had a lot to deal with since High Priest Delasharn departed.”

“Seems like there’s a lot going on here that we don’t know about,” Mole stated simply.

The cleric sighed. “These are difficult times in Cauldron. It was bad enough with the earlier disappearances, but now, with the children being taken... Jenya has publicly committed the Church to finding them, and bringing their abductors to justice, but thus far there’s been no information...”

“Children?” Zenna asked. “Children have been abducted? Ruphos mentioned some kidnappings, but he didn’t say...”

Illewyn nodded. “Come, we can talk about it more over a hot meal. Jenya can tell you more, later.”

* * * * *

A short while later, Mole and Zenna were together in a small, simple room with walls of undressed stone within the rectory. A curtain hanging in the doorway offered a modicum of privacy, and a pair of simple cots offered an opportunity for rest. Zenna was standing over a basin that sat on a table against the wall, the sleeves of her tunic rolled up as she washed her arms and neck with a towel already gray with the dirt she’d accumulated on the road. Mole was lying on one of the cots, although her eyes continued to roam the room, taking in every detail. She had her purse in her hand, and by the look on her face as she jangled it, she wasn’t pleased with what she heard.

“You left all my weapons? The least you could have done was recover my throwing knife! I had that specially made, you know! And that crossbow, that cost twenty crowns!”

“I didn’t exactly have time to look for your knife, and other things were on my mind at the moment,” Zenna said without turning. Bending low, she lifted two handfuls of water and splashed them into her face, letting herself enjoy the cool feeling of the water against her skin. “And you were heavy enough besides.” Memory stirred of that long hike, her friend dying in her arms, and she felt a cold shudder.

She straightened and felt a hand touch her arm. Looking down, she saw Mole there, an uncharacteristically serious look on her face. “I’m sorry... Thanks, it must have been... difficult.”

Zenna nodded, and smiled, taking the gnome’s hand in her own.

They looked up as the curtain parted, revealing Illewyn’s familiar face. “Jenya would like to see you, now.”

Chapter 7

The High Priest's office was as plain as most of the quarters in the temple complex, furnished in spartan fashion with a wide wooden desk, a few wall-mounted shelves, and several chairs. A bright open flame that burned brightly on the desk illuminated the room. Jenya was sitting at the desk as they entered, and Ruphos was there, standing at her shoulder with his hands clasped behind his back. Illewyn did not enter with them, instead departing back for the rectory after closing the door behind them. Jenya gestured for them to sit in the chairs that faced the desk.

"Ruphos has told me what happened," the cleric began. "It would seem that we owe you a debt of thanks, for scaring off his attackers."

"Do you have any idea of who it was who attacked him?" Zenna asked.

Jenya glanced up at Ruphos, and the two clerics exchanged a brief look. "Cauldron is normally a quiet city, but street crime is not unheard of."

"But this wasn't a run-of-the-mill mugging," Mole prodded.

"No. The way those thugs painted their faces... it is a symbol of a secret organization that calls itself 'The Last Laugh.'"

"A thieves' guild?" Mole asked. The cleric nodded.

"And you think they're the ones who are behind these abductions?" Zenna asked.

She and Mole had learned a bit more of what was going on in Cauldron from Illewyn, although the cleric knew little more than the vaguest outline of the facts. The disappearances of people had been going on for several months now, with both the Town Guard and the city's various churches utterly stymied in terms of tracking down whoever or whatever was behind them. But what had the town in an uproar was the recent—only a few nights' previous—abduction of four children from the city orphanage. The four had simply vanished from their rooms one night, without the faintest clue as to who had taken them or why.

"I... I just don't know," Jenya finally admitted. "The Last Laugh is certainly not an upright stalwart of Cauldron, but they've never done anything like this before. But tonight..." she glanced again up at Ruphos, who shifted slightly. "Ruphos had gone to the orphanage earlier, to offer consolation to the other children. Tell them what your attackers told you."

Ruphos looked a bit uncomfortable as their attention shifted to him, but he cleared his throat and said, "They jumped as I was walking home, and dragged me into the alley. At first I thought they were just thieves after my purse, but as they were beating me, one grabbed me and said, 'Stay away from the orphanage!'"

"Well, that seems like a pretty incriminating bit of evidence, I'd say," Mole said.

“We appreciate what you’ve done, offering us your hospitality, healing Mole,” Zenna said. “But why are you telling us all this? We’re just a pair of complete strangers who have only just arrived in town.”

Jenya didn’t respond immediately, only regarded them with an impenetrable gaze. Finally, she leaned forward across the desk, folding her hands before her. The desk was a bit too large for her, and she nearly had to stand to do so.

“I don’t know what brought you to Cauldron,” she began. “From what Ruphos told me, you had some trouble on the road, but overcame a difficult encounter. And you handled yourself well against those Last Laugh thugs. Clearly your skill in the arcane is significant.”

“My talents approximate those of a full apprentice,” Zenna said plainly and truthfully.

“Let me be completely frank with you. The Church has been placed in a very difficult position by these abductions. The people are scared, and they want answers. We’ve done what we can, used our resources to their fullest potential, worked with the other churches, and the guard... and yet those answers have not been forthcoming.”

“I still don’t see how this concerns us,” Zenna said, though in truth she was beginning to see where this was going.

“Whoever is behind this, they clearly know enough about the churches—ours and the others... the churches of Lathander and Tempus, while of divergent faiths, have been cooperating with us on this—to avoid detection. What we need is an outsider, someone who can poke around in the shadows, and hopefully uncover a clue that we’ve missed.”

Even though she’d suspected it was coming, Zenna was still surprised to hear the words. “So you want us to work for the church of Helm? And what’s more, to work for the most lawful and disciplined church in Faerûn as... I don’t know what word to use, ‘spies,’ ‘agents’?”

Jenya’s mouth tightened slightly as an expression of displeasure. “As I said, these are difficult times. And we’re willing to compensate you for your help, if you’re able to find out anything that can help us.”

Mole had perked up noticeably with the cleric’s last statement, but Zenna continued before her friend could chime in, her voice soft but earnest. “You have gotten a good look at me, I assume. Who is going to trust someone of my blood?”

Jenya did not back down. “I have no doubt that you’ve had a difficult time, and have learned to adjust for the reactions that you must constantly get. Cannot you see, that this experience makes you even more suited for such a task?”

Zenna blinked, and opened her mouth before she realized that she couldn’t think of a ready response. She felt Mole’s hand on her arm, and subsided. Her friend asked, “What other leads do you have?”

Jenya's gaze shifted to the gnome. "I... there is a clue, though I have not yet been able to make meaning of it." She glanced up at Ruphos yet again, just for a second, but in that glimpse it seemed as though the cleric's face had held a hint of—what?—embarrassment?

"The Church possesses a weapon of great power, the Star of Justice. This device is rightfully within the custodianship of the High Priest, but in his absence... Late last night, I called upon its power to cast a divination. As is the way with such magics, however, the information I received was cryptic."

Mole was sitting on the edge of her chair, clearly fascinated. Zenna, however, was feeling quite less sanguine. "What did the spell tell you?" the gnome asked.

"It was a riddle, of sorts," Jenya explained. She took on a focused expression, then recited,

*The locks are key to finding them.
Look beyond the curtain, below the cauldron
But beware the doors with teeth
Descend into the malachite hold
Where precious life is bought with gold
Half a dwarf binds them, but not for long*

"Ah, a riddle indeed," Mole said.

"What was the question that you posed, specifically, when you cast the spell?" Zenna asked.

Jenya blinked, surprised by the question. "As I recall, I asked, 'Where are the children who were abducted from the Lantern Street Orphanage?'"

"Below the cauldron... it could be that they're being held somewhere under the city," Mole suggested.

"I thought of that," Jenya said. "But the locks? The locks of the orphanage, perhaps?"

"I spoke to the headmistress of the orphanage today, when I visited," Ruphos said. "There wasn't any sign of forced entry."

"Perhaps an inside job, then," Mole suggested.

"A question that I hope you will be able to answer," Jenya broke in. "In any case, it cannot hurt to have another group of eyes and ears joining the search."

"We have not yet agreed to help," Zenna said.

"Say we did agree," Mole said. "What support could we expect from you guys?"

"The Church can provide healing, and other divine aid, but it would be best if you did not come here, at least not openly. It would defeat the whole purpose of having a group of outside investigators if you were seen to be connected to us. You can work through Ruphos, who will be your contact, and will help with your investigation.”

Zenna raised an eyebrow, and glanced up at the priest, who fidgeted slightly under the scrutiny. “Him? Forgive me, but Ruphos doesn’t exactly seem like the ‘covert operative’ type, and as you said, people here would recognize him easily.”

“Perhaps not,” Jenya said. She reached into one of the drawers under her desk, and drew out a small cloth object. It was a hat, a simple and rather worn device of faded green fabric with a peaked front and a felt liner. She handed it to Ruphos, who shook it out and placed it onto his head.

As Zenna and Mole watched in fascination, Ruphos’s features began to twist and reform, shimmering slightly before settling into the appearance of a new man. He was now a good deal older, perhaps in his forties, with a thick beard and dark eyes that seemed almost black. The hat was now a wide-brimmed leather teamster’s cap.

“What about his clothes?” Mole asked.

“This particular hat of disguise only works with facial features, and of course its own appearance,” Jenya said. “But clothes can be changed. It doesn’t change the voice, either, but I suspect that few would associate Ruphos’s voice with his true identity, given a dramatic enough change in appearance.”

Mole nodded, considering. “I can see how that would be an advantage. Now, we were talking about gold...”

But Zenna had not taken her eyes from Ruphos. “We’ll help you find the children,” she interjected. “In exchange for the hat.”

Chapter 8

The Drunken Morkoth was one of the livelier taverns in the city of Cauldron. It played regular host to a diverse crowd of teamsters, caravan guards, merchants, adventurers, and a fair number of townfolk who found the barely-controlled chaos of the place a draw. On typical evenings, such as this one, a handful of hired musicians plied their instruments furiously on a compact stage crammed in against one wall, their music just one small part of the loud din of conversation, shouts, insults, and general clatter. The common room was sprawling, large enough so that someone standing on one end would have a tough time spotting a comrade on the far side through all of the smoke and movement. A long bar ran across half of the back wall, staffed by a small army of serving women, and the line of employees coming and going from the twin swinging doors to the kitchens was equally constant.

In one corner of the common room, Zenna and Mole were seated around a compact round table. The long shadows that came in through the windows high along the wall behind them said that it was sunset, the end of their first full day in Cauldron. Zenna, as always, wore her cowl up despite the heat in the crowded room, but that didn't draw much notice here; she wasn't the only customer of the Morkoth who valued her privacy.

"You know, you're not a very good negotiator," Mole said, as she sipped from a mug of ale that looked huge in her diminutive hands.

"At least they agreed to pay for some new weapons," Zenna said, indicating with a lean of her head the neat pile of gear on the vacant chair beside them. The pile included a pair of light crossbows, a small leather pack fat with supplies and equipment, and two quivers stuffed with squat bolts. Mole had a new sword at her hip as well, a fine Tethyrian-forged blade.

"Yes, but we'll never know how much they were willing to pay, will we?"

Zenna leaned in over the table, so that her words would not carry. She needn't have bothered; the din within the common room was such that nobody could hear what anyone was saying more than a few feet away, unless they shouted. "You know how much that hat means to me, Mole."

The gnome sighed, but nodded. "Well, at least we have those healing potions Jenya gave us, in case we run into somebody else who wants to stick a sword into one of us."

Zenna leaned back, her own ale untouched. "What did you think about the orphanage? Or more specifically, the people at it?"

"The headmistress... Tashykk, wasn't it? She seemed suspicious, almost paranoid, but I suppose that's only to be expected, given what's happened. The rest of the staff, they seemed dedicated enough, genuinely concerned about their charges." Mole paused for a second, a thoughtful look on her face. "That half-orc, though... I think he was hiding something."

"The janitor? I thought he was a half-wit."

Mole shook her head. "I would think that you, of all people, would refrain from making judgments based on appearances."

"So do you think he's involved with what happened?"

"I don't know. Let's talk to Ruphos when he gets here, see what he thinks."

"Where is he, anyway? He was supposed to meet us here by sundown, and by the look of it, he'll be late again." The wizard's lips tightened in a gesture of disapproval. "Not that we wouldn't be better off conducting our investigation tonight without him; he's not very good at keeping a low profile."

"Don't underestimate him, Zenna. He's got good instincts, and can read people pretty well. Remember that he hasn't been out traveling the world like we have; he told me that he grew up in a village just a few days' travel from here, and has spent almost six years now here in Cauldron."

“Oh? I wasn’t aware that you’d had a chance to talk so much. I hope you haven’t told him—”

“Relax, I know when to be discreet. But you shouldn’t insist on keeping people at arm’s length all the time, either. Not everyone out there is a bad guy, you know.”

Zenna finally picked up her mug, taking a small sip. Softly, so that her whisper was muffled by the clay rim of the cup, she said, “No, only most of them.”

Mole had sharp ears, but her attention had been turned toward the center of the common room, where a disturbance was growing.

The ruckus was coming from two spacious circular tables separated by a small no-man’s-land that was currently occupied by members of two distinct and apparently hostile groups. The residents of the first table were apparently caravan guards or mercenaries by their clothes, while the other company had the hard, muscular look of laborers. Together the dozen or so men that comprised both parties shared a similar appearance: rough, dirty, and more than a little drunk. The initial confrontation had started with just one member from each table moving into the space between, but already, as words became shouts and pushes, more of their companions were rising from their tables to join what looked like a brewing confrontation.

The staff of the Morkoth was used to such things and was quick to respond, and already a half-dozen toughs—who looked much in common with the ruffians at the tables—were making their way through the crowd toward the disturbance, stout billets held tightly in their thick fists.

“It’s none of our business, Mole,” Zenna said. The gnome rolled her eyes, and quickly climbed atop the table, to get a better view. Many of the patrons apparently had a similar interest, based on the growing attention paid to the fracas, although a number took advantage of the delay to quickly move out of the radius of the contest.

The pushes grew more strenuous and it looked as though matters were about to explode when a sharp voice of command broke through the din.

“All right, that’s ENOUGH! You want to break some heads, go jump off the roof! Mayhap I’ll toss a few of you off myself, to show you how it’s done!”

Both groups drew back in surprise, as a short, stout figure—a dwarf—strode boldly into their midst.

Dwarves were not uncommon in the south, but this dwarf cut an unusual figure. His skin was a deep brown, the color of freshly-tilled soil, indicating that he was likely a gold dwarf of the Great Rift, who were far darker in coloration than their northern shield dwarf counterparts. He was clean-shaven, itself an uncommon feature for a dwarf, with shoulder-length hair that was as black as jet. He wore a suit of overlapping iron scales that covered his body like a second skin, and a pair of light hammers were tucked through his belt.

Across his chest he wore a plate medallion of polished silver a full foot across, bearing on its face an impressed icon of a hammer superimposed upon a great anvil.

For an instant, the dwarf's intrusion had united the two warring groups in hostility toward this newcomer. "This ain't none o' yer business, dwarf," one of the laborers growled, and several of the others echoed his sentiment.

The dwarf met the man's eyes with a stare as sharp as a dagger's edge. "It looks like we might have a volunteer," he said coldly.

But the delay had given the tavern's bouncers time to reach the site of the disturbance, and now they formed a ring around the erstwhile combatants, their clubs as ready as their fists. Grumbling, the two groups separated and returned to their tables, though not without more than a few dark glares that promised much that were shot at the other party, the dwarf, and the bouncers... with a few thrown out in the audience for good measure.

Abruptly, though—perhaps not willing to completely abandon the prospect of a good fight—one of the laborers spun and produced a short length of iron pipe from under his tunic, taking a swing at the back of the dwarf's head.

"Behind you!" Mole shouted in warning.

The dwarf turned quickly, and as the man's makeshift—but very heavy—club came down, he caught the man's fist in his own hand. The club's downward sweep was arrested as if it had struck a stone wall, and the man's face twisted in pain as the dwarf held his hand captive, and squeezed.

"Now, that wasn't a smart thing to do, my friend," he said, his voice as deep as the Great Rift itself. The others stood around him, watching, too surprised to react. The dwarf abruptly twisted his wrist, and with a loud snap! the pipe went flying. Freed from the dwarf's grip, the man collapsed to the ground, clutching at his hand.

"Me hand! You broke it! Aarrghh!"

"There was no call to do that, ser dwarf," one of the other laborers said. "Man needs his hands to work, to eat."

"If that club had hit, me thinks I'd be feelin' far worse," the dwarf countered, but he stepped forward, to stand over his would-be attacker. The laborer, for all his size and muscles, cringed as the dwarf loomed over him.

"Stay away from me!" he said.

"Ah, quit your bawling," the dwarf said. He reached down and grabbed the man's tunic, drawing him quickly up to his feet. No one interfered, the tavern quiet now as its patrons watched the unfolding drama.

The laborer tried to shield his hand, but the dwarf quickly uncovered it and lifted it for an examination. The man winced in pain, but knew better this time than to resist.

“It’s just a sprain,” the dwarf said. “Not that you deserve this, now, but your whining is starting to get on my nerves...”

He closed the man’s injured hand in both of his own. The laborer cried out and tried to draw back, but the dwarf held him firmly. Suddenly a white glow erupted from between his hands, lasting only an instant, and when it was done, the dwarf released his captive.

“Go, get out of here,” the dwarf said. “And watch who you take a swing at.”

The laborer looked at him with surprise, then quickly retreated, leaving the tavern without even looking back at his companions. As if his departure was a signal, the activity within the Morkoth began to return to normal, until the usual din had returned to its full force.

The dwarf, now apparently forgotten, turned to return to wherever it was that he had come from.

Mole, who had watched the entire scene with rapt interest, smoothly leapt down from the table to her chair, and then to the floor.

“Where are you going?” Zenna asked.

“I’m going to talk to him,” Mole said over her shoulder.

“Mole, no!” Zenna hissed, but it was too late; the gnome girl had already vanished into the crowd.

For a moment Zenna grappled with going after her, but she was decided a moment later when she saw Ruphos making his way through the crowd toward her table.

To her eyes, his identity was instantly obvious. It wasn’t that his disguise was poor; in fact, the power of the magical hat was without peer in terms of making a mundane disguise. After some discussion, they’d finally settled on a look that appeared competent but not especially threatening. His features were those of an older man, Ruphos’s age nearly twice over, with hair and beard starting to give over to gray. The hat was now a peaked forester’s cap that rode high upon his brow. The magic of the hat did not change the cleric’s body, though, so the “older man” still looked hale and fit, and Ruphos wore his chain shirt openly now, over a suit of plain but well-crafted woolens. His mace rode at his hip, within close reach.

Zenna frowned. No, the disguise was perfect, but Ruphos just wasn’t very good at playing any role other than the one of his own true identity. He walked like a young cleric, he moved his body like a young cleric, and when he spoke, he sounded like a young cleric (he’d tried to shift his voice to sound older, but that had been even worse). They’d agreed that she and Mole would do most of the talking, which was just as well, given that the priest’s points tended to be the opposite of what she or Mole would suggest in most situations.

“You’re late,” she told him, once he’d gotten close enough so that she didn’t have to raise her voice.

“I’m sorry,” he said. “There was an accident... a wagon broke loose of its team, and a young woman was injured, broke her arm.”

Zenna raised her eyebrows. “You didn’t...”

The cleric looked sheepish, but he matched her gaze without flinching. “I could not leave her lying there in the street, Zenna. It is my duty...”

“What about the children?” Her voice was growing louder, and a few people were glancing in their direction, so she grabbed him and half-pushed him into the chair Mole had vacated. “What about the missing children, you know, the one’s we’re looking for? If you’re going to go around casting spells and healing people, why even bother with a disguise?”

Ruphos’s expression darkened—for him, an unfamiliar turn. “Would you have had me leave her lying there?” he asked.

“You could have taken her to the temple, or any of the other churches in the city. You could have been subtle. You could have remembered what we are about here...”

The cleric lowered his eyes, but his hand had tightened into a fist. “Look. I didn’t ask for this task, but I will fulfill my mandate as best I can.” He lifted his head and met Zenna’s eyes squarely. “I want to find those children as much as you do, Zenna, and not for a reward.”

Zenna turned away—too quickly, indicating that the cleric’s words had stung. Ruphos looked uncomfortable, but said nothing. The silence between them stretched out for a long minute, broken finally when Mole returned to the table. The gold dwarf was behind her.

“Hey guys, this is Arun, Arun Goldenshield. He’s a paladin of Moradin, and he’s going to help us! Isn’t that great?”

Zenna opened her mouth to reply, but no words came.

Chapter 9

The next morning dawned cold and dreary in Cauldron, for the weather had turned with a sheet of ugly gray clouds sweeping down out of the mountains over the night.

The companions—now numbering four—walked along the innermost of Cauldron’s four avenues that formed wide circles around the inside of the caldera. Ash Street was fairly quiet, for it was the tenth day and many folks were taking advantage of that to stay in their beds and get a late start on their day.

Mole and Arun were walking side-by-side a short distance ahead of Zenna and Ruphos. The two taller folk were quiet, with a residue of tension from the night prior still hanging in the air between them, but the gnome was keeping up a steady torrent of chatter, punctuated by occasional replies from the dwarf.

“I haven’t seen a whole lot of dwarves, I admit, but I have to say that I can’t remember seeing one clean shaven.”

The dwarf glanced down at her. He looked even more imposing this morning, for in addition to his suit of masterwork scale armor and the two light hammers tucked into his belt, he now bore a heavy steel shield and had a massive warhammer slung across his back.

“I shave my beard as a sign of my commitment to the Soul Forger,” Arun replied in his sonorous voice. “It is a warning common among my people, so that when the evil races of the Underdark see a beardless dwarf coming at them, they know that they face a warrior consecrated to the Anvil.”

“Well, you’re different,” Mole went on. “Most dwarves I’ve seen have quick tempers and foul mouths, and aren’t all that into bathing. And they like the drink, ooh yeah.”

Arun raised an eyebrow. “Well, they say most gnomes are nosy, annoying pranksters, who can’t keep their mouths shut or their eyes out of other people’s business. Perhaps both stereotypes are overly... limited.”

Mole looked up at him suspiciously, weighing the amount of insult inherent in the dwarf’s comment. Arun only looked straight ahead, not betraying any clues in his expression. Finally, Mole laughed, and then the dwarf did smile.

“In any case, I would suggest that your cross-section of dwarvenkind was a limited one. Perhaps someday you should visit a dwarven hold, and see our people as they live among their own kind, in their homes with families and friends close at hand.”

“Yeah, I’d like that,” Mole said.

Behind the pair, Zenna and Ruphos walked in silence. Finally, though the cleric turned to her. “Look, I’m sorry about last night,” he said quietly. When Zenna didn’t reply, he added, “This isn’t easy for me... I’m not very good at this business of sneaking around and asking questions. I don’t know why Jenya picked me for this. Or for that matter, why she chose you.”

“Oh? And why is that?” Zenna asked softly.

“Um... oh, it’s not because... I mean... Look, I’m not like Morgan.”

“I see,” Zenna said.

Ruphos looked at her, but the tiefling woman did not turn her head, her face masked within the shelter of her cowl. The cleric opened his mouth to say something else, but was interrupted as Mole and Arun halted up ahead.

“Hey, this looks like the place,” Mole said.

Ghelve’s Locks was a compact, two-story shop that fronted onto Ash Street, flanked by other buildings of indeterminate purpose. Its identity was proclaimed by a large sign bearing the image of, naturally, a large clasp lock and a ring of keys.

They had decided last night to come here as the next step in their investigation. It was only natural, given that Jenya’s divination had specifically mentioned locks, and the gnome Keygan Ghelve was responsible for most of the locks in the city. Ruphos didn’t know much more about him than his name, but a few queries by Mole had revealed that the gnome was skilled at his trade, rather introspective, and a magic-user to boot.

“What if the shop’s closed?” Zenna asked. “It’s tenth day, and pretty early.”

“He’s a gnome,” Mole said. “It’ll be open.”

As if to confirm her words, the door to the shop opened, and someone stepped into the street. The individual was a lean, furtive-looking man with hints of elvish ancestry in his features, clad in plain brown woolens and a coat of cured leather that just about rose to the level of being armor. He started slightly in surprise at the four of them gathered in the street before the shop, then quickly turned and headed down Ash Avenue in the opposite direction.

“Well, let’s hope that Mr. Ghelve is not so jumpy,” Mole said, heading for the door.

A small bell attached to the jam tinkled faintly as they entered, announcing their presence. The front room of the shop was compact but cozy, with a fire burning in the hearth along the left wall, flanked by a pair of plushly padded armchairs. On the mantle above the hearth was arrayed a collection of the accoutrements of a tobacco addict, including a tinderbox, a clear vase of leaves, and a small collection of pipes in a wooden rack. To the right a long mahogany counter ran along the wall, with a curtained exit behind it.

Almost before the little bell had stopped its tinkling, the shopkeeper burst through the curtain into the front room. He was an odd character, a gnome of middle years, his facial features jutting prominently from his face. Perhaps most startling was the fact that he walked on stilts—actual wooden stilts!—that put him on eye level with Zenna and Ruphos. His features were a bit ragged, with dark circles under his eyes, but he composed himself quickly and addressed them in a slightly squeaky voice.

“Yes, what is it? How can I help you, what do you want?”

Mole stepped forward and hopped up onto the counter with a single sprightly burst. They’d agreed earlier that she would be their spokesperson, both for her easy manner and her racial connection to the locksmith. Ruphos walked over toward the chairs, pretending to examine the shop, while Arun just stood there, a dark look crossing his features as he started looking around, sniffing the air as if he’d suddenly caught a whiff of a foul odor.

“Well!” Mole said, with a disarming smile, giving the locksmith a good up-and-down look before settling her eyes on his. “We’re interested in locks, silly! Why else would we be here?”

The gnome harrumphed, but as they started talking it was clear that the girl’s manner was catching hold. The locksmith shot a few suspicious glances at her companions—his eyes lingering on Zenna in her cowl for a few heartbeats, and widening fractionally as they settled on Arun, but soon the two gnomes were animatedly discussing some of the intricacies of the craft.

Zenna let out a sigh—most of Mole’s knowledge of locks came from more dubious sources than honest crafting—but let her friend do her thing while she walked over to where Ruphos had paused in front of the fireplace. The cleric was staring into the hearth, and the flames that danced merrily within.

“Are you all right?” Zenna whispered, as she came up to him.

Ruphos turned to answer, but his eyes suddenly widened as he caught sight of the room behind her. Zenna turned to see Arun suddenly lunge forward, reaching around the edge of the counter toward the gnome. Ghelve squawked in surprise and tried to dodge back out of the way, but as he leaned back on one leg the stilt on the other jutted out to where the dwarf could get a firm grasp on it. Arun heaved and the gnome went flying, flailing in an unwieldy arc over the dwarf. For a moment Ghelve was heading for a face-first collision with the hard wooden floor, then Arun’s thick hand snapped out and caught a fistful of his coat from behind, drawing him up just an inch or two from impact.

For a moment the dwarf’s companions just stood there, shocked. Ruphos was the first to start forward, outrage written clear on his face, but Zenna stepped smoothly in front of him, grasping his arm to arrest his progress. The cleric turned on her, but she hissed, “Wait a moment!” She only hoped that the cleric would trust her, as she was trusting the dwarf.

Arun lifted Ghelve until the gnome was hovering just a few inches from the dwarf’s beardless face. The locksmith, as surprised as the companions by the sudden developments, and finding himself in very close proximity to an apparently mad dwarf, trembled as he tried to stammer out something comprehensible.

“What... what...” he managed.

“Don’t play the innocent with me!” the dwarf roared, spraying spittle over the gnome’s face. “I kin sense the taint hanging over this place like a shroud! There’s evil here, gnome, and yer’d better be quick about revealin’ it, or I start bashin’!” To emphasize his point, he lifted one of his light hammers up between them, spinning its fat iron head.

The companions stood there, watching, the room silent save for the labored breathing of the captive locksmith. Mole had stood instantly atop the counter as soon as Arun had moved, and now she walked down to its end, twirling a dagger between her fingers.

“I’d tell him what he wants,” she said. “He really does love the bashin’ part.”

Ghelve's eyes were as wide as saucers as he looked first at Mole, then back to the dwarf. "I... I..."

Ruphos, meanwhile, was becoming increasingly agitated. Mole, seeing this, caught Zenna's attention and inclined her head toward the curtain to the back room. The wizard nodded, all but dragging the reluctant cleric back in that direction. Ghelve reacted notably to their movement, his face betraying a sudden worry beyond even the panic induced by Arun's attack. Both Mole and the dwarf saw it, and Arun shook the gnome, drawing his attention back to him.

"Well? Don't be lying to me, I can tell if yer be lyin' to me..."

The back room was slightly larger than the front area of the shop, and was apparently a storage area. A large bay window to the right was set out as a display of the locksmith's wares to passersby on the street outside, and a compact staircase in the rear of the room led up to a balcony that overlooked the room and obviously offered access to the second story of the shop. Three considerable oak chests were arranged in the center of the floor, and a few tables were pushed up against the far wall, underneath a portrait of a silver-haired gnome.

As soon as they were through the curtain, Ruphos spun on Zenna. "What is this? I didn't agree to assaulting citizens!" At least he had the foresight to keep his voice low, but Zenna, knowing first-hand how sensitive gnomish ears were, drove him further back into the room anyway.

"He's a paladin!" she hissed. "They have the ability to detect evil, or don't you know that? Trust his instincts."

"Trust? We just met him." He gestured toward the curtain, but his eyes never wavered from Zenna when he said it. He looked indecisive, and said, "This is crazy."

So intent were they on each other, neither had a chance of seeing the shadow that detached itself from the wall along the balcony above, and leaned forward over the railing, looking down at them...

Chapter 10

Zenna cried out in surprise as a dark form hurtled down from above. Ruphos didn't even sense it before it slammed hard into him, knocking him sprawling roughly to the floor. The attacker sprang quickly to its feet before Zenna, who drew back in astonishment.

The light that filtered into the room through the narrow windows wasn't sufficient to clearly distinguish the newcomer. It was a man-sized humanoid figure, apparently naked save for a web-belt that supported a light crossbow and a scabbard for the rapier that it carried at the ready. It was strange enough that it appeared to lack gender, without any obvious sex organs. But its flesh—its body was a mottled, gray color that seemed to ripple with dark striations within the skin, causing it to blend unnaturally with its surroundings. Its face was a stunted, ugly caricature of a human's, his eyes a stark blue and without pupils, its mouth twisted with a snarl as it lunged at Zenna.

The startled wizard tried to call upon the words of a spell, but she managed only a single syllable before the creature lashed out with its rapier, smashing the hilt across her face. Blood exploded from her shattered nose and she crumpled, unconscious.

"Zenna!" Ruphos cried, clutching at his the mace at his belt as he tried to get up from where he had fallen. His cloak caught on one of the nearby chests, however, and he stumbled, landing awkwardly on his hip.

The skulk looked at him with an expression that could only be described as unmitigated hatred, and hefted its rapier as it stepped toward him. It turned, though, as the curtain flew open, revealing two hundred pounds of dwarven fury hurtling at full speed toward it.

The skulk tried to dodge out of the way of the charging dwarf. It moved swiftly and nimbly, but not nimbly enough as Arun swept his warhammer around in a wide arc that landed solidly in the center of the creature's chest. The skulk went flying roughly to the side, impacting the wall beneath the staircase with enough force to crack a few of the boards. The creature hung there, for a second, those uncanny blue eyes staring at them, then it sunk inevitably to the cold floor, not to arise again.

Ruphos, however, wasn't watching the skulk as it died. He half-crawled over to where Zenna had fallen, half-frantic as he called upon the power of his patron god. The blue healing light of Helm's grace poured from his hands into Zenna's shattered face, and she started, her eyes popping open in sudden surprise.

"What...?" she asked, as he eyes gained focus. "Help me up," she commanded, grabbing onto Ruphos's shoulder.

Arun was looking around for other foes, scanning the balcony above, but apparently the skulk had been alone—or its companions had elected to flee rather than fight. But before the three could discuss what had happened, a nimbus of flaring colors appeared around the borders of the curtain leading to the front of the shop, and a soft thump followed from that direction.

"Mole!" Zenna cried, pulling free from Ruphos's grasp and darting in that direction. The cleric and dwarf were right behind her.

As they passed through the curtain, they could see the gnome locksmith, standing behind Mole's limp body, holding the unconscious girl up against him as a shield with one arm. His free hand was holding Mole's dagger against her throat, though they could see the weapon trembling in his hand.

"Don't come any closer!" Ghelve cried. "I don't want to hurt her, but I will if you come any closer!"

Chapter 11

The three companions, Ruphos, Zenna, and Arun, faced off against a gnomish locksmith who was clearly involved in some quite shady dealings. At the moment, he was holding a knife to the throat of their friend, who had been knocked unconscious through some unknown magic.

“Drop your weapons!” the gnome commanded. “And keep your distance!”

Arun dropped his heavy warhammer, which landed on the stone floor with a solid thunk. But he only used that as an opportunity to draw out one of the lighter hammers from his belt, and he hefted it easily in his hand, a missile ready to be hurled in an instant.

“You harm her, you will face the justice of the Soul Forger,” he said, his voice flat with deadly earnest.

Zenna’s mind whirled, as she tried to come up with something that could ease this situation, and save her best friend in the world... her only friend. But it was Ruphos who stepped forward, who tore the magical hat from his head to reveal his true features.

“Keygan! I’m Ruphos Laro, of the church of Helm! Keygan, don’t do this!”

“Ruphos?” the gnome said. His entire body was trembling, now, but he did not release his grip on the dagger, nor did its edge dip from Mole’s throat.

“Keygan, you’re a respected member of this community? What are you doing? Whatever trouble you’re involved in, we can help you!”

The gnome shook his head. “Look, just go, get out of here. I’ll let her go if you leave, and don’t come back!”

“We can’t do that, Keygan,” Ruphos said. “Keygan, they took children. From the orphanage, four innocents.”

The gnome let out a sob, and staggered. “I’m... I’m so sorry,” he said, heaving the dagger away from him and releasing Mole. Zenna was there in an instant to catch her friend, while Arun kept the gnome under close scrutiny, his hammer still noticeably handy in his fist. But all fight had gone out of Keygan Ghelve, and he sagged to the floor, a broken man.

Mole was stirring, and she seemed all right, just stunned. Zenna helped her up, and the four of them faced the gnome, who seemed to shrink under their scrutiny.

“You’d better start from the beginning,” Arun intoned.

* * * * *

The gnome’s tale answered some questions, but left others tantalizingly unanswered.

Deep within the volcano, far under the city of Cauldron, lay various networks of tunnels and caverns. Many of these were natural, formed by ancient volcanic action while the volcano was still active, while others had been expanded and altered by residents who came after. One such group was the gnomes of Jzadirune.

Jzadirune had been a thriving underground community of gnomes who had prospered in the early days of Cauldron. Created by practitioners of the arcane mysteries, it had become known for a time for its magical creations, including rings and other miscellaneous items of great power. But Keygan told them that about three generations ago, the community had experienced a very sudden and dramatic decline. The gnome's information was vague on the details, but apparently a sickness of magical origin had emerged within the community, claiming many of its members. The survivors had gathered their possessions and left Jzadirune behind for some distant and unremembered destination.

By now most Cauldronites had forgotten that the gnome city had even existed, but the Ghelve family had maintained one link to this history. Under his shop lay a hidden staircase, the sole remaining access from the surface to the gnomish enclave. Keygan had all but forgotten about it—he certainly wasn't going to go exploring there—when one day some months ago, his life had changed.

They came through the secret door in the middle of the night, catching him by surprise, subduing him before he could defend himself. To compel his obedience, they'd taken captive his closest friend and companion, his rat familiar. Through the bond that existed between wizard and familiar, he could sense Starbrow's distress, alone and hungry in a dark place somewhere below.

Ghelve told them everything; there was no reason for him to hold back, now. The creatures came in two varieties; "tall ones"—skulks, like the one they'd killed, and "short ones." The latter Ghelve described as sinister gnome-like beings, except with pale, sickly flesh, bulbous noses, and cloven hooves for feet. There had been no leader that Ghelve had seen, indicating that whoever was coordinating these attacks might possibly have remained below the city, in the abandoned gnome enclave, or perhaps deeper. Ghelve acknowledged that he really didn't know what else lay below the city, but it was possible that other occupied caverns lay deeper, or perhaps even an access to that deepest of caves, the Underdark.

The gnome was able to give them one final guide: an ancient parchment that contained a finely traced map of the gnome enclave. This useful document Mole took into custody, examining it for several minutes before rolling it carefully and tucking it into her belt pouch.

An hour after they had entered the shop, the four companions gathered at the base of the stair, near the secret door. The boards were cracked where the skulk had slammed into them, making the edges of the hidden portal more obvious. The dead creature had been pushed into a corner, his corpse just a lump under the cover of a carpet. Ghelve, still under the watchful eyes of the dwarf paladin, fidgeted, his hands and feet bound securely by a length of rope that Mole had found in one of the rooms upstairs. The room was dim, as they'd closed the drapes in the display window. Ghelve's Locks was, for the moment, closed for business.

“Better gag him, too,” Mole suggested, putting her own suggestion into effect by stuffing a kerchief into his mouth even as the locksmith opened it to protest. Working quickly, she wrapped a length of cord around his head, securing the makeshift gag.

“You seem to be enjoying that,” Zenna said.

Mole shrugged. “It’s my own fault, I let him catch me off guard.” But she did seem a bit eager as she tested the gnome’s bonds, giving each a good yank and ignoring Ghelve’s grimace each time.

“I still say this is foolish,” Ruphos said. “We should contact the proper authorities... at least let me go and notify Jenya of what we found!”

“The messenger we sent will give her enough information to find her way here,” Mole said, as she stood. “But we cannot afford to delay. Remember the last line in Jenya’s divination: Half a dwarf binds them, but not for long. We have to act quickly, especially if that skulk was able to send a warning to his friends below.”

Ruphos persisted, saying, “But... we don’t know how many there are, there’s just the four of us!”

Arun sent him a cold look. “Go then, priest, if you think it best. I fear not the dark places under the earth, and certainly not those scum,” he added, indicating the lump that was the dead skulk.

“I’m not afraid,” he said defiantly, but then he shook his head. “All right, so I am afraid, but it’s also common sense! What happens if that man you hired decides not to deliver the message to Jenya, or gets run over by a wagon in the street? At least let’s rouse the Guard!”

Zenna came up behind Ruphos and touched him on the shoulder. “We’re all afraid, Ruphos; this is deadly serious stuff, not something we’re doing on a lark. But we have to assume that whoever is holding the children is going to be aware that this part of his operation has been discovered, if he hasn’t already. If we wait, or head down there with a large armed force, we may lose our chance to find them.”

Arun, who’d unlimbered his heavy shield and warhammer, looking fierce indeed in his scaled armor and helm, snorted. “Enough talking, let’s do this thing. Go with your warning, priest. Tell your friends they can follow the bodies of the evildoers we’ll leave in our wake.”

Ruphos looked at Zenna, who nodded. But the cleric swallowed and said, “All right, let’s get going then.”

Mole and Zenna exchanged a look, then moved into position behind the dwarf. Ruphos fell in behind them, hefting his mace.

Arun tucked his hammer into the crook of his shield arm, and with a mighty wrench pulled open the damaged secret door, revealing a black space beyond that waited expectantly for them.

Chapter 12

Jzadirune.

Once a lively place, even buried deep within the earth under Cauldron's slumbering volcano, filled with the sounds of its gnomish residents' labors and their sport.

That was before the Vanishing came.

The product of a botched magical experiment, it crept upon the gnomes of Jzadirune like an assassin come in the night. Before they could even diagnose what went wrong, a goodly percentage of the enclave's residents had contracted the plague, and begun the inexorable fading that would eventually lead their complete disappearance, leaving not even a drop of blood to mark that they had ever been at all.

Now Jzadirune was silent, abandoned by those who had built it... but no longer uninhabited...

Arun led the way down the stairs, negotiating the steps with ease despite his armored bulk. As a dwarf, he had no difficulty seeing in the dark, but while Zenna shared the gift of darkvision as a product of her mixed heritage, both Mole and Ruphos required light. The cleric, bringing up the rear, bore a lamp taken from Ghelve's shop, its flickering flame casting a tenuous glow that cast long shadows ahead of his companions as they negotiated the stairs that seemed to twist ever deeper into the earth.

But finally the stairs came to an end, depositing them in a square chamber of worked stone perhaps forty feet on a side. A corridor exited the chamber on the far wall opposite where they entered, and to their left stood two unusual doors, round wooden portals set into thick thresholds of dressed stone. One of the doors was partly open, rolled aside enough so that they could see that the outer edge of the portal resembled the notched teeth of a gear. Light shone from that opening, a golden shaft that spilled out in a long angle across the room's floor.

"Do you hear that?" Mole asked, as they came to a halt.

As the echoes of the sound of their footsteps and the clatter of their gear faded, they all could hear it, a sound of whispers, rustling leaves, and faint laughter that bordered just on the edges of their perception. The noises were merry, quite a contrast to the dark and heavy atmosphere that the abandoned hold seemed to hold for the four adventurers. The sounds persisted, not acknowledging the presence of intruders here.

"A persistent illusion, perhaps," Zenna suggested.

"What are those?" Ruphos asked, holding his lamp aloft to get a better look at the walls. The light glinted off of metal objects that hung from the walls at regular intervals around the perimeter of the room.

“Masks,” Mole said, walking nearer the walls, scanning the room around her as she walked, her crossbow loaded and ready in her hands. “Made of copper, it looks like... hmm, I wonder how much they’re worth?”

“Careful, Mole,” Zenna said. “Something’s not right here, I can feel it.”

“Ah, you worry too much,” the gnome said. But she kept her distance close to the others.

Arun was more direct, walking straight to the partially opened door. It appeared that the round doors were designed to roll into an open space within the jam, to the side. A heavy piece of stone had been wedged into the door’s gears, holding it open. As they all gathered around the dwarf, they could see that there was writing on the door, a single rune etched in bold lines into the reinforced wooden beams of the portal.

“It’s a gnomish letter ‘A’,” Mole told them. “There’s a ‘Z’ on that other door,” she said, indicating the adjacent doorway that was fully closed.

“Decent work,” the dwarf noted, peering into the lit space beyond the door. A non-descript chamber lay beyond; the light originated from a shining object in the center of the floor. A few squat objects that were probably chests were scattered haphazardly along the walls of the room. The door wasn’t very large, and the stone held it only half-open, but the dwarf slung his shield on its long strap across his back, and cautiously grasped the door.

“Maybe I should go first, check it out,” Mole suggested helpfully.

“Patience is a virtue of the long-lived,” Arun said, as he gave the door an exploratory heave. The door rolled easily enough within its mechanism, and Mole reached in to relocate the stone to hold it more fully open. The dwarf nodded to her, and reaching for his shield, stepped forward into the room beyond the door.

And cried out in surprise as two dark forms lunged out from the shadows flanking the portal, and thrust at him with slender blades.

Chapter 13

“Blast you blasted sneaks!” the dwarf cried out, as the pair of enemies flanking him stabbed at him. The dwarf, caught off guard, was fortunate in that the first thrust glanced off of the layered scales of armor that covered his torso. Even as he turned in that direction, though, the second attacker slipped its rapier into a gap in the armor under his arm, penetrating the thick leather there and driving several inches of the slender steel into the dwarf’s side. Arun grunted and jerked back, and his foe’s blade came away with its tip sheathed in bright red.

The ambushers—revealed as skulks, as the bright golden glow of the light on the floor shimmered on their color-shifting skin—did not stay to follow up on their assault. Even as Arun abandoned his effort to unlimber his shield and hefted his warhammer with both hands, the two skulks darted away, each toward one of two round tunnels that apparently had been bored through the walls of the room. The creatures were fast, certainly moreso than the armored dwarf, and they had nearly reached the two exits by the time Arun had readied his weapon.

Mole, however, was quicker to respond, and she leaned around the dwarf enough to get a clear bead on one of the creatures. Her crossbow snapped, and the skulk staggered as her bolt caught it high in the back of one shoulder. It recovered and would have likely escaped a moment later, but Arun tossed his heavy hammer to the floor, and with a single smooth motion drew and hurled one of the light hammers from his belt. The second missile caught the creature solidly in the base of its skull as it crouched to dart into the tunnel, and it crumpled in a heap in the rubble-strewn opening. The second creature had already vanished through the second tunnel.

Mole quickly reloaded her crossbow, and moved into the room, looking for signs of any more of the creatures. Arun recovered his warhammer and readjusted his shield, while behind them Zenna and Ruphos came warily into the room.

Mole took a look at the fallen skulk, confirming that it was dead, and scanning the tunnel to make sure no other danger lurked from that direction. The two tunnels were rough-hewn and compact, each a little less than five feet in diameter. Arun crossed to the center of the room, and the source of the light—a sunrod, its golden head shining with brilliant light.

Zenna came up behind the dwarf. “You’re hurt,” she said, noting the streak of blood where the skulk had scored with his rapier. “Ruphos...” The cleric was already coming over, but Arun forestalled him with a raised hand.

“Save your healing,” the dwarf rumbled. “I’m fine.”

“Ah, just like a man,” Mole said, joining them. “Pretend it doesn’t hurt, and maybe it will go away. Look, we need you to be at one hundred percent... the next skulks might not decide to run away so quickly.”

“You remind me of my brother’s wife,” the dwarf returned. “There was no peace for any man when that woman was about!” But he did not protest as Ruphos came over and took a look at the injury, and called upon the healing power of Helm to aid him.

“One got away,” Mole said, indicating the tunnel in the wall to the side. “Might be back with friends.”

“Should we retreat?” Ruphos asked, but by the look on his face, he knew the answer even before Arun turned on him.

“Retreat? After a little tussle like that? Wasn’t even a proper battle!”

“Which way, then?” Mole said, returning to the passage where the dead skulk lay. She was the only one of them short enough to move freely within the tunnel without bending over, and leaned inside, wrinkling her nose as she glanced down at the dead skulk.

“Careful, Mole,” Zenna warned. “There may be others in ambush, waiting for us.”

“Oh, I’m sure there are,” the gnome said distractedly. She’d taken Ghelve’s map from her pouch, and held it up to catch the light from the sunrod on the floor. “These tunnels aren’t on the map,” she reported. “This one forks after a ways, and I can see another light from somewhere ahead.”

“Let us go this way,” Arun said. “I do not think that we will catch that one that fled before he warns his comrades, but we may yet catch some in this direction unawares.”

“Okay,” Mole said, but even as she started down the narrow tunnel, Arun forestalled her.

“Let me take the lead,” he said.

The gnome frowned. “I can handle myself, and I’m a lot quieter than you are in all that metal.”

“I have no doubt of that,” Arun said. “But I have extensive experience in underground areas and tunnels like this one, and we’ll be traveling close together, and with our own light, so whoever’s down there will detect us coming anyway.”

“He’s got a point,” Zenna said.

“Let’s just get going,” Ruphos said, eyeing the other tunnel where the second skulk had escaped.

Wary of another ambush, the companions pressed on, stepping over one slain foe and creeping into the confines of the rough tunnel.

The tunnel was just under five feet in diameter, forcing even the squat—but wide—Arun to scrunch himself a bit to avoid scraping his shield or armored elbow against the uneven walls. The corridor appeared to have been rough-hewn from the solid stone of the volcano, although the dwarf remarked that the work was unusual, and that he couldn’t quite identify the method used for the excavation. With that mystery added to the total tally presented by Jzadirune, the companions pressed on.

After just a short distance the tunnel branched to the left and right. To the right the tunnel split again after about ten feet, with a side passage jutting left. The light that Mole had seen seemed to come from that direction, so Arun led them that way, with the others close behind. The dwarf held his heavy hammer at the ready, with Mole and Zenna with their crossbows loaded and ready to shoot, while Ruphos brought up the rear nervously with his mace held tightly in one hand, the lamp in the other. Every few steps the cleric shot a wary glance backward, peering into the dark length of the tunnel for any signs of pursuit. As the tallest member of the company, he had the most difficulty in the confines of the tunnel, bending low and frequently scraping his head on the rugged ceiling.

“And she complains about me making noise,” the dwarf grumbled to himself as they reached the second fork and headed toward the light.

After the turning the tunnel continued for only another ten feet or so before it emerged into a copious, vaulted chamber. The light came from a series of flickering globes that hung in the air, floating idly back and forth. The place was the largest open space they'd yet encountered in the complex, easily a hundred feet in length from where they stood to the far wall, where a fountain of sorts could be seen. Twin rows of pillars stretched down the length of the chamber, flanking a central isle a good twenty feet across. Several more mundane passages than the tunnel by which they'd arrived were visible along the side walls, and a few of the round rune-doors were visible in their familiar stone lintels.

The companions left the confines of the tunnel and cautiously moved forward into the room. Clearly this had been a gathering place of sorts, and the gnomes had put a great deal of effort into improvements. Faded murals covered the walls, and the thick pillars had been carved into the forms of gnomes standing upon the shoulders of their comrades, all the way to the ceiling high above.

"Lots of shadows," Mole commented. "Lots of places to hide." The others nodded, recognizing what the gnome had; while the magical dancing flames provided enough light to illuminate the entire chamber, their flickers and movements made that illumination very conducive to the sneaking of the treacherous skulks.

"By the fountain," Arun said, gesturing with his hammer. They could see that to one side of the fountain, at the far end of the chamber, several piles of loose rubble were scattered near another tunnel entrance. The four adventurers started in that direction.

As they passed one of the glowing globes, Mole reached up and touched it, smiling as her hand passed through the flickering light.

"Careful, Mole!" Zenna hissed in warning.

"Oh, it's just another illusion," Mole said. "It's not like I haven't seen this sort of thing, you know."

Zenna turned, frowning. She knew, and it was yet another reminder of the life she'd chosen to leave behind.

They were nearing the center of the room, having passed by several of the side corridors that exited the hall, when suddenly Mole stiffened.

"What is it?" Zenna whispered.

"I thought I heard something," she replied, scanning the darkness.

"I didn't hear anything," Ruphos murmured. But they all heard the next sound, a few moments later, the familiar twang of crossbows being fired.

Chapter 14

The first bolt glanced off of Arun's shield, skittering off one of the pillars with a noisy clatter. A heartbeat later, a second sliced out of the shadows in the direction of the fountain, clipping Mole on the side of the neck as it shot past. Had the unseen crossbowman's aim been a few inches to the left, the gnome would have been in serious trouble, but as it was the bolt merely grazed her.

Arun's reaction was quick and decisive. Rumbling some dwarven warcry, the paladin of Moradin hurled himself forward into a full-out charge toward the fountain and the source of the missiles. Mole hefted her crossbow and took careful aim, firing into the shadow where the bolt that had come at her had originated. Her return shot vanished into the shadows, although it was uncertain at first if she'd hit anything.

"Come on," she urged the others, drawing her shortsword and rushing after Arun.

Zenna took a step after her, but hesitated. Ruphos had taken up his holy symbol, holding it in one fist while clutching the lamp and mace awkwardly together in the other. His expression had shifted to that vacant look that it took on when he was communing with his patron, a look that Zenna understood, even though the source of her power was the Weave, rather than the might of some god. His lips moved, although Zenna could not make out the words that issued from his lips.

Whatever spell he cast, it only took a few seconds, and she could not immediately determine the result. She did, however, see the crossbow bolt than sank with a meaty thunk into the back of his thigh. Ruphos staggered forward with the impact, barely keeping his feet as he clutched at the protruding bolt. The lamp, however, fell from his grasp, smashing onto the floor with a crash that was immediately followed by a blaze of burning oil that spread outward into a fiery puddle on the stone floor of the chamber.

Zenna's eyes widened in horror and she scanned the end of the chamber and the tunnel from which they'd come, and where the bolt had to have originated. She could see nothing but shadows, though, continuing to shift as the magical globes of light twisted and danced.

The cleric also turned, limping heavily as he drew back from the spreading pool of flaming oil. He looked confused, and wasn't able to react in time to avoid a second bolt that streaked from the shadows to catch him hard high in the chest. His armor absorbed some of the impact, but the bolt still sank several inches into his shoulder, and he cried out as he fell to one knee, blood fanning out across his tabard from the wound. He wavered there, only barely remaining upright, a stricken look on his face.

Zenna was already moving, rushing to Ruphos's side. Although she could still not see their attackers, she knew that the skulks would reload quickly enough. She grabbed the cleric roughly by the shoulder, and felt something tear inside her as Ruphos screamed again in pain as she pulled at him.

"We've got to get to cover!" she yelled back, all but dragging him to his feet. The two of them lurched over to the shelter of one of the nearby pillars. Ruphos sagged to the ground against the base of the pillar as she released him, his face pale and his breathing labored. She was dimly aware of the noises of battle on the far side of the room, where Mole and Arun had engaged the original group of ambushers. Her attention, however, was fixed on those behind, and on the wounded man clinging precariously to consciousness at her feet. As if to confirm the threat, a bolt suddenly glanced off of the pillar less than a foot from her face, ricocheting wildly off into the shadows. Suddenly she caught sight of movement, and the gleam of metal glinting in the flame of the dancing lights. A rapier, a first appearing disembodied like the magical glows, until her eyes adjusted and she could make out the color-shifting form of the skulk holding the weapon. A moment later she spotted a second, even as it lowered its empty crossbow and drew its own rapier.

Apparently they'd seen her as well, as they charged straight for the pillar that sheltered her and Ruphos, separating to come at them from both sides at once.

Zenna ducked back behind the pillar, her heart pounding in her chest, knowing that they would be on her in a few seconds. She glanced down and saw the Ruphos had lost consciousness, a bright red stain continuing to spread across his jerkin from the wound in his shoulder.

Steeling herself, she took a deep breath, and started walking backwards.

She was about six feet away from the pillar when the skulks appeared, one from around each side of the granite shaft. At this range, she could see them clearly, even though the shifting light and continuously changing color of their skin combined to make it difficult. They glanced down at the fallen cleric, clearly no longer a threat, and then at her. She continued to retreat, moving at a deliberate pace, even though her instincts told her to run.

The skulks exchanged a glance and came for her, warily but with their intent clear.

She'd readied the spell, and the words came pouring from her lips, her hands weaving a pattern that echoed the complex matrix of the Weave that powered magic in the Realms. The skulks realized what she was doing and rushed at her, but before they could draw close enough to strike her color spray engulfed them. The blaze of light lasted only a heartbeat, but when the afterimage had faded, both skulks were lying on the ground, unconscious.

As Zenna reached for her dagger, she felt a surge of memory of another encounter on the road to Cauldron, a memory accompanied by a surge of revulsion. But there was no way around it; the spell only incapacitated a foe for a few seconds, and she had no illusions about what these skulks would do to her and her friends if they got a second chance.

A short time later she was crouching beside Ruphos. His breathing had grown weaker, but at least he still lived to draw breath. Gently she took his head and drew it back until his mouth opened, and then she upended the vial given to her by Jenya into the dying cleric.

There wasn't much liquid in the vial, not enough to choke him, and almost as soon as it entered his body the healing power infused into the fluid began its work. Zenna gritted her teeth and yanked the bolt out of Ruphos's shoulder, twisting it free of the torn links of chain of his armor shirt. Even as she drew it out, the wound closed, the flow of blood ceasing. She attended to the bolt in his leg in the same fashion, aiding the healing magic as it finished its work.

Ruphos opened his eyes. The healing potion had been potent; the man's serious wounds had been fully cured. For a moment he just looked up at her, something flashing deep within those deep brown eyes as she stared at her. The scrutiny was enough to make Zenna suddenly blush, and she quickly drew back, rising into an awkward crouch. He opened his mouth to speak, but was interrupted by another voice from behind the mage.

“Are you all right?”

Zenna and Ruphos turned to see Mole, a look of concern on her face. She looked unhurt, although the shortsword in her hand was slick with blood. She glanced down at the two dead skulks, regarding them with a matter-of-fact appraisal that seemed odd coming from a girl who would still be considered a teenager, by human standards. As Ruphos nodded, and got up, Mole gestured back toward the fountain.

“We got one, but the second fled into the tunnel. Arun chased after him, but we’d better help him! Hurry!”

She darted back toward the tunnel, the others close behind.

Chapter 15

Arun barreled down the confines of the narrow tunnel like a boulder rolling down a steep slope, heedless of trap or ambush. His arm stung where a skulk’s rapier had briefly penetrated his defenses, but he ignored the hurt as a trifling thing, certainly nothing in the face of the evil that required immediate smiting.

The others might be behind him, or might not; the thought did not distract him from his purpose. He was used to fighting alone, outnumbered but standing fast against the forces of evil. His new companions were competent enough, he supposed—even that bumbling boy-cleric. The gnome girl had surprised him again, forcing him to yet again rethink his assumptions about the inhabitants of the world outside the Rift. A world that was in many ways till new to him, a world into which he’d been thrust eight months ago.

He’d been engaged with a pair of the skulks, and had already taken one hit to the arm when she’d rushed boldly into the melee, apparently fearless, stabbing one of the skulks in the back with her shortsword. The creature had turned to face her, opening itself to a crushing blow from Arun’s hammer that had dropped it flailing to the ground.

He’d gotten a glancing hit on the other before it had disengaged and fled into this tunnel, but Arun was far too canny to assume that it was no longer a threat.

The tunnel ended up ahead, slanting up steeply to a small opening in the ceiling a good seven feet above the floor. This wasn’t going to be easy. Arun barely hesitated before shrugging out of his shield, and sliding his warhammer into the straps across his back. With his strong hands and feet working in unison he propelled himself up the steep slope, latching onto the edges of the opening and pulling himself through.

He’d expected the attack, so it was no surprise as he sensed the movement behind him. The attack was rushed, though, desperate, and instead of running him through the rapier just glanced off of his shoulder-plate, narrowly missing his neck. Arun heaved himself clear of the opening and rolled forward, one of his light hammers coming into his hand as he regained his feet and spun to face his adversary.

The skulk was fleeing, darting toward the far side of the room where one of the round gear-doors could be seen. It didn't make for that closed portal, however, instead reaching for an empty torch-sconce set into the wall.

Its hand closed around it at the same moment that Arun's hammer slammed hard into its back.

The skulk crashed into the wall and spun away, its legs thrashing as it let out a terrible moan of pain. Arun stepped forward to stand over it, his second hammer ready to hurl in his hand.

"No keel," the creature said, huddling against the wall, covering its head with its arms. It spoke in Undercommon, a tongue in which the dwarf was fluent, a language commonly understood within the deep ways under the Great Rift. "Warf no keel, me helps, no hurts, no keel."

Arun regarded it coldly, tapping the butt of his hammer against his open palm.

* * * * *

Mole, Zenna, and Ruphos found him there just a few minutes later, Ruphos's mace glowing with the bright glow of a light spell. Zenna briefly reported the outcome of the failed ambush from behind, but their attention was fixed on their captive, who shrank from their scrutiny. The dwarf indicated the sconce that the creature had been trying to reach, and Mole quickly discovered that the wall contained a secret door, operated by turning the bracket to the side. They left that, for the moment.

The room was relatively compact, with one corner dominated by the hole leading down to the tunnel below. A foul stench filled the place, the source immediately obvious as the carcass of a slain creature. The thing was some sort of giant worm-like insect, its body culminating in a gaping maw ringed with almost a dozen long tentacles. Arun identified it as a "carion crawler," and all of them gave it a wide berth. There was also a small heap that turned out to be a collection of chain shirts and bucklers, obvious designed by and for gnomes. Mole examined those, and admired the workmanship. After a moment's consideration, she took one of the chain shirts and shrugged into it, replacing her breastplate of boiled leather.

"Well, if we're going to be getting into all these battles," she said, at Zenna's querying glance. Tucking her hair back over the rear of the shirt, she spun and asked, "How do I look?"

The others did not reply, their attention focused instead on the captive skulk, whom Arun was interrogating in a harsh, guttural language. Zenna walked over to them, noticing that the skulk cringed at her arrival.

"What have you found out?" she asked him.

“Well, they’ve been working with the gnome—the locksmith—all right,” Arun said. “Though he blames the kidnapping of the children on the ‘creepers.’ I imagine that they’re the ‘short ones’ that Ghelve spoke of.”

“Where are the children now?” Ruphos said. He looked at the wounded skulk with a mixture of pity and revulsion, but made no move to help it.

“It says that they’re somewhere below, in ‘Dar Drumbos Malachot’... ‘the Malachite Fortress’.”

“Why do I not like the sound of that?” Zenna asked.

“Oh, and he says he knows where the gnome’s rat is, if you care,” Arun said.

“Well, if we run across it, let’s take it,” Zenna said. “It can keep him company in prison.”

While Arun, Zenna, and Ruphos confronted the skulk, Mole had walked over to where they carcass of the carrion crawler lay. Her nose wrinkled as she studied it, but then she saw something that caught her eye. Walking around to the side of the creature, she prodded it with her sword.

“Hey, guys, I think I found something here...”

They turned as she lifted a heavy flap of rotting flesh that had been cut in the creature’s side. The smell redoubled as she revealed the creature’s insides, but she also revealed a pair of small wooden coffers that had been jammed into the crawler’s guts.

“Ah, sneaky little buggers,” Mole said. She grimaced as she reached in, her boot making a sickening plop as it stepped in the crawler’s decaying organs. After a few more exclamations, “Oh, that’s just gross! Oh gods, I’m going to be smelling that for a week!” Mole had both coffers out where they could all see them.

“We don’t have time to be playing around with dead bodies and treasure chests,” Ruphos said. “Remember the divine message... we may have already lost our chance to find the children!”

“Oh, there’s always time to play around with treasure chests,” Mole said cheerfully as she scraped the crawler’s guts from her boots with her sword and tried to get most of the gunk off of the coffers. Then she knelt before them, examining them carefully. “You guys have to finish questioning that skulk anyway—hey, shine that light over here, will you?”

Zenna caught Ruphos’s gaze and smiled, shrugging while she and Arun turned back to the skulk. The dwarf continued with his interrogation, while Zenna suggested a question or two for him to pose. The skulk seemed utterly broken, occasionally breaking into a screech or a wail of pain, his cries only growing worse when the dwarf threatened him. It became clear after a few minutes, however, that it knew little more than what it had already told him.

"It's stalling for time," Zenna finally said. "It knows that an alarm has probably been issued, and it expects others to come looking for us."

"I suspect you're right," the dwarf said.

"Hoo, boy!" Mole exclaimed. She'd gotten the first of the coffers open, and was exclaiming over a hefty pile of copper, silver, and gold coins inside. Ruphos stood over her shoulder, holding aloft his lighted mace, impatience written clear on his face. "So what do we do with him?" he asked, gesturing at the skulk.

The answer came swiftly, as Arun suddenly brought his fist down, crushing the skulk's head with a single solid blow from his hammer. Ruphos jumped, then turned on the dwarf with an angry look on his features.

"He'd surrendered!" he protested. "You... you killed him in cold blood!"

"Aye," the dwarf said, meeting the cleric's gaze squarely. "And what do you think he'd do, if our places were reversed? How do you think those children felt, when him and his pals crept into their rooms at night, and tore them away from the safety of their beds?"

Ruphos did not answer, but his feelings were clear in his face. Biting off a curse, the dwarf turned away. "Get your stuff," Arun told them. "We're getting out of here."

Mole let out a small sound, hurriedly pouring the contents of the second coffer into a small sack. She tried to fit the sack, already bulging with the coins from the first coffer, into her backpack, but had some difficulty getting it to fit.

"Oh, here," Ruphos said, taking the sack from her and lifting it. "Hey, this is heavy!" Still, he managed to fasten it to his belt, tying it fast with a simple knot.

Mole smiled. "Oh, yeah."

The dwarf crossed to the torch sconce, turning it so that the secret door in the wall popped open. All of them, with the exception of Mole, who was trying to estimate how heavy the sack carried by Ruphos actually was, had grim looks on their faces as they moved back into the halls of Jzadirune.

Chapter 16

The secret door opened onto a corridor that ran ahead and to their left. To their left a set of stairs led down to the main hall where they'd fought the skulks, so they went straight, where the corridor forked again after a short distance, a side-branch heading off to their right. Reaching that intersection, they saw that to the right the corridor continued a short distance before ending in one of the gear-doors, while ahead it opened onto a room.

"What about these doors?" Zenna asked. "The skulks don't appear to use them, and if they're setting an ambush for us somewhere ahead, maybe we should try another route."

“The skulk said they’re all trapped,” Arun reported. “That’s why they don’t use them.”

“Beware the doors with teeth,” Zenna said. “That’s was in Jenya’s divination.”

“Gnome traps can be tricky things,” Mole confirmed. So they pressed on ahead, toward the chamber.

Ruphos’s light pushed back the shadows, revealing a oval-shaped room with a vaulted ceiling a good fifteen feet above. Another passage identical to the one they entered through exited on the far side of the room, and another gear-door was visible in the wall to their right. But their attention was drawn to the center of the room, where a stone-rimmed bath easily twenty feet long took up much of the floor space in the room. A grinning stone mouth poured water into the bath from above, which in turn swirled into a drain on the far side. But that wasn’t what had caught their eye; rather, it was the network of cobwebs that cluttered the ceiling, and the man-sized husk that dangled from them just above the center of the pool.

“Ugh, spiders,” Mole said.

“I think I know the drill here,” Zenna said. “We go for the body, expecting to find some nice treasure, and then the spider—probably hiding somewhere above—goes for us. No thank you.”

“Maybe we should go back, through the main hall,” Ruphos suggested. “There were several other exits without doors that we didn’t try.”

“Bah, it’s just a bug,” Arun said, stepping into the room. They noticed that he remained near the wall, however, giving the pool a wide berth as he headed for the far exit. The others followed, all eyes on the webs above.

“Too bad,” Mole said, glancing at her soiled boots. “I could’ve used a bath, too.”

They were halfway around the room when the spider leapt out of the pool—apparently not inconvenienced in the least by all the water—and sprang at the gnome.

The thing was the size of a pony, but several times as fast, darting forward with its eight hairy legs clacking slightly on the stone floor as it moved. Its fangs were the size of daggers, and it stabbed them as Mole as the gnome shrieked and tried to get out of the way. Her crossbow went off, but in her panic the shot went wide, glancing harmlessly off of the far wall of the room.

Ruphos, just a few steps behind her, surged in, grabbing the gnome even as the spider lunged. Its fangs snapped on empty air as the cleric spun and dragged Mole out of its reach, tossing her behind him. The spider did not relent, immediately turning on the human and directing its terrible bite at this larger, juicier prey. Ruphos screamed as the vermin bit him in the leg, injecting its poison into the wound.

The cleric’s companions rushed to his aid. Zenna fired her crossbow at its fat abdomen, but the bolt merely glanced off of its leathery hide. Arun was there a moment later, charging with his heavy warhammer at the ready. His blow caught the spider solidly into the center of its torso, and there was an audible crack as the beast sagged under the force of the blow. It turned toward the dwarf—slower, this time, clearly crippled—but before it could mount a new attack, Mole darted in behind it and thrust the length of her small blade into its body. With a terrible screech, the spider crumpled, its legs twitching violently before it finally fell still.

“Ruphos, are you all right?” Mole asked, as the cleric leaned against the wall, his face a rictus of pain. He was clutching the wound with both hands, and soon they could see the glow of healing spread from his fingers into the wound.

“It... the poison... I’ll be all right, just a little weak,” he said.

Zenna, who was reloading her crossbow, glanced up and saw two more spiders descending from the webs, one crawling along the slanted wall toward them while a second dropped on a slender strand of webbing directly toward Arun. These were smaller, perhaps the size of small hounds, but still imposing as they dropped to attack. “More of them!” she shouted, quickly fumbling a bolt into place.

“Blasted bugs!” Arun shouted, as the spider dropped onto his shoulder. It tried to bite him, but its sharp fangs only glanced off of the metal plates of his armor. Arun snapped his hammer up into its face, knocking it roughly off of him to the floor a few paces away, where it skittered, dazed.

The second spider looked to be heading toward Ruphos, but Zenna’s bolt transfixed it, holding it against the wall for a moment before it fell heavily to the floor. Ruphos drew quickly back out of its way.

Mole, meanwhile, drew a bead on the spider Arun had wounded. She drew a long knife out of her boot and hurled it at the vermin, scoring a hit to the head that finished the creature.

The four companions scanned the webs, looking for more attackers, but it seems that if there were more spiders, they were content to let the adventurers be for now. “Let’s get out of here,” Zenna said, her crossbow covering the webs as she backed away.

No one disagreed, so they left via the other passage, Ruphos still limping slightly as he followed behind.

[Story Note: following the suggestion given in the module, and the fact that the events here are following a time schedule that doesn’t really allow for retreat/rest, I allowed the characters to level during their progress through Jzadirune. All 3 of the 1st level characters had sufficient xp to reach 2nd level after the spider encounter, with Zenna well on her way to 3rd. Zenna won’t get to memorize new spells, of course, until she has a chance to rest and study, and she won’t get to add new spells to her spellbook until the next break between adventures. Readers familiar with the module will also note that the scroll that Mole found has an additional... surprise... that may become important later. ;)]

Chapter 17

“It looks like this complex is just a big ring around the center stairs,” Mole said, studying the map that they’d gotten from Ghelve. “It also looks like we’re not going to get anywhere without getting through some of those doors... at least not through the normal passages.”

“So it’s back to the skulk tunnels,” Zenna said. “Wonderful.”

They were back in the main hall, occupied only by themselves, the magical dancing lights, and the bodies of the skulks they’d slain earlier.

“Well, I think...” Ruphos began.

“I know,” Arun interrupted. “You want to go back to the surface, get help.”

Ruphos shook his head. “Actually, what I was going to say, is that we should see about finding the entrance to this ‘Malachite Fortress’. What did the skulk tell you about how to get down there?”

Arun looked hard at the cleric for a moment, then nodded. “He said that there’s a lift that connects the gnome enclave to the fortress. It’s accessed by a secret door, he said that it’s in the area occupied by the leader of the creepers, to the northeast.”

“Descend into the malachite hold, where precious life is bought with gold,” Zenna intoned.

Mole elbowed her. “Stop it with that, will you? It’s creepy.”

“Nonetheless, the divine message has not steered us wrong yet,” Ruphos said. “We should pay heed to its guidance.”

“Bah, I prefer a god who speaks clearly, and not in stupid riddles,” Arun said. He hefted his hammer. “Well, if we’re going to thrust our heads into the dragon’s mouth, let’s be about it, then!”

“Let’s try the tunnel that the first skulk took, the one that got away,” Mole suggested.

They retracted their steps to that room. Ruphos’s light spell had faded, but Mole had a few torches in her bag that she handed to the cleric to illuminate their way. Soon they were back in that first room off of the chamber of the masks. The room was dark now, the sunrod that they’d seen before lying expired on the floor where they’d left it. The body of the skulk, they instantly noticed, had been drawn out of the mouth of the tunnel and left to the near the adjacent pile of rubble.

“Somebody’s been along this way,” Arun warned, needlessly.

The dwarf led them into the new tunnel. This one stretched on for far longer than the ones they’d taken earlier, and they crept warily down its length for a good while before it crooked to the left and then back right again, drawing them gradually to the east. Finally they reached a fork, with the tunnel splitting off into identical tubes heading north and south. Following the directive given by the skulk prisoner, Arun led them to the north.

The tunnel continued for a good forty feet or so before it emerged on the eastern edge of a lengthy hall. The chamber stretched a good fifty feet or so ahead of them, and was perhaps twenty feet across. Arun, with his darkvision, could just make out another rough-hewn tunnel at the far end of the hall, and two passages that exited via the north and south walls. There was a pile of rubble stacked against the wall to their right, but other than that the place appeared barren, empty.

“And if you believe that, I’ll be sellin’ you a diamond mine I know of,” the dwarf grumbled.

“What’s that, Arun?” Mole asked.

“Nothing. Stay alert.”

The dwarf moved warily into the chamber, the others crowded into the mouth of the tunnel behind him. He’d barely managed a few paces, however, before a warning from Mole brought him up short.

“Arun!” she hissed. “You’re... fading!”

The dwarf looked down at himself—it was true, as he watched he found that he could see through his arm to the floor below, and a heartbeat later there was nothing, not even an outline of his bulky, armored frame. It was as if he had suddenly become disembodied, a ghost without tangible substance; except that he could feel his body around him, nothing had truly happened to him save for the shroud of invisibility that had drawn about him.

Belatedly, the dwarf realized that the others did not realize what had happened. “Arun! Are you...” Zenna cried out softly.

“I’m all right, just invisible,” he told them. He moved about, slightly relieved that he could still hear the sounds of his passage.

“Another persistent magical effect,” Mole said. She stepped out into the room, ignoring Zenna’s word of caution, holding up her hand before her so that she could witness the effect more clearly. Sure enough, the hand began to fade from view just a few moments after she entered the room.

She was distracted, however, at the sound of a voice that echoed clearly from the far end of the chamber. “Taral yan zygge!” it said, the voice rough and masculine.

“Hey, that’s gnomish!” Mole said. As she was already invisible, however, her friends could not see the sudden look of realization that hit her face, as she realized exactly what in her tongue the words signified...

A loud creaking noise, metal protesting being forced into motion, filled the room. Its origin was close, close enough almost to feel the vibrations as a solid thump! followed the initial sound, followed a moment later by an almost painful metallic screech. Before any of them could react to these sudden developments, they heard yet another sound, a loud dwarven cry of pain that was followed by a clatter of metal falling upon unyielding stone. Arun's hammer suddenly appeared, falling to the ground and skittering to a stop a few feet away, as did a spray of red droplets that hung in the air for an instant or two before falling to splatter on the stone floor.

Chapter 18

"Arun!" Zenna cried. She nearly rushed into the chamber, but Ruphos held onto her, knowing that whatever had struck down the dwarf was still raging within the invisibility. As the noise of its initial assault faded, however, the air seemed to solidify from where the noises of creaking and whirring continued to issue, and the form of their attacker took shape.

It was a mechanical shape, a construct of plates and gears that had the look of an iron barrel, with squat legs and stubby arms that ended in heavy, pointed steel heads shaped like the ends of a flanged mace. It had no discernable eyes, ears, or mouth, but it clearly had no difficulty marking them as targets even within the aura of invisibility. It came forward toward the tunnel entrance, where Zenna and Ruphos watched in horrified fascination. Zenna hefted her crossbow, although it was difficult to see how a mere bolt could harm such a thing, while Ruphos stepped boldly in front of her, holding his mace tightly in both hands.

"Blasted hunk of junk!" came Arun's voice, pain warring with anger in his tone. The hammer lifted off of the ground, wavering slightly before coming up high, poised to attack.

"Wait!" Mole said, her voice likewise issuing from thin air, but directly in the path of the automaton. "Mek taral neth!" she cried, speaking in the gnome tongue. Halt, don't attack!

The automaton lurched to a stop, the spinning heads on its arms grinding to a halt and dropping down toward the ground. Arun's hammer came to a halt as well, directly behind the creature, still hanging ready in the air. "Well?" the dwarf's voice came to them. "We smashing it, or what?"

Mole clapped her hands together. "It does what I say!" she said, gleefully. She gave it a command in gnome, and obediently the machine turned about, moving slowly in a circle. After a few moments the invisibility effect present in the room began to take effect upon it once, more, and the automaton faded from view.

"We've got ourselves a new ally, it would seem," Zenna noted.

* * * * *

The companions quickly took stock of their situation. A bit of cautious probing uncovered the limit of the invisibility effect, which was apparently a sphere perhaps fifteen feet across. A second one was located on the far side of the room, where the command that had unleashed the automaton upon them had originated. The spheres were fixed in place, and only affected beings that moved into them; once they left the radius of the effect, the individual returned immediately to visibility.

Ruphos treated Arun, who'd been grievously wounded by the automaton's assault. The dwarf did not complain, this time, as the cleric channeled healing energy into the stricken paladin. The four of them, trailed by the lumbering automaton, gathered in the center of the hall, where they could see each other free of the invisibility spheres. Mole was continuing to experiment with the device, giving it a variety of commands. The pulverizer was powerful, but unreliable; often it would hesitate or simply stand there for up to half a minute before finally lurching into action.

"What should we name it?" Mole asked the others. "How about, 'smashy?' You like that, Smashy?"

The automaton, of course, did not comment, but Arun, Zenna, and Ruphos shared a concerned look, standing close together and speaking in low voices.

"We can assume that the creepers know we're here, and that they may be preparing an ambush as we speak," Zenna said. "If they're not watching us right now... with that invisibility effect, one could be standing right over there and we'd never even know it."

"Well, that one that ordered the golem to attack either fled, or it's hiding," Arun said matter-of-factly. "Either way, it's a coward."

"We can't underestimate them," Zenna insisted. "Those tunnels are perfect for a surprise attack, and there's little we could do to react."

"I'm more worried about our resources," Ruphos added. "My spells are almost depleted, and we don't have much more in the way of healing. I have a single potion that Jenya gave me, but it is only good for one treatment."

"Hey, I still have my potion as well," Mole said, stepping into their circle. "And now that we have Smashy here, perhaps we can take a... different approach."

The three taller companions exchanged a glance, and looked expectantly at the gnome.

Chapter 19

Trust.

Trust was a double-edged sword, one that could turn on you and be thrust into your back when you least expected it. This was a truth that Yuathyb understood all too well, given what he was, and his current position.

The fact was, he was desperate, but he kept that fact well hidden from his minions. He'd always been suspicious of them, a wise precaution in any circumstances, but especially so given recent developments. Over the last few days, he's seen the way that the creepers had looked at him, the furtive glances that seemed to be weighing options, opportunities...

He did not blame them for that. In their circumstance, he would likely be doing the same thing.

One of the creepers came over to him, nimbly avoiding the broken pottery and glass that carelessly littered the floor. Of course, there was nothing careless about it, but there was nothing to be done for it now anyway.

The creeper looked up at him with hooded eyes, the rest of its face covered by the enfolding wrap of his cloak. Yuathyb knew what it was thinking, knew it was trying to judge how far the sickness had progressed since their last meeting, but he refused to draw his own cloak closer around himself.

“Report,” he snapped.

“They have taken control of the automaton,” the creeper hissed. “They have a gnome among them. Mzrak is keeping watch, in the tunnel.”

Outwardly, Yuathyb betrayed nothing, but inside he cursed. He should have anticipated that the intruders might have a gnome among their number. He glanced at the skulk, who at the moment was living up to its name, huddling in a corner. The creature had been less than useless in terms of describing the intruders, failing to report even this basic snippet of information, but the stalker could not blame it, either; at least the blasted things were consistent in their cowardice.

Yuathyb turned back to his minion. “Tell Mzrak not to engage, but to monitor the progress of the intruders and report back. We will ambush them here, and put an end to their meddling in a single blow.”

The creeper nodded, an anticipatory gleam in its dark eyes as it bowed incrementally before darting away toward the tunnel entrance.

The stalker watched it depart. The two other creepers that remained eyed him with the same evaluating stare as their companion, but Yuathyb ignored them, already lost in the complex machinations of thought.

He did not believe that the creepers would betray him—not now, with a common enemy to fight. Perhaps after these enemies were beaten, if he were left sufficiently weak, but Yuathyb was too canny a veteran to let himself be drawn directly into a battle if minions were available instead. They resented him, to be sure, particularly so with the memory of the lesson he’d had to impart just a few days ago fresh in their minds. It was a pity that had been necessary; he could have used Zirtak’s skills in the coming confrontation.

A sound drew his attention, a metallic scrape that seemed to come from the direction of the gnome door in the south wall. His creepers and the skulks alike avoided all of the gnome portals with their resetting traps and defensive wards, still quite potent despite the decades that had passed since the gnomes had abandoned Jzadirune. Once Yuathyb had discovered the pulverizer, they’d been able to create new tunnels that bypassed the doors, making them moot.

The stalker gestured, and one of the creepers slinked over to the door, careful not to touch it, leaning close against the wood to listen.

Suddenly there was a loud CLANG! and the door shuddered visibly. Almost immediately, a dense cloud of cloying purplish smoke erupted from all around the threshold, engulfing the creeper and filling a good portion of the space directly in front of the door. Yuathyb himself drew back quickly, although it was clear that the smoke was not spreading further into the room. The noise continued, accompanied now by the sounds of splintering wood as the door gave way before what had to be the assault of the automaton.

It would appear that I underestimated them, the stalker thought grimly to himself. He watched as the creeper staggered out of the cloud, clearly suffering its effects, his face ravaged and blackened, his cloak sagging as the acidic vapors continued to burn through the fabric. The creeper he'd sent just a few moments before emerged from the tunnel well away from the door, and Yuathyb froze the skulk who'd already begun edging away toward the passage exit in the north wall with a cold look.

The cloud was already beginning to clear. The stalker drew his sword, pointing it to the ruin of the doorway where the pulverizer was just coming into view.

His minions moved into position.

Chapter 20

As the cloud of acidic vapors triggered by the trap on the door cleared, the four companions could see the pulverizer automaton, its metallic hide scarred by the gas, continuing its assigned chore of dismantling the obstacle of the portal. Its twin rotating drills had already bored a sizeable hole in the center of the door, and it was now quickly widening it, sending shards of stone and wood flying.

"Well, I'd say we've lost the element of surprise, at least," Zenna noted dryly.

Arun moved up behind the automaton, trying to see into the chamber beyond. "Tell this thing to get out of the way," he said to Mole.

The gnome nodded, and ordered the automaton forward. The golem lowered its arms, and obediently lurched forward. The grinding noise of its movements had grown louder; apparently the cloud of corrosive gas had damaged its internal workings.

Arun followed the automaton into the room, which had the appearance of a ruined laboratory or workshop. Crushed pottery and shards of glass littered the floor, and tables surmounted with the ruin of once-extensive glassworks, shelves, and miscellaneous apparatus were pushed up against the walls. Also present was a short, squat, gnomelike figure, clad in a cloak that was a ruin of shredded fibers that barely hung together about him. Beady, hostile eyes met Arun's gaze, and he let out a terrible screech as he drew back, drawing a long dirk out from under his cloak. Arun hefted his hammer, but before he could do anything, the shadows around the creature seemed to thicken, gathering about him into a cloak of darkness that obscured his body from view.

“Your black sorceries will not save you from justice, fiend!” the dwarf shouted, stepping boldly forward into the room.

“What’s happening?” came Mole’s voice, from behind the door. The companions were pushing through the ruin of the doorway, but the jagged remnants of the portal that remained in the threshold were slowing their progress. Zenna’s face appeared through the gap, but then Ruphos pushed through, his mace in one hand and a torch in the other. Zenna was right behind him, holding her loaded crossbow at the ready.

As light from the burning brand flooded into the room, the shadow-cloaked creeper let out another angry cry. And the light revealed another short, cloaked figure who stepped out from the adjacent wall near the tunnel mouth to the left, right behind Arun...

“Arun! Watch out!” the cleric cried.

But the warning came too late, for even as he shouted, the creeper slipped up behind the dwarf and thrust his long knife into his side. The attack was devastating, punching through the gap in the dwarf’s scale mail under his arm and deep into the flesh and muscle and organs underneath. Arun staggered to the side, hurt badly, and the creeper cackled gleefully, his dagger slick with dwarvish blood along its entire length. The acid-burned one moved to join the attack, sweeping wide to come up on Arun’s far side to flank the dwarf.

Ruphos hefted his mace and prepared to come to the dwarf’s aid, but hesitated as a crossbow bolt lanced out from the right, narrowly missing him. He held the torch out in that direction, revealing a familiar tall form, its pale skin rippling with color to match the wall behind, already loading its bow for another shot.

“Skulk!” Ruphos warned. At his warning, Zenna lifted her bow and fired, though her hasty shot went wide and struck the table beside the skulk, smashing a clay beaker into a hundred fragments.

As if in response, another shadow stirred under a table near the wall just to the right of the door, the light from Ruphos’s torch refusing to penetrate its darkness as it started forward toward the two adventurers.

And it wasn’t as bad as it was going to get, either.

The light of Ruphos’s torch did not reach as far as the back of the room, leaving it a maze of deep shadows. From that direction a clear, angry voice filled the room. “Telath nur zyg’zet!”

And in response, the pulverizer, standing forgotten in the middle of the room, turned toward the dwarf, its drill-hands beginning once more to spin with their grinding cadence.

“Neth!” Mole cried, shouting at the automaton as she entered the room, biting off a curse as her cloak caught on the jagged edge of a shattered board. “Smashy, don’t!”

The automaton hesitated, caught between two conflicting commands. Finally it just stopped, lowering its arms, electing to do nothing.

From the back of the room came another command, spoken in a tongue that was rough and guttural, like pebbles being ground together. Arun was the only one among the four who spoke Undercommon, and thus understood the mandate directed at creepers and the skulk.

Kill the gnome!

“You’ll have to get through me, first!” he yelled back in challenge, sweeping his hammer with deadly force despite the grievous wound in his side. He assaulted the creeper in front of him, catching it with a glancing blow to its shoulder. The creeper drew back, summoning the magical shadow-cloak that protected its fellows before coming in again, its bloody knife darting in and out of the dark shroud at the dwarf. Meanwhile, the injured creeper came up on Arun from behind, seeking another weakness that it could exploit with a devastating sneak attack. Its knife came back, then darted forward...

And stopped, as the creeper, a dazed expression on its face, simply stood there, wavering. For several long seconds it hesitated, doing nothing, before it finally shook its head, clearing it of the mental fog that had descended upon it.

Just in time to clearly mark the hammer that came crashing down squarely upon its forehead.

Zenna nodded grimly as she witnessed the result of her spell. Arun turned to face his remaining opponent, but Zenna could not spare him any more aid at the moment. Ruphos had attacked the third creeper, while behind them, Zenna could see that the skulk had reloaded his crossbow, and was looking for targets. It staggered, though, as a bolt sank deeply into its side. The wizard glanced back and saw Mole, standing in the doorway, flashing her a thumbs-up before she started reloading.

Suddenly, out of the darkness, a long shaft came slicing directly toward her. Somehow instinct took over, and Zenna hurled herself aside, the javelin narrowly missing her before it slammed hard into the surviving jam of the door. Her heart pounding in her chest at the close call—she had no doubt that the missile would have killed her, had it struck her unawares—she lashed back without thinking, eschewing her magic for a more primal, basic power that was part of her very being.

A globe of pure blackness, darker even than the shadows beyond the radius of the torchlight, appeared in the back of the room. Zenna looked on in horror as she realized what she had done. She had tapped into the power of her mixed heritage—of the corrupt, shadowed side of what she was; a power that she’d sworn that she would never use. The taint that she’d hated all her life, ever since she’d learned what she was.

“Zenna! Are you all right?”

She looked up and saw Mole, her face a mask of concern. And also the shadow that rose up in the doorway behind her, a gleaming knife the only clearly discernable part of its form...

“Mole!”

Chapter 21

“Mole!”

The gnome saw her friend’s gaze shift, realized what it signified even as she dropped her bow and dove ahead to the side, out of the doorway. She felt the hot pain explode in her back even as she started to move, and knew that she’d been too late to react. Instead of dropping into a smooth roll that would have brought her back to her feet, she landed hard, sprawled on the stone, the impact launching a new wave of agony through her lower body. She tried to order her body up, but the pain fought her, freezing her muscles and slowing her movements. She did manage to pull herself up enough to look behind her, enough to see the creeper that was coming for her, its features obscured in shadow, its knife wet with her blood.

Arun and Ruphos were caught up in their own struggles as the battle in the chamber raged on. Having slain one adversary, Arun faced off against the other. Even seriously wounded, the dwarf was stronger and deadlier than the creeper, but its magical shadow-cloak made it difficult to discern its true location in the poor light. Already two punishing hammer-blows had gone astray, smashing only through empty shadows. The creeper was a canny opponent, darting in and out of the dwarf’s reach, stabbing with its small but still dangerous weapon. Although the dwarf’s armor had thus far protected him from another wound, it was uncertain which combatant would land the next, possibly deadly, blow.

Ruphos, meanwhile, had faced his adversary with bravery. He had height and reach over the smaller creeper, and his mace was a more formidable weapon than the creeper’s dagger. But the creeper’s shadow-cloak gave it a significant edge, one that it used to full advantage.

And the creeper wasn’t alone.

The cleric swung his mace in a determined blow that caught only empty shadows, overextending the priest as the weapon smashed against the wall hard enough to strike sparks. The creeper was quick to take advantage, darting in and stabbing Ruphos in the leg, leaving him with a shallow but painful wound. Ruphos quickly recovered and attacked again, more cautiously. This time he hit something solid, but the creeper darted back, not hurt seriously if it had been at all. Ruphos, gritting his teeth in determination, took a step after it, but staggered as a crossbow bolt from the skulk caught him solidly in the shoulder, almost in the exact spot where he’d been hit earlier.

“Aargh!” he cried in pain. The creeper cackled and leapt forward, and the priest hurriedly brought up his mace to defend himself. But instead of attacking him, the creeper took advantage of his distraction to slash at his off hand, knocking the torch out of his grasp.

The torch flared as it landed on the adjacent table, but while it remained lit it grew much dimmer, and the shadows throughout the room abruptly deepened.

Ruphos stumbled backward, and in desperation lashed out blindly with his mace. He felt a solid impact as he hit something hard, but it took him several long seconds to realize that the shadows in front of him had stopped moving, and that a dark form lay huddled at his feet.

Mole struggled to get her injured body to obey her, to get up before the creeper could reach her. It looked like a race that she was doomed to lose, but then, she saw a tall form rise up behind the creeper, and leap at it.

“Stay away from her!” Zenna shouted. She’d unclasped her cloak, and swept it out over the creeper’s head, catching it up in the folds of the garment. The creeper snarled and drew back, tearing a long rent in the heavy fabric with its sharp knife, fighting free.

“I’ll kill you, woman,” it hissed, turning toward her. Zenna, her face ashen, drew her dagger but did not back down.

Mole was not idle with the time that her friend had bought her. Digging in her pouch, she found the vial that Jenya had given her, and downed its contents in a single gulp. She felt as if someone had poured a cold waterfall through her body, its touch washing away the pain and weakness she’d felt. Leaping up, she drew her sword and charged at the creeper from the side. With its attention distracted between her and Zenna, the creeper was just a heartbeat slow to react, a heartbeat that cost it as Mole thrust the full length of her sword into its side. The creeper let out a strangled hiss as it stiffened, and fell to the floor.

Arun seemed to be slowing as he lost blood, while his creeper opponent, encouraged by the fact that the dwarf hadn’t been able to land a second blow, continued to dart in and around him, seeking an opening. Finally the hammer came around in a wide arc that overextended the dwarf, and the creeper gleefully leapt in to strike a finishing blow.

That was a mistake.

Abruptly Arun shifted, reversing the hammer and driving it hilt-first into the center of the shifting mass of shadows that shrouded the body of the creeper. The nimble creature tried to dodge, but wasn’t quite fast enough as the hilt crashed like a spear into his face with enough force to crush bone. The creeper fell, its defensive screen of darkness dissolving into wisps of black that quickly faded, still struggling as it tried to get up, to get away.

It failed on both counts, as the dwarf’s hammer came up and then down one more time.

The skulk, meanwhile, observing how the battle was turning, and not seeing any response from the dark stalker since the magical darkness had fallen over the back of the room, decided that discretion might, in this case, be the better part of valor. Following the curve of the wall, it started backing toward the back of the room, holding its loaded crossbow before it like a shield.

It didn't, apparently, work quite as well as a shield, as a bolt from Mole's bow caught it in the leg just above the knee. Combined with the wound it had already suffered, the new injury was just about too much for the hapless creature to bear. Dropping the crossbow, it fell hard against a table, sending crockery flying to the ground with a crash. Righting itself through a titanic effort, it tried desperately to get away, ignoring the painful scratches to its feet as it stumbled over the broken glass and pottery shards that littered the floor.

It made for the darkness, and the relative sanctuary that it offered, but came up short as the dwarf stepped into view, a light hammer cocked and ready to hurl in its hand. The dwarf shook his head.

The skulk slumped to the ground, beaten.

Chapter 22

The four companions, bleeding and battered, gathered wearily in a small chamber adjacent to the room where they'd battled the creepers. The room had been sealed by one of the gnome doors, but the automaton had made short work of it, surviving the blast of flames triggered by its opening. The skulk prisoner was on the floor between them, a defeated look on its face. The pulverizer automaton was in the corner, quiescent for now. Despite being seriously damaged, it was still a potentially potent weapon, one that they obviously did not want to leave lying around.

They'd been weakened, and their resources were all but depleted. Ruphos was out of healing spells, having used his final osiron to stabilize the skulk and keep it from bleeding out from the two punctures in its side and leg. Arun had not been pleased with that, but they'd needed answers, and none of them felt particularly like seeking out and challenging the mysterious leader of the creepers that had fled during the battle. Particularly not after the skulk had given them a description of the creature, the "stalker" named Yuathyb.

"We are fortunate that the leader did not join immediately in the attack," Mole commented. "One more skilled enemy in that melee, and things might have been different." Zenna nodded, but she remembered a javelin that had sped from the darkness, and the power she'd called upon in response, and shuddered.

"Your reprieve is going to be very short, skulk, unless you start talking, real fast now," Arun said to the prisoner in Undercommon. The dwarf's injuries were still serious, although he'd called upon the power of his patron god to stop the bleeding and ease his pain somewhat, and that and the escape of the enemy leader had not left him in a forgiving mood.

The skulk looked up at them. "If you swear upon your gods to set me free, I tell you everything." This one spoke a halting Common, enough for them to understand it through its thick accent.

Arun frowned, but Ruphos quickly stepped in. "Our need is great, and time is short," he said, more to the dwarf than to the prisoner. "We accept your terms, skulk, but all deals are void, if your words are false."

The skulk, however, seemed to have lost any motivation to dissemble. It spoke quickly, incorporating some words in Undercommon that the dwarf translated for the rest of them. They learned that the first skulk captive they'd taken had indeed misled them, directing them here to the lair of the stalker and its creeper minions rather than to the true location of the lift that provided access to the Malachite Fortress below.

"Tricky," Mole said. "Of course, we could have uncovered this, perhaps, if we'd brought the last prisoner with us, instead of bashing its skull in."

Arun did not respond in words, but his snort was a comment of sorts. The skulk, however, did respond, letting out a high-pitched whine and covering its head with its arms. "Hey, stop that, shut up," the dwarf said, kicking the skulk almost absently. The skulk subsided, its expression a mixture of fear and surly discontent.

On prodding, however, it revealed the rest of what it knew. The children, along with a number of other captives stolen from the city by the skulks and their creeper allies, were being held by a half-breed part-dwarf—the skulk could not be more specific—who commanded a significant force of hobgoblin renegades in the citadel deep underground. Apparently this creature and its followers were the ultimate driving force behind the abductions that had been going on in Cauldron, selling the captives to foul merchants who came up into the Malachite Fortress from the endless tunnels of the Underdark.

"This must be ended," Arun said, his hand tightening around the haft of his hammer as he spoke.

"Yes," Ruphos said. He turned to the skulk.

"We cannot let him go," Mole said. "He'd probably go right to this slaver... where else could he go?" The skulk drew back and let out a hollow noise from the back of its throat.

"You promise," it said. "You swear."

"I know," Ruphos said. "And the followers of Helm keep their word. I will personally intervene on your behalf with the city authorities, but we must take you into custody until this is finished."

"You sure you just wouldn't deal with it now?" Arun said, hefting his hammer. But he didn't press it when Ruphos shook his head.

"So you want to go back up?" Zenna asked, divining where Ruphos was going with this.

The cleric nodded. "We must retreat, if only briefly. I know that time is short," he said, forestalling Arun's interjection, "and I will return with you to face this slaver and his minions, but if we go on as we are, with our resources depleted, battered and wounded, we will be slaughtered to no gain."

Arun stared at him for a lengthy interval, then finally nodded. "You speak the truth, priest." He turned to the skulk and roughly dragged it to its feet. "Okay, we're leaving, and you keep quiet and don't try anything, skulk. Remember," he added, hefting his hammer, "all I need is an excuse. The priest wants to keep you alive, but I made no such promise."

The skulk whimpered but offered no resistance as they gathered up their gear and set out once again.

Chapter 23

A soft patter of rain, just a drizzle, really, could be heard against the sides of the house and the shuttered windows, the sound broken occasionally by a determined gust of wind that whistled past and departed on its way.

Only a faint, gray light made it through the narrow slats in the drawn shutters, but a single flame augmented that from a lamp atop one of the side tables, occasionally flickering as some small draft made it through the heavy boards.

That light shone on the six people gathered in the center of the chamber in Ghelve's Locks, standing in a circle near the partly-adjacent portal that led down to Jzadirune. Seven, if you counted the prisoner, the skulk kneeling on the floor under the watchful stare of Morgan, the undercleric of Helm.

"And so we returned here, but only to renew our supplies and possibly gain aid, before we head back to confront this slaver and his gang," Ruphos said. "Time is short, and the children might have already been taken beyond our reach."

Jenya Urikas nodded, the lamplight highlighting the determination written clearly on her features. "You have done well, Ruphos—all of you. When your message arrived, we came as quickly as we could, though not, I regret, quickly enough to give you more aid. We took Ghelve into custody; the locksmith, it seems, was no longer inclined to hide the truth, and he quickly admitted to us what he'd done."

"What will happen to him?" Mole asked.

"He will stand trial," Jenya said. "There were mitigating circumstances in his case, it seems, and clear coercion, but his actions still had very serious consequences. You will all be given a chance to speak, when he comes to judgment, but at the moment, we have a more pressing issue at hand."

"We'd better get going then, and be about this business," Arun said matter-of-factly. He looked better, since Jenya had healed him and the lingering injuries suffered by the other, but was still a sight with dried blood and grime caked on his armor and clothing.

"You've done the city a great service," Jenya said. "But this is a matter beyond the mandate I set for you. By nightfall I can have a fully armed patrol of the city Guard here, along with priests from the churches of Lathander and Tempus, in addition to our own clerics of Helm. We will launch a raid that will teach these... these vermin that would trade in children a lesson..."

“Jenya,” Ruphos interrupted, stepping forward. “I fear that we may not have even those hours. I was... I was reluctant to do this, at first, but I’ve become convinced that there is an urgency here, that the slavers may already be escaping with their captives while we speak. And if we return with an overwhelming force, this dwarf-creature and his followers may elect to kill their captives and flee into the Underdark before we can stop them. We have to return, and quickly...”

Jenya looked at her cleric, betraying a slight surprise in her expression before she schooled her features back to calm control. She nodded, taking his hand and bowing her head in respect.

Morgan, however, stepped forward as well. “Ruphos may be correct in his assessment, but you should send me, instead, Jenya,” he said. “Ruphos is not a warrior, and his spells are depleted.” Indeed, he looked impressive in his breastplate and greaves, standing several inches taller than Ruphos, his thick arms well-muscled, his heavy steel mace ready at his hip.

Jenya looked indecisive, but Zenna quickly broke in. “We—the four of us—have made a good team,” she said. “Ruphos should be there, at the end.”

Ruphos turned and looked at her in surprise. Morgan, on the other hand, did not bother to conceal his own feelings toward the tiefling wizard.

“Yeah, he’s one of us,” Mole added.

Ruphos smiled at her, then turned to Arun. The dwarf harrumphed, glancing deliberately to the side. Finally, though, he said, “Suppose it couldn’t hurt to have him with us, again.”

Jenya nodded. “Very well, then,” she said. Morgan opened his mouth to say something, but Jenya forestalled him with a raised hand. “Morgan, I need you to help raise support from the churches, while I go speak with the Council and the Guard. Take this wretch,” she said, indicating the skulk, “back to the temple, and see that he is securely held.”

“I swore an oath to him,” Ruphos said, frowning.

“I know,” Jenya said. “I promise he will not be harmed, until this is over and we can determine what to do with him.”

“So looks like it’s back into the maw of danger for us,” Mole said. But she was smiling as she said it.

Jenya, however, looked serious. “I am sending you four only to scout, and to see if you can find and locate the prisoners. If you run into trouble, don’t be afraid to retreat. The forces of the city will be following you as quickly as I can have them sent.”

She reached down to her belt pouch. “I wish I’d thought to bring more from the temple stores,” she said, “but take these, in any case.” She handed out several glass vials, healing potions, one for each of them. To Ruphos, she presented a slender wand of polished wood carved with hundreds of tiny etched symbols. “This wand’s spell is only of the sort designed to treat light injuries, and is not fully charged, but use it to aid your cause.” The cleric nodded, and took the offered device.

Morgan came forward, and gave the younger priest a slight clout on the shoulder. “Good luck,” he said. “And watch your back.” The look he shot at Zenna lingered just long enough to not be subtle, then he returned and took up the skulk.

“Helm, shine the light of your guidance upon these brave travelers,” Jenya said, holding her holy symbol aloft briefly as she laid a blessing upon them. Each of the four felt the divine energy course through them, dispelling doubt and reinforcing their resolve.

“Good luck,” she said. “And be careful.”

The four companions nodded, and turned toward the secret door. But before they reached it, the red curtain leading to the front of the shop parted, and two men stepped into the room. Their appearance was a surprise, since none of them had heard the bell on the front door, or their footfalls as they entered the front of the shop.

They were tall men, clad in leather armor with long gray cloaks damp from the rain, their cowls up. They were armed, with slender swords at their belts and the protruding outlines of what might have been bows visible under their cloaks. Both were clean-shaven, with strong features that showed the signs of frequent exposure to the outdoors. One was black-haired, with penetrating brown eyes, while his companion, a few inches shorter and lean of figure, had reddish-brown hair with eyes as blue as mountain pools.

Chapter 24

Morgan reacted swiftly, his mace darting up into a ready position, his other hand holding firm to the arm of the skulk. Arun, too, lifted his hammer, his eyes narrowing as he regarded the newcomers.

“Peace,” the blue-eyed man said to them. “We are not enemies.” Their posture, however, was that of cats waiting to spring, either to attack or flee, and their hands did not wander far from the hilts of the swords at their belts.

Zenna, who’d been peering at the face beneath the cowl, stepped forward. “You’re that elf we saw earlier, coming out of this place,” she said.

“Half-elf, actually,” the man said, drawing back his hood to clearly reveal his angular features and ears that rose to narrow points. “Though I’ve often heard that I favor my father.”

“Who are you?” Morgan demanded.

The half-elf offered a slight bow. “I am Fellian Shard, and my companion, here, is Fario Ellegoth.”

Jenya stepped forward, making a slight gesture toward Morgan that was intended to be placating. "I am Jenya Urikas, cleric of Helm," she said to them.

Fellian nodded. "I know who you are, Lady, and your companions as well."

"Oh?" Mole asked. "How is it that you know us, and we've never seen you before? Other than earlier today, that is."

"Yes, perhaps you'd better start with the answers, elf," Arun growled, still not having lowered his hefty warhammer.

Fario's expression darkened, but Fellian shot him a glance, and the man subsided. "I confess that we have been monitoring your progress," Fellian said. "We share the same goals, I suspect... we, too, are investigating the disappearances, and are interested in bringing the perpetrators of these crimes to justice. We observed your visit to the orphanage, and obviously drew the same conclusions that led you to Ghelve. You apparently had better success in ferreting out the truth than we did, however," he said, including his head slightly toward the skulk prisoner.

"I don't like sneaks," Arun said, and Ruphos added, "Why didn't you just make yourselves known to us?"

"I apologize for our secrecy, but we are outsiders here, and were not certain who we could trust."

"What is your interest in this, if I might ask?" Zenna asked.

"A friend of ours was among those taken," Fario said. "A wizard named Elethor Ashstaff."

Jenya nodded. "I know of him. A fine man, he sometimes performed feats of magic at parties for the children of the leading families of the city. He disappeared just over two tendays ago."

Both half-elves nodded. "Our investigations were not fruitful, until we started observing you," Fellian said.

"Now that you have uncovered who is behind this, we would aid you, and perhaps find our comrade," Fario added.

"And we should trust you why, exactly?" Morgan said, at the same moment that Arun grumbled, "I don't trust either of..." The two men looked at each other, their expressions suggesting that they were surprised and not entirely pleased at being in such close agreement on any matter, let alone this one.

"Trust is something that must be earned, not casually granted," Fellian said. "But from what you said earlier, I suspect that you could use our aid."

"Perhaps... if you would allow me to cast a spell, to help discern the purity of your motivations?" Jenya suggested. The two half-elves shared a look, but finally Fellian nodded. Jenya held aloft the silver symbol of her goddess, calling upon Helm's divine might. She closed her eyes, her lips moving soundlessly, and then fixed her stare firmly on both Fellian and Fario for a long minute. Neither half-elf flinched at her scrutiny, and finally she nodded.

"I sense no evil about them," she said. She turned to Ruphos. "But this is your mission, and I leave it to you to make the final decision."

Ruphos looked around at his companions, gauging their feelings. Finally he said, "Very well, you may come with us."

"Let's get moving, we've wasted enough time here," Arun growled, turning back toward the secret door.

And so the companions, now numbering six, returned to Jzadirune.

Chapter 25

With the information provided by the skulk, they were able to find the secret door without too much difficulty. It was located near the bottom of the twisting staircase that descended into Jzadirune from Ghelve's shop, and led to a short, blank corridor hidden within the stone. According to the skulk's directions, the secret passage provided access to the lift that descended into the Malachite Fortress. Whether it was guarded... well, the adventurers were too savvy to take anything for granted on that score.

"I miss Smashy," Mole said, as they moved into the corridor. Arun was still in the lead, but the half-elves were close behind, followed by the gnome and Zenna, with Ruphos again bringing up the rear. The cleric's torch was still the only light, but the half-elves were gifted with the low-light vision of their elvish parents, an ability that Mole shared as well, and of course Arun and Zenna needed no light at all. Fellian and Fario moved with a smooth grace, each seeming to complement the other, their short recurved bows ready with an arrow nocked, ready to be drawn and fired at a moment's notice. Arun could be heard to grumble every now and again as they followed him like twin shadows, but he did not offer any specific critique.

Zenna, for one, was glad to have them; although she hadn't been willing to admit it to the others, she'd been worried that the four of them alone would end up quickly in over their heads within the Malachite Fortress. Even the name seemed dark and foreboding, and the skulk's description of the slaver and his minions had been accompanied by genuine anxiety.

"The automaton was a useful ally," Ruphos said to Mole, "But we could not risk leaving it for the stalker, or any other hostile foe left in Jzadirune." With it already heavily damaged, it had only taken a pair of heavy blows from Arun's hammer, and they'd left the machine strewn in pieces in the lair of the creepers and their still-at-large leader.

The secret corridor was not lengthy, only about twenty feet long, and while they could not make out any obvious exit, the skulk had told them that they would find another hidden door that opened onto the lift. Even as Ruphos closed the secret door to the stairs behind them, Arun started in that direction, the others close behind.

Arun went straight to the far wall and started feeling at the stone. Fellian gestured for the others to remain back a short distance. "Be wary, there might be a trap," he said. "Perhaps you should let Fario and I handle the search."

"Bah, I've worked with dozens of different kinds of secret doors; the dwarves damn near invented the things, you know. Don't be trying to tell a dwarf about stonework," Arun said, moving along the length of the wall slowly, probing and prodding along the stone, carefully examining every detail in the stone surface of the wall.

With a wry look, Fario walked up to a place near the center of the wall where the dwarf had just looked, and reached up to touch a small protrusion about four feet above the floor.

"Perhaps you need some elvish eyes," the half-elf said, venturing a slight grin that contrasted with the dwarf's scowl. A slab of stone about four feet across swung open in the wall beside the trigger, pivoting on its vertical axis, revealing a dark space beyond.

But the grin evaporated as a sudden grinding noise erupted beneath them, lasting only a split-second before the floor collapsed beneath their feet.

Arun fell like a stone, plummeting to the floor of the pit. The fall was not severe, only about ten feet, but as he hit he splashed into a mire of a thick, black, clinging goo, the substance coating the floor to a depth of a few inches. It was not enough to break his fall, but dangerous nonetheless, as became evident as the dwarf felt hot pain sizzle where the viscous substance touched his flesh.

Fario lunged out and grabbed hold of the bottom sill of the secret doorway, dropping his bow to fall into the muck below. Even as he fell against the wall of the pit, he shot out his other hand to meet Fellian's. Their hands locked together and held their grasp even as Fellian swung forward and crashed against the wall beneath Fario, the former half-elf's feet dangling just a few feet above the acidic sludge covering the floor of the pit.

Even as she heard the click, Mole leapt backward, clearing the edge of the pit by inches. She collided against Zenna, who with Ruphos had been beyond the edge of the pit, thanks to Fellian's earlier warning for them to stay back.

"Are you all right?" Zenna yelled down to Arun, who was trying to stand up. Mole put her crossbow down on the floor and slipped off her small pack, digging in it for her coil of rope.

"Argh, by Moradin's blasted beard, this stuff burns!" the dwarf cried. Still, he managed to stand and stagger to the edge of the pit under them, although there was no way for him to manage the sheer walls without help. On the far side, under the secret door, Fario continued to hold on with one hand, supporting both his weight and the weight of his friend, his face twisted into a grimace with the weight of his effort.

"Hold on!" Ruphos said to them, standing behind Mole as she found and dug out the rope.

Distracted as he was, he didn't see the shadowy forms that came into view on the far side of the portal, or the glint of steel that shone in the light of his torch.

Chapter 26

It was Zenna who first detected the danger, but too late to save them from harm.

"Look out!" she cried, hefting her crossbow.

A long shaft shot out from behind the door, flying across the pit to strike Ruphos in the shoulder. The javelin did not bite deep, his armor protecting him from serious harm, but the cleric cried out in pain and surprise, dodging back as he wrenched the head of the missile free.

Zenna fired her crossbow, but the shot glanced off of the wall just left of the door. The portal formed by the rotating secret door was a pair of slit openings, each about two feet wide and four feet high, giving whoever was behind them excellent cover. The companions on the far side of the pit caught a glimpse of a ferocious humanoid visage for a moment before another javelin came flying out, narrowly missing Zenna and caroming violently down the corridor behind them.

"I have it!" Mole cried, hurriedly unwinding the rope and tossing one end down to Arun. "Help me!" she yelled to Ruphos, offering the other end to him.

The dwarf had quickly realized what was happening, and ignoring the blazing pain that continued to sizzle up his legs he turned and hurled one of his light hammers up toward the opening. The missile shot up just a foot over the threshold where Fario held on, but they did not hear the sound of a successful impact, only the delayed thump that indicated the hammer had hit a wall somewhere beyond.

Zenna crouched down and reloaded, while Ruphos and Mole grasped onto the rope. "It's no good, he's too heavy!" Ruphos said, even before Arun had taken up the rope. "He'll pull us right in after him... we have to anchor it somewhere!"

"I'm open to suggestions!" Mole replied.

Fario, meanwhile, was slipping, his body stretched by the strain of holding he and Fellian up by one hand. The two half-elves shared a quick look, some unspoken communication passing between them in that instant, and Fellian let go. He only dropped a few feet, landing easily on the slippery surface, but the acidic slime quickly went to work on his boots, smoking where the splash of his short fall had landed it on his leggings.

Ruphos, thinking quickly, turned and dashed down the corridor back toward the first secret door. For a moment he stood there blankly, faced with a featureless stone surface, but then he remembered the location of the triggering stone and swung the rotating portal open. The gnomish door was counterweight to swing back shut when he released pressure, but before it could close again he'd wrapped the end of the rope around his mace, and jammed it into the corner of the opening, where it was quickly wedged into place by the closing door.

“Go!” he cried back down the corridor.

The enemies behind the portal had not let up in their attack, although fortunately they had not apparently noticed the fingers hanging on at the base of the threshold. Another javelin shot out, this time aimed at Arun, thankfully glancing off of his armored torso without causing damage. A few seconds later a second shot out across at the far side of the pit, this one hitting Mole with a glancing hit that grazed her left leg.

“Ouch!” the gnome cried. She dove for her crossbow, hefting the loaded weapon and taking careful aim before firing. The bolt shot straight and true into one of the openings, where she was rewarded by a sudden cry of pain that turned into a bloody gurgle.

With Fellian’s weight removed, Fario grabbed onto the sill of the door with both hands and pulled himself up with a mighty heave. He was immediately faced with a heavily armored hobgoblin warrior, whose eyes widened with surprise as the half-elf rose up before him. The hobgoblin didn’t hesitate, eschewing the sword at his hip for the javelin that he already had in hand, thrusting the weapon like a spear at the half-elf. The javelin bit deep into his side, but Fario thrust forward anyway, tearing himself off the point and quickly drawing the shortsword from his belt. The hobgoblin backed away, trying to draw his own sword—and nearly stumbling over the body of his companion, Mole’s bolt lodged in its throat—but crumpled as Fario stabbed him in the gut, half the length of his short blade crunching through his armor into the organs underneath.

Arun had grabbed onto the rope, but hesitated as Fellian—already limping as the acid made short work of his boots—came up behind him. “Go!” he yelled, shoving the rope at him.

“You first, you’re hurt more!”

“Don’t be arguing, elf!” the dwarf roared, though the pain showed clearly in his face now as he all but dragged Fellian to the rope. The half-elf nimbly moved up the rope, although it was difficult given the current condition of his feet. Arun waited until he’d reached the lip of the pit, however, and Ruphos had pulled him over the edge, before he started up the rope. The rope had started to smoke where Fellian had touched it with his legs, but it held long enough for them the paladin to reach the relative safety of the top. Fario, meanwhile, had reappeared in the opening, waving to them that the way was now clear.

“Two dead hobgoblins,” he reported. “Well equipped, with heavy armor. It looks like this is the lift the skulk mentioned, there’s a wooden floor and a chain that connects with some sort of winch in the ceiling.”

“Good work,” Zenna said, “Especially since you were off your guard, climbing up.”

“I can’t take all the credit,” he replied. “Your markswoman there took out one, critical hit to the throat.”

“Well, he made me mad,” Mole said.

But their relief at winning past this difficult encounter quickly faded as they realized the difficulty of their current situation. All of them save Zenna were hurt, Arun seriously. His and Fellian’s boots were ruined, with only pitted leather left. Ruphos’s healing wand and Fellian’s own divine powers—the half-elf was a cleric of Shaundakul, as it happened—were able to treat their injuries, but of more pressing concern was how they were going to get across the pit.

“What about the rope?” Zenna suggested. “It should be long enough to make it across, and Fario can anchor it to something on that end...”

“The rope’s shot,” Arun broke in. “Between Fellian and I crawling up it with that stuff all over our legs, I’d not trust it to hold even the gnome here, not over that pit.”

“So what do we do?” Ruphos asked, tucking the wand back into his pouch. They were now restored somewhat, although Arun would be walking about on bare feet for the time being.

Mole drew out her map, the one that Ghelve had given them what seemed like days before. “Look, I’ll bet that the lift is this octagonal room here,” she said. “We should be able to get to it by going through these doors here, and here.”

“But we know those doors are trapped,” Zenna said.

Mole shrugged. “I don’t see another option.”

Arun hefted his hammer. “All right then,” he said. “Fario, you stay put, we’ll be there shortly. I’d stay away from the door, if I were you.” The half-elf nodded, and retreated back into the room, leaving the secret door propped slightly ajar.

Ruphos recovered his mace, and the companions set out once more.

Chapter 27

“Let’s try this way first,” Mole said, checking her map.

The passage in question was one of the side-branches of the skulk tunnels that they’d bypassed earlier. According to the map, it led back in the direction of the rooms that they wanted to get to, so Arun led them in that direction. The dwarf had insisted on maintaining his position of leadership at the front of the line, and Fellian did not further contest the issue. The half-elf moved close behind the dwarf, however, an arrow fitted to his bow.

The circular tunnel twisted and turned before straightening out once more and coming to an end beneath a steep shaft that led up to an opening in the ceiling about seven feet above them.

“Boost me up, I’ll lower the rope down to help the rest of you up,” Mole said. She’d rescued as much of her rope as wasn’t damaged by the acidic goo from the pit trap, leaving her with a segment about ten feet in length.

“I don’t like it, there might be something waiting for us up there,” Arun said.

“Well, unless you’re going to sprout wings, or can leap straight up seven feet...”

“Listen, you two,” Zenna broke in. “Whatever may be up there, it’s already heard you bickering, if it didn’t hear you coming fifty paces distant, what with all the clanking we’re making. Let’s lift Mole, but drop back down if you see anything dangerous, okay?”

Arun harrumphed, but he helped Fellian lift Mole up to the opening. The gnome nimbly leapt up into the opening, pulling herself through and disappearing from sight.

“Everything all right?” Zenna called up.

“Smells like skulk,” came the gnome’s voice, “but there’s no one here now. It’s just a little dead end-room, no obvious exists, but maybe one of those secret doors.”

“Lift me up,” Fellian said. “I’ll help her search.”

“We’ll all go,” Zenna said. “Arun, why don’t you come last, and we can all hold the rope to help you up, since you’re the heaviest.”

The dwarf grumbled some more at that, but helped each of them up in turn, then pulled himself up with the help of the rope. By the time they were all in the confines of the small chamber, Fellian had already located the secret door in the east wall, and they opened it to find the hexagonal room indicated on their map, just south of the lift. Unfortunately, that meant that there were still two of the trapped gnome-doors to navigate before they could reach Fario and the route down to the Malachite Fortress.

“I bet you’re wishing that you hadn’t destroyed Smashy now,” Mole said.

“Give it a rest, Mole,” Zenna said.

The room was mostly unremarkable, but what caught their attention immediately was a large, iron-bound chest sitting in the exact center of the chamber. Atop the chest was a small iron cage, inside which was a small brown rat. The rat, which had a white star-shaped patch of fur on its forehead, chattered excitedly as they entered the room, grasping the bars of its cage with its tiny paws.

“The locksmith’s familiar, I presume,” Zenna said.

“Ah, a treasure chest, allow me, this is my specialty,” Mole said, slinging her crossbow across her back and cracking her knuckles before starting forward. She’d barely gotten within ten paces of it, however, before the chest suddenly began to... move. A seam opened within its front, resolving into a gaping maw full of jagged teeth. Mole jumped back in surprise, letting out a startled, “Eep!” The cage and its occupant bucked slightly at the chest-creature’s movements, although it remained fixed to its perch.

“On second thought, maybe you’d better handle it,” she said to the others.

Chapter 28

The gap-toothed mouth expanded until it crossed half the width of the chest, then it started speaking, a rough, gibbous sound that filled the confines of the chamber.

“What is it saying?” Ruphos asked, his mouth twisted into an expression of disgust.

Arun had hefted one of his throwing hammers the moment the chest had started moving, but he held his throw as he listened to the spew of gibberish coming from the chest. “It’s speaking Undercommon,” he finally said, lowering the hammer fractionally. “Or at least it’s trying to, its accent is... poor.”

“What is it saying?” Fellian asked, echoing Ruphos’s question. He, too, had his bow half-ready to fire, but the chest-monster seemed content to hold its position, not advancing any closer to them.

“It says that it doesn’t want to fight us,” the dwarf said, his expression clearly conveying his skepticism. “It claims to have been set here to guard the rat, but it doesn’t sound quite content with its current employers.”

“Maybe you should tell it that it’s now unemployed,” Zenna said.

“I don’t know, maybe we don’t want to tick it off,” Mole said. She’d unslung her crossbow, and now pointed it warily at the chest as it continued to gibber at them.

“What is it, exactly?” Fellian asked.

“It’s a mimic,” Arun said. “Aberrations, shapeshifters that are sometimes found in the deep ways of the Underdark. They can imitate just about any inanimate object, and they’re tough combatants to boot. It may not look it, but that thing weighs several thousand pounds, and you’ll feel it when it hits you.”

“All the more reason not to make it mad,” Mole added.

“Will it let us pass?” Zenna asked.

“Hold,” Arun said to them, listening to the creature’s continued babbling. He said something to it in Undercommon, and the mimic responded.

“It says that it was tasked with guarding the rat, not the entrance to the Fortress. But it’s hungry—apparently the skulks only feed it rats and spiders.”

“Yuck!” Mole said.

“It’ll let us take the rat, if we give it something tasty to eat.”

“I shudder to think what that thing might find tasty,” Fellian said.

“Well, there was those skulks we killed in the room with the floating lights,” Mole said. “It’s only been a few hours, they probably aren’t too ‘ripe’ yet.”

“So you wish to deal with this... thing, then?” Ruphos asked her.

“Well, I certainly don’t want to fight it,” the gnome replied. “And we should probably take the rat; with the skulks dead, it’ll starve to death, and it’s not like it did anything wrong.”

Arun frowned. “I do not sense evil from the creature.”

“Well then, let’s get it a meal and be on our way,” Fellian offered.

Arun said something to the mimic in Undercommon, but it reared back, its huge maw twisting in a clear expression of distaste, spitting out a response. “It doesn’t savor the idea of eating skulks,” the dwarf said. “Apparently they smell and taste rather... poor.”

Zenna raised an eyebrow. “I’m not sure I’d want a guard creature working for me that knows what I taste like.”

“How about those hobgoblins we fought earlier?” Mole suggested.

“Great, now I’m a waiter for an aberration,” Arun said, turning back to the creature. But the mimic seemed amenable to the idea, saying that it hadn’t eaten a hobgoblin before, and was willing to accept the opportunity.

“Well, now we just have to find a way past these doors,” Mole said, as they moved past the mimic—giving it a wide berth—and approached the circular door. The portal seemed malevolent, threatening, given what they knew about the gnomish doors and their tricky traps.

“So all of these little doors are trapped, then?” Fellian asked.

“Well, the skulks thought so,” Zenna replied. “We only tried two, and one shot out a cloud of acidic gas, and the second a blast of fire.”

“Yes, and we don’t have our special door-opener any more,” Mole pointed out. She moved ahead, and examined the door and its surrounding threshold. There was a runic mark on the door, which Mole said was a gnomish letter “R”. There was a small notch in the stone threshold to the left of the door, which Mole examined carefully before drawing back and turning back to them.

“It looks like this is a keyhole of sorts,” she said. “But we don’t have a key.”

“I’ve got a key,” Arun said, stepping forward with his warhammer readied.

Chapter 29

Arun put down his shield, and laid into the door with a mighty two-handed blow that shattered wood and echoed loudly throughout the chamber. The gnome's familiar, still imprisoned in its cage stuck to the back of the mimic, crouched down inside its prison, covering its ears with its paws.

Even as the noise of that first impact faded, twin puffs of rancid black smoke erupted out of nowhere directly in front of the door, flanking the paladin. The smoke dissolved to reveal a pair of huge rats, with ugly, matted fur that stank of rot, sharp, jagged teeth, and eyes that were pinpricks of red flame. The fiendish rats did not hesitate, instantly leaping at the dwarf's legs with snapping jaws.

"Blast!" Arun cursed, as the rats lunged at him. One failed to get a hold of him, but the second sank its teeth into his unprotected ankle, digging deeply as if the consecrated blood of the holy warrior further fueled its corrupted form.

Mole rushed forward and stabbed the rat with her sword, sliding the blade into its body just below the base of its skull. The rat convulsed and died, and Arun kicked it free with a spray of blood from his wounded ankle. The paladin turned toward his second foe, but before he could bring his hammer to bear an arrow from Fellian's bow streaked into it, skewering it.

Both rats dissolved into the same greasy smoke that had heralded their arrival, leaving only an ugly black scar on the stone floor to mark that they had ever been there at all.

Ruphos came forward, drawing out the healing wand, but Arun forestalled him. "Save your magic, priest," he said. "There's still a job to be done here."

No more evil rats appeared, and with Arun's strength behind his blows the door did not long withstand his assault. Soon they were through and into another short passage beyond, culminating in another door. Beyond this one, they knew from Mole's map, lay the lift and Furio. Mole tapped on the door, and got an answering tap in return.

"Stay back," she shouted through the door. "We're going to force the door."

Once more Arun went to work, wary of another trap. No summoned rats appeared, but as the door gave way, the wooden planks clattering free of the threshold, a field of darting streams of electrical energy filled the opening, causing their skin to tingle and their hair to stand on end even several paces away. On the far side, between the intermittent sparks, they could just make out the room beyond, and Fario standing a good distance back from the obviously dangerous portal.

"Well, now what?" Ruphos asked.

Fellian took on a distant look for a moment, then he nodded, as if answering some silent question. Through the electrical field, they could see Fario moving to the back of the far chamber, returning after a moment with a hefty shape. "Get back, quick!" Fellian said, and they all retreated moments before a limp form came crashing through the opening. With a sizzle and the smell of roasted flesh the energy field discharged into the body of hobgoblin corpse, leaving only wisps of smoke rising from the body.

“Well, I hope the mimic likes his meals well-done,” Mole said, holding her nose.

* * * * *

A short while later, the companions, reunited once more, stood on the wooden lift, the creaking of the chain accompanied by the faint groaning of the wooden planks beneath them as they sank deeper into the mountain beneath Cauldron.

As they descended upon the lift, the stone of the shaft transitioned from the plain gray granite of Jzadirune to the glistening black sheet of malachite that presaged their ultimate destination. The six companions exchanged glances, their weapons at the ready, as the lift carried them deeper into the core of the mountain. Fario, having lost his bow in the acid pit, had taken one of the hobgoblin javelins as a temporary replacement.

Mole carried Starbrow, Keygan Ghelve’s familiar, which the mimic had handed over per the terms of their deal. The rat had made itself comfortable in her pack, occasionally sticking its head out through a gap in the cover flap to see what was going on. The others paid the creature no heed.

A door appeared, recessed into the south wall, and moments later the lift came to a halt. Above them the shaft rose up as high as they could see, the thick chain that supported the lift the only tenuous connection between them and the bright world above.

Arun was already walking to the door even before the lift had fully stopped. He glanced over his shoulder at the others. “Ready?”

Without waiting for a response, he opened the door.

Beyond the portal, which thankfully was of the familiar, non-trapped variety, they found themselves in a long hall, at least sixty feet in length. A pair of empty iron cages were suspended from the ceiling at opposite ends of the hall, dangling a good seven feet above the level of the floor. In the center of the room stood an unusually fashioned pedestal, an irregular construct that looked to be a misshapen lump of rough-hewn stone. Jutting from the pedestal were four jutting arms of stone, topped by crystalline points, pointing in the four main directions of the compass. The only other obvious exit was a door down toward the end of the hall in the east wall, near the second cage.

Warily the companions entered the room.

“I don’t like the look of that pillar,” Mole said, pointing at the squat stone column. Arun frowned, but didn’t say anything.

“We’ll check it out,” Fario said, gesturing to Fellian. The two half-elves started forward, but before they could draw near to the thing, Zenna lifted her crossbow and fired. The bolt hit the column squarely, the steel head shattering against the stone, the wooden shaft snapping and falling to the ground a short distance away. The adventurers all turned and looked at Zenna in surprise.

“Why did you do that?” Ruphos asked.

His question was answered before Zenna could reply. The pillar shook, looking for a moment like it might crumble into pieces, but only for a second as it lurched into movement, lumbering forward awkwardly but inevitably toward them.

The half-elves shared a momentary look, then quickly launched their assault upon the strange creature. Fellian drew and fired in a single smooth motion, though his arrow, like Zenna’s, seemed to have no effect against the hard stone skin of the thing. Fario hurled his javelin, but the missile proved equally useless, glancing off of its armored skin.

“How are we supposed to hurt that?” Mole exclaimed, but Fario, heedless of the inefficacy of their initial attacks, drew his two swords with a practiced skill and charged toward the creature’s flank.

Even as he started ahead, the others were joining the attack. A shot from Mole’s crossbow struck truer than the others, hitting just below one of the spiky appendages that jutted from the creature’s torso and sending a fist-sized chunk of stone flying from its body. And a throwing hammer hit it a glancing blow just a heartbeat later, followed by the charging form of the dwarf as he rushed straight at it, drawing his warhammer out as he ran. Behind them came Ruphos, holding his mace with a dubious expression, as if doubting what their weapons could do against an adversary apparently fashioned from solid stone.

But those doubts did not stop them from attacking the creature, as it lumbered forward to meet them. Fario dodged its first clumsy but powerful swipe, and laid into it with his blades. His longsword struck a glancing blow that chipped away a few small pieces of stone, but his shortsword had no effect against its tough hide.

From the opposite side of the creature, Arun laid into the thing with his hammer, the full force of his charge behind his assault. His first stroke was errant, however, a powerful but misaimed blow that only glanced harmlessly off of the creature’s “head”. With a stream of curses in dwarven, the paladin recovered and continued with another attack.

A volley of missiles from the other adventurers streamed at the stone spike, but the extra caution needed to avoid hitting their comrades in melee cost them in terms of accuracy. Only Mole’s shot actually hit the creature, failing to penetrate its hide, while the shots from Zenna and Fellian narrowly missed and caromed down the length of the hall into darkness.

Ruphos, his mace in one hand and his torch in the other, circled the melee, trying to find an opening.

The creature was not idle as these attacks landed upon its stony frame. For some reason it seemed to draw back somewhat from Arun, causing another potent hammerstroke to sheer off stone instead of hitting with crushing force. But it did not restrain itself from assaulting Fario with violent force. The nimble half-elf dodged the first spinning arm, but the creature abruptly reversed direction and drove a second into his side, impaling him upon the crystalline spike that tipped that appendage. Fario let out a gasp of pain and staggered back, somehow managing to keep standing even as blood poured from his side from the vicious wound.

Ruphos and Fellian were both moving quickly to help the injured Fario, but before they could reach him, the attention of the party was drawn to the door in the rear of the hall, as it swung ponderously open. A hulking figure trudged into the room, and the blocks of black stone that formed the floor seemed to tremble at its coming. It had the shape of a man, but stood over seven feet tall, its visage was ferocious and bestial, and its arms and legs were the size of tree trunks. It was clad in a fur garment that hung in tatters about it, and caked filth covered its body like a second skin. A falchion of huge proportions hung almost forgotten from one fat fist.

“Wait your turn!” Arun shouted at the newcomer. “We’re not done with this one yet!” He poked out at the stone spike with his hammer, not enough to hurt it, but trying to draw its attention away from the seriously injured half-elf.

The ogre regarded them all with a hard look. “More carrion for my larder. Very nice.”

It started toward the melee.

Chapter 30

Facing a deadly new foe in addition to the already dangerous one that they currently faced, the companions hastened to defend themselves.

The archers shifted their fire to the oncoming ogre as it lumbered down the hall toward them. Fellian, who’d been circling the raging melee with the stone spike to get to Fario, turned reluctantly from his stricken friend and fired a shaft from his shortbow down the length of the hall. The arrow hit, sticking in the rotten furs that covered its mangy hide, but it did not appear to phase the beast in the slightest as it picked up speed, running toward them. Zenna’s shot missed entirely, while Mole cursed as her bow misfired, the string jamming the bolt into the mechanism.

Arun slammed the stone spike again, yet once more his hammer failed to do more than jar the creature. He did finally get its attention, though, and the spike shifted toward him, its arms stabbing out toward him. On the far side of the melee, the wounded Fario, refusing to retreat, used that opening to attack the creature once more. Realizing that his twin-sword attacks had little chance of penetrating, he dropped his shortsword, and with both hands on the hilt of his longsword, drove the weapon with the full force he could muster into the body of the monster. The sword rang as it struck the thing’s stone skin, but after a moment of resistance it slid up to the length of its hilt into the elemental’s body. The stone spike quivered, a single plaintive sound issuing from deep within its frame, and then collapsed into a heap of rubble.

Even as their first foe fell, however, the ogre rushed to join the battle against the hard-pressed pair. Arun let out a deep growl that rumbled from his chest like a boulder rolling down a steep slope. He charged the ogre, his hammer raised high to smite the foul creature. Fario, heedless of his own serious wounds, was just an instant behind him, just as eager to strike down this latest adversary. Behind him, Ruphos held his healing wand and bit his lip in frustration as the injured warrior charged out of his reach.

But the ogre seemed just as eager to meet its attackers, and as Arun charged it raised its falchion and brought the heavy weapon down in an inevitable downward arc toward the dwarf's head. However, the dwarf, was, like all of his race, used to dealing with foes bigger and stronger than himself. As the ogre slashed downward Arun hurled himself to the side, catching the powerful stroke on his heavy shield and deflecting it harmlessly aside. The dwarf's momentum carried him forward, and as he passed by the hulking ogre he slammed his hammer into its side with powerful force. The blow would have laid a hobgoblin soldier out on his back, gasping out the last moments of its life, but the ogre merely smiled down at him, fat gobs of slobber dripping from the uneven gaps in its ugly black teeth.

Fario rushed in from the far side of the creature, stabbing with his sword into the ogre's torso. His longsword cut through the ragged furs that covered its body, but the flesh underneath was tougher than boiled leather, and his thrust failed to penetrate. Fellian, shooting over the darting form of his friend, shot another arrow high into the ogre's chest, but like his first shot, it seemed to have little effect upon the massive creature.

Back on the far side of the hall, Mole yanked the jammed bolt out of her bow, but cursed as one end of the bowstring popped off of its mounting. In frustration she threw down the bow, drew her sword, and rushed forward. Zenna, who'd just finished reloading her own bow, saw her and cried out, "No, Mole!" But she too, ultimately, followed, moving around the body of the destroyed stone spike to line up a clear shot at the ogre.

"So, you're a tough one, eh?" Arun said, bringing his hammer around for another swing. The ogre moved faster this time, however, and it brought its falchion around in a low sweep that the dwarf couldn't dodge. He grunted in pain as heavy blade caught him in the side, the force of its impact only partially stopped by the metal scales that covered his torso. Even as the blade dug into his muscled torso his training and experience kicked in, and he spun with the blow and returned to a slightly wobbly defensive stance. The ogre chuckled and brought the blade up once more as it finished its follow-through, the arc of the falchion leaving a spattering of the paladin's blood behind it on the stone floor of the hall.

Ruphos rushed boldly forward, though his destination was not the ogre, but rather the injured Fario. He lifted the healing wand, a blue glow already forming around its head, and darted in with it thrust like a dagger to impart its magic to his stricken companion. Fario, his attentions taken up by the desperate struggle with the ogre, did not notice the cleric coming up behind him, but the ogre, turning from its powerful hit on the dwarf, did see him.

The two lunged at the half-elf as one, the falchion pounding through the swordsman's guard, batting his parry aside before digging a cruel gash in his exposed shoulder. But for the half-elf's quick dodge back, it would have been a lot worse, perhaps taking his head as well. Even so, with the loss of blood from his other injury, Fario staggered and crumpled. Even as he fell, the healing energies from Ruphos's wand closed his wounds and stabilized him, but that power was not enough to bring the crippled warrior back to consciousness.

All too aware of the massive adversary standing over them, Ruphos dropped his mace and his torch, grabbed onto the half-elf by his shoulders, and dragged him back out of the melee.

Unfortunately, he underestimated the ogre's reach.

"Ruphos, look out!" Mole cried, seeing what the cleric, intent on his task, hadn't.

The falchion clipped him lightly on the arm, almost a light brush at the fullest extent of the ogre's reach. That light contact, however, was from a steel edge backed by the considerable force of the ogre's mass, and the steel tore through the cleric's mail links covering the upper part of his bicep, slicing neatly through the flesh underneath. Ruphos cried out and fell over Fario's limp form, clutching at the wound that was pouring a runnel of hot blood down the length of his arm.

But after a moment he grimaced, pulling himself back up and grabbing hold of Fario once more with his good arm. Gritting his teeth against the pain, he pulled the unconscious fighter to safety.

The ogre took a step forward as if to pursue, ignoring the dwarf behind him as Arun landed yet another ineffectual blow on his fat, flabby torso. The stream of dwarven profanities continued apace, but the ogre ignored that too, lumbering after its retreating victims.

It drew up short, however, as Fellian leapt into the breach, his bow discarded and now replaced by his drawn longsword. The ogre slashed down at him as he rushed in, but the half-elf leapt forward into a roll that carried him under the path of the stroke. The edge of the falchion struck sparks on the hard black stone of the floor even as Fellian rolled back to his feet and thrust at the ogre's body with his sword. Unfortunately, he found the ogre's unnaturally tough hide as tough as his companions had, and the blow failed to penetrate.

The ogre lifted its weapon to strike this new foe down, but turned as a shrill voice drew its attention to the side.

"Hey, ugly! Sheesh, do you, like, bathe in your own filth, or what?"

"I cut you in half, little girl, then I bathe in your blood," the ogre said, slicing down at Mole as the gnome darted in from the flank. But Mole was quicker, easily avoiding the clumsy backstroke and dashing in to stab her sword into the monster's hairy leg. The blade sank only half its length into the thick limb, but it was quite clear from the ogre's reaction that it felt that attack.

"I crush you!" it shouted, rearing up before slamming the injured leg down on the gnome rogue. She wasn't there when the limb hit, however, having rolled out of the way, and as its foot slammed heavily into the ground, a new look of pain crossed the ogre's features.

"I see your brains are as defective as your sense of smell," piped the gnome's voice from below.

“Blast you blasted giant, go down!” roared Arun, attacking once more as the frustrated dwarf threw all caution aside and virtually hurled himself at the ogre. His hammer came up into its gut, but as the ogre spun around, still trying to find out where Mole had gone, it only smacked loudly but ineffectually against its fat belly. Almost carelessly it dropped one fat fist from the hilt of its falchion, and punched the dwarf in the face. Arun staggered drunkenly back, his head ringing from the force of the blow, but within moments his eyes cleared, and his expression became one of unadulterated fury.

“Oh, I’ll do you for that,” he said. Shrugging off his shield, he hefted his hammer with both hands, and with a dwarven battlecry rushed back into the fray.

But the ogre was already in trouble, confounded by the efforts of the two rogues that faced it. Fellian and Mole worked together without the need for open conversation, flanking the massive brute. Mole continued to taunt it, and luck was with her as the ogre missed with yet another potent but clumsy swing. That gave Fellian an opening; even though the half-elf lacked Fario’s strength and skill of arms, he was able to work his sword into a crease in the ogre’s bulbous torso and dig a nasty cut that spilled forth hot red blood across the black stone floor. The ogre, stung by that attack, turned to smite the half-elf, a foolish decision given the proven threat of Mole. The gnome wasn’t a warrior, and she barely came up to the ogre’s knee, but she leapt up and sank the entire length of her small sword into the back of the monster’s thigh.

It was already going down when Arun leapt up and bashed its skull in with a two-handed smite from his hammer.

“Eww,” Mole said, making a face as she gingerly tried to recover her sword from the dead ogre’s leg. The weapon was slick from the blood of the monster, and she needed Arun’s help to finally drag it free.

Zenna had gone to help Ruphos and Fario during the final moments of the battle, but the cleric had recovered enough to heal both himself and the half-elf fighter with his healing wand. Fellian drew out a scroll and went to help Arun, but drew back as the paladin threw down his hammer in disgust and walked away.

“What’s the matter?” Zenna asked. Mole had gone to recover her crossbow, but she paused to kick through the remnants of the stone spike, verifying that some precious item hadn’t been secreted on the body of the elemental thing.

“Blasted thing’s cursed!” the dwarf spat. “Couldn’t hit that blasted bastard for bloody blasted squat! Baargh!”

Fellian strode up, still holding the scroll. “That was no ordinary ogre,” he said. “I don’t know what manner of thing it was, but its skin was... unnaturally resilient, and it shrugged off hits that should have slain two such beasts. It is no failure to admit difficulty in fighting such a thing.”

The dwarf met the half-elf’s look with a square gaze. Finally he said, “Bah!” and went to recover his hammer. He grumbled something not quite clearly audible, but what sounded like a threat directed at the weapon should it continue in its failure to perform. He let Fellian cast his spells of healing from his scroll, restoring much of the damage he'd suffered at the hands of the ogre.

With the elemental creature and the ogre both slain, the companions recovered the rest of their weapons and searched the rest of the hall. Fario spotted another secret door on the far end of the hall from where they had entered, but they let it be for the moment. The ogre smelled even worse in death than it had in life, so after a cursory examination to verify that it wasn't carrying anything of value, they gave the corpse a wide berth. Mole did find an iron key on a throng stuck through its belt, so she kept that.

They looked into the chamber from which the ogre had emerged, but didn't get any further than the door. The stench that roiled from beyond was an almost palpable thing, like a cloud that hung in the air and poured into their lungs with eager tendrils on every breath. The chamber beyond the door was a rectangular space perhaps twenty feet across and thirty feet wide, and every square foot of floor space, every corner, was jammed with refuse. It covered the floor, rising and falling in heaps like waves, forming mounds as high as a few feet in places. Mole, possessed of perhaps the most sensitive nose of all of them, staggered back, looking ill, but through it she still managed to point to a particular heap of filth on the far side of the room to their left.

"Ith that a cheth?" she asked, holding her nose.

Fellian peered at the indicated site. "Perhaps, it looks like some sort of rectangular object, under all that muck," he said. "I'm not going in there to see, though... feel free, if you wish."

Mole looked hopefully up at Ruphos, but the cleric shook his head. "We're not here for that," he told her. "We have to find the children."

"Well, drat," Mole said. But she still managed to look relieved when Fario pushed the heavy door shut.

With that, they turned to the secret door.

Chapter 31

The door, a foot-thick, rectangular panel set into the black stone of the wall, opened easily at Fario's nimble touch. Light and smoke spilled out over them, as they looked into the space beyond.

It was a chamber of considerable size, a square room perhaps forty feet on a side. The ceiling was a vaulted dome that rose up a good twenty feet or more above them. Directly under the apex of that dome, in the center of the room, stood an imposing nine foot statue of a dwarf warrior. Carved of black malachite, that stern-faced figure faced toward them, clad in armor and holding a double-bladed battleaxe haft-up with its blades touching the floor at its feet. Someone had draped a tangled mass of chains over the top of the statute, wrapped in numerous loops around its neck, torso, and arms.

In each of the four corners of the room rested a free-standing stone brazier of unusual make. Carved into the form of a xorn, those three-armed denizens of the Elemental Plane of Stone, each was topped by a mouth full of brightly glowing coals that issued a faint but constant stream of smoke into the chamber. Double doors were situated in the center of the walls to their left and right, the ones to the right secured with a heavy iron bar.

Although the wisps of stray smoke partially obscured the chamber, it was instantly obvious that the place was occupied. Standing by each set of doors stood a pair of heavily armored hobgoblin warriors, who spotted the companions almost immediately after the door opened. Drawing their swords, they rushed to attack.

Fario leaned forward, but before he could enter the room Arun pushed roughly past him, unapologetically placing himself a few paces on the far side of the door, shield and hammer prepared to meet the enemy charge. The elves were quick to follow, and as they entered, one of the hobgoblins barked a command, and one of the four broke off and ran toward the double doors to the south.

He almost made it before Fellian's arrow slammed into his back. The hobgoblin staggered forward, falling to his knees directly before the portal. For a moment he clung to consciousness, and even managed to drag himself to his feet, clutching the handle of the door. Then a bolt from Mole's crossbow caught him in the side, and he crumpled.

Arun met the hobgoblin charge with a clang and clatter of metal on metal. The first sword stroke he took on his shield, and the second glanced off of an armored shoulder, but the third got within his guard and drew a line of red across his upper bicep. The hobgoblins fought well together, moving to flank the dwarf, but Fario's quick arrival helped even the odds. Their initial counters were met by expert parries or were deflected by the heavy layers of banded armor worn by the hobgoblins, but they in turn were confounded by Arun's heavy shield and Fario's quick dodges.

But then the rest of the companions joined the battle, and the tide quickly turned. Fellian rushed in to flank Fario's opponent, and caught between the two half-elves the hobgoblin was quickly dispatched. Arun's two foes had caught him in a flanking move, but one found himself flanked in turn as Mole darted in behind him, her sword flashing at its legs. The hobgoblin was sufficiently aware to dodge that new attack, but the distraction was enough for Arun to bring his hammer up in a powerful smash that connected decisively with the side of its head.

The last hobgoblin gave ground in a fighting retreat, trying to make for the southern doors where its comrade already lay dead. As it retreated, Zenna shot at it with her crossbow, but her shot was deflected away by its armor. That protection could not, however, save it from the half-elves, who, unencumbered by such heavy garb, moved quickly to block its escape. The hobgoblin threw itself at Fario, trying to at least take one foe with it, but was run through by Fellian before it could land a blow.

Quiet returned to the chamber as the last hobgoblin crumpled. Fario and Fellian were quick to verify that each of their enemies was truly slain, finishing the task with a quick thrust when necessary. Meanwhile, Arun crossed to the unbarred double doors to the south, dragging the body of the dead hobgoblin there out of the way and watching just in case the noise of the brief fracas had drawn the attention of more guards.

“I wouldn’t be surprised if there’s more of them beyond those doors, since they were so keen on getting there,” Ruphos said.

“The leader ordered that one to get reinforcements,” Zenna confirmed, glancing at the statue briefly as she moved to where the others were gathering near the southern doors. Mole, however, lagged behind, her attention more fully drawn by the huge stone figure of the dwarf hero.

“You speak hobgoblin?” Ruphos asked in surprise.

“Goblinoid, actually,” Zenna replied. “The tongue is shared by goblins, hobgoblins, bugbears, and a few other races of similar bloodline. It was a useful tongue to know, where I was from.”

Ruphos’s expression showed that he was curious, and might have welcomed more explanation, but Zenna abruptly turned away, deliberately focusing her attention elsewhere—on the barred doors to the north, on the strange braziers in the corners, on the vaulted ceiling high above—anywhere but on the cleric.

Mole’s voice drew their attention back to the center of the room. “Those are gemstones, I think—the statue’s eyes, look!” Even as she finished, she’d already shrugged out of her backpack, placing it and her crossbow in a neat pile on the ground, and was heading for the base of the construct.

“Mole, just leave it be,” Zenna said, with a hint of exasperation in her voice. “We’re not here for that... look, watch out for those chains...” With her sharp vision, she could clearly make out the jagged hooks and sharp blades hooked in and among the links of the mess of chains that covered much of the upper half of the statue.

“Bah, I can climb around them,” she said, and in fact she was already halfway up the statue, working her way up the haft of its massive stone axe before grasping onto its forearms, careful to avoid the enfolding links of chain and the sharp cargoes attached to them. Arun, engaged in quiet conversation with the half-elves by the door, shot them an impatient look, but did not move to interfere.

“Mole, I don’t think you should do that,” Ruphos said tentatively. “I’ve got a bad feeling...”

“You worry too much,” she shot back, having reached a point well up atop the statue’s chest, her attention now on its face. Its eyes were shining orbs of pure black, the face of the gnome girl reflected in their depths in the smoky light from the braziers. Her dagger popped into her hand from its hidden sheath in her boot, and she leaned forward, a focused look on her face.

“Mole, look out!” Zenna screamed, a moment before the gnome cried out in pain and surprise. The mass of chains had shifted slightly, and with only that subtle warning, a strand of links untwined from one of the statue’s fat arms and shot out at Mole. The gnome, intent on her prize, had not noticed the telltale motion that Zenna had seen, so she could not react as the length of chain slammed into her back. The barbs and hooks attached to the link dug into the chain links of her armor shirt, and her dagger fell from her grip as she slipped from her perch, falling end over end to clatter noisily against the stone floor eight feet below. The rogue would have followed a moment later, but even as she started to fall, another length of chain shot out from around the back of the statue, whipping around her torso and dragging her roughly against the hard stone. The mass of chains was now alive with movement, and new strands of hooked and bladed links were continuing to work themselves free while the bulk of it remained firmly anchored to the top half of the statue.

“Ow! Help, it’s got me... aaaaaahhhhh!”

Mole screamed again as the chains wrapped around her body tightened their grip, the sharp hooks and barbs piercing her clothes and digging into her flesh. She tried to reach for her sword, but couldn’t get to it through the terrible strands that pinned her body against the statue. Looking down, she saw Zenna and the others, concern for her written in fear across their faces, rushing toward the statue, but then there was only the pain. Twisting helpless in the firm grasp of the chains, she caught a glimpse of the face of the statue, looking down at her from above, and to her it seemed to be laughing at her, berating her for the foolishness that had gotten her into this mess.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry,” she sobbed, and then the pain claimed her.

Chapter 32

“Mole!” Zenna cried again, feeling something wrench deep inside of her as she watched the animated chain-creature wrap around her friend, crushing and tearing her diminutive form.

The companions leapt into action with Zenna’s first shout of warning. Ruphos ran forward and leapt up atop the statue’s base, trying to reach the trapped gnome, but staggered as one of the strands of chain whipped out across his face. Blood erupted into the air as the jagged edges caught and tore the flesh across his jaw, and he fell back, dazed from the force of the impact. The young cleric, however, shook his head and with determination in his blood-streaked face he hefted his mace and waded in again. He smashed at the creature, but only struck sparks as his blow glanced off the links and smashed against the black malachite of the statue’s chest.

The half-elves were quick to act, charging together toward the statue, spreading out to come at it from both sides. Fellian fired an arrow, careful to avoid targeting any part of the thing near Mole, and while the steel arrowhead slammed full-force into a link of chain, shattering it, the rest of the creature seemed barely affected. Fario dodged a slashing strand of chain and hacked at it with his sword after it shot past. The result of his efforts was merely a notch on his masterwork blade, and he quite nearly lost his grip on the weapon.

Arun did not hesitate, rushing straight for the statue. The mass of chains had dragged Mole up near the head of the statue, out of the easy reach of the adventurers. The gnome’s struggles grew fainter as they watched, which seemed to drive the dwarf even more strongly into action. As he ran he shrugged off his heavy shield, which clattered noisily to the floor, and hefted his hammer in both hands. With a cry to his stern god he leapt up and slammed the hammer two-handed square into the densest part of the mass of chains that he could reach. The entire network quivered with the force of the impact, and the statue itself seemed to shake. Mole let out a piteous moan as the chain-creature seemed to tighten its grip in retaliation, but the trapped girl fell limp, slipping into the grasp of unconsciousness.

Zenna rushed at the statue, frustration written clearly on her face, but Ruphos caught hold of her and drew her roughly back. "No, Zenna!"

"It's killing her!" she cried.

"You won't help her by joining her!" Ruphos shouted roughly, pushing her back before turning to rush back into the fray. Fellian had advanced to just outside the chain-thing's reach, and fired another arrow into its form, shattering another link of chain with a direct hit. Fario continued his assault from the far side of the statue, although his longsword wasn't well-suited to harming such a creature. The mass of chains had drawn itself up higher around the bulk of the statue, wrapped around its neck and barrel chest, clutching Mole like a child holding to a prized toy.

A visceral growl built in Arun's chest. A chain lashed across his arm, trying to grab hold of his hammer. He dropped the weapon before the chain could grab hold, and hurled himself forward at the statue. Another chain lashed him like a whip across the back and shoulders, but he shrugged off the pain of the impact. The dwarf hurled himself up with a surprising burst of strength and speed, and while he could not reach anywhere near Mole, he dug his hands into the mass of the construct. Ignoring the pain as sharp points tore into his thick hands, he pulled himself up bodily, planted his feet against the stone shield slung across the back of the statue, and pulled.

The animated mass of chains lashed out with a terrible and chaotic frenzy. A stray length caught Arun in the face, drawing a vicious gash across his forehead that trailed blood down in multiple streams through his eyes and into his beard. But the dwarf maintained his grip, his face tightening with the effort as his thick arms and legs strained with all of his strength against the metal links of the construct. On the other side of the statue, Fellian and Ruphos both attacked, the cleric sundering one of the chains anchoring the creature with a solid blow from his mace.

With a suddenness that caught them all off guard the chains suddenly gave way, the entire mass tumbling down upon the dwarf as both plummeted to the ground. Fario was there in an instant, ready to strike, but the chains had stopped moving, their animating force sundered by the damage wrought upon it. Zenna and Ruphos arrived just a heartbeat later, both quickly digging through the mess of links and hooks and sharp edges to try and free the small figure trapped in their embrace.

Mole wasn't moving, and her body was a mess of cuts and punctures, the hooks digging into her flesh, the chains drawn tight against her body in a fatal embrace. Tears fell down Zenna's face in a torrent as she pulled her friend free, heedless of the cuts to her own hands in the process.

“Mole, don’t,” she cried. “Don’t leave me, please...”

Ruphos had drawn out his wand, and as the tiefling pulled her friend into her embrace he activated its power, pouring healing energy into the ravaged body of the gnome girl. But she did not stir.

Fario helped Arun to his feet, the dwarf barely standing himself in the face of the battering he’d taken. The dwarf joined the others, standing around the kneeling woman and the friend she clutched to her.

“Is she...” Fario asked, unable to put it into words.

“Damn it!” Ruphos cursed, pouring more healing energy from the wand into the stricken rogue. But the girl remained limp, unmoving...

And then, her body trembled, and Mole stirred, gasping as she drank in a deep draught of air that turned into a wracking cough. Her eyes opened, blinking in confusion and the lingering memory of pain.

“Oh gods, that hurt,” she said weakly.

“Oh, Mole,” Zenna said, wiping the tears from her face.

“Thanks, guys,” she said, looking up at all of them, and the smiles that accompanied the multiple sighs of relief that came from the circle of her companions.

Chapter 33

“Now, promise me that you won’t do anything that stupid again!” Zenna said, still hovering protectively over her friend.

“I promise, as long as you promise to not let me!” Mole swore. The rogue looked much better now that Ruphos had fully restored her using the wand, although she was still pale and her gaze never quite made it back to the statue that loomed over all of them in the center of the room.

Battered by their struggle against the chain-monster, the companions had taken some time to rest and recover. Arun and Ruphos had consumed the potions give to them by Jenya, healing most of the damage they’d taken from the chain-monster’s attacks. Ruphos reported that the healing wand was nearly depleted of power, another reminder that they had to be especially careful from here on out.

Finishing their search of the room, Fellian uncovered another secret door, a panel in the wall opposite the one through which they’d entered. Leaving that for the moment, they elected to take a quick look behind the barred northern doors. Arun lifted the heavy bar, laying it carefully to the side before returning to face the thick portals.

“Clearly this was designed to keep something out,” Fellian commented.

“Careful,” Zenna cautioned. After what had just happened to Mole, no one offered a comment this time.

Arun pushed open one of the doors. They were thick, with several layers of thick planks reinforced with sturdy bands of iron. That, at least, explained why nothing had been drawn by the noise they’d made in the room. As soon as Arun was able to get the door open enough to see the dark space beyond, they could hear a whistling sound, a cavernous noise of air moving through vast spaces underground.

Ruphos’s torch cast a fitful glow in a radius just bright enough to indicate that the space beyond was much greater. They stood upon a broad stone ledge facing a gaping chasm, over which a stone bridge arced over to the far side. All around them was a great dark, with other faintly audible sounds in the distance that could have been anything.

“What is this place?” Ruphos breathed.

“The Underdark,” Arun said.

Most of them started at that, for most of the surface-dwellers of Faerûn had at least heard of that vast network deep under the sunlit surface of the world, a place full of terrible dangers and strange wonders in the legends and fables of those above. It was the home for some of the most powerful and mysterious races of the Realms; the drow, the duergar, the illithids, and others whose names were known only to sages.

“Are you certain?” Zenna asked. “I did not realize that we were that far underground.”

Arun looked up at her. “I know,” he said. “I can smell it in the air, feel it... all my people can. There are numerous places where the network connects to the surface world, like under the Great Rift where the holds of the gold dwarves lay.”

“We’ve heard stories,” Mole said. “None of them made it sound like a very nice place.”

“Indeed,” Arun said, his hand tightening noticeable on the haft of his great hammer.

“Let us return to the fortress,” Ruphos said, his voice tight. “Our goal does not lie within these tunnels.”

Grimly, they turned and retreated to the statue-chamber, closing and rebarring the heavy doors behind them. Next they made their way to the secret door, Fario opening it to reveal a short passage beyond that culminated in two plain wooden doors.

The half-elf warrior led the way, with Arun clunking along close behind. The nimble strides of the half-elf contrasted sharply with the heavy steps of the dwarf, but the effectiveness of both had been proven already on this mission. The others followed as they made their way to the doors. Fario listened at both, but shook his head.

“Let’s try this one,” Mole suggested, starting toward the right door. Arun, however, blocked her with his shield. The girl looked up at him with a frown.

“Look, I appreciate you saving my life and all, but you don’t have to coddle me.”

“No,” the dwarf replied. “But if there’s trouble behind that door, the elves and I should go in first.”

“He’s right, Mole,” Zenna said. “You don’t have to prove anything to us.”

Mole looked up at all of them, nodded—somewhat reluctantly, it seemed—and gave way.

Fario nodded to the dwarf, and opened the door.

Immediately a potent stench overwhelmed the companions, and they looked upon a dank chamber decorated in a disturbing fashion. Nooks had been carved into the walls, and were festooned with an array of polished skulls of various shapes and sizes. In between those grisly ornaments, poorly cured hides were stretched and fastened to the walls. The center of the room was dominated by a great chair apparently fashioned from bones, its high back surmounted by a great draconic skull. Behind this, in the far corner, they could see a nest of carrion and sprouting fungi, likely the source of the rank odor that filled the place.

“Disgusting,” Fario said.

“The quarters of the master of this place, perhaps?” Fellian suggested.

“In any case, he doesn’t seem to be at home,” Ruphos said. “We’d best press on.”

“We should check it out, make sure there’s nothing of importance here,” Mole said. She started forward, but again Arun forestalled her.

“We’ll come back if need be,” the dwarf said. “First things first.”

The gnome sighed, and fell in with the others as they moved to the second door. Once again Fario took up a position against the portal, checking to make sure that the others were ready before he pushed it open.

This room was both lit and occupied. Another of the iron cages dangled from the ceiling, this one containing a small, two-foot beetle with glands behind its eyes that shed a ruddy, reddish glow. The place was clearly a guardroom, with four beds about the perimeter and a table and benches in the center. A pair of hobgoblins sat at the table, eating and drinking, while another pair were sleeping in two of the beds. A single door in the far wall was the only obvious exit.

The hobgoblins looked up as the door opened, and quickly grabbed their weapons as they spotted the intruders.

“Brak-geddek!” one of the cried, as they leapt to the attack.

“Here we go again,” came Mole’s voice from within the knot of adventurers.

Chapter 34

Fario and Arun leapt through the doorway almost together, meeting the hobgoblins as they rose from their benches to attack. Fario darted forward, and in some unspoken harmony ducked just in time for Fellian’s arrow to slice over him and hit one of the hobgoblins in the shoulder. Unfortunately, the arrow failed to penetrate the warrior’s heavy armor, but it distracted it just enough for Fario to draw first blood, a quick slice to its leg from his longsword that scored through the layered banded armor.

Arun rushed at the second hobgoblin, which rushed around the table to meet him. The dwarf almost casually batted away its thrust with his shield, following with a punishing blow from his hammer that crumpled the hobgoblin’s breastplate, driving it roughly to the ground.

The dwarf turned to aid Fario, but the battle was already wrapping up. The two sleeping hobgoblins had stirred quickly once the melee had started, but they were slow to react, reaching for their weapons clumsily as they tried to shake off the haze of sleep. One managed to draw its sword just in time to take two hits from Zenna and Mole’s crossbows, collapsing back into its bed as it bled out its last moments. The second picked up a javelin and hurled it at the adventurers, narrowly missing Fellian. It reached for its sword, but dropped the weapon as the half-elf’s return shot lodged in the meat of its arm. It tried to pick up the scabbarded blade with its other hand, but came up short as Ruphos confronted it, his mace raised to strike.

“Surrender or die,” he commanded. The hobgoblin looked at the center of the room, where the last of its companions had just fallen to Fario’s sword, snarled, and complied.

* * * * *

“Tell it that it had better reveal where those children are, or there’ll be this to answer to,” Arun said, hefting his warhammer.

Zenna spoke to the hobgoblin in its own tongue, repeating Arun’s question. The hobgoblin snarled, uttered something, and spat. They’d pulled the arrow from its arm and allowed it to wrap the wound in an old shirt, but it was clearly still in a lot of pain. That clearly hadn’t overcome its sour attitude toward them, however.

“Enough of this!” Arun shouted, grabbing onto the hobgoblin by the throat and dragging it roughly to its feet. Ruphos took a step forward, but frowned, turning away but saying nothing as the dwarf hefted his hammer and ended it with a single punishing blow. The two half-elves regarded him with unreadable expressions.

“I don’t expect we’ll get much out of him now,” Fellian commented.

“Enough!” Arun repeated, his anger growing rather than easing now that the last enemy was dead. “We’ve wasted enough time here. Come on, let’s find those captives!”

Zenna shot a concerned look at Mole, but the gnome was already falling in behind the dwarf as he crossed to the far door and all but threw it open. Beyond it, rather than more enemies to crush, lay another long corridor, running along the edge of a deep chasm that dropped off to the left. The elves shared a look but took up their weapons and moved to follow.

Zenna looked at Ruphos, who still hadn't moved. "Are you all right?" she asked, touching his shoulder with her hand.

He looked at her and smiled sadly. "Sorry. This hasn't been easy for me... all of this."

"I don't think it has been, for any of us," she said. "Come, we'd better catch up to the others."

He hesitated. "Could I ask a favor?"

"What is it?"

"Would you lower your cowl for a moment? I'd like to look at you, the real you, for a moment."

She bit her lip. "There's no time..."

"Please, just for a moment."

She glanced at the door—the others had already gone—and nodded, pulling back her cowl. She flushed slightly at his stark gaze, but he only looked, and finally nodded.

"Thank you," he said. "And I'm sorry."

"For what?"

"For judging when I had no right," he said. He took up his mace, and lifted his torch. "Let's go."

He hurried after the others, and Zenna followed him, lifting her cowl back into place as she departed.

* * * * *

The corridor south of the guardroom ran along the edge of a deep chasm to their left. A chill seemed to rise up from somewhere below, and a faint dampness hung in the air.

Across the chasm, perhaps thirty or forty feet across from them, rose a sheer cliff wall atop which stood the black stone walls of the Fortress. Ahead a stone bridge stretched across the gap, and some distance beyond that they could see windows high in the fortress wall overlooking the chasm, narrow slits through which a faint light could be seen.

Arun had headed straight ahead, toward the bridge, but instead of turning to cross it he instead turned right, to where a stone door was recessed into a short passage opposite the bridge. The corridor also continued ahead along the edge of the chasm for a good distance, ending in what looked like another door about forty feet beyond the bridge.

As Zenna and Ruphos hastened to rejoin their companions, the wizard glanced up at a tall dwarven statue set into the high wall to her right, facing outward toward the chasm. The statue, nine feet tall and fashioned out of white marble, depicted a female dwarven warrior, clad in plate armor and brandishing a dwarven urgosh. Another statue, of a similarly clad male warrior, stood on the opposite side of the bridge. Zenna stared at the statues in amazement; the stonework was incredible, and somehow these silent sentinels did not contain the foreboding that clung to the warrior statue they'd encounter earlier.

But there was no time for further reflection on the matter, as Arun was already opening the door.

The heavy stone door opened slowly, revealing yet another passage beyond. Arun grunted and started down the corridor, barely hesitating as Zenna caught up to him.

"Slow down, Arun. We're not going to help anyone if we rush into danger unprepared."

"I've had enough of tiptoeing around this place," the dwarf returned. But he waited until everyone was ready before he started down the passageway. Behind them, Ruphos eased the heavy door shut.

Ahead of them, the passageway split into two branches, heading to their left and right. Arun headed toward that intersection, but hesitated, the others coming to a halt behind him.

"What's the matter?" Mole asked.

"Something's not right here," the dwarf said. "The echoes are wrong..."

He didn't get a chance to elaborate, as a metallic grinding noise suddenly filled the corridor. Its source wasn't immediately evident, but it was close, and it seemed to come from somewhere behind the wall to their right.

Frowning, Mole reached out and touched the wall... and her hand passed through it as if it wasn't there.

"An illusion!" she said.

"Get back!" Arun shouted, heading toward her even as the noise grew louder. Mole's eyes widened and she stepped back, but not quickly enough as a metallic figure emerged from the wall, swinging a massive iron hammer that came crashing down toward her.

Chapter 35

The automaton had the look of a bulky, armored gnome, with a nasty pincer at the end of one metal arm and a huge iron hammer on the other that made Arun's weapon seem a toy by contrast. As it appeared through the illusory wall it attacked Mole, driving that weapon downward with great force.

At the last instant the gnome hopped back, out of the direct path of the hammer as it smashed into the floor with enough force to crack the hard black stone. Even though the move saved her life, the hammer's edge still clipped her with enough force to send her sprawling.

Even faced with such a strange and deadly foe, the companions did not hesitate. Fario and Fellian attacked as one, flanking the creature as they hacked at it with their swords. Fario eschewed his typical two-swords style for a single thrust from his longsword in an attempt to penetrate the thing's armor, but despite his best efforts his blade merely scratched off of the automaton's thick metal skin. Fellian fared no better, even though the metal monstrosity was turned partly away from him toward his companion.

Arun, partially blocked from the automaton by Fario, turned and ran through the illusory wall to come at it from behind. As he passed through the illusory barrier, though, he found himself face to face with a second automaton. This one was clearly damaged, with several rents in its metal skin, and instead of attacking immediately, it simply stood there, making a whirring noise and spinning its pincer arm in a continuous motion.

Arun didn't question his good fortune, instead hefting his hammer and launching himself at the thing. "There's one more in here!" he shouted, to warn his companions.

Those companions found themselves rather busy at that moment, so they could not immediately move to the aid of the dwarf. Zenna helped Mole up to her feet, pulling her out of the raging melee. Mole dug her healing potion out of her pouch, uncorking the vial and downing the precious fluid in a single gulp.

Ruphos joined the half-elves in attacking the automaton, smashing at it with his mace. His attack had no greater luck than theirs, however, clanging against its hard outer shell without effect.

"This thing's invulnerable!" he cried.

"Keep attacking! Find a weakness!" Fario shouted back.

The automaton turned toward him, as if drawn by his words. The thing's pincer arm shot out and snapped around his body, holding him fast within its iron grasp. Thus held, there was little that the half-elf could do as the huge hammer came up, poised to strike.

"No!" Fellian cried, knowing that there was nothing he could do. But then, before the killing blow landed, the automaton abruptly hesitated, a quiver passing through its metallic body as the heavy hammer head simply hung there in the air. The thing did not release its tight hold on Fario, however, and the elf's struggles seemed of little use against its solid grip.

Trying to capitalize on what they'd learned from the pulverizer above in Jzadirune, Zenna shouted a command in gnomish for the automaton to cease its attacks and release Fario. This one, however, did not respond, and suddenly its hesitation ended, and it lurched once more into motion, the hammer-arm drawing back.

"Helm, grant me your strength!" Ruphos cried, leaping forward once more, his weapon clutched tightly in both hands. To the surprise of everyone—perhaps including the cleric—the armored front of the construct buckled as the steel head of his mace crashed into it with a ringing crash of concussive force. The construct twisted awkwardly, and its grip loosened just enough for Fario to pull free of its vice-like pincer. The half-elf did not retreat, hefting his sword again in both hands as he assaulted it from the flank opposite Fellian. This time he drove his blade deep into one of the rents in its side opened by Ruphos's strike, and an angry clang of broken metal issued from somewhere deep inside its frame as the sword crunched in.

Mole, recovered from her injury, circled around the edges of the melee with the automaton, and darted through the illusory wall to check on Arun. She immediately saw the dwarf engaged with the second construct, the two apparently engaged in a titanic exchange of hammer-blows. Arun had landed a solid hit that had crushed one side of its armored shell, but the automaton had in turn shaken out of its mechanical funk to land a crushing blow to the dwarf's shield-arm. Mole could see that the dwarf was hurt, his shield hanging low instead of kept up in its usual protective stance before him. As she appeared the hammerer tried to catch the dwarf with its pincer-arm, but Arun was able to dodge back narrowly in time to avoid being caught.

"I'll help distract it!" Mole said, drawing her sword and rushing around the automaton's flank.

"No!" Arun cried, but it was too late; the gnome was already past it, tumbling quickly past it before it could react to her sudden appearance. She came up smoothly into a ready stance, poking at its backside with her sword. The feeble assault did no damage, but it certainly did get its attention; the automaton wheezed and with a grinding of metal gears it spun to face her. Before it could strike, however, Arun roared and came up behind it, bringing his hammer down in a powerful blow that crushed through the remnants of its armor and savaged the gearwork within. With a final clatter of noise, the battered construct leaned over and crashed heavily to the ground.

"That was foolish," Arun said, shaking his hammer at the gnome.

"Maybe, but it worked!" she returned. "Come on, the others are still fighting theirs!" Again, before he could do anything to stop her, she darted back through the illusory wall.

Arun followed, but his hammer wasn't needed. The automaton, perhaps damaged by the attacks from Ruphos and Fario, had managed only one tentative swing against Fario before freezing again, and by the time it shook free the three companions were able to do enough damage to destroy it. Mole reported that the second one had been destroyed as well, so the six companions stood there over the ruins of the first automaton, catching their breath.

“Those things were tough!” Ruphos exclaimed, checking Fario’s injuries. The grasp of the pincer-arm hadn’t hurt him seriously, though the outcome would have been quite different had its hammer connected with him.

“That was an impressive strike, priest,” the half-elf observed. “I thank you.”

Ruphos nodded. “It is a power granted by Helm, the feat of strength. Though I had never called upon it before.”

“Well, now you have,” Arun said. “Shall we see what these things were guarding?”

Chapter 36

“It’s a difficult decision,” Fellian said.

“Once more, we’re nearly out of resources,” Zenna said. “I don’t know if we can handle another big fight.”

“I came down here to get those children,” Arun growled. “And I’m not leaving without them.”

“But it not only them that we have to consider, now,” the tiefling mage pointed out.

The six companions stood in a circle, their expressions betraying that fact that they were all too aware of the multiple sets of eyes watching them from the far side of the room.

* * * * *

Less than an hour had passed since their battle with the hammerer automatons, enough time for their circumstances to change dramatically. The corridors beyond the illusory walls and the construct ambush had been a dead end, leading only to empty cells that showed no recent signs of occupancy. They had all begun to feel the sense of urgency that was driving Arun, a gnawing worry that lingered in the gut. Already they had seen horrors, enough to drive imaginings about the fate of the captive children, and the others that had been taken from Cauldron in recent tendays...

They wasted no time, returning to the passage that ran alongside the chasm, following it to the heavy door at its end. This time their eyes all drifted to the high walls of the fortress on the far side of the stone bridge, and the light that filtered from the narrow slits high in that wall. It was clear that this might be their ultimate destination, but after finding the empty cells none of them wanted to leave any possibilities unexamined behind them.

The door had led to another guardroom, occupied by a pair of less-than-vigilant hobgoblin guards. The adventurers were quick to take out their frustrations on these creatures, but the noise quickly brought reinforcements in the form of another pair of guards accompanied by a one-armed, black-skinned hobgoblin carrying a red-hot poker in his remaining hand. The battle that followed lasted a bit longer, and when it ended Fellian was limping heavily, a blow from the leader’s sword having penetrated his defenses.

Once more they had overcome foes, but this victory had only created new dilemmas for them.

The room that the hobgoblin reinforcements had come from was decorated as a grisly torture chamber, lit by an ugly glow that issued from a crude open-faced iron oven. Inside they had found a battered human woman who introduced herself as Coryston Pike, a resident of Cauldron who had been abducted from the city a few tendays ago. She was able to direct them to the cellblock adjacent to the guardroom, where they found four other ragged captives. When asked about the children, Coryston and the others said that they'd been taken to the "bazaar," the chamber across the bridge where the half-dwarf slaver Kazmojen conducted his nefarious dealings in the suffering unfortunates who had been stolen from the city above.

"We can't bring them into battle," Mole said quietly, shooting a glance back at the far side of the room, where the five freed captives were sitting on the bunks of the slain hobgoblin guards, watching their liberators with wary expressions. "They're not warriors—well, maybe that one."

"That one" was a man named Kryscar Endercott, who despite his starved condition and the obvious scars that covered his body paced impatiently before the other captives. The armor he'd taken from one of the hobgoblins was missized and hung over his frame awkwardly, but he clearly knew how to move with it, and the sword and javelin he'd taken fit into his hands with easy familiarity. Endercott's attitude was markedly different than that of the other prisoners, who were simple commoners caught up in terrible events through an accident of fate. He'd been a mercenary, or at least that's what he told them, and by the way he moved and handled weapons it was clear that he had at least some experience as a warrior. There's been a tense moment when he'd almost attacked them, before it became clear that they were here to free the prisoners. Even now, he seemed like a coiled spring, tense and ready to lash out at the slightest provocation.

"So what do we do?" Ruphos asked.

"We stop wasting time chatting about this," Arun said. "Those others said that this 'Kazmojen' is conducting a sale for the children, may already be delivering them to a buyer as we speak. I am going to stop him—you may come or stay with them as you wish." He started toward the door, a grim look etched into his face as if chiseled in stone.

"Arun," Zenna said, stepping forward and putting her hand on the dwarf's shoulder. The paladin glared at her, but did stop. "We're with you on this, but we can't just rush in. Those prisoners also said that the dwarf also had some sort of demon-hound with him, and more guards. We have to have a plan."

The dwarf harrumphed, but further debate was interrupted as Coryston Pike rose and crossed to where the companions were gathered. Endercott was right behind her, bringing that hint of danger that he carried around with him like a shadow. The injured woman looked much better than she had when they'd found her strapped into a chair in the torture chamber. Zenna had given her the last of the potions that Jenya had given them; Fellian had insisted, even though he'd been seriously hurt himself and his own remaining magic had only barely been enough to stop the bleeding on his leg. Fortunately they'd found a few minor-strength healing potions on the hobgoblin torturer, but the half-elf cleric still looked wan and exhausted. Coryston, for her part, still had an obvious limp, but she'd told them that it was an old wound, suffered in a battle with a troll from her earlier adventuring days.

"For what it's worth, we understand your situation," Coryston said. She looked back at the other three captives, ignoring Endercott's smoldering look. "You have to rescue the children, at least you have to try. We will wait here for your return, and trust in your skill."

"I'm sorry that we just can't let you make a break for the surface," Mole said. "We've killed some of the guards, but there's still... stuff... up there, stuff that'd make quick work of you guys, alone."

"Yeah, well, I'm not staying anywhere, waiting for that halfbreed to come back and lock me up," Endercott said. "I'm going with you, and I'll see that bastard dead with my own eyes, and by my own hand, if necessary." His hand tightened around the grip of the hobgoblin javelin he'd appropriated, as if daring them to challenge his statement.

Coryston sighed but did not respond to the mercenary. "I will stay with them, then," she said. "I have some magic... not much, but it may be enough to offer some resistance if more guards return. It may also be of some help to you... if you are going to try to challenge Kazmojen in his lair, you may need the advantage of surprise."

* * * * *

"Bah, this is a stupid idea," Arun said, standing before the considerable iron-shod door on the far side of the stone bridge.

"Just let me do all the talking," Zenna said. "And be ready for my signal."

Arun grunted, but he didn't offer anything more of a critique. Zenna turned to the half-elves and nodded. The pair gulped down half of the contents of the vials each carried, and quickly faded from view. The invisibility potions would not last for long, but the companions had already discussed their strategy and would not be lingering here.

She glanced back at Ruphos, and Endercott standing beside him. They were clearly discernable even through the magical disguises they wore. Ruphos looked scared but determined, and the mercenary had the scowl that Zenna suspected was a more or less permanent feature on his face.

Using her own spell of disguise self, Ruphos's magical hat, and Coryston Pike's own magic, Ruphos, Endercott, Arun, and herself all wore the faces of hobgoblin warriors. Zenna had felt a twinge of envy at Coryston's talent; the woman, her magic derived from sorcery rather than the scholarly arts of the wizard, had been able to cast the spell of disguise repeatedly with little apparent effort, disguising herself in addition to Endercott and Arun before the companions had left.

"Ready?" she asked them.

“Let’s get this over with,” the mercenary spat, though Zenna could see that his hands were clenched tightly around the shaft of his javelin. Ruphos only nodded, as if he didn’t fully trust his own voice to offer agreement.

Zenna looked behind them at the shadow that she knew was Mole. Even with her darkvision, and knowing that she was there, she could barely see her friend, wrapped in her dark cloak in the lee of the stone railing of the bridge. Mole was their wild card, the whole of their reserves.

“All right then,” Arun said, and he reached up to pull open the heavy door.

Chapter 37

Light spilled out over them, as the door swung open.

The southern end of the Malachite Fortress was a single huge chamber, easily sixty feet across. Four thick stone pillars supported the ceiling a good twenty feet above. From their summits dangled four iron cages, each containing a captive fire beetle that shed a steady red glow that left deep shadows in numerous places about the edges of the room. To their left, tall double doors likely connected with the rest of the fortress, in the direction of the rooms they’d explored earlier, while on the opposite wall another, single door provided an additional exit. The southern end of the room, to their right, formed a platform raised five feet above the floor of the rest of the chamber, accessed by a broad stone staircase in the center of the room. Though they could not see the entire span of the platform from the entry, as they entered they could hear laughter coming from that direction, a deep, throaty sound that somehow seemed cold and menacing. That laugh was followed by a voice that made the laugh seem friendly by comparison.

“Ah, you drive a hard bargain, Pyllrak! But as always, it’s a pleasure doing business with you, in the end.”

Arun moved quickly forward, forcing Zenna to hurry to keep up. The double doors to their left were guarded by a pair of armored hobgoblin sentries who quickly turned toward them and raised their javelins warily. Once they saw that the newcomers were friends, not foes, they turned their attention back to the events transpiring at the summit of the stone steps. Arun barely paid them any heed, striding forward with the others close behind. As Zenna hurried along behind, Endercott pushed roughly past her, his javelin already up in a threatening posture, if not ready to cast. She couldn’t see the half-elves, of course, but she hoped that they were adjusting with her, moving ahead into the room.

No plan survives contact with the enemy, she thought grimly, remembering something that Mole’s uncle had told her once before, during one of his tales of the adventures he and his companions had had in their travels across the western regions of Faerûn. She glanced to her left, and saw that the two guards guarding the door had grown suspicious, although they had not yet moved from their vantage.

Arun stopped at the foot of the stairs, and as Zenna came up behind him she got her first good look at Kazmojen's slave bazaar.

The stairs culminated in a flat open space between two of the thick malachite pillars. A short distance beyond, near the far wall, a shorter pillar of black stone was driven into the ground. Attached to that pillar by heavy iron manacles were three wretched clumps that had to be the missing children.

Standing between them and the captives, however, at the top of the stairs, stood a squat, muscled monstrosity clad in black plate armor that could only be the half-dwarf Kazmojen. In one hand he held a dwarven urgrosh, that bastard combination of axe and spear, and in the other, he held a short length of chain that was secured to a neck-manacle holding the fourth child-slave, a young boy. The slaver was speaking with another dwarf, or at least part-dwarf, a man with skin the color of old ashes, clad in a simple robe with a fiery red beard that jutted from his face like a bed of needlethorns. To Zenna's eyes, there was something just... wrong with him, and suddenly she felt very cold inside as she realized that what she recognized was the same corruption that existed within herself. The bearded man, Pyllrak, clutched a small white coffer and smiled as Kazmojen yanked the chain and held the struggling boy up for examination.

Her eyes wide in horror, Zenna's attention was drawn to the side by a deep growl. There, slinking out of the shadows behind one of the pillars a few paces behind Kazmojen, appeared a terror beyond even that presented by the warped appearance of the evil dwarves.

It had the look of a great hound, at first, but only for the first moment's glance. Then one could make out the snarling, skeletal face, with bulging jaws and fiery red pinpricks for eyes. And instead of fur, long, wickedly barbed quills covered its body like a porcupine, shaking violently with every movement of the creature.

The creature's growls had alerted Kazmojen to their presence, and he released the chain, dropping the boy to the ground with a metallic clatter. "What is the meaning of this interruption?" he asked. They couldn't see his face, covered by the visor of his helm and lost in shadows, but the impatience was clear in his tone.

"We've come for those children, slaver," Arun growled, hefting his hammer.

"You're too late," Kazmojen replied. "These are no longer for sale." He nodded to the fiery-bearded dwarf, who glared at them through narrowed eyes that gleamed with a sickly yellow light.

Zenna glanced over her shoulder, and saw that one of the hobgoblins had opened the double doors, and two other guards were coming through to join the two already here. She bit her lip, sensing that this was about to turn ugly real fast.

"Enough chatter!" Endercott cried. "Die, bastard!" The mercenary hefted and hurled his javelin at Kazmojen in a sudden motion. The cast was true, but the dwarf almost casually lifted his urgrosh, deflecting the missile with the heavy axe-blade that tipped one end of the ungainly weapon.

“Attack!” Zenna cried, knowing that the advantage of surprise was already lost. She spun and fired her crossbow at the hobgoblins, but her shot missed wide and harmlessly shattered against the stone wall of the chamber. A moment later, though, one staggered and crumpled, clutching at the feathered end of a bolt jutting from its side.

Mole, hiding in the shadows by the nearby pillar, had added her voice to the fray.

The howler let out an unholy screech and bounded forward toward the stairs, but before it could charge a long javelin appeared out of thin air and caught it hard in the joint where its head met its shoulder. Fario materialized at the base of the stairs even as the abyssal creature cried out in pain, caught off guard by the half-elf’s sneak attack. Even as Fario’s missile struck an arrow shot out from a few paces distant toward Kazmojen, but was deflected by the slaver’s heavy armor of layered steel. Fellian appeared behind his companion, cursing as he reached for another arrow.

Arun let out a bellowing cry, and hurled one of his light hammers up the stairs at the same moment that the slaver hefted his urgrosh and roared a challenge. The howler bit down on the javelin and tore it from the bloody wound in its neck, while the hobgoblin guards on the far side of the room hefted their own javelins or drew their swords. The companions reached for weapons or reloaded their bows.

A raging battle was poised to explode.

Then the air above the stairs shimmered, and everything changed.

Chapter 38

The eyes of everyone in the room, friend and foe alike, were drawn upward as the distortion in the air solidified and took form, and a... thing appeared in the chamber.

It hovered in the air above them all, floating in defiance of gravity, a sphere six feet in diameter, with a rough gray skin the color and texture of stone. As it spun in the air, they could see that it possessed a single great eye just above a gaping maw full of long, pointed teeth, with ten more smaller eyes dangling at the end of writhing stalks atop its body.

Zenna felt her gut clench and her blood freeze as she realized what it was. By the gods, a beholder, she thought. She could feel her body shaking, frozen in terror. She felt rather than saw Arun tense beside her, and for a moment she thought that her death was here, that the dwarf was going to attack regardless of the appearance of the eye tyrant. But Arun, born of a race that knew well the aberrations of the Underdark, understood all too well the nature of the newcomer, and stood his ground.

The creature spun in place, taking in the whole situation in a single broad sweep. As its central eye passed over the companions, their magical disguises faded, revealing their true faces, and Zenna felt a tingle pass through her body. What the creature was thinking as it looked at them was impossible to guess; the beholder was just too alien.

Kazmojen and his minions had been taken by surprise as well, but now it looked up at the beholder with what looked, at least outwardly, with calm control. “What do you want?” he asked.

The beholder shifted its attention upon the slaver, but Zenna saw that several of the eyestalks continued to monitor them. No one else moved.

“I have come for Terrem Kharatys,” the creature said, its voice strong and dripping with power. “That boy should not have been taken from Cauldron. I intend to see that he is safely returned to his orphanage. You can keep the others. They are of no consequence. Come, Terrem—you will be safe with me.”

A pouch appeared out of thin air a few paces above the beholder, falling to land with a clink of metal on the stone floor at Kazmojen’s feet. The erstwhile buyer, Pyllrat, said nothing, having drawn back from the scene with the beholder’s appearance, watching the developing scene intently. Kazmojen himself drew back a step as the beholder dropped toward him, its eyestalks twisting as the different eyes regarded him in turn. The howler offered a growl of challenge, causing several of the eyestalks to snap toward it, but Kazmojen let out a harsh whistle, and the beast drew back. Terrem, the boy captive, huddled miserably in his chains, unable to do anything to alter his fate.

A pale blue ray lanced out from one of the eyestalks, hitting the boy squarely, surrounding him with a soft glow. Terrem lifted into the air, rising with the beholder as the two ascended toward the ceiling high above.

Arun shook himself and stepped forward, pointing his warhammer at the beholder. “Now wait just a minute here!” he shouted at it. The beholder turned to regard the companions, but even as it did, the creature—along with the boy—shimmered again and vanished.

For a moment everyone just stood there, trying to grasp the implications of what they had just seen, or just reveling in the fact that they yet drew breath. But Kazmojen shattered that momentary reverie, when he stepped forward, his urgosh raised.

“The deal is done!” he said, his voice cold. “Now, you die.”

Chapter 39

Arun did not hesitate. Hefting his hammer, and shouting a dwarven war-cry, he hurtled up the stairs. Kazmojen held his urgosh before him, letting his foe come to him, letting the paladin exert his precious energy rushing up the staircase.

As the dwarf paladin drew within range, the half-dwarf hefted his weapon and brought down the axe-blade in a descending arc toward Arun’s weapon-arm, the side not protected by his heavy shield. The monstrous dwarf had incredible reach, his arms unnaturally long and flexible. Even charging and off-balance, Arun was able to adjust to partially deflect the blow, but the heavy blade clipped the edge of his shield and crunched heavily into his armored side. Kazmojen’s steel crushed through the pounded scales of Arun’s armor, already battered from what the paladin had gone through to get here, and Arun grunted in pain as the axe tore a gash in his side.

The paladin took the hit and continued forward, lifting his hammer and unleashing a powerful blow at the slaver's chest. "By Moradin's forge!" he cried, scoring a solid impact that drove Kazmojen a step backward despite his bulk and strength. The half-dwarf's heavy armor absorbed much of the impact, but it was clear from his wheeze of pain that he'd felt the force of that blow.

"Not bad, brother dwarf, but not nearly good enough!" he returned, immediately launching another series of attacks at his adversary, slicing with the axe and stabbing with the spear-end of his urgrosh.

The others had not been idle while the two champions had engaged in their all-out struggle, but they found themselves hard-pressed and unable to come immediately to the aid of their friend. Fario started up the stairs immediately in the wake of the dwarf, drawing his sword as he went, but had to dodge quickly to the side as the howler leapt down into their midst, its terrible quills lashing out around it as it came, keening a deep, horrible wail that echoed through the chamber. The fiendish monstrosity lunged at the half-elf, its powerful jaws snapping at him, but it caught only empty air as the half-elf darted backward, twisting his body out of its path. Fario slashed at it as he retreated, but his sword merely glanced harmlessly off the long quills that flowed backward from its head. The howler turned to face him, even as Endercott and Ruphos rushed up the steps to his aid.

In the tumult of battle, no one noticed when Pyllrat, the slaver-trader, retreated from the battle into the shadow of the nearby pillar, and faded from view. Nor did they mark the quick opening and closing of one of the side doors, less than a minute later. There were too many other things going on for either side to worry about someone leaving the battle.

The three hobgoblin guards came forward, and with her companions engaged with deadly foes behind them, Zenna knew that she had to buy them some time. One of the humanoids hurled his javelin at Fellian, scoring a glancing hit that dug through the soft leather protecting his hip, drawing blood and a gasp of pain from the half-elf. Fellian fired back, but his shot failed to penetrate the hobgoblin's banded mail. Grimacing as he yanked the javelin from his side, the cleric of Shaundakul dropped his bow and drew forth his sword.

Zenna focused her thoughts and drew upon the power of her magic. Her most powerful spells were all gone, cast during their excursion through Jzadirune and the Malachite Fortress, but she called upon a minor cantrip, straining inwardly to send its power out to the furthest extent of its range, just beyond the slightly-open double doors. Brows knitted in concentration, she directed the magic into the course she desired.

The noise was faint, at first, but it rapidly grew loud enough so that she could hear it clearly; the clank of armor, the tread of heavy boots, voices. A man's voice, strong and commanding, "Over here, men! We'll take care of the last of those hobgoblin scum!" It sounded like a good-sized group coming quickly closer... or at least Zenna hoped that it did, to the hobgoblins who were already turning back to the door, wary looks on their faces.

One of them barked a command, and another ran back to the doors, quickly drawing the open portal closed. There was no bar, but he slid his javelin through the two handles, forming an impromptu latch that would not stop a determined invader, but which might delay.

And with luck, delay any hobgoblin reinforcements, Zenna thought.

But that didn't do anything about the other two warriors, who were charging toward her and Fellian, their swords drawn.

Arun was a seasoned warrior, veteran of the skirmishes that his people fought in the trackless Underdark, traveler across much of Faerûn, and survivor of the trials that they'd encountered under Cauldron. But he quickly realized that this foe was stronger, tougher, and more skilled than him. He'd managed another solid hit against the half-dwarf, but in turn could feel his reflexes slowing as blood continued to seep from the two cuts that had gotten through his defenses. Kazmojen, on the other hand, seemed to be getting stronger with each passing moment, as if the wounds that Arun was inflicting were somehow imparting energy rather than injury to him. The slaver had given up his initial strategy of using both ends of his weapon against the paladin, instead focusing on all-out blows with the axe. Arun knew that only one more of those powerful strokes had to land solidly, and he was finished.

But he refused to retreat, grinding his teeth and launching another attack. He brought his hammer around in a powerful sweep, holding his shield up to absorb the inevitable counter. But Kazmojen didn't even bother to dodge, absorbing the impact to his side that should have crushed ribs and left him sprawling.

Should have, but didn't.

"That's your last chance, brother," the slaver said, swinging his axe in a downward stroke that came in from the paladin's unshielded right. Arun tried to lift the heavy shield to block, but his arms felt leaden, his reflexes slowed by the hurts he'd already taken. It was too late, he knew it even before the axe crushed into his shoulder, driving him down, driving a spike of pain through him.

I have failed you, Soul Forger, he thought, falling. Then everything went black.

Chapter 40

The howler lashed out about it, its long quills as threatening as its terrible jaws. Fario, Ruphos, and the mercenary Endercott faced off against it on the stairs, but being surrounded only seemed to drive it on to a more terrible fury. Ruphos bashed at its flank with his mace, but only got a quill stuck in his arm for his trouble. Fario stabbed at the creature, but again his stroke went awry.

Endercott screamed, a sound of repressed anger and frustration released as he lunged straight for the beast's head. His borrowed blade glanced off the howler's skull, slicing open a garish flap of flesh that hang back behind its ear like some sort of garish ornament, revealing the stark white of bone beneath. The creature's howls doubled in intensity, a sound of pure rage that seemed loud enough to shatter the stone of the walls. It lunged at Endercott, a quill lodging in the man's side as it thrashed back and forth, following him as he tried uselessly to retreat, to get away from the monster's inexorable rush. Finally it lunged, quickly, its jaws closing with grim finality around the man's neck. The mercenary barely managed a scream that turned into a wet gurgle as the jaws clamped and the howler tore the man's throat out. Endercott went down, his body now just a limp corpse that flopped in a mess of blood and gore that settled at the foot of the stairs.

Fario rushed forward, too late to aid the mercenary, but able to take advantage of the creature's distraction as he slid his sword into its body from behind. Narrowly avoiding a quill that nearly pierced his exposed neck, Fario grimaced and thrust the blade deeper. The howler quivered abruptly, then exploded into a paroxysm of frenzied movement as its blood poured from the gash in its side. The half-elf and Ruphos drew back from the still-deadly forest of quills as the howler thrashed on the stairs, its black heart punctured by Fario's thrust. As it happened, Fario had retreated down the stairs, and Ruphos up. That would be a fateful cast of fate, for both men. But for the moment, Fario felt an echo of pain explode within his mind, and he quickly turned, knowing already what he would see.

The two hobgoblin warriors charged into battle, one meeting Fellian in a clash of swords, the other coming straight for the undefended Zenna. Zenna cried out in pain as the sword bit into her shoulder, cutting through her tunic and drawing a line of pain that spread through her body like a blaze of fire. She'd turned enough so that the gash was serious but not fatal, but as she staggered back the hobgoblin warrior followed her, an evil grin deepening on his face. The dagger in her hand seemed puny in comparison with the warrior's longsword, and the hobgoblin laughed as she slashed out at him, trying to keep him at bay.

"Perhaps I shall keep you alive for a little while," the hobgoblin said in its crude language, a tongue that Zenna understood, one of the many things she'd learned growing up among a community of adventurers.

It seems that she hadn't learned enough, though.

As the hobgoblin came at her again, though, a shadow tumbled into place behind it. The hobgoblin never even saw it, and did not know its danger until Mole's sword slid home into its back through one of the slats of its armor. The hobgoblin's sword fell from nerveless fingers, and it slumped slowly to the floor, bleeding out its last.

"Are you all right?" Mole asked. But Zenna's attention had turned toward the staircase, and she dashed off in that direction, clutching her bleeding shoulder, her friend just a step behind.

Fellian had never been a good swordsman, certainly not the equal of his companion Fario. His talents had always laid more in other directions, his faith, his agility, his good nature and buoyant personality. He still bore the marks of his lingering injury from their earlier battles, only partially healed by the potions they'd found. But he faced off bravely against the hobgoblin, meeting his sword in a series of quick exchanges that gave neither an advantage. He was used to fighting with his friend, the two using their skills to surround foes and find weaknesses in their defenses. His faith granted him magic that bolstered their skills, gave them an added advantage.

But this time, he was alone, and his magic was depleted.

He gritted his teeth as the hobgoblin turned off a parry and caught him on the arm, slicing through his skin before the cleric could pull away. The wound wasn't serious, but it added to the tally of his hurts. He heard Zenna cry out and knew that the other warrior was attacking her, but knew that if he shifted his attention from this adversary, even for a moment, he would be dead.

The hobgoblin fainted, and Fellian caught the stroke easily with his sword. The real thrust came a moment later, but the half-elf had already anticipated and darted sideways, countering with a thrust that darted into his side. The hobgoblin's armor absorbed most of the impact of the attack, but the tip of Fellian's sword drew blood. The two combatants broke apart and recovered, each wary now of the other.

Unfortunately for the half-elf, the last guard, having secured the double doors against Zenna's illusory invaders, saw his chance and rushed to flank Fellian while his comrade pressed a new assault. Fellian saw what was about to happen and leapt at the foe before him. He caught the hobgoblin off-guard, and got inside his defense with a slash that caught him just under the jaw. The hobgoblin staggered and fell, but as he did he caught hold of the half-elf's sword with his arm, nearly knocking the weapon from his grasp. Fellian managed to recover, but the move cost him a precious few seconds. Seconds that cost him, for as he started to turn to face the second hobgoblin, he felt a sudden spasm of pain as a sword caught him square across the body. His own sword was knocked from his grasp as he sagged to the ground, bleeding.

As the howler thrashed out its last breaths, and Fario rushed to the aid of his stricken companion, Ruphos had turned to see Kazmojen strike down Arun. As the dwarf paladin went down, the half-dwarf slaver stepped forward to stand over his fallen foe, his bloody weapon lifted high in triumph. Then he lowered the spear-end of the urgrosh, ready to finish his helpless foe.

Ruphos Laro wasn't a man of great courage, or strength, or even particular skill with the simple weapon that he carried. He would have been the first to admit that among the companions that had delved into the Malachite Fortress, he was perhaps the least suited to face this enemy. Even Zenna had her magic, and an intelligence that he had seen shining in her like a candle's bright flame. He had his faith, a shield that had always been strong enough to sustain him, but which had been shrouded in doubt and fear since he had come into the dark places under Cauldron.

All of this was true, and yet he found himself charging up the stairs toward a foe that could only promise him death.

Kazmojen seemed oblivious to the arrival of this new foe, but as Ruphos neared striking distance, his mace already lifted to attack, the urgrosh swiped out in its deadly arc, propelled by those huge arms. Ruphos cried out as the blade crushed his arm, only the links of his chain shirt keeping the blow from taking off the limb just below his shoulder.

He should have gone down then, but he knew that if he did, Arun was dead. Somehow he could feel the slender thread of life that remained yet in the unconscious form at his feet, a thread that flowed out into the world and connected them all, himself, his friends, even this monstrosity before him. He knew that his friends would come, that they would have to bring this creature down or all die here, in this dark place far under the earth. He knew that he had to give them time.

Through the haze of pain he felt a sudden peace come over him. With his good arm, he lifted the mace and brought it down on the half-dwarf's armored head. The blow wasn't particularly strong, the flanged head of the weapon glancing off Kazmojen's helm, but it still had an effect, and pain clouded the slaver's eyes for a moment.

But only for a moment.

Kazmojen leaned forward, close enough so that Ruphos could smell the stale stink of blood and sweat from the other. "A fine day when I get to kill two champions of Good in one encounter," he hissed.

Ruphos brought his mace up to strike again, but Kazmojen knocked it aside with the axe-end of his urgrosh, and then, reversing the weapon, drove the spear-end through the priest, impaling him with a single mighty thrust.

Chapter 41

Time seemed to freeze for Zenna, staring up the staircase, her own wound forgotten as she watched Ruphos battling the half-dwarf slaver. The air seemed thick like water around her as she tried to run toward the scene that moved inexorably, inevitably, forward. She heard the continuing battle with the hobgoblins behind her, heard Mole call her name, but it meant nothing as she saw Ruphos lift his mace to strike, saw Kazmojen knock it away, saw the spear-end of the urgrosh come up...

"NO!" she screamed, helpless to stop it. When the spear drove through Ruphos, striking what could only have been a killing blow, she felt as though it were driving through her as well.

Fario, meanwhile, confronted his own difficulties. Upon the death of the howler he'd rushed to the aid of Fellian, too late to save his friend from being struck down by the last hobgoblin guard. The hobgoblin, encouraged perhaps by the triumphant roars of its master, or its victory over the half-elf cleric lying at its feet, refused to flee despite being outnumbered. It met Fario's rush with an attack that forced the fighter into a defensive stance. The two clashed blades noisily once, twice, three times, until finally Fario, driven by a realization that time was not on their side, drove forward, knocked the hobgoblin's sword aside, and thrust half of the length of his sword through his adversary's throat.

He crouched by Fellian, worry written on his face. The cleric was alive, but bleeding profusely from the wound in his side. A momentary indecision crossed Fario's features, but then he took on a look of intense concentration, pressing his fingers to his temples.

A few seconds later, Fellian vanished.

Fario rose and turned back to the stairs just in time to see Ruphos run through.

Kazmojen held Ruphos up, imprisoned on the shaft of his weapon, smiling as he watched the life drain from the cleric's eyes. Then he let urgrosh drop, placing his boot on the dead man's chest as he yanked the weapon free. He'd taken a beating, but his steps were still strong as he strode forward, and a renewed fury burned in his eyes as he looked down at the fallen form of his howler.

"For that, I will make each of you feel pain, before you die," he said.

Zenna just stood there on the steps, frozen, her eyes wide as she watched the slaver come slowly, almost carelessly, toward her. But then she felt Mole come up beside her, and her friend's presence seemed to make the fear drain away.

"We can run," Mole said, in gnomish.

Zenna looked down at her friend, the calm look on her young face. Zenna knew what she really meant, You can run. Mole had to know what she'd already recognized, that there was no way that the short-legged gnome would be able to outdistance the powerful dwarf, even clad in armor as he was.

Fario came up beside them, a look of determination on his face. For a moment a strange look crossed his face, as if a conflicting thought had suddenly crossed his mind, but then he shook his head, and his grim visage of determination returned.

"Come on then, slaver," he said, his bloody sword ready at his side. As he reached Zenna and Mole, he lowered his other hand, twisting it so that its contents were hidden from Kazmojen's view. In it, they could see a small vial.

Mole moved behind him, taking up position on his far side, palming the vial as she did so.

Kazmojen regarded the three of them coldly. "Your friends are dead, and I suspect that the dwarf was the fiercest that your little band had to offer. You cannot hope to defeat the likes of me. I have faced horrors of which you can only dream."

Zenna suspected that the dwarf was stalling for some reason, and she opened her mouth to say something, but Fario beat her to it. "Come on then, dwarf—or whatever you are. Your little doggie there was an interesting warm-up, but I'm ready for a bit of challenge."

Kazmojen fixed the half-elf with a dark stare, but he lifted his urgrosh and charged, surging forward in a seemingly inevitable rush. Fario drew his shortsword, but instead of rushing to meet the slaver, he dodged back, his blades slicing out in a dancing parry to cover his retreat. Kazmojen used his long arms to slash out at the fighter, nearly catching him despite his quick movements, but the half-elf was quick enough to avoid the opening rush.

Zenna and Mole both retreated quickly from the half-dwarf's charge, each knowing they could not hope to stand before him in open battle. Zenna fell back to where she had dropped her crossbow, willing her hands not to shake as she drew a bolt from her quiver and loaded the weapon. Mole, meanwhile, downed the rest of Fario's invisibility potion, and even as she faded from view was darting nimbly and silently down the steps after Kazmojen.

Fario continued to give ground, slashing at the slaver, scoring minor hits that failed to penetrate his heavy armor. In his defensive stance, Kazmojen failed to hit the nimble elf, but once again switched from a combination of axe-strokes and spear-thrusts from the different ends of his urgrosh and instead turned to an all-out assault with the axe.

"You can't escape me, elf!" he roared, and his words seemed true as he clipped Fario with a sweeping cut that tore a vicious gash in his side. "I'll tear you.... AARGH!"

Kazmojen cried out as Mole appeared directly behind him, the gnome holding her sword with both hands as she tried to drive it deeper into the slaver's body. The invisible rogue had found a gap in the half-dwarf's armor and exploited it, sliding her sharp sword through leather and cloth and flesh and muscle and into the soft organs underneath.

But Kazmojen was possessed of a monstrous fortitude, and he turned, realizing his mistake in dismissing this diminutive foe. He dropped the axe and reached for Mole with claws augmented by steel, his gauntlets tipped with jagged ends of sharpened metal.

A crossbow bolt ricocheted off his breastplate, causing him no harm but drawing his attention.

"Don't you touch her," Zenna snarled.

Kazmojen opened his mouth to shoot back a reply, but only another hiss of agony came forth as Fario came up from behind and buried his own elven-forged blade deep into the slaver's back. Kazmojen staggered around, fixing each of them with a hateful stare in turn, his mouth twisting in a snarl of contempt.

Then he fell to the cold stone floor, unmoving.

Chapter 42

"Mole! Are you all right?" Zenna shouted, rushing over to her friend. She herself felt faint, as blood continued to ooze from the wound in her shoulder.

Ironically, the gnome rogue was the only one of them who remained uninjured. They were all battered, with Fario wavering on his feet, but refusing to sheath his swords, keeping a wary eye about for any new threats. On seeing that Mole was all right, Zenna ran up the stairs, giving the still-twitching corpse of the howler a wide berth, knowing already what she would see.

Ruphos was dead, there was no doubting that. He lay in a heap, one side of his body lying over the motionless form of Arun, covered in blood. Arun... no, as Zenna reached for them, she caught the faintest hint of movement, the slightest swelling of the dwarf's torso. Her vision half-ruined by her tears, she checked the dwarf's body.

"Arun's alive!" she sobbed, her voice cracking. Somehow, whether through his own incredible fortitude or his patron god's intervention, he'd stabilized, though he was still unconscious and close to death.

Mole, who'd spent those few moments helping Fario stem his own bleeding wound with a bandage, turned to help her, but hesitated as she looked down at the body of Kazmojen. Had the slaver... there, again, there was no doubting it...

"He's still alive!" Mole cried, but the tone of her voice made it immediately clear that she was not talking about Arun, but their fallen adversary, who was stirring, his body heaving as it somehow crawled back toward life. Fario spun and quickly moved forward, but Mole was there first, stabbing the fallen dwarf repeatedly with her sword.

"Die!" she yelled, stabbing him in the neck, under the back edge of his helmet. "Die!" she repeated, thrusting her sword through whatever gap she could find.

"He must have some regenerative ability," Fario said, arriving to help drive the slaver back across the line into unconsciousness, closer to death.

"Well, how do we kill him for good?" Mole asked.

"Fire. Or acid." Mole was already digging into her pack, pulling out her last torch.

Zenna knelt over the body of her friend, her tears flowing freely now, feeling as helpless as she ever had before in the face of this final loss. She did not even have the power to help Arun, who could slide over the razor's edge into death at any moment. She heard her friends' shouts as they dealt with Kazmojen, but could not even will herself up to help them. She felt weak, a weakness that penetrated to her very bones.

A sound drew her attention. Looking up, she saw the three children still shackled to the pillar, staring at her with expressions that were dark and haunted. Seeing them allowed her to finally cut through the pain that held her in its grasp, and she slowly pulled herself to her feet.

A sickening stench of roasting flesh greeted her nostrils. Turning, she saw that Fario and Mole had finally taken care of Kazmojen for good, and a small pyre continued to smolder over his corpse. Mole still held her torch, in case it was needed. Zenna scanned the room, her gaze lingering briefly on the ravaged body of Endercott. They hadn't even gotten to know him, she thought.

"What happened to Fellian?"

Fario looked up at her, standing at the top of the stairs. "He is well," the fighter said. "He and I..."

He paused, and did not get to finish his statement as a loud thump drew their attention around. The double doors moved, the hobgoblin javelin jammed into their handles rattling as someone tried to force their way through from beyond. Whoever it was, it did not appear that they would allow that flimsy barrier to stop them, as the noise increased, and the javelin began to bend with the force upon it.

Fario shot her a questioning glance, but Zenna shook her head. "We can't leave Arun, or the children," she said.

The half-elf nodded, and bent to retrieve a discarded javelin before moving to join her. Mole recovered her crossbow and did the same, reloading as she went. For her part, Zenna reloaded her own weapon, a resigned look falling into place on her features.

The doors thumped, and the javelin cracked...

Chapter 43

"To be honest, we thought we were all dead," Mole said, the relief still clear in her voice as she chattered on.

"I'm sorry that we could not get there sooner," Jenya said. Three men clad in the uniforms of the City Watch passed by, nodding to the cleric in respect before continuing into the building behind them.

Around them, the city of Cauldron slept, the city engulfed in a night deepened with the thick cover of clouds above them. In front of Ghelve's Locks, however, a half-dozen torches and lamps burned brightly, and a number of curious townsfolk had gathered, kept back by the watchful cordon of guardsmen that had secured the area. Zenna, Mole, Fario, and Jenya stood in a close knot some distance back, the torchlight casting long shadows behind them on the street.

"Well, better you than a squad of hobgoblin warriors," Fario said. The half-elf had been healed, and looked well, although he seemed distracted.

"Are you sure Arun will be all right?" Mole asked.

Jenya nodded. "He was grievously injured, and very close to death when we found you, but he will be all right. My arts could not restore him fully after such a close brush with death, but we will be able to treat him, and the other freed captives, once Morgan and the others can get them to the temple."

Mole nodded, and glanced up at Zenna. The young woman looked like a shadow, shrouded in her dark cloak, her face lost in the shadows of her cowl. She had said almost nothing since Jenya, Morgan, and the forces of the other churches, along with a full platoon of the City Watch, had burst into the slave bazaar within the Malachite Fortress a few hours before. The forces from the city had taken control of the rest of the fortress, liberating the remaining slaves from the few remaining hobgoblins in Kazmojen's garrison. Mole, whose sharp eyes could penetrate the shadows to see her friend's face, read the deep sadness etched therein, a sadness that she felt herself at the loss of Ruphos. The gnome, however, was concerned that her friend would not be able to handle what she had seen, once the full force of her emotions broke through the fragile shell of control that she'd put up around herself.

"Ruphos gave his life so that others could live," Jenya said, as if reading the gnome's mind. She focused her warm blue eyes on Zenna, and touched the taller woman on the shoulder. "Do not forget, he made the choice freely, Zenna. He did what he had to do."

There was a silence then, one that Fario finally broke by clearing his throat. "I am sorry, I must depart. I have to see to my companion."

Mole frowned—that was one mystery that had not yet been solved to her satisfaction—but Jenya nodded and took his hand. "We are thankful for your aid," she said. "I hope that we will have the chance to speak further, at a later time."

Fario nodded, and turned to Mole and Zenna. "I am sure we will meet again," the half-elf said, and before they could respond, he turned and vanished into the darkness.

"Well, that was rude," Mole said. "After all we've been through, that's the good-bye we get?"

"He has his own secrets," Zenna said, softly.

"You have had a difficult night," Jenya said. "For some of us, I suspect it will go on for some time, but you have earned your rest. The children and the other captives, and your friend, are being seen to. I was going to return to the church myself; come, and we'll see that you've someplace safe to rest."

The two women went with the cleric, walking down Lava Street, while above them the first glimmers of the coming dawn began to brighten the far horizon.

THE END OF "LIFE'S BAZAAR"

Book II: "Flood Season"

Chapter 44

A faint patter of rain sounded on the roof tiles as Zenna bent over the small desk, the only other sound the faint scritch, scritch, of her pen on the sheet of parchment before her.

It was dark in the cramped confines of the loft where the mage worked, the only light coming from a narrow slit of a window near the peak of the roof a few feet from the plank desk where Zenna sat. Zenna needed no lamp or candle for her work, of course, and in fact preferred the quiet solitude of the loft in the washed-out gray light of the rainy day. She knew it would be louder later, when the inn's custom picked up, and louder still if Mole returned this evening, filled with stories about her day in the city.

Zenna sighed. She hadn't been a very good companion of late, she knew. Mole had urged her to go out into the city more, to explore all that Cauldron had to offer, to be social and to have fun. Zenna knew, of course, that Mole was worried about her, that she wasn't putting behind her the memories of what had happened in the dark places under the city. But she had to deal with her feelings in her own way, and Mole hadn't pressed the point too heavily, all too eager herself to go out into the city and delve into the mysteries that it had to offer.

She would find plenty of those, the tiefling woman thought. Cauldron had more than its share of secrets.

It had been a quiet tenday, all told. They'd spoken with Jenya once or twice since that night, but the interim leader of the church of Helm had been busy, and Zenna had felt uncomfortable around all of the Helmites, as if their very proximity reminded her of what had happened to Ruphos. Jenya had been as good as her word, granting her the magical hat that she now wore at all times, and adding a few healing potions to their reward as well. Mole had mentioned something about a separate reward for Arun, she recalled, but she hadn't been listening too intently and she had not seen the dwarf at all since they'd emerged from Kazmojen's stronghold.

Most of her news of events in the city were filtered through Mole, who was all too ready to chatter on endlessly at the end of each day. For all that they were now quartered in an inn, Zenna spent little time in the common room, preferring to bring her meals up to their little shared attic to eat. The loft wasn't actually in the main building of the Drunken Morkoth, instead situated above one of the long outbuildings behind the structure that were used as stables, workshops, quarters for staff, and general storage. Zenna liked the privacy, and Mole liked the easy access both to the inn and the adjacent alley that opened onto the street. Plus it was relatively cheap, and although they weren't quite poor, what with the money they'd found in Jzadirune, that was an important consideration for them as well the longer they remained in the city.

And that was another question that lingered unanswered, of course.

Zenna leaned back from the desk, rubbing at her eyes. She didn't want to think about it. She felt tired, had felt that way a lot over the last tenday. Mole said that she just needed to get out and do things, but even with the artificial means of disguise provided by the magical hat, she had little interest in mingling with others. Since returning from the tunnels under the city she'd felt increasingly hollow, empty, as if she'd left a part of her down there.

Why did she feel that way? It was not as though she had known Ruphos all that well, after all; they'd barely known each other a few days. And while they'd seen some terrible things down below, they'd also overcome a great evil, and brought most of the captives back up to safety. There was the matter of the boy, Terrem, and the beholder, but that mystery too remained unsolved. The day after their return she and Mole had gone with Jenya to the orphanage, only to find that the boy had been returned safely, just as the beholder had said. Gretchyn, the headmistress of the orphanage, hadn't been able to provide any answers, reporting only that a dark-clad woman had returned the boy that same night, and Terrem wasn't able to provide anything more useful.

Zenna frowned. There was something more here, something deeper, more sinister, that none of them could see. Why had the beholder been so interested in the boy? Outwardly, there had been nothing to distinguish him from any of the other stolen children. Jenya hadn't been able to provide any insight, though she'd been noticeably troubled when they had told her about the beholder. Zenna knew little of such beings, except that they were possessed both of great power and great cunning.

She shook her head. The rain had eased off, and she could now hear the faint sounds from the adjacent inn, the bustle of the afternoon rush picking up. Enough time for idle speculation, she thought, reaching for her pen.

She bit off a curse as she looked down at the parchment. The last two characters she'd written were transposed, completely ruining the spell she'd been working on. Fortunately it hadn't been in her spellbook; she'd have lost a whole page to such a stupid mistake. Her magical powers had grown since they'd returned from underground; in the last tenday she'd added several new spells to her book, including a dweomer taken from a gnomish scroll that they'd found in the skulk treasure. The second spell on that parchment, however, that of mirror image, continued to vex her, taunting her just beyond her abilities, like a book placed on a shelf just above her reach. She could feel some of the new spells burning in her mind right now, imprinted upon her memory like a melody that lingered long after the minstrel stopped playing. She could call upon any of them right now, she knew, and the spell would be wiped clean from her mind, until she rested and studied its formula once more.

She glanced out the window, trying to judge the hour. Mole wouldn't likely be back for hours. They still took their evening meals together, though didn't spend much more time together than that, at least not over the last few days. She rose, careful not to bang her head against the sloping roof above, and reached for her cloak. Her gaze lingered on her pack and crossbow for a moment, but she finally decided to leave them; she was only going out into the city, not on another adventure. And if trouble did find her, she had her spells.

With that decision made, she headed down the narrow stairs and went out into the city.

The streets of Cauldron were slick with the day's rain, with puddles gathering wherever there was a slight dip in the pavement. The sky above was an unbroken bank of deep gray, promising more rain before nightfall. The air was clean, heavy with dampness, and Zenna's hair clung to the back of her head as she left the alley behind the Morkoth and started down Obsidian Street in the direction of the city's northern gate. She left her cowl down; with the magical hat, she no longer needed to hide her features from people. The streets were rather quiet, however, the citizenry of the town muted by a combination of the weather and the difficult times that they had faced over the last month. Zenna passed by a number of townsfolk who seemed primarily interested in minding their own business and hurrying about their errands before the rain started up again. That was fine with her; she was of a like mind.

The scrivener's shop was only a few blocks from the Drunken Morkoth, nestled into one corner of a large two-story building that also housed a printer, a leather-goods shop, and apartments above. The proprietor was a middle-aged woman named Leira, who knew Zenna from several past visits over the last few tendays. Her prices were fair, but blank scrolls and such were expensive, and Zenna self-consciously felt at her unhappily light purse as she entered the shop.

The front room of the shop was tiny, with only a counter, two chairs barely larger than stools, and a curtained doorway that led back into the workroom. The place smelled like paper, and inkstains decorated the old wood in more than a few places. Zenna could hear Leira whistling in the backroom, and as the tiny bell over the door tinkled she came out to greet her.

"Hello, Leira... I'm afraid I made a mistake on my last scroll, and I need a few more sheets of parchment... what's wrong?"

The older woman's smile had faded when she'd gotten a good look at her customer, and now her face grew pale. "Uh, um, nothing, let me get that for you." She turned and hurriedly retreated back to the workroom, the curtain swaying behind her.

Zenna frowned, wondering what was wrong with the woman. For a moment she felt a sudden twinge of panic and reached up, confirming that the magical hat was still in place. Had its power failed for some reason? She could still feel the stubby horns that jutted from her temples; the magic only concealed them, did not actually change her body in any way. But without a mirror, there was no way to know for sure what Leira had seen.

"You used the calfskin, as I recall," she said, returning with a small package. "Three sheets, six silver, please."

On her previous visits Leira had been chatty and friendly, asking questions and making suggestions for other products. But now she was clearly agitated, taking Zenna's money and waiting there as if eager for her to depart. Distracted, Zenna left, glancing back to see the woman watching her through the front window of the shop.

She walked down the street, staying in the shadow of the buildings. She passed by another shop, this one closed and empty, and paused by its window. The four panes of glass set into the frame were of poor quality, clouded and scratched, but there was just enough light for her to clearly see her own reflection in its surface.

She sucked in a startled breath.

Chapter 45

Zenna stared into a face that was her own, yet at the same time...

At first she thought it was just the way that the shadowy reflection showed in the bad glass. But then she saw that her cloak and the rest of her body was clearly outlined in the impromptu mirror, it was only her face that was... wrong.

The magic of the hat was still working, at least she could not see the horns that were nonetheless still there. But her skin... not just pale, it was somehow... faded, as if formed of a thin parchment that had been scraped once too many times. She touched her face; the skin was firm, solid, but to her eyes it looked almost insubstantial.

A sickening feeling caught her gut and squeezed. What was happening to her?

She looked down at her hands, and tugged off one of her thin leather gloves. Immediately she saw that the skin looked the same, worse even when looked at directly, rather than in the reflection of the glass. Her flesh was pale, and as she moved it she thought that she could almost see the ground below through the delicate fingers.

“No,” she said, feeling a rush of anxiety come over her. She’d felt sick, hollow, it was true, over the last few days, but this... It was as if she was slowly vanishing, fading until there would be nothing left of her at all, as if she’d never existed...

“What the...”

Zenna looked up, and saw that a man dressed in the simple clothes of a laborer had approached along the walk, drawing back in surprise as he got a good look at her. With a reflex born of long practice Zenna turned away, darting out into the street and rushing away from the man, pulling up her cowl to hide her features. The man shouted something after her, but she could not tell what it was over the sound of her own heartbeat pounding in her ears. As long as she could hear that sound, she thought, she was still alive. She stabbed her hand back into her glove, running down the street, dodging the occasional horse or wagon, avoiding the pedestrians along the walk to either side that looked out at her in surprise as she ran past.

She wasn’t really sure where she was running to, at first, but her course was taking her farther away from the Morkoth. Past the North Gate, she knew, further down Obsidian Street, was the Temple of Helm. She felt uncomfortable at the thought of returning there, but she remembered the way that her hand had looked just a few moments ago, and rushed on. Perhaps Jenya could do something to help her...

Something cold touched her face. It was starting to rain again.

“Watch it, woman!”

The teamster yelled out his warning as Zenna rushed blindly across an intersection, her cowl limiting her field of view. A two-horse team was drawing a wagon up one of the sloping streets that formed the spokes connecting the main boulevards that ringed the town. One of the horses reared as she shot past, startled by her sudden appearance. She narrowly avoided a hoof that lashed out at the air before her, and then she was past, curses from the driver following her. She turned to look back over her shoulder...

“Arg!”

One boot caught on an uneven flagstone in the street, and the other slid out from under her as it landed awkwardly on the slick stone. She was falling, her momentum carrying her forward, and then pain exploded through her body as she landed hard on the wet street. She felt a shocking cold as water seeped through her clothes, then a warm haze that fell over her like a blanket. For a moment the world seemed to spin out of control around her, then it started to fade, everything melding into a soft grayness that filled her senses.

No, I don't want to fade away! she screamed, but the sound only echoed hollowly in her own thoughts.

The last thing she was aware of was voices, distant and jumbled. One voice seemed to separate from that mass, its tone soft and comforting, but although she strained to make out the words, they slipped through her thoughts like water through her fingers.

Then she faded, and everything disappeared.

Chapter 46

Consciousness came gradually, the layers of gray that enfolded her falling away in stages. Around her the world took focus, with light, sound, smell, and sensation each returning slowly.

Zenna blinked, and looked around her. She was in a small but comfortable chamber that was crowded with an unusual array of furnishings and decorative enhancements. Plush carpets woven with complex patterns covered almost the entirety of the wooden floor, the colors blending well with the tapestries that hung from the walls intermittently between the many tall bookshelves crammed with volumes. That alone was remarkable—a collection of several hundred books was worth a small fortune—but Zenna's attention was further drawn to the odd knickknacks scattered on the bookshelves, the small end tables situated throughout the room, or even hanging from the ceiling from slender lengths of chain. These curios ranged from weapons of unusual make, carvings and statuettes fashioned from wood, clay, or metal, a small collection of odd skulls of various sizes, some colored glassware, small pots and vases, and a few other items that even Zenna could not readily identify at first glance. A stream of incense wafted up into the air from a small brass censer atop one of the small tables, filling the room with a faint smell of vanilla and lavender.

She was lying on a couch heavily decorated with embroidered pillows. Her body felt light, a little numb, but she felt a surge of relief that she could feel it at all. She lifted her arm—a motion that cost a fair amount of effort—and was relieved when her sleeve fell away to reveal solid, substantial flesh underneath.

A slight sound drew her attention around, behind her. There, sitting on a gilded perch before the room's only window, was a white owl. The bird was watching her with its wide golden eyes, but it gave no sign that it was disconcerted by her proximity or her movements.

Zenna rose, slowly, to a sitting position. She felt weak, but there were no other lingering effects of the sickness she'd had. Using the end of the couch as a prop, she rose, waiting to see if her legs would support her. She looked at the owl, who was preening itself, apparently bored with her already. Behind it she could see through the window that it was still raining, the city a washed-out haze through the rain-streaked window. The window faced toward the center of the city, and was fairly high up, a few stories above ground level at least. She could see the roofs of buildings that dropped in huge steps toward the lake beyond.

“A fine view, is it not? Even on a dreary day like this one, I find it refreshing.”

The voice drew her around so suddenly that her legs nearly gave out under her. The speaker was a man in his later years, perhaps sixty, though still hale. He stood in one of the doorways that exited the room, clad in a simple robe of soft white cloth belted at the waist. His close-cropped hair and beard were a slate gray, a stark contrast to eyes that were the deep green of emeralds. He wore a pendant or amulet of some sort on a silver chain about his neck, but Zenna couldn't quite make out the sigil from where she was standing.

“The weakness will pass, in time,” he told her. “Your body experienced quite a shock.... and if you'd come to me an hour later, it might have been too late to restore you to this world.”

Zenna forced herself to remaining standing as she faced him, even though her legs seemed to want to take advantage of the adjacent couch. “Who are you, if I may ask, and what is this place?”

The man nodded. “I am Esbar Tolerathkas, and you are in my current domicile. Like you, Izandra, I am not a native of Cauldron, but I have been pleased to call it my home for the last year, and doubly fortunate that a friend was willing to rent me this fine apartment.”

“How did you know my name?” she asked.

Esbar came into the room, though he kept his distance from Zenna. “You said it, repeatedly, while you were ill,” he said. “I am Izandra,” you kept saying. “I'm afraid there wasn't much else, at least nothing coherent. You were quite sick.”

She didn't sense any duplicity from the man, but was still leery, her spells tingling in her mind as if anticipating being released. “I go by Zenna,” she told him.

Esbar nodded. “Zenna, then.”

“How did I get here?”

“A young man of my acquaintance found you, and brought you to me.”

“You... you healed me?”

“Yes.”

“Thank you. I... I am sorry that I was a bother. I was heading for the Temple of Helm, when I fell. I...” she trailed off, as something occurred to her. She’d noticed that her cloak and belt—along with her dagger and spell components pouch—were piled neatly atop one of the nearby tables. Not quite within easy reach, but closer to her than to Esbar. But then she saw something else, jutting out from under the cloak...

“My friend has some... issues... with the clergy of Helm, or I am sure he would have taken you there. I believe it is fortunate that he brought you to me instead, though; I suspect even Jenya Urikas might have had some difficulties with the sickness you had... what’s wrong?”

Zenna had grown pale, as she realized that what she’d seen on the table was her hat of disguise, that her benefactor knew what she was, that he could see the betraying marks of her heritage right now. There was no way to conceal it, now, and she resisted the urge to turn away, to hide her face.

“I... I’d better go, my friends, they must be worried about me...”

His gaze was penetrating, but not harsh, as he regarded her intently. “I understand. But you are still weak, and it’s still raining. Let me call a coach. While we are waiting, we can enjoy a small meal, before you depart.”

Zenna swallowed, but nodded. Esbar watched her as she walked—gingerly—to the table and recovered her gear. The hat she simply tucked into a pocket of her cloak; no need to betray its function now, since it was too late to hide herself from this man.

“Come,” he said. “There’s hot soup and cider in the tea room.”

* * * * *

Esbar was a gracious host, though it became immediately clear that there was more to him than met the eye. The cider and soup was served by what Zenna recognized was an unseen servant, and when she finally got closer to him she saw that the amulet that he wore bore the design of a raised index finger surrounded by sparkles of light.

He noticed her attention and said, “Yes, I am a follower of the High One, Azuth. And I did recognize that you as well are a practitioner of the magic arts.” He made a gesture, and the pitcher of cider drifted off of the nearby trundle to refill both of their cups. Wisps of steam rose from the brown liquid, and Esbar blew on his before taking a sip. Zenna watched him warily, but she could not resist digging into the hot soup. She still felt empty inside, but now it was the familiar pangs of hunger, and not the shadowy emptiness that she’d felt before.

“Is that why you helped me?” she asked.

“Partly,” he said. He leaned back in his chair, cupping his mug in a wrinkled hand, letting its warmth seep into him. “I admit, I am not the philanthropic sort; I leave such things to the cult of Helm, and to the other gods of benevolent sort. Tell me, what do you know of Azuth?”

Zenna blinked at the unexpected question, then reluctantly put her spoon down into the empty bowl before her. "I know he's the god of magic," she said. "Or at least a god of magic; there's Mystara, after all. I haven't actually seen a temple dedicated to him, or even met one of his priests."

"You have now," the man said, with a hint of a smile. "Or rather a 'devotee'; we don't play the games of title and rank that many of the other churches of Faerûn play."

"Azuth was one of those gods who began existence as a mortal, walking this very world that we now share. Those who follow him venerate magic, of course, but do not seek power for its own sake. Rather, we study magic to understand it, to better understand reality, this world and others, and our place in the larger scheme of existence. An Azuthite practices the Art with calm and caution, placing each step with deliberation, lest he unleash destruction that even magic, for all its potential, cannot undo."

"But you're a priest, or devotee, or what have you," Zenna said. "You healed me with divine power; isn't that different from the power of the Weave?"

"Yes. And no. All magic is interrelated, Zenna. Just as all life is related. Perhaps, in time, you may come to understand that for yourself."

A small bell sounded from somewhere below. Esbar waved a hand, and his invisible helper began clearing the dishes from the table. He rose, and after a moment Zenna did as well, feeling rather better than she had when she'd first woken.

"The carriage will take you to where you are staying," he told her. "I hope that you will come and speak with me again, if you have the time."

"I'd like that," she said. He escorted her to the staircase that led down to the ground floor, three stories below. She hesitated there, and looked up at him.

"Can I ask you another question?"

He nodded. She could see that he knew what it was that she wanted to ask, but she had to anyway.

"When you took off my hat, you saw what... what I am. And yet you helped me anyway. And you haven't mentioned it at all during our conversation..."

"I wish I could say that I possessed a deeper understanding that allowed me to look beyond the narrow stereotypes of our culture," Esbar said. "But in all honesty, one of the first things that I did was to delve your aura."

"Oh," she said.

"You are an interesting person, Zenna, more so than I think you yourself realize. I do hope that we can continue our conversation at a later date."

She nodded, and left.

It wasn't until she reached the bottom of the stairs—a difficult journey in itself, in her still-weakened state—as she was reaching into the pocket of her cloak for her magical hat, that she found something there. She drew it out, revealing a silver disk a half-span across.

Thoughtfully, she placed the sigil of Azuth back into her pocket.

Chapter 47

Lines of morning sunlight streamed into the common room of the Drunken Morkoth, indicating a welcome break in the weather. The sprawling chamber with its dozens of tables was mostly empty at this hour, with a few local tradespeople taking their breakfast in liquid form at the bar, and a sprinkling of others enjoying a late breakfast. It was quiet, subdued, with little of the noise that characterized the place in the evenings.

Zenna sat alone in a quiet corner near a window, eating a bowl of hot oatmeal sprinkled liberally with brown sugar. There was a book open on the table beside her bowl, but she wasn't really reading it, her thoughts instead wandering over a variety of roads.

She liked these quiet mornings, where she could have time to think and read without the close air and isolation of her room. Since recovering from her illness she found that she preferred to be around people, even if she didn't interact with them directly. Somehow it was reassuring to have that connection with others, that background noise of the city and its inhabitants.

She finished the last of her morning meal and leaned back in her chair, letting out a deep breath. She felt better, had fully recovered from her ordeal, but while she'd enjoyed this quiet time the period of idleness was starting to grate on her. She admitted that despite having spent nearly two tendays in Cauldron that she still did not know the city well. Fortunately she had Mole, who no doubt by now knew most of the back alleys and interesting hidey holes of the city, and probably a good share of its inhabitants as well. Mole had been great about giving her the space that she needed to confront her personal legacies of Jzadirune and the Malachite Fortress, but now it was time to move on to the next challenge. Perhaps tonight, over dinner, they could talk about the subject that they'd danced around until now. What next?

Zenna sipped at her coffee. For a long time she'd been running away from something. She absently felt at her tunic, at the hard lump pinned to its interior. Uncomfortable at first, now the pin seemed a part of her, almost forgotten. Almost.

But Cauldron was half a world away from where she'd started, both in a literal and a figurative sense. Could she find a place for herself here? Would this be more than a temporary waystation in her wanderings? Mole hadn't revealed her views on the subject. The gnome was possessed of an insatiable curiosity, and while she seemed to enjoy the city, Zenna didn't know if that suggested that she might want to stay.

Another thing for them to talk about, it seemed.

Zenna's hand dropped to the pocket of her cloak, to the symbol she still carried with her. She hadn't gone back to speak to Esbar, although the mage-priest—"devotee," as he called himself—had sent her a book, a study on the philosophy of magic by the notable eastern mage Nes Tarlok. It had been an interesting read, and it opened new questions for her to ponder.

"Good morning," a voice said, startling her out of her thoughts. She looked up to see an elf standing over her.

He was clearly a moon elf, the most common variety of his race in Faerûn, at least that one would see in a civilized town. He was perhaps an inch or two shorter than Zenna, which made him fairly tall for his kind. His silken brown hair flowed down over his shoulders, tamed only by a thin leather band about his brow. He looked young, which meant that he was probably thrice her age, she thought. His eyes were deep and dark, the color of almonds, framed by brows that slanted just slightly beyond what you'd expect from a human. Those eyes caught her up, so much so that she swallowed her initial question, and that she didn't immediately notice the other details about him.

"I am sorry," he said. "I did not mean to interrupt your privacy. But I had wished to see you again, to make sure that you were well." He smiled, faintly, as if a secret had suddenly occurred to him that no one else but her shared.

Zenna frowned. While his features were unfamiliar, there was something in the elf's voice that was familiar, triggering a memory that she couldn't quite bring into focus. She belatedly noticed that he was clad in simple traveling clothes colored in a mix of greens and browns, with a chain shirt over his tunic and a trailing waterproof cloak over it all. A sword was belted at his hip, and she could tell by the way he carried himself that he knew how to use it.

Suddenly she realized that he was just standing there, waiting for her to reply. "I'm sorry," she said. "Have we met?"

He nodded, as if her answer was not unexpected. "I thought that you might not remember," he said. "You were quite ill, at the time."

Something flashed in her mind as a connection fell into place. "You were the one," she said. "The one who brought me to Esbar."

The elf nodded. "Dannel Ardan, at your service." He bowed slightly in the elven manner, a clipped, curt gesture of respect.

"Zenna."

She gestured for him to sit—it was the least she could do—and waited until he had done so before continuing. "I have not seen a great number of the Fair Folk here in Cauldron," she said. "Are you from the Forest of Mir?"

“A bit further afield, actually,” he said, but did not elaborate. Zenna, who had secrets of her own, did not press him, instead asking, “So, what brings you to Cauldron?”

“A bit of business,” he said, “and visiting some old friends. Esbar Tolerathkas, for one.”

“Fortunate for me,” she said. “And fortuitous that you encountered me when you did.”

“Indeed.”

“Coffee?”

“No, no thank you.”

He stared at her for a long moment, enough so that Zenna dropped her eyes, uncomfortable under that heavy gaze. The conversation didn't seem to be going anywhere, with the elf as reluctant as she to share any information about himself. She was trying to think of a way to politely extricate herself when a familiar voice piped, “Hey Zenna! Who's your friend?”

Zenna and the elf both turned to see Mole, who as always had crept up on them unawares. If Dannel was surprised by the sudden appearance, however, he gave no sign of it. “This is Dannel Ardan,” she said by way of introduction. “Dannel, this is Mole, my traveling companion.”

Mole beamed and offered her slight hand, which the elf shook briefly.

“Pleased to meet you,” the gnome said, as she leapt sprightly up into the remaining vacant chair. The table and chairs were built for people of larger size, so once she had sat down, all that Zenna could see of her was the upper half of her head. “You're a moon elf, right? Are you from the Western Heartlands, by any chance? I once knew this elf, he was an arcane archer, from Evereska. Never been there myself, but it sounds like a fascinating place, an entire elven city!”

Mole continued speaking, with Dannel managing to get the odd word in edgewise, but Zenna barely heard them. Suddenly she'd felt a surge of unease creep over her, a vague but powerful sensation that felt akin to nausea but penetrated deeper into her consciousness. Dannel and Mole seemed oblivious to it, whatever she was feeling, and as she looked around the common room she saw the other Cauldronites going about their business as well. Zenna tried to shake off the feeling, but every scrap of instinct that she possessed was warning her that something was terribly, dramatically... wrong.

What was going on?

She was jolted from her reverie as Dannel, in response to something that Mole had asked, drew an object out from under his cloak. It was a silver flute, in two foot-long segments that the elf fitted together into a single seamless whole. The elf raised the instrument to his lips, and a melody lifted from the device, notes of music that seemed to hang in the air and enfold the three of them in their grasp. The tune was soft, lilting, like water cascading over stones. The music of the flute banished the anxiety Zenna had felt, replacing it with a sense of calm. Dannel's eyes were closed as he played on, and Zenna realized that everyone else in the common room had grown quiet as well, listening to the elf's performance.

And then he was done. Mole clapped, as did most of the others in the other part of the room. Dannel took the flute apart and replaced it in its sheath, looking at Zenna with a quiet intensity in his eyes.

"Hey, that was really good!" Mole said. "Could you teach it to me, sometime? I mean, it wouldn't be as good whistled, rather than played on the flute, of course, but I really liked the melody."

Dannel's intent gaze hadn't shifted, and once more Zenna wondered just who this elf was. Why did he act as though he knew her?

"Hey, Zenna, isn't that one of the clerics of Helm?"

Zenna looked up to where Mole was pointing, noting that Dannel had shifted as well, something flashing in his eyes for an instant before his veneer of self-control returned. The young woman who had just entered the Morkoth did look familiar, and her suspicion was confirmed a few moments later as the woman scanned the room, and headed immediately for their table once she had caught sight of them. She was distressed, clearly, and in fact looked to be on the brink of tears as she rushed, breathless, to their table.

"What's the matter, Illeywn?" Mole asked. Zenna nodded to herself; she'd forgotten the woman's name, but of course Mole would have remembered, as she was more interested in people in general.

"Jenya sent me to find you," the woman said, gasping a little to catch her breath. "She wants you to come to the Temple of Helm, immediately!" She shot a quick glance at Dannel, and frowned slightly.

"What is it, this time?" Zenna asked, perhaps a tad more dryly than was needed. The fact was, she was still a bit off guard due to the appearance and manner of the elf, and the strange feeling she'd felt before. Was Jenya's summons somehow related?

The cleric looked at Dannel again, but the elf's expression did not change from a neutral detachment. "Something has happened... it's Sarcem, he's in trouble. Please... I have two horses outside, I can bring you there in a few minutes, Jenya specifically asked for the two of you..."

Zenna was curious, but also wary; the last time that they had agreed to help the Church of Helm had ended in disaster in the dark chambers of the Malachite Fortress. She felt a sudden pang at the memory, a feeling amplified by the reminder offered by the familiar symbol that Illewyn wore around her neck. The same symbol Ruphos had worn...

"Sarcem—the High Priest?" Mole asked. "Of course, we'll go with you." She stood on her human-sized chair before dropping lightly to the ground. "There's just a thing or two I want to get from my room, first... I'll be back in a jiffy!" Before any of them could offer a comment, the gnome was gone, darting out among the tables and chairs in the center of the room.

Zenna stood, and Dannel moved smoothly to match her motion. “Perhaps I might accompany you as well?” he asked. “While I do not know Sarcem Delasharn personally, I have heard a great deal of praiseful speech about him even in my brief time in Cauldron.”

Illewyn looked a bit flustered, uncertain how to reply, but Zenna stepped in. “I am sure that if Jenya needed more help, she would know to ask for it,” she said. “I’m certain that you understand.” She remembered what Esbar had said, about her benefactor having some “issues” with the church of Helm, and she was still somewhat suspicious of the elf’s motives.

But if the elf was put off by her refusal, he didn’t show it. “Of course,” he said. “I will take my leave of you, then. Extend my best wishes to the curate,” he said, with a slight bow at Illewyn, “and express my hopes to your friend,” returning his gaze to Zenna, “that perhaps I shall have occasion to teach her my song at a later date.”

“I will,” Zenna said. “And thank you again,” she added, as he turned to go. Dannel nodded, smiled that odd smile of his, and departed. Zenna watched him go, then turned to Illewyn.

“Well, I guess we’d better get going then. If I know Mole, she’s probably already waiting for us at the horses.”

Chapter 48

The Temple of Helm was as she remembered it, all hard edges and quiet dignity, with a certain majesty in the cavernous interior of its holy sanctum. But she also immediately sensed the tension in the air as soon as they had arrived. An acolyte had greeted them and took their horses to the stable in the courtyard beside the church, worry clear in her features. It was written as well on the faces of the other underclerics that they saw as Illewyn ushered them into not into the small structure that served as quarters and offices for the temple priests, but rather into the main church building itself.

That structure was mostly comprised of a single large hall of worship, with twin rows of wooden pews that could seat perhaps a hundred worshippers. Thick wooden beams supported the roof that rose to a peak some twenty feet above. Jenya Urikas was standing by the altar, and as she turned to greet them, Zenna could see the worry and concern she’d seen earlier reflected tenfold in the face of the woman who led the church of Helm in Cauldron in the absence of Sarcem Delasharn.

“Thank you for coming,” Jenya said, coming forward to greet them with an earnest clasp of their hands. Jenya was a slight, compact woman, nearly a half a foot shorter than Zenna, and at the moment she looked older than her thirty-one years. Her long brown hair, typically done up in a stylish design, now hung about her shoulders in disarray.

“What’s happened?” Mole asked.

"It's Sarcem," she said, forgetting about honorifics and titles in her agitation. "Not even an hour ago, as I was conducting the morning devotions, I received a sending from him." Without waiting for a response from them, she dug into the small pouch at her belt and thrust a scrap of paper at them. Zenna scanned it quickly, then handed it to Mole.

At Lucky Monkey. Have eight wands. Tavern's been attacked. Bandits led by barbaric apeman. Mortally wounded. Retreated to basement. They know we're here. Send assistance!

Sarcem? Is that you? hang on! Conserve your resources. I'll send out aid immediately. Send me another message when you can. But until then have...

"The second line is my reply," Jenya explained. "I didn't have time to think it out clearly, I wanted to tell him to 'have faith.'" She nervously chewed on a fingernail. It unnerved Zenna slightly, to see the normally cool and collected woman so distraught.

"The Lucky Monkey?" Mole asked.

"It's a wayside inn about a day's travel from here, along the north road, on the outskirts of the Forest of Mir."

"We came from the north, though we stayed to the foothills, rather than the forest," Mole said. She glanced down at the message again. "Apeman... that doesn't sound too good..."

"What are these wands he speaks of?" Zenna asked.

"Wands of control water," Jenya replied. "For years now, they have been an essential element in Cauldron's survival." She seemed to take some strength from finally doing something, even if it was just relating a story, and her voice grew stronger as she continued. "As you know, the depths of the volcano are filled with a great lake, one that penetrates far down into the interior of the mountain. There are natural drains down there in the depths, but during the rainy season, or 'flood season,' as we call it, the caldera collects more water than the lake can drain. This results in potentially dangerous floods that can devastate the lower levels of the city, if not properly handled."

"The churches of Cauldron responded to the danger by undertaking the creation of wands of control water. With the aid of these devices, the priests of the city have been able to keep the floodwaters at bay, protecting the city. But in recent years, the rains have been mild, and the churches, distracted by other matters, have turned from their responsibilities. Only Sarcem remained vigilant in calling for more preparation... but he alone could not manufacture all of the wands needed. As the rainy season approached in recent months, he decided to set out for Almraiven, to purchase more wands there. He's been gone nearly a month now, and I had no reason to worry... until now!"

"Please—I ask you, to help us once more. I was going to go myself, but... I know Sarcem would never forgive me if I abandoned my responsibility, left the church and the city without protection. My clergy is small, with young priests, few of whom are warriors. I have sent Morgan to rally the Guard, but getting even a squad released for action so far from the city will take time, and persuasion." She frowned, her displeasure at the reality of urban politics clear. "It will take an entire day's hard ride to reach the Monkey, if the weather holds. I fear that if I wait for the Guard, help will not reach Sarcem until tomorrow... which may be too late for him.

"So you want us, just the two of us, to ride up there and see what's what?" Zenna asked, not bothering to hide her incredulity.

"I... I know it's a great deal to ask. But..." she lowered her head, "I don't know who else to ask."

"Hey, I think I know where I can find Arun," Mole said. "He'll go with us, I'm sure of it."

"If you could just go, see if Sarcem still... if he's all right," Jenya said. "If the bandits and this 'apeman' are still there, wait for Morgan and the Guards to arrive. I do not ask you to throw away your lives..."

That's almost the same as what she told us last time, Zenna thought. That's not how it worked out, though. She didn't say anything, however.

"C'mon, Zenna," Mole said, reading the look on her friend's face. "We can help, we can't just let these bandits get away with it."

"All right," Zenna said, after a moment.

"Great!" Mole said, clearly excited by the prospect of another adventure, even one as dangerous as this one promised to be. "I'll go see if I can find Arun, and meet you at the north gate!" She shot off like a crossbow bolt down the aisle, gone within moments.

Illewyn stepped forward. The cleric had stood there in the background during the whole exchange, but her face wore a mask of determination now. "Let me go with them, Jenya," she said. "They will need a cleric, particularly if Sarcem is seriously injured."

Jenya shook her head. "You are not a warrior, sister," she began, but seeing the resolve in the other woman's face, relented a moment later with a nod. "Very well. But remember, if danger still lurks at the Monkey, wait for Morgan..."

Illewyn nodded, a mix of excitement and fear flashing in her eyes. "I will gather my arms and armor," she said, before taking her leave.

"Come, I will have Malakar prepare fresh mounts for you. It's a long ride, but the road is clearly marked all the way down to the plains. And I will give you another cache of healing potions... in case."

Zenna nodded absently. "If you have an extra light crossbow, I could use one," she said. "I left mine at the Morkoth."

"We will see you fully equipped and on the road within the hour," Jenya said. Even as they stepped out of the church and into the courtyard, the cleric was already shouting orders, directing her underpriests to begin preparations. Those preparations went quickly, with a scurry of activity surrounding Zenna as the young priests brought her a bow and case of bolts, a small padded satchel containing bandages, salves, and four precious healing potions, and saddlebags full of supplies. Zenna watched distractedly, her thoughts already going out to the long road and hard ride ahead, and alternately back to that strange feeling of dread she'd experienced earlier, in the inn.

She strongly doubted that the two were unconnected.

Chapter 49

Arun Goldenshield drained the last dregs of ale from his tall mug, wiping the foam from his jaw—his clean-shaven jaw—before dropping the stein noisily on the table before him. The tavernkeeper shot him an inquiring look from where he stood behind the bar, polishing the bottles and mugs lined up in neat rows on the shelving against the wall. Arun shook his head, and ran his fingers across his jaw. The stubble was starting to itch; it was time to shave again. The thick, full beard of the dwarven tavernkeeper seemed to mock him, but the man was a good enough chap. Shield dwarves and gold dwarves didn't always have the best of relations, but the tavernkeeper had come even farther from his own home than Arun had, and he showed respect to the symbol that the paladin wore about his neck. Respected the symbol, anyway, if not the man.

Arun harrumphed, refusing to indulge himself with self-pity. It had been a long tenday for him, after returning from the Malachite Fortress. Unlike Zenna he had not spent that time with regrets and soul searching; the line between Good and Evil had been clear down there, and he'd unleashed his share of righteous smiting of the latter in a cause that had been both honorable and just. The captives had been freed, and the corrupted half-dwarf behind it slain. Of course, he'd fallen before Kazmojen had been finally defeated, but at least he'd weakened him enough for his comrades to finish the job...

The paladin harrumphed again, his armor creaking as he adjusted himself. The metal plates fit him like a second skin, now, and he rarely left his room, even just to come down here for an ale or three, without it on. He admitted that the Helmites—or more accurately, whoever they'd hired out to do the work—had done a fine job with it. Kazmojen's armor had taken a pounding in their battle, and burned to boot when Mole and Fario roasted the regenerating brute, but it had been restored lovingly to service, and further etched with the design of the Soul Forger, right across the front of the breastplate. Arun had been rightfully honored when the clerics had presented him with it, and his old battle-scarred suit of scale armor had quickly found its way into the discard bin.

The tavernkeeper shot him another glance, followed by a not-so-subtle look at the single window high along one wall of the common room. Arun refused to rise to the bait. He knew it was early, that another whole day lay out there in wait. Dwarves had nothing against spending time in dark, crowded place under the earth, and he himself enjoyed time spent in prayer and contemplation, but even he had to admit that he was mostly hiding here, enjoying the company of fellow dwarves, strong drink and songs. No one knew him here. No one knew what he had done.

Abruptly he pushed the bench back from the table and rose. What was he doing here, anyway? There was no evil to be confronted in the dingy depths of a dwarven tavern. He harrumphed again, but his heart wasn't in it. Where else could he go?

He turned to head back to his room, but even as he left his table the outer door burst open, and Mole charged in, almost colliding with him in her rush.

* * * * *

The morning sunlight had been replaced by thick gray clouds that had gathered overhead as the companions gathered at the northern gate of the city. Not dark enough yet to promise more rain, they nonetheless encouraged them to haste as they rode through the massive stone arch that formed a tunnel through the thick city wall. The reinforced doors at each end of the tunnel were open, and the guards paid little heed to their progress as they rode through. Beyond the city lay a winding, sometimes steep road that would take them down the mountainside into the foothills beyond, and further yet into the plains that formed a narrow belt between the Alamir Mountains and the vast Forest of Mir. Near Cauldron, the foothills and the creeping edges of the wood came close together, enough so that the easy ride across the plains would be the shortest and easiest part of their ride. First, they had to get down from the mountains.

Zenna glanced back at Arun, who looked ill at ease on his horse. Mole said that the dwarf had readily agreed to accompany them, but he'd barely said five words to Zenna, and a storm having nothing to do with the inclement weather seemed to hang over the paladin. Still, she was glad to have him with them, going into a potentially dangerous situation like this one.

Illewyn, on the other hand, was an unknown quantity. The woman was in her mid twenties, fit enough if hinting slightly toward a pudginess that would probably grow more developed as youth retreated into middle age. Her shoulder-length black hair was tied neatly back into a knot, but even though she now wore a chain shirt over her clerical robes, and a light horseman's mace hung at her belt, she definitely did not radiate the martial air of a battle-priest. In some ways, she reminded Zenna of Ruphos, who similarly had been forced to take up a role for which he had not been prepared.

Mole was riding behind the cleric, chattering on about some random topic. Zenna didn't bother to listen in, instead turning her attention back to the road ahead.

As they reached the first bend in the road, the first of many as it switchbacked its way down the mountain upon which Cauldron perched, Zenna caught sight of a squat column formed at the next bend, a jumble of boulders stacked haphazardly in a pile. Beside that natural pillar there was a horse and rider, apparently waiting for them. A suspicion grew in her even before they drew close enough for her to identify the rider, who simply sat there on his mount, waiting without greeting or hail as they approached.

"Dannel," Zenna said, finally reining in a few paces away, the others close behind her.

The elf looked much the same as when he'd taken leave of them an hour before, although now he carried a considerable composite longbow across his lap, with a quiver packed full of long shafts jutting out from behind his shoulder. His horse was a powerful roan, looking like a Shaar breed, perhaps, with its muscular shoulders and hindquarters. It snorted at the other horses, and it sounded like a challenge.

“What are you doing here?” Zenna asked, a hint of impatience creeping into her voice.

The elf lifted his palms, as if to place her at ease. “I was looking to get out of the city for a time, and would share the road with you, if you are willing.”

“Hey,” Mole began, but Zenna cut her off. “I think you’d better be straight with me, starting right now,” the tiefling said.

“You want I should tie this fellow around this pillar?” Arun growled. “He certainly looks stringy enough for a few knots to hold.”

“Peace, dwarf,” he said, but his eyes were like shards of glass, hard and edgy. But he shifted his gaze back to Zenna. “Very well, Zenna, I will be honest with you. There are two reasons that I wish to accompany you.”

“The first is as I said before. The urgency of your departure, your weapons and the manner that you carry them, and the presence of the cleric of Helm, tells me that the nature of the High Priest’s situation is serious. I meant what I said, I wish the cleric no ill, and if he is in danger, I would offer my aid to his cause.”

“And the second reason?” Zenna prodded.

“I’ve been asked to watch over you,” he said.

Zenna nodded to herself. So Esbar Tolerathkas had more than a passing interest in her, it seemed. Part of her felt a surge of fury at the presumption of it, setting a... a guardian over her, as if she was some possession to be monitored. But she also had to admit that the road ahead might be dangerous, if the threat was something that the High Priest of Helm could not handle.

“We ride swiftly,” she said. “You’ll have to keep up as best you can.”

He smiled at her, that same enigmatic smile as before, as she kicked her mount forward again. The others followed behind her, with Mole already engaged in a new conversation with the elf as he fell into the line. Arun brought up the rear, and Zenna could already hear what was sure to be a long day of grumbling begin from that direction.

She urged her horse into a canter, and they continued as quickly as was safe down the side of the mountain.

Chapter 50

The sun had already fallen below the horizon as the five riders approached their destination. The roadhouse was a looming shadow, framed by the tall trees of the forest that stretched out before them as far as they could see to the north and south. The road that led past the inn was swallowed up by the wood within a hundred yards, a black tunnel that seemed to promise doom for anyone foolish enough to essay that route at night.

The roadhouse itself was a sprawling, two-story structure, nestled at the rear of a wide clearing along the forest's edge. As they drew nearer they could see that a side building stood adjacent to the main building, probably a stables or storehouse by the look of it. The windows on both the first and second stories were all shuttered, although faint glimmers of light from around the edges were a possible indicator that the building was still occupied.

The night was close about them, and deeply quiet. Their horses, winded from the long ride, breathed heavily as they approached at a walk.

"Did you see those baboons, on the road?" Mole asked.

Zenna glanced back at where the gnome was riding behind the priestess. "Baboons?"

"I saw them as well," Dannel added. "A pack of them, hiding in the brush about a mile back, just watching us as we went past. Quite unusual."

"It felt like they... I don't know," Mole said. "I didn't like it."

"Bah," Arun said, dismounting awkwardly, his legs stiff from the unaccustomed riding. The horse seemed just as pleased to be free of its burden, and nearly pulled its reins free from the dwarf's grip. Dannel quickly pulled up alongside the creature, and calmed it.

Zenna dismounted as well, and led her horse toward the roadhouse. With her darkvision she could clearly make out what appeared to be the front doors, and headed in that direction.

"Look at those!" Mole said, skipping ahead. She pointed at the various carvings set into the eaves and braces on the inn's exterior, depicting monkeys in various active poses. One monkey was trying to crawl out onto a leaning branch to grab a banana hanging over a sleeping tiger, while another across from it sat blissfully unaware on a flat rock while the poacher behind it was eaten by an ankheg. Mole ran along the front of the building, enjoying the various carvings, but Dannel brought their attention back to their current grim situation a moment later.

"Look there," he said, gesturing with his longbow. Zenna saw where he had pointed, could clearly see the fresh stains splattered against one of the front beams to the left of the doors. Her darkvision didn't allow her to distinguish colors, but she could guess what had made the stains.

Dannel came forward, and crouched in the dirt of the path that led to the doors. "Been a scuffle here," he said, probing the ground, his elven eyes allowing him to see the signs even in the near-darkness.

"Well, let's go in and get this over with," Arun said. His horse shied again, agitated. "Quiet, you blasted beast!" he growled at it.

"It's not you," Dannel said, observing all of the horses. "Something is setting them off."

"We'd better leave them somewhere," Zenna said. "Maybe the stables?"

They made their way over to the side building, passing around the edge of the roadhouse to the dark and silent structure. "I cannot see anything," Illewyn said, as the night continued to deepen. "Let me call upon the power of Helm to brighten our way."

"Hold a bit," Dannel suggested. "We don't want to give ourselves away, and a light spell will do that like a beacon, if anyone is watching."

So they continued in darkness, reaching the stables without incident. Arun, still fighting his reluctant horse with one hand, pulled open the heavy front doors of the stables with the other. Mole peeked inside, and after declaring the place clear, they moved inside. The stables were musty with the odors of animals, but there were no horses present, and no other signs of trouble. Dannel drew down some feed from an overhead bin into a long trough that connected to several of the stalls that ran down one side of the interior, and urged the horses into them. Their mounts were still agitated, but Dannel was able to persuade them to enter the stalls, and he made sure that they were well-secured before he rejoined the others.

"With all the noise them beasts are making, no doubt the whole place knows we're here," Arun grumbled.

"Well, it'll save you having to look all over for the bandits, Arun, if they come find us," Mole offered.

"They may not even be around here, still," Dannel said. "Most bandits don't wait around for the authorities to arrive; they strike quickly and fade away into the shadows."

"But they may not be expecting word to get out so quickly," Zenna said. "We should be ready for anything."

"A wise approach, in any situation," the elf replied.

"We should hurry," Illewyn said, clutching her mace tightly. "Sarcem may still need our help!" The way she said it, it was clear that the statement was as much a prayer as a suggestion.

"All right," Arun said, leading them back outside toward the roadhouse. Zenna saw another entrance on the side of the building facing the stables, but Arun was heading straight back toward the front doors, unlimbering his shield and heavy hammer as he went, moving deceptively quickly for someone of his stature and heavy burdens.

Zenna hurried after him. "Maybe we might want to be a little bit circumspect," she offered.

"Nothing wrong with a frontal assault," the dwarf replied, frowning. "Sneakin' about's not my style."

"If those bandits are still here, I have no doubt you'll get your chance to demonstrate your prowess," Zenna said. "But..."

"Shh," Mole said, having run ahead to the doors during the exchange. "Hear that?"

They quieted, and could hear what the sharp-eared gnome had; a muffled sound from inside, a series of crashes and clattering noises, punctuated by the odd sound of breaking glass.

"Sounds like someone's tearing up the place," Dannel said.

"We have to get in there!" Illewyn added.

"Well?" the dwarf said, looking impatiently at Zenna. The tiefling in turn nodded at Mole, who checked the door efficiently before testing it, pushing the handles and dropping to the ground to peer under the tiny space at the bottom.

"Locked," she said, "And I think there's something stacked up behind it, as well."

"A barricade, eh?" Arun said. "Well, I think I can take care of that." He hefted his hammer, and stepped forward.

"Wait a moment," Zenna said. "By the time we bludgeon through, everyone inside will be waiting on the far side. Mole?"

The gnome, who was thinking the same thing, nodded and ran along the face of the roadhouse to their left, the others quickly following behind. She paused a few dozen paces beyond the doors, under one of the heavy wooden shutters.

"Why this one?" Dannel asked.

"There's no light shining from around the edges," Mole explained. "Boost me up."

The window was only about six feet off of the ground, so the elf was easily able to lift the gnome up to reach the shutters. Mole stood on his shoulders while she examined the thick wooden planks covering the window underneath. They were fastened somehow from inside, but Mole drew out her dagger, working it into the narrow gap between the two planks and drawing it open enough to reveal the latching mechanism. She dug into one of her pouches and drew out a small metal tool, which in turn slipped through the gap and slid easily into the metal clasp that held the latch. A few seconds later, a faint click sounded, and Mole swung the shutters open.

"All right, hold on for a second," she said, sliding up the window and crawling inside. She disappeared into the darkened space, and was only gone for a few seconds before she returned to the window, leaning out over the sill toward them. She gestured for them to come nearer; from behind her, the muffled sound of laughter could briefly be heard from somewhere beyond.

"I'm in a private alcove set off from the common room of the inn by a curtain," she said. "There's a bunch of people in there, having a bit of a party. Bandits, by the look of them, all armed and armored. They're wearing these red sashes around their wrists, and they seem to be at least a little drunk."

"Was there any sign of Sarcem?" Illewyn asked. "He's an older man, balding, in a white clerical robe."

"No, I didn't see him," Mole said. "C'mon, get up here, we can take them by surprise."

Dannel nodded, but Arun looked up at the window dubiously. "I can't just hop up there," he said. "I'll go around to the main doors."

"They've got a pretty big barricade against them," Mole said. "It would take even you some time to bash through, and there may be more of them around, not to mention that 'apeman'."

"Come on, dwarf, we can get you up there, if we work together," Dannel said.

"I don't know, he's pretty heavy," Mole said from above. "Lots of ale, you know."

Arun's eyes narrowed under the brim of his helm. "Take my shield," he commanded, handing the heavy sheet of plate steel up to Mole. This was followed quickly by the dwarf's heavy warhammer, then he turned to Dannel. It was clear that he wasn't going to ask.

The elf grinned. "All right, girls, grab his legs, we just need to boost him to the sill." He stood before the window and formed a box with his hands, bending so that the dwarf could use him as a step to reach the window. The smile erased as Arun's weight settled on him, and even with Zenna and Illewyn adding their strength, the three of them were barely able to lift the dwarf high enough to reach the windowsill.

"Gods... dwarf... you... weigh... a hundredstone!" Dannel grunted, fighting to lift the dwarf higher. Arun grabbed the edges of the windowsill with his thick hands and started to pull himself up, while the three below added their strength from below. Slowly, the dwarf rose, until he'd managed to clamber halfway into the window, his head and shoulders through and his legs dangling out behind.

"Come on!" Mole hissed, glancing with concern at the curtain. The dwarf was making a fair amount of noise, although at least he was keeping his cursing under his breath.

Arun grunted and with a heave fell through the window, landing on the floor with a loud clatter of metal that seemed to fill the place with sound.

Mole was at the curtain in an instant, but even before she peeked around its edge, she could hear the voices change, followed by the sounds of activity and the familiar noise of weapons being drawn.

The bandits were coming.

Chapter 51

Dannel leapt up smoothly into the window, catching the sill and pulling himself through in a fluid motion. He quickly leaned back out and caught Zenna's hand, drawing her up after him. After helping the wizard through, he turned to assist the cleric, who'd grabbed onto the sill but who despite a determined effort couldn't quite pull herself up.

"They know we're here, they're coming!" Mole hissed, loading her crossbow while she peered out through the gap at the edge of the curtain. There could be no doubt, now, that intruders had gotten into the inn; Arun continued to clank and clatter as he awkwardly rose to his feet, immediately making for where his hammer and shield lay on the floor near the window.

"Hey, who's hidin' in there?" came a call from beyond the curtain.

"Lookie like we missed one!" added a second voice, obviously female, but no less menacing for that.

"Yeah, come out, we won'ts hurt ya," added another. By the laughter that they heard, it was clear that Mole's assessment about the intoxicated state of the bandits was accurate, but none of them were foolish enough to believe that this would make their foes any less dangerous.

"They think that we're from the inn, not from outside," Zenna whispered. "We can use this to our advantage, catch them by surprise..."

But Arun had evidently had enough with temporizing, for no sooner had he picked up his weapon and shield then he roared a dwarvish battle cry and burst through the curtain.

The common room of the Lucky Monkey was a sprawling interior space larger even than that of the Morkoth, with a long, curving bar facing the barricaded front doors that had to be at least thirty paces long. The tables and chairs that filled the room were in disarray, with a lot of the furniture turned over or scattered against the walls. But the most pressing matter was the cluster of armed figures approaching the alcove there the companions waited. There were six of the bandits in all, a mixture of men and women, all humans with hard looks on their faces. Four were clad in chainmail with heavy steel shields and longswords, with the other two bore studded leather armor, with slender rapiers in their hands and small bows slung across their backs. All wore the red sashes that Mole had noticed earlier, wrapped around their forearms.

Their reflexes softened by ale and harder drink, the bandits were caught momentarily off guard as the dwarf appeared and charged into their disordered ranks. Arun's hammer slammed into the armored chest of one of the warriors, driving him back several paces. But even intoxicated as they were, it quickly became clear that these foes were not mere novices unused to the press of battle. The warriors hefted their blades and assaulted the dwarf with powerful strokes that clanged loudly against Arun's shield and plate armor, while the two rogues darted in at his flanks, trying to find a gap in his defenses through which they could thrust their rapiers. Arun grunted as one sword glanced off of his helmet, opening a narrow gash in the side of his head. Another warrior, a woman who seemed a bit more wobbly than the others, missed him entirely, swinging her sword in a fumbling attack that clipped one of the rogues in the shoulder before he could dodge out of the way.

“Watch your blade, fool!” the man hissed at her.

“Get out the way then, Alleybasher!” she retorted, trying to recenter herself for another attack as the storm of blades crashed about the dwarf.

“There’s plenty of dwarf to go around for all of you!” Arun roared, sweeping his hammer around in a broad arc, driving his foes back. He caught one of the fighters with a glancing blow to the arm that spoiled his attack, but grunted again in pain as one of the rogues, a red-haired woman with a scar ruining an otherwise pretty face, thrust her rapier into a gap in the armor covering his left hip.

But Arun’s companions had not been idle, and they rushed quickly to his aid as the battle swarmed around him. Mole, unable to get a clear shot into the swirling melee, dropped her bow and rushed forward, drawing her slender sword as she came. She targeted one of the fighters surrounding the dwarf, flanking him in turn as she stabbed at his exposed backside. Her sword failed to penetrate the chain links of his armor, but the attack did draw his attention, and he spun to face her.

“You should have picked on someone your own size, little gnome,” the man hissed, an evil smile crossing his features as he hefted his sword, several times the size of Mole’s diminutive weapon.

But before the warrior could attack, his eyes grew vacant and confused, his already alcohol-befuddled mind clouded by the power of Zenna’s daze spell. His sword lowered, its tip touching the ground as he held it slackly, and his shield dropped, leaving an opening that Mole was quick to exploit. Lunging inside the tall human’s reach, Mole slipped her sword up into his gut, forcing it through the chain mesh into the soft flesh and organs underneath. The daze gave way to pain too late to save the bandit, as he staggered and slumped to his knees, trying to hold in the blood pouring from the vicious wound.

“That cut you a bit down to size, eh?” Mole said, as she drew back, her blade red in her hand.

Back in the alcove, Dannel heaved and pulled Illewyn up through the window, stumbling a bit as the cleric tried to grab onto the threshold and make it into the room beyond. The sounds of battle spurred him on as he unslung his longbow and strung it with a practiced motion, drawing an arrow out from the quiver across his back and fitting it to the string. Darting out the far side of the curtain, opposite where Zenna looked out from behind its other side, he quickly sighted a target, drew, and fired. The shot looked good, but Dannel had overcompensated to avoid the risk of hitting Arun, and it glanced off of a bandit warrior’s greave, caroming harmlessly off to stick in the wall behind the bar.

Muttering an elvish curse, the elf ranger reached for another arrow.

Arun was finding himself hard-pressed as the bandits pressed their attack. Another blow caught him before he could block, the bandit’s longsword coming under his weapon arm and hitting him solidly in the side. The stroke did not penetrate his heavy armor, but he nonetheless felt the force of the impact sting painfully against his ribs. The bandit warriors, even the women, were strong, and their drunkenness did nothing to interfere with the raw power of their chaotic swings. If one of those landed a lucky hit, he knew, he would be in trouble.

But the dwarf did not relent, even surrounded by foes. The one he had injured in his initial charge rushed forward again, screaming a battle cry, and Arun met him with a downward stroke from his hammer. Too late the fighter saw the danger, too late to avoid the impact as the hammer caught him squarely on the forehead. The thin metal foreplate of his open-faced helm provided little protection as the hammer hit with a sickening crunch, and the bandit flopped backward to land in a flailing heap upon the floor.

“Bastard!” cried another of the warriors, a homely young woman with close-cropped black hair, as the man went down. She lunged at Arun, but the dwarf brought his shield around, catching and deflecting the blow. But a moment later pain erupted again in his back as the rogues struck once more, and he felt the strength begin to slip from his limbs, flowing out of his body with the blood that seeped from his wounds.

“Blasted bloody sneaks!” Arun growled, knowing that he couldn’t turn to face that threat, not with several fighters still pressing the attack right in front of him. But he knew that another hit would finish him.

Mole saw the dwarf’s situation, and was already rushing to his aid. She tumbled around the edge of the battle behind one of the rogues, flanking her as she came smoothly back to her feet. The woman saw her coming and tried to adjust, bringing her rapier around into a defensive stance. But Mole was faster, using the momentum of her roll to power her thrust as she stabbed her sword deep into the woman’s leg. She screamed and fell backward, barely keeping her feet as she staggered back from the melee. Mole let her go, instead turning toward the second rogue, who had spun back from Arun and shifted to face her.

“You won’t find me such easy prey, little one,” he said, spinning the tip of his rapier through the air before lunging forward toward her.

The injured woman rogue fell against a nearby table, using it to support her weight as she hurriedly wrapped her sash around the bloody wound. Instead of fleeing the battle, she unslung her bow—a mistake, as it turned out, as Zenna’s crossbow bolt sank into her chest, dropping her.

Arun faced off against the two remaining fighters, holding them at bay with sweeps of his hammer, deflecting their attacks with his shield. The seriousness of their situation was beginning to set in through the haze of alcohol, but they also knew that their foe was grievously hurt, each step the dwarf made leaving a patter of blood in his wake. Near the double doors, another curtain fronting another of the private dining alcoves was flung open, and another pair of bandits lurched into the common room. The reason for the delay seemed pretty obvious as the man was still fastening the draws of his trousers as he entered the room, and the woman’s shirt was half-open, revealing a single white breast. Neither was armored, but their weapons were out, the man with a longsword and the woman with a rapier, and they quickly rushed toward the fray.

“Bria!” shouted the rogue facing Mole. “Get Tongueater!”

In response, the open-shirted woman veered away from the melee, making for one of the doors that exited the common room for other parts of the roadhouse. She only made a few steps, however, before a shaft streaked across the room, catching her hard in the side. Without armor to stop it, Dannel’s arrow bit deep, throwing her against the bar. She gritted her teeth and actually started to move forward again before a second arrow hit her squarely in the throat, ending the matter quite decisively.

“You’ll be joining the others soon enough,” the man threatening Mole said. With his attention on the gnome rogue, he didn’t see his companion go down, but his eyes darted left and right as he pressed her, and he was clearly aware that more of his side were down on the hardwood floor than of the enemy. But he pressed his attack nonetheless, thrusting at Mole’s head with a sudden lunge. Mole narrowly dodged the thrust, countering with a quick riposte that drew a shallow gash along the rogue’s forearm.

“Not bad,” he said, drawing back. “But I am still bigger, and faster.”

“Perhaps, but she’s not alone,” Zenna said, walking slowly up to the pair, holding her loaded crossbow pointed at the man’s heart. “Surrender, and we may spare your wretched life.”

The rogue glanced over to where the other newcomer had joined the fray, lunging at Arun’s flank while the dwarf continued to fight off the other two remaining fighters. He saw the woman lying dead by the bar, and his expression darkened. “I don’t know what she saw in that fool Pierto, but I had a soft spot for Bria, nonetheless,” he hissed. “You’ll pay for that, I swear it!”

He lashed out at Mole, and this time his rapier scored, penetrating the links of her chain shirt and stabbing into her shoulder. The gnome darted back, favoring the wounded side, even as Zenna fired. The rogue was expecting that, though, and the shot merely clipped him as he dodged to the side, bouncing off one of the metal studs set into his armor.

Facing now a third attacker, Arun found his situation even more serious, and his arms felt leaden as he tried to adjust. There was no way he could avoid being surrounded now, meaning that a flank attack would likely penetrate his defenses sooner rather than later. Indeed, as he deflected the newcomer’s first attack with his shield, the woman behind him lifted her sword, bringing it around in an arc that would intersect solidly with the back of the dwarf’s head...

“HALT!” cried Illewyn, her mace extended, her holy symbol held in her other hand. The word echoed with the force of divine power, and the swordswoman obeyed, her sword frozen in mid-stroke.

“Thanks, lass,” Arun called out, before shifting his full attention to the unarmored man who’d just struck at him. “Here’s a little lesson about assaulting a paladin of Moradin without puttin’ on your armor,” he said, before driving his warhammer with the full force of his strength behind it into the man’s torso. Pierto may have won over the Alleybasher Bria, but he couldn't escape his due as the blow crushed his ribs and knocked him sprawling to the ground. Somehow the man remained both alive and conscious, and even managed to slowly get up, still holding his longsword.

Arun turned to the last warrior, just in time to take another hit that caught solidly on the crossbar of his helmet. The dwarf staggered, his head spinning.

Then he fell, landing hard on the floor in a clatter of metal armor.

Chapter 52

The bandits had taken heavy casualties, but there was still a lot of fight left in them. The unarmored one that Arun had bashed got up, critically injured but still able to hold his sword. He moved to join the man that had finally taken down Arun, and the woman warrior as she shook off the brief effects of Illewyn's spell. The cleric looked hopelessly outmatched as the three spread out and came toward her, their faces now grimly serious.

Just a few paces away, on the far side of the battlefield, Mole and Zenna faced off against a skilled rogue, member of the notorious Alleybasher gang. He'd taken a gash from Mole's sword, but in turn had inflicted a more serious wound on the gnome with his own weapon. Mole refused to retreat, however, even as a circle of blood continued to spread across her shirt where his rapier had bitten her.

The three fighters threatening Illewyn hesitated as Dannel stepped forward, another arrow drawn and ready to fire. "All right, which shall it be?" he said.

"You can't shoot us all," the injured man, Pierto, said. He'd drawn a potion vial out from a pocket of his shirt, and held it closely in one hand, his other keeping his sword up in a guard position.

"True," Dannel said. He shifted his aim and released in one smooth motion, the arrow slamming hard into Pierto's chest and knocking him backward roughly to the ground.

This time the fighter did not get up.

The other two hefted their swords and charged. Dannel dropped his bow and charged forward to meet them, his sword hissing out of his scabbard.

"Help the dwarf!" he shouted over his shoulder to Illewyn.

Zenna saw Arun go down, and the surviving fighters turn toward Illewyn and Dannel. She knew that they had to act quickly, that she and Mole could not draw out this confrontation with their adversary any longer. Lowering her empty crossbow, she stepped forward until she stood right behind Mole. The rogue, leery of Mole's speed despite his threats, eyed her warily, ready for an attack, and too late realized his mistake as Zenna uttered a string of magical syllables that echoed in the air momentarily before fading.

A stream of blinding colors shot from the fingertips of the wizard, catching the rogue squarely in the face. His senses overwhelmed by the display, he fell, unconscious.

“Help Dannel,” she said to Mole, grimly drawing out her dagger. She knew that the effects of the spell would last only a few seconds, and the only way to ensure that this foe did not return to the battle. Mole, understanding that as well, nodded and rushed to the elf’s aid.

Dannel met his opponents in a clash of steel on steel. The two remaining bandits knew that this battle would come down to this final confrontation, that they’d taken out the toughest foe, and they had to finish the others before they themselves fell. They could run, but they were veteran enough to know that turning away, lowering their guard, would likely only lead to their deaths against equally veteran opponents.

So they came at the elf with everything they had, spreading out so as to flank him. Dannel turned the first stroke, and the second, but he could only manage a weak counter that failed to do more than glance harmlessly off the other’s heavy mail. They drove him back toward the curtain, harrying him relentlessly.

“You are outmatched, elf,” the woman said, as they pressed him, launching more attacks. Adrenaline was cutting through some of the haze from the alcohol in their systems, and for all his speed Dannel was far less armored than his enemies.

“Perhaps,” he replied, as he parried another blow aimed for his throat. “But time is on my side, I think.”

The man on Dannel’s right sensed the danger a moment before Mole rushed up behind him, and he turned just in time to avoid the stroke aimed at his hamstring. Dannel slashed at him, doing no damage but forcing him back. The melee split into two separate battles, with Mole facing off against the male fighter while Dannel turned to the woman.

“See how quickly things change?” he said to her. “Maybe it would be a good idea to surrender, to turn yourself in and accept a fair trial for your crimes.”

“Never!” the woman hissed, lunging at him again. Dannel darted back, but couldn’t avoid a gash in his off arm that drew a red line across his bicep just above the elbow.

Zenna rose after wiping her dagger on the shirt of the man she’d just killed, grimly stabbing the knife back into its sheath. She hurried over to where Illewyn was still tending to Arun, relief flooding into her as she saw the dwarf stir under the blue glow that shone from the cleric’s fingers. She dug into her pouch and crouched beside the dwarf as his eyes blinked open, and lowered a vial to his lips.

“Drink this,” she commanded.

As life poured back into the battered dwarf’s body, he shot up, blood flying in droplets from his splattered armor. Illewyn and Zenna were nearly dragged down as well as they helped him; with his heavy armor, the dwarf was almost like a turtle knocked onto its back. Once afoot, if still wavering somewhat, Arun shrugged out of the grasp of the two women and charged toward the still-raging battle a few paces away. Not bothering to recover his heavy warhammer, he drew out one of the light hammers from his belt, and rushed up behind the man fighting Mole. The gnome had thus far held her own, although she hadn't managed to hurt her armored foe, but things quickly turned for that combatant when Arun slammed the head of the hammer into the small of the warrior's back. Grunting in pain, the warrior was staggered and left completely open for the thrust of Mole's sword into his gut.

Zenna and Illewyn exchanged a look, then moved to help Dannel.

The last bandit was quick to realize that her situation had grown hopeless. "Tongueater will do for you and yours, elf!" she hissed, lunging at him in a clear feint before turning to flee. Dannel wasn't fooled, and he caught her with a low thrust that crunched through her armor and bit deeply into her thigh. The woman staggered but kept going, heading for one of the doors behind the bar. As she rounded the edge of the bar, Dannel still pressing her from behind, a bolt from Zenna's crossbow just missed her and shattered a nearly empty bottle on the shelving against the back wall. Even as the sound of the crash echoed, another missile spun almost lazily through the air toward the fleeing bandit, catching her in the back of the head even as she reached for the handle of the door. With a sickening snap as her spine cracked from the impact of Arun's hammer, the woman crumpled.

A belated quiet returned once more to the common room, which now had the look of an abattoir. The bodies of the eight bandits were scattered about the room, their blood gathered in messy pools and splattered both on the furnishings and on the bodies of the victors. Breathing heavily, the five adventurers from Cauldron stood and surveyed the results of their efforts.

Arun walked over to where his warhammer lay on the floor. As he bent to recover the weapon, Illewyn approached him, already beginning an incantation. The dwarf shook his head. "I'm fine. Save your prayers, priestess."

Zenna threw up her hands. "You stubborn fool! If you'd just waited earlier, I could have taken out most of them with my color spray. Now you won't take healing, just because you're too thick-headed to admit that you're hurt! Well, there's going to be more of those bandits, and that 'Tongueater' they mentioned, so you'd better just drop the bravado and start acting as though there's something besides rocks in that head of yours!"

Arun raised an eyebrow. "And I'd say that you can toss that dagger of yours, girl... your tongue is sharp enough!" But as he hefted his hammer, he let out a loud harrumph. "Fine then, cast your spells, but I'll not be slinking about when there's Evil to be crushed!"

A loud crash drew their attention to the far side of the room, beyond the barricade toward the eastern half of the long common room. There a raised alcove formed a stage of sorts, and they could see another armored figure there, leaning awkwardly against the wall. The figure, another female fighter equipped in similar fashion to the other thugs they'd just battle, had just knocked a chair down the steps of the stage, and as the companions reached for their weapons, she turned and half-ran, half-staggered to the adjacent stair well that led up to the second story of the inn. Arun was the only one to react in time, hurling his second hammer, but the missile was far wide and caromed harmlessly off the wall.

The dwarf had already started in that direction, but Zenna forestalled him. "Let's not rush into another ambush." She nodded to Illewyn, who cast her spell of healing on the clearly impatient dwarf.

"Maybe we should just wait here, prepare for their attack," Mole said. Arun snorted, making his thoughts on that suggestion known.

"There's too many ways into this room, too easy to get flanked or surrounded." Dannel said. The elf had recovered his bow, and handed the throwing hammer that had brained the last enemy fighter back to Arun. "We should be at full strength for the next confrontation, but likewise we should not give our enemies too much time to prepare, to get back on their guard." He drew out from his pouch a slender metal wand that resembled a long, skinny fork, and as they watched he sang to it, summoning a soft greenish glow that seeped from his hand into his body, healing the injuries he'd suffered in the battle.

Zenna gave Mole one of Jenya's healing potions, which the gnome quickly downed.

"While we're lounging about here, our enemies are getting stronger," Arun growled.

Zenna reloaded her crossbow, and glanced at each of the others, gauging their preparedness. "All right," she said. "Let's go."

With the dwarf in the lead, they crossed quickly to the stairs. Wary of an ambush, they made their way up the stairs to the second story of the Lucky Monkey.

They found themselves on a landing, with hallways providing access to guest rooms to the left and right. The landing met the hallways at an angle, with the halls running north and west into different wings of the roadhouse. Directly across from them the first door was standing open, revealing a compact room that had been obviously ransacked.

Arun grunted and moved forward into the hallway. Almost as soon as he stepped from the landing into the hall, the attack came.

Chapter 53

Arrows shot down the hall toward the dwarf from both directions, ricocheting off of his shield and plate armor. Even as he identified the archers, standing in open doorways a short length down the hall in both directions, armored fighters leapt into the open and charged, their longswords held before them like spears. There wasn't much space in the confines of the hall, but where Arun stood, at the intersection of the hall and landing, there was ample room for the defenders to come at him from both directions.

Rather than retreating, the dwarf paladin merely hefted his hammer and waited.

Behind him on the landing, Dannel took aim and fired. His first shot flew over Arun's shoulder and down the left hallway, but the woman thug saw it coming and brought her shield up in time to deflect it. With a visceral cry she hurled herself at Arun at the same time that the second warrior charged at him from behind. Arun held his ground, keeping his back toward the landing and his companions so that he could look down both hallways and keep his guard up against both foes.

The narrow space was filled a moment later with the clash of steel on steel as the bandit warriors met Arun. The dwarf, with his superior armor, held his ground, but conversely there wasn't much room to bring his own hammer to bear against his foes. Behind him, Dannel managed a shot past the warrior on the left in the general direction of the bandit archer still back down the hall, but his arrow lodged in the wooden threshold of the doorway in which the rogue took cover.

Mole leapt forward, tumbling past Arun toward the right fork of the hall and the second warrior. Continuing into a second somersault she nearly slipped right past him to take up position at his back, but the warrior shifted and stopped her movement with a swift kick that caught her heavily in the side. The gnome cried out and fell back against the wall of the hallway, scrambling back to her feet as the man turned toward her, his sword poised to finish what he'd started.

Clucking her tongue in frustration, Zenna held her crossbow, trying in vain to line up a shot. Behind her Illewyn stood holding her mace, likewise unable to work her way into a position where she could add her support to the battle in the confined space. "This battlefield does not favor us!" the older woman said.

Zenna, unable to do anything more, silently agreed.

With a slight screech Mole ducked just in time to avoid the first cut from the swordsman, his heavy blade knocking a chip from the wall just inches above her head. She drew back, but cried out again as an arrow shot at her from further down the hall. The arrow hit the wall a foot in front of her face, but as it shot past the steel arrowhead glanced off her temple, opening a nasty gash that quickly spilled hot blood down the side of her face.

"Ow!" Mole said, regretting her decision to join in the melee.

Arun was aware of her plight, and he shifted his focus to the warrior on his right, driving him back with a solid blow that hit his shield with enough force to knock him back a pace. As the dwarf followed up he left his left flank open to attack from the woman thug, but Dannel leapt into the breach, hurdling the edge of the railing that warded the stairs, drawing his sword as he came. Elf and dwarf stood back to back as their attackers pressed in from both sides, seeking an opening.

Zenna took advantage of the brief opening to fire a crossbow bolt at the woman warrior, but once more the shot narrowly missed its target.

As the fighter threatening her turned his attention to Arun, Mole took advantage of the distraction to leap ahead and dart past him. The man kicked out at her once again, but this time she was able to slip around him. She couldn't turn to sneak attack him, though, for once clear she found herself facing the second bandit archer, who stepped out from his hidey-hole in one of the open doorways, dropping his bow and drawing his sword as he stepped forward to face her.

Grimacing, the gnome hefted her own diminutive blade and went to meet him.

The two hired blades were good, but Arun and Dannel fought together like veterans, moving with each other as they parried and counterattacked their foes. Dannel lacked the heavy protection of the dwarf, but he was nimble and the reflexes of the two fighters had clearly been affected by drink, much like their late comrades in the chamber below. Furthermore the woman was distracted by the bolts that Zenna continued to fire at her from across the landing. Hindered by the need to avoid hitting Dannel, Zenna wasn't able to score any hits, but each near-miss seemed to fluster the warrior a bit more, leaving her open to Dannel's thrusts. Within a few more exchanges both enemy fighters were bleeding, Dannel had taken only a slight gash to his off arm, and Arun wasn't even scratched.

Finally, as if triggered by some secret communication, both warriors lunged forward, their battle cries filling the passage, swords raised high to strike down their foes. Just as smoothly the two defenders adjusted, Arun deflecting the attack of his foe with shield, Dannel pivoting out of the way and turning the stroke with a high parry. Arun's hammer and Dannel's sword lashed out in tandem, the hammer crushing his foe's chest, the sword sliding into a gap in between broken mail links. Both bandits sagged backward, and fell.

"Nice work, elf," Arun offered. "But mine fell first."

"Um... I could still use a little help over here!" Mole exclaimed, still trading blows with her enemy toward the end of the rightmost hallway. On seeing the resolution of the main battle, however, the rogue darted backward, disengaging and disappearing into one of the guest rooms, the door slamming shut behind him. Mole let him go, pressing a square of cloth to the gash on the side of her forehead.

"The other archer fled as well," Dannel reported, "Along with the other fighter, the one we saw downstairs, I presume."

"They'll be back with reinforcements shortly, I'd wager," Zenna said. "Along with the apeman Sarcem described... Tongueater, I presume."

"So? I'm ready for a few more of this rabble," Arun said, kicking the corpse of the man he'd killed.

"These are no common bandits," Dannel said. "They're clearly mercenaries, with no small skill."

"He's right," Zenna said. "We don't know how many more of them are left."

"We cannot leave until we find Sarcem," Illewyn said, with determination.

"Um... look, I'm all for a drag-down brawl," Mole said. The gnome looked a sight, with the bloody cloth held to her head and favoring her ribs where the bandit thug had kicked her. "But we've lost the advantage of surprise, and if those bandits catch us in this hallway, we're going to get squished."

“You want to retreat, then,” Arun said, making the word sound a curse.

“We can watch the roadhouse from the woods, make sure that none of them escape,” Zenna said. “They don’t have horses, and we do, and we have reinforcements on the way. I have a bad feeling about this, if we stay.”

“If we don’t make up our minds soon, the decision will be made for us,” Dannel said. He’d taken up his bow again, and stood vantage on the left hallway, his keen elvish eyes alert for any signs of movement.

Arun and Zenna faced off, each meeting the other’s stare squarely. “We’ll finish this,” Zenna said. “On our own terms, not theirs.”

For a moment she thought that the dwarf was going to stalk off, willing to fight this battle even alone, but finally he nodded. “All right, we’ll do it your way.”

The decision made, the companions quickly returned back the way they had come, heading back to the stairs to the common room.

They’d barely reached the top of the stairs when a loud roar issued from directly below them.

They were too late.

Chapter 54

“All right then,” Arun said, hefting his hammer and turning toward the stairs.

“Wait!” Zenna whispered, grasping the dwarf’s shoulder. “Please, just this once, let’s not stumble blindly into danger!”

While the dwarf looked at her with a hard expression, Mole slipped between a gap in the banisters of the railing. “Do you hear that?” she asked, and bent head-first over the stairwell, dangling enough so that she could see into the room below. They could all hear what had alerted the gnome, now, a jumble of noises from downstairs that included voices, both male and female, mixed with hoots and barks that sent chills down their spines to hear them.

After just a few moments, Mole pulled herself back up, her face white.

“What is it?” Illewyn asked, careful to keep her voice low.

“Run!” Mole said.

A loud, clear voice sounded from below, laced with anger that bordered on rage. “Spread out... find them!” The hooting noises grew louder, accompanied by the crash of wood and glass.

Arun stood at the head of the stairs, looking momentarily uncertain.

“There’s too many,” Mole urged again. “More warriors, baboons, and the apeman...” She shuddered at the too-fresh memory of Tongueater’s terrible visage.

“We need to find someplace defensible... come on!” Dannel urged.

The elf darted back around the landing, leading them into the left branch hallway. The others followed, Arun bringing up the rear, frequently looking back to see if their enemies were chasing.

The hallway meandered across the main wing of the roadhouse, with occasional doors on both sides opening onto ransacked guest rooms. With the turns they quickly left the landing behind them, and finally the hall straightened and ended with a slightly larger room ahead.

The place was clearly intended to serve as a lounge for the upstairs guests, a haven for those who preferred someplace quieter than the boisterous common room below. A hearth sat empty and cold to their left, while to their right there was a heavy round table of sturdy oak flanked by five simple but comfortable-looking padded chairs. Two doors exited to the right, and they could just hear the patter of rain on the shuttered windows.

Arun turned to block the hallway, standing guard like a sentinel. “This is a good spot,” he said. “I’ve had enough of running away, dwarves don’t run away.”

Zenna’s reply was something not quite audible, issued under her breath as she and Mole hurried to the two doors. One opened onto a compact bath chamber, complete with a heavy wooden tub, while the other revealed a small bridge, open to the night air and the cold rain, crossing over the slanting roof to another door a half-dozen paces ahead.

Zenna pulled that door shut. “There’s no way to secure this door, it opens outward!” she exclaimed. There was a latch to hold the door shut, but it was just a flimsy piece of wood attached to the door by a leather cord. Below that was the handle, basically a foot-long bar of curved iron set into the door at its top and bottom.

“You just need to be a little creative,” Mole said, taking a quick look at the door before darting into the bath chamber. She returned a few seconds later with a wooden board, which she forced through the door handle and wedged against the doorframe, setting it firmly into place with a few taps from the hilt of her sword. “There,” she said. “It’s not a proper lock, but it’ll hold unless someone takes the door off its moorings.”

Meanwhile, Dannel had called to Arun, and the two had shifted the heavy table to block the hallway, tilting it so that its heavy top face sat in the mouth of the hall like a battlement. The round table was nearly big enough to block the entire exit, leaving small spaces around the edges that would serve as impromptu arrow slits. Illewyn helped by stacking a few of the chairs behind the table, filling in the gaps near the floor and adding to its weight as a barricade.

Even as they finished their work, the sound of animal hooting became audible down the hallway, followed by the familiar clink of metal and several all-too-human shouts, alerting their bandit enemies that the invaders of their stolen safehold had been found.

“They’re coming!” Arun warned, hefting one of his throwing hammers.

Chapter 55

The hallway was dark with shadows. Only just enough light filtered in through the one shuttered window in the hall and around the barrier to incrementally brighten the darkness. Outside, the downpour continued, its patter against the roof a faint but constant backdrop to the developing confrontation inside.

The first enemy to appear was a tall, lanky man clad in chainmail, his shield slung and carrying a torch in his off-hand, his longsword bare in the other. Upon sighting the barricade he let out a shout to his comrades, but instead of retreating back to the cover behind the bend in the hall, or pausing to unlimber his shield, he raised his sword and charged.

It was the last foolish decision that this particular warrior, a nasty, cruel-hearted wretch named Lakus, ever made.

Dannel’s first arrow hit him on the shoulder, by sheer bad luck striking the iron buckle of his baldric and glancing aside. The impact barely slowed the man, still infused with the false courage of alcohol, and he continued his rush into the death that awaited him. Dannel’s second shot caught him less than ten paces later, the steel arrowhead this time penetrating the mesh of steel links that protected him, stabbing several inches into his torso. Lakus felt the pain through his drunken haze, but it did not stop his rush. As he neared the barrier, another bolt came up from a narrow slit where the table curved away from the wall, the opening there mostly blocked by a chair jammed into the space. Mole’s shot caught the warrior in the leg, biting deeply into his thigh. Once again he wavered, but kept coming on, limping.

When Arun’s thrown hammer caught him in the face, though, he’d had enough.

Even as the first foe fell, an arrow slammed into the edge of the table, quivering with the force of the impact. A moment later a second streaked through a gap in the barricade, narrowly missing Dannel. A pair of bandit rogues had moved into position at the far end of the hallway, taking cover behind the bend in the hall on one side and an open doorway to a guestroom on the other. The guttering torch lying on the floor beside the fallen warrior served as the only illumination, casting a fitful glow over the scene. Unfortunately for the bandits, neither Dannel nor Mole needed more than that, as they returned fire. But with the bad light and the fact that both sides had good cover, no one scored a hit in the first exchange.

“Stalemate?” Mole asked, as she drew back to reload.

"I wouldn't bet on it," Arun replied, peering around the edge of the far side of the barricade, his warhammer at the ready.

Behind them, Illewyn, without a missile weapon, and unable to see clearly in near-darkness, reached out with a prayer, calling down the blessing of Helm upon the besieged companions.

Down the hall, the light of more torches appeared around the bend in the hallway. But instead of more warriors or Alleybashers appearing, the light revealed a group of three baboons, each nearly the size of a wolf, the source of the hooting and barking noises that erupted anew as the companions caught sight of them. That cacophony was echoed by a deeper, stronger cry that sounded from somewhere further down the hall, and as that sound faded, the creatures dashed down the hallway, their claws clacking against the hardwood floors as they came.

"Let them have it!" Dannel cried. He fired the opening shot, but his arrow narrowly missed as one of the baboons darted to the side, the long shaft bouncing up from the floor to carom harmlessly into the far wall where the hallway turned. He didn't bother to curse his ill luck, however, and was already drawing out another arrow as the others joined the barrage. Zenna had taken up position standing over Mole, and fired a bolt from her own bow that caught a baboon solidly on the shoulder. Mole took aim at the same one, hitting it in the leg. The baboon, seriously injured now, fell behind the other two, which hurled themselves forward at the barrier. One snarled and lunged at Mole through the gap near the base of the barricade, its claws drawing gashes in the wooden chair jammed into the opening as it tried to get to the gnome. Mole let out a small shriek despite herself, drawing back just as one long furry limb shot through and tried to grab her.

The second ape tried to clear the barrier entirely, leaping up, its claws seeking purchase on the lacquered edge of the table. But Arun was waiting for it, and his hammer smacked solidly into it before it could clear the obstacle. The ape, stunned by the blow, tried to get back up, but was too late as Dannel leaned over the edge of the table and fired an arrow into its side.

Zenna tried to hold the chair in place with her foot even as the baboon redoubled its efforts to slip through. Its jaws snapped at them, but its body was just too big to fit through the opening. It only managed to wedge itself into place, which cost it as Mole fired her bow point-blank into its furry hide. The baboon screamed and drew back, but Zenna stepped forward and fired again, hitting it with a meaty thunk that drove it to the ground, half-conscious and bleeding.

The third ape, with two bolts stuck in it, made it belatedly to the edge of the barrier. It scrambled up despite its wounds, but even before it cleared the edge of the table a dwarven arm lifted over the barrier, and the heavy hammer came down. Hammer met apish skull, and the creature slumped heavily to the ground.

Even as the furious but futile assault from the baboons ended, however, Dannel shouted and pointed down the hallway. There, another foe had stepped into view, bracketed by the torches carried by the pair of warriors who stood behind him.

He was a tall, powerfully-built figure, standing easily seven feet in height. He wore a vest of boiled leather set with fat metal studs, revealing muscular arms that were marked with scars and metal piercings. He bore a falchion, a heavy, ugly weapon that he scratched upon the floor as he moved. But most terrible was his face, the visage of a baboon, featuring garish colors that shone evilly in the torchlight, and massive jaws that sported long, uneven teeth.

“Time for you to die, meddlers,” he croaked, and he laughed a cruel, terrible laugh.

Tongueater had arrived.

Chapter 56

“Time for you to die, meddlers,” Tongueater croaked, his sick laugh sounding clearly even almost thirty feet down the hall.

“You first, monster!” Dannel yelled back, drawing and firing his longbow across the barrier.

The shot flew true, hitting the apeman squarely in the center of his chest. The arrow clearly penetrated his armor, but Tongueater merely reached down and plucked the missile free, tossing it aside. There was no blood.

“You’ll have to do better than that, fools,” he hissed. He reached into a pouch at his belt and drew forth a small vial. Turning to his remaining warriors, he ordered, “Kill them!” before uncorking and draining the elixir.

Arrows shot out at the companions, but once again the poor light and the strong barrier—combined perhaps with the lingering effects of too much pilfered ale—resulted in the shots flying wide or sticking harmlessly in the tabletop. The two warriors behind Tongueater rushed down the hall toward the barricade, holding torches and longswords in their hands.

Dannel, meanwhile, had turned away from his sniping position at the edge of the makeshift battlement, and was digging hurriedly in his pack.

“What are you doing?” Arun shouted at him. “We need your bow, elf!” He himself hurled his last throwing hammer down the hall at the charging warriors, but in his haste he missed his target. Zenna and Mole both fired their crossbows, but they too were mostly ineffective, with the gnome scoring a glancing hit that stabbed into the arm of the charging warrior on the left, a squat, pug-nosed woman.

Even as the two women tried to reload, their enemies reached the barrier. The pug-nosed woman lowered her shoulder and tried to push through the barrier on Zenna and Mole’s side. Her plain appearance belied a considerable strength, and the table slid a foot back as she drove forward, kicking out the chair jammed beneath it as she came. Zenna tried to push back against the table, but the woman thug saw her and lashed out with the arm holding her torch, hitting her across the face with her gauntlet and knocking her roughly against the adjacent wall.

Mole, however, had put the few seconds that her friend had bought to good use, lifting her bow and firing it point-blank into the woman's gut. The bolt penetrated the links of mail protecting her torso, and she cried out in pain as the shaft dug deep into her belly. With a snarl she hefted her sword and forced through the opening she'd made in the barricade, staying on her feet through sheer grit. But her eyes widened in surprise as Illewyn rushed forward from the shadows in the back of the room. The cleric's eyes shone in a mixture of anger and terror as she brought her mace down squarely in the center of the warrior's helmeted head, and with a solid crunch the woman sagged down to the floor, unconscious.

On the other side of the barricade, the other warrior, a blond-haired young man, tried likewise to force his way through the obstacle. Unfortunately for him, that side of the barrier was garrisoned by a rather querulous dwarf paladin, who was not going to let just any bandit fighter through. The thug, whose fair face belied the drunken, wastrel, and just plain mean story of his young life, let out a warcry as he hit the barrier, shoving his torch through the gap where the table curved from the wall. He didn't manage to push the table back like his female comrade on the far side had, and the flames of the torch did nothing to stop Arun, who knocked the brand aside with his shield before bringing his hammer down in an overhead strike that crushed the warrior's extended bicep. The warrior screamed as bone crunched under the impact. He tried to counter with a thrust of his sword, but his aim was poor, and the sword stabbed awkwardly into the edge of the table. Fortunately for him he had a moment of lucidity through the haze of pain that rushed into his body through his broken arm, and he drew back hastily before Arun could launch another assault over the barricade.

Even as the enemy fighters were driven back, a roar announced the arrival of Tongueater to the fray. Having consumed his potion, the ferocious apeman flew into a rage, bounding down the hall in an inexorable rush, the walls of the hallway seeming to shake with the force of his passage. Even as Illewyn struck down the first bandit fighter, and Arun drove back the second, the bandit leader crouched and sprung over the barricade, hurling his considerable body through the gap with amazing speed and strength. His roar filled the lounge as he landed heavily, shaking the floor even as he whipped around his falchion, ready for blood.

Arun answered its roar with a dwarven battle cry, surging at the monster from the side. His hammer swept out and caught him on the side, but instead of crushing his ribs the blow seemed to only lightly faze him. The half-orc, half-baboon monstrosity laughed as he ripped into Arun with his falchion. The heavy steel blade connected with the paladin's body, and while his armor held, keeping him from being carved into pieces, it was clear from the dwarf's grunt that the stroke had hurt.

Just a few paces away, Dannel rose, hefting his bow. He'd found what he was looking for in his pack, a cloth wrapping that had held four arrows. A gift from a silversmith for aid against orcs that had assaulted his wagon, the elf had never thought to use the arrow that he now fitted to his string as a weapon. But while he'd never faced one personally, he'd belatedly recognized their foe as a lycanthrope, and knew the tales that spoke of their one weakness.

The shot could barely miss at that range, and the silver-tipped shaft drove deep into the apeman's back. Tongueater roared again, this time in pain, and he spun to face the elf, hatred burning in his eyes. An ordinary man would have been lying on the floor with such a wound... but the lycanthrope was no ordinary man.

Dannel did not retreat—there was nowhere to go—reaching for his second arrow even as Tongueater leapt at him. The elf nimbly dodged the vicious stroke of the falchion, but was caught by surprise as the apeman suddenly lunged at him, his vicious jaws snapping around the elf's shoulder. Dannel cried out as pain erupted through his body as the cruel jaws tightened, and it was only through a desperate effort that he was able to tear free.

The elf's companions rushed to his aid, trying to distract their enemy from his target. Arun pressed it again from behind, but once more his hammer, even backed by his considerable strength, had little effect upon the apeman. Mole drew her sword and charged him from the side, but she too found her thrust of little use, the sharp blade glancing off his preternaturally tough hide.

These attacks gave little respite to the beleaguered elf, but he pressed his attack regardless, dancing back a pace to give him room to draw and fire once more. Again his arrow bit into his target, catching the apeman high in the shoulder. Although the force of this shot was mostly absorbed by Tongueater's heavy leather vest, the additional hit drove the creature's rage even further. He leapt forward at Dannel, and this time there was no place for the elf to run to as he swept his falchion around in a mighty arc, driving it with the full force of his monstrous strength into the elf's body. The force of the blow tore through the elf's chain shirt, and the blade bit deep into his side, knocking him aside to fall in a crumpled heap a few feet away.

Chapter 57

Tongueater cackled madly as his foe collapsed, bleeding his life out from a terrible gash in his side. Even as Dannel landed on the hard wooden floor the apeman was turning to face Arun and Mole, whose attacks thus far had done little in the way of damage. "You next, dwarf," he said, leering as he hefted his falchion. The blade dripped crimson, droplets of Dannel's blood falling to splatter on the floor at the lycanthrope's feet.

Illewyn turned immediately toward the downed elf, but before she could go to his aid, a heavy dragging noise drew her attention back around to the barricade. One of the bandit rogues had taken advantage of the distraction from his leader's attack to close, and even as Illewyn lifted her mace he lunged at her, stabbing with his rapier. The cleric cried out and fell back, bleeding from the puncture wound in her chest.

Zenna knew that the priestess needed help, but she also knew that Dannel, if he wasn't already dead, would be so shortly. Dodging around the melee between the cleric and her attacker, she knelt at the fallen elf's side, already digging into the satchel at her side for the remaining healing potions she kept there.

But her heart froze as she felt a wetness there, and her fingers brushed shards of broken glass. Even before she looked into the bag, she knew what she would find.

“By Moradin’s beard!” Arun cried, calling upon the divine power of his patron in unleashing a terrific blow from his hammer that smacked squarely into Tongueater’s chest. The lycanthrope clearly felt that blow, but his inhuman constitution, combined with the froth of his rage, let him shrug off that hurt as well. Even with two arrows stuck in him, and the battering he’d taken from the dwarf, the apeman still seemed almost unstoppable. Mole took advantage of the dwarf’s attack to move into position behind the bandit leader, but once more her slashing sword failed to do more than scratch his unnaturally tough hide.

Tongueater ignored her, focusing instead on bringing down the dwarf.

Zenna felt tears form in her eyes, and angrily shook them away as she looked down at the dying elf. He was dying, she saw, blood pouring from his savaged side in a fountain, his lips flecked with blood as his last breaths slipped raggedly from his body. She looked around for succor; there was none, her companions engaged in their own life-or-death struggles. The potions she’d carried were destroyed, broken when the bandit had knocked her against the wall. She felt a sickening helplessness, the same that she’d felt when she’d seen Ruphos run through by Kazmojen...

A faint clink sounded through the raging sounds of battle all around her. She looked down to see that the icon she carried, the holy symbol of Azuth, had fallen from her pocket. She reached down, and everything around her seemed to slow down, the world around her frozen in an instant outside of time. Then she touched the amulet, and felt a surge of power flow through her, unlike anything that she’d felt before... and yet, somehow connected to the arcane powers that she’d channeled ever since she was a girl.

Blue light flared around her hand. Her eyes open in wonderment, she touched the hand to Dannel’s side, and watched as the bleeding stopped, and the terrible wound closed. He was still grievously hurt, but she had no doubt now that he would live.

Then her surroundings rushed back in around her, as she heard Mole’s scream.

The titanic struggle between Tongueater, Arun, and Mole had raged on while Zenna had fought to save Dannel’s life. The gnome cursed in frustration as the mighty lycanthrope ignored her feeble attacks; even with his focus on the dwarf, she was unable to find a weakness with her sneak attacks from behind. Arun stood his ground before the apeman’s assault, but it was clear once more that his foe outmatched him. Hammer and falchion exchanged strikes again, and Arun was driven back, hard pressed. Then Tongueater abruptly hurled himself forward, opening his massive jaws as wide as they could to snap down on the dwarf’s head.

Mole, unable to do anything to stop it, could only scream in frustration.

On the far edge of the battlefield, just a few short steps away, Illewyn found herself engaged in her own desperate struggle. Unable to break away from her attacker, a lanky, lean-faced young man with twin scars on his cheeks, she took another hit from that dancing rapier. She felt a coldness in her gut that reflected the hot burning pain she felt from the two wounds she’d taken. Her own counters had been easily parried by the rogue, who smiled a dark smile as he came at her again.

“Sorry, pretty lady, but I’m going to have to kill you now,” he said. He barked out a short laugh, savoring the fear he was inflicting upon his enemy.

That hesitation proved costly, as Illewyn stepped back and called upon the power of her patron. A light shone in her eyes for just an instant as the divine power of Helm entered her, and when it was gone her wounds had faded, and she stood strong and uninjured again.

“I will not be defeated by the likes of you,” she said in a clear voice. The rogue snarled, realizing his mistake, and leapt forward to the attack once more. But the cleric met him boldly, and this time her mace caught him squarely across the shoulders, driving him back this time.

As she heard Mole scream, Zenna looked up to see Tongueater leap onto Arun, snapping his massive jaws onto the dwarf’s head, looming over his smaller foe like a giant. Something snapped inside the tiefling, and she felt a guttural snarl escape her lips as she leapt up and threw herself at the lycanthrope’s back. Too many times had she watched, helpless, while her comrades were killed or injured by their enemies.

Now, at least, she had the power to do something about it.

The magic came quickly at her call, and as she laid her hands upon the apeman, shivers of electrical energy shot from her into Tongueater’s body. The apeman roared and straightened, Arun falling away before him as he released his hold on the dwarf. Twisting around, Tongueater didn’t hesitate, sweeping his falchion around in a deadly arc. Zenna knew it was coming, knew that she could not escape that stroke. Still, reflex had her diving to the side, and she did not cry out when pain exploded through her body.

“Zenna!” Mole cried out, as her friend went down. Her quick dive had probably saved her life, but as the falchion clipped her, and she fell to the ground, she slumped and did not get back up. Mole screamed and hurled herself at their enemy, this seemingly unstoppable foe, stabbing at him with her sword. Once more the stroke did nothing; she may as well have been hacking at a tree.

“Your turn now, little one,” he said. But Mole could see that the bandit leader was hurt, and hurt bad. His chest now heaved with exertion, and trails of dark blood ran down his body from his wounds. From between his legs, Mole saw a dark shadow rise back up off the ground, lifting his mighty hammer with both hands.

Tongueater sensed it too. He turned back toward the dwarf, the falchion coming back up, more slowly now, as the lycanthrope called upon a last reserve of strength to destroy these foes.

Too slowly.

Arun, his face bloody with the cuts torn open by the apeman’s teeth, cried out as he brought his hammer down in a last mighty stroke. Driven by his full strength, with everything that the battered dwarf had left in him, the head of the hammer sank into Tongueater’s chest with enough force to drive the powerful lycanthrope to his knees. A loud crack filled the room, as the blow crushed through the creature's resistances and snapped his breastbone.

For a moment, Tongueater knelt there, staring into the dwarf's eyes with unconcealed hatred. His fingers dug at his pouch for another potion, but the vial fumbled from the bloody digits and fell to the floor.

"This isn't done," he hissed, his voice twisted into a gurgle. "The Masters will do for you..."

And then he slumped forward, dead.

Chapter 58

The aftermath of the battle with Tongueater and his bandit minions was a collection of close calls and quick recoveries. With the death of their leader, the last few surviving bandits had been quick to flee. The rogue fighting Illewyn didn't quite make it; as he darted back for the hallway he stumbled on the debris of the chair that had been part of the barricade, and by the time he got back up Arun's hammer was there to end it.

Zenna lived, and Illewyn was quick to restore her to consciousness using her divinely-granted healing. Dannel was brought around using the same method, and once conscious he used his own healing wand to restore all of them to health. Mole made a cursory search of Tongueater and the dead bandits, and found several more potions, several of which looked like healing elixirs. More remarkable was the leather pack that the apeman had worn as a pouch; Mole found to her delight that the item was an example of the magical bag known as Heward's handy haversack. The gnome quickly transferred the contents of her current pack into the bag, which barely made a dent in the enhanced capacity of the container.

The companions made their preparations in silence, the heavy weight of what had almost happened hanging over them like a shroud. All of them were quite aware that even one more bandit attacker might have turned the tide, and even a few seconds delay could have led to the deaths of both Zenna and Dannel.

Even though magical healing had restored her to full health, Zenna felt that sense of fate quite acutely. On top of this, her thoughts were troubled by the implications of what she had done to save Dannel. The holy symbol of Azuth was back within her pocket, and its now-familiar weight was a constant reminder of its presence. None of the others had seen what had happened; Dannel, the beneficiary of her actions, had been unconscious throughout, and as far as he knew, had been brought around by Illewyn.

How could this had happened? Everything that Zenna had learned had reinforced that divine and arcane magic were two entirely different things, one drawing from the power of the gods, the other tapping into the mystical energies of the Weave. Yet even as she had called upon what she presumed was the power of Azuth through the amulet, casting a spell no wizard could cast, she had felt a strange sense of familiarity, a link to that power that she channeled through the patterns that she stored in her mind through the mechanism of her memorized spells.

She resolved to speak once more with Esbar, upon their return to Cauldron. But there was no more time now for reflection, as the companions prepared once more to move out. None of them wanted to linger here, in this chamber now transformed into yet another gory battlefield. Already Zenna's nose wrinkled at the smells of death, as the forms of what had once been living, breathing men and women were now transformed into organic debris.

"We have to find Sarcem," Illewyn said as she straightened from treating Arun's injuries, her face betraying her exhaustion but her eyes shining with determination as she repeated her familiar mantra.

"Remain wary," Dannel said, as he tucked his healing wand back away and recovered his bow. "The remaining bandits will likely flee, given the death of their leader, but there may be holdouts who may yet be waiting in ambush."

"Bah, bring them on," Arun said. But despite his words, the dwarf's face too showed hints of weariness, and there was a shadow in them as he looked down one last time at the slain body of the lycanthrope.

The companions made their way back downstairs, following the route of the last few bandits who had fled from the battle at its conclusion. There were at least two, they calculated; the second archer who hadn't joined in the melee, and the warrior whose arm Arun had crushed with his hammer. Illewyn had recovered one of the torches dropped by the bandits, and the flickering light of brand sent long shadows ahead of them as they made their way back downstairs.

The common room was again as they had left it, although the stench of death now hung heavier in the chamber. A door in the eastern part of the room near the stairs that had been shut earlier was now open, so they headed in that direction. A hallway led beyond that opened onto a number of small rooms that had the look of offices and quarters for the staff that ran the roadhouse. They saw no signs of the bandits, save for the general destruction and looting that had characterized the rest of the place, so continued on to the end of the hall.

The last door opened onto the kitchen, a spacious room with several other exits. To their right were a pair of shuttered windows flanking a set of double doors that opened onto the night outside. The doors were slightly open, the locking mechanism clearly bashed open, and a small half-circle of wet from the storm outside had already formed in front of the opening. A staircase led up to the second story directly to their left as they entered, with a heavy iron stove standing against its base, while a massive hearth stood cold and empty in the opposite wall. A single lamp burned fitfully in a wall sconce, its flame dancing in the damp wind that blew in through the open doors, and another half-dozen lamps were burned out and unlit about the chamber.

To their left, a heavy table stood against one of the interior walls. Standing there was a woman in armor who was hurriedly transferring handfuls of coins from the tabletop into a fat burlap sack. Other coins were scattered across the floor, forming a trail of sorts to the open doors. As they entered she looked up and saw them. She dropped the sack, some of the coins falling to roll across the floor, and reached for the longsword at her hip.

“Give it up,” Arun said, stepping into the room. “Your leader’s dead, and so are the rest of your comrades.” Behind the dwarf, Dannel entered, an arrow to his bow and the string half-drawn, ready to fire at an instant’s notice.

For a long moment the woman warrior only looked at them in silence, her face torn between expressions of anger and fear. Then a scream from beyond the half-open outer doors broke the standoff, followed by a bestial roar and a tearing noise that sounded quite unpleasant indeed.

“What the...” Arun said, shifting his attention to the disturbance.

The woman bandit leapt into action, but instead of charging the companions she spun and fled, darting toward one of the doors in the far wall that led into another part of the roadhouse. Dannel lifted his bow and drew the arrow to his cheek, but held his fire as the woman disappeared. Zenna, standing behind him, noticed but did not say anything as they followed Arun into the room and toward the doors.

“Oh, no!” Illewyn cried, a sound that pushed the border between sanity and hysteria, drawing their attention around.

The priestess’s torch had illuminated what had looked like a mount or scone attached to the wall near the table. As the light drove back the shadows, however, it quickly became clear that the object was in fact a human head, severed and impaled on the wooden surface. Illewyn’s behavior revealed the identity of the grisly token, even before she sobbed the answer.

“Sarcem... Sarcem!” she cried, falling to her knees, her body shaking.

Mole and Zenna were at her side in an instant, offering what sympathy they could, while Dannel moved over to remove the impaled head from the wall. Before he could reach it, however, another roar sounded from outside, followed by what sounded like a patter of feet on the muddy ground, drawing nearer.

“I don’t think we’re done here yet,” Arun said to them, while he moved to the door with his hammer at the ready.

His words were proven true a heartbeat later. A drenched human appeared in the opening, staggering toward the sanctuary offered by the roadhouse, his face a rictus of pain as he clutched gashes in his side that oozed blood. Even as he spotted Arun a darker, bigger form rose up out of the rain behind the fleeing bandit, lunging for him from behind. The bandit reached for the doors even as the shadow struck, and he screamed as it tore into him, driving him forward. The bandit and his pursuer hit the doors, slamming them shut with incredible force, and behind them the companions could hear the sounds of rending flesh.

Then, a few minutes later, silence returned to the roadhouse kitchen, broken only by the faint sounds of the rain outside.

Chapter 59

After Arun related what he'd seen to the others, none of them were particularly interested in going outside, so they barricaded the door with the heavy table and continued their search. It appeared that the bandits had gathered their collected loot here after the attack, and posted the head of the fallen cleric as a trophy of their victory. True to his name, they found that the bandit leader had torn the tongue of the priest from his head. Illewyn was barely functioning, still consumed by her grief, so Dannel wrapped the head in a blanket and placed it in an out-of-the-way spot for them to return later for burial.

They left the remaining treasure for now, aside from a few small items that found their way into Mole's new magical backpack, and resumed their search. They didn't find any sign of the bandit woman that had fled from them earlier, but they did come across a window that had been forced open, its shutters clattering against the frame from the force of the wind.

"I hope for her sake that those... things weren't still out there," Mole said.

"She earned her fate when she chose to join in the assault upon this place," Arun said grimly, and they pressed on.

The rest of the roadhouse was quiet and dark. The storm outside continued unabated, and the wind picked up as the night drew on, crashing insistently against the shuttered windows. They found several lamps that had not been broken by the bandits, which they used to aid in their search. Other than Sarcem's head, they had not as yet found any other sign of the inn's staff and patrons.

"This storm doesn't bode well for Cauldron," Illewyn commented idly, the first words she'd said since they had found Sarcem's head. The cleric's eyes were red, and she moved with the listless steps of one who had not slept in days. "We have to find those wands..."

There was a brief scare when Dannel opened a door that led onto a central courtyard in the interior of the inn. Dark forms were visible in the landscaped garden, and they quickly turned toward the door, deep growls indicating their intent, white teeth flashing in the light of their lamps. The elf was quicker, though, slamming the door an instant before the first heavy body collided into it.

"Looks like Tongueater left a few of his friends behind," the elf noted. Looking through a nearby window, Zenna was unable to see anything remarkable in the small garden except for the five hill baboons, so they left the creatures to their rage and continued their search.

An hour later, they finally found the rest of Sarcem, in the cellar under the kitchen. The decapitated cleric's body lay in a bloody heap, surrounded by signs of battle. Apparently a last stand of sorts had occurred here. The cleric was still clad in his banded mail, the shiny metal plates now marked with blood and dirt, and his mace was lying on the floor, half-covered by his fallen frame. Mole checked the corpse, and shook her head, confirming what the others already knew they would find.

The wands were gone.

Illewyn slumped to her knees beside the body. She had no more tears left to cry, but her body sagged with the force of her grief. She reached out and touched the cleric's bloody hand, while Dannel covered the body with a spare cloak.

"Goodbye, my friend."

Mole was already searching the rest of the chamber, and had gravitated toward a narrow corridor that led off from the main cellar. "Look here," she said, holding up her lamp as she started down the corridor.

"Careful," Zenna said, moving to join her friend. "Stay together."

The hall progressed for some twenty feet or so. Two doors stood open on their left, with a third ahead at the end of the passage. Even before they drew near they could see what had drawn Mole's attention, for before the final door lay the bodies of three humans, dressed in similar fashion to the rogues that they'd faced earlier.

"It's cold," Mole said, with a shiver.

Zenna nodded. Warily, they continued down the corridor. Arun had joined them, while Dannel, half-supporting Illewyn, brought up the rear.

As they drew closer to the door, they could see that its construction was... strange. It looked almost as though the heavy planks had somehow melted, flowing outward from the center of the door to overlap the edges of the threshold into which the portal was set.

"That's not going to be easy to get open," Mole said.

"Why do we even care?" Dannel's voice came, from further back down the corridor.

"They obviously wanted to know what was behind it," Zenna said, gesturing at the three bodies lying on the floor. "This is strange... I cannot imagine that the owners of the roadhouse would have put a trap here, where anyone from above could wander down into it."

"What makes you think it was a trap?" the elf asked.

"Look at the bodies," Zenna said. And indeed, while a few minor cuts and scrapes could be seen on the corpses, there were no apparent injuries serious enough to have killed them. Their faces were pale, almost white, frozen in expressions of surprise and fear.

"I'll get it open," Arun said, starting forward.

"Wait," Mole said, quickly stepping in front of him. "This is my job, remember? As I recall, you don't really have much of a way with traps."

The dwarf grumbled, but didn't challenge her. Mole fixed him with a raised eyebrow until she was sure that he wasn't going to stop her, then she turned and started for the door.

“Be careful, Mole,” Zenna said.

Mole shot her a glance back that was dismissive, but as she turned back to the portal her face took on a look of intense concentration. Her breath formed a cloud before her as she neared the bodies. As she passed the open door to her left, she paused, holding up the lantern.

“There’s writing here,” she told them. “It says, ‘No open flames beyond this point.’”

“Maybe a gas trap,” Dannel suggested.

“They don’t look like they were burned,” Zenna replied. “Frozen, perhaps.”

“Maybe you’d better leave the lamp, Mole,” Dannel suggested. The gnome nodded, placing the lamp on the floor, before continuing to the door.

“There’s some sort of brownish gunk on the door and the walls near it,” she reported. “It... ahhh!”

“Mole!”

Chapter 60

“Mole!” Zenna cried. The gnome groaned and shook, her face becoming pale as she staggered back from the door. Arun was there in an instant to meet her, and he scooped her up and carried her back to where the others waited. She was a bit groggy, but still conscious, and she continued to shiver even as the others tended to her.

“What happened?” Zenna asked. “Are you all right?”

“Cold...” Mole said. “It felt like... it felt like the heat was being drained right out of my body...”

“This will help you,” Dannel said, drawing out his unusually-shaped wand and humming the melody that triggered its power. The blue glow from the device suffused into the body of the gnome, and some of the color returned to her pale features.

“Thanks,” she said, with a smile.

“We were more fortunate than those,” Arun said, with a gesture toward the slain rogues.

“We still need to get past that door,” Mole said.

“It’s too risky,” Zenna said. “We can’t even get near the door, without being affected by the cold. The next time, one of us might not be so fortunate.”

“It’s bearable, if you don’t get too close,” Mole said. “If we use a battering ram, I bet we could remove the door without being hurt.”

“A good idea,” Dannel said. “But what then, after it’s destroyed? The cold will still affect you as you move through the doorway. And we don’t know if the effect fills the room beyond.”

Illewyn came forward. She had spent the bulk of the encounter lurking in the background, but now something of her previous strength was reflected in her voice. “I can use the power of Helm to shelter one of us from the cold,” she said. “The power is not without limits, but it should allow someone to move through and investigate.”

“That might have been good to know, cleric, before Mole there risked herself,” Arun said dryly.

Illewyn’s expression said that the remark cut, but Zenna interjected, “We couldn’t have known what would happen... and what’s done is done. Let’s see if we can put Mole’s plan into action.” After a pause, she added, reluctantly, “It should be me who goes, once the door is removed. My... I have an inherent resistance to cold already, which should help protect me if the spell is insufficient.”

Arun looked at her with a raised eyebrow, but didn’t offer further comment.

They moved quickly, now that they had a plan. For a battering ram they dismantled one of the heavy tables from the common room above, lashing together a number of planks to form a compact shaft of wood almost a foot across and just over ten feet long. Arun found a heavy metal pot that they used to cap the ram. The whole was unwieldy and crude, but it would effectively transfer their combined strength against the door from a distance. Working together they dragged this unwieldy device back downstairs, and moved it into position. Dannel and Arun grabbed onto it from opposite sides, while Mole held on at the end, her meager weight serving as a counterbalance to keep the iron-tipped head up.

The door shivered as they rushed forward, slamming the ram heavily into it. Dannel and Arun’s breaths frosted in the air as they entered the cold end of the passageway, but the ram gave them sufficient distance to avoid taking damage from the brown mold. They repeated the action several times, until finally the warped boards began to snap. From there it was only a few more well-placed strikes until the entire door collapsed inward, revealing a dark chamber beyond.

The two men drew back, dropping the ram to the ground. “Blast, that’s cold!” Arun complained, rubbing his hands together vigorously.

“All right,” Zenna said. “Cast your spell upon me, Illewyn.”

“Bah,” Arun interjected. “I should be the one. If there’s trouble back there, I’m better equipped to handle it.”

“If I see anything, I’ll come right back, I promise,” Zenna said. “If there is anything in there, it would have to go through the cold zone to get to us.”

Arun harrumphed, but didn't say more as Illewyn cast her spell upon the tiefling. But even as Zenna felt the magical effect settle about her, Arun turned and charged down the passageway. He let out a growl as he passed through the open doorway, then he was through. Shaking her head, Zenna followed.

"Dwarves," she heard Mole say, behind her.

Zenna felt the cold descend about her as she neared the doorway, but steeled herself and strode through. The brown mold seemed larger than it had, and in her imagination she thought it almost pulsed as she passed before it, as if eager to drink the heat from her body. But the spell protected her, and she made it past the area of the growth, shivering but otherwise all right.

The room was unremarkable, its walls formed of rough-hewn stone. A round shaft that was probably a well was the only thing of note, the opening partially obscured by several ill-fitting boards. Zenna's darkvision allowed her to see quite clearly, and she made out the squat form of something lying behind the edge of the well, its identity not quite clear from this distance. Arun had seen it as well; he was already heading in that direction.

"Is everything all right in there?" Mole asked from back down the corridor.

"Fine," Zenna replied, moving to join Arun.

The dwarf reached it even as Zenna got a good look at the object—or rather the creature, for the recumbent form was that of a woman, apparently unconscious. Her skin was dark, blending in with the packed earth of the floor, while her hair starkly contrasted with long strands of pure white falling about her head and shoulders. Her hair partially obscured her features, but Zenna could see enough to indicate that the woman had at least some elvish blood in her heritage.

Arun sucked in a surprised breath. "Drow!" he hissed.

Almost reflexively, his hammer came up.

Chapter 61

Zenna saw the dwarf's movement, and quickly stepped in to intervene. "No!" she hissed, blocking him from the unconscious woman.

The dwarf's look could have etched stone. "You don't know what you're about, woman. Drow are dangerous, even when injured, and their hearts as black as..."

"As those of tieflings?" Zenna interrupted. In a flurry she drew back her cowl, and tugged the magical hat from her head. For a moment her visage flickered, and then her true face was revealed.

“You?” the dwarf asked in surprise. “You possess the blood of fiends...” For a moment his face betrayed a rare conflict of feelings, as he tried to sort out the implications of this revelation. Finally, his expression darkened. “Why did you not reveal this before, woman?”

Zenna sighed tiredly. “Have you never been judged for what you are on the outside, Arun? Is it how we look, or our heritage, that defines what we are... or our actions, our hearts, the truth that lies inside?”

The dwarf frowned, and turned slightly away from her.

“Arun... I am what I always was. I did not intend to deceive you. Concealing what I am has... it’s become second nature, I suppose. Most people are quick to rush to judgment, when they see the signs of my heritage. My father was luckier; he could pass as human, though there was always something ‘wrong’ with him that people could sense. But he did a lot of good, as well, and he ended up joining the Harpers. It didn’t make him a better father, but I suppose it means something in the larger scheme of the world...”

She trailed off, unable to think of anything else she could say.

Mole’s voice came to them again from the corridor. “Are you still all right in there?”

Zenna looked at Arun. “Are we all right, paladin?”

Arun fixed her with a hard stare, but finally nodded. “Aye,” he said. “But that doesn’t necessarily mean that the drow’s all right!”

Zenna nodded. “Well, it looks like she wasn’t with the bandits, anyway.” She turned back toward the open doorway. “We’re fine!” Zenna shouted back to the others. “We’ve found someone... she’s hurt.”

“Do you want me to come through?” Illewyn asked.

“Wait a moment,” Zenna returned. Returning her attention to Arun, she said, “Let me see what I can do. If she turns me into a newt or something, you have my permission to give her a good bashing.”

Ignoring the dwarf’s scowl, she knelt beside the unconscious woman. Her body heaved slightly with her breath, but she’d suffered several injuries—likely from the blades of the raiders—and her skin was chill to the touch. Zenna knew that Arun had the power to heal her, but doubted that the dwarf would be quick to help, out of pride if nothing else. She could call to Illewyn, but the cleric had already sacrificed her magical protection against the cold to help her; going through the doorway and the brown mold would be dangerous.

With a sigh, she reluctantly reached into her pocket for the holy symbol. Without consciously thinking about it, she turned her body slightly to conceal the motion from Arun. The amulet was cold in her hand, just a piece of carved metal...

But as she stared at it, the device seemed to grow larger in her vision, and she felt her thoughts drawing inward, focusing in a way similar to the meditation techniques she’d been training in as a child. Somewhere deep in that place was her magic, the tendrils of energy that formed the Weave, accessed by the words and gestures that she stored in her mind. This was different, somehow, but again Zenna felt that same vague sense of commonality.

Blue fire blazed in her hand, wisps of soft light that dissolved into the skin of the injured woman. In response the woman stirred, her mouth opening as she drew a deep breath into her body. She heard the creak of metal as Arun shifted, no doubt readying himself to pound the drow into paste if she made any threatening gestures. Zenna could see her wounds closing, and she thought she could feel the woman's body grow warmer, as the healing touch of the magic—her magic—banished the cold that had gripped her.

Her eyes opened.

"I am not dead," she said, her voice a soft, melodic sound.

Zenna opened her mouth to speak, but Arun beat her to it.

"No, drow, and if you want to keep it that way, you'd better be quick to answer some questions."

Despite the dwarf's hostility, the woman nodded calmly, drawing herself up with Zenna's help to a sitting position. "I will do what I can." She looked around, taking them all in, the battered door, the dwarf's armor with the sigil of Moradin clearly etched into its surface. Her eyes lingered slightly on Zenna's face, and with a flush the wizardess realized that she hadn't lifted her cowl or put her magical hat back on after her confrontation with Arun.

"What's your name?" Zenna asked her.

"I am Shensen Tesseril. I maintain the shrine here, the small sanctuary to the Rider of the Winds."

"Shaundakul," Zenna said, and the woman nodded.

"What of the bandits?" she asked.

"Dead," Arun said. "Or at least most of them," he amended. "We got that half-monkey leader of theirs, though."

The drow woman shivered noticeably, and not from the cold—although it was cold in here, Zenna realized, though the chill did not touch her through her magical protection. She took off her cloak and wrapped it around Shensen, who nodded gratefully.

"What of the cleric?"

"He didn't make it, sadly," Zenna said.

"That is a great sadness, the loss of a valiant man of faith, but not what I meant. I am referring to the woman... the human creature with the hair of fire and the markings of the Black Fist upon her. During the assault upon the Lucky Monkey, she gave commands to the were-creature and the other bandits.”

Zenna and Arun exchanged a look. “We saw no such cleric,” Zenna said.

“There was a fire dark and terrible burning within that one,” Shensen said. “In a way, she was more frightening than the monstrosity that slew the servant of Helm.”

“Why don’t you tell us what happened?” Zenna asked.

Shensen told the story briefly, but with enough detail for them to get a clear understanding of what had happened. The attack had come the previous night, late enough so that many of the roadhouse’s guests were already in their rooms. The attackers were skilled and well-equipped, a fact that Zenna could certainly attest to, and they made short work of the staff and those few patrons able to defend themselves. Shensen had been in the small shrine to Shaundakul when the attack had begun, and was drawn to the fighting by the noise of shouts and broken glass. She arrived to find Sarcem, the High Priest of Helm, rallying some of the survivors. The defenders were forced to take refuge in the cellar as more bandits converged on their position, and it was there that Tongueater and his warriors finally overcame them. Even as the were-baboon struck down Sarcem, Shensen fled into the cold-storage room, recovering the box of brown mold kept there. Already wounded, and with several bandits in pursuit, she was able to release the mold over the door to the well chamber and seal it with a wood shape spell before the chilling effects of the mold overcame her. She was barely able to crawl away from the range of the mold before passing out.

“And that is how you found me,” she concluded. “Have I answered your questions satisfactorily, master dwarf?”

“You haven’t mentioned what you’re doing here, a drow, in the surface world,” Arun pointed out.

“I am only half-drow, but I make no apologies for what I am. Would you suggest that I am to blame for the color of my skin, or the practices of those who share my bloodline? Certainly we are rare here, here under the sun and stars... but not unheard of, certainly.... much like your own people, perhaps? In any case, I understand your wariness, but I ask that you not offer judgment before you have come to know me.”

Arun grunted noncommittally. Zenna thought that Shensen’s words were much like her own, and suspected that Arun was feeling a bit conflicted at being told off twice in quick succession. She managed to hide a faint smile at the thought.

“We’d better get you out of here,” Zenna said. “Our companions are in the outer corridor, but we need to find a way to get through the mold.”

Shensen took a deep breath and stood. “I feel weak, but perhaps can make it through one last time.”

Zenna gave the drow woman one of the potions they'd taken off of Tongueater; restored further by the healing power of the draught, they turned to brave the mold once more. The growth had expanded somewhat from the heat it had drained off of their bodies, but dashing through they were all able to make it back to where the others waited. After some introductions, they returned to the ground floor of the roadhouse.

It was now closer to dawn than the preceding dusk. The companions pressed their search for a brief while, but they were all exhausted from the long travel and the ordeals they had faced here. Finally they decided to hole up and rest. They checked the shutters and doors one last time to be sure they were secure, set up a barricade near the staff quarters, set a schedule for watches, and collapsed into a deep and dreamless sleep.

Chapter 62

The next morning came swiftly. The storm broke sometime during their rest, leaving scattered gray clouds strewn across the sky in its wake. The world outside had been reduced to greenery and mud, with some rock scattered in between for flavor. At least the beasts that had attacked the bandits the night before had departed; they found little more than the shredded remains of several of the rogues in the space outside the kitchen doors.

Their reinforcements from Cauldron had not yet arrived, so they gathered up their possessions, including the body and head of Sarcem, and prepared to depart. Their horses were still in the stable where they had left them the night before, which was a relief. Shensen elected to come with them rather than stay behind; while she stated her intent to rebuild the shrine at the Lucky Monkey, and help restore the roadhouse to working order, she said that she needed to first report to her superiors in Cauldron. Zenna offered to let the half-drow woman ride double with her, but Shensen spent most of the journey on foot, and proved quite able to meet their pace even with the rest of them mounted. The others seemed to accept her presence, distracted as they were by their own thoughts, but Zenna observed Dannel casting several covert but intent glances at Shensen during the trip. From what she understood of their culture, the moon elves had a deep abiding hostility toward the drow, although Dannel did not make any overtly hostile gestures toward the woman. They fastened Sarcem's body to Illewyn's mount, and Mole shifted to ride behind Dannel.

They met the column from Cauldron shortly after noon. The riders included a squad of armed and armored city watch, a full dozen with extra mounts. Riding at their head was a familiar face: Morgan, the cleric of Helm. The cleric reacted strongly to the news of Sarcem's death, and he did not even try to hide his emotions as Illewyn related what else had happened.

"I will ride back with you, and deliver Sarcem's body to Jenya personally," Morgan declared, when they had finished.

Illewyn shook her head. "No, Morgan. There's nothing that can be done now, and we can bring the news ourselves. The roadhouse must be secured; we left some nasty apes in the inner courtyard, and there were some other hostile beasts in the area as well. A few of the bandits may have escaped us as well, though I doubt they would linger behind there."

Morgan mastered himself with a bit of effort, but it was clear that he wasn't fully convinced. He made a gesture toward the side of the trail, away from the others. "We should not argue in front... of these people," he said. He didn't specify, but it was clear whom he meant by the way that his eyes settled first on Zenna, then on Arun.

But Illewyn didn't take the bait, nor did she move to follow him. "We must all cleave to our duty, now more than ever, Morgan."

The cleric reined in his mount, drawing the animal back a pace, and it was clear from his face that the words had stung. He brought his horse roughly around to face back down the road to the Lucky Monkey. "We ride on, lieutenant," he said, putting his words into action as he spurred his mount onward, the rest of the patrol falling in quickly behind him.

"That man has a lot of things going on inside him," Dannel commented.

"Yeah, what a jerk," Mole added.

"Morgan is... complicated," Illewyn said. "He's not all bad, but he tends to let his emotions catch him up and carry him headlong, rather than letting reason guide his steps."

"Aren't all men like that?" Mole asked, too innocently to be credible.

"He has suffered a great loss too," Shensen reminded them. "People respond to such in different ways. Perhaps the young man's anger is the only way he knows."

Perhaps, Zenna thought to herself as they set out again, starting up the steep and winding road that led back up to Cauldron. But Morgan had made it quite clear how he felt about her, and after all of their encounters she found herself reciprocating his feelings quite readily.

* * * * *

Cauldron was much as they had left it, if rather wetter. The city was in good spirits, with preparations for the annual Flood Festival in full swing, but as they rode down Obsidian Avenue toward the Temple of Helm Zenna could sense the undercurrent of unease that hung in the air. She supposed she understood the reason; living in a big bowl, one had to be worried that the storm that they'd just experienced was just a precursor of a wet winter to come. That, and with the memory of the recent abductions still fresh on the minds of most Cauldronites... Certainly once the news of what had happened at the Monkey became public knowledge, the nerves of the people would not likely be eased any.

As they arrived in town, with the sun already half-gone beyond the western horizon, Dannel left them. The elf dodged their queries, saying only that he would see them again in the coming days. With the duty of Sarcem's body still weighing upon them, they had no choice but to let him go on his way. Shensen left as well, thanking them for their help and promising to return after she reported what had happened at the Lucky Monkey to her superiors.

Zenna watched Dannel depart with hooded eyes, her feelings about the elf still mixed. There was no doubt that his role on their mission had been crucial, and he'd shed his blood freely for their cause, but there was something hidden about him that still worried at the tiefling's thoughts like an unscratchable mental itch.

Jenya received them instantly, dark circles under her eyes betraying her concern for the fate of their mission. She took the news of Sarcem's death stoically, drawing upon some inner reserve of strength. Illewyn offered what comfort she could, and she related what had happened. As the story drew on, the expression of the new High Priest of Helm darkened.

"We must find those wands," Jenya said. "This first storm is just a precursor, I can feel it. Without the wands of control water, half of the city might be destroyed in the floods."

"We will do what we can," Zenna promised. But as they departed, she didn't feel so certain. There weren't many leads, but they had the description provided by Shensen, of the woman cleric of Bane that had led the attack.

As they left the Temple, Zenna looked up at the clouds gathering once more in the darkening sky above. Flood season was here, and she suspected that they weren't done, not by a long shot.

Chapter 63

She still felt a similar feeling three days later. It was late afternoon, and the evening crowd was starting to filter into the Drunken Morkoth, although the noise level hadn't quite yet reached its full crescendo. Festival was still a few days away; although a few storms had blown through the mountains onto Cauldron, the rainfall hadn't yet matched that from that first heavy storm earlier in the tenday. But there was still a feeling of anxiety that hung over the community here, for word had filtered out among those with a care to listen that there would be no magical aid forthcoming should the flood waters rise this season.

Zenna, Mole, and Arun were seated at a semi-private booth in a back corner of the common room. Zenna glanced over at the dwarf, who'd taken on that same unreadable expression that she'd gotten used to on him. This was the first time she'd seen Arun since their return from the Lucky Monkey; while she had no idea where the dwarf disappeared to, Mole seemed to be able to produce him upon demand. Although she couldn't be sure, Zenna thought that Arun seemed a bit distracted.

"No Dannel?" Mole asked.

"No, I haven't seen him," Zenna replied. In truth, she hadn't really looked, had no idea where the elf would be found. Well, that wasn't entirely true. She had visited Ezbar shortly after returning to Cauldron, and had spent the better part of a morning speaking to him over scones and tea. While he hadn't been able to answer all of the questions she had, one thing, at least, had changed as a result of that visit. Unconsciously Zenna reached up and idly fingered the amulet that now hung openly on her chest. Ezbar had showed her how to gain some measure of control over the power she'd evidenced at the Lucky Monkey. A part of her still couldn't quite grasp that she was now a cleric. She didn't pray to Azuth, really; using the meditation techniques Ezbar had suggested she'd been able to tap into that power she'd used for healing, and even now she could feel the stored power of several spells. She had not yet solved the mystery of the relationship between those spells and the arcane magics she had recorded in her spellbook. They were somehow similar, yet at the same time different and discrete.

Distracted, she realized that Mole was saying something. "What was that?" she asked.

Mole tisked. "You should pay attention... for most adventuring parties, this is the best part!" She lifted her backpack atop the table. She'd gotten quite attached to the magical haversack; Zenna could not remember seeing it out of the gnome's possession since they'd found it. Mole stood, allowing her to lean over the table, addressing her friends in a conspiratorial tone.

"All right," she said. She ruined the earlier effect by laughing. "Time to split the loot!"

"I have to admit that I already did some shopping," the gnome said. "For the good of the group, though. Bag, bolts."

Zenna couldn't help but smile as Mole addressed her backpack, but to her surprise the gnome immediately reached in and withdrew a pair of slender wooden cases, the sort used to store crossbow bolts. She would have to give the bag a second look; such a power would be quite useful, especially in the chaotic rush of a battle.

"I traded in one of those masterwork swords that the thugs had for some bolts," she said. "One box for you, one for me. They're the best that the fletcher makes, top quality, very expensive."

Zenna looked briefly in the box. The bolts looked ordinary enough; she shrugged and put them in her bag.

"What about the rest of the swords?" Zenna asked. She suspected that she already knew the answer, as Mole was wearing a new suit of finely crafted leather armor under her cloak. The gnome had complained that the chain shirt she'd found in Jzadirune was too heavy and constricting, despite the good quality of protection that it offered.

"Well, I sold them," Mole said. "There's this great magic shop, Zenna... you have to visit! It's called Skie's Treasury, and it's run by a gnome, and she has all kinds of great stuff for adventurers. She gives a discount to 'official' adventuring groups, but you have to sell her a lotta stuff first, and have a name. Anyway, I took the money from the extra swords and a few things I found at the Monkey and my share of the gold, and bought this magical armor. I know I should've waited to talk to you..."

"It's all right," Zenna said. "I don't think that any of us would begrudge you being as well-protected as possible." She looked over at Arun, but the dwarf didn't respond.

"Hey, thanks! This armor is great, at least until I can get my hands on a mithril shirt... Anyway, you should go with me next time, once we have all the gold and stuff sorted out.

There's a healing wand that might be a good investment, now that you're a cleric too and all..."

"Maybe we should divide the rest of the treasure, before it gets too crowded in here," Zenna suggested. She knew her friend, and suspected that they would be here until dawn, if she let Mole get a full head of steam.

"Oh, sure! Bag, potions." She drew out a number of potion vials, laying them out on the table.

"Most of these are healing," she said. "Three of the minor-strength ones, and four of the more potent ones. There's also this one," she said, indicating a vial full of a murky red liquid. "This was one of the ones we found on Tongueater. It makes you grow for a short time, if you drink it. Makes you stronger, I guess."

Zenna nodded; she was familiar with the spell. She for one was glad that they'd faced Tongueater in the narrow confines of the Monkey's hallways; the thought of an enlarged were-ape was not a pleasant one.

"Arun should take it," Mole said. "Since he's the front-rank fighter."

"Bah," the dwarf said, his first word of the meeting. "I have no need of such trickery."

"Oh, but imagine the looks on those evildoers' faces, when they see a giant dwarf charging toward them! They'd be scared to death for sure, and then you could pound them even better."

Arun looked hard at the gnome, as if weighing her words to see if they were mocking. Mole, to her credit, maintained an utterly convincing expression, and the paladin finally took the potion. Zenna, meanwhile, divided the healing potions, and they each took two, with the extra going back into Mole's bag for now.

"I'll just hold this one for Dannel, for now," Mole said. Illewyn had already rejected her share in any treasure, saying that the church of Helm had already benefited from help of the companions in defeating the killers of Sarcem. Zenna suspected that there was more to it than that; the cynical side of her knew that Jenya still wanted their help tracking down the mysterious woman cleric who'd been seen during the attack. She looked down at the plain gold ring that circled the third finger of her right hand. It wasn't a bribe, not quite; Jenya had given her Sarcem's ring out of thanks for their help.

Zenna felt a sour taste in her mouth. Had she always been this bitter?

"And there's the gold, of course. I included a share for Dannel, which I guess I'll hold onto until we see him again. I sold a few of the things we found at the Monkey, and added it to the tally."

"You know, some of that stuff probably belonged to people staying there, or to the owners," Zenna said.

Mole looked hurt. “Yes, but they were all killed! You saw me offer Shensen a share of the treasure on the way back to Cauldron, didn’t you? I even offered to make a donation for the families of those who were killed. And we didn’t take everything.” Of course, she didn’t add that some of the things had been too bulky to fit into even her magical backpack.

“I’m sorry, Mole. How much is there?”

“Well, split four ways, it’s seven hundred and thirty gold pieces each.”

Despite herself, Zenna stared, and she saw that Arun had taken a renewed interest as well. That was a small fortune! Almost without thinking she started calculating how many scrolls she could scribe with that amount of money, how many new spells she could add to her spellbook.

“Arun, you could give your share to charity, if you want to... I know paladins like to do that.” The dwarf harrumphed, but didn’t respond to Mole’s offer.

Mole reached for the bag again, but Zenna shook her head. “Maybe we’d better make this transaction in our room.”

Mole nodded, but even as Zenna started to get up, her attention was drawn to the front of the room, where a few newcomers had just entered the tavern.

There were four of them, and even across the room Zenna could see that there was something that set them apart from the common run of patrons, even at a place like the Morkoth. All four were young, likely about her age. They were dressed as adventurers, clad in the diverse raiment one came across in that profession, and even at a distance could see that their garments and gear were stylish and well-tailored. All looked to be human, two men and two women. Their leader appeared to be a tall, attractive woman who naturally drew the attention of the room toward her. As Zenna watched she searched the room in a sweeping gaze, finally settling on her. The woman nodded, and she smiled slightly. Zenna felt a cold sense of foreboding; the smile didn’t reach the woman’s eyes, and there was something in them that bespoke trouble.

The four adventurers headed toward their table.

Chapter 64

Mole continued to jabber on, oblivious to the four strangers who were clearly headed for their table. Zenna heard a growl from Arun—the dwarf, at least, had the wit to keep his senses alert.

The young woman drew up ten paces from their table, standing in the midst of a knot of a dozen round tables. Some of the guests had taken note of the newcomers, and glanced at them curiously. The woman basked in the attention, piquing the curiosity of the mob, letting her gaze travel across the room before turning back to Zenna and her friends. Her skin was flawless, a dark color perhaps a shade lighter than Arun’s, and her clothing was of sufficient style and quality that she would have had little quality fitting in with a gathering of nobles. Looking down at her own tattered cloak, Zenna felt cheap and ugly. A rapier hung at her belt, and a lute was slung casually over her shoulder, perhaps indicating her profession.

“Ah, friends! Unless my eyes deceive me, we are in the presence of some notable souls! Are these not the very same heroes who freed the orphanage children from the clutches of those vile slavers that were defiling our town?”

One of her companions, a muscled woman with close cropped red hair and a breastplate, looked at them with a seemingly bored expression. “I don’t think so, Annah. By their clothes, they look like a couple of unemployed mercenaries to me.”

Annah chuckled. “Now, Cora, don’t be rude. I think that it is indeed them!”

Zenna frowned. The attention of everyone in the room had focused on the developing scene, now, and the buzz of conversation had grown silent. The wizardess noticed that all four of the young adventurers wore a badge on their garments, a brooch shaped in the form of a miniature shield, bearing the sigil of a pair of crossed swords surrounded by a cloud producing stylized bolts of lightning. The badges appeared to be fashioned out of solid silver.

Mole had finally turned her attention from the treasure and her bag, and turned to face the strangers. “Yes, that’s us all right,” she said cheerfully. “What can we do for you?”

Zenna groaned.

The one named Annah chuckled. “It should be us doing something for you, as heroes who have done such good for the citizens of Cauldron. Bartender, a round in honor of Cauldron’s newest heroes, courtesy of the Stormblades!”

Annah drew out a small pouch that clinked as she tossed it onto a nearby table. There was some activity as the inn’s staff rushed to meet a flurry of drink orders from patrons determined to enjoy this unexpected largess, but the attention of the room was still on the exchange between the two groups of adventurers.

One of the men leaned against a vacant chair, crossing his arms in front of his chest. His clothes were of equal quality to his companions’, but they hung awkwardly on his lean frame. His face was narrow and tweaked, his expression reminding them more of a weasel than anything else.

“Amazing that they were able to find the children, when no one else could,” he said to no one in particular, although his words carried easily throughout the tavern. “The City Guard, the churches, all manner of independent groups... no one could find them. I suppose it was a good thing that you came along when you did, appearing out of nowhere like you did.”

“Well, it wasn’t really that hard, once we put the clues together,” Mole said. “I’m sure that if we hadn’t agreed to help Jenya Urikas find the children, someone like you guys would have figured it out... eventually.”

Zenna nodded to herself. Mole had figured out what these “Stormblades” were up to, and was responding to their jab in the way she always did... by talking. The wizard glanced around the room, weighing the gathered audience, sensing that more was coming.

“Indeed, Todd doesn’t exaggerate the degree of our good fortune,” the last man said. He was a stark contrast to the unkempt Todd, tall and ruggedly handsome with a finely trimmed beard. Zenna could see that he wore an icon at his throat, possibly a holy symbol, although she could not quite make out the design at this distance.

“An ingenious plot by these scum, using the locksmith who created the town’s locks to gain access to private homes,” Cora said. “Wasn’t he a gnome?” she added, with a not-so-subtle look at Mole.

“I believe so,” Todd replied. “From what I’ve heard, there’s a whole gnome settlement under the city. But the slaver leader was a dark dwarf... much like that fellow over there.”

Twenty sets of eyes turned to regard Arun, who was watching with eyes that smoldered. Zenna suspected that they were losing control of the situation, though Mole’s cheerful expression hadn’t slipped and Arun didn’t move. Clearly the Stormblades were trying to provoke them, but to what end?

“You should be careful, boy, in applying labels when you don’t know what in the blazes you’re talking about,” Arun said. His voice was a deep growl, low enough so that the audience had to strain to hear. But Todd had heard it, by the way his expression changed.

Annah interjected before either he or the dwarf could comment further. “Friends!” she said, in such a way that it included everyone in the room. “Come, let us not argue! There is no denying that the children are safe, and the abductions have ceased! I’m sure these strangers can offer good reasons for how they, as outsiders to our city, unraveled the evil mystery that so vexed our city!”

The bearded young man nodded. “Indeed. We should not offer disrespect where it is not deserved. Tell us, ser dwarf, of this slaver, this dark example of your race.”

Cora, standing beside him with hands tucked into her swordbelt, added, “If he’s even a dwarf,” he said. “I’ve never heard of a dwarf who shaved his beard. Well, unless they’ve been dishonored and ejected from their clan, perhaps.”

Arun moved so quickly that Zenna didn’t have a chance to stop him. One minute he was seated at the back of the booth, and then the heavy table scraped aside and he was standing before them. A few patrons at tables nearby moved back reflexively at the sudden movement, giving the heavily armored and armed dwarf some space. The Stormblades made no obvious reaction, but it was clear to Zenna’s experienced eye that they too prepared, with hands falling to weapons hilts, postures changing slightly in anticipation of action. The mood in the room had changed, with that collective tension that existed before a situation exploded into chaos. The innkeeper made a quick movement, and one of the kitchen boys darted out the door into the streets of the city.

“Keep speaking, woman, if you want to earn a lesson in manners.”

Zenna pressed her fingers to her brow. She knew how it sounded to the crowd, the dwarf threatening a woman, even one dressed in armor and carrying a blade. These Stormblades were clearly locals, and they would gather the sympathy of the crowd if things turned ugly. A few more people rose from their chairs and moved backward.

“Touchy, eh dwarf? Perhaps a few barbs struck home?”

“Yeah, maybe you’d better explain a few things to the goodly people of our city, dwarf,” Todd hissed. “You’re a long way from the Great Rift. In fact, I heard that you beat up a guy in this very tavern, less than a tenday ago.” A few regulars nodded, remembering the event.

Annah shook her head sadly. “Indeed, the people of Cauldron deserve to know the truth,” she said, as if regretting how the encounter had turned. Zenna wasn’t fooled, but she was at a loss for how to disarm the situation. Annah lifted her gaze to fix on Zenna, and the tiefling thought she saw the slightest tweak of a smile on her face. “After all, a noble man of Helm, our own local cleric Ruphos Laro, gave his life to see those children free.”

Zenna felt as though she’d been punched in the gut. Mole’s forced grin evaporated, and Arun’s hands tightened into fists at his side. To be attacked with insinuation and innuendo was one thing, but to have Ruphos’s sacrifice tarnished...

Cora stepped forward to face Arun. “Well, dwarf?” she asked. “What do you have to say?”

Zenna tensed, suspecting that she knew what Arun’s response would be.

Chapter 65

“The truth!” a voice rang out, from the back of the tavern. “And a tale both wonderful and terrible it is!” The attention of everyone swiveled around as Dannel Ardan strode boldly into the tavern, his cloak flaring out behind him as he moved. The elf strode boldly up to an empty chair, and vaulted up onto it, staring out over the gathered crowd.

“I have heard the tale told from one who was there,” Dannel said. “Fighting against the forces of darkness that threatened our town!”

Annah tried to interject, but the crowd’s attention had shifted. Dannel did not hesitate, telling the tale of the battle against Kazmojen in a rapid-fire of descriptive narrative. All of them were present in the telling; herself, Mole, Arun, Ruphos, Fario, Fellian... even the rakish Kryscar Endercott, whose role was elevated into a brave and hopeless charge against the howler in Dannel’s telling. The beholder was not mentioned, but every other aspect of the battle was true to Zenna’s memory of those desperate minutes. His hands moved and cut with each sword-thrust, and when he described the heroic sacrifice of Ruphos to save Arun’s life, Zenna felt tears gather in her eyes. When he was done, and described the final cut that downed Kazmojen, a rousing cry went up from the gathered people.

“And so we do owe thanks to these brave people, my friends,” Dannel concluded, stepping down from the chair and grabbing an untended flagon. “To the heroes of Cauldron,” he said, lifting his drink.

“To the heroes!” came the cry.

Dannel drank deeply, then left the flagon and walked over to the companions. As he walked past the Stormblades, he seemed oblivious to the hostility barely disguised in their expressions.

“That was quite a timely arrival, Dannel,” Mole whispered.

The Stormblades looked to Annah. “A rousing story, elf,” she said, with the slightest nod. Zenna thought that the look in her eyes could cut glass. “Perhaps we will meet again, ‘heroes,’” she said. Then she turned and departed, the others following.

In their wake, the activity in the tavern returned to more or less normal.

“I think it might be prudent to depart now,” Dannel suggested.

“An excellent suggestion,” Zenna said, rising. They headed for the back exit that led to Zenna and Mole’s room above the adjunct building behind the Morkoth. Arun was the last to follow, the dwarf slowly unlocking his fists and his anger before turning to join his companions.

“Wow, I thought that we were going to have a brawl for sure,” Mole said, as they left the main building of the inn. Zenna thought she sounded a bit disappointed.

“What was that all about?” Zenna asked. “Who were those guys?”

“They’re a local adventuring company,” Dannel explained. “I haven’t heard that much about them, but from what I understand they’re all the children of local nobility.”

“Noble brats,” Arun commented.

“But why would they want to pick a fight with us?” Zenna asked, as they made their way into the long building that the inn used for storage and as quarters for a number of its staff. Mole and Zenna had been renting out one of the rooms at the end of the second story for a while now. While they could now afford something a bit more... comfortable, Zenna found that she didn’t mind the proximity to both the excitement of the inn and the main boulevards of the town.

“Maybe they’re just envious that you’ve stolen the spotlight,” the elf suggested. “Or maybe one of you did something to tick them off, without realizing it.”

“Well, if they come looking for trouble again, we’ll just sic Arun on them,” Mole said, unlocking the door to their room and ushering them inside. The room wasn’t large, with barely enough room to accommodate the four of them. There were only two chairs, so Mole leapt up onto one of the beds while Dannel remained standing by the door. Zenna lit the lantern hanging from a nail hammered into the slanting ceiling, and took the seat by the desk before the room's sole window.

"Comfy," the elf observed.

"Oh, I've got some treasure for you, Dannel," Mole said, placing her haversack on the nightstand beside her bed.

"We were wondering where you'd gotten off to," Zenna said.

"Out and about," the elf responded. "Actually, I've been asking some questions, about our 'friend.'"

Zenna nodded. She knew who the elf was talking about.

"The cleric," Arun growled.

"Any luck?" Mole asked, tucking a pillow between her back and the wall to make herself more comfortable.

"Well, my subtle queries didn't lead anywhere," Dannel reported. "But I guess they prodded something loose, for this morning I found this slid under my door."

The elf produced a small, neatly folded scrap of parchment. With her curiosity, Mole was the first to reach him, and she took it, unfolding it and moving over to where the lantern's light was bright enough to read by.

"I know you're looking for the wands," Mole read. "I can help, for a price. If you're interested, come to the Lakeside Pavillion tonight at midnight. Bring 500 gold pieces and you'll walk away with the location of the wands. Bring backup, and you'll never find them."

There was a moment of silence, as Mole finished reading. Zenna finally broke the silence with a single word.

"Well."

"Trap," Arun said.

"No doubt it could be," Zenna noted. "Especially since that cleric has likely heard of our interest by now, and the identity of those who slew her raiders at the Lucky Monkey."

"The same thought occurred to me," Dannel said. "But it is the best... the only, lead we have thus far. I take it that the Helmites have not been able to come up with anything?"

Zenna shook her head. "No, though I have not spoken to Jenya or Illewyn since the day before yesterday."

"So you want to meet with this guy?" Mole asked. "Tonight? We'd better start getting ready, it's already starting to get dark."

“The message says that the... individual... will only make an appearance if I come alone.”

“If you’d intended to go alone, you would have just gone and done it, and maybe told us afterwards,” Zenna said wryly. “You don’t strike me as the sort of man who asks for permission—for anything.”

Dannel cracked an irreverent grin. “Am I that transparent, then?”

“So what’s your plan then, elf?” Arun growled, clearly impatient.

“Well, obviously I intend to meet with him; we should be able to get the Helmites to cover the cost of the information, if the informant turns out to be legitimate.”

“And if he’s not, and it is a trap?” Zenna asked.

“Well then...”

He didn’t get a chance to finish, for at that moment a sudden, clear knock sounded at the door to the room.

Chapter 66

Arun’s chair creaked dangerously as the dwarf stood, his heavy warhammer seeming to leap into his hands. Dannel spun smoothly, his hand on the hilt of his sword, and even Mole had produced a knife from out of nowhere.

“Stormblades looking for more trouble?” Zenna asked no one in particular. Mole crept silently to the door and listened at it, finally shaking her head. Arun moved toward the door; his armor clanked noisily in the quiet of the room, and the floorboards creaked under his weight. Zenna shook her head; there was nothing to be done for it now, although the noise would likely have alerted whoever was beyond the door that someone was within.

Dannel moved into position on the far side of the portal, having to bend his head against the slope of the low roof. He didn’t draw his sword, but he was clearly ready for whatever might happen.

Mole glanced at each of them to verify that they were prepared, and then opened the door.

The narrow hall was unoccupied by Stormblades, or other obvious dangers. Standing before the door was a shadowy figure, whose face was revealed as the light from the room spilled over her familiar features.

"Shensen!" Mole exclaimed. "What a surprise!"

The half-drow woman entered the room, giving them a wary look as she observed their state of readiness. She looked rather more at ease than the last time they had seen her, and she now wore a clean robe of soft brown wool that flowed over her lithe body as she moved. A leather satchel that bulged slightly with its contents hung from one shoulder. Dannel closed the door and moved back toward the center of the room, where he could stand straight, and Arun returned to his chair, grumbling something under his breath.

"What brings you to us, Shensen?" Zenna asked. "Do you have any news about what... what happened?"

Shensen shook her head, her long white hair falling about her shoulders like the surge from a waterfall. "My fellow followers of the Wandering God have been able to find out little more than what we already knew. We did uncover one interesting fact: the identity of the red-haired woman."

"The Banite?" Mole asked. "Who is she?"

"A former guardswoman named Triel Eldurast," Shensen explained. "From what we've heard, she was a bit of a taut bowstring, aggressive and ill-suited to discipline. Apparently there was an incident where she murdered a few of her fellow guards while on duty, then dropped out of sight. This happened almost a decade ago, so she's been all but forgotten by most people."

"Where did you get this information?" Dannel asked.

"I'm sorry," she replied. "We have some confidential sources that I cannot divulge, even to trusted allies such as yourselves."

"Bah, so much for trust, then," Arun said. "What you got is rumors and innuendo, then."

"Well, it's more information than we had," Zenna cautioned him. "Thank you for sharing it with us, Shensen."

"Hey, have you seen Fellian?" Mole asked. Like Shensen, Fellian was a follower of Shaundakul, and had fought with them against dire enemies in the recent past.

"I have not," Shensen. "Though I have heard that he is well. He and Fario have been tasked to a different mission."

Arun's frown mirrored Dannel's, but neither bothered to ask, already knowing that the followers of the Wandering God were closed-mouthed about the details of their activities in Cauldron. Likewise, Shensen did not ask them about their own leads, and none of the four felt inclined to volunteer any details of the note and their earlier discussion.

There was a brief and slightly awkward silence, then Mole asked, "So, Shensen, are you heading back to the Lucky Monkey?"

"Indeed. There is much work to be done, I fear, to repair the damage wrought by Tongueater and his cronies. I did wish, however, to express my gratitude to you one more time."

"Those rogues had it coming to them," Arun disclaimed.

"I have brought you a small token, a more substantial expression of the thanks of my association," she said. Opening the satchel, she produced a pair of leather boots.

"Footwear?" Dannel asked.

"These are magical boots," Shensen explained. "They add length to the wearer's stride, and enhance one's jumping ability as well."

Mole was quick to leap forward for a closer look. "Really?" Then she realized something, and her expression sank. "Oh, they're sized for big folk," she said. "Too bad."

Shensen shook her head. "As I said, they are magical. Try them on, perhaps you'll be surprised."

"Okay!" Mole took the boots and sat down right there on the floor, shedding her own footwear in a flash before shoving her feet into the boots. True to Shensen's words, the magical boots shrank down to fit her diminutive feet, forming a tight yet comfortable fit about her ankles. Mole shot up, testing her footing and twisting her body to examine them from a variety of angles.

"Oh," she said, looking up at her companions. "I guess they are for all of us..."

"You should take them," Zenna said. "You are the slowest of all of us, with your short legs; it makes sense."

"Aye, maybe now you can finally keep up!" Arun added.

With a small cry of glee Mole darted forward. There wasn't really anywhere to go in the small room, but as she reached the wall she leapt straight up, kicking off from the wall right where the slanting ceiling met it, five feet above the ground. Her body twisted smoothly in the air, and she tucked herself into a roll as she shot off the wall back toward the center of the room. She was headed right for the desk when Dannel quickly stepped in and caught her.

"Careful, there! Maybe you'd better wait to test them when we have a little more room."

"Most excellent!" Mole reported.

"A bouncing gnome, just what we need," Arun observed dryly.

"Thank you, Shensen," Zenna said.

"And I thank you. Perhaps we will meet again in the future." With a last bow to all of them, the half-drow woman turned and departed, closing the door behind her.

"A strange woman," Dannel observed, as he set Mole back down on her feet.

"Hiding something," Arun noted.

“Aren’t we all?” Zenna asked.

“True enough,” Dannel replied. He crossed to the wall where he’d left his bow. “It’s getting dark... we still have a lot to do.”

Chapter 67

The night was cold and dark, with a soft but steady rain that filled the great bowl of Cauldron, descending its streets and alleys to end up eventually by pouring into the black lake at its center. The night wind came and went in gusts, flapping the colorful awnings that had been set up along the city’s major thoroughfares in anticipation of the Flood Festival.

Down by the lakeshore, the streets were deserted, as anyone with even a lick of sense chose to stay indoors where it was warm and dry. Even the occasional patrols of the City Guard didn’t bother to come down here this night, departing their guardhouses only to conduct hurried sweeps of the higher streets along the rim of the bowl before returning to the laughter and dice that waited in heated chambers of old stone.

The Lakeshore Pavilion was just a vague shadow in the night, even to Zenna’s darkvision. From her vantage, she could see it silhouetted against the flat expanse of the lake, but could make out little more than that. Yet she dared not approach closer. Dannel had been specific on that, and Zenna had been forced to agree. They could not risk losing the only concrete lead they’d been able to uncover thus far, even if it meant risking a trap.

Mole would be closer, she knew, but in circumstances like this Mole was like a part of the night itself, finding the darkest part of the shadows and sliding into them like a sword sliding into its scabbard. Arun had been... a bit more difficult. Zenna smiled despite herself at the memory. Arun was smarter than his gruff manner and hard exterior suggested, she knew, and he’d ultimately bowed to the logic of the situation. The dwarf just wasn’t suited to an operation based on stealth and subtlety, like this one. But he’d made his displeasure known, before finally agreeing to wait for them at a quiet hole-in-the-wall tavern, one of the few still open at this hour, several blocks away.

The rain made a constant patter against her cloak. She was already soaked, the threadbare garment a poor substitute for her usual cloak, but despite the weather had insisted on going with her original idea to head out disguised. Anyone who happened to catch sight of her would see only a ragged wretch huddling in a doorway, a man well into middle age who’d clearly been ill-used by life. She was getting more used to the powers of her hat of disguise, and found that she could swiftly switch between personas with just a few moments of concentration. Under the battered cloak that formed the exterior of her disguise, her dagger and spell components were within easy reach.

The wind picked up again, filling her shelter with the sound of its coming. With her innate resistance to cold she wasn’t as poorly off as a true homeless person would be, but she was far from comfortable. But she forgot about her discomfort, as she saw a vague form break the familiar outline of the Pavillion, across the street and a half-block away, on the very shore of the lake. The waters of the lake had risen up to surround the heavy wooden pilings that supported the structure, giving it the illusion of floating upon the water. A few of the buildings along the lakeshore had water lapping up against their very doorsteps, adding a sense of urgency to their mission. If they didn't find the wands of control water, flood season this year could be catastrophic for Cauldron.

She watched the Pavillion intently, cursing silently at her inability to see clearly what was happening. Inwardly she resolved to learn one of the spells that allowed one to better perceive events at a distance. The figure at the Pavillion had to be Dannel, but she could not tell if there was another person there with him. They'd agreed on a predetermined signal, a small display of colored light easily conjured with a prestidigation spell, but she knew that the reality was that Dannel was more or less on his own, if in fact the message was a trap. She didn't know where Mole was, but doubted that either of them would be able to get to Dannel quickly enough to aid him if an ambush was sprung.

She tensed as she caught a hint of movement from the direction of the Pavillion. Someone was coming down the street, in her direction. Reflexively she shrank deeper into the darkness of the doorway, but as the figure drew closer, she was able to see that it was Dannel. The elf was moving quickly, his boots splashing in several inches of water with each step. He spotted her, belatedly—even with his keen elvish eyes, he couldn't match her darkvision—and nodded.

Zenna rose, and clung to the lee of the buildings along the side of the street as she followed the elf away from the meeting place. She finally caught up to him as they rounded the corner that led up to the tavern where Arun waited.

"Well?" came a little voice just behind her. Zenna jumped about a foot into the air before she realized that it was Mole, virtually invisible in her dark cloak.

Dannel looked at both of them, the rain falling in runnels off the hood of his cloak and down his body. "I got it," he said. "I know where the wands are being held."

Chapter 68

Dawn was just a faint promise on the jagged horizon formed by the line of peaks that overshadowed Cauldron to the east. The rain had eased off sometime during the night, and a thick fog hung over the caldera, spilling out over the wall and spreading thick fingers down the outer slopes of the volcano.

The companions stood at the summit of the volcano, facing outward, the impassive thickness of the city wall behind them. They were a good distance away from the nearest gate; no road or track led down from here, just a rough and uneven slope that promised little but broken bones and treacherous slides.

"Here we go," Dannel said. A few feet away, Mole yawned.

Zenna felt tired as well. She hadn't slept much since their encounter at the Pavillion; none of them had, really, with the need to make preparations and knowing that once more they would be thrust into mortal danger. It was a good thing that she'd already had a full complement of spells memorized; she doubted that she would have been able to get anything out of her spellbook after a night like this one. She could feel the spells tingling in her mind, an odd mixture of the spells from her book and the ones that had appeared in her thoughts with the meditative exercises that Esbar had taught her.

She glanced over at Illewyn. The young woman was resolute, her face tight in an expression that had not been part of her when Zenna had first met her, little more than a tenday ago. There had been little time to give Jenya more than a sketchy briefing of what they'd learned, but Illewyn had been quick to volunteer to accompany them. Admittedly the source and veracity of their information was still sketchy—Dannel hadn't been able to tell more than that his informant had been human—but it was still all they had to go on. And they had to assume that the information was good, that they would encounter Triel Eldurast and whatever allies she still possessed when they completed this trek.

“Let's get about this, then,” Arun growled.

They'd already worked out their roles, already knew each other's talents from their struggles together at the Lucky Monkey. Dannel led them down, the nimble elf directing them along the safest and most direct path. Behind him came Mole, hopping a bit with each step, and then Arun, the dwarf clanking slightly with the noise of his armor and weapons. Then Zenna, a shade in her dark cloak, and Illewyn bringing up the rear.

They made their way down the slope in silence, save for the noise of their gear and Arun's perpetual clatter. Only a few minutes after they'd started, Zenna looked back over her shoulder—the wall of the city was lost behind them, faded into the fog. It was as if they were in a world where everything was just a ghostly shadow of reality, even their own forms dark and indistinct. It was a morbid thought, especially given what she'd experienced with the Vanishing, so she pushed those thoughts aside with a shudder and forced herself to focus on the treacherous track. Behind her she heard a slight clatter and a muffled curse. Zenna belatedly realized that Illewyn had to be all but blind in these circumstances, so she quickly turned back to help the cleric.

It didn't take them much longer before Dannel brought them to a halt with a raised hand. The others gathered behind him. Zenna, with her darkvision, could clearly see what the keen-eyed elf had spotted, a low mound formed by a dozen massive boulders that jutted from the mountainside like a pimple.

“I'll go check it out,” he said. “Wait here.”

Arun grumbled, but even he didn't offer further complaint as the elf darted off into the shadowy mists. He was only gone for a minute, Zenna thought, before he returned, the news of his success written clearly on his face.

“There's a shaft that leads deeper into the mountain,” he said. “It would appear that our informant was correct, at least about that.”

“Let's hope that they aren't expecting guests,” Mole said.

Dannel directed them to the entrance. The shaft sloped steeply but appeared to be navigable; its walls were cylindrical and smooth. The passage was utterly and purely black.

“Lava tube, most like,” Arun said.

“Even you are going to need light down there, elf,” Illewyn said. “I will call light to brighten our way.”

“All right, but keep it shrouded,” Dannel said. “I’ll go on a bit ahead, check for ambushes or guards.”

“No offense, elf, but even with your vaunted eyes, you’re not going to be able to see nothing down there. I should go in the lead; my dwarven senses are suited to such work.” Arun started for the entrance, as if taking their assent for granted.

“No offense taken, ser dwarf,” Dannel returned, moving quickly to block him without seeming to do so. “But sound carries as well as light in the dark places under the earth, and you are rather... noisy... in that most impressive getup.”

It looked like an argument might be brewing, but Zenna surprised them both—and perhaps herself—by stepping in between them. “I’ll go ahead,” she said. “I have the benefit of both darkvision and stealth, as I do not wear armor.”

Both the elf and the dwarf looked at her with obvious disapproval. “If there is trouble down there...” Arun began.

“I’ll come right back and get you,” she promised.

The two shared a look, and Zenna felt a combination of prickly anger at their presumption of control over her, and a brief hope that they would press her, force her to back down from this crazy plan. She didn’t really want to be the first to go...

Finally, Dannel nodded. “Be careful,” he said.

They moved into the mouth of the tube. Zenna looked down at her hand, white and slender against the dark colors of her clothing. She concentrated for a moment, calling the power of her magical hat, and the hand darkened until it was nearly black in color. She knew that her face would likewise be darkened, and wouldn’t give her away if a light appeared below.

“Oh, that’s a nice trick,” Mole said in approval.

Zenna closed her eyes and called upon her magic. The words and gestures flowed easily, and she felt the power surge through her momentarily. Again she felt a brief confusion—this spell was scribed in her spellbook, but she had drawn upon it from some... outside source, had not committed it to memory the way she normally did. She shook her head. This was not the time for introspection. She felt the familiar tingle as the invisible mage armor settled about her.

Then she took a deep breath, and started into the tunnel.

Chapter 69

The darkness swallowed up Zenna before she'd taken a few paces. With her darkvision she could see quite clearly, of course, but there was still an oppressive sense to the tunnel, as though the surrounding rock were eager to crush her for her insolence at penetrating its fastness.

She made her way swiftly, the soft soles of her boots whisking faintly on the smooth floor of the tube. She touched the wall, and her fingers came away damp with condensation. The air from below was damp and stale, but she thought she could detect the faintest hint of a breeze. Behind her she could hear the sounds of the others as they started into the tube after her. Glancing back, she could see the faint glow that had to be Illewyn's magical light.

She hastened her pace. The shaft apparently led deep into the mountain, for she progressed for some time without any break or other variation in the tunnel. Finally, however, different sounds began to intrude upon her senses, sounds of air and water that hinted at a larger space up ahead. Warily, she pressed on.

The shaft finally emerged onto a broad shelf that overlooked a larger cavern, its borders far beyond the capabilities of her darkvision to measure. But directly in front of her was an incongruous sight that took a few moments for her to identify. It was a lift, a metal cage attached to cables that ran from somewhere below in the cavern into a plain structure of rough-worked stone that perched on the far side of the ledge to her left. A door provided access to the building.

After glancing around to make sure that she was alone on the ledge, she crept forward and looked out over the lip of the ledge. She could not see the bottom of the cavern below, but from the sounds and smells she guessed that there was a body of water beneath. Not surprising, given that Cauldron stood on the shores of a lake. From closer up she could see that the cage was designed to hold a number of passengers, and had a small gate in one side to allow access. There was no apparent way to move it from within, however; the mechanism had to be inside the building. She wasn't about to press on further without the others, however.

They arrived just a few minutes later, the clank of Arun's movements announcing them even before Illewyn's light spilled out over the ledge. The cleric held the light under her cloak, letting out just enough of a glow for her to see the ground ahead of her. To Zenna's eyes, adjusted to the darkness, that glow shone like a beacon. If there was anyone out and about in the cavern below...

Well. There was no helping that now, she thought.

Zenna gestured toward the door, and the companions gathered before the portal. Weapons were readied and everyone took up a position to give them a good vantage; having worked together before, the adventurers needed no discussion to prepare themselves. Dannel held an arrow to his bowstring with his left hand, and reached over the push open the portal with his right.

The door opened easily, despite its considerable appearance. Beyond was a compact chamber, maybe twenty feet square, dominated by the winch mechanism for the cage outside. Thick cables penetrated the wall overlooking the chasm, connected by an intricate gear mechanism to the heavy wheel that operated the system. There were a few long, flat boards piled up against one wall, and a door similar to the one through which they'd entered on the opposite wall.

The companions moved quickly into the chamber. Arun took a quick look at the winch mechanism, while Mole moved swiftly to the far door. Illewyn walked over to the far side of the winch mechanism, careful not to shine her light directly on the cable openings, and as she was looking around saw something on the wall that drew her attention.

Moving closer, she saw that it was a flat stone of some sort, sticking to the wall at about chest-height as if fixed with glue. Curious, she reached out to touch it...

"I wouldn't do that, if I were you," Dannel said from behind her, interrupting her with her hand just a scant foot from the stone.

"What?" she said, turning around, drawing her hand back hastily.

"I wouldn't touch that," he repeated. "I've seen devices like that one before... ordinary objects sticking to a flat surface like a lodestone on a metal sheet. Sometimes such things are enchanted with a spell that gives an alarm when someone touches them... or even moves by, in some cases."

"Well, we're lucky it's not the latter, this time," Zenna said. She cautiously approached the stone, and summoned a cantrip. Sure enough, the oblong rock began to glow, indicating that a magical aura was in fact placed upon it.

"Shhh," Mole said, directing their attention to the door. As they moved to join her, she whispered, "I think I hear voices."

"Now you're talking," Arun growled.

Chapter 70

"Do you think anyone heard that?" Illewyn asked, a few minutes later.

"Naw, the outer door was shut, and I doubt that much sound got out through those cable openings," Mole said authoritatively, as she reloaded her small crossbow.

Zenna turned her attention to the two bodies lying on the floor, watching Dannel search them quickly and efficiently. The two guards had not been alert, and one had gone down before they even really realized that they were under attack. The second had gotten his sword out and tried to bull rush his way past them, but Arun had placed himself in the man's path with grim finality, and his hammer had made short work of the guard's escape.

“We’re fortunate that they were lax in their duty, and that they hadn’t placed the alarm-stone in here, where one of them could get to it without coming through us,” Dannel observed as he rose and faced them. He held up two small vials, similar to the ones they’d found on the warriors at the Lucky Monkey, and which likely held healing draughts. He handed one to Mole, and offered the other to Arun; when the dwarf harrumphed and turned away, he smiled and instead gave the other potion to Zenna.

“No doubt there will be more of them further in,” Zenna said pragmatically, tucking the vial into her pouch.

“Well, it looks like we’ll have to ride down into the cavern to find out!” Mole said, clearly excited about the prospect of navigating down in the iron cage. By the looks on the faces of the others, it was likely that she was alone in that sentiment.

The guardroom was unremarkable save for a table and a few chairs, and an adjacent closet that contained a small stockpile of supplies. The companions returned to the winch chamber, giving the alarm stone a good berth just in case.

“So, how are we going to work this?” Zenna asked. “Even if the cage can support our combined weight, someone will have to work the winch.”

“I’ll stay and operate it,” Dannel offered.

“How will you get down, then?” Mole asked.

The elf’s smile was a bit rakish. “Don’t worry, I’ll manage it.”

“Just don’t jump off the cliff,” Zenna said. “While our experiences together have gone a long way toward convincing me that all men have heads full of rocks, I don’t think that landing on yours would do much for your conversational skills.”

Dannel laughed, even as Arun let out a loud harrumph.

The elf remained behind while the others returned to the ledge, and the waiting cage. They brought one of the long boards, which were obviously used as an aid to boarding the dangling conveyance. Mole hopped lightly over to the cage and quickly opened the grate, her steps barely affecting it. Illewyn looked far more unsteady as she crossed to the waiting opening, and Arun’s face was uncharacteristically tight as he approached the plank. Had the dwarf been possessed of a fair complexion, Zenna thought, he’d be deathly pale right now.

“Are you all right?” she asked, softly so that the others wouldn’t hear.

“I’m fine,” the dwarf said, and he started across the plank. His weight on the plank caused the cage to twist slightly, and he froze, a brief look of disquiet—not quite fear, as paladins were supposedly immune to that emotion—shooting through his eyes.

“Come on, you can do it!” Mole said. Illewyn was holding onto the bars at the far edge of the cage, her eyes tightly closed, and she offered no comment.

Arun growled and crossed over into the cage. The cage swayed back and forth as it settled with the new weight, and the dwarf joined the cleric inside, grasping the bars.

“Don’t look down,” Mole offered, trying to be helpful.

Zenna made it over to the cage without difficulty, and as she entered the cage Mole reached out and heaved the plank back over to the ledge. She let out a faint whistle—the signal they’d agreed upon—and the cage started down into the cavern.

It took a few minutes, and while the cage creaked some under their weight, soon Zenna could see their destination draw near as they approached the bottom of the cavern. Most of the cavern was apparently taken up by a vast underground lake, as she’d guessed earlier. But her attention was drawn to the far wall of the cavern, behind the lake, toward where the cage was descending.

The entire far end of the cavern was occupied by a massive citadel, apparently carved into the sheer rock of the cavern face. The structure bore an air of ancient permanence about it, and was formed of odd angles and bulbous domes that seemed to bulge out from the cliff like the eyes of a goggling fish. To Zenna the entire thing seemed alien and forbidding, and she felt a shudder as she imagined the fortress itself watching their descent.

Or maybe it wasn’t imagination.

“Is that a building there?” Mole asked. Zenna remembered that her friend lacked darkvision, and would only be able to see shadows in the gleam of Illewyn’s partially shielded light.

“No dwarf crafted that... or any other race I’ve encountered,” Arun said.

Zenna saw that they were approaching the floor of the cavern. The ropes of their conveyance vanished into a small structure separate from the citadel, but before they reached it, the cage began to scrape along the hard, uneven stone floor of the cavern. The waters of the underground lake came up almost to their position, lapping softly against a shore littered with broken shards of rock and tiny stones worn smooth by wind and water.

The cage scraped noisily for a few more feet, tilting awkwardly to the side, before it came to a halt. Evidently Dannel had adjudged that the device had reached the end of its course. Mole opened the cage door and the companions filtered out, staring about them at their new surroundings.

“What a fantastic place!” Mole exclaimed. “Illewyn, shine some more light over here!”

“Careful,” Zenna cautioned. “There are probably more guards.”

“No doubt they’ll have heard us coming, with all that racket,” Arun grumbled. He came forward, unlimbering his hammer and hefting it experimentally.

But no foes emerged from the citadel to trouble them. They observed a number of doors, flat heavy slabs of unadorned stone, along the front face of the fortress, and a few narrow slits that showed only blackness beyond. The front face of the complex stretched for a few hundred feet before them, with protruding cylinders and boxy squares layered upon each other as though the architect had sought to combine every style of construction into one medley. The small building housing the lower end of the lift assembly seemed fairly unremarkable, if more recent construction, so they turned their attention to the various entrances in the cliff face.

Zenna lingered back, glancing up at the twin cables of the lift, wondering how Dannel would manage the descent. Her question was answered a moment later as she perceived a shadow moving down the ropes, discernable a moment later as the elf, sliding down quickly on an object he'd slung over the cable and now held onto with both hands, his feet dangling below as he picked up speed. Dannel's mouth was open and his eyes were wide as he shot down the rope toward the watching wizard; belatedly Zenna realized that he was coming right for her and she quickly leapt out of the route of his descent. For an instant it looked as though Dannel would slam at full speed into the waiting cage, but at the last moment he let go and landed hard on the uneven ground, transferring his momentum into an awkward roll that carried him with a splash into the waters of the lake. Zenna was there in seconds to help him, as he rose and limped over to where the rest of them waited.

"Are you all right?" Mole asked.

"That was pretty reckless, elf," Arun said.

"Well, I had to get down one way or another," he said with a grin, although it turned into a grimace as he probed at his side. "Damned hilt caught me hard when I landed, and I think I may have twisted my ankle as well." Illewyn started forward, but the elf forestalled her. "Best save your talents, priestess; I'll use my wand."

Mole had picked up the object he'd used to slide down the rope; it was a spare leather baldric from one of the slain guards above. "I wouldn't mind trying that sometime," she said, tossing the belt into the lake.

Dannel winked at her as he straightened, the glow from his wand already fading into his body. "It was...interesting, although the landing part's a bit rough."

"Are we going to chat here all day, or be about our business?" Arun asked. "If you're quite ready, elf."

Dannel tucked his wand back into its pocket, and unlimbered his bow. "Lead on, dwarf."

They selected the nearest visible exit, and after checking their weapons and other gear once last time, Arun shouldered the heavy portal open and they entered the citadel.

Chapter 71

The stone door grated open on its pivot, revealing a quiet, dark space beyond.

They moved inside, Illewyn's light playing out over the spacious interior of what appeared to be a considerable entry hall. Thick columns of stone carved in flowing, twisting patterns rose up along the walls to buttress a domed ceiling a good forty feet above. Condensed moisture shone on the walls, and the entire place had a musty odor. A second exterior door was visible to their left, and several interior doors provided access to other parts of the complex, including a large set of double doors directly across from the entry. A long wooden table dominated the center of the room, ringed by functional wooden chairs.

"Looks like nobody's home," Dannel said.

"Don't bet on it," Arun offered.

"Which way?" Illewyn asked, holding the light aloft with one hand, and clutching her mace tightly with the other.

"We should try the side doors," Mole suggested. "See what we can find, without stirring up the whole place."

"A sound approach," Dannel said, and they moved together to the single door in the wall to their left. The portal was of similar construction as the exterior door, if not quite as thick or imposing. Arun was able to open it without difficulty, but what they saw beyond gave them pause.

The room was small, roughly square, with walls of plain unadorned stone and a single other door in the wall to their right. However, strung across the floor, maybe a hand's span above the surface of the stone, was a network of thin white cords. The cords formed a lattice, crossing and crisscrossing each other and forming little spaces of varying size between their matrix.

"Well, that's a trap, obviously," Dannel said, looking in. "Though I can't quite make out what it sets off..."

"Some sort of alarm, no doubt," Mole said. "I think I can make it through, though."

"Are you sure we want to risk it?" Zenna asked. "We can try another way."

"Well... maybe the trap means that there won't be as many guards this way," Mole said. "And there's no guarantee that the other ways won't be warded by other traps, less obvious than this one."

A sound of something heavy dragging across the floor drew their attention around. Arun was there, bringing one of the chairs from the table. Zenna was the first to see what he intended, and she quickly stepped in to intervene. "Um... I don't think that's a good idea..."

"Why risk one of us?" the dwarf said. "We set off the trap, go charging in, and even if an alarm is sounded, we're doing damage before there's time for the guards to react."

“While it will no doubt cause my honored ancestors to cry out to hear my agreement with a dwarf, I have to say, there might be something to his logic,” Dannel said. “No doubt the trap is obvious for a reason, and there may be a hidden danger to complement the obvious one.”

“Well, I say why risk it at all?” Zenna persisted. “When there are other options...”

As the others debated, Mole turned and looked into the room once more, examining the network of tripwires and the walls and ceiling. After one more glance over her shoulder to verify that the others weren’t looking, she nimbly hopped forward into the room and started across toward the door.

Illewyn happened to turn and spot the gnome’s action, and her startled exclamation drew the attention of the others around. “Mole!” Zenna hissed, darting to the doorframe with the others close behind. The gnome didn’t turn, her attention on her feet as they darted into the tight spaces between the wires, already halfway to her destination.

“Ah, the inevitable logic of chaos,” Dannel commented, an arrow held to his bowstring in readiness for a quick draw. “For a group with two practitioners of lawful faiths in its midst, we certainly do seem quite devoted to it.”

“Quiet, elf,” Arun said, still holding the chair.

Mole darted through the maze of wires, her magical boots lifting her in precise little hops that made her seem like she was bouncing across the room. The others held their collective breaths as she reached the door, which had a small open space before it that was devoid of the tripwires. With a grin, she turned and offered a low bow to the others.

“Careful, there may yet be something dangerous beyond,” Zenna cautioned.

“You worry too much,” Mole said, but her actions belied caution as she scanned the door for traps and then lowered her ear to the flat stone to listen. Satisfied, she reached up and tugged at the door’s handle.

Mole was strong for her size, but the door resisted her pull stubbornly. She grimaced and pulled harder... and the door suddenly sprang open, moving smoothly on its greased pivot. Caught off guard, she tried to adjust, and for a moment she teetered off balance...

...before stepping back into a mess of tripwires.

Chapter 72

The results were swift. The white cords drew taut and a few snapped, the sound followed immediately by a series of louder snaps that seemed to come from within the walls. The ceiling, lost in shadows a good ten feet above, seemed to shiver, and then a black mess detached and fell onto the floor below.

Mole saw it coming, and without hesitation leapt forward through the open door, into the unknown beyond.

The heavy curtain fell across the floor; it was a net, blackened to blend in with the dark ceiling, weighted with small iron bells in the strands that made a loud clatter as they fell against the hard stone floor. The sound was loud enough to carry some distance, allowing the trap to serve both as prison and alarm at once. But fortunately, none of them had been snared by it.

Whatever relief they might have felt was tempered by the fact that Mole was separated from them, and further dampened by the shouts of surprise that came from beyond the open door.

Dannel was the first to react, slipping forward into the room. He only got one pace in, however, for as he stepped on the net, the material of it adhered to his boot, dragging at him, forcing him to arrest his progress lest he get further entangled.

“It’s sticky!” he said in warning to the others.

Arun came forward, still holding the chair, thrusting it before him like a farmer driving a plow. The dwarf caught up the edge of the net and thrust it ahead of him, pushing it back and clearing a path for them to the door. Dannel was knocked off balance and barely kept his footing, wrenching himself free of the net to fall against the near wall. Arun continued to push the net, which bunched up around the legs of the chair like a dislodged carpet.

Zenna and Illewyn came after him, rushing toward the open door. The sound of steel clashing on steel, followed by a sharp exclamation of pain, clenched Zenna’s heart with fear for her friend, and she rounded the door to find herself staring into the face of a lanky, muscular young man perhaps a year or two older than she. The man was clad in the familiar armor of the mercenaries that they’d fought at the Lucky Monkey, and in his hand he clutched a fat ceramic flask.

Man and woman stared at each other in surprise for a moment, then he hefted the flask to throw, at the same instant that Zenna recognized what it was.

Instinct took over, and mystic phrases rolled off of Zenna’s tongue as the energy of a spell flooded through her. The power focused into a single word, which Zenna felt echo through her mind as she spoke it.

“Drop!”

The man hesitated as the power of the spell hit him like the force of a blow. In response, his hand opened, and the flask fell from his hand. Belatedly he realized what he’d done, and he made a desperate grab for it, but was too late as the container struck the hard stone and shattered.

Flames exploded as the volatile alchemist’s fire erupted upon contact with the air. Instantly the man’s lower torso was sheathed in fire, and he stared down in horror, too startled even to scream as he staggered backward. Zenna, too, stumbled backward, lifting her hands to protect her face. Gobs of liquid flame caught on her cloak and trousers, eagerly claiming the fabric. Zenna could hear the sounds of confusion and melee mixed with the roar of the fire, the acrid tang of smoke, and the dancing shadows as the burning mixture consumed its fuel. But her attention was more immediately drawn to stamping out the flames before they captured her entire outfit. With her bare hand she smothered the little burning droplets, her innate resistance to fire thankfully protecting her from more than just minor burns. The flames died out, but she coughed as the smoke filling the room continued to grow denser. Confused, she looked around—and realized that the net had caught fire, and flames were even now spreading aggressively outward through the small antechamber.

“We’ve got to get out of here!” Illewyn said, drawing her attention back up as the cleric grasped her arm. Zenna looked around, and realized that she and the cleric were alone in the room. With her head starting to swim, she staggered toward the door to the room where Mole—and presumably the others—had vanished.

She entered into the midst of a still-raging melee. The bodies of two guards lay bloody on the floor, including the charred figure of the man who’d been caught in the fire, one side of his face caved in by a blow from Arun’s hammer. Mole lay on her side on the ground, propping herself up on one elbow, blood from several wounds streaking her clothes. She was warding by Arun, who continued to exchange blows with another guard. Dannel fought the last defender by the only other door that exited the place, forcing the man to fight him rather than attempt flight. Zenna saw that the elf was favoring his side, where a patch of red indicated that at least one of the defenders’ thrusts had scored. Even as she watched the warrior made a desperate lunge at Dannel, forcing him back a pace, before turning and darting toward the door and escape.

She didn’t hesitate; calling upon a cantrip she clouded the mind of the enemy fighter for a few moments, dazing him long enough for Dannel to run him through with a deadly thrust of his sword. In the same heartbeat Arun laid into his foe with a mighty blow of his hammer, crushing his breastbone with an audible and ugly snap. Both brigands collapsed, gasping out their last moments upon the floor.

Zenna moved quickly to where Mole lay, followed a step later by Illewyn. “Are you all right?” Zenna asked, noticing that Mole had drawn out a potion vial.

“I will be in just a moment,” she said, uncorking the vial and downing its contents quickly. The magic worked as expected, and the gnome’s wounds closed immediately, allowing her to stand up, if still a bit groggily.

“That was pretty foolish, all around,” Zenna said sternly.

Mole flushed slightly. “Well...”

“At least we avoided the trap, and killed the guards without any of them getting an alarm out,” Dannel suggested.

“Others might have heard the clatter,” Illewyn said. She had closed the door to the net-chamber behind them, but wisps of smoke continued to drift in from around the jamb.

“Well, if they didn’t, no doubt someone will smell the smoke,” Zenna observed. “We should be quick.”

“For once, that’s something I can agree with,” Arun declared, leading them to the door. Mole paused only long enough to quickly search the bodies, an action that proved fruitful as they discovered several more healing potions that hadn’t benefited their previous owners. She also found a few more clay flasks of alchemist’s fire, which covertly made their way into her handy haversack. Zenna caught sight of the maneuver, however, and shook her head wryly.

The door led onto a small chamber with two other exits. The first was securely locked, and Mole’s efforts to work it open met with failure. Electing to leave it for the moment, rather than draw attention by attempting to force it, they turned to the other door. Beyond that portal lay a long hallway, extending to their left and right for as far as their light penetrated. A few more doors were visible in either direction.

Dannel bent to examine the floor briefly. “Some faint tracks this way,” he said, indicating the left passage. “Someone came through here wearing muddy boots.”

“All right then,” Arun said, leading them in that direction. The passage curved slightly to the right, then straightened and ran another forty feet or so before ending in a trio of closed doors.

They started in that direction, but hadn’t gotten very far when the door in the wall to their right at the end of the passage opened, and a small figure stepped into the corridor. He was a halfling, clad in a bright red cloak and with a serious expression fixed on his face. At first he didn’t notice the adventurers, apparently preoccupied by some other matter, but as he turned from the door he looked up and saw the quintet standing about twenty feet ahead of him. Instantly his expression changed, souring into a look of clear disapproval.

“What’s this?” he said. “How did you get in here?”

“We’ll be the one asking the questions, shorty,” Arun barked, even as Dannel chimed, “Lax guards.”

The halfling was clearly dissatisfied with both answers, but seemed disinclined to further parley. Moving quickly, he drew something out of a pouch at his waist, and started chanting a string of strange-sounding syllables.

“He’s spellcasting!” Zenna warned.

Chapter 73

Even as Zenna shouted her warning, Dannel was moving, lifting his bow and drawing back the arrow already fitted to the string. However, in his haste the arrow improbably slipped off the string, falling aside before the elf could react. Rather than going for the arrow, Dannel bit off an elvish curse and dug into his quiver for another shaft.

Arun likewise responded quickly, if not as swiftly as Dannel. However, his throw went wide, and the light hammer spun easily a full pace over the halfling's head, crashing into the door behind him.

Mole, who'd been lagging behind, hefted her crossbow and came forward even as Dannel fitted his second arrow to the string and drew. But the delay had given the halfling enough time, and he faded from view, shooting them one last hostile smirk as he vanished. Dannel's arrow sliced through the air where he'd been standing a moment later, but it hit nothing.

"Spread out, block the passage!" Zenna urged. "And watch those doors, don't let him get away!"

They moved forward, wary, in close ranks to keep the halfling from slipping past, weapons at the ready. But they were still a good fifteen feet from the doors when Mole paused, hearing a faint sound that seemed to come from up above.

"He's casting again!" Mole warned. She pointed her crossbow up in the direction of the sound, but held her fire, uncertain. How could he have gotten up there?

A loud voice filled the corridor, seeming to come from right where the five of them were standing. "INTRUDERS IN THE COMPLEX! TO ARMS!" The sound was so loud that it seemed as though a dozen men were shouting at the top of their lungs, and it continued uttering the same warning repeatedly, effectively covering any noise that the hidden wizard might make.

"We're in trouble!" Dannel shouted, trying to make himself heard over the din.

"Fall back!" Zenna warned.

But before they could retreat, the door in the far wall opened, revealing a rather irate-looking armored woman warrior, her sword ready in her hand. Light shone into the corridor from the room behind her, clearly outlining the forms of additional guards. Without hesitating, she hefted her sword and charged, shouting a battle cry that was lost in the continuing din from the halfling's spell.

Dannel drew and fired, and this time, didn't miss. His arrow caught the woman in an armored shoulder, penetrating the steel plate with a heavy crunch and jabbing into the muscled flesh beneath. She staggered but still came on, bringing up her shield in time to catch the bolt from Mole's crossbow. Behind her came a second warrior and a pair of rogues clad in the familiar style of the Alleybasher gang, drawing slender rapiers as they moved forward in tandem.

Arun held his ground to meet their charge, but even as he lifted his own shield to meet the overhead stroke from the injured woman, Zenna leaned over him and unleashed a color spray down the corridor.

In the close quarters, there was no chance that she could miss. The blazing colors swam over the woman warrior and the armored man a few paces behind her, and caught the two rogues as well. One, a young red-haired woman who'd shaved one side of her head bald, turned away in time to avoid the blast, but her companion caught the colors square in the face, and like the two warriors slumped unconscious to the ground. The woman rogue hesitated, clearly not liking the odds as they had just been recalculated.

"Nice work!" Mole yelled, as she reloaded her crossbow.

"Surrender or be slain!" Dannel shouted. Despite his slight frame, his words carried clearly even over the continued warning. Her response wasn't quite clear, but it was clear from her expression was the gist of her comment was. Dannel nodded and drew out another arrow, even as Arun hefted his hammer and stepped forward with a grim look on his face.

Zenna felt a sudden tingle of power, a stirring in the air that made strands of her hair rise up and stand on end. In horror she turned just as a jagged bolt of liquid energy exploded down the corridor. She threw herself back against the wall as the lightning bolt blasted through the middle of the corridor. Illewyn was hit square on by the bolt and screamed as she fell, her torso blackened where the bolt had seared through her. Arun, next in line, was also hit squarely, though the dwarf remained standing as the electrical discharge flowed through him. Dannel, on the far side of the passage, was narrowly missed by the bolt, which continued down the corridor in a blazing streak, sending tendrils of death into the fallen warriors as it went. It narrowly missed the still-standing rogue, who threw herself down to the floor, and finally blasted into the door at the far end of the passage, sundering it off its hinges.

Zenna turned to see the halfling, shorn of his invisibility, standing on the ceiling a good ten paces back down the corridor behind them. The halfling's figure was still shadowy and indistinct, as though some vestiges of his magical invisibility still clung to his form. Even as she fumbled for her crossbow, Mole—who had also dodged out of the path of the bolt—lifted her own bow and fired. The shot was true, but the halfling clearly had some sort of magical protection up, for the bolt jerked aside at the last instant.

Meanwhile, the door to the left of the passage had opened as well, discharging another trio of Alleybashers to the fray. Clearly these three had been resting, for their clothes and armor were clearly hastily donned, and sleep still lingered in their eyes. For all that they recovered quickly with the prospect of a battle taking place right in front of them, and they drew their rapiers, quickly joining their thus-far extremely lucky companion in rushing to attack.

Dannel drew and fired, grazing one of the rogues with a shot that drew a red gash along her side. He knew that the magic-user behind them was a significant threat, but he could also see that Arun, weakened by the lightning bolt, wouldn't stand long alone against four enemies. He grasped one last arrow and quickly fired, hitting the woman he'd just wounded with a more significant injury to the leg that definitely gave her cause for concern. Then he drew his sword and moved to support the dwarf.

Arun leapt over one of the fallen fighters—now charred from the passage of the lightning—and engaged the first pair of rogues. As in the Lucky Monkey, the Alleybashers moved quickly and efficiently to coordinate their attacks, slipping around the dwarf to flank him. This time, however, the enemy was clearly not hindered by drink, and almost immediately one dug his rapier into a gap in Arun's armor, scoring a hit that was clearly serious. The dwarf, now in trouble, refused to budge, bringing his hammer around to strike back at his adversary. The hammer connected, but it was only a glancing hit that did little to hinder the canny rogue.

"We've got a problem here!" Mole yelled, as she reloaded her crossbow. The halfling wizard laughed, and with a wave of his hand conjured a series of magical bolts that darted unerringly to hit Mole and Zenna. The tiefling's body clenched as pain stabbed into her with the pair of impacts, but she forced her attention to the body of the woman lying in front of her. She knew that they had to deal with the wizard, but she'd seen the effects of the lightning bolt on Illewyn and knew that the cleric would die if she didn't intervene immediately.

Kneeling beside the fallen cleric, Zenna called upon the power of Azuth to stabilize her. The healing power flowed into the unconscious woman, who stirred as the positive energy drew her back from the brink of death.

Mole fired at the wizard again, this time getting through his defenses to score a minor gash as a bolt drew across his thigh. The halfling stamped one foot against the ceiling in fury, and began casting once more.

Arun fought on with an almost blind rage, laying about him with his heavy hammer, keeping his foes at bay through sheer effort. The one he'd hurt darted back to avoid another powerful stroke, and his friend on the other side just barely missed another opening that would have likely meant the end of the paladin. The rogue shifted to come in for another try, but was forced to dart back as Dannel leapt into the fray, slashing with a tight stroke that cut the Alleybasher in the cheek before he could get free. The man snarled, and faced off against the elf in the tight space of the corridor. To his side stood Arun, who continued to exchange blows with the other man, with neither able to deal a telling blow for the moment. Behind the two rogues the other two Alleybashers, unable for now to reach the melee in the crowded space, drew out their bows.

Having aided Illewyn, Zenna glanced up at the halfling, lost in his next no doubt deadly spell. Knowing that she didn't have time for her own casting, she swallowed her hesitation about drawing on her natural powers and called down a globe of darkness around the halfling's position. The cry of frustration that she heard told her that she'd interfered with whatever the enemy wizard had been about to unleash upon them. Streams of red fire emerged from the darkness, twin blasts that were aimed in the general direction of her and Mole, but without sight to guide them, both missed their targets. Zenna was quite glad of that, as one scorching ray seared the wall just a foot above where she crouched, close enough that she could feel the heat that quite possibly would have killed her, had it struck her dead-on.

The ghost sound summoned by him earlier called out one more warning and then ceased. As the deafening noise ended, the echo of the shout still ringing in Zenna's ears, she turned to see Arun and Dannel fighting for their lives against the Alleybasher rogues, while Illewyn had drawn herself up against the far wall of the corridor and was casting a spell to channel further healing into her battered body. Mole held her loaded crossbow at the ready, in case the halfling presented himself again through the darkness.

Apparently, however, the enemy wizard had had enough of this impromptu confrontation. "Get Triel, you fools!" he shouted from somewhere still beyond Zenna's bubble of blackness.

The battle with the rogues was clearly turning, and they were quick to take their leader's advice to heart. As Arun's foe lunged once more at him, trying in vain to penetrate his defenses, the dwarf abruptly lurched forward, catching the Alleybasher off guard as Arun drove his hammer up into his jaw. The impact crushed the entire lower half of his face, and he crumpled backward. Behind him one of the women rogues shot him with her bow at point-blank range, but the arrow likewise skittered off of his armored form. Arun didn't hesitate, continuing his rush and slamming his hammer with bonecrushing force into the woman's midsection. Her face twisted in pain as she collapsed to the ground, trying in vain to suck in breath as her heart continued to pour blood into her savaged torso.

The last woman, the one who had avoided both the color spray and the lightning bolt, wasn't sticking around to press her luck. Like a flash she darted through the open door at the far end of the corridor, and was gone.

Arun turned to help Dannel, but the elf already had his situation well in hand. Before the dwarf could strike, the last Alleybasher slumped to the ground, clutching a deep puncture in his side.

Dannel offered the heavily wounded dwarf a healing potion, and this time the paladin did not refuse.

Zenna had likewise drawn out a healing draught, and as she drank it she felt the sting from the halfling's magic missiles ease and quickly fade away. She moved to help Illewyn up back to her feet; the cleric's divine magic had eased her hurts somewhat but she still looked a sight, with her white robes blackened and charred where the lightning bolt had struck her.

Mole's voice drew their attention back down the corridor, where the globe of blackness still hung over the upper two-thirds of the passageway, leaving a clear space a few feet high below. "Come on, he went this way!" she cried.

The others hurried in that direction. "What was that about not rushing headlong into danger?" Dannel offered to Zenna as an aside, as he slipped ahead of her, his bow again unlimbered with an arrow set to the string.

Chapter 74

"That little bugger's dangerous... we can't give him a chance to recover," Arun said, as he pounded down the hall, the top of his body vanishing as he passed through the globe of darkness.

They found Mole just around the bend in the corridor, leaning against the corridor wall with her crossbow loaded and ready. “He went into that second door on the left, there,” she said. “He didn’t see me, I don’t think. Did you see the way he was walking on the ceiling? That would be useful, I bet. I wonder if it’s a spell that does that, or if he has some sort of magical item that grants the power?”

“He’s very skilled—and dangerous,” Zenna said. “Those spells he fired off aren’t simple enchantments.”

“That’s not all,” Dannel pointed out. “One of those rogues got away, and it’s likely we’re going to be getting some more company right quick.”

“I hope you’re not suggesting we withdraw,” Arun said.

“Not at all, dwarf. But we’d best be expecting a bit more trouble... perhaps more than we can handle.”

“Maybe we should get moving, then?” Illewyn suggested.

Warily the companions headed down the corridor, past the door to the guardroom that they’d come through earlier. They reached the door that Mole had indicated, and after a quick look to ensure that all of them were ready, Arun drew it open.

They were immediately greeted by a rather unnerving sight; the room beyond the door was completely filled with spiderwebs. And these were not simple strands that one would expect to find in a long-neglected storeroom; the webs formed a blanket over the floor and ran up well along the walls, fashioned of strands that were closer to cables than thin strings. On the far side of the chamber they could see a natural-looking tunnel that extended further ahead, likewise choked with webs.

“You’re sure he went this way?” Zenna asked.

“Positive,” Mole returned.

“Well then, friends,” Dannel said. “Do we go in after him?” He probed the floor ahead tentatively with his boot. “It’s not sticky, a bit awkward, but I bet we could manage it.”

“Are you crazy?” Illewyn asked. “Do you know what lives in spiderwebs like these?”

“Of course,” Dannel replied. “I’m not saying it’s not a trap. But if that little halfling went in here, then there must be more to it than just a nest of giant spiders. Remember, we’re looking for some stolen items in here, in addition to this cult.”

“Maybe we can just burn ‘em out?” Mole suggested.

“I’m not sure if these webs will burn,” Dannel replied. “And if they do, we’re likely to destroy anything of value beyond... including, perhaps, those wands that we need to find.”

“Bah, all of this talking is a waste of time,” Arun said. He strode boldly into the room, the webs quivering madly as he progressed. He came to a halt about five paces in, shaking his foot with a look of disgust on his face.

“There’s a few sticky spots in here,” he cautioned.

“Best let me go ahead, and probe for a workable path,” Dannel suggested.

And with that, the companions moved ahead into yet another unknown danger.

Illewyn’s divinely-conjured light began to fade, so she paused to refresh the spell. As she was once again in the rear of the small company, long shadows darted ahead of the rest of the companions as they moved deeper into the webbed cavern. Dannel, probing ahead carefully with the heel of his bow, identified several other places where the webs were still possessed of their adhesive property, allowing them to avoid getting entangled further.

They passed a side corridor that broke off to the left, running back in the direction they had come. That passage was likewise choked with webbing, falling in strands that formed curtains of sorts across their field of vision. But they could see that a larger chamber opened up just ahead, so they pressed on in that direction.

The chamber was clearly of considerable size, although the presence of the interminable webbing made it seem smaller than it was. Illewyn’s light revealed another exit on the far side of the room to their left, but before they could explore further, skittering noises from within the dense networks of webs indicated that they were not alone.

Dannel spun, drew, and fired in a single fluid motion. His arrow struck a bulbous, huge spider hovering over the entrance of the room, its segmented body easily five feet across. It let out a mad scree as the arrow sank into its body, and it leapt from its perch to land in the webs adjacent to Arun. That proved to be an ill choice of destination, as the dwarf’s hammer landed solidly in the center of the spider’s head a moment later, crushing it instantly.

But their victory was short-lived, as Illewyn held up the light, revealing nearly a half-dozen other shapes moving closer through the webs.

Chapter 75

Numerous additional spiders scuttled forward to the attack, including a pair of hulking monsters that were each easily the size of a good-sized horse. The companions prepared to meet the assault, but before the two forces could join in battle, Illewyn stepped forward boldly, holding up her holy symbol with its shining glow of magical light driving back the shadows. It also more fully revealed their charging foes, three more of the medium-sized spiders in addition to the two larger specimens that skittled forth without hindrance through their maze of webs.

“Illewyn, what are you doing!” Zenna shouted in warning, but the cleric, caught up in the divine song of her god, paid no heed. A soft sound came from the young woman, words of power that flowed through the room. The light flared and spread outward in a burst of soft blue that was gone so quickly that none of the other companions were quite sure it had existed at all. They could feel, however, the pulse of emotion that accompanied the cleric's spell, as their fears eased and their anxiety softened, replaced by a feeling of contentment and security.

The feeling clearly affected the hostile spiders as well, as they abruptly stopped, shaking slightly as they stood in place, their eight legs trembling on the strands of webbing, the light reflecting in their bulbous eyes as their sharp fangs snapped at the air. It was as if Illewyn had frozen them in place, death held at bay through the channeled power of her patron.

"Um, so they're not going to kill us?" Mole asked, looking out from behind the comfortable bulk of Arun, her crossbow loaded and ready in her hands.

"It would appear not," Dannel said, his own bow ready with a long shaft held against the string. "How long will the effect last?" he queried.

For a moment Illewyn just stood there, her back to them, the concentration evident just in the way she held herself rigid. "A few moments, no more," she said. "As long as I can maintain my concentration..."

"Bah, let 'em come then," Arun said, slapping the head of his hammer against the edge of his shield, letting out a ringing note of challenge. The spiders reared and hissed as the sound reverberated, but they remained rooted to their positions.

"Perhaps we can be a bit more... strategic," Zenna suggested.

Dannel glanced at her and nodded. "If we retreat to the corridor, we can keep them all from coming at us at once."

"Exactly my thought."

"I have the alchemist's fire," Mole reminded them.

"No!" Zenna replied, a bit too loudly, perhaps. "No," she repeated, "We don't want to get caught in our own conflagration..."

"Whatever you're doing, do it quickly," Illewyn said, the strain showing in her voice.

"All right," Dannel said. "Let's back it up then, slowly..."

They gave way, Arun holding his position until Illewyn had passed him, and then taking up a blocking position as they retreated back to the corridor. As they gave way Dannel started to hum a soft tune, a lilting melody that seemed oddly out of place in these circumstances, but which picked up until he added voice to the song. The words were in elvish, which none of them understood, but somehow the meaning of the song, offering reassurance in the face of mortal danger, made it through, easing them as the afterimage of Illewyn's spell had done earlier.

“Bah, a good dwarven war-song is what we need here,” Arun growled. But he didn’t ask the elf to stop as he took up position at the mouth of the corridor.

“The big one on the right,” Zenna said, lifting her own crossbow. The others nodded, preparing their own weapons.

Illewyn sagged slightly, lowering the holy symbol as its light flickered slightly for a moment.

The spiders surged forward, at the same instant that the companions unleashed their fire.

Chapter 76

Zenna cursed as her shot went wide, the bolt striking a dangling strand of webbing that dislodged it enough to narrowly miss her target. The others, however, were more accurate, with Mole’s shot catching the spider in its fat body just to the right of its maw, while Dannel’s arrow sank deeply into a black eye. Arun hurled a light hammer, which smacked it in the body just above the row of remaining eyes. Still it came on, its jaws glistening with venom as it sought out the flesh of those who had harmed it. Behind it the other spiders charged on in its wake, just as eager.

Arun growled out a challenge as he hefted his warhammer and set his shield to meet their rush.

The spider charged into him with enough force to drive even the sturdy dwarf back a step, and there was a moment of doubt as the dwarf’s footing nearly gave out on the tangled map of webbing. But the paladin kept his stance, and the spider’s fangs snapped in vain against the hard front of his shield. With a roar Arun countered with a powerful underhanded sweep of his hammer that came up into the creature’s head from below. Stunned by the force of the impact, the spider wavered... but somehow, despite the grievous wounds it had suffered, yet stood.

“Blast you, die already, you blasted vermin!” the dwarf shouted, bringing the hammer up to try and finish it before the spider could recover to attack again.

The second large spider couldn’t fit into the tight confines of the corridor, with its brother engaged with Arun in the narrow space. The smaller spiders—small being a relative term, since each was the size of a wolf—spread out and crawled up the walls to slip in around their larger cousin. One even skittered up a dangling length of web to the ceiling, clinging to the threads like a tightrope walker immune to the tug of gravity as it slipped into the corridor from above.

Dannel met the first medium spider to dart into the corridor with an arrow that sank almost to the fletching in its hairy body. The spider twitched spasmodically but then sprang forward, narrowly missing the elf to land in the midst of the companions. Mole let out a reflexive shriek and dodged back, falling into a cluster of webs that thankfully weren’t sticky enough to hold her. Zenna, standing right before the spider, held her ground as the wounded creature turned to face her, and calmly fired her crossbow directly into its head. The spider shuddered, and collapsed.

Illewyn, who'd also been caught off guard, could only hold her mace limply, looking at Zenna with an amazed look on her face while the tiefling reached for another bolt and reloaded.

The large spider recovered just as Arun smashed into it with another blow that knocked it backward, flying end-over-end to land in a tumbled heap of legs and mashed innards. Before he could even reset, however, the second large spider darted in with uncanny speed, stabbing its fangs into the dwarf's armored shoulder. Arun cried out as the spider's powerful bite crunched through plate, digging into the flesh beneath and pumping liquid death into his veins.

But the dwarf was made of stern stuff, and he quickly shook free and bashed the spider in the head with his hammer, driving it back enough to give him room to work.

Dannel fired as quickly as he could fit arrows to his bowstring, unleashing shots that bit spider flesh more often than not despite his haste. He hit the spider crawling in across the ceiling with a shot that staggered it, and before it could recover followed with a second that hit with enough impact to send it flying, narrowly missing Arun even as he struggled against the remaining large specimen. Two more medium spiders came scrambling around the edges of the corridor, along the walls. Dannel drew and fired a shot that slammed into the first spider's maw, through its body, and jutted out through its hindquarters, its momentum finally spent. The spider stiffened and dropped. The second twitched and leapt, forcing the elf to duck to narrowly avoid its leap. The spider landed right in front of Mole, who had pulled herself from the webs but thus far had been unable to get a clear shot at anything in the tight confines of the battle. She lifted her crossbow, but the spider lunged and bit at her before she could shoot, dragging a pair of gashes in her forearm with its fangs.

"Ow!" Mole yelled, darting back from the creature's reach before it could snare her again.

Zenna fired at the spider, but her shot merely glanced off of its leathery body. It turned to face her, but Illewyn leapt into the gap to challenge it, catching it with a glancing blow from her mace. The spider, clearly not impressed by the strike, lunged at the priestess's leg, but its fangs only caught the hem of her robe as she pulled abruptly back.

Mole, now brandishing her sword, leapt forward, her magical boots allowing her to spring up around the spider to flank it. The spider, still fixated on Illewyn, failed to react in time to save it as the gnome took advantage to slip her blade into a joint in the creature's body, slaying it.

Arun, meanwhile, had just finished a titanic struggle with the second of the larger spiders, crushing it with a final blow of his hammer. He was clearly weakened, though, with a second wound in his weapon arm where the spider's fangs had again penetrated through his protections. Even as the spider died, and the room grew quiet again, the dwarf sagged against the bewebbed wall, his hammer and shield leaden in his hands.

"Is everyone all right?" Zenna asked.

“Look out!” Dannel cried, reaching for another arrow. Before any of them could react, however, an object hurtled out of the darkness from the far exit. It was a net, fashioned of spiderwebs, that settled around the tired dwarf, pinning his arms and securing him against the wall. Arun struggled, but in his currently weakened condition could not break free.

The web-hurler was revealed a moment later as it moved forward into the room, shuffling into the edge of their light. It was a terrible thing, looking like nothing other than a cross between a spider and a man, walking upright while its bestial jaws clacked eagerly, shining with the telltale glister that marked poison. Behind it, a second creature was visible.

“We’re not done here yet!” Dannel cried, drawing his bow and sighting down the length of the shaft.

Chapter 77

Dannel’s shot hit the spider-man, although the missile caught the creature in the fleshy part of its shoulder, rather than square in its heart as the elf had intended. The beast, along with its companion still within the darkness of the far corridor, elected however to withdraw rather than advance into the room to attack. Mole fired her crossbow after them, but it was doubtful that she hit anything through the screening webs and darkness.

Keeping an eye on the exit where the two creatures had vanished, the companions turned to help Arun free himself from the enfolding webbing. The dwarf sputtered and protested as they cut him free, cursing as he tugged persistent strands from his face and the cracks and crevices of his armor. This was one case where not having a beard was proving an advantage, Zenna thought.

Illewyn moved forward and laid hands upon the dwarf, calling upon the power of Helm to purge some of the lingering effects of the spider venom from the dwarf’s body. Zenna suspected that the paladin was still weakened somewhat, but she knew that Arun would never admit to such. Still, the dwarf was at least somewhat gracious, nodding to the cleric in gratitude as he took up his hammer.

“Bah, I’m starting to think this is all just a big trap,” he growled, trying in vain to shake off some of the lingering threads that hung from his shield. “That blasted wizard might have doubled back on us... why would he come into this nest of vermin?”

Zenna nodded—it was a sound point—but Dannel, still focused on the far exit, another arrow fitted to his bow, shook his head. “Those creatures... ettercaps, they are called. They’re intelligent, not mindless hunters like the spiders. I suspect that the mage might have had an arrangement with them; it’s pushing the bounds of credibility to expect that this cult would lair in such close proximity to such creatures otherwise.”

“I can do no more against the bites of the spiders this day,” Illewyn reported. “We should be cautious.”

Zenna moved deeper into the room, away from the dark exit to their left, careful lest she step into one of the stickier areas of webbing. After waiting a moment to verify that no more spiders were hiding in the tangle of webs in the rear of the room, she opened her mind to the power of the Weave, reciting the simple trigger phrases of a minor cantrip.

“What are you doing?” Mole asked her.

Zenna didn't respond at first, concentrating to focus the power of her spell as she scanned the room. The others turned to watch her as she finished her sweep. “I am checking for magical auras,” she said. “To see if our invisible friend was lurking nearby.”

“Ah, that's a good idea,” the gnome said. “Although I'm actually sort of glad he's not,” she said, rubbing her chest where the lingering memory of the halfling's magic missiles remained.

Zenna nodded, but her attention was drawn to a faint resonance that she detected with her spell. She started in that direction, pausing as she stepped into a patch of webs that tugged at her boot annoyingly.

“Careful, Zenna,” Dannel said, from where he was covering Arun. The dwarf had moved to the mouth of the corridor where the ettercaps had retreated, scanning for any ambushes. “There might be more little spiders in the webs.”

“Did you find something?” Mole said, hopping lightly across the strands of webbing to where Zenna had paused before an unsightly clump of tangled webs that formed a ball of sorts about a foot across.

“There's a magical aura coming from within there,” Zenna reported.

Mole needed no further encouragement; drawing her dagger she went to work on the bulb of webs. Her little cry of glee reported her success, and soon she was stuffing handfuls of coins into her magical haversack, pausing every now and again to bend and grab one that skittered away onto the carpet of webs.

“We can worry about the loot later,” Dannel persisted. “We can't give our enemy time to prepare.”

“I'll just be a second,” Mole insisted. She found something else in the cache and handed it absently to Zenna. It was a slender wand of polished wood; the tiefling examined it with fascination, sensing the magic pulsing within it even without the aid of her spell. Closing her eyes, she focused her perceptions upon it, trying to draw out the secret of its power.

“It's not like they don't already know we're here, and that we're coming,” the gnome went on. Having secured the treasure, she slipped her pack back on and took her crossbow again, traveling lightly in small hops across the sea of webs to where the others waited. Zenna followed behind, having tucked the wand into a pocket of her cloak.

Grimly, they pressed on.

The rough corridor continued for a few dozen paces before opening up into yet another natural cavern similarly choked with webbing. A wider entrance, perhaps opening onto another chamber beyond, was visible on the far side of the place. While the entire room was covered in webs, they formed a more or less flat expanse in the center, like a intricate and plush carpet laid over the hard stone of the floor. Seeing no immediate foes, Arun started forward, before Dannel grasped him on the shoulder.

“If I were a canny defender, I would lay a trap in the center of this room, the easiest route of approach,” he warned.

The dwarf nodded, and the two split up, moving around the edges of the room, prodding ahead for any surprises. Zenna and Mole covered them with their crossbows, while Illewyn, who had not brought a missile weapon, held her mace tightly and muttered the words of a prayer.

The faintest stirring amidst the webs that curtained the far exit was their only warning.

“Incoming!” Mole cried in warning, at the same time that Dannel, who had seen it too, stepped back and drew his longbow. With his low-light vision he could clearly mark the ettercap half-hidden among the webs, but as he released his boot slid on a slick strand of webbing, and his shot went awry. A pair of web-nets shot out from the creatures’ vantage, targeting the elf and dwarf. Dannel, recovering quickly from his misstep, smoothly dodged back and avoided the cast.

Arun, predictably, was completely snared.

But the others were not idle during those moments, and both Mole and Zenna hit with shots that sank with a meaty thud into the body of one of the ettercaps, mere inches apart. The creature, already wounded by Dannel’s arrow earlier, released a ear-rattling screech and staggered backward, into the chamber beyond. The second creature, apparently eager to avoid a similar fate, joined it before the two women could reload. Dannel sent an arrow after it as it withdrew, but there was no indication that he scored a hit.

Illewyn had already moved to assist Arun, whose curses formed an unbroken string of syllables in Dwarven as he struggled to extricate himself for the second time from a prison of sticky webs. The paladin now looked quite a sight, with white strands covering his armor and shield, and pasted over his helm and dangling from his hair. He looked about ready to charge full on into the chamber where the ettercaps had disappeared, but once more Dannel forestalled him.

“Let me be,” Arun said. “I’ve got me a score to settle with them blasted bugs.”

“Let us not abandon caution,” Dannel said softly. “I sense that a dire confrontation looms ahead.”

He did not know just how right he was.

Wary of another ambush, the companions moved slowly to the exit. Arun in the lead, clanking slightly with every movement, Dannel with a ready arrow just behind, Zenna and Mole side by side with crossbows pointing in every direction at once, and Illewyn bringing up the rear.

The third and final chamber in the complex of webbed caverns was somewhat larger than the first two, with a ceiling that rose as high as twenty feet above the floor. Every nook and cranny was filled with webbing, tendrils of which dangled down from the uneven ceiling, stirring in the faintest hint of a breeze that likely drifted in through the web-choked cracks and crevices in the walls.

“You were fools to follow me here,” came a voice from somewhere across the room, its source impossible to discern with precision.

“Hand over the wands, and maybe we can talk,” Zenna offered.

“No, I don’t think so,” came the voice. “In fact, I think you’re quite about to die.”

Forms moved in the webs along the edges of the rooms, resolving into the outlines of the ettercaps they faced earlier. But then their attention was drawn to something... big that shifted high along the far wall, near the ceiling. As Illewyn came into the room, the light from her holy symbol drove back the shadows, revealing more details of the form.

Zenna drew in a startled breath, and she wasn’t the only one.

“By the gods,” Illewyn whispered, her face suddenly white.

Chapter 78

The thing was a bloated, sick monstrosity, a spider covered with no-doubt sharp spines that jutted from its body, huge jaws that slavered with poison-dripping fangs, and eyes that shone with the terrible gleam of intelligence.

But while the terrible spider held their attention for several heartbeats, the skittering of the ettercaps reminded them that they were not alone. Arun snarled and stepped forward onto the spongy mass of webs that covered the floor, drawing their attention to himself.

“Enough of stickin’ me with your blasted webs!” he shouted, and lifted a vial to his lips.

Almost immediately the dwarf began to surge and grow, enlarging until he had reached a height of nearly eight feet. Zenna swallowed, impressed with the effects of the draught they’d taken from Tongueater, and glad that Mole had pressed it upon the dwarf.

The dwarf’s dramatic action shook them from their reverie, and the companions launched into action. At ettercap, the one already bleeding from the hits they’d inflicted upon it, huddled now among the webs to their left, gathering a web to cast at them. Dannel saw it and fired, his arrow catching it square in the face, putting it down for good.

Illewyn called upon the power of Helm, shrouding them all with a blessing. Zenna scanned the shadows, the darkness of the chamber no match for her darkvision, but she could not see where the halfling wizard was hiding. Biting her lip in frustration, she took aim on the giant spider.

But she was surprised as Mole stepped ahead of her, clutching a fat object in one small hand. “Desperate situations call for desperate measures!” she cried, and hurled the flask of alchemist’s fire at the spider.

The missile arced through the air, but instead of hitting the spider square in the face as she’d intended, it glanced off one of the long spines that jutted from the top of its body, sticking in the webbing that surrounded it without breaking.

“Damn!” the gnome cursed.

The spider responded so quickly that they were all caught off guard. The spider’s jaws opened wide, and sharp projections shot out of its body across the room on long tentacles, like harpoons fired from the bow of a whaling vessel. Mole yelled and narrowly dodged one of the deadly fangs, which snapped at her and almost instantly began retracting back into the spider’s body.

The second harpoon-fang hit Illewyn squarely in the chest, driving her back roughly a pace as the sharp edges tore through the links of her chain shirt into her flesh. She cried out and staggered as the tentacle quickly drew taut, yanking her off her feet and pulling her roughly across the room.

“Illewyn!” Zenna cried. Without any spells that might be effective against the spider in her mental inventory, she could only aim her bow and fire. The missile sank into its fat body, but did not hinder the spider from drawing in its victim. Illewyn screamed as the spider pulled her closer, lifting her off of the ground and up into the air toward its perch. Gleaming fangs like sharp daggers had unfolded from within its widely-stretched jaws, snapping in eagerness to claim their prey.

Arun had started toward the terrible spider, his reach now easily enough to assail it from the ground, but two more ettercaps emerged from the webbing to assault him from both sides. The normally cautious creatures, drawn to a frenzy by the presence of their “god,” attacked heedless of concern for their personal safety. Arun made that cost them as the first lunged within his extended reach, bringing his hammer with its considerably-enhanced punch down on the ettercap’s shoulder. The blow staggered the creature, but Arun couldn’t adjust in time to stop the second monster as it leapt at him, snapping its sharp fangs at his hip. Fortunately for the dwarf, his armor held, and the ettercap was left to snarl in frustration as its envenomed fangs slipped off of the steel plate.

Even as he lifted his hammer to finish off the first creature, a shadow seemed to fall over the embattled dwarf. Looking up, his eyes widened in surprise as a dark form approached, slowly taking substance. It was a vague, indistinct form, but it embodied all of the fears and terrors that lurked in the dark corners of a man’s mind.

But such fears held no terror for the paladin, shielded by the iron dedication of his faith. Skaven’s phantasmal killer began to dissolve even before it touched the dwarf, finally shattering into a wisps of shadow and dream, harmless.

Hidden within his nook high along the wall, the halfling bit back a curse, belatedly realizing the true nature of his foe.

Zenna had only barely sensed the wizard's spell as a tickle upon the edges of her consciousness, but she realized that the wizard was still a deadly threat, as deadly as the spider that had assaulted Illewyn. She moved forward into the room, coming dangerously close to where Arun was still battling the ettercaps, scanning everywhere... there, a shadow barely distinct from the webs of shadow that filled the room, something not quite... right.

Zenna called upon the power of Azuth, challenging her power into that spot. "Approach," she said, the word reverberating with power.

Dannel, meanwhile, had also moved forward, drawing another shaft as he drew bead on the terrible harpoon spider. His first shot missed, sliding past it to stick in the morass of webs behind it, while the second hit a protruding spear of rock and glanced wide. Mole ran past him, heedless of her own safety, loading her crossbow as she came, trying to get under the creature.

Despite the cleric's struggles, the spider pulled Illewyn up to it, snapping at her with its terrible fangs. Illewyn cried out as the sharp points jabbed into her torso, injecting their venom into her body. She tried to tear free, but the spider held her tightly, wrapping its foremost limbs around her struggling form.

She managed to lift her mace, but as she stared into the unholy visage of the creature, she knew that she had little chance of doing enough damage to save herself.

Then her eyes drifted to the fat object hanging in the webs just over its body.

Skaven actually took a step before his disciplined mind cut through the force of Zenna's command, restoring order within his body. The halfling shifted his attention from the enlarged paladin beating up on the ettercaps to the woman who'd assaulted him with magic. He'd initially pegged her as a wizard, perhaps a sorceress, but the spell she'd hurled at him had been divine in origin. Normally he would have scoffed at the idea of an enemy spellcaster injuring him with magics of the mind, but this was twice now that she'd discomfited him, first with the darkness in the corridor, and now with this simple spell that had quite nearly had him...

The halfling wizard, still fairly secure in the shroud provided by his earlier consumed potion of hiding, cast a quick spell that sharpened his senses and focused his aim, and then he launched into one of the most powerful magics left in his repertoire. Whatever she was, the woman would pay the price for her attacks upon him.

Illewyn could feel her muscles stiffening and twitching, her limbs becoming leaden as they began to disregard the commands sent to them from her brain. She imagined that she could feel the spider's venom burning through her system like a wildfire, destroying the pitiful resistance put up by her body. When the spider thrust its fangs into her again, she could barely feel it.

One thing gave her focus as her body drifted out of her control; the white hot fire that was the presence of Helm's light within her. With a cry that was half desperation, half determination, she lunged forward awkwardly with her mace, striking not at the spider, but at the clay flask of alchemist's fire suspended in the webbing just above it. She could not even feel the force of impact as the iron head of her weapon smacked into the webs, slipping from her hand...

But she could see the white-hot flare that erupted before her, blossoming into an eager red flower that spread to engulf the entire upper body of the harpoon spider. The spider reared back and issued a terrible screech that echoed through the room. Illewyn, in a last desperate effort, the heat of fire burning through her poison-induced haze as liquid drops of flame settled on her robe, lifted her legs and kicked against the spider's face. She felt something give, and was falling. The ground wasn't that far below her, and padded with webs, but the cleric had taken enough of a beating already. As she hit, her head grazed something solid, and she lost consciousness.

Even as the flames spread, and Illewyn freed herself, the other companions continued their assault upon the spider and his allies. Arun slew the ettercap he'd already wounded with a powerful stroke that relocated its head about in the center of where its shoulders met. The second creature lunged at him again from behind, and this time secured a hold where it could stab its fangs into the joint where his armor folded at the knee. Arun roared in pain and anger, and shifted to face the second creature. The ettercap lifted its bloody jaws and snarled at the dwarf, who drove the enlarged haft of his hammer like a spear into the gaping hole of its face. The ettercap, choking on the shattered remnants of its fangs and its own blood, staggered back and slumped to the ground, dying.

Mole leapt into position under the spider as it assailed Illewyn, cursing as her boots took hold in a sticky patch of webbing. She didn't let it hinder her attack, however, shooting her crossbow up into the belly of the creature. The shot barely seemed to hinder it, however; not like the reaction it showed when Illewyn burst the flask of alchemist's fire upon it. Mole looked up at the blaze of flame in amazement, then belatedly realized that her current location placed her in a rather precarious position. Sliding her bow across her back, she went to work trying to free herself from the webs.

Dannel's unlucky streak finally came to an end. Even as Illewyn fell free, and the flaming spider withdrew, he fired a shot that smacked solidly into its body. The spider hissed at the elf, and showed that it still had a lot of fight left in it as it shot one of its harpoons at him. Dannel staggered as the sticky head of the tendril tore into his shoulder and stuck, threatening to draw him into the same fate that had befallen Illewyn. But instead of falling, the elf ran forward, keeping his footing as the spider reeled him in. He dropped his bow and drew his sword, and as he was drawn up into ring of fire that was spreading on and around the spider, he lifted the weapon and prepared to strike.

A beam of twisting black energy streamed from the darkness high along the cavern wall, extending greedily from its summoner to strike Zenna squarely in the chest and spill out around her in an enfolding embrace. The enervation only lasted for a few moments, but even as the shadow-lance faded, Zenna staggered from the impact of the negative power of the halfling wizard's spell. She realized with horror that she was... diminished, the clerical spells she had memorized wiped from her memory, along with some of the wizardly potential that she had fought so hard to accumulate. She felt small, weak. She trembled as she realized how close she had come to having her very life force snuffed out by that dark ray, and for a long moment just stood there while battle raged around her, unable to stop herself from shaking.

Skaven chuckled to himself as he observed the effect of his spell—there wouldn't be any more trouble from that one—but he quickly sobered as he realized that the rest of the battle was turning against him and his allies. He had a few more offensive spells left, but he was all too aware of the spreading flames, and it really wasn't in his nature to fight to the last in a dangerous situation. Fighting back the urge to gloat a bit before withdrawing, he drew out a vial, consumed it, and dissolved into a small plume of mist that blended in with the thickening smoke as he slipped quietly from the chamber.

Mole slashed at the webs holding her with increasing concern. The alchemist's fire had set a considerable portion of the webbing along the wall and ceiling ablaze, and flaming strands were falling onto the floor around her, lighting smaller fires that were getting progressively hotter. Smoke was starting to fill the room as well, and she resisted the urge to cough—she had to free herself! She realized that she could just step out of her new magical boots, but she wasn't quite ready to go to that extreme... not just yet.

Dannel found himself drawn into the maelstrom of fire, but his full attention was on those snapping fangs and the black eyes above them. Finally, as the spider drew him up with one more solid jerk, he thrust, his sword sinking with a sick plop into the spider's gaping maw. The spider screamed and twisted to the side, losing its grip on the wall as its legs failed to find purchase on the fire-scorched rock. Dannel found himself falling with it, resigning himself to an uncomfortable landing.

At that moment Mole looked up, and her heart froze in her chest as she saw the spider, with flames still licking across its back and Dannel attached to its front, slip off the wall and start falling.

Straight toward where she was standing, still struggling to get free.

Chapter 79

Mole closed her eyes, resigning herself to her fate. Her last thought was, "What a way to go... crushed by an oversized bug!"

But that inglorious outcome never came. She felt rather than saw the hulking presence moving toward her, and heard the heavy sound of something heavy and solid slamming against metal, then crashing a heartbeat later into the ground a pace where she'd been standing. She opened her eyes to see first the dead spider, with Dannel grinning—grinning!—as he extricated himself from its still smoldering corpse, then up to see the still quite sizeable Arun standing over her, his now-massive shield raised protectively above them.

"We've got to get out of here," the dwarf rumbled.

Mole nodded, slashing the last strands of webbing free from her boots. It was easier, now, without the distraction of a spider the size of a warhorse about to fall on you...

Though she was loath to reject the dwarf's helpful protection from the spreading flames, she knew that others needed help as well. "Help Illewyn!" she urged, catching sight of the cleric lying in a nest of webs a few paces away.

The dwarf had seen her as well, and was already moving. Slinging his hammer across his back, his bent and gingerly picked up the priestess's limp form in a massive hand. Shafts of golden light shone from his hand as he poured healing power into the stricken priestess, easing her injuries and drawing her back from the brink of death. She remained unconscious, however, so the dwarf carried her carefully in the crook of his arm and turned back to Mole and Dannel.

The gnome had freed herself already, and she and Dannel were already making their way back to the exit. Zenna still stood there, a stricken look on her face, but she seemed otherwise unhurt as the five of them withdrew, coughing, from the smoke-filled chamber.

They made their way all the way back to the first large cavern. Smoke continued to hang in the air, but most of it seemed to be escaping through vents in the cavern complex. Dannel looked back down the corridor, wary of the flames pursuing them.

"She needs more healing," Arun said, laying the cleric down gently on the floor.

"I... I cannot," Zenna said. Mole looked at her in surprise—it looked like her friend, normally collected, was close to tears.

"Here, I've got a few extra potions, the good ones," Mole said. She took one and carefully poured one into the cleric's mouth, helping her as she coughed and recovered consciousness. Within moments, she was strong enough to rise, although her movements remained uncoordinated and awkward.

"The spider poison," Illewyn told them. "It will take time... aaah." She shifted, leaning into Mole as her legs threatened to give out under her.

"Did anyone see what happened to the wizard?" Dannel asked, returning to the center of the room.

"He got away," Zenna said, her voice flat.

"We're seriously weakened," the elf went on. "We have to consider retreat." The companions shared a look, and even Arun, himself still suffering from the effects of several poisonous bites, did not complain.

"Come on," the dwarf said. He turned to Illewyn, and again lifted the cleric, holding her against him in his still-massive arms.

“That draught... cough... will not last much longer,” Zenna said. And in fact, even as she finished speaking, Arun began to shrink back to his normal size. He put Illewyn down, and the cleric stood, leaning against his shoulder.

“It’s all right... I can walk.”

“Come,” Dannel said, leading them toward the exit. He’d recovered his bow, at least, and drew out another arrow as he directed them back the way they had come. He’d also found the cleric’s mace, and handed it back to her as they continued out of the smoke-filled cavern.

“Are you all right, Zenna?” Mole asked, worried at the listless look about her friend.

“I will be... at least, I hope so,” the tiefling replied. “Come, let’s get out of this place.”

They navigated the passage without difficulty, bruised and battered from their struggle against the harpoon spider and its allies. As they neared the door to the main corridor, however, Dannel held up his hand, bringing them to a halt.

“What is it, elf?” Arun asked.

“That door... didn’t we close it behind us?” Indeed, the heavy stone slab was now open.

“Maybe the halfling came back this way, left it open,” Mole suggested.

But that theory was dispelled a moment later, when they heard a mocking, feminine laughter come from just outside the door. A tall female figure stepped into the opening, her hair a blazing red like the flames in the spider’s lair. She was clad head to toe in spiked steel platemail, and she carried a heavy flail that likewise culminated in wicked spikes. A black hand was emblazoned prominently across her breastplate; the symbol of the dread god Bane.

“Well,” she said. “It would seem that you meddlers have gotten yourself into quite an unfortunate position. Now, it is time to grant you the reward that you have earned for interfering in my plans at the Lucky Monkey.”

Dannel lifted his bow, but the woman—the fell cleric Triel Eldurast, obviously—stepped smoothly to the side, out of their line of sight. They could all hear the sounds of metal on metal that betrayed the presence of others waiting in the hall outside, flanking the door.

“Uh oh,” Mole said.

Chapter 80

The companions choked as the smoke continued to thicken in the web-choked confines of the narrow corridor, a reminder that they were rapidly running out of choices.

“What do we do now?” Illewyn asked, her eyes wide with the hints of a growing panic.

“Bah, we can handle this wench and her lackeys,” Arun said, hefting his hammer.

Mole, meanwhile, crept forward, moving like a shadow until she neared the doorway. The corridor beyond was well-lit, and she gave the threshold a wide berth as she crouched low, and listened.

“There’s that other side passage,” Zenna suggested.

“I suspect that just connects to the other door we passed in the main corridor,” Dannel replied. “I don’t imagine that Triel would have been so audacious to appear to us, if she didn’t know that we were well and truly trapped.”

“Let’s get this over with, then,” Arun said, adjusting his helmet. “We remain here, with all this smoke, and those bandits won’t have to bother with killing us.”

“I agree,” Zenna said, a hint of her former fire returning as they confronted the hard reality of their situation. “But we need a plan.”

Mole had crept back to join them. “There’s a bunch of them on either side of the door,” she reported. “Most of them sound like they’re armored.”

“Waiting for us to come out,” Illewyn said grimly, her hands trembling from the tension, or from the lingering effects of the spider venom.

“Well then, let us give them what they want,” Dannel said.

* * * * *

On the far side of the doorway, flanked by her warriors, Triel Eldurast felt a conflict of emotions. On the one hand, fury at the damage already wrought to her plans caused her jaw to tighten almost painfully, her eyes burning like pits of coals lying in braziers. Her soldiers, mercenaries though they were, knew her moods and tried not to draw her attention, focusing on the dark opening where smoke continued to issue out in a soft haze. Triel had ordered the doors between here and the main cavern wedged open, and the resulting breeze kept the smoke from gathering too heavily, interfering with their effectiveness.

Her anger was complemented, however, with a fierce anticipation, an eagerness for the fray that would commence shortly. The smoke would drive the enemy out, and this corridor would turn into a storm of noise and pain and blood. She bit her lip, savoring the taste of her own blood in her mouth. Her lean, muscular body felt alive under the steel shell of her armor, and the haft of her flail felt as light as a wooden switch in her gauntleted hand.

Bane was with her; she could feel the dark power of her bond floating within her mind, awaiting only her call. Her soldiers were competent enough, if lazy and indulgent fools for the most part. She’d ordered contingents to guard both the entrance to the treasure vault and the main cavern, in case this intrusion was part of a larger assault. But thus far the reports were all negative. Skaven hadn’t reported; no doubt the intruders had chased him into the lair of his beloved spiders, and perhaps they'd finished him there. Triel wasted little concern on the diminutive mage, either way. He'd been useful enough, but of course she hadn't been foolish enough to invest him with her full trust. No one had been worthy of that gift for years... perhaps, given what she had become, never would anyone again.

A noise drew her attention to the dark tunnel, and her soldiers tensed, hefting sword or drawing bow. They would have to depart, now that the secret of this lair was compromised, and her forces already dealt heavy losses by the intruders. The fury returned, and this time Triel let it surge through her like a tidal wave, exulting in the rush of battle.

The clank of metal announced the arrival of the dwarf a moment before he burst into the passage.

Chaos ensued.

Chapter 81

Arun burst into the corridor, his shield raised high before him. Arrows shot out from the corridor to either side, propelled from the bows of the Alleybashers who stood behind the shields of Triel's armored warriors. There was a pair of fighters to each side, with another pair of rogues behind; eight mercenaries in all. Triel stood to the right, flanked by her two toughs, clad in her spiked platemail with her silver flail held aloft in both hands, dark syllables issuing from her mouth as she called upon the power of her terrible patron.

Arun, of course, headed immediately in that direction. Arrows glanced off of his shield or the heavy plates that covered his back, but the dwarf's luck held and none of the initial attacks penetrated.

The armored thugs flanking Triel rushed to block the dwarf, while the two behind him down the left branch of the passageway moved forward to assault him from behind. Before they could reach him, however, the dwarf's allies burst into the fray. A tiny form shot out of the doorway like a stone rolling down a steep hill, still trailing cobwebs behind her. As Mole came out of her roll she twisted and hurled a ceramic flask into the oncoming fighters, catching one in the chest. The alchemist's fire exploded, covering the hapless thug in a cloak of fire. His companion, a hungry-faced woman, dodged to the side as hot splashes of the burning mixture splattered on her armor. Even as the burning warrior's screams filled the corridor, the woman raised her sword and rushed at Mole. She'd barely covered two paces, however, when a long shaft slammed into her side and tore through her armor, biting deep. Dannel stepped forward out of the tunnel into the corridor, already reaching for another arrow.

Behind him came Illewyn and Zenna. The two women had already taken a beating in earlier battles, but the companions knew that none of them could afford to hang back in this struggle. Zenna saw Arun facing off against five foes to the right, including the evil priestess of Bane. Triel was invoking her patron, clearly content to let her allies withstand the initial rush from the adventurers who had invaded her lair. Behind her stood two rogues who had already reloaded their bows, and were seeking new targets. One saw her and shouted something lost in the chaos of the battle, and without hesitation drew and fired.

The long shaft sliced narrowly through the melee between Arun and the two warriors facing him, and shot straight toward Zenna's face... only to be turned at the last instant by the magical shield she'd just invoked.

Releasing the breath that had frozen in her lungs, she lifted her new wand and invoked its power.

Hot flames exploded from the wand, blasting down the corridor in a bright orange cone. The burning hands engulfed Arun, but the dwarf, protected by Illewyn's resist energy spell, paid them no heed. The two warriors, not favored with such protection, cried out as the hot fire swept over them, and Triel, just behind them, let out a nasty curse as the flames reached their furthest extent, licking at her steel armor with their fading tongues.

Illewyn was the last to emerge from the tunnel. Her heart was pounding in her chest, seemingly loud enough to drown out the surrounding sounds of the fray. Despite her training in the arts of war as part of the instruction that all initiates into the church of Helm received, she felt completely overwhelmed at the chaos that swirled around her. To her left a man who'd been transformed into a pyre continued to scream as he tried in vain to pat out the flames covering his upper body, while right in front of her, a woman with an arrow jutting from her side tried to stab at Mole, who leapt nimbly back out of the way. To her right, the dwarf paladin exchanged blows with a pair of warriors, and behind him, the evil woman in spiked plate lifted her flail and called again on her dark god's intervention. The air was filled with smoke, and Illewyn felt as though her head was going to explode as everything swam in and out of focus.

She felt a sharp pain blaze across her temple, and staggered. Reaching up, she felt the hot blood pouring down her face from the gash a scant inch above her left eye. Turning, she saw the archer—who couldn't have been more than eighteen, if that—grin evilly at the results of his shot. His companion, a near giant of a woman missing most of her teeth, was already fitting an arrow to her bow as well, and took aim at Dannel.

Indecision flooded away, replaced by the cold calm of certainty as Illewyn felt the power of her god enter her. She called upon the potency of a spell, targeting the woman archer even as she drew the fletchings of her arrow back to her cheek.

The arrow remained there, frozen, as the woman stiffed, held by the power of Illewyn's spell.

Dannel fired his second arrow of the battle into the back of the woman threatening Mole, driving her forward to collapse against the wall. Without hesitating he drew and aimed again in a blur, shifting to target the Alleybasher aiming at him. He didn't know that the woman was no longer a threat, and with her frozen in place she could not avoid the shaft that sank deeply into her shoulder, knocking her back to fall hard to the ground, paralyzed and bleeding.

The remaining young archer, his allies stripped away in a matter of moments, didn't look quite so cocky all of a sudden.

On the far side of the battle, barely ten paces away from where these events transpired, Arun exchanged blows with a pair of armored men who loomed over him like giants. The dwarf fought with a fury as if possessed by a vengeful spirit, crashing powerful blows from his hammer into his foes' shields and armored forms. One already favored his side where an impact from that sledge had already gotten through his defenses. In turn, their blows seemed to glance off of the dwarf's armor like a dull chisel on solid marble. Despite the lingering effects of the spider and ettercap poison in his veins, he fought with tenacious determination, filled with the divine favor of his patron deity, the hard and grim dwarf god Moradin.

Zenna fired a second spread of burning hands into the melee. The hot flames roared over the combatants, cooking them just a bit more in their metal armor. The already-injured one drew back, raising his arm to shield his face from the flames. That gave Arun the opening he needed to pulverize him with an upward blow that hit him in the gut. The metal bands protecting him buckled, and the fighter collapsed, trying in vain to suck in breath with his shattered diaphragm. The other fighter, his armor lined with char from the two blasts of fire, sliced at Arun with his sword, but once more caught only the dwarf's shield.

But even as the first soldier fell, Triel stepped over him and joined the fray. Bolstered by the dread power of Bane, she swung her massive flail in a powerful two-handed swing that crushed into the shoulder of Arun's weapon-arm. The dwarf, solid as he was, grunted as pain shot through his body, and it was clear that only through a considerable effort was he able to keep his grip on his hammer.

Zenna raised her wand again, but cried out as an arrow shot through her shield and sank several inches into her shoulder. Sagging against the wall, she fought to retain consciousness, holding her hand against the bloody wound.

Dannel, meanwhile, continued his exchange of fire with the Alleybasher archers. The young man who was the only one left standing on their left flank lifted an arrow and took aim at the elf, but his hands trembled and the shot sliced the air two inches from the elf's ear.

"Your mistake, to engage in an archery duel with an elf," Dannel said, calmly drawing his own bow and firing. The longbow propelled the missile in a streak that sank into the youth's body. His armor slowed its progress, but not by much. The youth sagged against the wall, but remained standing, and reached for the small sword at his belt.

"Second mistake," Dannel added, as his second shot buried to the feathers in the man's throat a few seconds later. All too aware of the desperate sounds of metal striking metal behind him, he turned just in time to see one of the archers standing behind the enemy line shoot Zenna.

Illewyn fought through the red and gray haze of blood and smoke and focused her will once more upon their enemies. Wiping blood from her eyes, she pointed at the madwoman who was pounding at Arun with her flail, and issued a command backed by the power of divine Helm.

"Flee!"

Triel merely laughed. “Your little mind tricks will not work on me, Helmite!”

Mole had not been idle during those few moments since she'd tumbled into the corridor. Her sword was already bloody, used to end the struggles of the scorched warrior as the alchemist's fire burned out. Seeing Arun and Zenna hard-pressed, she spun and sprang back across the battlefield. The corridor was cramped and crowded with armored bodies and deadly weapons sweeping in wide arcs, but she didn't hesitate, hurling herself forward and tumbling into another roll propelled by the magical properties of her new boots. She caromed off the wall like a cannonball, coming up behind the toasted warrior assaulting Arun. The soldier, no novice, realized that he'd been flanked, but considering the dwarf the greater foe, did not adjust his stance. That choice cost him, as Mole slipped the length of her sword through a gap in his armor and into his back.

The entire melee had lasted perhaps fifteen seconds, and already several enemies were down, and most of the companions had not even been hurt. The enemy leader, however, now fully immersed in the raging tide of battle, did not relent. Uttering a fierce cry of exultation, the priestess of the Black Hand swept her flail down in another punishing blow that glanced painfully off the paladin's helmet, denting the rigid metal. Arun staggered, dazed by the assault, but managed to bring his shield up enough to meet the cleric's backswing. The woman's blows were backed by an almost inhuman strength, and there was no denying her skill at arms.

But the paladin too was driven, no stranger to the fray. Calling upon the name of the Soul Forger, he unleashed an all-out strike that pounded into the evil cleric's breastplate. Triel was driven back a step, but only that, and she was quick to come forward again.

“A fine strike, paladin... but not quite good enough!”

Flames washed over them as Zenna unleashed her third spray of burning hands, targeted on the cleric. Triel stood within the flames without flinching, looking like nothing less than a terrible demon from the Abyss as the orange tongues licked around the spiked flanges of her armor. If she was discomfited by the spell, she gave no indication, continuing her efforts to destroy the dwarf paladin through brute strength.

Mole, dodging back to avoid the edges of Zenna's spell, recognized as well that the evil priestess was the greatest threat. One of the rogues had dropped his bow and came at her with his shortsword, but she ignored him to move into flanking position against the cleric. She paid for that maneuver with a shallow but painful gash along her arm from the Alleybasher, but managed a weak blow against the cleric's hip that glanced off of her armor. Enough to get her attention, certainly.

“I'll get to you in a moment, you little creeping,” the cleric's voice hissed from within the spiked helm.

Zenna lifted the wand again, determined to unleash all of its stored spells if necessary to bring this almost inhuman adversary down. But before she could call upon its power, a second arrow sliced through the crowded melee and through her defenses, glancing off of her skull just above her right ear. The tiefling fell against the wall, clinging to the cold stone, just barely hanging on to consciousness.

Dannel cursed as he missed the remaining archer, allowing the shot that crippled Zenna a heartbeat later. The elf took a step forward toward the injured woman, indecision gripping his gut like an iron fist. He reached for his wand of healing, but Illewyn was already moving, crossing to where Zenna hovered on the edges of the melee.

But then, the tide turned.

Arun growled out another challenge and swung his hammer low, crashing the heavy iron head into the evil cleric's hip. The impact had to hurt, but Triel only laughed, a manic laugh followed by action as she smashed her silver flail into the dwarf's body once, then again. The first hit knocked his shield aside and smashed his arm, while the second came down heavily onto the dwarf's chest with the force of a giant's club.

Arun was blasted back, knocked off his feet to land on his back. He struggled once, faintly, then lost consciousness.

Chapter 82

With their toughest combatant down, defeated by the insane, powerful Triel Eldurast, the already grim situation took a turn for the worse for the embattled companions.

As the woman stepped forward to stand over the body of the fallen paladin, Dannel fired another arrow at point-blank range. At that distance he could hardly miss, but the arrow turned even before it hit her heavy armor, deflected by the shield of faith that she had invoked at the start of the battle.

"My faith is strong, elf," she hissed. "Is yours?"

Zenna, still barely hanging on to consciousness, looked up at the domineering form of the enemy cleric. She had no spells left that could hurt this adversary, even if she could manage a casting in her condition. But she did not withdraw—what hope was there, to expect mercy from one such as this? She lifted the wand for one last blast of flame, but Triel saw her, and she knew that there was no chance of beating the blow from that flail that would end it. Even as the heavy weapon came up, Zenna knew that it meant her death.

But a sound drew her attention away from that grim specter, a sound both familiar and strange. The noise was Illewyn's cry as she hurled herself at the evil priestess. The lightly armored servant of Helm looked thin and fragile in contrast to her hulking, spiked foe, but as she lashed out with her mace she'd clearly caught Triel off-guard, managing a glancing blow that caromed off of her steel helm.

"Bravely done, Helmite," the evil cleric laughed. "But now it is time to die."

Triel lashed out with her flail, catching Illewyn with a merciless blow that savaged her side. The priestess cried out and staggered, but did not go down. The Banite priestess did not relent, hitting her again with a powerful overhand blow that might have taken her head off, had it connected squarely. As it was, even the glancing hit off of her metal-rimmed skullcap spun her around, blood spraying into the air as one of the flail's wicked edges tore flesh.

Zenna looked up, and saw for a single stark instant the deep brown eyes of Illewyn meeting hers as the cleric whipped around. The priestess's face was a mask of blood, but determination shone in her eyes, a commitment that Zenna remembered seeing before. The tiefling willed herself to speak, but nothing came from her lips as time seemed to slow around her.

Run... Zenna wanted to say. No, not again... She was aware of Dannel charging, dropping his bow as his sword sliced out of its scabbard, too late...

Illewyn smiled at Zenna, and stumbled back to face the cleric, invoking the power of Helm once more. His name was on her lips as the flail crashed into her face, crushing her skull.

Zenna looked up at the dark pit beyond the eyeslit of Triel's helm. "Two down," the priestess said. The cleric had taken a beating, however, and even as she turned to face Dannel's charge, she took one hand off her flail and reached into her belt pouch, withdrawing a slender wooden wand covered in magical symbols. Zenna tried to rouse herself for one last attack, but she'd lost too much blood. She found herself slipping, sliding down the wall to what would apparently be her final resting place.

Mole found herself hard-pressed indeed, unable to stop this foe that was wreaking disaster upon them. The second archer had drawn his sword and joined his companion, and now it was Mole that was flanked, caught between a wall of spiked metal in the form of Triel, and two agile rogues who knew how to take advantage. She could tumble free, she knew, and with her magical boots outdistance these foes, maybe even escape.

But she could not leave her companions behind.

Even as another sword struck home, tearing through her armor and gashing her right shoulder, she sprung clear, tumbling out of the immediate path of the darting swords. But rather than continue out of the melee, she turned and darted back in. She still held her sword, but her other hand had dug into her pouch, recovering the item she'd left there.

The gnome sprang into the air, her boots giving her enough of a boost that she easily cleared five feet above the ground. The two rogues looked up at her as she arced past them, past Triel...

And as she flew past, she slammed the flask of alchemist's fire squarely into the back of the cleric's neck.

Flames exploded in a hungry, surging blast. Mole was knocked roughly backward, her arms smoldering with fire, landing awkwardly a few feet down the passage. Fortunately for her, the two rogues were caught equally off guard, dodging back as wisps of liquid fire splashed onto their garments. Triel, however, found herself in a far more unpleasant situation.

The alchemical substance poured through the crevices in her armor, searing the evil woman's flesh mercilessly. Triel screamed, twisting her body in a vain attempt to avoid the clinging flames. She dropped her flail, but clutched onto the wand in her hand like a lifeline. The wooden shaft began to glow with a soft blue light, offering the reassuring power of healing energy.

"No, I don't think so," Dannel said, ramming his sword into her body.

Triel stiffened. The wand and its promise of life fell from her hand. She reached up and managed to pull her helmet from her head; the heavy metal fell to the ground with a clatter, revealing her once-beautiful features scorched and ruined by the flames. With her other hand she reached out and clasped the elf on the shoulder, using him to hold her standing even as blood poured out over the elf's blade embedded in her gut.

"Go... to... hell..." she muttered, and fell, lifeless, to the ground.

Chapter 83

She came in fire and blood, as she often did, a black specter that hunted her mercilessly, pursuing her until there was no place left to hide. When she finally ran her to ground, catching up to her in a dead-end corridor, there was nothing she could do as she came on, burning, that mocking laughter taunting her weakness.

Bodies where there, she saw; she hadn't noticed them before. Familiar forms with familiar faces, now broken and ruined. She couldn't turn her eyes away from them, even as death came for her. The laughter filled her as the heavy silver flail came down toward her head...

"Aaahhhh!"

Zenna shot up out of her bed, shaking, the reality of her room removing the afterimage of the dream but doing nothing to ease the feelings that lingered in its wake. It wasn't the first time, and she feared that it would not be the last.

She rose, and crossed to the bedtable and the basin there. The water was cold and brackish, but she splashed her face with it, anyway. Mole's bed was vacant, undisturbed. She crossed to the small window and looked outside.

It was quiet and dark in that way you find in most cities just before dawn. The darkness held no menace for her, but it was foreboding, nonetheless, to see the busy streets of Cauldron deserted and empty.

She crossed not to her bed, but to the chair at her desk, and sat down. She ignored the lantern; she didn't need the light. She didn't think she could get back to sleep, but neither was she ready to face the day.

The service for Illewyn was today. She knew that she would have to go, but at the same time felt a dread at the prospect of confronting what had happened anew. She knew that she would face anger, even hatred; Morgan had flown into a rage when they'd first returned, and Zenna suspected that only Jenya's intervention had avoided a violent confrontation. She would have thought that they all would have had enough violence, with all that had happened...

They had been victorious again, but again the cost had been high. Zenna hadn't fallen apart this time as she had when Ruphos had died at the hands of Kazmojen, but the feelings were there, returning like a hated enemy thought forever gone only to return when you were least able to face him.

Her thoughts drifted back inevitably to the chaos of that day. She hadn't been conscious to witness the end of the battle with Triel and her minions, but Mole had filled in the details later. The death of their leader had stolen what will to fight had remained among the Alleybashers, who had beat a hasty retreat rather than remain to face Mole and Dannel. Dannel had expended the last of the energy of his healing wand restoring Zenna and Arun to consciousness, but there was nothing that he could have done for Illewyn. Mercifully the elf had quickly covered the ruined face of the cleric, but Zenna knew that the image would be burned into her memory for the remainder of her life. Even Arun seemed solemn, taking up the body of the priestess and they gathered their gear and departed the still nameless ruins under the city for the wind and the rain above.

Bruised and battered, covered with blood and grime, they had reported directly to Jenya, bearing their ill news and equally unpleasant burden. They'd found three of the wands of control water on the body of the evil priestess, along with a variety of other devices that responded positively to Zenna's detect magic spell. They were in no condition to return to the lava tube and the underground complex, however, so instead they returned to the Drunken Morkoth after turning the wands over to Jenya.

The next day, refreshed in body if not in mind, they returned to the Temple of Helm, only to find that the task they had begun had been completed by another. In the interval since their return, the news of what had happened had spread swiftly. Zenna had her suspicions about that, as she'd caught a glimpse of Morgan in the courtyard outside the cathedral, afterward, his look both smug and anguished with a dash of hatred that radiated out from him like a sickly stench. Jenya told them that the mayor had directly intervened, and had sent a patrol of armed mercenaries along with a group of local adventurers into the caverns that evening, to cleanse the place and find the rest of the wands.

Even before the High Priestess had told them the name of the adventuring company, Zenna had known instinctively who it was. Arun had been rather... disgruntled... at the news, she recalled.

The Stormblades and the mercenaries had found the complex mostly deserted, which didn't surprise Zenna. There was no sign of the remaining bandits, nor did they encounter the halfling mage who'd given the companions such trouble. They did find some undead creatures within a natural warren of tunnels and caverns in the farthest edges of the complex, including a terrible entity that had once been a gnoll. Several of the mercenaries were killed by this monstrosity, but the Stormblades emerged victorious with several more of the wands and a considerable haul of treasure. When told the rough amount of the find, which ran to thousands of gold and other coins, Mole had lamented, "But that's our loot!" But the Stormblades had been quite canny, donating a considerable share of the treasure to the city, and so no one in positions of authority had raised any concerns about that resolution. Somehow the noble adventurers also managed to collect most of the credit for recovering the wands, even though they'd only found two to the companions' three.

Zenna sighed. She didn't mind that, although Dannel and Mole had been quite indignant. She didn't want accolades, or fame. What do you want? came a niggling thought in the back of her mind.

She looked at the window, where the faintest hints of dawn were just becoming visible.

At the moment, she just wished that she could get some sleep.

THE END OF "FLOOD SEASON"

The Shackled City III: "Zenith Trajectory"
Begun 10-5-03

Chapter 84

"Blast it!" Zenna said, leaning back from the desk against the plushly padded cushions of the weathered oak chair.

"Difficulty?" Dannel asked, from his perch in the cozy windowbox across the room.

The two adventurers were in the comfortable surroundings of Esbar Tolerathkas's study, in one of the more rarified neighborhoods of the city of Cauldron. The arcanist was not present, having departed on an extended visit to the city of Almraiven, but he'd allowed Zenna the use of his rented home during his absence, in exchange for keeping an eye on the place. Given the breadth of the man's library, and the facilities in his workroom, Zenna considered herself much the better for the exchange, and had spent a lot of time here in the last tenday.

She glanced over at the elf, who was holding both his silver flute and a small notebook balanced expertly in his lap. Dannel's relationship with the devotee of Azuth remained somewhat murky to her. Clearly the two were friends; and Dannel had all but told her that Esbar had set him to keep an eye on her. Whatever his motives, Dannel had proven himself repeatedly to be a boon companion, aiding them first against the brigands that had seized the Lucky Monkey, and again in the dark tunnels under the city where the cult led by Triel Eldurast had been based.

Zenna let out a sigh and pushed the parchment she'd been working on away. The scroll was covered with arcane formulas and notes in the quixotic language of magic, and while there was no actual spell scribed upon it, to one familiar with the Art it would hold an air of mystery and power.

“Just frustrated, I guess,” she said. “I feel like I’m stuck in a rut. I’ve mastered a number of spells... a great number, if you consider the power that Esbar’s meditative techniques have opened to me. But all fall within the lowest valences of magical power; for all my work, the more potent works may as well be in Netherese for all I can make of them.”

“They will come,” Dannel said simply. “Consider the progress you’ve made since arriving in Cauldron—how long has it been, a month, in total? I know mages who took years to get where you are now.”

Zenna nodded, but she didn’t look convinced, and her eyes stole back to the scroll.

“I don’t see why you are so preoccupied with power, anyway,” Dannel went on, closing his book and leaning back against the weathered wooden boards that framed the broad windows. “There’s much more to life, you know.”

Zenna’s gaze snapped back to the elf, and she said sharply, “I know that,” she said. “But it’s a fact of life in Faerûn, in case you haven’t noticed, that power is a necessity to survival. Life is hard, dangerous, and unforgiving to those who lack talent or dedication to improving themselves. Even if I wanted to forget that, what’s happened since I arrived in Cauldron has only served to drive that lesson home.”

Dannel regarded her with an expression that wasn’t quite pity—he knew her well enough to know that such would only fuel her rage. Instead, he nodded. “What you say is true. But it’s also true that life is beautiful, and wondrous, and full of mysteries that tickle the soul and challenge the spirit.”

And he lifted his flute to his lips, playing a soft tune that floated across the room, hanging in the air. Zenna had heard him play a number of times, but this melody was unfamiliar, evocative of joyous homecomings and the promise of friendships both old and new. Despite an unwillingness to let her guard down the song crept into her and softened her anger, awakening memories that she’d struggled to forget, of a home she had denied and people she’d cared about... but who had abandoned her. Those memories always left her with a bittersweet feeling, and uncertainties that she preferred not to revisit. Still, when the song ended, she felt as though a weight had been lifted from her, and she turned away, not wanting the elf to see how deeply she’d been affected.

Dannel complied in this little deception, making a show of gathering up his possessions, uncoupling the flute into its component pieces before sliding it back into its sheath. “We’d best be on our way,” he said. “We’ll be late for our meeting with Mole and Arun.”

He took up his longbow from its perch leaning into the adjacent corner, and rose. She watched him, still trying to sort out her own feelings. As he crossed to where she stood, near the exit to the landing that led downstairs, she said, “It’s too bad that life isn’t always like a song.”

He turned, and without warning, leaned in and kissed her.

Completely surprised, Zenna felt a million emotions warring with the immediate sensation of the elf's lips pressed against her, his arm firm against her side as he pulled her to him. At the same time she was indignant, shocked, amused, excited. Before she could decide how to react, it was over. He drew back, unapologetic, that familiar twinkle in his eye that she found both endearing and infuriating.

She opened her mouth to speak, but couldn't settle on what to say, and nothing came out. She suddenly felt very self-conscious, and snapped her mouth shut, feeling awkward under his scrutiny.

"Well," she finally said.

"Well," he echoed, with a smile that demanded nothing, but also promised nothing. "We'd better get going, the others will be waiting for us."

And with that, he turned and left, waiting at the landing until she started to follow.

Chapter 85

"Sheesh, this place is depressing," Mole said. "Why spend so much time here, when there's a whole wide world full of interesting things just outside that door?"

Arun's only reply was a grunt, as he scooped up the remaining swaths of gravy from his plate with the heel of his biscuit. The dwarf was clad in a simple wool mantle, looking a bit out of place without the familiar presence of his steel armor about his frame. His hammer was at its accustomed place at his side, however.

"You know what? You're just a big grumpus," Mole said. Arun lifted an eyebrow but didn't respond to the bait, so Mole spun around on the bench and faced out into the room.

There wasn't much to see. The dwarven tavern, situated below the surface of the street outside, was plain and functional, with massive wooden beams supporting the low ceiling. The place was virtually empty, with only a pair of dwarven craftsmen over by the hearth and the tavernmaster behind the polished wooden bar, cleaning massive crockery mugs nearly as thick about as the gnome's body.

"Now that you're done, we'd better get going," Mole said, glancing over her shoulder at Arun. "Shouldn't keep the others waiting, especially since this errand is for your benefit."

She turned back and so didn't see Arun's reaction, if there was any. But she smiled to herself—she enjoyed baiting the dwarf, but at the same time thought warmly of the old curmudgeon. After all, she owed him her life.

The door to the steep stairwell leading up to the street opened, and a trio of dwarves entered the tavern. By their finery—neat but functional, like the tavern itself—they were likely merchants, gold dwarves by the deep earthen tone of their skin. Unlike Arun, all wore long, rich beards, that of the oldest streaked through with silver, and tied with a dozen small golden bells that tinkled slightly with his movements. The elder merchant's eyes scanned the common room with approval before alighting upon the table where Mole and Arun sat.

"I thought this were a dwarven tavern," the merchant spat, in thickly accented Common.

Mole leaned back against the table. "Oh, my mother was half-dwarven," she chimed, sounding utterly credible despite the contrary evidence offered by her appearance.

The old gold dwarf regarded her doubtfully, but finally turned away and started toward the bar. "Dwarven ale," he said in his own tongue, pulling off leather gloves and slapping them down on a vacant table. "The strong stuff. Tis been a long road, and we could use a taste o' home."

The bartender nodded and started filling steins. One of the old merchant's companions had unslung his pack at the table chosen by the leader, but the other lingered a moment, staring at Arun with cold, beady eyes.

"Been livin' among humans long... takin' their likin' to the razor then?" he queried, his words thick, as though he chewed each one off a bit before spitting it out.

Arun met his gaze squarely. Though he didn't reply, his eyes were like cold iron, and when Mole glanced back, she saw that his hands were tight against the edge of the table, as though hanging on for dear life.

Sensing a difficult situation, Mole naturally decided to intervene.

"Welcome to Cauldron!" she said expansively, popping up and crossing to the dwarf, offering her hand. "I think you'll find the hospitality here much to your liking... there's something for everyone here!"

The dwarf ignored her, still staring at Arun. "Be that I know ye?" he growled. "Yer of the Rift, that's no doubt. Southern spur, the Electrum Deeps?"

Arun stood, the bench scraping back loudly against the floor. "Nay," he said. "Must have me mistaken for someone else, friend." He took up his hammer, and started around the table in the general direction of the door.

The dwarf merchant's companions came over to join him. "No, I be certain, now," he said. "Tough to be forgettin' the likes o' you, ye beardless coward."

Arun stopped as if poleaxed, his mouth tightening in barely suppressed rage.

Mole, who did not speak dwarven, did not understand what was being said, but she could read the tension that had gotten thick enough to cut with a knife. "Um... perhaps we'll just be going..." she hazarded.

But the dwarf merchant was having none of it, and in fact was clearly getting as angry as Arun. "Yer still gots the temerity to be wearin' that symbol, then?" he said, gesturing curtly at the icon splayed across the paladin's chest—the hammer and anvil of Moradin, the chief deity of the dwarven pantheon.

The merchant's companions looked at their friend curiously. He reported, "This be Arun Goldenshield," he spat.

The old merchant nodded, the movement causing the bells in his beard to tinkle slightly. "Ah. I heard about the troubles in the Deeps." His eyes were sad, a contrast to the anger in those of his younger companion.

"I have no quarrel with you," Arun said, starting once more toward the door. Mole, familiar with the dwarf's mannerisms, could see that each step came only with difficulty, and she could sense the conflict within her friend.

The young merchant stepped before him, blocking his way. "Yes, flee, coward," he said. "And stay out of this place. This be a tavern for dwarves."

Arun did not respond, but Mole stepped forward, indignant. "Look, fella, I don't know what your problem is, but you should show at least a little respect. Arun is a great hero, a paladin of your head-honcho forger god, and he's slain many evil foes—I know, I was there. So lay off, eh?"

The dwarf merchant turned to her. "Your 'friend' should have told you the full story, seems like," he said, his Chondanthan accented but understandable. "Did he tell ye, that he's an exile, driven out from his people, never to return on pain of death? That his cowardice allowed enemies of the gold dwarven people to walk free, to threaten our wives and our children?"

Mole looked at Arun, whose face was a stone slate. "I trust my friend, and whatever he did, I know he had a good reason," she said with conviction.

"Bah," the merchant retorted. "He'll fit in well with you surfacers, with your weak stomachs and 'tolerant' ways. Get out of my sight... unless you want to do something about it, coward?"

For a moment Mole hoped that Arun would; she wanted to see this smug jerk taught some manners. The gray-bearded dwarf was hanging back, with that sad look still on his face, but the other young one—he seemed barely an adult, by the look of him—looked equally eager for a bit of trouble.

But Arun only turned away, and the dwarf laughed.

That was it for Mole. She stepped forward to confront the rude dwarf directly. Even though he was short even for his kind, he was broad, and muscular—easily several times Mole's weight, no doubt. He met her approach with a look of derision.

"Well? Get out, I said."

Mole responded with a single lengthy sentence. While she didn't speak dwarven, she'd picked up a few of its more creative curses, and in the sentence, she managed to insult the dwarf, his family, several of his more distant ancestors (one of whom, by implication, had apparently been a goblin), and finally that part of him about which most males are rather protective.

The dwarf responded rather predictably by flying into a rage, and reached out to grab the gnome with his thick, muscled fingers. His intent was clear in the look of fury blazed across his face.

His fingers closed upon empty air, however, as Mole darted forward under his reach, coming up alongside his left hip. She'd drawn a leather purse from the pouch at her belt—jangling with the weight of numerous coins—and as she passed the dwarf she smoothly spun and slammed the improvised bludgeon into the dwarf's side. The impact, hitting the dwarf off-guard, drew a grunt of pain from the merchant, who staggered awkwardly to the side. Already off balance due to his lunge, he stumbled and went down.

The dwarf's young companion came forward to help, but Mole suddenly sprung into the air, her magical boots carrying her up almost to the level of the rafters above. As the dwarf looked up at her with an almost comical look of surprise on his face, the gnome's boot shot out, catching him squarely across the bridge of his nose. The dwarf stumbled back and likewise fell, blood pouring from the broken appendage.

The old dwarf stood his ground, refusing to get involved. But the first dwarf, the one that she'd struck with the purse, was already getting back to his feet, and even as Mole heard him and turned to face him, he drew out a handaxe from his belt. The elder dwarf saw him and shouted something in dwarvish, but the younger merchant, his ego and body both bruised, his rage unslaked and demanding satisfaction, hurtled forward, the axe coming up threateningly.

But it was arrested as Arun stepped in, and captured the merchant's wrist in an iron grip.

"Enough," he said. The dwarf struggled for a moment, but then his eyes met the paladin's, and he saw something there that gave him pause. He shuddered, then nodded. The old man took him into custody and the two groups of combatants drew apart, each wary of the other.

"I think it's time that we left this place," Arun said, turning wearily and starting toward the stairs. Mole followed—after pausing to stick her tongue out at the fiery-tempered young dwarf merchant.

Chapter 86

Magma Avenue was fairly crowded on this morning, with dozens of Cauldronites taking advantage of the break in the storms of the last few tendays to catch up on errands and just general meandering out of doors. The sky above was a stark blue in between the scattered clouds, although the chill in the air sufficed to remind everyone that yes, it was still winter. Clouds hung in denser clusters over the mountains that overshadowed the city to the east, a further reminder that the city would likely be facing more inclement weather before too long. But with the churches of the city equipped with the wands of control water recovered from the clutches of Triel Eldurast and her co-conspirators, the terror of flooding had been eased, at least for this season.

“That wasn’t necessary,” Arun said, as the gnome and dwarf made their way through the crowds. Magma Avenue was a fairly busy shopping district, and it seemed as though the residents of the city wanted to get a month’s worth of purchasing and selling into this one clear morning.

“Well, I was starting to get worried that I’d spend my entire stay in Cauldron without participating in a barroom brawl,” Mole said idly, drawing a harrumph that might have been amusement from the paladin.

They walked on in silence for a bit, then Mole asked, “Do you want to talk about it?”

Arun didn’t respond for several paces, and Mole didn’t push him. But finally he said, “It’s true what he said—I am a coward, at least by the traditions and laws of my people.”

“I can’t believe that,” she said earnestly. “If anything, you’re a bit too brave, a little crazy, even.”

Arun’s mouth cracked a smile, but it wasn’t in his voice as he continued. “I was accepted into the Order of the Hammer at a relatively young age,” he said. “I volunteered for pioneer duty—the cadres that scout the outermost tunnels, searching for threats.”

“One time there was an incursion by a tribe of goblins—almost a thousand of them—that had made their way up from the Underdark. They weren’t looking for trouble, were probably running from something bigger and meaner than they were. Which is mostly everything, in the Underdark.”

The dwarf paused as he looked off into the distance, seeing memories revisited in his thoughts. When he continued, there was a grimness in his tone. “I fought in a few skirmishes, and got separated from my patrol. I found myself in a side tunnel—cramped, but quiet. I was making my way back to one of the main tunnels when I came across a small cavern.”

“The place was crowded with goblins. Women, children... all noncombatants. The males were all off fighting off my kin, not that they would last long against battle-hardened dwarves. There must have been a hundred in that place. There was no way out, except through me.”

Mole looked up at him. “I thought your paladin code was pretty straightforward about such things; defenseless enemies and such.”

“Among humans, perhaps. Not among dwarves. A child goblin is still a goblin, who will grow up to become a goblin adult... evil and corrupted.”

“So what did you do?” Mole asked, though she thought she already knew the answer.

“I let them go,” he said.

“And your kin weren’t happy when they found out about it,” Mole said.

“No,” Arun said. “I submitted myself for judgment to the elders of our community. There were a few that were sympathetic to my plight, but there was little that they could do, given my oaths and the direct contravention of our laws. I was given a choice: I could be stripped of my station and my perquisites, including the right to bear arms and the right to pass on my family name, and live out my life as a miner or other unskilled laborer. Or I could accept exile.”

“It couldn’t have been an easy decision.”

“No, it was not.”

“Well... I know my opinion doesn’t count for a whole lot, but I think you’re the most honorable man I’ve ever met.”

The dwarf looked down at the gnome. “Thank you. And I think your opinion is more valuable than you give credit for.”

Mole smiled, then caught sight of something ahead through the crowd, further down the street. “Oh look, there’s Zenna and Dannel. I wonder if they’ve had as much excitement as we have, this morning.”

Mole whistled loudly, then waved as Dannel turned in their direction. Zenna seemed distracted, but that wasn’t an unusual state for her. Head in the clouds, that girl, Mole thought idly.

The two groups started toward each other, but Mole paused abruptly, a frown creasing her expression.

“Do you hear that?” she asked Arun. The dwarf looked around, curious. “What?”

“A rumbling... under the surface of the street...”

That was all the warning that they had, as a building along the north side of the street suddenly erupted in a shower of earth and stone, spraying shards of shattered brick out into the crowd. People started screaming and running even before a massive form took shape out of the cloud of pulverized dust and dirt that billowed out over the wreckage of what had, until moments ago, been the front of a non-descript warehouse.

It resembled a huge bug, although it stood upright, with a hard, chitinous shell covering its alien, multi-segmented form. Massive mandibles snapped experimentally at the air as it emerged from the cloud of debris, and it grasped onto the rough edges of the wall with powerful claws, tearing down more of the structure of the warehouse down around it as it drew itself up out of the tunnel it had burrowed up from somewhere below the city.

“Oh, dear,” Mole said, reaching for her crossbow.

Chapter 87

The street scene erupted into chaos as an umber hulk made a sudden appearance, tearing apart the front of a warehouse upon Magma Avenue.

The companions, no strangers to unexpected danger, were quick to react. Arun, of course, immediately charged, despite the fact that he was unarmored. Even without his second skin of steel, his booted feet pounded loudly on the cobbles of the street, and as he unlimbered his heavy warhammer, he made an impressive sight as he charged across the street toward the lumbering hulk.

Even as the dwarf charged forward into battle, Dannel strung his bow and drew a long steel-tipped shaft from his quiver. In a single smooth motion he drew, aimed, and released. The arrow sliced through the air a mere handspan above the heads of the fleeing townsfolk, clipping the umber hulk on the back of its armored skull. The arrow glanced off of the hard chitin that comprised its shell, but clearly the creature had felt it, as it spun ponderously about, staring out into the street with bulbous, multifaced eyes.

Mole unlimbered and loaded her crossbow with quick efficiency. But as she lifted the weapon to aim, she met the creature’s potent gaze. Suddenly, she couldn’t remember what she was doing here... oh, the sky was such a pretty color today! People were screaming all around her, and that sounded fun, so she started screaming too! Such great fun!

Zenna cursed inwardly—it hadn’t occurred to her to bring her own crossbow, not for a mere jaunt out into the city. She searched her mind for a spell that might be useful against such a monstrosity, but doubted that a mere command would have any effect on such a beast. Then she heard Mole’s screams over the noise of the crowd, and without hesitation headed in that direction.

“Zenna... wait!” Dannel shouted, uselessly.

Arun felt a wash of conflicting thoughts rush over him as he met the uncanny stare of the creature, but he shrugged off the confusion as he focused on this latest in the series of deadly adversaries that he’d confronted. The monster saw him coming, the sole individual on the street interested in approaching rather than fleeing, but it ignored him and instead started widening the hole it had made in the front wall of the warehouse, ripping boards from the building’s frame as though they were paper, and toppling most of the rest of the structure’s façade out into the street. The roof above groaned as its supports gave way, and it sagged awkwardly, likely only moments away from a collapse.

Arun let out a roar as he surged into the creature from behind, driving his hammer into its armored back. The strike barely seemed to faze the umber hulk, but the dwarf had finally gotten its attention, as it spun and lashed out at him with its massive claws. Arun paid the price for rushing into melee without the protection of his armor, as the claws that so easily penetrated wood and stone ripped deep gashes in his torso. Through a haze of pain, the dwarf saw the hulk's head dart down, its mandibles snapping to take his head from his shoulders. The dwarf lurched backward just in time to avoid the unpleasant fate of decapitation, but could not fully avoid the jaws as one ridged mandible sliced along the side of his skull, drawing a red line that laid open his head to the bone.

Somehow the dwarf remained standing, but as blood fountained down his head and over his savaged body, it was clear that he was just about finished. A second arrow from Dannel sliced past, narrowly missing the hulk. The need to avoid hitting his friend had forced the elf to be conservative in his aim, and this time it had cost him.

Zenna pushed her way through a screaming crowd of people—most focused simply on exiting the immediate area, but some staggered about as if dazed, and she saw one man inexplicably beating on another with furious if mostly inaccurate blows, while his target just stood there, yelling something incoherent.

Madness...

She pushed past a pair of brightly dressed women who had the look of noble folk about them, and saw Mole. Her friend was just standing there, her loaded crossbow held limply at her side, a strange look on her face.

"Mole!" Zenna said, rushing toward her friend.

Mole looked up, smiled...

...raised her crossbow until the bolt was level with Zenna's chest, and fired.

Chapter 88

Arun quickly realized that facing the umber hulk head-on was only going to result in his rather messy demise. He staggered back, opening his mind to the divine power of Moradin, letting the healing energy of his bond to his patron surge through him, easing the pain of his injuries.

He underestimated the hulk's reach, however, as one of its gangly but powerful arms shot out, catching him across the face with a blow that knocked him roughly back into the rubble. Arun slumped down, blood oozing from the fresh cuts across his face.

The hulk let out a shriek as Dannel finally scored a solid hit, his arrow sinking deeply into one of the gaps in its armored shell where its limbs met its body. The creature turned again and with amazing speed burrowed back down into the ground, stirring up a cloud of dirt and dust that hung in the air briefly as it vanished from view.

Zenna twisted her body abruptly to the side, but Mole's bolt still sliced across her chest, tearing through her clothes and flesh before glancing off her breastbone. The impact, oblique though it was, still felt like she'd been punched in the chest by an ogre.

She looked down at Mole, and saw that the gnome had drawn her sword, and was spinning around, chanting something incoherent. She could hear the roars of the creature as well, and knew that Arun and Dannel would likely be needing her help right about now.

“Flee!” Zenna commanded. Obediently, Mole abruptly ceased what she was doing, and turned and ran, still screaming.

She’s probably the smart one, Zenna thought, before turning back to the battle—just in time to see Arun go down and the creature burrow back under the street.

It was immediately clear that the hulk wasn’t departing the scene, as the sidewalk in front of the ruined warehouse suddenly lurched and snapped, forming a jagged peak a few feet high. That pattern repeated itself as a wave of rising cobbles broke across the street, forming a corridor that clearly indicated the hulk’s progress underground. It was heading for the building across and a short distance up the street, right toward where Dannel was helping a few confused citizens get free of the area...

“Look out!” Zenna warned, and he nodded—he’d seen it coming as well. Not surprisingly, he kept on right what he was doing, even as the ridge of displaced street cobbles drew nearer to his position.

Zenna rushed over to where Arun sat bleeding up against a pile of rubble that had been the southeast corner of the warehouse a few minutes earlier. Bits of debris continued to sift down through the destruction, though thankfully the rest of the roof over this part of the building still held, sagging over them threateningly.

The dwarf opened his eyes as she knelt beside him. His face was a wreck, and a ghastly cut along the side of his head continued to ooze blood.

“Blasted bug,” Arun managed to mutter, blood dripping from his torn lips as they moved.

“You crazy dwarf,” she said, opening her mind to the power that she accessed through her meditations and unlocking of the mysteries that Esbar had opened for her. She felt it surge through her like a crashing wave, channeled from some other realm, through her, into the dwarf. The blue glow spread from her fingers into his wounds, undoing some of the damage. Stirring, the dwarf returned more fully to consciousness, though he was still grievously wounded.

The first thing he did was start looking around for his hammer, and tried to get up, his battered body still awkward and resistant to his mind’s commands.

“Hold still a moment,” Zenna tisked. “You’ll do no one any good if you rush back into battle, only to get knocked back down again.” She pressed a vial from her pouch into the dwarf’s bloody hand, and as the dwarf lifted it to his lips, Zenna continued to pour healing energy into him.

“You’re hurt too,” the dwarf said, looking much better as the combined flows of healing power restored much of his vigor. He was steady now as he lifted himself up, shaking off fat droplets of blood from his sodden and shredded clothing, bending to recover his hammer from where it had fallen a few paces away.

“You won’t stand a chance without your armor,” Zenna said, ignoring his remark even though the gash in her chest blazed like fire. “Hold on just another few seconds.”

“That thing’s back again!” Arun protested, and Zenna could hear it too; a loud crash from across the street. The trail of dislodged street made by the hulk’s passage ran under a building about forty feet down and across the roadway, a single-story edifice equipped with brick facings, overhanging eaves, and heavy wooden shutters drawn across the half-dozen or so windows that she could see. She and Dannel had been walking in front of the place when this started; it was a moneychanger’s or some similar business.

Her guess was confirmed as they heard another crash, accompanied by the jingling sound of metal that carried quite clearly even over the chaos of the street. The street was mostly deserted by now, with a few stragglers still affected by the hulk’s confusion. Dannel was helping a few of them get their bearings and get clear of the moneychanger’s house, where no doubt the hulk was wreaking destruction inside.

Arun looked positively antsy as he waited impatiently for Zenna. The wizardess ignored him as she called one last time on the repository of divine power she accessed through her mind, channeling the power of Azuth into a protective field of mage armor that she laid upon the dwarf. She’d never cast the spell on another, but as the protective glow settled in upon him, fading quickly into invisibility, she felt a brief surge of elation.

“All right, go,” she said. The dwarf nodded and was gone, charging across the street, looking like nothing more than a madman charging toward the battle in his tattered clothes tainted with his own blood and dirty with stone dust and caked earth. She felt a momentary surge of fear as she looked across the street and couldn’t see Dannel, but then caught sight of him coming around the corner of the building, his bow loaded and ready in his hands. Apparently the chaos had finally drawn other attention, as well, as she saw several armed guardsmen carrying halberds making their way up the street toward their location.

She glanced down the street, but Mole was nowhere in sight. Sighing, she drew out her wand of burning hands and started after Arun.

The elf and dwarf were both converging on the side of the building facing the street when a series of loud noises issued from within, sounding as though the world itself was being torn asunder. The front of the moneychanger’s shop literally erupted, bricks and wooden planks alike showering out into the street, along with a smattering of silver and golden coins. Through the opening stepped the umber hulk, clearly ready for more battle.

Chapter 89

Hey! You’re running the wrong way, girl!

The little voice in Mole’s head drew her up short, and she stopped running, looking around the street in confusion. There were a few people around her, all moving in the same direction that she had just been, but none of them seemed particularly interested in stopping to explain to her what was going on.

There was a battle, that... thing appeared, then...

Everything after that was a jumble, confused memories that seemed quite unlikely now. A particularly disturbing image leapt into her mind, of her shooting her best friend with her crossbow. She looked down, but her bow was gone, and her sword was missing from its scabbard. Did she throw her weapons away? She couldn't remember... but it was clear, from the noises of destruction coming down the street, that some bad business was still going on down there.

And her friends were probably right in the middle of it...

Grimly she started running back down the street, her magical boots carrying her in long strides back into the fray.

* * * * *

“Don't look directly at it... avoid its gaze!” Dannel cried in warning, as he and Arun—reinforced now by a quartet of city guardsmen—reengaged the rampaging umber hulk. The creature turned from its dismantling of the moneychanger's shop to face these interlopers that would interfere with its swath of destruction. The guardsmen were burly, muscular half-orcs, part of the cadre that the mayor had recently recruited to bolster the armed forces of the city in light of the recent disasters facing Cauldron. Two of the four guards heeded the elf's warning, averting their eyes in time, but the other two looked into the creature's multifaced orbs as its gaze swept over them. One screamed and leapt at the creature, sweeping with its halberd, while the second lowered his weapon and just stood there, a vacant look on his face.

Arun didn't look away either. “How am I supposed to bash it, if I cannot see it!” he shouted to Dannel, leaping forward to join the guardsmen in engaging the hostile creature. Its gaze swept over him again, but once more he fought off the deluge of confusing thoughts and images that threatened to temporarily unhinge his sanity.

The first guardsman, driven into a rage by the effects of the umber hulk's gaze, lunged at the creature, bringing down its halberd in an overhand chopping motion. The polearm managed to cut a shallow gash in the creature's shoulder, but the guardsman had little time to revel in his achievement as the hulk swept out one arm, grabbed the guard in its claw, and pulled him bodily up to its snapping jaws. The guard had just barely enough time to scream before the mandibles sank into the sides of his head, squashing his skull like an overripe melon.

“Die, bug!” Arun cried, leaping at the hulk from the side. The umber hulk almost casually swept out its other arm, forcing Arun to dodge to the side. Even with the protection of Zenna's mage armor, its claw dug heavily into the dwarf's side, knocking him roughly aside.

The creature let out a terrible keening howl as another arrow from Dannel's bow sank into its body, piercing its thick armor and digging into the meaty flesh underneath. The elf had taken up position in a wagon left empty and unattended by its owner in the street in front of the shattered shop, and was firing arrows as quickly as he could lift them to his bowstring over the heads of his allies battling the creature.

The two remaining guards—aside from the one standing confused—poked at the creature with their halberds, trying to keep their eyes averted from its dangerous gaze while striking at its body. Not surprisingly, their attacks were ineffective.

Zenna was rushing across the street toward the battle when a faint sound over the din of combat brought her attention around. It sounded like a child's crying, and it took her a moment to determine the source: a third-story window of the inn across the street from the moneychanger's shop. Her eyes widened as she saw that the crying was from an infant child, half-wrapped in swaddling, balanced precariously on the windowsill overlooking the street, a good twenty feet below.

Caught by indecision, she glanced back at the ruined front of the shop, where the hulk was wreaking havoc upon the defenders, then up again at the struggling child.

Then, suddenly, the child slipped from the ledge and started to fall toward certain death below.

The hulk lashed out with its claws, striking both of the guards menacing it. Both men went down, one with its face now a ruin of deep gashes, the second knocked roughly into his confused comrade, sending both to the ground in a jumble of arms and legs and blood. The hulk did not have time to follow up on its triumph, however, as another arrow slammed into it just below its jaws, releasing a jet of blood as it sank deeply into its body.

The hulk screeched and crouched low, digging once more into the ground, but before it could disappear from sight again Arun charged into it from the side.

"Not again, beastie!" he cried, and brought his hammer down in a powerful two-handed stroke that landed squarely atop the umber hulk's head.

With a sick squash, the creature shuddered... and fell limp.

As the baby started to plummet, Zenna reached out desperately with her mind. The words of the spell flowed instinctively from her lips, and she focused on a dangling awning that fronted the display window of the bakery located in the front of the inn. The awning billowed out, filling with air as it stretched out over the cobbles of the street below. The baby impacted a moment later, landing in the middle of the awning like a stone dropped onto a down pillow. The baby's weight quickly dragged it down, but before it could fall from the awning Zenna was there, catching the child as it rolled from the awning into her waiting grasp.

The baby squirmed in her grasp as she looked back across the street. The child was ugly, with thick limbs and a pudgy nose. Dannel caught her eye and nodded, offering a reassuring wave. The ruined front of the moneychanger's shop had grown quiet, but she could see Arun doing something within the rubble, with no sign of the hulk. Then she caught movement out of the corner of her eye, and saw Mole rushing up the street toward them.

She skidded to a halt in front of the ruined shop, looking at each of the companions in turn.

“So, what’d I miss?”

Chapter 90

“A representative of the Lord Mayor’s office will be in touch with you, probably tomorrow, if there’s anything else,” the guard sergeant said, in a tone that was friendly but with a manner that was all business.

A few people were coming back out onto the street, curiosity overcoming their earlier terror. It was remarkable that more people hadn’t been killed, Zenna remarked, as she surveyed the swath of destruction wrought by the umber hulk. The only death had been the mercenary guard whose head had been shredded by the hulk like a melon dropped into a harvester. Several of the other guards had been seriously injured, but the quick intervention of Zenna, drawing upon the power of Azuth, had saved their lives. Fortunately no one had been inside either the warehouse or the moneychanger’s shop when the attack had come, or the death toll might have been higher.

“Thank you, sergeant,” Dannel said. The man nodded, and turned back toward the excavation that was ongoing in the rubble of the moneychanger’s shop. About two dozen town guards were present, a mixture of the mostly-human veterans and the new half-orc mercenaries recently hired by the Mayor. The latter had sullen, hard looks about them, and they watched the gathered pedestrians as if expecting any or all of them to initiate an assault.

There were also four gnomes in the investigation group, two men and two women clad in functional robes of blue trimmed with white, marked with the seal of the city. Those four were obviously arcanists of some sort; Zenna had noticed several casting spells, mostly minor divinations as they scanned the scene for clues.

Arun stood with his arms crossed before his chest, his face a thunderhead, his body covered in blood and the tattered remnants of his clothes. He’d gotten an extra cloak from somewhere, obviously sized for a human, but paid it little heed as his dark eyes penetrated the scene.

“I don’t like it,” he said.

“What... the fact that a creature like this suddenly appeared in the middle of the city, or that we just happened to be here when it happened?” Dannel asked.

“Please,” Zenna said. “It’s not like anyone knew that we would be here today. Paranoia’s all well and good, but let’s not get excessive here.”

They turned as Mole suddenly appeared beside them, materializing out of the crowd along the street. “The warehouse and moneychanger’s shop were both owned by a guy named Maavu,” she said. “Merchant guy, very wealthy, wasn’t able to find out more, yet.”

“Perhaps this guy Maavu made a few enemies,” Dannel suggested.

“Perhaps,” Zenna replied. “In any case, standing around here’s not going to yield any answers. Let’s finish our errand, get Arun’s new armor, and head back to the Morkoth. I think we could all use a break, after... this.”

* * * * *

“So, any word?” Zenna asked.

The common room of the Drunken Morkoth was starting to get busy, with patrons continuing to issue into the place through the main doors outside. Outside the windows the city was cloaked in blackness, broken occasionally by the winking flames of streetlamps. With the weather as cold as it was, few people remained out on the streets at this hour, and those that were moved quickly, intent on reaching a destination somewhere around a roaring fire.

Zenna, Mole, and Arun occupied a semi-private booth in the rear of the common room, near one of the doors that led out onto the rear courtyard. Zenna and Mole, who lived in one of the guest rooms over the long building that abutted the back of the inn, had taken semi-permanent claim over this spot, which offered a good view of the near-constant activity of the common room while lending them a modicum of privacy.

“Maavu’s involved in a number of business ventures throughout the city,” Mole reported. “He owned half the buildings along that stretch of Magma Avenue, where the attack occurred. And get this—it’s just a rumor, but I heard it from several unrelated sources: the word about the city is that he left town in a big hurry this evening, riding a horse that had clouds for hooves.”

“Now, that’s pretty unusual,” Zenna noted.

Mole nodded in agreement. “I couldn’t find any specifics about why someone would want to sic a monster like that hulk on him. But I have a few more names, and can maybe do a little more digging tomorrow.”

Arun grunted something noncommittal. The dwarf looked more at ease clad once again in steel plate; which was to say, he wasn’t all that much at ease at all. His masterwork armor, enhanced by the arcane arts of the armorer that Skie the trader had recommended to them, now radiated a faint aura that Zenna, through her magical arts, could detect.

They looked up as Dannel entered the inn, quickly detecting them and cutting nimbly through the crowd to their booth.

“I wasn’t sure you were going to make it,” Zenna said dryly.

“Wouldn’t miss it!” the elf said with a grin. “The reason for my delay was an encounter I had with a striking young woman, while I was leaving Esbar’s place.”

Zenna’s look intensified a notch until it had an edge like a dagger.

“I’m surprised that you’re here at all, then,” Arun said, as he tore another hunk off of the loaf of bread before them on the table, not bothering with the tub of butter before stuffing the bulk of it into his mouth.

Dannel shot the dwarf a look that clearly said, you’re not helping, before turning back to Zenna. “It’s not like that. She said that she wanted to arrange a business dinner with us, all of us, tomorrow evening at sundown. Said it would be profitable.” He tossed a small white card onto the table, which Mole grabbed before it had settled to a stop. The card was covered with the precise lines of quality calligraphy.

“Cusp of Sunrise/Obsidian Avenue Northwest,” Mole read. “Hey, I know that place... lots of nobles and such hang out there. Very swanky.”

“You’d think we’d have had enough to do with nobles of late,” Zenna said, not shifting her impaling stare from Dannel.

“I think there’s more to it than that,” Dannel said. “It strains credulity to believe that what happened today and this invitation are unrelated.”

“Maybe our reputation proceeds us,” Mole offered.

“Perhaps,” the elf said. “But I’ve got a strange feeling about this... and I’ve learned to trust my feelings.”

Zenna rolled her eyes obviously. “Well, at least it’s a free meal.”

Chapter 91

The Cusp of Sunrise was a considerable, cross-shaped building covered in ivy, with a great central tower that rose as high as the city walls. As they drew nearer, they could see an engraved sign upon the ironbound door that said, “C.o.S.—Members Only.” The faint sounds of laughter and music could be heard from within over the background noise of the city.

“Looks like this is the place!” Mole exclaimed, hopping up the stairs to knock firmly on the heavy oaken door.

The door opened promptly, revealing an older gentleman clad in simple but exceptionally cut garments, with graying hair that had been trained until not a single strand seemed out of place. He looked down at the four adventurers with a featureless expression that seemed clearly well-schooled. “Yes?”

“We’re here for a meeting with Celeste,” Dannel said.

The man raised an eyebrow, but didn't speak nor move from his position until the elf proffered the card that the woman had given him. He scanned it and nodded to himself. "Ah, the umber hulk people," he told them. "I am Renjin. Come inside, if you please."

He proceeded them into a marble foyer that would have served in itself as a comfortable home for a family of four. An elaborately woven carpet that was probably worth more than most of the homes in the city was sprawled across the center of the foyer, beneath a many-armed chandelier that shone with what was probably genuine gold, rather than just gilding. Three tall arches offered access to different wings of the structure, but Renjin again held up their progress as he took up a blocking position beside a large mahogany desk that had a look of great age about it—as well as a buffed shine that was so perfect that it could likely serve as a mirror in a pinch.

"Was there something else?" Dannel asked.

The butler seemed nonplussed. "The members of the Cusp of Sunrise are accustomed to a certain... decorum... in their guests, sir."

Zenna took a good look at herself and her companions, and understood immediately what the man was getting at. They'd all had enough time to have most of their clothes repaired after their multiple delvings into places that were Terribly Dangerous. But standing there, clad in armor and with weapons and fat pouches dangling off of them every which way, they looked like nothing else than what they were. Adventurers. The Stormblades could pull off making that look good, but for the four of them...

Arun opened his mouth to say something that would no doubt be devastating to their cause, but Dannel stepped in smoothly. "I am sure that we will conduct ourselves with the utmost in restraint, Renjin, and do nothing to upset the sensibilities of your guests." The elf smiled but shot a not-quite-covert look at Arun, and reluctantly—so it seemed to Zenna—subsided.

Renjin wasn't quite satisfied, though. "There are no stags to be hunted in the Great Library, sir," he added, with a look at Dannel's bow.

The elf nodded, and with a sudden snap of his wrist launched the bow across the foyer, to settle perfectly onto a rack sparsely populated with a few outdoor coats and cloaks. "Try to make sure it doesn't wander off," he couldn't resist adding as a jab, appreciating the offended look that flashed briefly across the butler's smooth façade.

Zenna glanced back at Mole, and started slightly in surprise. Somehow the gnome's weapons, even her crossbow, had vanished, and she now wore a pair of earrings set with chips of blue lapis, complemented by a silver necklace that bore a trio of wedge-cut moonstones. And while she wasn't one hundred percent sure, Zenna thought that the blouse her diminutive friend was wearing—a flowing V-cut of soft blue silk—wasn't the same one she'd seen on her when they'd left the Morkoth... and how had she managed that!

Mole met her incredulous look and merely smiled, offering a clearly disingenuous shrug.

Well fine then, Zenna thought to herself, after all, she could play games as well...

Zenna briefly concentrated upon her magical hat. When she turned around, her appearance had subtly but noticeably changed. Her red hair was no longer tucked haphazardly under the simple cap that was the natural form of the hat of disguise, but now neatly caught up in an ivory comb studded with bands of shining platinum. Her features were highlighted with just enough makeup to avoid drawing attention to it—that was a lesson that her stepmother had given her—while her often-repaired tunic was now silk, like Mole's, with the repaired rents now appearing as decorative designs in thread-of-gold. Even her component pouches looked stylish, trimmed with ermine and the occasional gold buckle.

Dannel slipped a glance at her, then forgot himself and stared. Even Renjin was clearly taken aback for a moment, but he recovered quickly and turned to Arun. Even before the man could open his mouth, the dwarf was already shaking his head.

“Don't even think about it,” he said. “This hammer and my armor are sacred articles of my faith, signs of my devotion to the All-Father. I'd sooner mash your head down into your gut than hand either over to the likes of you.” As he finished, he tightened his grip on the haft of his hammer, as if contemplating whether to go ahead with his own suggestion.

Renjin huffed slightly, as if dealing with uncouth dwarves was just a part of his many burdens, then turned and gestured toward the far archway. “Miss Celeste will join you in the Great Library,” he said dismissively.

As they moved past, Zenna whispered to Arun, “Quite diplomatic of you.”

Arun harrumphed.

The Great Library was impressive, Zenna had to admit, as they stepped from the foyer into the huge, vaulted chamber. The room appeared to comprise the entirety of the tower that they'd seen from outside, with walls twelve feet high topped by a dome that rose to a vaulted height easily forty feet above their heads. Long, narrow windows punctuated the dome near its base, filling the room with slivers of light that were augmented by at least a dozen bright brass lamps hanging on chains about the perimeter of the room. A long bar with dozens if not hundreds of bottles in organized rows on shelves behind it ran inconspicuously along the edge of the room to their left, and tall bookshelves accompanied by metal-frame ladders mounted to the wall on rollers ran around the entire circumference of the chamber. The spacious interior of the room was filled with comfortable-looking padded chairs, small tables where a number of well-dressed patrons were gaming with dice, and even a harpsichord sitting alone to one side. The room was filled to about half its apparent occupancy with a representative sample of Faerûn's races and genders, all clad in expensive raiment that made Zenna feel her even illusion-enhanced appearance to be shabby and cheap by contrast. A few glanced up at them as they entered with mild curiosity, but most remained focused on their conversations or games, not deigning to notice them.

“Didn’t think a little town like this one could support so much foppery,” Arun growled. At least he had the presence of mind to keep his voice low, she thought, as the dwarf sauntered over to the nearest chair that was at least a dozen paces from any of the gathered nobles, and sat down, the chair creaking alarmingly as it adjusted to his considerable armor-enhanced weight. The look on his face made it clear that he welcomed no idle chatter.

Dannel moved gracefully to another chair, and drew out his flute, assembling it in a practiced motion. He didn’t play to draw attention, but rather began testing out a few complex melodies quietly. Zenna recognized that by attempting not to draw focus to himself, he was already doing so, and in fact a few nobles moved closer, to better hear what he was doing.

She sighed, feeling torn and undecided, feelings that she had never been comfortable with. She and Dannel had not spoken of what had happened at Esbar’s place that morning, before the battle with the umber hulk attack. Clearly the elf was comfortable with what had happened between them, his kissing her, just a lark, perhaps. The elf was clearly comfortable around women, she’d seen that already. No doubt she was just the last in a long line that he’d set his eyes upon for a casual dalliance...

Zenna felt herself coloring and a growing surge of anger that threatened to strip away her reason. Blast the man! Blast all men! She spun and moved away, nearly trampling a surprised young noble who swallowed his complaint when he saw the look on her face. Zenna instead turned her attention to the bookshelves, walking around the perimeter of the room examining the titles—or at least pretending to, until she was able to master her unpredictable and raging emotions.

Mole, of course, seemed blissfully unaware of the various subtexts going on around her, and headed directly for the gaming tables.

It looked like all three tables were playing the same game, a dice-tossing affair that used small metal dice of a variety of shapes. The only difference seemed to be the stakes; gold coins at one table, platinum at the next, and what looked like small platinum bars at the last. Her gaze lingered at that one; she knew enough about precious metals to estimate that the small piles of bars beside the players at that table had to be worth over a thousand gold pieces!

She gravitated to the “gold” table, where four players were playing. They included a young human male, an elderly elven woman, a balding human male with one eye covered with a gem-studded patch, and a halfling man clad in a fur cloak that looked to contain the skins of a good half-dozen assorted creatures. The halfling and the young human nodded at her in greeting as she approached. There was a long padded bench a short distance back from the table for spectators, so she hopped up there to get a better look.

It didn’t take her long to figure out what was going on; apparently chatter was a big part of the game and the nobles seemed welcoming enough of a potential new player. The game was called “gemsnatcher,” and the young man—Evrans Durst, his name was—explained the rules in between his tosses. It seemed that the game started with everyone rolling the pyramidal dice, the one with four sides. Once a player rolled a “one” on that die, they graduated up to the next larger size for the next toss. This continued until someone made it up to the largest die, a fat, nearly spherical bronze slug nearly the size of a sling bullet. When that die, which Mole guessed had about 20 facets, was cast, then everyone who didn't roll a "one" in that toss had to pay the caster of the bronze die that number of coins showing on its face. "And then you buy the table a round from your winnings!" Durst editorialized with a sweeping gesture—apparently he'd already consumed a number of such victory toasts.

"The purchase of libations is strictly optional," the elvish woman, a good-natured matron named Talia Emberleaf, added.

The game concluded with Talia rolling a "four" on the big die. Evran, who'd gotten up to the twelve-sided die quickly before rolling ten straight throws without a one, cursed but smiled as he handed over the coins desultorily. Mole realized that none of these four really worried about the money; just the jewelry that each wore was probably worth at least a hundred times the total stakes at the table.

The older man stood. "I have an errand in the city... you may have my table, madam," he said, with a nod to Mole. The halfling also rose. "Alas, I must also depart," he said, nodding to each of them before sliding his coins into his purse and exiting.

"Well blast it, it's bad luck to play gemsnatcher with less than four," Evran said. "Perhaps one of your friends would join us, Mole?"

Mole glanced over at where Dannel was playing, Arun was scowling, and Zenna was trying to ignore the lot of them, her nose in a book. "Um..."

"If you need a fourth, I would be willing to play a round," someone said. Mole jumped slightly—she hadn't heard the newcomer come up from behind her. She felt a nasty twinge as she recognized the voice, which was confirmed a moment later as he walked around her, sliding easily into the vacant seat.

"Vanderboren," Evran said, his tone indicating that he bore the young rake little affection. If Todd Vanderboren cared, he didn't show it, laying out a small pile of golden coins in front of him with a sweep of his hand. Mole glanced around the room, to see if any of the other Stormblades had entered, but apparently Vanderboren was alone. His face twisted into an expression just short of a leer—his face really did resemble a rat's, or maybe a weasel's, Mole thought—before his hand shot out and swept up the dice left by one of the departing players.

"Feeling lucky today?" he asked, even his voice sounding like a sneer, his eyes on Mole.

Chapter 92

"Oh, I always feel lucky," Mole said lightly, forcing herself to be at ease. It wasn't as though the Stormblade was going to try anything here! Her friends hadn't noticed his arrival yet, but he was definitely alone, at least for the moment. He wore his rapier, and his Stormblade sigil hung askew at a collar that showed stains on the expensive fabric.

Vanderboren always had the look of a man who didn't pay attention to how he appeared, so long as everything was of the finest quality and expense.

"Let us play," Talia said, taking up her 4-sided die.

The four dice clattered into the velvet circle that was etched into the center of the table, an arena where the little blocks of metal did battle. Each was of a different construction, so each player's die was clearly distinguishable from the others.

The little pyramids did not have an actual top face, so the numbers were scribed around the base where it landed. In the first toss, Evran and Talia both got a one, while Todd and Mole rolled fours. The two nobles replaced the pyramids for cubes for the second toss.

"I heard that there was some action on Magma Avenue yesterday," Todd said, as he took up his pyramid die. He scowled as the second toss in a one for Mole, who joined Evran and Talia with the six-sided cube. His own die showed a two.

"Yes, the umber hulk," Evran said, grinning as his third toss showed another one. He upgraded to the diamond-shaped eight-sider. Todd also rolled a one and upgraded, while the women rolled higher numbers on this cast, no help to them.

"I have heard that the creature's sudden appearance may have been magical in nature," Talia said. "The city's Magical Threats team has been looking into the matter."

"Well, if we want more information, why don't we just go to the source?" Todd said. They made another toss, but no ones came up when the dice stopped tumbling. "You and your friends were there, were you not?" he said to Mole.

"Yes, we fought the creature," Mole said. She watched Todd carefully as they made another toss. Even before Todd's die settled to the felt cover of the table, a single pip showing on its top face, her suspicion was confirmed; the Stormblade was trying to influence the roll of the die by the way he held and cast it. She recognized the tactic, as she'd been doing something of the sort herself almost by reflex, having played more than a few dice games in her day. Evran and Talia appeared completely oblivious to the tactic, however.

Evran was looking over at Dannel and Arun, an interested look on his face. "You were the ones that battled the creature?" he asked. "I heard it took the head off a guardsman in one bite."

"We're just lucky that our brave heroes were there to put a stop to the creature's rampage," Todd said, his voice like a slithering snake, the title a mocking slur. "Funny how you four always seem to be right there, whenever something terrible happens in the city."

"You are holding up the game," Talia said, hefting her palm with the die inside. Once more Evran scored a one, upgrading to the ten-sided die, while the others got nothing. To Mole's sharp eyes it looked like Todd was eschewing subtlety and all but dropping the die on the table, trying to get that one.

“I don’t think my friend the paladin found it funny,” Mole said. “He charged into battle with it even though he wasn’t wearing his armor at the time—one doesn’t expect a deadly melee in the midst of a leisurely walk through the city!—and it nearly tore him apart. Luckily he’s not the sort to chatter about when it’s time for action.”

Todd glared, and lifted his die as they prepared for another cast. Mole interrupted them, however, and held up her hand.

“You know, it may be silly of me, but can we use a cup for all four dice? I love the sound that the dice make when they clatter together before the roll, makes me feel lucky.”

The hostility in Todd’s stare deepened, but he didn’t respond; he was smart enough to know that any complaints would only make the implication in Mole’s words worse. Evran and Talia were quick to voice approval for the plan, each stealing a quick glance at Todd as they placed their dice into a leather cup that the young nobleman produced from the storage drawer under the table.

The next cast was a push, with no one rolling a one. They paused for a moment then as a waiter came around to take drink orders. Mole ordered something fruity that Talia recommended, while Evran and Todd’s beverages were of a more basic purpose. The waiter nodded, took their orders and empty cups, and departed silently.

Todd leaned back, tilting his chair back precariously on two legs as he scanned the room. “It seems like the Cusp just doesn’t have the same aura it used to,” he offered. “Used to be, you could expect a certain... refinement when you came here.”

Mole almost had to bite back a laugh. In a way, Vanderboren had an almost refreshing lack of subtlety, she thought. She remembered the way that he and his friends had looked at them in their first encounter, in the Drunken Morkoth, and sobered.

Evran did not restrain himself. “I know exactly what you mean,” he replied, his own gaze fixed squarely on Todd.

“Roll,” the Stormblade said, lunging forward to all but hurl his die into the cup. It was Talia’s turn to shake the cup, and her toss revealed another one for Evran, who upgraded to the twelve-sided die, the last one before the bronze dodecahedron.

“Ah, luck favors me tonight!” the young nobleman chortled. But on the next toss he rolled a three, while Talia’s one allowed her to upgrade to the eight-sider. Now she and Todd were tied with eight sides, while Mole still had six and Evran twelve.

“Speaking of treasure,” Todd said, although they hadn’t been talking about it at all as far as Mole could recall, “did you hear, the Stormblades found a cache in the tunnels under the city? After what happened yesterday with the umber hulk, the Mayor asked us to close an opening to the Underdark that had been found in the tunnels under the city. Seems the place had been used by the slavers connected with those abductions we’d had some trouble with last month. ‘The Malachite Fortress,’ I think they call it. Anyway, closing the tunnel was easy enough, but afterwards we were poking around a bit, and found a hidden cache... gold, silver, jewels... the ill-gotten gains of the slavers.”

Mole felt sick—not another missed treasure! Talia raised an eyebrow and asked, “And what will you and your little crew do with this newfound largess?”

“Oh, you know Annah, and her good heart—she insisted that we make a donation to the orphanage, and to the families of those who had suffered at the hands of Kazmojen and his evil allies. Those poor children... they’ve suffered enough, I think.”

His voice was so thick with false sincerity that the knot in Mole’s stomach threatened to boil over into bile. She refused to let him successfully bait her, however, so she simply said, “Oh, is it my toss?”

The next two rounds came up without any ones. As the cup passed to Todd, he twirled it in his hand and said, “This game grows tiresome. Shall we raise the bet, say, to ten times face value?”

“The rules for this table are clear,” Talia said sternly. “Let us continue the game.”

“Ah, so rare to find individuals of stout heart in these troubled times,” Todd said, shooting the dice onto the table. When they settled, Talia had another one, bringing her up to the ten-sided die. The next toss resulted in a one for Mole, and she swapped out for the eight-sider.

“Blah, this is just like last game,” Ezran complained, as he rolled yet another false roll on his next play, a five. “Get stuck on the twelve-sider...”

“You still have the lead,” Talia said, “and the odds of rolling a one on the twelve are rather longer than on the smaller die.” The elfess’s distinguished façade cracked into a smile, however, when on the next toss she achieved a one, upgrading her to the twelve. Her pleasure was drowned out by Todd, however, who loudly declared, “FINALLY!” as he moved up to the ten-sider. Now Mole was alone in last place, on the eight-sided dice, as the cup passed to her.

“Looks like your luck has deserted you today,” Todd chortled. “Might want to be careful, bad luck tends to come in streaks.”

Mole shot him a venomous look despite herself, and rolled. In fact it seemed as though bad luck had descended upon the table, for the next five tosses were all pushes, with no ones deigning to appear. Evran grew cross as his twelve-sider produced a twelve and three elevens in those five tosses, although the arrival of his drink brightened his spirits somewhat. Mole didn’t see the point of his anger, since any result not a one was the same in the rules of the game, but she supposed she could see the mental effect of rolling a number far from the desired objective.

Todd drained his liquor noisily and belched. “All right, let’s get this game over with,” he said, taking the cup and making his toss. And in fact, his ten-sided die showed a one. Now three players had the twelve, and Mole had the eight.

“What say you to a little side wager?” he said to Mole, leaning over the table until she could smell the alcohol on his breath. “If I go up on the next toss, you’re mine, for a night.”

Evran looked shocked, and even Talia betrayed clear disgust at the suggestion. Mole, however, had gained control of herself, and only wrinkled her nose in disgust.

“I’m tempted to agree, if only that I could demand that you bathe, if I should win. But sadly, I promised my parents that I wouldn’t lay with vermin, so I must decline your bold offer.”

Evran chortled. Talia said, “Let us finish this game. I suddenly find myself quite tired of the present company.” She took up the cup, and rolled. Her die came up with a one, and she took up the bronze twenty-sider. The others placed their dice into the cup, and without bothering to pass the cup to Todd the elf woman went ahead and made the final toss. There were no ones, and Talia’s fifteen marked the settlement of the wager. Mole and Evran counted out fifteen gold, while Todd ungraciously shoved a pile of coins in her direction.

“And now, I think I will adjourn,” Talia said, standing. “It was a pleasure meeting you, Mole. I hope we may resume our acquaintance under better circumstances.”

The Stormblade stood as well. “One final wager,” he said, leaning over the table, leering down at Mole, his voice thick. “If you are not too cowardly to refuse.”

“Well, as long as it doesn’t involve... touching... you,” Mole suggested.

“No, you’ve missed that chance, my little dear, though... who can say, in the future?” He reached down and took up the twenty-sided die. “I propose this. One toss each. High toss wins, winner collects the face value... times one hundred gold.”

Evran started, and a few others who had heard the declaration turned toward the game. Todd sneered down at Mole, as if awaiting her rejection of his offer.

Mole hesitated, genuinely uncertain. She wanted nothing more than to show up the weasely noble brat, but the possible sums involved in this wager were considerable. She could cover the bet, most likely—though she might have to lose her new earrings or necklace if he threw high—but was it worth it, really? She imagined that she could hear Zenna’s voice, berating her for even considering the reckless...

“We accept,” Zenna said, her voice cutting through Mole’s musings. Mole looked up to see all of her friends standing around the gamers at the table, along with about a dozen other nobles. The games at the other tables had come to a temporary halt, as everyone watched to see how this showdown would conclude. Mole thought it was silly, actually—the table with the platinum bars had far larger wagers than this one! But she felt a surge of excitement as she stood atop her chair (she hated all these big folk looming over her) and nodded.

Vanderboren hefted the heavy bronze die. Too late Mole realized that she should have required the dice cup as the nobleman launched the die onto the table with a snap of his wrist. It bounced off the raised edge of the center gamespace, then spun to a stop.

Revealing a seventeen.

Todd Vanderboren smiled, but there was nothing pleasant in it.

“Your roll.”

[Story Note: just FYI, I played out the entire game using an online random number generator (including the final wager, which will be concluded in the next post). I skipped a few inconclusive rounds at the end of the gemsnatcher game where no ones were rolled, but other than that I did not change any of the dice results. I adjudicated the attempts to affect the roll as a Sleight of Hand vs. DC25, with success allowing a reroll of that particular cast. Since Mole had a far greater modifier (+9, including her bluff synergy) than Todd (+5), going to the dice cup may have actually hurt her chances more, but he hit the 20 on the skill check and rerolled a one on the 5th round, so who’s to say...]

Chapter 93

Mole took up the bronze die, which felt unnaturally heavy in her small hand. She looked up at the gathered onlookers, including her friends. Zenna met her gaze and smiled, and nodded, sending the message, Whatever happens, we’re in this together.

Mole cast the die. When it settled to a stop, the crowd let out a cheer. The number showing on the die’s top face was clear.

Twenty.

Todd Vanderboren looked down at the table in disbelief.

“I believe that’s two thousand gold pieces,” Mole said.

The young man looked taken aback for the first time since they’d encountered him. “I... I do not have that much on me...”

“I am sure that the club will be happy to advance the funds, in your name,” came a voice from beyond the circle of onlookers. Everyone turned to see Celeste, the woman who had contacted Dannel yesterday, standing near the main entrance of the chamber. “After all, we all know the Vanderboren name... and that they honor their debts.”

Todd snarled, but there was nothing he could do but agree. A member of the club staff brought Mole a stack of the platinum bars on a tray, twenty of them. He was a bit surprised when Mole bade him bend low, and within a few seconds tucked all of them into her magical haversack. Todd remained only long enough to slash his name onto a receipt provided by the club, then slunk quickly out of the place through the far exit.

“I have to say, I’m quite pleased that I came when I did,” Celeste told them, once the nobles had returned to their activities and the four adventurers had moved to greet their hostess.

“That young man has an ill favor about him.” She frowned briefly, looking toward the arch where the nobleman had departed, but quickly shifted her gaze back to the adventurers, a warm smile returning to her face. “Come. You haven’t eaten already? Well then, I am certain you will enjoy the fare offered by the Cusp.”

She led them to one of the side wings of the structure, to a private dining room set off from the main corridor by a short hall and a stout wooden door. At Celeste’s urging the companions sat around the room’s primary feature, an oval table of considerable size that had been carved with various designs of leaves and vines about its perimeter. The chairs were plushly padded and of various sizes to comfortably accommodate all of them, and the table was already set with cutlery and dinnerware that shone brightly with the reflected light of the room’s several glimmering lamps.

“Wow, this is some nice stuff,” Mole commented as she seated herself, holding up a crystal goblet that caught the light and spread a rainbow of colors onto the linen tablecloth.

“Please, enjoy yourselves, and do not hesitate to notify the waitstaff if you require anything,” Celeste said. She waved her hand, and as if summoned magically by her gesture, a quartet of servers in the white and gold livery of the Cusp appeared from a subtle side door, laden with platters of appetizers and chilled bottles of wine.

For a moment the adventurers admired the foodstuffs that were placed before them. Mole sampled the vintage and declared it excellent. Finally, as the servers retreated back through the side door, Zenna turned and asked, “So, Celeste, why have you...”

But the woman was gone, as if the air itself had swallowed her up.

“Perhaps she means to speak to us after we have dined,” Dannel suggested, taking a fair helping of thin breads and cheeses from a nearby platter.

“I hope they intend to have real food after this,” Arun said, dubiously examining a plate containing a variety of sliced fruits.

“It’s called a ‘first course,’ friend dwarf,” Dannel said, deftly spiriting the fruit plate out from under the dwarf’s doubtful gaze. “You should try a few of these, they won’t kill you.”

“I’ll take my chances against umber hulks and giant spiders,” the dwarf muttered under his breath.

But Arun’s fears were misplaced, for the appetizers were only the first in a series of courses that included simmering onion soup accompanied by fat slabs of black bread, a quartet of roast pheasants drowned in spicy mushrooms, a lamb haunch that sizzled in its own juices as it was brought out, a fair dozen selections of vegetables prepared in a variety of ways, and a breaded stuffing fat with chips of fresh bacon and pine nuts. When the plates were finally taken away, Arun leaned back in his chair contentedly, belching loudly.

“You men and your noises,” Mole said chidingly. The gnome had consumed as much as any of her larger companions, and more than a few choice selections had somehow made their way into one of the side pouches of her haversack for later snacking.

“I hope you saved room for desert,” came Celeste’s voice from the far end of the table. They all turned to look at the slender woman—she had returned as silently as she had departed, though there was nothing untoward in her manner. “The caramel custard is superb.”

“We’re really quite stuffed,” Dannel said, “But our curiosity remains unslaked; perhaps you could now tell us why you’ve asked us here?”

“Of course. If you’d come with me, please, I will show you.” She gestured back toward the hallway door. Mole lingered behind, a slightly wistful look on her face.

“Caramel custard?”

Chapter 94

Celeste led them to another small private room, this one even more remotely situated at the end of a lengthy side-hall. As she held the door the four adventurers entered to find themselves facing an aged dwarf. In truth, the dwarf was venerable, his body a thin shell, his beard a sea of white that descended almost to his knees. It seemed as though the chain in which he was seated was the only thing keeping him upright at all, but they could just see the hints of silvery mail peeking out from under his robe and beard, hinting at a past more storied than the wretched condition in which he now found himself.

Arun nodded in deference to the elderly dwarf, who watched them under furrowed white brows as the four entered, with Celeste closing the door behind them. As the young woman turned to face the seated elder, he spoke, his voice like a stone slab being dragged across gravel. “These are the four of whom you spoke, Celeste?”

“Yes,” she said. Turning to the companions, she said, “Allow me to introduce Davked Splintershield.”

Dannel nodded, “I have heard the name,” he said. “Yours was the clan that occupied the hold under the city, the Malachite Fortress.”

Zenna betrayed her surprise as she shared a look with her companions. Although Dannel had not yet been with them then, she, Mole, and Arun had first-hand knowledge of that place, and the memories were not pleasant.

As if reading her thoughts, the old dwarf nodded, his dark eyes penetrating. “Yes, yes. It was a dark day, when we were forced to leave.”

“I had heard something about an expedition to the Underdark,” Dannel said.

The old dwarf’s expression clouded for a moment, and his eyes flashed, as if remembering something unpleasant. “Aye. My son, Zenith Splintershield, he thought he could defeat the horrors of the Underdark alone. And he is the source of my current suffering, though indirectly.”

“Your son? How is that?” Mole asked.

“Nay, I should not blame the boy,” the old dwarf said. “It is my own hubris that led me to this pass.” He sagged in the chair, air hissing from his tired lungs like from a punctured bladder.

“I was not a pleasant man, in my days of vigor and energy,” he said, when he could finally continue. “My greed and my pride blinded me to what was important, drove away my sons, which broke the heart of my wife. She tried to instruct me to my errors, but I ignored her. Finally the wench, on her deathbed, issued a curse in the name of the dwarven gods. It held that unless I reconciled with my sons, the life would bleed out from me, stealing what remained of my vigor much as I had stolen the love that had once existed between the members of my clan.”

“I ask for no absolution for what I was or what I did,” he said to them. He coughed, a sick sound that rattled in his chest. “But I am committed to spending what remains of my existence to righting the wrong that I perpetuated. I have met with my other sons, have begged their forgiveness, and had it granted. But Zenith...” he trailed off, his head sagging until his chin touched his chest, as if speaking the very name drew out what strength was left to him.

“Can’t you be healed?” Mole asked.

“I wish it could. Even the most powerful clerics of my faith have been unable to reverse what Marta wrought. Perhaps the gods found her words fitting—I cannot argue with her sentiment.”

“And Zenith’s fate?” Dannel asked.

“I pleaded with the boy not to abandon the Malachite Fortress,” Davked said. “Told him that his quest was a fool’s errand. But he was willful... and my own failings did not help. But I have consulted wizard and cleric alike, and their spells have revealed that my son yet lives, held captive in the Underdark.”

“The Underdark is not a place to visit lightly,” Zenna said. “Trust me, I know this.” She looked at Mole; the gnome had heard the same tales, told to them by their elder friends and relatives back home. Tales of god-dragons and dark dwarves, of terrible aberrations and things best left unmentioned.

“Held captive by whom?” Arun asked.

Davked was wrought by a fit of coughing, and was unable to reply. Celeste stepped forward, and said, “The kuo-toa have him, in a fortress known as Bhal-Hamatugn.”

“So you want us to go into the Underdark, and recover your son for you,” Zenna said, her voice betraying her doubts about the endeavor.

The old dwarf nodded. "Yes. I will pay you well; my clan still has wealth and I will have little need for it where I will be going, all too soon. Four thousand in gold, or six thousand in arms and armor from the forges of my people, if you prefer. Plus Celeste here will sponsor your membership in the Cusp, and pay the annual fee... that's worth a thousand right there."

Zenna managed to keep her features neutral. "A fair sum, but our affairs keep us busy..." she offered noncommittally.

Mole lunged forward, "Now, let's not be hasty..."

Zenna ignored her friend, and instead shifted her gaze to Celeste. "Tell me, what is your stake in this matter?"

Celeste seemed nonplussed at the direct question. "Davked and his kin are friends of mine, and I would see this curse lifted," she said simply.

"Say we accept," Dannel said. "How would we find this place, this 'Bhal-Hamatugn'?"

Celeste replied, "Unfortunately, a local group of adventurers who call themselves the Stormblades—perhaps you have heard of them, that fellow Vanderboren is one of them—recently collapsed the tunnels that connect to the Underdark under the city. However, there is another access point to the north of here, near the hut of a hermit known as Crazy Jared. I can give you map that will lead you there."

"I do not seek your aid lightly, and understand that this matter involves great danger and personal risk," Davked said. "But I have not much time left to me, even without this damned curse rushing me along toward the grave. All I have left to me is my honor, and it demands that I right the wrongs that I caused, before I take them with me to my eternal rest."

"I know something about honor," Arun said. "And the price that it can demand," he added, in an undertone. "Very well, I will lend my hammer to your cause, old dwarf."

Zenna tried to hide a grimace. As usual, no planning, no discussion—just precipitous action.

She wasn't really surprised when Mole quickly offered her support as well. But she was a bit surprised when Dannel added his assent. "It would do me good to get out from these walls for a time," he said.

All eyes turned to her. As if I have a choice, now, she seethed inwardly. But she didn't express that thought, instead saying, "It would seem that we are in agreement."

The old dwarf nodded, a satisfied look in his eyes.

Chapter 95

Zenna was cold, and she knew that if she could feel the icy bite of the wind through the protection afforded by her demonic heritage, then the others had to be freezing. But they offered no complaint, trudging across the mountain trails as the hours passed slowly but inexorably.

The weather had been hit or miss over the last few days. For every hour of clear skies it seemed they had been faced with an hour of frozen downpour, with apparently no middle ground in between. At least it hadn't been cold enough to snow, although the higher peaks to their right were already draped in a white shroud that seemed to dip closer to them the further north they marched.

Dannel's wilderness skills were a godsend, and thus far he'd found them a dry and secure shelter every night of their travel, as well as enough food and fuel so that they'd barely had to dip into their iron rations. Even with the spacious boost provided by Mole's magical backpack, which was now packed full of gear and supplies, Zenna was concerned that the Underdark might tax their resources.

The sudden clatter of metal directly ahead drew her out of her reverie. Arun was down, having slipped on a muddy patch of stone, part of a jagged bulge of rock that rose up out of the ground directly across their path. They were making their way through a high meadow at the moment, but even here there was more barren stone than grassy earth. Their trail led them to obstacles that had to be surmounted at least a dozen times each day. Mole reached the dwarf before Zenna could, but Arun refused her offered help, lifting himself clumsily to his feet with yet more clanking and clattering.

If there's anything hostile in these mountains, it'll hear us coming a dozen miles distant, Zenna thought to herself. Thus far, however, their luck had held, and they had encountered nothing more threatening than a large mountain cat that had growled at them a few times from the safety of a nearby outcropping before withdrawing.

Arun returned to the stone ridge, clambering awkwardly up the slick stones using his hands as well as his feet, while Mole surmounted the barrier in a few magically-enhanced hops. Zenna fell somewhere in between, climbing up the rocks carefully and methodically until she reached the summit of the ridge. It wasn't all that high, perhaps fifteen feet above the level of the meadow at its highest point, giving her an unobstructed view of what looked like an endless sequence of ridges, valleys, and hills stretching ahead of her as far as she could see. Dannel had insisted that they were following the trail indicated on the map, but Zenna had to admit that the mountains all looked alike to her eyes.

She saw Dannel up ahead, the elf returning from one of his frequent scouts. With all the coming and going he did, he had to be covering twice the distance that the rest of them were in a given day, but she had to admit that the ranger was now in his element, more at home among the stark mountain landscape than in the civilized confines of Cauldron. Dannel had kept all of their spirits up, singing songs or playing his flute at their camps each night. Even Arun had let up on his criticisms; the dwarf had seemed quiet of late, Zenna mused, even more so than was usual for him. Mole had shared with her what had transpired between them in the dwarven tavern and afterward, shedding some light on the complex machinations in the mind of their friend. Perhaps she understood better what drove the man, she thought.

“I think that we may have some company up ahead,” Dannel reported, once they’d joined him back on the meadow floor. “I detected a faint smell of woodsmoke on the breeze when the wind shifted a short while ago, although I did not see any signs of habitation up ahead.”

“You think?” Arun interjected. “Bah—what’s the use of all them elfy skills of yours, if you cannot be certain? Let me go on up ahead, and I’ll smoke ‘em out, if there be anything hostile waiting for us along the trail.”

Dannel laughed. “I am sure that any foe would depart in haste at your coming, ser paladin! But I doubt it’s an ambush, else they wouldn’t have had a fire burning where it could be detected by anyone approaching. Best to be cautious, though, then to blunder into trouble.”

There was no denying that advice, so they continued on their way, passing out of the far edge of the meadow and into a long ravine that followed the course of what was probably a watershed, waiting patiently for the spring thaw to channel a deluge of water into the lowlands. At the moment there was only a trickling spring winding its way through the hills. Dannel said that the ravine offered a shortcut around a line of rough terrain to the north; they would be able to circumvent that obstacle and rejoin their general course without giving up too much in the way of time.

They hadn’t gone very far along the twisting course of the ravine, however, when Mole raised her hand. “Do you hear that?” she asked.

Zenna listened, and a faint noise, barely distinguishable from the background noise of the wind through the hills, reached her ears. “What is it?” she asked.

“Trouble,” Dannel reported, stringing his bow and drawing out a long shaft from his quiver. “Come!”

The elf led them quickly down the length of the ravine toward the source of the noise, moving swiftly and stealthily across the rocks. Arun fell behind, and Zenna suspected that this was a deliberate ploy on Dannel’s part, so that the noisy passage of the dwarf wouldn’t provide undue warning to whoever or whatever lay ahead. Mole, hopping from boulder to boulder using the magical powers of her boots, had no difficulty keeping up, but Zenna wasn’t quite so adept and found the distance between her and the elf slowly widening.

They reached a bend in the course of the ravine, and just like that the sounds grew more distinct, even as their source became obvious.

A battle raged before them, situated within a small campsite constructed at the bend in the streambed. Scattered about were the ruins of a heavy canvas tent, a shattered frame of what might have been a mining sluice, and a slain mule, its slashed body lying awkwardly across the course of the stream, forming an impromptu dam. A dwarf was fighting off a strange creature shaped almost like a gaunt, violet-skinned hound, with a pair of tentacles tipped with sharp ridges jutting from its shoulders. As Zenna’s eyes widened in surprise, she saw the creature shimmer and shift, its outline twisting as it seemed to travel back and forth a few paces without actually moving.

Dannel had already drawn his bow and fired, aiming at the hindquarters of the beast so as not to threaten the embattled dwarf. His shot was accurate, but the shot passed through empty air as the monster shifted again a pace to the left.

The dwarf appeared to be having similar difficulties. "Stand still, ye blasted beastie, so I can smack ye!" he roared. He was wielding a long-handled spade like a battleaxe, but the creature's constant shifting was making it difficult for him to land a blow. It, however, had no such hindrance, and it lashed out at the dwarf, scoring a painful blow across his torso that drove him back roughly.

"Right! I'll do yer for that one!" the dwarf yelled, jabbing upward with the shovel, catching the creature under the jaw as it snapped at him with its massive teeth. This time the blow connected, and the displacer beast hissed in sudden pain. It drew back reflexively, but clearly the attack had only momentarily discomfited the creature.

"Come on, we've got to help him!" Mole shouted, springing forward toward the melee.

"Mole, no!" Zenna cried in warning, but of course it was already too late. She drew out her magical wand of burning hands, but held back, first calling upon her magic to protect herself with mage armor. Prudently. Unlike her heedless friends...

Even as Dannel nocked and drew his second arrow, she could hear the clanking announcing Arun's approach. For once, she found the noise very reassuring. But at the same time, she became aware of another noise, coming from further down the ravine...

"Watch out, there's another one!" she warned, unslinging her crossbow from across her back.

Dannel's second shot was equally ineffective, foiled again by the displacement properties of the creature. The elf cursed and started forward, his bow in one hand while he drew his sword with the other.

The dwarf cried out as the displacer beast savaged him, taking multiple hits to his body and only narrowly avoiding a snap of its jaws that would have turned his throat into red shreds. He refused to go down, however, even with blood splattering on the rocks about him with every movement. Mole reached the battle and leapt forward with a sudden heave. She had targeted the creature's back, but was prepared when its form shifted and she landed a pace away from its new location. Continuing the momentum of her charge, she thrust her sword into its side, drawing a howl of pain from it as the blade bit deeply through real flesh and muscle.

Enraged, the displacer beast turned to face this new threat.

Zenna moved toward the melee in Dannel's wake, loading her crossbow as she went. She looked nervously to her right, where the stream bent again around a rough outcropping of jumbled boulders. As if summoned by her gaze, a second creature suddenly materialized atop the heap, carried there by a single great leap from the space beyond. In dawning horror she realized that its tentacles and jaws alike were dripping with crimson, fresh blood that dripped from it in fat gobs.

The creature let out a great roar, and immediately leapt into the fray.

Charging right toward her.

Chapter 96

The companions, coming to the aid of a dwarf caught in a dire struggle against a pair of displacer beasts, found themselves engaged in yet another violent melee.

Zenna held her ground against the charge of the second displacer beast, although her legs felt like gel and her entire body shook with fear. The magic came at her call, however, and a blaze of colors engulfed the creature. Its displacement power was not enough to move it from the path of her spell, and it hurtled forward blindly, the momentum of its charge carrying it ahead. Zenna spun and leapt to the side, but something heavy crashed into her, and she went flying, landing hard in the rocks, pain jabbing into her side from the force of the impact.

Mole dodged the first lashing tentacle that slammed down toward her, grimacing as the blow snapped the rock she'd been standing on in two. Suddenly her brave charge to aid the poor hapless dwarf didn't seem quite so reasonable as it had a few moments ago. That decision seemed even more ill-favored a heartbeat later, as the displacer beast's huge jaws snapped forward, catching her on the shoulder and lifting her painfully into the air. She found herself flying—and not in the good way—before something hard smashed into her back, and she could feel her flesh tearing as the sharp ridges of the beast's tentacle ravaged her cloak and armor. For a moment a flash of fear punched through her... oh no, not my magical pack! Then pain penetrated thought, and everything broke apart as she landed head-first in the wooden wreckage of the sluice.

Dannel's let out a harsh cry and rushed into the beast that had so battered his friend, stabbing with his slender sword. In close quarters his blow struck more truly than his arrows earlier, although he cut only into the beast's shoulder, and not its heart as he had intended. The creature snarled and lunged at him, but abruptly staggered as the dwarf smashed his spade two-handed into the back of its skull. The displacer beast stood there a moment quivering, uttered a plaintive cry, and collapsed.

The second creature shook off the effects of Zenna's color spray just in time to see Arun charging right for it. The beast lashed out with its tentacles, but they glanced off of the dwarf's shield or the bright plates of his heavy armor. The beast's form continued to shift, but Arun had judged its true location based on the source of those strikes, and when the hammer came down it connected with solid flesh.

That made it mad.

Zenna shook her head, trying to clear it of the fuzziness born of the pain that continued to shoot through her battered body like jolts of electricity. She felt something jar her boot, and looked up to see the displacer beast all but on top of her, snarling at it battled with Arun.

Without hesitation, she opened her mind to her magic, calling upon the words of a spell. The creature apparently didn't hear her over the noise of its clashes with the paladin, who deflected another tentacle strike with his shield before taking a punishing stroke that glanced off of the side of his helmet. Zenna could feel her skin crinkling with the magical power she'd called as she reached out for the hind leg of the displacer beast. Her hand passed through it, but as she swept outward, she felt her fingers brush against rough skin, and she released the power of her spell.

The displacer beast roared as the electrical energy from Zenna's shocking grasp tore through it. Snarling, it made the mistake of rounding on the mage, who drew back in alarm as the tentacles lashed out at her. One caught her on the arm and tore away a long strip of flesh, while the second snapped across her back, driving her roughly down into the rocks. Zenna crumpled, lying there unconscious and bleeding.

The creature had removed that threat, but its assault had left it vulnerable to the assault from the dwarf. Arun charged right into the side of the creature, bringing his hammer down in a deadly arc. Again the dwarf was able to strike through the displacement effect, and the beast staggered as its spine snapped with an ugly crack. Its tentacles flailing aimlessly, it fell backward and spent out the remainder of its existence thrashing about among the rocks.

Arun was quick to reach Zenna's side, and calling upon the divine power of Moradin stabilized her.

The battle had been brief but bloody. Two of the companions had gone down, and the battered dwarf was barely standing. Still, he managed to make his way to a bundle laid out among the ruins of his camp, and from within it he drew out a massive single-bladed axe and a fat leather pouch. From the latter, he drew out a small vial and quaffed it. Despite the blood caked onto his garments from the rents in his tough hide, the dwarf regarded them calmly, leaning slightly upon the axe, his hands slick with blood as they tightened on the shaft of the weapon.

Dannel had brought Mole around with a dose of healing energy from his wand, and now handed her a potion as she gingerly propped herself back up. Ignoring the dwarf, he rushed over to Zenna, his concern written on her face as he used more healing to bring her back to consciousness.

Arun, the side of his own face bloody where a swipe of a tentacle had caught him, turned to the dwarf.

"Well met," the paladin offered.

"Well met yerself," the dwarf replied, spitting a gob that was more blood than saliva against the rocks.

“Don’t mind him, he’s always like that,” Mole said, dusting herself off as she rose and stepped in between the two dwarves. “I’m Mole, he’s Arun, the elf is Dannel, and his girlfriend over there is Zenna.”

“Balthazar Hodge,” the dwarf replied, though he didn’t offer his hand or make any other gesture of greeting. “Call me Hodge.”

“Hodge? That doesn’t sound like a dwarven name,” Mole opined.

“That’s cause I’m really a fairy elf princess,” the dwarf spat. “HAR!” he roared, his laughter more than a little jarring.

“That’s a good one!” Mole enthusiastically offered. She glanced back and saw that Dannel was helping Zenna carefully to her feet. “So, you a miner or something?” she asked, glancing about the ruins of the camp.

“Gotta check on me helpers,” the dwarf said, hefting his axe as he headed down the ravine toward the bend around which the second creature had appeared. Mole and the others followed.

The rest of the campsite was in worse condition than the first area. A second mule lay dead, along with more battered equipment and another tent. Worst of all was the battered remains of a pair of humans, clearly dead even before Zenna moved to examine the bodies.

“I’m sorry about your friends,” Dannel said.

“Don’t be,” the dwarf said, spitting noisily again. “Said ‘ey could handle ‘emselves, ‘ey did. Guess ‘ey was wrong.”

“If we hadn’t come along, looks like you would have had a bit more than you could handle yourself,” Arun said, clearly offended by the dwarf’s casual dismissal of his comrades’ death.

The dwarf shook his head in derision. “Dem beasties would nay be gotten de best o’ me, if’n I’d ‘ad a chance to get me fingers on ol’ Betsy here.” He patted the smooth steel flange of his axe, and spat. “What I deserve, I reckon, trustin’ to de likes of these to be keepin’ watch. Like as not ‘ey were watchin’ a bottle, ‘stead of their duty.”

“What language is he speaking?” Zenna whispered covertly to Dannel, who shrugged, as if the idiosyncrasies of dwarves was just another of those things beyond his understanding or control.

“Your axe is named Betsy?” Mole asked, fascinated by the strange dwarf and his unusual manner.

“Ay, she is! After a girl I knew once... now there was a wench, oy! But this Betsy be a mite easier to ‘andle, she be! HAR!”

The dwarf walked out into the ruined camp, occasionally stopping to poke at something with his axe. Arun moved over to the two slain humans, and after righting their bodies as best he could, started gathering stones for a cairn. Zenna quickly moved to help him, although she could barely move rocks that the dwarf lifted easily in one hand.

“There weren’t any others of your party?” Dannel asked.

“Nay, elf, just me an’ Daric an’ Morse, here.” He paused over the slain mule. “Best pair o’ mules I ever owned, too,” he lamented. “Blasted bloody bleeding bastards!” he roared, shaking his axe in the general direction of the dead displacer beasts.

“So, what are you going to do now?” Mole asked, glancing over to make sure that Zenna was fully involved in helping Arun, and therefore not likely to overhear the conversation. “Back to Cauldron?”

“Total bleeding loss,” Hodge was saying, scratching his thick hair with a hand crusted with dirt and blood—mostly his, of the latter. Belatedly he seemed to realize that he’d been asked a question, for he turned and regarded the gnome. Weighing the question, he finally spit. “Back to that cess-hole? Not blasted likely. No...” He regarded the gnome thoughtfully, and ran an appraising glance over her companions as well. “Yer all treasure hunters or somesuch? There ain’t much out thisaways, but stones and dirt.”

“Oh, no,” Mole said cheerfully. “We’re—”

“We’d best be making our way onward,” Dannel said, interrupting as he came up behind the two of them, his sword cleaned and sheathed and his bow ready again for any further sign of trouble. “There are other menaces in these mountains, and they may be drawn to this place by the smell of smoke and blood.”

“Right,” Hodge said, fixing the elf with a canny look. “Travelin’ north, are ye? I was thinkin’ of headin’ that way meself, maybe try my luck on the far side of these rocks, along the Lake.”

Dannel opened his mouth to say something, but Mole quickly said, “Wonderful, why don’t you travel with us, then! Strength in numbers, of course, and if we meet anything else that’s nasty you can use Betsy to teach them whatfor!”

“Just so,” Hodge said. “Lemme gather a few things.”

As he trudged off, Zenna came up, rubbing her slender hands together. “Guess what, Zenna?” Mole said. “Hodge is going to go with us!”

Zenna looked at Dannel with an expression that might have been accusatory. “Another dwarf. Wonderful,” she said dryly.

Chapter 97

The “secret” of their mission lasted the better part of an hour. Mole, delighted to find someone who hadn’t heard all of the tales of their adventures, chattered non-stop, her magical boots allowing her to easily pace the trudging steps of their new companion. At first Zenna thought that the dwarf might go into a berserk rage after a few hours of this, but Hodge seemed to mostly ignore the gnome, occasionally punctuating his steps with a grunt or a fat gob of spittle. Furthermore, when Hodge mentioned something to Arun the paladin—naturally—responded with complete and stark honesty about their destination. Zenna thought that news that they intended to travel into the Underdark would have cured their fellow traveler of any inclination to accompany them further, but if anything it seemed to strengthen his resolve to match his course to theirs.

She sighed. Well, he’d learn soon enough what sort of trouble the four of them always seemed to get into.

That night, in camp, Zenna caught Mole unloading a gob of spit into the fire, when she thought no one was looking. The gnome didn’t pull it off very well, leaving most of the spittle on the front of her cloak, but Zenna had no doubt that her friend would quickly master all of Hodge’s bad habits.

The dwarf was... disgusting, yes, that was the one and only word for his behavior, Zenna thought. What was worse, he seemed either oblivious or completely unconcerned as to the effects of his behavior upon his traveling companions. He stank, he spat constantly, he swore at the faintest provocation, and he seemed to take a perverse delight at tweaking Arun in his fastidiousness and piety. Zenna shook her head—to think of the gold dwarf in those terms! By contrast to Hodge, however, Arun was like a virginal monk of Ilmater.

This was all Dannel’s fault. Zenna wasn’t quite able to work out the exact logic of that conclusion, but it was nonetheless quite fixed in her thoughts. The elf furthermore seemed to treat the entire situation with amusement, probably taking pleasure in her discomfort with the whole situation. Who had invited him, anyway?

Two days after their battle with the displacer beasts and meeting with Hodge, they found themselves approaching their immediate destination. Dannel, who had been carrying the map given to them by Celeste, led them up a trail that switchbacked up a ridge that gave onto a broad alpine plateau. A cold wind blew constantly down out of the mountains, and while the plateau contained knots of evergreens and sere mountain grasses that had persisted despite the winter, the landscape as a whole was stark and bracing. Boulders lay strewn about as though dropped by careless giants, and wide stretches of land were marked by nothing more than scattered stones and bare granite worn smooth by the unceasing wind. Behind them they could see the sprawling expanse of the Almraiven Vale, stretching north from the coast between the rising mountain range and the implacable Forest of Mir. Ahead lay the fog-shrouded peaks of the Alamirs, and beyond that, the Lake of Steam.

“Quite a view,” Dannel said, standing at the summit of the trail, staring out over the vista as he waited for the others to join him at the top.

“What’s that, now?” Arun said, huffing slightly as he cleared the crest and looked out over the plateau. Despite his dwarven fortitude, he was still burdened with more weight than all of the others, what with his heavy armor, shield, and hammers. He also insisted on carrying one of the two heavy wool tents that they bore with them, even though the bulging pack he bore gave him the almost outrageous appearance of a two-legged pack mule.

“Our current destination, I would presume,” Dannel said.

As the remainder of the party gathered at the summit, they could all clearly distinguish what the dwarf had spotted. It was a crude dwelling, a wooden structure surrounded by a barrier of tanned hides stretched from wooden pilings that formed the appearance of a wall without the substance. The place was clearly in poor repair, although a faint line of smoke rising from the building hinted at current occupancy.

“Why’dja bring us ‘ere?” Hodge piped up, for once not venturing spittle in the unpredictably shifting winds to punctuate his statement.

“Someone dwells here with information that we need,” Dannel started to explain, but Hodge interrupted him with a grunt.

“Bah, yer wantin’ to chat with that loonie? Waste o’ bleedin’ time, that feller’s crazier than a bunch o’ drunken elves at Midsummer. No offense,” he added, with a desultory glance at Dannel.

“None taken,” the elf said, rolling his eyes.

“You can be on your way at any time,” Arun said to the other dwarf, adjusting his pack as he turned toward the crude structure where Crazy Jared dwelled.

“Neh, this should be interestin’,” Hodge said, falling in with them as the adventurers started across the plateau.

The plateau wasn’t very far across, perhaps a half-mile, and the predominance of at least relatively flat terrain made for easy going. Other than the wind, there was a strange quiet over the mountains, which tickled the caution of the five veterans. Hodge paused to wind his massive crossbow, an action which drew querying looks but no question. A few steps later Mole unlimbered her own crossbow and loaded it, followed quickly by Zenna. They could all feel it, a sense of vague anticipation that belied the harmless appearance of the mountaintop dwelling.

They were perhaps one hundred yards away from the structure when a loud crash from somewhere within stopped them in their tracks. A disheveled figure clad in a chaotic mantle that swirled in the wind rushed out of the hut. From their current distance they could only see that he was an older man, and that he clutched what appeared to be a silver rod in both hands as he ran. He spotted them, and came running toward them, shouting something that was lost on the wind.

“What the...” Dannel began.

He didn't get a chance to finish his thought, for at that moment a hulking form rose up into the air behind the hut. It hung there for a moment, its wings outstretched, catching the air and the pale afternoon light... a dragon, its body not much larger than a horse, but dramatic nonetheless as it swept forward and landed on the roof of the building. They could hear the sound of the impact across the field separating them from the beast, punctuated a moment later as the dragon lifted its head and unleashed a terrible roar that seemed to shake the very mountain beneath their feet. Then it crouched and hurled itself into the air once more, its wings spreading to capture the wind even as its head came down, its jaws opening wide to disgorge a stream of liquid fire onto the hut. The eager flames poured over it like a pitcher of water dumped upon a stone, and in seconds the place was engulfed in fire.

"By the gods," Zenna breathed. The others, unable to even speak, simply watched in stunned amazement.

Then, shaking them out of their reverie, the yells of the fleeing hermit—Jared, no doubt—came to them. The dragon, still hanging there in the sky thirty feet above the burning shack, lifted its head and fixed them with a baleful stare. Its powerful wings pumped, lifting the creature higher and toward them.

"Run!" Zenna cried, even as the companions reached for their weapons.

As the dragon swept toward them, the old man, a speck against the looming bulk of the monstrosity overhead, shouted at them again. "Onward, my knights! For Anduria!" As he lifted the silver rod, there was a gleaming flash of light, and in that instant his tattered robe became a golden mantle trimmed in fur, a shimmering crown laid lightly upon his head, a trailing length of crimson fabric fluttering in the wind behind him.

"Scatter!" Dannel cried in warning, the dragon's intent clear as it lifted higher off of the ground, peaking with another powerful stroke of its wings before streaking down in a lunging glide toward them, its jaws already opening with the promise of death.

Chapter 98

A few missiles shot up at the diving dragon, shafts from Dannel's powerful longbow and the crossbows of the others. Zenna lifted her own weapon with trembling hands, the small device of wood and metal seeming pathetic against the terrible majesty of the dragon. It filled her vision as she aimed and fired, but the bolt, caught in the gusts of wind that swirled over the plateau, spun harmlessly astray, missing the dragon by a good ten feet. A few of the other shots at least hit it, although the darts seemed of little use against the thick hide of the beast.

Then it dove, and fire filled the world.

Zenna saw Mole leaping into a roll, then everything was pain. Her heritage provided her with some small protection against fire, but it was nothing against this heat. As a child, she had amused herself and startled the other children by grasping burning brands from the hearth, letting the flames play harmless across her hands and forearms. But now she burned, screaming as the hot flames crinkled her flesh and scored her body. She was falling, falling...

Dannel's heart froze in his chest as the dragon's breath engulfed Zenna. He was just outside the radius of the blast, but the wave of heat from the point of impact struck him with the force of a blow. He ignored that, however, rushing blindly into the ring of carnage where the land itself was scorched to black where the breath weapon had impacted. She was there, still smoldering, her cloak burned back from her shoulders, her flesh blackened...

He started toward her, but was jostled aside by Arun, who bent down and scooped up the unconscious tiefling. The dwarf's armor was likewise blasted and scorched, and wisps of steam rose from the gaps in his helm, but the dwarf ignored his own hurts and focused on the crippled woman, pouring lifesaving healing energy drawn from his sacred bond to Moradin into her.

"She lives, elf, but we'll all die if we don't find some shelter from that monster!"

The hard words shook Dannel from his fear, and he looked up to see that the dragon was indeed turning for another pass, almost leisurely twisting around the edge of the plateau in a wide arc. Dannel scanned the landscape, taking in their entire surroundings in a single glance, before pointing at a knobby cluster of boulders that formed a little maze of rock off to one side of the plateau. "There!" he yelled, pointing with his bow. Without hesitation Arun started off in that direction, Zenna's limp form cradled against his body. Hodge, his entire right side heavily burned as well, ran after him, and quickly passed the more burdened paladin as he ran for the promise of cover.

"Go!" Dannel shouted to Mole, who was reloading her crossbow. The dragon had now realigned its course, and was coming in again across the plateau. "Go!"

"What about you?" the gnome yelled.

"I'll draw its attention!"

"But—"

"GO!" the elf shouted. Reluctantly, Mole complied, her magical boots carrying her in long strides across the barren rock.

"Fight bravely, my knights!" Jared was shouting, waving his rod as though it were indeed a kingly standard. "Hold the line against the terror of the Beast!"

Dannel ignored him, drawing the feathers of his arrow to his cheek as the dragon dove again. The creature seemed intent on destroying the largest group of foes, ignoring both the crazy illusionist and the solitary elf apparently bent on suicide.

Well. He would have to convince the beast that he was a threat.

As the dragon bore down on him, Dannel released his hold on the taut string, driving his arrow like a knife through the swirling winds. The arrow vanished into the dragon's maw, already open in preparation of another devastating blast of fire. The dragon shook its head and roared in fury, the smooth arc of its dive interrupted by the stinging pain of the hit. It broke off, its wings beating to carry it back up into the air, but as its momentum carried it over Dannel, it snapped its head back momentarily and unleashed a gout of flame.

The nimble elf launched himself to the side, but could not fully escape the force of the flames that struck him hard across the back. Searing tongues of flame caressed his back and sent tendrils of pain across his shoulders and neck as he hurled forward and came up into a roll. He dug at his hip quiver for another arrow, but the dragon had already drawn away, gaining altitude again.

"Wonderfully done, noble archer!" Jared shouted in approval. The madman had closed to within thirty feet, his noble raiment swirling around his body. "That will teach yonder drake to trifle with my subjects!"

But Dannel wasn't convinced for a moment that the dragon was finished with them. His suspicion was confirmed a moment later when the beast began another broad turn over the edge of the plateau.

"Get to cover, old man!" Dannel said, all but driving the "king" in the direction of the boulders where the others had taken cover.

"I say, this is not a way to treat your sovereign!" Jared declaimed, but he did start moving, perhaps a bit more quickly than was required by the demands of gravitas.

Dannel paused to call upon the potency of a minor spell, the words of a song filling the air with the momentary tingle of magic. The enchantment, that of expeditious retreat, added to his speed, allowing him to move with fleetness across the plateau. He deliberately went wide of the hermit, hoping that the dragon would target the one who had caused it the most injury thus far.

The dragon's course, however, was slow and deliberate, giving them ample time to reach the shelter of the boulder field. The scattered boulders rose up like a dozen stubby fingers clutching skyward, with numerous cracks and crevices offering cover and concealment.

"Over here, elf!" Arun shouted, drawing Dannel around to a leaning rock that sheltered the paladin, gnome, and the ravaged form of Zenna. To Dannel's immense relief Zenna was moving about under her own power, although she still looked terrible, with half of her hair burned off to reveal blackened skin beneath. She'd lost her magical hat, and Dannel could see the white of her horns jutting from the front of her skull, contrasting jarringly with the red and black of her flame-ravaged skin.

"Where's Hodge?" Dannel asked, looking around for the other dwarf.

Arun gestured with a sharp nod, and Dannel turned to see Hodge crouched under another leaning boulder about ten paces distant. Upon meeting the elf's gaze, the dwarf straightened some, his expression darkening.

"I'm not as ready to die as the lot o'yer," he almost snarled, rubbing his face with his arm. But Dannel could see that he held to his heavy crossbow as if it were a lifeline, and that the fat steel head of the bolt quivered slightly.

"Here it comes again!" Mole warned.

"That crazy fool," Arun growled, looking around the edges of his cover to see Jared, still garbed in his illusory resplendence, approaching their bastion. The dragon seemed to fill the sky behind him, though he was still a good distance off. The dwarven paladin leapt out of cover long enough to grab the surprised madman, all but hurling him into a crevice in the lee of two jutting boulders.

Zenna started to get up, but Dannel quickly forestalled her. "Stay under cover," he ordered.

"I can fight," she said, her voice raspy.

"I know," he said. "But stay under cover, and let us draw its attention. Strike when it doesn't see you... that goes for you, too, Mole."

"Yessir, captain," Mole said with a salute, but it was clear from her expression that her gaiety was forced.

The sound of the wind grew louder for a moment, announcing the arrival of the dragon a moment before a hot wash of heat brushed over them. The flames struck at the front of their redoubt, licking around the stones but failing to do any real damage to the concealed adventurers. As the dragon arced off of its dive, a few missiles shot out after it. A throwing hammer rose up out of the cluster of boulders, but bounded off of the dragon's chest without doing damage. Mole's shot stuck in its hindquarters, but Dannel's arrow glanced off an armored scale. Hodge didn't even lift his bow, and Arun turned on him as he returned to where the rest of them hid.

"If you're not even going to shoot that, give it to me," the paladin said.

"Stay away from me," the dwarven miner growled.

"It's coming back," Mole's voice rose up from somewhere. "Looks like... uh oh, it's going to land!"

"Stand fast, my warriors—" Jared began, but Arun cut him off. "Just shut up and stay hidden," the dwarf commanded.

The hermit stood, exposing himself alarmingly to attack. "I'll not be spoken to in that manner, ser," he said, with a loud harrumph. "But nor will I allow some... some beast to waylay my kingdom!"

"Oh, for the love of..." Dannel said, darting around his covering boulder to get to the old man.

Even as he caught sight of Crazy Jared, though, Dannel looked up to see the broad outline of the dragon descending upon them. Jared saw it as well as the shadow of the creature fell over them, but instead of retreating in terror he lifted his arms dramatically, and pointed his rod at the drake.

“Be gone, foul creature!” he cried, and unleashed a loud screech that sounded like fingernails being drawn across a flat slab of slate. The companions covered their ears at the sound, but the dragon, its claws outstretched as it descended, roared and shook its head violently. The action caused it to miss its intended perch, and it pumped its wings to avoid an awkward landing among the uneven stones. As it pulled around its tail lashed out at where Jared stood, but Dannel leapt at the man, dragging both of them down back into the crevice moments before the tail struck the spot he’d been standing with enough force to crack the weathered stone.

“T’would appear that the creature has a resistance to my powers,” the old man said, as he struggled feebly in Dannel’s grasp.

“You think so?” the elf opined, trying to disengage himself while keeping his grip on his bow.

A few more missiles shot out at the creature from the hiding places of the companions as the dragon settled to a landing at the edge of the boulder field, again scoring minor hits at best. The dragon let out another terrible roar as it crept forward, scanning the nooks and crannies among the stony debris for signs of its victims. Its sibilant hiss crept over them like a promise of death, as it pulled itself up onto the nearest of the boulders with its powerful claws.

“Enough—I’m not stickin’ around here to be dragon-food!” Hodge yelled, and he broke from cover, lumbering away from the concealing boulders toward the edge of the plateau.

“Hodge, no!” Zenna cried, but there was nothing that she could do to stop the dwarf. The dragon was instantly drawn by the noise and movement, and leapt nimbly over the entire cluster of boulders, its wings pumping to help carry it over the obstacle. Its rear claws dug in upon landing, scoring the stone as it propelled itself forward with great speed.

Overtaking the fleeing dwarf in a matter of heartbeats.

Chapter 99

The companions were unable to intervene as the dragon leapt forward after the fleeing dwarf miner. Hodge could feel the impact of the dragon as it landed running, the very ground shaking beneath it, and his face was livid with terror as he glanced back over his shoulder, his legs pumping furiously in a violent yet futile effort to escape. He finally spun and fired his crossbow with a cry that was part anger, part fear, and part desperation, but the missile only glanced off the dragon’s scaled neck as its head shot down at its prey, its jaws snapping open to reveal row upon row of jagged teeth the size of daggers.

Hodge tried to twist away, but the edge of the dragon's jaws closed on his shoulder, tearing chain links, leather, and flesh as it dragged him roughly to the side in a broad arc. The dwarf's empty crossbow went flying uselessly away, and the struggling dwarf left behind a trail of scraped dirt spattered with blood for a full ten feet before he finally broke free, flopping to the ground in a bloody mess. The dragon quickly recovered to face the seriously injured dwarf, who feebly clutched at his axe as he struggled to rise to face the terrible beast's renewed assault.

"Hold on, brave warrior, help is on the way!" came Jared's voice from the shelter of the redoubt. A stirring battle chant spread out over the battlefield in old Chondanthan, the rousing cadences inspiring even though the archaic language of the verses that were lost over the sounds of the wind and the violence of the battle.

Dannel leapt up into a firing position in a raised notch between two boulders, his arrow coming back even as he settled into place. But even as he drew the arrow to his cheek, the flame-scorched bowstring snapped. The arrow went flying off into the rocks, and the elf slipped back, off-balance, only narrowly averting a fall into the gap between the looming stones.

From deeper in the rocks came another bolt. Mole's shot was more fortuitous than her companion's, and stuck between a gap in the scales in the dragon's back between its wings. The tiny bolt did little apparent damage, however, and did not distract the dragon from its immediate target. The dragon placed its hind legs solidly on the broken ground, rearing up and spreading its wings until it loomed over Hodge's battered and burned form like an angel of death. The dwarf, now holding his axe in a bloody hand, swiped at it as if the weak blow could keep it at bay, but the edge of the axe merely glanced harmlessly off the drake's torso; it was doubtful that the creature even felt it.

But even as the dragon let out a triumphant roar, an echoing sound came from its flank. The dragon's head came around even as Arun charged into the fray, his shield high in one hand and his heavy warhammer raised to strike in the other. The dwarf's battle cry echoed across the plateau as he crashed into the dragon with the force of a battering ram. Even the dwarf's considerable bulk could not actually drive the beast backward, but as he brought his hammer down and crushed it solidly into the dragon's chest, it was clear that the beast felt that blow.

But the dragon was not the sort of creature that could be felled by a single hit, and it was more than capable of defending itself.

Without further hesitation, the dragon unleashed a devastating assault upon the paladin. Already weakened by the blast of fire he'd absorbed earlier, the dwarf was hard-pressed to withstand the attacks that seemed to come from every direction at once. He saw the jaws snapping down and was able to bring his shield up in time to absorb an impact that nearly sent him sprawling. But that left his sides vulnerable, and claws with tips like forged iron savaged him, crushing into his flanks with incredible force. Although the magical plate armor covering his torso held, the sheer strength of the dragon and the concussive effects of the blows slammed through his body, juggling his organs like loose stones in an earthquake. One claw found a gap where his breastplate met the backplate of his armor, and when it drew back the long ivory tip was red with the paladin's blood. Arun cried out again, this time in pain, as he staggered back.

The dragon would have been quick to press its advantage, but a scrabbling to its side drew its attention momentarily. Hodge had finally regained his footing, and now stumbled away from the melee, fumbling at his belt pouch for the reassuring touch of a vial of healing elixir. The dragon, in an almost contemptuous gesture, slashed out at the fleeing dwarf with its long tail. The scaled member caught Hodge across the back like a whip, and he went down like a sack of potatoes dropped roughly to the floor.

The dragon emitted a hiss of triumph and turned its attention back to the paladin. The distraction had lasted all of two seconds, perhaps.

But in that instant, the madman, Jared, had clambered atop a boulder that jutted precariously from the field of debris. Still clad in his illusory splendor, he lifted his arms broadly into the air, the silver rod shining even though the sun was obscured by the gray clouds above.

"Fell monster!" he cried, his voice echoing in a way that seemed uncanny coming from his slender frame. "The very earth of my realm rejects your blemish upon its soil!"

He gestured, and light flared from his fingertips, momentarily casting long shadows from the gathered boulders about his perch. And then, even as the dragon roared again in challenge, the ground around the hillock rumbled in answer. As the companions watched in amazement, a patch of boulders shuddered and rose up out of the debris field, taking on a humanoid form as the heavy stones spun and cluttered together, given consistency by an animating force from beyond drawn here by the madman's magic.

Or at least that's how it seemed. Zenna was the first to notice the inconsistencies; once she could look away from the dominating aspect of the elemental, she saw that the bits of dirt that fell from its form vanished before they hit the ground, and that as it moved forward, the hillock behind it was still as whole as it had been before, undisturbed by the removal of the boulders of its frame.

An illusion, she thought, glancing up at the grinning madman atop his perch with a reevaluating look. But a skilled one, for that.

Had the dragon been older, it would have ignored the vision, even forgetting the inconsistencies that had alerted Zenna. But Gottrod was still young for its kind, and in its blood rage of battle it turned from the smaller creatures that had managed only minor stings against it to face this new adversary. But as it leapt forward the companions could see that it moved noticeably more sluggishly than in its initial rush; collectively those small wounds were beginning to take their toll on the seemingly invincible creature.

Too late the dragon realized its mistake, recognizing the figment for what it was even as the elemental lifted its boulder-arms to strike. The dragon hissed and looked up at Jared, who was still loudly pontificating upon the subject of the drake's imminent demise.

The dragon's eyes narrowed, and its jaws opened wide as it sucked in a deep breath.

Then everything went dark.

Dannel used the distraction provided by Jared's illusion to good effect, quickly drawing out a spare bowstring from his pouch and bracing himself against one of the boulders to restrung the weapon. When he saw the dragon's look at the madman, however, he knew what was coming even before the drake's jaw opened wide.

"Get down!" he cried, already moving even as the sphere of darkness conjured by Zenna obscured the beast's vision. A sound like a great bellows being pumped filled his ears, rivaling the pounding of his heart in his chest as he anticipated the death that was coming. He hurled forward, catching the edge of Jared's cloak, pulling them down for a second time into cover.

Fire roared all around them as the dragon breathed. Partly shielded by the jutting boulder, the elf nonetheless felt his skin crinkle as the fire washed over it. His head swam, and he felt his consciousness dangling by a slender thread.

Then the flames and smoke cleared away enough for him to see, and he saw Jared, pressed close to him, the old man's eyes shining with a surprising lucidity. The madman's skin was red and blistered, and good portion of his robe was charred, but he'd gotten off better than Dannel. There was little doubt of what would have happened had the full force of the dragon's breath had caught him while exposed atop the stones, however.

"Good work, lad," he said, clasping the elf's shoulder, helping him rise.

The dragon roared again, this time in frustration as it backed up out of the radius of the darkness. Right into Arun's charge, as the dwarf came up behind it, narrowly dodging the blind sweep of its tail. With its incredible senses the dragon wasn't truly blind even in the darkness, but again its relative inexperience was costing it precious seconds that the companions used to good advantage. With a cry to his divine patron, Arun unleashed a potent blow that caught the dragon solidly in the hindquarters. The paladin got revenge for his earlier wounds as he smote evil, channeling divine power through the wound into the very essence of the drake.

Gottrod was enraged, but through that its native intelligence still lurked, and despite the braggadocio and pride of the creature, it was quickly realizing the danger of its situation. While it didn't doubt its ability to tear this troublesome dwarf to pieces, there were still multiple spellcasters hidden in the rocks, and archers—that point confirmed a moment later as another crossbow bolt lanced out of concealment, stabbing painfully into the meat of its shoulder.

It wasn't fleeing, no—it could retreat, gauge the situation, and then return to blast these foes from above with fiery waves of hot flame. The dragon reared and pumped its powerful wings, lifting off into the air with a blast of downward wind that lifted a cloud of dust in its wake. Arun tried to close with it for a final blow, but the dragon pulled away before he could get close enough to strike. The dwarf shook his hammer and shouted a curse at it that was lost in the noise of its passage.

The dragon rose up over the field of boulders, already fifty feet above the ground and gaining altitude. It didn't see the elf who rose up out of his position of cover, bracing himself and drawing his heavy bow back smoothly. The shaft shot out as the dragon passed, and for a moment it seemed as though the arrow just vanished into its bulk as the creature—still potent and terrible despite its wounds—lifted away into the sky.

It continued for another hundred yards, seemingly unaffected, but with each mighty pump of its wings, a great gout of blood poured from its nicked heart into its body cavity. Finally the creature seemed to just... shudder in the air, hanging there for a moment two hundred feet above the plateau.

Then, inexorably, it fell.

Chapter 100

Zenna sat on the ground in a miserable heap, wrapped in the scorched remnants of her cloak, rocking back and forth slightly, though the wind had died as though the dragon's passing had stolen it away.

"Zenna," Dannel said softly, coming over to where she sat on the cold earth, a good distance from the others.

"Leave me alone," she said, turning away, betraying the source of her misery as she tried to tug up her cowl to conceal her features. The battered threads had taken too much abuse, however, and the hood came off in her hand, the last few strands tearing away as she tugged on them. Disconsolate, she tossed the fabric away.

"Zenna," the elf said, a bit more firmly. "You have to get up. The others need you."

She looked up at him, her eyes wet with the tears that she only held back through concerted effort. No, I cannot show weakness, not to him...

"I need you."

His words broke through her resolution, and she let out a sob as the tears released down her cheeks. But after a moment, she restored control, and as her face darkened. "Don't mock me... I don't have a mirror handy, but I can imagine how I look right now." Magical healing had restored her body, but it couldn't replace the hair that had been burned away from half of her head, nor could it make the regrown skin look natural, the pinkish patches of fresh growth forming splotches where they intersected with paler, unblemished skin, where an accidental placement of an article of clothing had provided protection.

She met his gaze with a cold look. "Get used to it, the hat's gone, so you'll have to face the real me from here on." Unable to maintain the challenge in her stare, she abruptly looked away.

He came forward, knelt in front of her. She tried to shy away, but he grabbed her by the arms, a little too roughly, perhaps, forcing her to look at him. What she saw in his eyes, though, when she could finally meet them, wasn't anger, but warmth.

"It was always the real you," he told her. "The person that I care about, Zenna."

He reached up, and she didn't shy away as he gently touched the side of her face. Then he pulled her forward—or she fell forward, it wasn't quite clear—and they held each other close.

Not far distant, amidst a patch of soil churned up by the claws of the dragon, Arun helped Hodge to his feet. The dwarf looked a sight worse than Zenna, although it was difficult to discern what was the result of the dragon's assault and what was part of his normally disheveled appearance. Arun offered him a second vial of healing elixir—he'd had to pour the first down the unconscious dwarf's throat, as he'd spent all of his divinely granted healing energy restoring Zenna to consciousness earlier. It was his last healing potion, but he offered it freely, despite the numerous wounds he himself had suffered.

Hodge could see how battered the paladin was, however, and shook his head. "I've got a healin' draught or two left me," he said. "You should tend to yer friends, or to yerself."

Arun nodded, and downed the contents of the vial without further comment. The two dwarves just stood there, silent. Hodge looked around him at the far edge of the plain around the edges of the boulder field, as if confirming what he'd seen earlier. The body of the dragon was a low mound, and from a distance might have been a hummock of turf and rocks, or something equally innocuous. Only he knew better. They all knew better.

"Sure it dead, eh?" the dwarf finally ventured.

"Mole's checking it out," Arun said, "But the way it fell..." Hodge's eyes widened slightly at that, but Arun's faith in his diminutive companion was clear in his voice, and the shield dwarf found yet another preconception disintegrating in his mind.

"Yeh..." he said. "Look..."

"There is no need to explain yourself," the paladin said. "You could not have known the danger of accompanying us, for we ourselves did not know what to expect. Facing a dragon's not exactly a common undertaking."

"Yeh, well, you 'andled 'er right enough," Hodge said. "Damnedest thing I've ever seen..." he once again trailed off, as though searching for words that he couldn't quite find.

"Well, I guess we'd better talk to that madman," Arun said. They looked at where Crazy Jared was standing alone near the base of the boulder mound, mumbling something to himself. "Normally I'd leave that to the elf, but it looks like he's got his hands full right about now."

He turned, but Hodge forestalled him. "Wait. Can... can I ask yer somepin?"

“Ask.”

“All that stuff yer were sayin’ earlier... when I was talkin’ ‘bout treasure, and yer was goin’ on ‘bout honor and the gods and helpin’ that dwarf hero find ‘is son and all that stuff... yer really believe all that... I guess what I’m sayin’...” He shrugged. “I don’t rightly know what I’m sayin’. Just when I saw you rush that dragon... I ain’t never seen the likes o’ that, anyway.”

Arun nodded, and for the first time the hard look toward the other dwarf softened. “I don’t pretend to have all the answers, friend. I can only say what I believe, and the Code that gives me... gives me meaning to my life. It didn’t always, and there was a time when I doubted...” He turned, his gaze lingering on Dannel and Zenna. “But I found some friends who helped me find my way back to the path of truth... my truth, perhaps, but a good one, I think.”

Hodge nodded, and there was nothing mocking in his eyes this time as he regarded the paladin solemnly. “Well then, I be guessin’ we shouldn’t keep the wacko waitin’ then, eh?”

Mole approached the fallen carcass of the dragon, savoring the feelings that swirled in her as she neared the great beast. A dragon. A real live—well, not anymore—dragon! In all her dreams of adventure, she’d never imagined that she’d meet up with one of the fantastic beasts of legend and bard’s tale. Her uncle, of course, had battled several in his career, and she’d always relished those accounts, stories of drama and hang-onto-your-seat thrill that he’d told in that cutting style of his. She’d read his book, too, even before she was old enough to read, her little fingers tracing over the sketches of her uncle and his friends, of wondrous places and terrible creatures, crafted from recollections of long years spent on the roads of Faerûn’s Wild West.

She swelled with pride as she noticed one of her bolts jutting from between two scales on the creature’s hindquarters. She’d gotten a few hits in, she thought, though it was really Dannel’s bow and Arun’s hammer that had brought the mighty beast down. Well, she’d gotten through the battle without a scratch, and that was something...

She checked the dragon—a bit more perfunctorily than she’d have liked, but her friends were waiting—and returned toward the shelter of the boulder field. She wiped her hands on her breeches; she’d taken a few mementoes from the carcass to tuck into her magical backpack, and dragonblood was sticky. Her magical boots carried her across the plateau in great strides, but as she passed the flame-blackened area where the dragon had initially attacked, she paused. She bent over and uncovered a small object almost indistinguishable from the blackened scrub.

Ah. Zenna’s hat. It was a little charred, but she hefted it experimentally, and nodded to herself. It still felt magical, but Mole had to admit that her inexpert evaluation wasn’t necessarily as accurate as Zenna’s detect magic spell.

She tucked the hat into her pocket, and rushed back to rejoin her companions.

Chapter 101

The five travelers formed a half-circle behind Jared as the madman led them back to the charred remains of his dwelling.

Zenna looked to be collected and in control once again—her features now restored to their normal appearance, thanks to Mole’s return of her magical hat to her—but there was still a stiffness to her motion and demeanor that revealed the strain that yet suffused her. Dannel walked near her, his own concern written clearly in his dark amber eyes.

Jared seemed nonplussed by the destruction of his modest living quarters. Indeed, as he walked, he exclaimed, “A good bit of damage done by that rampaging beast, but do not despair—we shall rebuild, better than before!”

“If yer thinkin’ I’ll be laborin’ here to build a new house fer a crazy, yer dafter ‘an I thought,” Hodge grumbled, but his voice wasn’t loud enough to carry to where the “king” strode at their van.

“Um... your majesty...” Dannel began.

“Behold, the peaceful land of Anduria!” Jared said with a flourish, lifting his arms wide as he turned once again to face him. As he did so, his thin fingers twisted a pattern in the air, and the liquid syllables of magic poured from his lips.

Zenna tensed for a moment as she recognized the sounds and gestures as spellcasting, but then forced herself to relax. This man, though clearly mentally sick, had not offered them any threat, and in fact had managed to aid them somewhat against the dragon. “Another illusion,” she muttered, more to herself than to her friends, although Mole heard her.

Even as she spoke the landscape was transformed. Where the sparse and rocky plateau had stretched was now an expansive landscape of vibrant growth and bright color. The thorny and scraggly brush of before was replaced by flowering bushes and squat trees laden with fruit of a dozen varieties. The illusion was so complete that even the smells of the flowers could be detected by the companions, although the overall effect was ruined somewhat by the resumption of the previous landscape at the edges of the plateau, outside the limits of the spell.

Jared, however, seemed oblivious to such distinctions, or even to the fact that his own magic had conjured the illusion. “Tis it not a beauteous place?” he said wistfully.

“Indeed, sire,” Dannel said, coming forward before any of the others could offer commentary. “No other place rivals it in reputation. And so we have come, not only to look upon such marvels, but to protect it from the dangers that threaten it.”

“Smooth,” Arun commented.

“Yes, and you fought bravely,” Jared said. “And we shall not forget your bold defense of our royal person, ser knight—a great estate in the western marches of the realm shall surely be yours, for the service done to your liege this day!”

“Oh, I want one too!” Mole said, coming forward.

“Your Grace is... generous,” Dannel replied, with a deep bow. “But first we must confront the danger that yet lingers. The dragon,” he said, indicating the fallen creature, in case the madman hadn’t clearly marked its nature, “is but the leading force of an invading force, bent on conquering this land!”

“I knew it!” Jared exclaimed. “The treacherous demon-queen of Kheltos plans anew to overthrow Anduria! Long have I suspected that she survived our last confrontation, and still seeks to destroy our fair land! I must raise the army, to defend the borders!”

“Um... sire,” Dannel interrupted, “My... knights... and I are prepared to go and do battle against this foe, but require some direction. The enemy is cunning, and this time are coming up from an access point to the Underdark, which is located near here...”

Jared nodded. “The Pit of the Seven Jaws. Of course, I should have guessed.”

“Seven jaws?” Mole said. “I don’t think I like the sound of that...”

“A guardian of some sort?” Zenna ventured.

“Have your squire fetch pen and ink, and I will prepare a map, to guide you, noble knight,” Jared said. “I am certain with your prowess, any defenses possessed by the foe shall be breached!”

“I don’t doubt it, sire,” Dannel said. Zenna procured a sheet of parchment, an old pen, and a vial of ink from her bag, and handed them to the madman, who quickly bent over a rock and started making quick sketches on the parchment. In a matter of minutes, he’d prepared a drawing, which he handed to Dannel. The elf examined the map—it appeared fairly clear, actually, although most of the landmarks were keyed with names that were presumably sites within “Anduria.”

“We’d best get a good start then,” Dannel said, rolling up the map for safe storage in his pouch, then taking up his bow. “Will you be... all right, here, sire?”

The old man nodded. “Fear not for me, sir knight! I have considerable forces left to me... if Kheltos thinks to catch Anduria unaware, she shall be quite surprised when she strikes!”

“He’ll be well enough, elf,” Arun said, as the adventurers turned away. “He’s been up here quite some time, looks like, and for all the apparent difficulties he has with reality, his magic is clearly potent.”

“Powerful indeed,” Zenna remarked, casting a last look back at the old man, who regarded them with a beaming look full of confidence.

Mole had lingered behind a moment, and as the others started away, she leaned in and said, conspiratorially, “Are you really crazy?”

The old man knelt so that their faces were on the same level. Matching her tone, he said, “What a bold question to ask of your sovereign! But you’re not the first to make such an assertion—I suspect there was a bit of over-familiarity earlier in my family tree, if you get my meaning—so I will answer. Are not all of us who walk the byways of this wondrous world at least a bit crazy? I say I am crazier than some, and saner than the demon queen of Kheltos, may she ever be stymied in her foul plots!”

With a wink, he rose. Mole smiled, and with a quick bow, she hurried to rejoin the others.

“Well?” Zenna asked, when the gnome had rejoined them. “What’s the verdict?”

“Undecided,” Mole said, glancing back at the solitary man standing on the bluff, the wind tugging at his clothes, now again ragged and threadbare.

* * * * *

They pressed on for the remainder of that day, putting a number of miles between them and their battle with the dragon, and after an uneventful night camped in a sheltered hollow they continued on their trek. For once the weather seemed to favor them, although the icy wind continued to blow down out of the peaks to their right. Dannel had little difficulty following the landmarks sketched on their map, and held them true to their course as they made their way steadily northward. They had only one encounter, with a trio of bugbear hunters heading down out of the mountains to the lowlands, moving perpendicular to the adventurers’ line of march. The hulking goblinoids spotted the travelers from Cauldron but were not eager for a confrontation, and the two groups gave each other a wide berth before continuing on their way. Since the bugbears didn’t seem to be heading in the direction of Jared’s hut or any other known settlements, the companions let them be. The two dwarves weren’t especially happy about that, for different reasons; Arun expressed concern that the bugbears might be part of a larger company intent on trouble in the region, while Hodge suggested that the three would circle around to follow them, and slit their throats when they paused to camp for the night.

“There’s no need to seek out trouble, when enough of it finds us as it is,” Dannel said, as they made their way back along the trail. Holding up the map to catch the light of the cloud-obscured sun, he added, “And I think that we’ll reach our destination before nightfall, in any case. Even if there are more of them, they’d be foolish to follow us into the Underdark.”

“Aye, an’ what does that say about us then?” Hodge grumbled, but he did not offer further dissent as they continued their trek.

True to the elf’s words, the faint light of the fading sun still hung tenuously over the mountains when they found themselves clambering up another ridge to another broad shelf that jutted out from the range like a server holding a tray. Dannel identified this as the final marker on his map, and strung his bow, the others copying his action as they prepared their own weapons. This plateau slanted down toward its far end, and in that direction, they quickly encountered a gaping square pit that sank down into darkness where the weak light of the closing day did not penetrate.

Warily, they closed to the crumbling edges of the pit. A rank odor from below assailed their nostrils, and they could see that a narrow metal staircase had been anchored into the sides of the pit, descending around its perimeter into the darkness below.

“That’s a stink I remember,” Arun said. “Strange, I once thought that the surface had an ill odor, when first I came up from the deeper realms of the Rift.”

“Time plays odd tricks with memory,” Zenna said, stepping forward near the edge so that she could look down into the pit.

“Careful,” Dannel cautioned. “That edge looks non too sturdy.”

Zenna shot him a glance that had a slight edge, but she was clearly watching her steps as she cast one more look below and then drew back. “It looks to be about sixty feet down,” she said. The stair runs around the perimeter, and there appears to be landings at each corner. I can’t be sure, but I think there’s an opening of some sort at the bottom, a deep crevice in the stone.”

“What about the seven jaws?” Mole asked.

“We’ll find out, I suppose,” Arun said. “I’ll take the lead, but keep your distance and ware your steps. I dislike the looks of that stair.”

“Stay close to me,” Dannel told Zenna and Mole. “If we should fall, I have a spell that can slow our descent, that requires only a split second to call into being.”

Arun started down, his heavy boots clinking softly on the metal surface of the stairs. Hodge and Dannel exchanged a look, and then, with a fair amount of grumbling, the dwarf started down next. The others followed after a few moments, remaining close to the edge of the pit. All held their bows at the ready, save for Arun, whose heavy warhammer balanced prepared in his muscled fist, ready to unleash fury at the slightest hint of danger. The metal stairs creaked slightly under their weight, but held.

In the darkness of the crevice below, something stirred.

Chapter 102

Metal creaked, the wind blew across the lip of the pit, and tension floated heavily in the air as the companions made their way down into the shadowy darkness. Arun reached the first corner landing and started down the second flight of stairs, the others following slowly behind.

A sound alerted them, movement in the darkness within the fissure, deep enough to be out of the line of sight even of those with darkvision. Something heavy, scraping on stone. Then a sibilant hiss, a sound that filled the pit like a sinister caress.

The companions readied their weapons.

Something moved into view, crossing the boundary between total blackness and mere shadows. A long, reptilian head, shaped like a dagger, jaws filled with sharp teeth, the whole perched atop a long, twisting neck, like a snake.

“Another drake!” Hodge warned, backing up against the false security of the pit wall, lifting his crossbow.

But Dannel, who had realized the true significance of the title of this place, given to them by Jared, recognized with horror the true nature of the foe. “Back!” he warned them. “Back up, get up!”

The elf’s discovery was understood by all of them a heartbeat later, as the creature came forward into view. Another head appeared, and then another, until a twisting nest of long necks and deadly heads had appeared. The heads—seven of them, in all—were attached to a fat, powerful body, propelled forward by short, muscular legs. It was long, with much of its bulk still trailing back into the fissure. The beast was a dark gray tinged with purple, with streaks of starker violet trailing up its necks and marking the bony forehead of each head.

“Hydra!” Dannel shouted, putting a name to the beast.

“Well, don’t just stand there, put a hurt on it!” Arun yelled, starting down the stairs toward the creature.

“No!” Dannel shouted, but the warning came too late. Even as the companions launched their missiles at the creature, a volley of bolts stabbing down from the bows of Mole, Zenna, and Hodge, the hydra’s heads came up toward the descending dwarf. Arun was still too high up for its jaws to reach him, surely, but then, as the others watched in horror, several reptilian maws opened wide, and gouts of white ice blasted from the depths of the creature’s belly into the dwarf. The paladin, caught in the multiple blasts, staggered backward against the wall, his armor and shield now tinged white where ice had condensed on the metal surfaces.

“Arun!” Mole cried.

Dannel fired his bow, knowing even as he did that the shot was wasted. Indeed, even as his arrow slammed into the hydra’s body, one of the earlier wounds—from the massive size of the bolt jutting from the wound, from Hodge’s bow—healed, the thick shaft pushed harmlessly free as the tear closed itself.

“It’s regenerating!” Zenna said, recognizing what Dannel had already known would happen.

“Back up, now!” Dannel said. “The creature’s too big for those stairs, it won’t be able to follow us up!”

“I’ll get Arun!” Mole said, already darting nimbly down the steps toward the first landing.

But Hodge was already moving. Frozen by fear by the creature's appearance, and chilled by the backblast of its frosty breath against Arun, he'd nonetheless scored a hit in the initial volley. Even before Dannel's words his legs were already starting him on their course back up the stairs, but he hesitated, turned back to where the hydra was continuing toward Arun, most of its body now out of the fissure. Gods... it was huge, larger even than the dragon they'd battled before. As he watched the hydra unleashed another frost blast from another head, chilling the already frozen paladin further. Arun was still conscious, trying to shake free from the ice coating his compact frame, still trying to reach the creature to attack. The heads were almost just below him, now, and if he charged to the next landing, they would be able to meet him.

And tear him to pieces.

Hodge was surprised to find himself charging down, toward Arun. Frost exploded around him, and for a moment of stark terror he found himself blind, stumbling down a stair where one false step would lead to a quick and messy death. But then he was beside Arun, and he grabbed the paladin on the arm.

"We've got to get back up!" he shouted.

Through his pain and rage, the paladin nodded. With relief Hodge started trudging back up the steps, Arun close behind. Another frost blast followed them, but they'd reached the first landing by this point, and most of the cold was blocked by the metal framework of the staircase. The hydra's heads hissed at them as they withdrew, snapping as a few more crossbow bolts from the other companions above harassed the creature. Finally, frustrated at the escape of its supper, the creature turned and with surprising adroitness returned to the shelter of the fissure. Within ten seconds, it was out of sight, and quiet returned to the pit.

Arun and Hodge reached the top, where the others waited. Both dwarves found the nearest open spot and dropped to the ground, breathing heavily, Arun shivering from the cold blasts that had chilled him to the bone.

"You're frozen nigh to death," Zenna said, her role as healer taking over as she knelt beside the ailing paladin. She took the healing wand she'd recovered from Triel Eldurast, and used it to treat the dwarf, restoring color to his pale skin and sending soothing warmth through his body.

"There's not much power left in this," Zenna said, holding up the wand for a moment before tucking it back into its pocket. Dannel, meanwhile, had used his own wand of cure light wounds to attend to Hodge, although the second dwarf had not suffered to the same degree as Arun.

"Not all foes can be bashed head-on," the elf said chidingly, as Arun, much recovered, pulled himself back to his feet. Arun shot him a hard look, but then grudgingly nodded.

"So now what are we going to do?" Mole asked. "Find another way?"

“I know of no other route into the Underdark,” Dannel said. “At least not for hundreds of miles.”

“That thing’s just going to wait for us down there, and we can’t attack it unless it comes out of the fissure,” Zenna said. “It seemed to regenerate very quickly the damage we inflicted upon it.”

“What if we cut the heads off?” Hodge suggested. “Seems like that’s where most of the danger be, if’n you ask me.”

“That would work, if you had fire or acid handy,” Dannel said. “But risky. Hydras have the ability to regrow lost heads; in fact, if you sever one and do not quickly seal the stump, two heads may regrow where one once was.”

“Well, blasted bloody damn!” Hodge exclaimed. “How we s’posed to beat such a thing?”

“I admit, I do not know,” Dannel said. “I doubt we could do enough damage from range to the body quickly enough to overcome its natural regeneration. And if we closed to melee, down there, it would quickly tear us apart. Those jaws are strong, like a dragon’s bite.”

The companions stood there, glum at their prospects. Mole, however, had taken off her magical backpack, and was trying to lift something bulky from inside. Zenna noticed her, and turned toward her.

“What are you doing?”

“Well,” Mole said, grunting with a bit of effort as she lifted a small cask—that should have been enough to fill the entire backpack by itself, had it not been magical—free and laid it on the ground. “That thing breathes frost, so I’d imagine that it doesn’t much like fire.”

Zenna wrinkled her forehead, not understanding, but Dannel had recognized the cask, heavily crusted with heavy sealant that oozed out from between the gaps in the wood. “Lamp oil?” he asked.

Mole grinned sheepishly. “Well...”

“No.” Zenna said. “Mole, tell me that you haven’t been carrying...”

“What?” Hodge said, looking at the cask curiously.

“Well, it worked so well when we were fighting the cult under Cauldron.”

“Mole...” Zenna said, stern disapproval in her voice.

“I’d consider ourselves quite fortunate that our friend here wasn’t caught in one of the breath attacks from that dragon,” Dannel said.

“What?” Hodge repeated, a confused look on his face.

Mole shrugged. "Okay, so it's alchemist's fire."

Chapter 103

Arun walked boldly down the stairs. Each step rang loudly against the metal stairs, echoing off the tight confines of the pit wall. Those steps had the sound of finality to them, and they did not slow or falter as the paladin descended into darkness.

By the time he had reached the first landing, that sound had been joined by another, a lilting melody that contrasting jarringly with the sonorous dirge of the metallic footsteps. Dannel's song was one of hope and bravery, and while none of those present could understand the words in elvish, the sentiment shone through, lifting their spirits.

The fissure remained dark and quiet. Too quiet.

Arun reached the first landing, and without hesitation, continued toward the second. He slowed only briefly, as he reached the slippery place where the cryohydra's snowy blasts had scored. The metal of the stairs was still coated with ice, but the sure-footed dwarf soon made his way past.

He reached the second landing. He was now within reach of the hydra's jaws from below, if it came out into the open.

"Well?" he roared. "You coming out to get your comeuppance, or have you decided to slink off like the snake you are?"

Quiet.

From the lip of the pit above, Mole flipped a coin down into the abyss. The coin, enchanted earlier by Dannel's light spell, glowed brightly as it descended, and as it landed with a loud metallic clatter, bouncing a few feet into the air a few times before settling, it cast its bright radiance into the fissure.

Illuminating the hydra, crouched low in the opening, poised to charge.

The companions had barely registered the appearance of the beast when it roared and rushed forward, its jaws snapping angrily at the air. Arun, caught off guard by the hydra's sudden appearance, nonetheless stood his ground as the creature exploded into the open and rose up to its full height, several toothy maws already probing at the paladin's vantage. A blast of cold washed over him, but he held his ground, bolstered by the divine favor of his patron that he'd invoked upon his first step back onto the stairs. He hefted his weapon—not his own familiar warhammer, but Dannel's masterwork longsword, borrowed against this particular purpose.

The hydra had to move into position for all of its heads to be able to threaten Arun, and the dwarf's careful positioning meant that it gave him some cover against assault from below. The hydra, however, did not hesitate, rearing up as it leapt to the attack.

“Now, Hodge!” Dannel cried. A stream of curses erupted from the far side of the pit, where sounds of heavy straining emerged from the brush that screened the pit edge.

A pair of draconic heads shot forward at Arun. The dwarf caught one on his shield, but the force of the impact was like a hit from a ram, driving him back a step. The second bit tore at his other arm, threatening momentarily to disarm him before he could pull his wrist free from its grip. His heavy bracer protected him from a crippling wound, but blood trailed from his hand as he lifted his sword to strike.

And strike he did, bringing the sword down with the full force of his strength on the exposed neck of the head that had just bitten him. The maneuver opened him to another bite, as a third head snaked in and caught him in the leg, but he shrugged off the pain as he sawed the sharp steel edge across the gash he’d opened. The hydra drew back in pain as the crippled head went flying, landing in a sick mess of blood on the edge of the platform.

But the severed stump was already beginning to twist and pulse...

Zenna abruptly appeared on the edge of the first platform, her cloak of invisibility falling from her as she incanted the words of a new spell, one she’d mastered in long nights of studying the formulae in her spellbook in camp, long after the others had already gone to sleep. She’d first seen it cast when the evil halfling mage Sarcem had hurled it at her, and now her careful preparation paid off as the coruscating energy of a scorching ray erupted from her fingers, flaring over the front of the hydra. The flames deeply seared the creature, cauterizing the stump Arun had made, ensuring that for now, at least, only six heads would threaten them.

But the hydra responded quickly, and a pair of heads swiveled toward her, and unleashed two blasts of icy cold in quick succession.

Zenna dodged back, but could not fully avoid the frozen breath. Her heritage protected her to some degree, but still she felt the bitter cold cut through her clothes and chill her to the bone. She stumbled back until she felt the hard surface of the wall against her, and barely kept her footing as she fought off unconsciousness.

With a hearty cry Hodge appeared, half-lifting, half-pushing an awkward burden. As he reached the edge of the pit he hurled it forward, nearly going over after it, until Mole caught his arm and dragged him back. The burden, which looked some bulky objects wrapped in a spare cloak, plummeted down into the pit. For a moment it looked like the missile would clip the edge of the platform where Arun stood, and the friends held their breath, but then it narrowly overshot that obstacle, and slammed heavily into the body of the hydra.

The hydra sagged as the projectile sank into its body with a meaty plop. The small boulders they’d wrapped into the cloak were heavy, but their primary purpose was to crush the small cask laid in the center, on impact...

Fire rushed outward in an eager rage over the entire upper body of the hydra. It screamed and thrashed, trying to escape flames that could not be extinguished by normal means. It barely noticed the stings as Mole and Dannel sent arrows into it, but the flames found the wounds, and seared them. Its heads twisted and tangled, and it fired blasts of cold in random directions, trying unsuccessfully to recover enough to douse the flames that covered it.

Arun had started forward again to try and get another shot at an exposed neck, but he had to recoil as a pair of frost blasts bracketed his position. The icy blasts laid a layer of frost on the metal, and now the underlying supports creaked alarmingly, as the pounding that they had sustained finally began to overcome their structural integrity.

“Oh, da—”

He didn't get a chance to finish his thought, as the entire platform came loose, tumbling—along with the dwarf—to the floor of the pit.

Onto the thrashing form of the burning hydra.

Chapter 104

This was easier than I thought it would be, Zenna thought, staring out into the darkness ahead.

Only it wasn't really dark, not truly. Traces of phosphorant lichens crossed the walls of the great cavern, shedding just enough light for her to clearly make out the distinguishing features of this place. And it hadn't really been that easy, either... but it made her feel better to think so, to place the challenges they'd faced getting her against the difficulties that no doubt faced them now, directly ahead.

The hydra... now that had been tough, although chance had favored them in their second confrontation with the creature. The wreckage of the falling staircase had crushed the creature, ending its struggles against the combined damage unleashed upon it by the companions. Whether it would have survived without that inadvertent intervention, she couldn't be certain.

She felt rather than heard Dannel sidle up behind her, his footsteps like whispers on the uneven stone. The elf had impressed her with his skills in this dark place, almost as much as the ability of the dwarves with their uncanny knack for anticipating the dangers in these dark realms under the ground. Arun, she knew, had had to confront a fair amount of emotional baggage in returning here, to the depths of the Underdark. But the paladin seemed steadfast, as undaunted as when they'd pulled him out of the wreckage piled onto the carcass of the hydra. Dannel had intervened quickly, leaping into the chasm even as the reverberations of the collapse had faded, using his feather fall spell to ease him into a soft landing on the edges of the jagged mass of debris. He'd found Arun quickly, still struggling to free himself despite the pair of steel joists jutting from deep punctures in his side and hip. Once he'd helped the dwarf free himself and treated the most serious of his wounds, the others had made their way down to join them, descending on a rope Mole produced from her magical haversack.

Even before they explored the fissure, they'd gotten a quick reminder of what lay ahead for them. A corpse, half-encased in ice. Zenna had known what it was even before Arun confirmed it, with a dark growl.

"Drow elf."

It was impossible to discern much from the body of the frozen elf, but the chain links of the armor shirt he wore had been mithral, and glowed in response to Zenna's detect magic spell. Dannel wore that shirt now, the bright silvery links concealed by the darker colors of his tunic, letting him better fade into the shadows. Zenna hoped that the added protection of the magical mailshirt would help keep him safe, here in the realms of shadow.

It had taken them the better part of two days to get here, long hours descending ever-deeper into the mantle of Abeir-Toril. Zenna suspected that they haven't covered more than ten miles or so in raw distance from the fissure, but with all the twists and turns, ascents and descents over the uneven ground, she figured that they had probably walked at least twice that. They'd had two encounters in that time, although they'd happened so fast that she hadn't even had a chance to cast a spell. No, she corrected herself mentally, she had used a scorching ray to finish that troll, but by the time she'd reached the battle the creature was already down, with three of Dannel's arrows stuck in its torso, one leg bent at a weird angle from a blow of Arun's hammer, and half its side torn open by Hodge's axe. Zenna had arrived to see its terrible wounds already beginning to knit as the creature's regenerative properties begun to take hold, but her spell had put an end to that, turning the creature into a pyre. Dannel's new armor had proven its worth, keeping the creature from getting a rending hold on him, but his arm had borne deep gashes where one claw had momentarily gotten a grip on him. They were fortunate that the creature had been alone, Zenna mused; trolls were deadly foes at best.

The other encounter had come and gone even quicker. They'd been crossing a small cavern, a bubble in the rock that was bisected by the tunnel, when a trio of huge bats had detached from the darkness of the cavern roof and swept down toward them. This time Zenna was the first to spot the danger, and called out a warning to the others even as she'd fumbled with the string to her crossbow. She didn't get a shot off; the bats dove with a shriek, lunged at them with nasty bites that failed to connect with any of their targets, and then streaked off down the corridor. They hadn't come back, and they left one of their number bleeding out its life on the stones.

Two encounters, potentially deadly, but thus far no serious injuries. Too easy.

And now they were here, the tunnel opening onto the edge of a vast cavern. Below, the surface of the cavern was flat; too flat, Zenna thought, thinking that maybe the dark sheet that glistened slightly in the faint luminescence was the surface of an underground lake. The air here was thick and moist, bolstering that supposition. But most of their attention was drawn to the structure on the far side of the cavern, excavated from the cliff opposite. The most prominent feature was a bulbous construction that jutted out into the cavern proper, a building that to Zenna's eyes had the look of some great and terrible fish. Its eyes and mouth were dark circles that hinted at deeper spaces beyond them.

"Bhal-Hamatugn, I would presume," Dannel said.

“I’m not looking forward to taking a swim anytime soon,” Arun commented. “How we going to get across?”

“Let’s go down and take a look,” Zenna suggested.

They made their way slowly down the steep slope from where the tunnel entered the cavern, careful not to dislodge any loose stones or make any other loud noises that might give away their position. Zenna figured it was a useless effort; when they’d entered here Mole had been carrying her small miner’s lamp, and although she’d shuttered it once they’d seen that a cavern lay ahead, no doubt anything hostile in the fish-fortress had seen its flicker across the darkness of the cavern. Carrying light sources down here was all but guaranteed to ensure that any threats would see them before they were seen, but there was no alternative; Dannel and Mole both had excellent night-vision, but unlike Zenna and the dwarves, could not see in total blackness.

They made their way down to the floor of the cavern without incident. The glossy flat surface was indeed a lake, stretching entirely across the width of the cavern. Down here their view was obscured somewhat by a faint mist that hung above the surface of the water, and the complex on the far side of the lake was just a vague shadow superimposed against the sheer cliff beyond. The occasional sound of dripping water was the only sound, punctuated every now and again by a faint splash that might have been caused by anything.

“Cheerful place,” Mole said dryly.

“I dinna s’pose yer got a boat in that pack o’ yers,” Hodge queried.

“No, sorry,” the gnome said with a shrug.

“I can swim across and take a look,” Dannel suggested.

“You’re daft, elf, but there’s no doubting your courage,” Arun said. “These lakes tend to have nasty things living in them, and they don’t take kindly to outsiders making a disturbance.”

“Well, what’s your idea then?”

Zenna quieted them with a sudden, “Shh—look!”

They all turned to the lake, staring out through the mists and what Zenna indicated with a pointed finger. A dark shadow emerged from the swirling wisps of fog, taking form and resolving into a tall, gaunt, humanoid figure directing a long canoe across the lake toward them. It bore an oar in one hand, and a spear in the other, held aloft like a pinion missing its standard.

“What in all the hells be ‘at?” Hodge said, his loaded crossbow held readied in his hands.

Even with their sharp vision, Mole and Dannel couldn't define anything more than a shadow in the poor light. But Arun squinted into the murk, and as the strange boatman drew nearer he spat. "Goggler," he said. "Kuo-toa."

As if his statement had triggered the creature to action, the creature lowered its hands, letting its spear drop, and the paddle drag idly through the water in the wake of the angular craft. They could all see it, now, a cross between a fish and a man, with huge, bulbous eyes and a gaping mouth that seemed to suck at the air, the folds of flesh at its throat distending with each heavy breath. It sat there, watching them, for a long moment.

"Well, should we say something?" Mole whispered.

"It don' look friendly to me. Best give it a bolt, just to be safe," Hodge suggested, not taking his eyes from the creature.

It croaked something at them in a wet, guttural language, punctuated by clicks like the sound of bubbles popping.

"What's it saying?" Mole asked.

"It's Undercommon," Arun reported, his feelings about the creature evident in his tone and expression, even half-hidden by the faceplate of his helm. "It said something about the 'Eye of Darkness,' or somesuch, and offered to take us through it."

"Could be a trap," Hodge said.

"Well, of course it's a trap, silly," Mole said. "But still, better to be ambushed in a boat than swimming with your gear, I say."

"How 'bout we shoot it, then take the boat?" the dwarf returned.

"I suppose it didn't occur to you that maybe it understands what we're saying, that maybe these things have excellent hearing, and that the building over there—let alone this lake—may have a hundred of them watching us even as we speak?" Zenna hissed, the words coming out of the side of her mouth as she kept her eyes on the kuo-toa boatman. The creature just sat there, watching them, its alien expression inscrutable.

Dannel had silently stepped forward, until he stood on the very edge of the lake, the water sloshing softly against the leather of his boots.

"Now, what's that elf doin'?" Hodge asked.

As the others watched, Dannel began to sing, softly at first, his voice forming the outlines of a melody, wordless, the notes floating out across the water. The kuo-toa watched him intently, and seemed to tense for a moment, before sagging slightly, its body growing limp.

The song faded. Dannel beckoned, and the creature took up its paddle, driving the canoe toward them with several swift strokes. It drew the craft to a halt at the very edge of the lake, and croaked out something to them in greeting.

“It wants us to come with it,” Arun reported. “Is there a reason we should be trusting it, now, elf?”

Dannel turned to his companions, so that his body sheltered him from direct view from the kuo-toa. Quietly, he said, “I have set a charm upon the creature, so it will temporarily consider me a friend and ally. We must be careful, though; any hostile action upon it will disrupt the magic.” His eyes focused on Hodge as he spoke the final words.

“Bah,” the dwarf said. “Mark my words, it be leadin’ us into a trap.”

“Well, why don’t we ask it?” the elf replied, with a nod toward Arun.

The companions turned as one, and focused their attention upon the kuo-toa.

Chapter 105

Silence enfolded them, broken only by the soft, rhythmic splash of the kuo-toa’s oar into the flat surface of the lake. The mists formed a thick barrier all around them that pressed in close with clammy fingers against their flesh; it was as if the Underdark, the cavern, the very world about them had vanished, replaced only by a featureless, cold, wet void.

“Yer all as crazy as this goggler,” Hodge growled, his thick brows furrowed as he tried in vain to penetrate the murk.

The kuo-toa let out a croak that sounded uncannily loud in the surrounding quiet.

Their interrogation of the creature had yielded little of use, even with the prod of Dannel’s charm spell. Hodge’s judgment seemed to be accurate when it came to the kuo-toa’s state of mind, for it spoke in rambling, confused statements that Arun could make little sense of. When asked about Zenith Spintershield, the kuo-toa had replied, “I glimpse Zenith amid the great darkness, but he glimpses things beyond the dark where it is darker still. Dark than dark, yes. And I see what lies where Zenith sees, in the dark. The cold, wet dark. It’s dark, dark where I see Zenith. Are you from the dark?” When prodded about the number of guards in the complex, the kuo-toa returned with, “The children of the Sea Mother wait in the dark, wait, yes, many eyes, unblinking in the cold darkness, ever watching for her return.” When asked about who was in charge of the outpost, the kuo-toa’s answers got even more rambling, referring alternatively to someone named “Margh-Michto,” who sounded like a priest of sorts, and to someone else named “Dhorlot,” who the kuo-toa described as “the father of the sacred brood, the holy children of the Sea Mother, whose spawn will stand at Her side as the chosen.”

Well, at least there was one hopeful side to it, as Zenna had noted, “If they’re all as disoriented as this one is, maybe we won’t have such a tough time of it after all.”

“Spell or no, I’d not trust that one as far as I could toss him,” Hodge had added.

Their brief and mostly fruitless discussion had yielded little of concrete use, and they were ultimately left with the same unpleasant choices they'd faced before the creature had arrived. They'd elected finally to press on across the lake, using the boat and their guide while Dannel's spell retained its efficacy. The elf warned them that he could not guarantee that the spell would work again once this casting faded, but he reassured them that it would retain its hold upon the mind of their captive for at least a few more hours yet.

So now they steered a course across the lake toward the fish-shaped dome they'd seen earlier, from their vantage on the far side of the cavern. The kuo-toa seemed to have no difficulty guiding them through the mists, and soon they saw a dark form loom up out of the mists ahead of them. It was a stone pillar, its uneven shape truncated by a jagged line six feet above its base, the whole jutting at a slight angle from the edge of a stone platform that extended out over the edge of the water. As the canoe drew up to the platform, they could see that stairs rose up from it in a steep ascent. The mists thinned, and they could see that the staircase vanished into a gaping maw, the main entrance to the kuo-toa outpost. The resemblance of the structure to a giant fish was even more pronounced from this angle, and the dark mouth looked particularly forbidding when it seemed poised to swallow them up. The dark orbs of the fish's "eyes" gaped higher up, and each of the companions could feel the prickly feeling of being watched by those lifeless cavities.

"I wouldn't be surprised if they had sentries up there, watching," Arun said under his breath as their guide fastened the canoe to the pillar.

"Just act natural, like we belong here, friends coming for a visit," Dannel replied covertly.

"Comin' fer dinner, more like... as the main course," Hodge grumbled, taking up the rear as they started up the stairs. Their guide started babbling animatedly, gesturing wildly with its rubbery, webbed hands to punctuate its croaking statements.

"Canna yer shut that thing up?" Hodge asked.

"What's it saying, Arun?" Zenna asked.

"Gibberish," the paladin responded, "More babble about the 'Eye in the Dark'." The dwarf scanned the darkness around them, alert for any signs of trouble.

"I don't like the look that that fish is giving me," Mole said, staring up at the dark eyeholes that loomed above them as they drew nearer to the gaping mouth.

"You sure about this?" Zenna asked Dannel, quietly, as they came to stand in the black entry, the uneven stone ring of the building's mouth dripping fat droplets of water onto the steps, as the moisture in the air condensed upon the exterior stone.

The elf looked at her. Zenna of course could see his expression clearly, even in the half-light that filtered in from the cavern, but she realized that to him, her face had to be a vague shadow. Impelled by a sudden instinct, she reached out, touched his arm, trying to offer him some assurance, that she was in fact real, not just a shadowy illusion created by this place of evil and blackness.

"It's what we came here to do," Dannel said, finally.

"Well, let's be about it, then," Arun said decisively, stepping forward to take the lead, the clank of his mail resounding slightly against the stone tunnel that continued to rise beyond the fish's mouth.

"Wait a moment," the elf said, reaching into his pouch. "This damp is wreaking havoc with my bowstring, I'll need to swap out a new one."

"You and Mole will need light," Zenna added, as the elf changed out the string on his weapon.

"Got it covered," the gnome said, producing her miner's lamp once again from her magical backpack, and lighting it with a few strokes of flint on steel. As the warm glow of light spread from the wick, it shed a reassuring radiance on the pale skin of their collective faces. It also glistened on the wet skin of the kuo-toa, who croaked agitatedly at the bright flicker. In the real light of a flame, the creature looked even more a monstrosity, at home in this alien place of cold damp stone.

"It doesn't like the light," Arun said.

"Tell it that we need the light to make our way to the Eye," Dannel said, testing his new string before nocking an arrow to it and holding it ready to draw in his fist.

The kuo-toa quieted, and they made their way slowly up the staircase to a landing up above. The walls around them were curved, and it was as if they were indeed in the throat of a giant fish. Water was all around them, glistening on the walls and forming puddles wherever slight dips occurred in the floor. Narrow passages led off from the landing to their left and right, and directly in front of them, on the far side of the landing, stood a pair of massive stone doors. The doors were decorated in an undersea motif, and bore a carving depicting a lobster-headed woman devouring various other creatures.

"I really don't like the looks of her," Mole said, but she was already heading toward the doors.

"That's their Sea Mother," Arun said, "She's a real bi—" He caught himself, glancing back at the kuo-toa, but the creature seemed to have forgotten that they were there, staring at the doors with a look of fanatical devotion upon its face.

"Maybe we'd better go another way," Dannel suggested, "before heading right in the front door."

"I'll just take a quick look," Mole said. "We should know what to expect, no?" She reached the massive doors, against which she looked like a tiny child.

"You'll never get them open," Arun said, moving forward to join her.

“I don’t think this is a good idea,” Zenna said, with a sidelong look at the kuo-toa. It started suddenly, as if shaken from a dream back into awareness of its surroundings. Animated by the sight of two outsiders approaching the sacred doors, it croaked something, agitated...

Mole reached out, and placed her hand upon the door...

A pulse of raw sonic energy erupted in the hallway. Zenna felt something pop in her head, and felt a stinging pain bite hard somewhere deep inside her skull. Staggering from a sudden dizziness, she shook her head to clear it. Looking up, she saw that Mole was down on the ground, blood seeping from her nose and ears, pale, unmoving. A few paces away Arun was slumped against the wall of the corridor, groaning, stunned.

“Mole!” Zenna cried, rushing forward toward her downed friend. Dannel was only a step behind her, already drawing out his wand of healing.

Behind them, the kuo-toa had fallen to its knees, and now it emitted a loud, keening wail, almost painful in the wake of the sonic blast of the trap that Mole had triggered. “Shut that blasted thing up!” Zenna shouted, as she fell forward to kneel at Mole’s side. Her friend’s face was stained with trails of blood, and she didn’t respond as Zenna tugged at her, shook her. “Mole, you have to wake up,” the tiefling urged, her voice thick with emotion. “You can’t die on me, not after all we’ve been through...”

Hodge came up behind the wailing kuo-toa, and with a mighty two-handed stroke brought his axe down hard onto the creature’s spine. The kuo-toa went down hard, its limbs flailing, but to the dwarf’s amazement immediately started trying to get back up, even though its back had surely been crushed by the sheer force of the blow. Hodge recovered quickly, though, and before the kuo-toa could flop back to its feet, he slammed Betsy down onto the side of its neck, dropping it with a gush of turgid black blood that sprayed all over the damp stone around them.

“Mole!” Zenna cried, holding her friend against her, shaking. She was only vaguely aware of Dannel’s voice, shouting at her.

“Damn it, Zenna, let me heal her! She’s alive, listen to me, she’s alive, but we have to help her now!”

The words finally broke through, and Zenna pulled back to see the blue glow of healing around Mole’s face as Dannel poured healing energy into her. “She... she’s not breathing...” she said, faltering.

“Help me, then!” Dannel said, focusing his amber eyes upon the tiefling. “Use your power, Zenna, help Mole find her way back!”

Zenna nodded, anger and shame merging inside herself—how could she have let herself come apart so, when her friend needed her? She opened her mind to the power she’d come to know inside of her, felt that torrent of life-giving energy that was the gift of... Azuth? Esbar Tolerathkas? Her own heritage, some spark that lay deep within her? She still didn’t know the answer to that one, but she knew that she had to trust the power, to open herself to it, in order to bring her friend back from the brink.

She shook as a sudden jolt of positive energy flowed through her into her friend, more raw and pure than she'd felt when she'd cast healing spells before. Mole stirred, and her mouth opened as she drew in a huge, hungry breath of air, before coughing, flecks of blood staining her lips.

"Ow..." the gnome said, finally, when she could speak.

"Mole..." Zenna said, her tears flowing freely down her cheeks.

Dannel rose to tend to Arun, who'd slumped down against the wall, only half-conscious from the backblast of the sonic glyph. But even as the elf lifted his wand to help the paladin, his keen ears picked up the sounds of croaking, coming from one of the side passages back at the landing.

Hodge had heard it too. "We got company comin'," he said, lifting his bloody axe.

And thus, with two members of their company barely clinging to life, Bhal-Hamatugn roused, and prepared a cold-blooded welcome for the intruders from the surface who had come to disturb its halls.

Chapter 106

"What in the blasted... what happened?" Arun said, shaking his head to clear it as Dannel continued to use his healing wand upon the injured paladin.

It's a good thing we weren't all standing in front of those doors when that glyph hit, the elf thought to himself. From the damage he'd seen Mole and Arun absorb, he doubted that he and Zenna would have even survived the full force of the blast.

"We've got trouble," the elf said simply. "Best prepare for a fight."

The dwarf nodded, and invoked the power of his patron, calling upon the divine power of his god to further heal his wounds and restore the strength he would need in the upcoming confrontation.

"Here they come, sounds like a lot o' 'em," Hodge warned, moving into position beside one of the side passages. They could all here it, the sounds of angry goggling coming from the stirred garrison of the outpost.

"Zenna," Dannel said, glancing over at his shoulder to where the tiefling continued to help Mole, using her potent healing wand now to channel more life-giving positive energy into her. The rogue was slow to get up, her body literally shaky after the force of the sonic blast that had nearly killed her, but Dannel knew that they didn't have time to readjust to the situation.

"We are ready," Zenna replied, getting to her feet.

“Use that wand to heal Arun,” the elf commanded, moving to join Hodge. The dwarf looked up and saw him coming, and nodded as the sound of footsteps splashing through the puddles in the corridor reached them.

The dwarf roared as the first kuo-toa stepped into view, the fish-creature clad in a web-harness and sporting a tiny crossbow in one hand, and a steel rapier in the other. Hodge chopped at it with Betsy, but the kuo-toa, surprisingly quick for a creature of its gangliness and awkward form, darted nimbly to the side, avoiding the stroke. A second creature exploded from the passage behind it, tumbling past the dwarf and taking up a position beyond him, threatening his flank. It lifted its rapier to strike, but let out a sudden cry as Dannel fired an arrow into it at point-blank range, the shaft sinking deep with a meaty plop into its side.

“More coming!” he warned, drawing out another shaft from his quiver even as the injured kuo-toa shifted to face him.

True to his warning, more of the fish-men continued to pour out of the passageway, moving swiftly to attack the intruders. Two more joined in assaulting the hard-pressed Hodge, who was soon sporting a pair of deep punctures that spilled red blood down his arm and torso. The dwarf’s light armor was insufficient to deflect the thrusts from the sharp rapiers carried by the kuo-toa, and they fought together with merciless efficiency, flanking him to open up devastating sneak attacks that found the holes in his defenses. He refused to give way, however, cutting deep into the torso of one of his attackers with Betsy.

Several other kuo-toa swept around the dwarf and came at Dannel, who dropped his first foe with a second arrow but then had to draw his sword as three others pressed him in close combat, tumbling forward to lunge at him with their rapiers. Giving ground he avoided being flanked in that initial rush, but there was only so far he could go, with the heavy stone doors—and his injured companions—behind him. The sound of metal ringing on metal filled the corridor as his longsword clashed off one thrusting rapier after another, the elf barely keeping himself intact as he fought off his foes.

Hodge and Dannel barely withstood that initial rush, but it was enough to give their friends time to join in the fray.

Arun, his injuries mostly restored by the various healing spells expended upon him, most notably a charge from Zenna’s wand of cure serious wounds, charged boldly into the fray. Seeing Hodge in more serious trouble than Dannel, at least for the moment, he moved to help the surrounded dwarf, launching himself at the one flanking him from behind. His hammer, backed by his own considerable strength and the divine favor of Moradin, came up in a potent sweep that crushed into the kuo-toa from the backside, driving it roughly away from Hodge. The kuo-toa fell but bounced up again almost as quickly, hurling itself at the paladin with a lunge aimed at the open slit in the front of his helm. Arun ducked the blow, which slid harmlessly off of the hard steel of his helmet, and responded with a crushing strike that caved in one side of the fish-man’s body, knocking it once more to the ground.

That time it didn’t get back up.

Mole, despite still feeling a bit unsteady, drew her own sword and rushed forward into the melee. Dannel's foes had finally managed to flank him, and one stabbed him deep in the hip as it tumbled past, forcing him to half-fall against the nearby wall, only narrowly parrying another thrust from another attacker. It was clear that the elf would not be able to stand against these foes for long. But Mole turned the flanker into the flanker, as she came up behind the kuo-toa, and thrust her small sword to the hilt into its back. The kuo-toa stiffened, and fell, a vital organ pierced by the canny rogue's attack.

Zenna, meanwhile, had turned from healing Arun to call up a magical shield, to complement the mage armor she'd conjured earlier. She then targeted one of Dannel's foes with a daze spell, but the kuo-toa shook off the effect. Drawing out her wand of burning hands, she moved closer to the melee, looking for a clear angle where she could use it without roasting her friends.

She didn't see the final guard, who'd emerged from the passage unable to find a clear space to fit into the raging melee. It spotted her, though, clearly a magic-user from the translucent shield of blue energy that hung in the air in front of her, and lifted its small bow to fire. The dart flew truly through the crowded battleground in the corridor, but was turned at the last instant by Zenna's magical defenses.

"I was wonderin' when you'd see fit to join the fun!" Hodge roared to Arun, slamming his axe into the side of the kuo-toa he'd already wounded, dropping it to the ground in a bloody mess. His remaining attacker didn't retreat, though, and the one that had shot at Zenna moved quickly forward to fill the gap, the two thrusting at the dwarf with their rapiers anew. Hodge managed to block the first with his shield, but the second avoided that barrier and stabbed deep into his side, penetrating through the steel links of his chain shirt. The dwarf groaned and sagged backward against the wall, the two kuo-toa pressing him hard.

Arun saw that his ally was in trouble, and quickly moved to help him. He aimed a mighty blow at one of the kuo-toa battling Hodge that missed, but drew the attention of the foe toward him.

Dannel narrowly dodged another vicious cut from a kuo-toa blade, and slashed at it with a weak slash that only resulted in a light cut along its arm. Even though Mole's presence had removed the danger of being flanked, the two kuo-toa were still dangerous adversaries, a fact that was proven as the second attacker stabbed him hard in the shoulder. Dannel growled and yanked himself free from the wicked tip of the kuo-toa blade, will alone now keeping him standing.

Zenna, calling upon her magic, fired a blast of liquid flame into the head of one of the two creatures attacking the elf. The scorching ray roasted it in the heartbeats that the flames splashed over the kuo-toa, and when the bright ray faded into wisps of smoke, the fish-man fell, dead. Mole rushed forward to engage the other remaining creature, which began to draw back, realizing that it was outmatched.

The two dwarves continued to fight in unison against the two remaining guards on the far flank, holding their ground despite their injuries. Hodge was now covered in trails of his own blood that had run down under his armor to his breeches, and continued to fight on despite the red droplets that sprayed from him with each sudden movement. It was clear that he was weakening, however, and his adversary continued to try and find a way through his weaving axe and shield for a lethal finishing strike. Its fellow, which had turned to face Arun, similarly pressed its assault, but while it managed to dodge another potent blow from the paladin's hammer, its own attacks were blunted by the strong layers of the dwarf's magical plate armor.

As the sound of metal clanging on metal, mingled with the cries of the adventurers and the goggling of the fish-men, filled the corridor, Zenna suddenly became aware of another sound, the noise of stone grinding on stone...

Her eyes widened in horror as she turned around to see the great stone portals behind them slowly opening, the slimy hands of more kuo-toa already visible around the edge of the jam as the gap between them grew steadily wider.

Chapter 107

The heavy portals swung open, discharging another company of guards, armed like the first cadre with small hand crossbows and drawn rapiers. As they spotted Zenna two lifted their bows and fired, while several others rushed forward, blades raised to attack. Behind them could be seen the shadowy form of another kuo-toa, clad in the bizarre raiment of a lesser priest, called whips in the terminology of the fish-men.

The two darts glanced off of the potent magical defenses that Zenna had raised, but she didn't even notice, already lost in the casting of another spell. Even as the two foremost kuo-toa rushed at her, a blaze of colored light erupted from her fingertips, engulfing the fish-creatures and extending fully to the gap in the door, spilling through to catch up the two archers in the effect. As the color spray faded the all four kuo-toa warriors stood there stunned by the sensory overload of the spell, temporarily blinded, but Zenna could hear the angry croaking from the priest, no doubt exhorting its followers to renew the attack. From somewhere beyond her field of vision, she heard other kuo-toa voices, answering the whip's call.

"There's more of them!" Zenna cried, backing up. Calling upon her innate powers, she drew down a sphere of darkness upon the doorway, hoping to gain them just a few seconds' more time.

The rest of the battle in the corridor was rapidly drawing to a close, with the companions victorious but heavily battered. Arun had finally knocked down his adversary with a solid blow to the creature's fishy head, and together he and Hodge were putting the finish to their last foe, the kuo-toa already down and struggling with futility to get up and away. The last one facing Mole and Dannel had also tried to flee, but didn't get very far before Mole's blade had sliced through its hamstring, bringing it down for a final killing thrust.

Dannel looked like he could barely stand, but he turned at Zenna's warning, and sheathed his sword as he took up his longbow again. "We've got to retreat!" he urged. "Back to the boat."

None of the others offered dissent; while Arun hadn't taken any more damage in the melee, Hodge was pale beneath the layer of whiskers covering his face, pressing his arm against his side in an attempt to staunch the oozing flow of blood from one of his several wounds. But he offered no complaint as they made their way painfully down the stairs. Dannel brought up the rear, and fired an arrow over his shoulder at one of the warriors that Zenna had stunned, and which was already beginning to recover. The fish-man took the hit hard, and floundered, but was clearly not going to be taken out of the fight by one shot.

Mole came up beside him, already digging into her magical pack for something. "Go!" Dannel urged, already backing down the stairs, but the gnome ignored him as the haversack produced her objective, a fat quart-sized ceramic flask.

"Not again!" the elf said, but the gnome only offered a mischievous grin as she slammed the flask down at the head of the stairs. The impact released a long slick of thick black grease, that splayed out over the wet stones like dark fingers grasping the rock.

"Okay, let's go," the gnome said, darting down the steps with long, sure-footed strides, reaching the bottom in advance of the elf thanks to her magical boots.

Evil croaking sounds issued from the mouth of the massive fish-temple as they made their way back down to the stone dock. Arun and Hodge had already clambered onto the boat, and Zenna was helping to hold it steady as Mole and Dannel caught up to them and boarded. They had only the one oar left by the kuo-toa boatman, but Hodge supplemented it with powerful if awkward strokes from his axe. Even as they turned back into the mists they heard the loud cry of a kuo-toa—the priest, it looked like—as it appeared in the dark opening of the fish-mouth. Dannel, sitting in the prow of the craft in a half-crouch, quickly drew and fired, but with the movement of the canoe the arrow missed well to the left, shattering on the hard stone.

"Damn ye, elf, quit rockin' the boat, it be unsteady enough to start with!" Hodge cursed.

More kuo-toa forms appeared around the priest, and soon small darts were landing around them as the canoe made its way into the mists. One plinked off of Arun's shoulder plate, while a second stabbed into the side of the canoe, a few inches from Mole's thigh. The gnome was twisting around, trying to get a good look at their attackers through the mists.

"Did any of them slip on the grease? I can't see!"

But then the mists swallowed them up, and once more the world around them was lost to shadow.

"We're not safe yet," Dannel urged them. "Remember, kuo-toa can swim as easily as you or I walk on solid ground."

"I'm rowin' as fast as I can, elf!" Hodge sputtered, and it was true, although his face seemed almost like a death mask now, and his breath rattled in his throat with every stroke of his axe.

“Let me help you,” Zenna said, reaching around Arun to touch the wounded dwarf with her wand. The healing energy coursed into him, and as the blue glow faded Hodge exclaimed, “Ah, now that’s better ‘an even a mug of stout!”

Zenna turned back to the front of the boat. “You’re barely standing yourself, Dannel,” she said, offering the wand.

“I’ve got it,” the elf said, drawing out his own wand of minor healing, humming the musical notes that activated its power. Soon the bleeding from his own wounds had stopped, although Zenna could tell that he was still more than a bit unsteady from the lost blood.

Fine, if he wants to be stubborn, let him, she thought, stabbing the wand back into its pocket with perhaps more force than was exactly necessary. Inwardly, she was worried; she could sense that the healing wand was all but depleted, and her own spells had been nearly all expended in the brief but desperate struggle. She glanced over at Mole, who had produced an oblong object from her backpack, and was now using it as an improvised oar to help the dwarves drive the boat forward across the lake. Her efforts were probably of little help to their muscular strokes, but she was still helping, adding her incremental efforts to the survival of the group.

Odd, to have had to come to a place like this, to find a group of people to whom I actually belong, she thought. Other images popped unbidden into her mind, thoughts of a home she’d once had and people she’d once loved... and now? She squashed such musings ruthlessly, forcing herself to focus on the immediate danger. Dannel was right, while they were out of sight of their foes for the moment, it would be foolish to assume that the kuo-toa would not pursue them, or that other dangers did not exist here in the depths of the Underdark.

Dannel leapt out of the boat with such abruptness that Zenna started, before realizing that they had arrived at the far shore of the lake. The elf helped them pull the canoe up onto the rocky shoreline, and they quickly disembarked. Hodge had actually started up the slope a few paces back toward the tunnel entrance, before Dannel called him back.

“Don’t forget the canoe.”

Hodge looked at him with incredulity. “What? Yer not meanin’ what I think yer meanin’?”

Dannel opened his mouth to speak, but Arun beat him to it. “He’s right, we’re not done here, and we’ll be needing the boat when we come back.”

“In case yer hadn’t noticed, them things cleaned up on us!” Hodge said. “And they’ll be waitin’ fer ya, when yer be comin’ back!”

“I gave my word,” Arun said simply, taking up the rear of the canoe, while Dannel lifted the front. They started up the slope, with Mole and Zenna watching for any signs of danger.

“Cheer up!” Mole said, as she passed the dwarf. “At least we’re all still alive this time!”

“Yer all daft,” the dwarf grumbled, but he followed after them, glancing back occasionally at the still lake behind them. Belatedly something occurred to him. “What do yer mean, ‘this time?’” he asked, rushing to catch up to the others.

Chapter 108

They returned to a small cavern they’d passed on their route to Bhal-Hamatugn, about a mile distant from the city. The place was little more than a widening of the tunnel, a small bubble in the rock, but it featured a stony overhang that could be easily defended by someone perched up above. Exhausted from the battle and their hurried flight, the companions forced the difficult ascent with the aid of Mole’s rope, dragging the canoe up after them. They lacked the resources for a fire, but Mole’s magical bag provided a variety of carefully packed foodstuffs, so they were at least able to enjoy a satisfying repast. Mole turned her lamp down to where a bare flicker of flame clung to the wick, and the darkness settled around them until it was nearly total.

“How are we doing for supplies?” Zenna asked, with a nod at the pack.

“Fair,” Mole said. “Enough for the hike back, plus a day or two extra, if we don’t splurge.” She shot Hodge a look as she said it, and the dwarf paused in the midst of devouring a flat corn cake the size of a dinner plate.

“Well, at least there’s plenty of water down here,” Zenna offered.

The five of them sat in silence in the darkness for a moment, weary to the point of collapse, but unwilling to rest until they had settled at least the outline of their intent.

“We’re going to need to refine our tactics,” Zenna suggested finally.

Arun turned to her. “Just keep supporting us with your healing and spells,” the dwarf said. “Leave the tactics to us warriors.”

Zenna just looked at him in disbelief. A mental image flashed in her mind, a composite of the dozens of times that the paladin had charged blindly into danger, often against foes that far outnumbered them. The irony was so thick that her mouth had opened to offer a stinging retort, but then she heard a familiar voice in her mind. Advice, once given by her stepmother, long ago.

The trick to handling men, she’d told her, isn’t so much that they have to be in charge all the time. They just have to think they’re in charge. Give them that illusion, and it won’t matter that you are pursuing the sensible course from behind their backs...

“Well, at least there be a sight fewer o’ them than there were before,” Hodge offered.

“I don’t know about that,” Dannel replied. “That one with the shield, he had the look of a cleric, what they call ‘whips’. I’m sure that he was able to stabilize at least some of the fallen; we may see some of them again on our next visit.”

“Yer never got nothin’ good to say ‘bout nothin’, do yer?”

“I believe in being realistic,” the elf said.

“You do not have to come with us,” Zenna said. “If you prefer, wait here until we return; this site is readily defensible.”

Hodge shot a quick glance at Arun before responding. “And miss my share of the treasure? I dinna say I’d not go, but nay do I be wantin’ to throw me life away,” he growled.

“Enough then,” Arun said. “We are resolute; the decision is made. Take your rest. I will stand first watch.” The paladin rose and crossed to the edge of the overhang, perched fifteen feet above the floor of the main tunnel below. The others drew out their blankets and tried to find someplace comfortable on the hard stone. In their current state of exhaustion, it wasn’t long before they all drifted off to sleep.

* * * * *

The cavern was much as she remembered it, so much so that she felt a profound sense of deja vu, even the sound of Arun dipping the oar into the water echoing off of her memories of the earlier trip. The mists were as thick and cloying, and seemed even more malicious this time, hiding what might be empty space ahead, or a score of kuo-toa warriors waiting for them. They would find out, soon enough...

“It’s quiet,” Dannel’s voice drifted back to her, from the bow of the canoe. “Too quiet.”

Arun lifted the oar, and a pure silence descended upon them. Zenna felt a vague uneasiness suffuse her, edged by a growing fear. Dark shapes flashed by them in the water beneath the canoe. Zenna’s eyes widened in alarm...

The water around them erupted in noise and spray, as rubbery hands grasped onto the sides of the canoe. Zenna heard a scream—Mole’s voice—as the canoe tilted dangerously, and she fought to retain her balance as more hands clasped onto the sides and pulled or pushed. She saw Arun bring his hammer down onto the head of one of the kuo-toa, but even as it sank beneath the surface of the lake, the boat lurched deeper and both dwarves went tumbling over the side, hitting the water with a loud splash. Zenna reached out for Hodge, who was the closest to her, but even as she tried to grab his outstretched hand, a pair of rubbery hands closed over his face, and he vanished beneath the water.

Then the canoe went over, and she found herself in the water. The weight of her pouches and clothing weighed her down, threatening to drag her under, but by flailing out violently with her hands and feet, she found that she could just keep her head above water. She wasn’t a strong swimmer, even in the best of circumstances, and as she cast around desperately for the canoe, having gotten all turned around in the chaos, she knew that she would never be able to reach either shore.

Then she saw a dark head crest the surface of the water, coming toward her. There was nothing she could do, as the kuo-toa came closer, closer...

“Zenna!”

Chapter 109

“Zenna!”

The tiefling shot up, her breath frozen in her lungs like the water she'd drunk in on being knocked from the canoe...

She looked around, disoriented. She was on the outcropping, her blanket gathered in a pile around her legs, Dannel crouched over her, a look of concern on his face.

It was just a dream. A dream. Relief flooded her, and she began to shake.

“You were having a nightmare,” Dannel said, softly. He took her into his arms, and while Zenna hated showing him this weakness, she was inwardly grateful for his reassuring presence.

“We... we were in the boat, heading back across the lake,” she said into his shoulder, wishing that her voice was more even than it was. “They swam up from below, they overturned the canoe, we all... we all...”

“Shhh,” he said, caressing her hair. “It was just a dream.”

She drew back enough to clearly meet his eyes. “A warning. They'll be waiting for us, Dannel.”

The elf nodded. “I know. But what else can we do? There's no other way; the lake fills the entire floor of the cavern, and the walls to either side are sheer cliffs.”

“There has to be another way,” Zenna said.

Her dream had faded enough for her to recover an awareness of her surroundings. Mole and Hodge were still asleep, and Arun was still perched at the edge of the outcropping. “How long has it been?” she asked the elf, unable to gauge the passing of time her in the depths beneath the world above.

“Six or seven hours, I think,” he replied.

Zenna rose, adjusting her clothes and settling her cloak more comfortably about her shoulders. She still felt a chill, but whether it was due to the cold air of these tunnels, or the aftereffects of her dream, she couldn't be certain.

“You need some rest as well, Arun,” she said, kneeling beside him on the cold stone.

The dwarf did not immediately reply, and Zenna realized that his eyes were closed, his mouth moving slightly in silent words. She realized that he was probably praying to his god, in a way that she never truly did, to her more enigmatic patron. She moved to get up and back away, to leave the paladin his privacy, but he turned and looked at her.

“You do not have to go.”

“I don’t wish to intrude upon your prayers.”

“You are not intruding. You are troubled; I heard your distress earlier.”

“It was just a dream. Dark dreams, for a dark place.”

“Yes,” Arun said. “Dark, true... but the Underdark can also be a place of beauty, of wonders hidden forever from the light of the world above. My people, the dwarves of the Rift, spend much time in these depths; many among my folk never visit the surface, or only very rarely.”

“But there are so many terrible things that dwell down here. The drow, mind flayers, duergar, aberrations, grimlocks, others...”

“Is that truly different from the world above? Some of the dangers above wear nicer faces, but there is just as much evil there as there is here.”

Zenna nodded, acknowledging the justice of the remark.

“You are worried about our return to Bhal-Hamatugn,” Arun finally stated. Zenna nodded. “I feel it as well.”

“They will be waiting for us,” she said. “There’s something more going on here, something beyond which we came here for. I’ve felt it ever since we spoke to that insane boatman. I fear that we may be walking into a trap.”

“Then we shall have to do something that they do not expect,” the dwarf said. He nodded to himself, as if coming to a decision. “And I shall have to accept the legacy of my heritage.”

“What do you mean?”

But Arun refused to elaborate, asking that she leave him to conclude his prayers. The others were already stirring, so Zenna turned back to help prepare the “morning” meal and strike their camp for travel. For the most part, that involved tucking items back into Mole’s magical backpack for storage; the carrying capacity of the magical haversack was truly impressive.

We’ll be in trouble if we manage to lose that, she thought. Gods, you’re cheerful this morning, she added to herself, ruefully.

The companions prepared to depart. Arun joined them as they were readying to leave, accepting his rations without comment and eating quickly before taking up his hammer and shield. Using Mole's rope once again, they lowered the canoe to the tunnel floor before descending themselves. In a matter of minutes, they were on their way again.

Back to Bhal-Hamatugn.

Chapter 110

The journey back to the cavern was uneventful, and before too long they stood at the entrance to the huge cavern where Bhal-Hamatugn was situated. The place was as they had left it, and while they could make out the outlines of the fortress through the omnipresent mists, there was no indicator of anyone or anything moving about.

"Well, here we are again," Dannel said simply. The five of them remained crouched in the tunnel, concealed from casual view by the stones that framed the uneven entrance to the Underdark passageway.

"If they've got any kind of watch at all, they'll see us making our way down to the lake," Zenna said. "And with the mists blocking our view at the level of the cavern floor, they could slip into the lake and assault the canoe at any point, without us being able to see them coming."

Dannel nodded, and sighed. "Again, if you have an alternative plan, I'd be happy to hear it," he said.

Arun rose. "Give me a moment," he said. Before any of the others could comment, he turned and walked a short distance back down the tunnel. Reaching a flat spot a stone's throw distant, he knelt, removing his helmet and placing his hammer shaft-down on the stone before him. Holding the hammer with both hands to balance it, he pressed his forehead to its cold metal head.

"Great All-father," he said, his voice a low rumble, not carrying more than a few paces away, "your servant calls upon your aid. We face a potent evil, here in the deep places..."

"What's he doing?" Mole asked, as she and the others watched him from the mouth of the tunnel.

"Praying, I think," Dannel said.

"Oh? Does that help?" the gnome asked. "I'd offer one to Garl, but he'd probably be just as likely to sink the canoe, for a laugh."

"Hsst!" Zenna said. "Something's coming!" She pointed down the tunnel, where she'd caught sight of a dark form that had seemingly seeped out of the very stones of the tunnel wall, and now approached Arun.

"I can't see it!" Dannel said, but he set an arrow to his bowstring anyway. He considered a light cantrip, but even as the thought appeared he glanced over his shoulder at the kuo-toa cavern; the spell would give away their position like a beacon.

“What in the blazes!” Hodge said. He’d raised his crossbow, but the loaded bolt had fallen free, making a small noise as the steel head hit the stone floor and clattered about.

The words of a spell came to Zenna’s mind, but even as she considered which magic to hurl at the newcomer, realization washed over her. She held up a hand to forestall the others. “Wait,” she said, stepping forward toward Arun.

“Zenna!” Dannel said, in alarm.

They followed her as she approached. The dark shadow had moved to a position directly above the paladin, who now slowly rose up, looking up in amazement. As they drew nearer, they could see that the creature was a massive lizard, its limbs articulated in slender but muscular claws that gripped the wall of the tunnel, holding it in place as if the sheer surface were a floor. Its scaled hide was flawless, burnished with a faintly golden sheen that was lost in the darkness of the tunnel, and there was an intelligence in the dark golden orbs of its eyes. A ridge across its back formed a sort of saddle, and it looked strong enough to support any of them with ease. It regarded Arun with clear deference, awaiting his command.

“Arun...” Zenna said, staring up in wonder at the giant lizard. “Where did this come from?”

“Moradin sent him,” the paladin replied. “The Sacred Creepers are rarely sent to any but the most devoted and powerful members of my order, the champions of the Deep Halls. I... I did not believe that one would come to me, but our need was great...”

Zenna laid a hand on the dwarf’s armored shoulder. “It does not surprise me,” she said softly. “I know of no greater champion against evil, and no man of greater conviction.”

Arun laid a hand upon the celestial lizard’s flank, and its long forked tongue darted out to caress his bare face.

“With your ally, we can come at Bhal-Hamatugn in a way that our foes are not expecting, perhaps,” Dannel offered.

Arun nodded in agreement. But Hodge shook his head.

“Well, it be nice to have a pack animal, but how’s that thing gonna help us get across the lake...” His eyes widened in sudden realization. “Nay, yer don’t be thinkin’...” The dwarf paled. “Yer all touched, yer are!”

“Oh, this’ll be fun!” Mole said, hopping up into the air in her excitement.

Chapter 111

“Well, so far so good,” Dannel whispered. “That wasn’t so bad, eh?”

Zenna shook her head. "I'll wait until Hodge and Mole make it over before I rest easily," she replied. "And then we still have to get inside, without alerting the whole place."

"You worry too much," he said with a grin. The elf crept forward, slowly, careful to keep his profile low against the damp stone. Zenna kept her position, close against a looming stone projection that slanted up fifteen feet above her, while Arun remained yet further back, far from any of the edges that promised only a precipitous fall at the slightest careless step.

The three of them were perched atop the massive back of the stone "fish" that comprised the main structure of Bhal-Hamatugh. Behind them the stone of the temple structure merged with the steep slant of the cavern's cliff wall. Elaborate stonework that had no doubt been striking at one point was now muted, worn down by centuries of action of wind and water, and coated with a thin layer of slick muck. The air was thick with moisture, and a hundred smells that warred with each other with every breath, until the nose was overwhelmed by them.

Zenna glanced up, but it was hopeless; her darkvision couldn't penetrate farther than a good sixty feet or so, and the faint illumination cast by the glowing lichens that coated the cavern walls was insufficient to reveal what she was looking for. At least that same darkness would protect Mole and Hodge from the watchful eyes of the kuo-toa.

At least she hoped so.

Dannel crept slowly back to her. "See anything?" she asked.

"Still quiet," the elf replied. "I didn't see any obvious guards, but it's damned hard to see anything in this murk, and the mists climb almost to the mouth of the fish."

She reminded herself that his vision, despite his keen elven senses, was only as good as the light that was available. She opened her mouth to say something else, but abruptly caught sight of a shadow that had shifted along the ceiling of the cavern above. "There!" she hissed.

* * * * *

Balthazar Hodge wasn't having a very fun time; in fact, he was about as terrified as he could ever remember being before. Dangling upside down, lashed to the back of a giant lizard, the floor VERY far down below. His experience wasn't improved by the fact that that damned gnomish girl strapped in behind him seemed to be having the time of her life.

"There they are," came Mole's voice over his shoulder, even her whisper sounding her enthusiasm clearly. She—blast it—leaned forward against the straps, twisting her body around his frame to get a better view.

"Bloody blazes, stop yer shiftin', the beastie will lose its grip!" he warned, barely catching himself before the words came out in an undignified shriek.

“Oh, don’t worry, she’s very good at climbing... and don’t forget, Clinger made it across and back twice already! Hey, do you think Arun will mind, that I named her? Clinger just seems so appropriate...”

But Hodge was unable to reply, forced to spend all of his effort just to keep from losing his morning meal as the lizard started down the far side of the cavern, toward the roof of the massive structure where the others were already waiting.

The sure-footed mount continued down the cliff face without hesitation, managing a constant pace despite the heavy and shifting burden upon its back. Hodge, tied in place by ropes slung around the creature, found himself looking straight down at the roof of the temple structure below. For a moment the dwarf felt a strange twisting sensation, as if the cavern were spinning around him, then he felt a lurch as something pressed against his back, seemingly intent on pushing him out of his precarious perch.

It was Mole, trying to get a better view around the considerable bulk of the dwarf. Hodge opened his mouth to speak, but his words froze in his throat as the lizard abruptly shifted, turning to work its way around a sudden gap in the cliff face. Hodge tried to hold onto something, anything, his hyperactive senses certain that the ropes were giving way...

His sudden movement caused his axe, Betsy, to slip out of the looped length of leather cord that held it at his side. Mole offered a warning, and made a precarious grab for it that nearly caused Hodge’s heart to stop beating in his chest. As she hung there, on his shoulder, he realized that she wasn’t roped in, that she was simply balancing on his back as the lizard continued down the cliff face!

The axe tumbled away into the darkness, plummeting toward the ground below. A loud clang echoed through the chamber, as the waraxe impacted hard against the side of the kuo-toan building, followed a few heartbeats later by another rattle as it settled onto the uneven stones of the cavern floor.

Almost immediately, a pair of kuo-toa emerged from the mouth of the great stone fish, looking around warily, loaded hand-crossbows clutched in one hand, their slender rapiers in the other. For a few seconds everything was still. The kuo-toa started in the direction of the cavern where the axe had finally come to rest, but their attention was drawn upward by a sudden exclamation.

All of the shifting and abuse to the makeshift harness of rope holding the passengers in place across the back of the giant lizard had taken its toll. Even as they neared the relative safety of the curving roof of the fish-building, a length of rope shifted, and Hodge slipped free with an unavoidable cry of alarm. Mole, clinging to his back, let out a, “whoah!” as the two of them slid from the back of the lizard into the back void beneath them.

Chapter 112

Mole made a desperate grab for something, anything, to arrest their fall, but the remaining ropes, twisting with the movements of the lizard, escaped her grasp. They started falling... but abruptly Mole found herself jerked to a rough halt. Instinct rather than conscious thought had her clutch onto the straps of Hodge's armor, even though it felt as though her arms were being ripped from her sockets as the full weight of the dwarf snapped down onto them.

Hanging freely in space, a dwarf dangling beneath her, Mole looked up to see the giant lizard's face directly above her, its jaws locked onto her magical backpack. She thought she saw remonstrance in its eyes, but she couldn't be sure.

"Nice catch, Clinger!" she said. "Don't let go!" From below a string of expletives sounded from Hodge, whose feet kicked uselessly out over the void. Mole knew that she couldn't hold him for long; gods, the dwarf was heavy!

As if matters weren't already complicated enough, a small crossbow bolt shattered against the cliff face behind her, a pace from her head. There were kuo-toa below, shooting at them!

"Great," she said dryly, echoing Zenna's tone perfectly. She looked down at the roof below, trying to judge the distance remaining; it looked to be about fifty feet, she guessed.

The two kuo-toa, goggling animatedly in their strange language, reloaded their small crossbows. But even as one lifted its weapon, taking aim at the subterranean lizard holding onto the two intruders this time, an arrow slammed into its shoulder. Croaking out in pain, the fish-man dropped its bow and staggered. The other fired its weapon at the archer now visible atop the sacred temple, then the two moved quickly to take cover behind some nearby rocks. They continued croaking loudly, the sound no doubt clearly audible to the rest of the kuo-toa force still within the structure.

"Dannel!" Zenna said, drawing the elf's attention from the two kuo-toa who'd taken cover, back up to where Mole and Hodge were dangling from the mouth of the giant lizard precariously clinging to the cliff wall above them. The cliff face actually sloped back as it neared the cavern floor, so that the two adventurers couldn't even try to grab onto the uneven surface of the stone. Arun stood there, helpless to do anything to aid his friends.

Suddenly, with a sound of tearing fabric, Mole and Hodge broke free and tumbled down.

Dannel reacted instantly, lifting his hand even as he sang out the melodic resonances of a spell. The potent energies of the feather fall enchantment enfolded the two falling adventurers, and their precipitous descent slowed to a gentle drift. Hodge, falling back-first toward the ground, didn't immediately recognize the change, and he bumped awkwardly against the sloping summit of the kuo-toa temple, tumbling down the side of the building in a jumble of arms, legs, and assorted equipment. Fortunately the spell's power remained in effect until he hit the ground, but even so he landed in heap, dazed and more than a bit confused.

"That weren't so bad as I thought," he finally managed to say, as he staggered to his feet, just in time to see a company of kuo-toa emerge from the building and start around to his location.

Mole landed only moments after Hodge, but she'd gotten her bearings far quicker, and she was able to dig the toes of her boots onto the slimy slanting surface and avoid falling any further. She cautiously pulled herself up to where Arun waited, the paladin helping her as soon as he could get to her without risking going over the edge himself. Once secure, she immediately shrugged off her backpack, her face falling as her suspicions were confirmed. The main compartment of the haversack was torn where the lizard had bitten it; the compartment was now empty, its magic sundered by the destruction of its integrity. She held onto a momentary hope that the side compartments had at least survived, but she could tell from the weight of the pack that it had lost all of its magical potency, even before she checked.

Well, damn it all, she thought. Looking up, she thought to offer a complaint to Arun about the general unfairness of the universe, only to belatedly realize that a battle was still going on.

Two more kuo-toa had clambered out of the lake, joining the pair already in cover among the rocks below. Those two apparently did not have hand crossbows with them, but they drew rapiers and rushed forward to where a stream of dwarven profanity indicated where Hodge was getting his bearings. The dwarf saw them coming, and finally spotting the resting place of his axe, rushed toward it. The kuo-toa, however, moved to intercept, and the dwarf was forced to draw his dagger as the pair moved to flank him. Before they could launch their assault, however, the first staggered and went down, two long shafts stuck in its back. Zenna had unlimbered her crossbow, and added her fire to Dannel's precise and deadly shots. The tiefling cried out in pain, however, as a small dart stabbed into her thigh.

"Protect yourself!" the elf said, shifting his aim back to the pair hiding in the rocks. Below, Hodge let out a roar and charged into the kuo-toa still facing him, stabbing his blade into the creature's bloated gut.

Zenna cursed as she drew out the dart and tossed it, slick with her blood, aside. She was mostly angry with herself; in the excitement and drama of returning here and embarking upon the giant lizard, she'd forgotten to cast mage armor upon herself. She rectified that now, and as the familiar glow settled about her person, fading quickly to invisibility, she glanced down at the mouth of the fish, partially obstructed by the bulging front of the structure.

"More of them!" she cried in warning, as she spotted a clutch of kuo-toa disgorged from the dark entry of the temple. There were at least a half-dozen, and Zenna saw that three of them were clad in the clearly distinguishable garb of lesser clerics, with metal armor fashioned to the odd configuration of their forms, and carrying hefty morningstars and large wooden shields that seemed to glisten in the faint light that shone throughout the cavern.

Dannel had seen them as well, and even as he drew his bow for another shot he shifted his aim to the right, letting an arrow fly at the newcomers. The shaft caught a kuo-toa warrior in the shoulder, the impact spinning it around until it landed in an awkward crouch. But the elf's efforts were answered immediately by a flurry of shots from kuo-toa hand crossbows. The nimble elf darted back, the slant of the building giving him at least a modicum of cover from below, but one dart nonetheless caught in the mail links protecting his upper arm, puncturing his flesh.

And then the three priests linked hands. The foremost lifted his hand and pointed at Dannel in a gesture of denunciation... and a jagged bolt of liquid energy shot from the tip of the digit in a lashing arc that sliced across the elf's torso. Dannel cried out and fell hard on his back, wisps of smoke rising from his body where the lightning bolt had struck. Zenna, just a few paces behind him, was caught on the edges of the blast, but her own innate resistance to electricity, as well as the fact that Dannel had absorbed much of the energy of the bolt, protected her from serious injury.

"Dannel!" Zenna exclaimed, crouching beside him.

"Ow..." he said, slowly getting up.

Arun, without a reliable missile weapon to use against the kuo-toa below, and in his heavy armor unable to move across the vaulted roof of the building without risking a hard slide to the broken floor below, found himself frustrated as the battle raged on. He'd hurled one of his light hammers at the kuo-toa threatening Hodge, but even that simple movement had nearly caused him to lose his footing on the slick stone, and the missile caromed harmlessly off into the darkness over the lake before vanishing from sight. He gestured urgently to his new companion, the giant lizard moving swiftly down the cavern wall now that it had been relieved of its awkward burdens. The celestial reptile had barely crossed the threshold from cliff to structure when Arun met it, determination writ clearly upon the hard lines of his face.

"Take me down there," he commanded, tucking his hammer into his belt as he swung up across the back of the giant lizard.

As soon as she'd realized that her services were required in a more martial aspect, Mole had immediately reached for her crossbow. Unfortunately it was at that moment that she remembered that she'd placed it into her haversack, so that it wouldn't bump her while she was riding on the back of Clinger. Glancing down at the target-rich environment below, she considered her holdout knife, but she'd seen Arun throw his hammer away and she really liked that knife... Undecided for several long seconds, her decision was finally made for her when she saw Arun clambering onto the back of the giant subterranean lizard, which immediately made a swift beeline for the front of the building. That was too good an opportunity to pass up, she thought, as she ran after them, her boots carrying her on a half-hop, half-slide course across the slick dorsal crest of the "fish."

Hodge, bleeding from a gash above one eye where the kuo-toa's rapier had cut him, grunted as he punched his dagger deep into the chest of the creature. Already well-savaged by two other wounds, it sagged to the ground, where the dwarf gave it another stab or two for good measure. Victorious, he kicked his foe's corpse on the way past it to recover his waraxe, pausing only to stick the bloody dagger back into his belt.

"Ah, Betsy, don't go runnin' off like that on me again," he said to the weapon, before turning back to the melee. One of the kuo-toa that had taken cover beyond the rocks earlier had emerged around the edge of a boulder, holding its rapier tentatively. That was enough for Hodge, who lifted the axe and rushed forward once more into battle.

Having recovered his footing, and bolstered by healing magic from Zenna, Dannel moved cautiously along the crest of the kuo-toa temple, sending arrows down into the ranks of their foes, using as much cover as the building could give him to the darts that continued to slice up from below. The whips did not unleash another lightning bolt, but they were also neutralizing much of the elf's effectiveness; their shields served as quite effective protection from his arrows, while potent healing spells read from scrolls restored the wounds suffered when his shafts did hit. Zenna, with most of her own spells effective only at close range, added fire from her own crossbow, but even the masterwork bolts that Mole had bought for her earlier were not enough for her to penetrate the effective armor worn by the kuo-toa priests. The kuo-toa clerics continued to incant spells to their evil patron goddess, bolstering their allies or adding magical protections to themselves as the battle raged on. Thus far, none of the seven kuo-toa of the reinforcing group had been permanently removed from the battle.

But they hadn't faced Arun yet.

Chapter 113

Arun Goldenshield, filled with the divine favor of his god Moradin, rode his celestial mount down the front face of the massive fish-structure, his hammer held aloft in one hand, his shield protecting the other. Somehow he maintained his perch upon the tilting back of the lizard as it clambered rapidly down the slick stone face; it was as if dwarf and steed were one creature, promising death to any who would face it. Darts rose up to meet them from the tiny bows of the kuo-toa guards, but they either glanced off of the dwarf's heavy armor, or from the thick hide of the celestial lizard.

It was an impressive sight, and if no one initially noticed the gnome hanging for dear life onto one of the ropes slung across the flanks of the lizard, they could perhaps be forgiven the oversight.

While the clerics screamed in anger, or perhaps encouragement to their warriors—the kuo-toa tongue sounded like nothing less than a frog being strangled to death, so it was impossible to tell—the four warriors flanking them drew their rapiers and rushed forward to meet the descending paladin. The first abruptly stopped, an arrow and crossbow bolt jutting from its chest a few inches apart, and fell limply backward to the ground. The second leapt over the body of its comrade and lunged at the giant lizard; the beast was quicker, though, and as it darted forward it snapped up the fish-man's arm in its powerful jaws, jerking it wildly back and forth while the kuo-toa croaked in pain. The other two warriors did not hesitate, moving to flank the lizard and assault it from the sides, but that plan faltered when the dwarven rider brought his hammer down in a powerful blow that caught one of the warriors on the chest and drove it roughly back. The one on the other side pressed its attack despite the losses its side had just taken, stabbing its rapier into the side of the giant lizard in an attack that drew a bright trail of celestial ichor from the wound. The lizard released its current victim with a shake of its head and turned to face this new attacker, but before it could attack, the kuo-toa slumped to its knees. As it fell, it turned to reveal Mole hanging from its back, her small sword sunk to its hilt in the creature's fat torso.

"Nobody messes with my friends," she said with a smile at Clinger.

Arun directed his mount back toward the clerics, but before they could resume their charge, another lightning bolt erupted from the leader of the triad, lancing mercilessly into the lizard and its rider. But the paladin shrugged off the pain of the blast, and despite its wounds the lizard carried him forward in a swift rush that took him into the midst of the gathered whips. The kuo-toa warrior that he'd injured earlier and the one that the lizard had bitten were both still active and dangerous, but before they could move to pursue the dwarf and aid the priests, one went down with another of Dannel's arrows sunk to the feathers in its thigh, while the other was forced to turn to deal with Mole as the gnome stabbed at it with her tiny sword.

On the far flank of the battle, Hodge continued battling against the kuo-toa warriors that had taken cover in the rocks. Both of the remaining kuo-toa warriors were injured now, one with a deep gash from Betsy, the other still hindered by the arrow stuck in its shoulder, but they continued to press their attacks against the dwarf with an almost insane fury. The fish-men flanked the dwarf, who soon found himself hard-pressed as they worked in tandem to seek out the holes in his defenses.

Arun grunted as a whip slammed its morningstar into his armored thigh, the force of the blow augmented by the bull's strength that it had conjured earlier. He countered with a strong swing of his own, but before he could land his blow the kuo-toa brought up its heavy shield. The hammer impacted the solid surface with a muted thwack, but to Arun's surprise the hammer remained securely affixed to the shield. The dwarf nearly lost his grip on the weapon as the kuo-toa drew back, trying to take its prize from the paladin, and for a moment the two engaged in a vicious tug-of-war, the stakes clear as the other two priests rushed into the fray, their own weapons lashing out at the dwarf and his mount.

Zenna cursed as yet another shot from her crossbow went awry. With the need to avoid hitting her friends, she was forced to be conservative in her choice of targets, and thus far she'd squandered five bolts to only two hits. If she could only get down to the ground below, she could employ her spells... but one glance at the long descent from their perch was enough to dissuade her from trying anything foolish. As she tugged at the string of her bow back into firing position once more, she glanced over at Dannel. The elf had seemingly become one with his bow, drawing and firing with a smooth efficiency. He managed several shots to her one, and even with such rapid shots, was managing to score hits with a greater frequency. Even as the tiefling slid another bolt into the long groove of her crossbow, the elf managed to slide another shot neatly into the chaotic melee that raged around Arun, and one of the clerics drew back in pain, a shaft jutting awkwardly from the side of its bulbous throat.

Hodge cried out as a rapier slid several inches into his side, punching a nasty hole through steel links, leather, cloth, and into the flesh beneath. With a defiant roar he tore himself free of the weapon before the fish-man could work it deeper, trailing blood as he regained a defensive stance a few paces away. The kuo-toa, sensing that their foe was nearly defeated, eagerly rushed forward, spreading out to flank the dwarf again and open up another devastating sneak attack. Hodge did not give ground, but he seemed barely able to stand, holding his wounded side and breathing in hard, labored gasps. His axe hung limply at his side, its deadly edge no longer as threatening without a strong arm to wield it.

Then, suddenly, as the first kuo-toa came into reach, he sprang up, Betsy seeming to jump into his hand as he brought the axe up in a violent arc. The kuo-toa was unable to react in time as the blade of the axe drew a deep line across its throat, and it crumpled, its head flopping back on what was left of its spine. The second kuo-toa came up short, staring down at bleeding and battered foe, who now spat out a challenge through blood-flecked lips.

“A’right then, yer turn, fish-face,” he grunted, taking a meaningful step forward. The kuo-toa met his gaze squarely, then its huge eyes drifted to the bloody axe. For a moment it seemed to hesitate, and then it spun around and darted into the lake, disappearing with only a tiny splash.

“Yah, I thought so,” the dwarf said, staggering forward a pace or two before slumping to the ground and promptly passing out.

“Hodge is down!” Zenna cried out from above. She followed that warning by uttering a particularly nasty and likely biologically impossible suggestion in orcish that she’d picked up in her travels, as another shot glanced harmlessly off of a whip’s shield. Dannel likewise missed as the three enemy clerics swarmed onto Arun and the giant lizard. The lizard bit one of the enemy priests, but suffered a nasty blow to its head in response. The spikes of the whip’s weapon drew open wicked gashes along the side of the lizard’s head, oozing bright celestial ichor that fell in fat drops onto the wet stone at its feet. At the same moment, Arun finally lost his tug-of-war with the kuo-toa holding his weapon hostage with its adhesive shield, as a second priest joined in the struggle. The first whip pulled away its shield with the hammer stuck to it, while the second grabbed onto the paladin and dragged him roughly off of the lizard’s back and to the ground.

For a moment the paladin disappeared from view, ringed by the kuo-toa priests and the battered and struggling lizard. An already-bloody morningstar was lifted high and came down, ringing as it struck metal. But then an opening appeared as one of the kuo-toa staggered back, turning to reveal half its jaw crushed into a bloody mess. Arun exploded out of the gap, his second light hammer clutched in his fist, laying about him with mighty swings backed by the full force of his strength and the divine potency of his patron. The second kuo-toa tried to crush his skull from behind, but before the blow landed the dwarf spun and drove his hammer with a meaty plop into the fish-man’s gut. The creature, its organs merged into a jumbled stew from the force of the blow, crumpled and collapsed in a flopping heap.

Even as Arun turned to face the other priest, it fell, an arrow jutting from its back. The paladin spun to aid his ally, but the lizard had things well in hand, and was busy crushing the head of the last whip in its powerful jaws. Similarly, Mole had dealt with her foe, the wounded kuo-toa unable to connect with the nimble gnome before falling to several well-placed thrusts from her smaller blade.

Quiet belatedly returned to the cavern as the rush of combat ended, and the companions stood amidst the ruin of the kuo-toa defenders.

Chapter 114

The companions, knowing that more enemies could emerge from the giant fish at any moment, did not waste any time in idle contemplation of their victory. Mole rushed over to where Hodge had fallen, and was able to bind his wounds. Arun sent his mount up to retrieve Zenna and Dannel before moving to help the stricken dwarf, channeling enough healing power into him to restore him to consciousness. The companions gathered at the base of the giant structure in the narrow band of uneven ground between the wall and the lake, a short distance from the gaping mouth of the structure. Arun had managed to recover his warhammer, although he'd had to nearly destroy the kuo-toa's shield to do so; even now bits of wood and sticky goop dangled from the head of the weapon. Magical healing had restored them to nearly full health; Hodge still looked a bit unsteady, but at least part of that was due to the numerous draughts he'd taken from a flask he'd produced from an inner pocket upon being restored to consciousness.

After helping Zenna and Dannel down from the roof of the building, Arun had dismissed his battered celestial companion. The lizard nodded its head in an almost human-like gesture of respect, before turning and vanishing into the uneven rocks that lined the floor of the cavern.

"Bye Clinger!" Mole said in farewell.

"Well... that could have gone better," Dannel began.

"Our resources are already heavily depleted," Zenna added. "My healing wand is now fully discharged, and I'd wager Dannel's is not far behind." At the elf's confirming nod, she went on, "And unless one of you is holding out, we're completely out of healing potions."

"If we retreat and come back later, they'll just have a chance to restore their defenses again," Arun said. "We must press on."

"In any case, unless yer plannin' to swim, there be only one way t'go," Hodge pointed out.

"Um..." Mole said.

Four sets of eyes turned to her. "What is it?" Zenna asked.

"Well... it's the backpack, you see..." she drew the ruin of her magical haversack out from behind her back, so that all of them could clearly see the damage to the fabric.

"Ah, it would seem our situation has grown yet more complex," Dannel observed.

"No more food?" Hodge asked.

"Not only that," Dannel said. "Our extra bandages, blankets, and traveling gear, such as rope and lamp oil, were in there. And the spare quivers for myself and the women." He looked meaningfully at his own quiver, where barely a half-dozen arrows remained waiting.

“Well, you got a sword,” Arun said plainly. “If there’s nothing else to be said, let us be about our business.”

“A moment,” Zenna said. “Let us see what we can salvage from them before we press on.”

Arun growled impatiently, but did not protest as they examined the bodies of the fallen kuo-toa. In fact, he took an interest as Zenna examined the bodies of the clerics, and announced that their heavy armor produced a magical aura. She also found a few potions and scrolls, but most of what the whips had possessed had been consumed in the battle. Mole appropriated a hand crossbow and quiver of bolts from one of the slain warriors, the little weapon looking small even in her diminutive hands.

“Come over here,” Arun said to Hodge, kneeling beside one of the slain clerics.

“What?” the dwarf said, suspicion clear on his face, confirmed a moment later as Arun started peeling armor plates from the carcass of the slain fish-man. “Yer not thinkin’ I be wearin’ that stinkin’ junk!”

“It’s better than you getting hacked up in every single engagement,” the paladin said, his voice brooking no argument. “And that shirt you currently call armor is barely more than tattered links; I’m surprised it even keeps together on your torso, given how you maintain it.”

“Bah, I dinna ask yer advice!” the dwarf snorted, eying the banded mail dubiously.

Arun looked up and fixed the other dwarf with a hard stare. “We may need you to hold the line with me, in there,” he said.

Hodge ran his bloody fingers through the nest of mud-caked hair that covered his head. The fringe on the top was more mud than hair, it looked like. “That’ll never fit me,” he finally said.

“It’ll fit, with a few adjustments,” Arun insisted.

A few minutes later, the party set out again, prepared as best they could against the dangers that still lurked inside the kuo-toa stronghold. At least no further guards had emerged from the place; none of the companions, however, took this to mean that their foes had been overcome.

Hodge had taken on a look of sufferance as he clanked alongside Arun toward the dark opening. True to his word, Arun had fitted the armor to the dwarf well, given the lack of tools and time, but the magical suit accommodated Hodge poorly in contrast to a truly fitted covering. But for now, it would have to do.

“So, what do you think about ‘Clinger’?” Mole asked, trudging alongside Arun, her magical boots lifting her in neat little hops that brought her eye-to-eye with the dwarf for a flicker with each step.

"I think you'd better go on ahead and check for traps," the paladin grumbled, suspecting that he'd somehow managed to lose another battle even before he'd been aware of the engagement.

The gnome and elf slipped silently ahead of the column, with the dwarves forming a line ten paces ahead, and Zenna warily bringing up the rear. There was no need for excess stealth now that their foes knew they were coming, so Dannel hummed the words of a minor cantrip, conjuring a magical light to brighten their way.

Entering the structure, they reached the landing at the head of the stairs without incident. The great stone doors ahead of them had been closed once more, although there was no way of telling by casual observation whether the defensive ward that had nearly killed Mole and Arun the last time had been reset.

"Maybe we should avoid the front door this time," Mole suggested.

The companions took one of the side passages, and quickly found themselves in a long hallway whose function was immediately clear. Heavy iron grates set deep into the surrounding stone fronted a series of cells that ran along the length of the hall. Their arrival had been instantly detected, and a pair of figures in two separate cells appeared immediately at the bars, begging for release. One was a short, thin-faced human clad in tattered rags, while the second was a halfling, dressed in the remnants of what might have once been expensive and fashionable robes, but were now little better than the shreds worn by the other.

"Set me free, for the love of mercy!"

"Hurry, please... the kuo-toa may come at any instant!"

"Who are you?" Mole asked, stepping forward.

"I am White-Eye," the human said, at the same time that the halfling replied, "I am Cherrit. I was taken by the kuo-toa..."

"Liar!" White-Eye exclaimed. "Don't listen to him, he was working with them, working with the gogglers!"

"Don't believe him!" Cherrit said. "That two-faced orcspawn, he sold out another prisoner from my caravan to the kuo-toa, we were planning an escape, and he betrayed us!"

"Liar, liar!" the human snarled, extending a hairy fist through the bars as if he could reach the halfling's cell through force of will alone.

"Shut up, both of you," Arun said, quietly but with an iron force behind the words that subdued both captives. "Your noise will bring more of those sea-spawn down on us, and I'll give either or both of you a rap on the noggin if you don't control yourselves."

"Obviously one of them... or perhaps both... are lying," Zenna observed. "Although it's clear that neither of them are Zenith Splintershield."

“We don’t have time for this,” the paladin said. “For the moment, the safest place for both of you is in these cells. We’ll come back for you, once we’ve dealt with the kuo-toa.”

Both prisoners started to protest. “No, please!” the human said, while the halfling responded, “And what if they kill you?”

“Then you’re no worse off than you are now,” Dannel said.

Another narrow tunnel led off from the prison area, and the companions headed in that direction. Continued protests and denunciations followed them from both of the prisoners, their hostility for each other and desire to be freed apparently overriding their worry about alerting their jailers.

“Should’ve shut them both up,” Hodge muttered, as they started down the cramped corridor, forced to shift their marching order to single file.

“Whatever their crimes, we cannot leave them to the kuo-toa,” Arun said. “But they would have likely killed each other, without restraint, and we cannot spare someone to watch over them. We will come back once we have time to deal with them.”

The tunnel twisted and gave way to a narrow set of steep stairs, slick with condensed moisture. Dannel, in the lead, led them slowly forward, his bow loaded and ready to draw at the first sign of a threat.

At the foot of the stairs the corridor continued straight for a short distance before opening onto a small chamber. The air was heavy with damp, and the chamber had an oppressive air to it even before Dannel’s light revealed to them its contents.

“Torture chamber,” Mole said, wrinkling her nose in distaste.

Indeed, the gnome’s assessment seemed borne out by the grim décor, and the various implements of torment set along the walls. The ground slanted downward slightly toward the center of the room, where a wide pool of collected water partitioned the room into two halves. Another corridor similar to the one by which they had entered was apparent on the far side of the chamber.

“Empty,” Mole proclaimed, walking to the edge of the pool. She tested the water by prodding it with the blade of her sword. “Hmm... this looks like it might get pretty deep in the middle. I may have to beg a ride from one of you tall folk...”

Arun continued to regard the apparently empty chamber with suspicion. “There is a great evil in this place,” he said.

“Even I ken see that,” Hodge said with a shudder.

“No,” Arun said. “Something darker...”

Even as he spoke, the water stirred on the far side of the pool, and Mole leapt back in alarm. The companions readied their weapons as a humanoid form rose up out of the water. It was impossible to tell what it was, or had been; strands of tattered cloth streaked with mud and mildew trailed from its body, and most of its flesh had rotted away, leaving only ugly decay and stark bone that jutted incongruously from beneath the ragged coverings that seemed to be the only thing holding it together. Twin pinpoints of red light burned within the cavernous interior of its head, fixing each of them as it rose up out of the water.

Zenna felt a cold terror sweep over her as that unholy stare sent a spike of bottomless fear into the very depths of her soul. The foul appearance of the mummy threatened to unhinge her self-control, but even as she felt her muscles turning to jelly she fought back, her body shaking as she enforced the iron discipline she'd learned over the years upon herself. With a sudden sigh she tore herself free from the terrible despair spawned by the mummy's appearance.

But as she glanced at her friends, she felt the cold tingle of fear return. Mole, Dannel, and Hodge all seemed frozen, their bodies captive to the mummy's fear, and while Arun stepped forward to face the creature, he seemed to Zenna's eyes to be a lonely stalwart in the face of the unholy terror of the undead monstrosity.

The mummy came toward them.

Chapter 115

The water rose to the mummy's hips as it waded through the pool, but it barely seemed to slow the creature as it drove mercilessly onward toward them. Arun met it at the edge of the pool, bringing it around in a wide arc that culminated in a powerful blow to the creature's side. The blow would have likely crippled a living foe, but the mummy seemed to shrug it off, its rotted carcass absorbing the blow like a fist hitting a side of beef. The mummy responded with a powerful cross that caught Arun solidly across the face, knocking him roughly backward with the sheer force of the impact.

Zenna, driven beyond fear by the appearance of the creature, sought desperately for the words of a spell. She remembered her wand, but even as she reached for it, something else occurred to her, a memory of something that Esbar Tolerathkas had told her... or had it been her step-mother? Even as the source of the thought scrabbled away from her, her fingers closed on the symbol, etched in silver, that she wore on a clasp about her neck.

Her divine spells came to her through focused thought and meditation, although deep down, she'd always understood that their final source was something... other, a tangible entity unlike the vague and permeating essence of the Weave. Azuth... she'd never thought of him as a "patron," even as she used that power to work miracles such as bringing a dying friend back from the brink. But she called upon that power now, channeling it through the symbol, holding it boldly before her. Although the dim light cast by Dannel's spell remained the only illumination in the chamber, to her eyes the symbol of Azuth glowed like a beacon, driving back the shadows.

“Back!” she yelled, willing the undead abomination to obey.

But the mummy only turned from Arun, fixed its sinister stare upon her, and lunged forward. The invisible glow failed and faded as the mummy came upon her, too fast for her to do anything but scream as it lashed out with one withered and twisted hand. Stars exploded around her as the blow knocked her roughly back, and she stumbled, barely able to keep from collapsing to the ground.

The mummy followed, intent on destroying this pathetic cleric that had dared to challenge it.

But before the creature could strike again, another foe stepped forward to block it. Dannel, finally able to shake off the grim effects of the creature’s power out of fury at its assault upon Zenna, drew his sword and brought it around to hack at the creature’s outstretched arm. Chips of bone flew from the impact, although the assault appeared to do little to slow or hinder the creature as it raised its other arm and turned toward the elf. Behind it, Arun rushed once more into the fray, but once again his powerful blow to the small of the mummy’s back seemed harmlessly absorbed by its unnaturally tough hide. Snarling in frustration, Arun tossed his shield aside and took up the hammer with both hands, intent on overcoming its defenses through sheer strength.

“Zenna!” Dannel cried, his distraction nearly costing him as the mummy lunged for his throat with both claw-like hands. The elf dodged backward, nearly falling as he stumbled against Mole. The gnome was still shaking off the effects of the mummy’s despair, and Dannel caught her up, dragging her free of the melee. The mummy followed, and would have caught them, but for Arun surging in again, his hammer raised again to attack.

“Face ME!” he said, bringing down the hammer in an incredible two-handed strike, smiting the mummy. The undead monster clearly felt that attack, though it still seemed nigh-unstoppable as it spun to face the dwarf. Its claws tore at his arms as he pulled back his hammer, but the dwarf’s bracers protected him from damage, and he was able to draw free before the mummy could get a clean grip on him.

“Help Zenna!” Dannel said to Mole, putting the rogue down a few paces away before turning back toward the melee.

But Zenna had already recovered, and even as the elf turned away from Mole she stepped forward boldly, words of power flowing from her lips. The mummy heard and turned toward her, just in time to absorb a scorching ray that flared over its withered body like a dragon’s deadly breath. The mummy screeched as its upper body turned into a pyre, but it kept coming, staggering toward Zenna, its arms outstretched with its burning fingers clutching at air as they sought to rend her flesh. The tiefling darted back in alarm, but before it could reach her Dannel ducked in and swept his sword around low, catching the mummy solidly on one leg and knocking it off-balance. Before it could recover, Arun’s hammer had arrived with its own message for the creature’s spine, and it went down, flames still spreading across its body.

It tried to get up, but never made it.

Hodge finally “unfroze,” staring at the scorched carcass of the mummy with a look combining shame and disgust. Arun clasped the dwarf’s shoulder. “There is no shame in it; the effect was magical, and affected Mole and the elf as well.”

“It dinna affect yer,” the dwarf replied.

“My faith was my shield, but that is not to say that I did not feel the terror of its gaze.”

Dannel, meanwhile, came over to Zenna. “That wound looks bad,” he said, examining her face, drawing out his magical wand. The tiefling was pale, her skin cracked and bleeding where the mummy had struck her.

The elf sang to his wand, calling upon its power, but frowned as the healing glow failed to do anything to Zenna’s injury.

“Arun,” he said.

“What’s the matter?” Zenna asked, noticing the change in Dannel’s expression.

“Nothing, I’d just like Arun to take a look at it,” the elf said.

“I... I feel weak,” Zenna said. “I think that creature hit me harder than I thought; maybe I should sit down for a moment...” There were no chairs or other convenient objects on this side of the room, so Dannel made a pad out of his cloak and helped the tiefling sit down.

Arun came over and examined Zenna, frowning as he looked at the wound.

“What is it?” Zenna asked.

“Your skin is starting to crack, around the injury,” he said. He took off his gauntlets and touched his thick hands to the woman’s face. Zenna felt a sudden surge of energy pass through her at the dwarf’s touch, as a sensation like being dipped in a cold mountain stream spread throughout her body. But a moment later the sensation abruptly faded, and she felt suddenly ill. Leaning over, she was barely able to keep from losing the contents of her stomach upon the wet stone.

“Zenna!” Mole exclaimed, worry in her voice.

“What... what’s happening to me...” the tiefling said, her voice tight.

Arun looked to Dannel, and shook his head.

The elf nodded. His expression was that of a man who’d just been stabbed in the gut.

“Dannel,” Zenna said, pulling herself back up to a sitting position, using Mole for support. “Tell me.”

Reluctantly, he met her gaze. “You have contracted mummy rot.”

Chapter 116

For a moment, a cold silence hung over the five adventurers gathered in the dank underground chamber.

“Well, how do we cure her?” Mole said. “I thought you paladins could cure disease?”

“The power of the curse overlays the sickness, and resists my efforts to purge the disease from her,” Arun said. “Until we remove the curse, I cannot heal her.”

“Well, how do we remove the curse, then?” the gnome persisted.

“A powerful cleric could do it, or a wizard of yet greater talent,” Dannel explained.

“In other words, none of us here,” Zenna said. “Help me up.”

“You need to save your strength,” Dannel began, but the tiefling cut him off.

“Why? Don’t think I don’t understand what you’ve told me, Dannel... I know enough to know that what you’ve pronounced is in all likelihood a death sentence.”

“No!” Mole exclaimed. “No, we’ll find a way! We should go back to Cauldron... Jenya can treat you!”

Dannel and Arun both nodded. “Yes, the high priestess most likely could purge you of the infection,” Dannel said. “We should head back immediately,” the dwarf added.

But Zenna shook her head. “No. Don’t get me wrong,” she added, holding up a hand to forestall their replies. “I have no wish to die. But we’re nearly a tenday from Cauldron, and I know enough about sickness to know that my chances of surviving that march are slender. No, we should finish what we came here to do... These kuo-toa are led by a powerful priest, if you’ll remember; perhaps they may have something, a potion, a scroll, that can help us.”

“Zenna,” Dannel began.

“We finish our search, find Zenith Splintershield, and then we’ll head back,” she said firmly. “Another hour isn’t going to make a difference, either way.”

“I am not without skill in healing, and I can pray for spells that can mitigate the worst effects of the disease, give us time,” Arun said. “Do not abandon hope, never abandon hope.”

Zenna nodded, her face already marked with splotches around the ugly wound, her expression grim.

“Let’s get this done then,” Hodge said, boldly trudging forward through the pool to the far side. The others followed, Mole making the trip astride Arun’s back. There was no levity, even from Mole; once they had gathered safely on the far side of the pool, they set out again in single file down the far corridor, Dannel again in the lead.

After a few dozen paces the corridor turned left, progressing only a short distance before turning left and heading back parallel to their original course. The passageway ended a few paces later in a flat stone wall fronted by a small puddle of water and greenish mulch. It only took Dannel a few moments to determine that the apparent barrier was in fact a portal, a stone door cleverly recessed and built to look like a normal wall.

"I expect it's less obvious on the far side," he told the others. "Not much sense in building a corridor that goes nowhere."

"Nor do builders create secret doors, unless there's a reason," Zenna pointed out.

Dannel nodded, and turned back to the door. He and Mole quickly scanned the door for traps or triggers, the elf looking high, the gnome low. He then handed the small stone that contained his light spell back to Zenna, who closed her fingers around it until only a faint sliver of light shone to illuminate the door.

Dannel nodded at Mole, and carefully pressed against the edge of the portal. For a moment the heavy stone resisted, and then with a slight sucking sound it slid outward. Light and noise spilled into the corridor; the former a soft, greenish glow that seemed almost unreal in its composition, and the latter an uneven, rhythmic chanting that the companions now clearly recognized as kuo-toan.

"Shhh," Mole whispered to them, then she darted through the crack before any of them could move to stop her.

Zenna caught herself before she exclaimed a warning, throwing up her hands in frustration.

Dannel edged forward to the opening, so that he could peer into the room beyond. The space, even from his limited field of vision, had a feeling of great size about it. Huge pillars at least five paces thick supported a platform directly above them, that appeared to occupy a good portion of this side of the chamber. The center of the room was filled with a wide pool of green water of indeterminate depth, out of which rose stone steps that ascended to the top of the platform. The chanting seemed to be coming from above, atop the platform.

Mole had closed to the edge of the platform, moving slowly to avoid splashing in the many puddles that dotted the floor. She left Dannel's line of sight for a moment that stretched into a long minute. The elf was about to head out after her when she reappeared, gesturing up toward the platform with two fingers held up.

The elf nodded, and drew back.

"Looks like a pair of clerics," he told the others. "We'd best be careful, though; this room is huge and looks like it could be some sort of temple or gathering place."

"Let's be about it, then," Arun said.

The elf looked at the heavily-armored dwarves dubiously. "You wouldn't get ten paces before alerting them," he said. "The floor of the chamber is half-flooded, in any case. Let Mole and I get into position; we can ambush them, and you can rush in once we've engaged them."

"Me as well," Zenna said. "I'm not wearing armor; I can be at least relatively quiet, and you may need my spells."

The elf nodded, and turned back to the narrow opening. Mole had vanished again, but Dannel knew that she'd be in position. Aware of Zenna's presence behind him, he crept along the edge of the room until he was out from under the looming presence of the platform above. He continued in the shadows along the perimeter of the chamber until he could get a clear look at what they faced.

The platform was dominated by a huge stone statue, rising some thirty feet above its surface into the shadows that gathered in the chamber's vaulted ceiling. The statue was of a female humanoid form, with claws for hands and a crustacean abomination for a head. The room had to fill the entire interior of the great stone fish, Dannel realized. He could sense the power in this place, a faintly malevolent aura that clung to him like the water soaking his skin. High above, several balconies ran around the edges of the room, but they appeared to be unoccupied as far as he could determine.

Standing on that platform was the source of the chanting, a pair of kuo-toa priests. They wore ceremonial robes in a sickly olive draped over their bodies, but even the bulky garments were not enough to fully conceal the obvious metal armor that they wore beneath. High above the ground level, a balcony ran around the edges of the room.

Dannel gestured for Zenna to take up a position where he'd concealed himself, then he moved ahead to a spot near a narrow stone staircase that led up to the lowest of the circling balconies. There was still no sign of Mole, but Dannel knew she was out there, somewhere, likely in a position where she'd get into the maximum amount of trouble.

A loud clank drew his attention around. Arun had appeared in the doorway, waiting. Dannel glanced up at the kuo-toa clerics, but apparently they hadn't heard the sound; at least their chanting and abasement before the fell statue continued unimpeded.

Enough stalling, he thought. He drew out one of his few remaining arrows, fitted it to his bow, carefully sighted down its length, and released.

The shaft flew true and impacted with a metallic thud, the steel head punching through armor and into the clammy flesh of the fish-man. The kuo-toa staggered forward against the statue. Its companion let out an angry croak and spun, only to cry out as a tiny dart embedded itself deeply in the gap where the plates of its armor overlapped at its hip. Dannel stifled a groan as Mole popped up from her place of concealment—a shadowy spot on the flight of stairs that led up to the platform, perhaps three steps from the summit.

Zenna, too distant for her remaining spells to be of assistance, fired her crossbow at the cleric that Dannel had wounded. Her aim was off, however, and the bolt caromed off of one stone foot of the statue. The injured whip shrieked in rage at the desecration, and both of them turned toward Mole, reaching for the morningstars hanging at their belts.

The grinding of stone, the creak of metal, and loud splashing announced the arrival of the dwarves. Arun and Hodge rushed forward from the secret door toward the base of the stairs, the gathered water slowing them some as they charged toward the battle.

Mole held her ground, awaiting the rush of the priests—at least she had that much sense in her, Dannel thought as he reached for another arrow. But instead of charging, the one that Mole had shot stepped over to where its companion stood, lifting a soggy limb to touch its companion. Mole recognized what they were about at the same instant that Dannel did, and the gnome leapt aside as a forked lightning bolt sliced out at her. The arc of energy narrowly missed her as she tucked into a roll and came back up to her feet, narrowly missing tumbling off of the platform entirely. Dannel's second shot caught the cleric squarely in the chest a moment later, and the creature crumpled, now seriously hurt.

The second whip dug into the leather pouch dangling from its side, unrolling a scroll. It began croaking out the words of a spell, but whether the magic was designed to aid itself or its crippled ally, or to strike out at the adventurers, would remain unknown as a gleaming steel knife punched through the parchment, jabbing several inches into the kuo-toa's throat. The gathering magic from the sundered scroll fragmented as the cleric reached out and pulled Mole's blade free, slick with its fetid blood. The kuo-toa croaked something and turned toward the rear of the platform, where a pair of doors exited the chamber behind the statue, but it only managed a few steps before a heavy bolt from Hodge's crossbow caught it squarely in the back of the skull, and it fell to the ground, its limbs flopping as its body came gradually to learn that it was dead.

Arun clambered up the stairs in a noisy progression, Hodge a short distance behind him after he'd swapped out his heavy crossbow for his trusty Betsy. Mole, seeing that neither cleric was getting back up, turned to await them at the top of the stairs, after flashing a "thumbs up" to Dannel and Zenna.

The elf started toward the stairs himself, but hesitated as he saw a tall shadow move in the darkness behind the statue...

"Look out!" he cried in warning, but was too late as a cloud of terrible, roiling blackness erupted at the edge of the platform, engulfing both Arun and Mole and obscuring them from sight.

Mole screamed.

Chapter 117

Mole screamed as the world went dark around her, and the unholy blight tore at her senses. The innate goodness of her heart increased her suffering now, as the foulness of the evil spell sought out the bright places in her soul, searing them with its dank corruption.

But then, just when she thought that she could not bear another instant, the spell ended and the black cloud faded. Still sick from the blight, she saw the kuo-toa cleric who had cast the spell. The creature was huge, nearly seven feet in height, and covered with a second skin of silvery metal plate armor that glistened wetly in the cold moisture of the temple. It carried a massive staff with a nasty-looking pincer on one end.

Beside her, Arun, looking equally ravaged by the terrible spell, nonetheless trod bravely forward, hefting his hammer as he confronted the foul high priest.

“You die now, monster,” he said, lifting his heavy hammer and pointing it like a spear at the cleric’s chest.

And to Mole’s surprise, the cleric retreated, back to the stone portal that stood ajar behind the lobster-woman statue. Not surprisingly, Arun followed.

“Come on guys, he’s getting away!” Mole yelled down to the others, before starting after Arun. Fighting down the roiling sensation in her gut that still threatened to overcome her, she tucked her little crossbow into her belt—she’d never bring down a monster like that cleric with that!—and drew out her slender sword. Dannel, rushing up the stairs, shouted something after her, but the words were lost in the acoustics of the chamber and the pounding of her blood in her ears. The kuo-toa high priest—Margh-Michto, she remembered, the name given him by the kuo-toa they’d spoken to before—darted through the half-open portal into a smaller chamber beyond. Arun followed him at a deliberate pace, his armored body clanking loudly with each step.

“Um... Arun, maybe we’d best wait for the others...”

But it didn’t look like the paladin was stopping, and she didn’t want to miss the trouble that was no doubt waiting for him in the priest’s lair, so she hastened her pace, catching up to the dwarf even as he strode boldly through the stone threshold.

Mole took in the features of the room in an instant; the grim carvings on the walls, the relatively low ceiling, the two inches of water that covered the slightly sunken floor. There were other exits, stone doors in the walls to the left and right, but Mole didn’t really have time to examine them, for the kuo-toa high priest was there, as in right on top of them, driving forward to slam the heavy door shut behind them. Arun responded quickly, slamming his hammer into the fish-man’s side, but Margh-Michto’s heavy armor was fashioned of mithral, and it absorbed most of the force of the impact. The stone door clanged as it slammed shut—or mostly shut, Mole amended; it was jammed slightly open by something stuck in the threshold.

Even so, she didn’t think it was a good idea to give the cleric time for more tricks, so she quickly skirted around Arun to come upon the kuo-toa from behind.

But before she could get into position, Margh-Michto stepped back, and uttered a terrible and harsh croak replete with evil power. Arun, recognizing that the priest was calling upon another spell, lifted his hammer and rushed forward to strike, but even as the weapon began its downward arc, the kuo-toa finished his dread magic. The power of the priest’s fell patron flowed at the command of her servant, drawing upon elemental energies to shape their surroundings to his will.

And in a flash, the room was suddenly filled to the ceiling with water.

Chapter 118

Dannel ran across the platform toward the dark doorway at full speed, Hodge and Zenna somewhere behind him. Arun disappeared after the fleeing cleric, Mole only a step behind, and even as his mind formed the expectation he saw the door slam shut.

Damn it, people, how many times do you have to walk into an ambush! he thought even as he leapt forward, knowing that he would be too late. At the last instant, though, impelled as much by instinct as by conscious thought, he stabbed his sword forward into the closing gap a spare instant before the heavy stone door clanged noisily against the metal. Dannel imagined that he could sense the steel snapping under the force, but the masterwork blade held, and the door was pinned slightly open.

The elf, suspecting what the slamming door had in store for his friends, lowered his shoulder against the door to thrust it back open. The stone yielded, or started to, but then, suddenly, it slammed back hard again against his sword with almost enough force to knock him down, followed a heartbeat later by a sharp wedge of water that poured through the narrow slot between the door and the jam like a knife, soaking him and sending a sharp jolt of cold through his body.

“Arun! Mole!” he yelled, knowing that they would not be able to hear him.

Mole found the transition from a room that was mostly air and slightly water to the reverse to be an entirely unpleasant experience. Her body, loaded with her clothes and pouches, wasn't sure if it wanted to float or sink, and for a moment she felt disoriented, her breath burning in her chest as her lungs craved for the reassurance of fresh air. She was barely able to keep enough presence of mind to retain her grip on her sword; yes, she'd need that—and with her magical boots boosting her, she kicked off of the floor and rose upward to where a small pocket of air remained between the water filling the chamber and the low ceiling. She took a sweet breath as her head crested the surface, then the weight of her sodden garments pulled her back under.

Then she remembered Arun.

She couldn't see the dwarf, whose heavy armor meant that he would not be making any easy swims up for a breath of air. But she could sense the shadowy figure that slid, even clad in plate, effortlessly through the changed environment toward the paladin. Arun sensed the coming of the cleric as well, but his limbs moved leadenly through the water, unable to stop the cleric as it slid past him, touching him with a slimy hand as it passed. Pain exploded from the touch, and red misted the waters around the dwarf as blood erupted from his nose and ears. The dwarf dropped his now-useless hammer and tried to grab the cleric as it swam past, but he may have been trying to grapple a waterfall, as the kuo-toa slipped free from his grasp and slid away.

Mole tried to follow its path, but quickly lost it in the murky blackness of the water.

We're in trouble, she thought.

A mere few paces distant, on the far side of the door, the rest of the companions tried unsuccessfully to aid their hard-pressed companions. Dannel tried again unsuccessfully to force the door, only managing to fall as the continuing deluge of water turned the already slick stone of the platform into an almost impossible slide. The elf pulled himself up by grabbing onto the hilt of his sword, still jutting awkwardly from the door jam, embedded in the rushing flow of water.

“Out o’ the way!” came a booming dwarven voice. Hodge rushed in, the water parting around him as he came, and with an angry roar he jammed the head of his axe into the narrow gap. Barely keeping his place against the onrushing flow, he worked the blade deeper into the thin opening, until several inches of the steel were wedged into place.

“Open!” he yelled at the door, bracing himself and pulling, using the axe as a lever to force the door.

Dannel pulled himself up enough to grab onto the haft of the axe with the dwarf, the two of them pulling with all their might. The door opened a finger’s span wider, releasing even more water in a torrent through the opening. The elf and dwarf clung together to the handle of the axe, gasping for breaths as the water rushed over them, focusing all of their will upon their effort.

Zenna, a few paces further back, was unable to do anything but watch, her own powers useless against this challenge. Suddenly, though, an idea came to her, and she started forward toward the two working at the door. She barely made it two paces, however, before she slipped on the wet stone, falling painfully to her knees.

Arun could feel the flow of water around him, and had a general idea of where the door was behind him. His chest burned with the lack of air, but of greater concern was the evil cleric lurking in the waters nearby. With his darkvision he could vaguely make out the presence of Maugh-Michto in the murky water, but even moreso the foul evil of the creature burned within his senses like a beacon. There... coming, again. The paladin tensed himself, unsure how he could battle an adversary adapted to this environment that alone would kill him even without outside intervention.

This time, however, the kuo-toa cleric stopped its rush short, instead thrusting a spear-like object at the dwarf’s neck. Realizing what was coming, but again too slow against the press of water to react, Arun could only bring his hands up to claw at the heavy grasp of the pincer staff as it closed heavily around his throat.

Chapter 119

Zenna forced herself back to her feet, trying to ignore the shooting pains that shot up her legs from her bruised knees. She stumbled forward, slipping again on the slick stone as she neared the source of the outpouring water. Nearly going down again, she threw herself up against Dannel’s back to balance herself. Water coursed around her ankles, and for a moment she hung on to the elf for dear life, as she tried to place her boots more or less solidly against the floor.

“Get back, Zenna!” Dannel urged, the words hissed between clenched teeth as he and the dwarf futilely worked the axe wedged into the door.

Ignoring him, Zenna drew herself up. With spray flashing in her face, and her clothes soaking up the water, she focused her concentration, and with one hand clutched to Dannel’s shoulder to steady herself, passed the other before her in a complex pattern while she uttered the words of a spell.

Despite the various distractions, her concentration held for the crucial instants of the spell, and as she finished the enchantment a glowing blue globe appeared before her, a magical shield. The translucent plane of force tilted upward at the wizard’s command, deflecting the sheet of water jetting outward from the slit in the doorframe, passing above the three adventurers in a sheet and forming a cloak of water at their backs as it fell to the stone of the platform a few paces behind.

“All right, give it a heave!” Dannel yelled in encouragement, as he and Hodge renewed their efforts at the door.

Slowly, incrementally, the gap widened.

Although she hadn’t been attacked, Mole could sense that Arun was in trouble, and she knew that the evil cleric would deal with her as soon as the more dire threat was neutralized. Springing up for another breath, she twisted and kicked off from the ceiling, propelling herself in the general direction of where she guessed the kuo-toa to be. Abruptly she sensed movement in front of her, and a vague shadow materialized in the water before her. For a moment she hesitated, worried that she’d confused her position so drastically that she’d come up on Arun, instead of Margh-Michto.

Finally, with a mental shrug, and a fleeting thought, Oh well, we’re dead anyway, I guess, she kicked forward and stabbed her little sword into what she hoped was the head of the kuo-toa priest.

The blade jerked in her hand as she hit something hard, but the sudden thrashing ahead of her indicated that her thrust had had some effect. She tried to kick away, back up to the surface for another breath, but before she could put some distance between her and her enemy a webbed hand grasped tightly onto her ankle, drawing her down. Pain exploded from the touch, a terrible, sick pain that drove up her leg into her body like needles under her flesh. She cried out, but the water muted the sound, and water poured into her throat, choking her.

Suddenly everything began to fade, as the pain began to give way to the soft gray of unconsciousness.

Arun struggled against the pinning grasp of the metal claw around his neck, trying to free himself even as his lungs felt like to burst and the powerful grip of the high priest on the far end of the pincer staff pushed him further back. His arms felt leaden, and his struggles grew weaker as his strength flowed out of him like the water holding him in its cold embrace. At that moment, he knew he was dead, and he felt only a forlorn sense of regret, of choices not taken, words not said.

Even as those thoughts formed in his mind, however, something changed. The water around him was moving, swirling, drawing it backward with him in the direction of the door. He felt the grip on the staff loosen slightly, the hard pressure that had driven him toward the ground easing, and with a sudden desperate surge Arun yanked back, tearing free of the staff's grip with a painful jerk. He tried to rise, knowing that he'd never reach the surface of the water as laden as he was, but to his surprise, as he stood, the current helping to draw him up, he momentarily crested the surface, his face breaking into open air. He barely had time to draw a fraction of a breath, however, before the tumult of the water drew him back under again, and he was fighting to regain his footing once more. But that momentary respite had given him hope, and now he was fighting with all of his typical vigor, clawing back toward the faintest sliver of life.

As the narrow gap of the door widened to a hand's space in width, the spray of water became a torrent that washed over the three adventurers. Zenna's shield deflected a good portion of it from their upper bodies, but it still felt as though an angry giant was grabbing at their legs, trying to pull them down and away into the rush of water. Hodge's face was tight, his jaw locked, his muscles taut like iron cords as they continued to hold the door open. But without a proper fulcrum, there was only so much that could be done with the axe, and it looked like the gap was as large as it was going to get.

"Hold it a second longer!" Dannel cried, thrusting himself into the gap. Hodge grunted and held his ground against the deluge, as the elf pulled himself bodily against the rush of outpouring water into the opening. Grasping onto the lintel and the edge of the door, almost entirely submerged in the flood, he pushed. The escaping water to some extent countered the pressure on the far side holding the door shut, and he was able to draw the gap open another few inches, pulling his body into it to function as a brace and give him more leverage to push. Water swirled all around him, and as the wedge opened Hodge's axe and Dannel's sword were both carried free, washed away by the flood. The dwarf, without the axe to hang onto, was likewise cast backwards across the platform, tangled up with Zenna as the two flailed in confusion within the rushing waters. The elf held on, unable to even draw breath as the water rushed over him, knowing that the lives of his companions depended on hanging on, for just a bit longer!

Finally, after what seemed like an eternity, the flood began to ease, and Dannel realized that he could breathe. Standing up, water continuing to rush out around his legs, he saw that most of the room had drained out. His bow and sword were both gone along with Hodge's axe, presumably somewhere in the pool that now covered the entire floor of the outer chamber below. His feet were more than a bit unsteady as he pulled himself forward into the room that they'd gone through so much trouble to reach.

Arun was there, near the door, still conscious but clearly battered, his throat oozing blood, lying on his side. But the elf's attention was drawn to the kuo-toa high priest, who was even now getting to his own feet. As he rose, Dannel's gaze shifted to the limp form lying in a heap at his feet, half-submerged in a puddle of dank water.

Mole.

Chapter 120

“Mole!” Dannel cried. The elf started forward, but came up short as Margh-Michto turned to face him, the evil priest bleeding slightly from a gash in the side of its neck, but otherwise quite intact—and dangerous.

It was at that point that Dannel remembered that he didn’t have a weapon.

A clank of metal behind him startled him, before he remembered Arun. The dwarf paladin drew himself up in cumbersome motions to his feet, pausing only to close his fingers around the haft of his warhammer, pressed up against the base of the door where the rushing waters had cast it. The kuo-toa regarded them with clear hatred in its eyes as the battered paladin stepped forward, sagging a bit with each stride. His shield had been torn away in the chaos of the flooded chamber, and he held his weapon tightly in both hands.

“I believe you were about to die,” Arun said, lifting his weapon with a clear effort, pointing its head at the chest of Margh-Michto.

The kuo-toa cleric let out a roar and came forward to meet them, calling upon the power of its fell goddess. It did... something to Arun, calling down a curse upon the holy warrior, but the dwarf’s innate resistances and the dedication of his calling allowed him to shrug off the baleful effect of the spell. The dwarf, in turn, lashed out with his hammer, striking the kuo-toa a two-handed blow to the side that it clearly felt, even through its nearly invincible armor.

Dannel knew that he could do little against the creature unarmed, but he also knew that despite his initial success, Arun couldn’t take much more of a beating. He cast about for a weapon, and his eyes alighted upon the creature’s staff, torn free by the escaping waters and now lying apart toward the far side of the room. Dannel was there quickly, and scooping up the weapon darted toward the melee. The weapon was ungainly and awkward, and he didn’t even bother with the pincer-construction at its business end, instead holding the blunt end like a quarterstaff as he came at Margh-Michto from the kuo-toa’s flank. He thrust the improvised weapon at the creature’s side, trying to force it back from Mole unmoving form.

The evil high priest refused to give ground, taking the blow against its side and turning to the paladin. Calling upon its patron yet again, it called upon the dark energies of a spell and reached out to touch the paladin. Arun did not flinch, even when dark energies ripped into him, pushing him even closer to the brink between life and death. He took the full force of the inflict wounds spell—thankfully, the cleric’s greater magics had been expended, and the spell was only of lesser effect—and with a roar brought his hammer down in a two-handed, overhead strike that sank with a mighty plop into the moist skin of the cleric’s head. The blow struck with such force that the flanges of the mithral half-helm it wore over its ungainly skull were driven deep into its shoulders, and the remaining contents of its head squished outward around the edges of the impact, one bulbous eye popping with a sick sucking sound.

The evil cleric, clearly dying, remained standing for a full second, a terrible sound coming from the compressed slit of its jaw. To his horror, Dannel realized that the sound was laughter, a sound that persisted even as the creature collapsed in a heap on the floor.

A moment later, Arun joined him, the dwarf finally pushed beyond even his remarkable endurance by the abuse he'd suffered, slipping down into unconsciousness.

Zenna appeared in the doorway, a sight with her clothes soaked and torn about her, her face a pale death's-mask. Dannel was already crouching beside Mole, singing a magical song infused with urgency, his wand of healing already glowing blue in resonance with the tune.

"She's not breathing..." he said, turning her over to reveal a face that was white, still.

Zenna half-ran, half staggered over to her friend. She pulled one of the kuo-toa scrolls she'd confiscated earlier from her pouch; falling to her knees with a splash beside the fallen gnome, she read the words scribed therein, calling upon the power stored upon the parchment. The source of that power had originally been the dark goddess whose servants had caused the suffering she now battled, but the healing energy nonetheless responded at her call, and she focused it into the small, frail form now lying before her.

Mole stirred, and her mouth opened as she sucked in a gasp of air, before coughing out a flood of gray water upon the stones. Dannel held her, helped her as she cleared her drowned lungs.

"Help Arun," he told her.

She nodded and turned to the paladin. She did not have much of her own power left to her, but she called upon what she could through the muddled and exhausted frame of her mind, channeling positive energy into the paladin.

Hodge appeared in the doorway. "Check the other clerics we battled, they might have more scrolls," Dannel told him. The dwarf took in the scene inside the chamber in a weary look, and nodded.

"Oh man, oh man," Mole said, finally recovered enough to speak, looking utterly miserable.

"Arun, I expect to go rushing off blindly into a trap," Zenna said, as she emptied the last of her divine magic into the paladin, who stirred groggily. "But I expect you to be more careful, Mole!" The worry and strain written on her face, however, took some of the sting off of her words.

"Zenna, it wasn't her fault," Dannel said, gently, continuing his soft melody, the soft blue glow flowing into Mole's body until the nimbus around the forked end of the wand faded. Zenna saw it too, and didn't have to ask the elf what it portended. That was that; no more magical healing.

Meanwhile, outside, Hodge rifled the corpses of the two dead kuo-toa priests they'd battled earlier out on the platform in the temple chamber. He'd come across Dannel's longbow, precariously balanced on the edge of the platform near the stairs where the rushing waters had deposited it. The floor of the room was now a small lake, one that no doubt contained his precious axe, Betsy. Yeah, that was fair, he thought, the elf's pansy bow stays up here, while my axe is washed away down there.... With a grunt, he picked up the longbow and turned to the bodies. He found a scroll on one and pocketed it; crossing to the second, he bent to examine its pouches but was distracted by a faint crack followed by a hissing sound that came from the air above him, before the ugly statue of the lobster-woman.

The dwarf's eyes widened in amazement, and his mouth fell open as he regarded a strange and wondrous sight. There, hanging in the air twenty feet above him, was a woman—or at least a creature with the look of a woman. Her features were exotic, her olive skin offset by the brilliant red of her hair, which flowed down in a wave over her shoulders and down her back. Throngs of leather covered her body in a less-than-decent fashion that caused even the vulgar dwarf to color slightly. Wings of long white feathers speckled in red spots the color of blood jutted from her back, but she was not using them to keep her aloft; she just... floated there, hanging in space.

The newcomer looked down at him. “That’s it? I’m brought here for a single filthy dwarf?”

“Hey, this dwarf’s more than enough man fer ya, lady...” Hodge began, but he trailed off as he saw... something... in the flying woman’s eyes that gave him pause. It was only then that he noticed that the woman was carrying a huge longbow, which she loaded with an arrow from the quiver at her hip, and in a smooth, effortless motion drew and aimed down at him. As the head of the arrow touched the shaft of the bow, it burst into eager red flames, which cast an unholy glow upon the sinister features of the woman, their flicker reflected in the dark orbs of her eyes.

“Um... on second thought...”

Chapter 121

Dannel helped Mole to her feet, the gnome looking rather unsteady still even after Dannel’s magical healing. Arun was even slower to rise, the dwarf looking like a man who’d been beaten within an inch of his life, and then smacked on some more for good measure.

Hodge’s cry of pain and alarm drew their attention toward the half-open door. While Arun bent down to recover his hammer yet again, Dannel gestured for Zenna to stay with their injured companions while he ran toward the door. He reached it just as Hodge burst through, a smoldering arrow jutting from a puncture in one of his shoulder-plates, his expression one of alarm as he turned and pushed the heavy door shut.

“What is it?” Dannel asked.

“Demon... woman... very bad...” the dwarf panted. He slammed the door shut, and leaned himself against it, wincing as the action aggravated the wound in his shoulder. “Here, take this,” he said, handing the elf his bow. The elf took the weapon and tested the string—still sound, though it would have to be changed after the soaking they’d taken.

Suddenly a small crack and a familiar hiss sounded in the far corner of the room.

“Oh, damn,” Hodge said.

They all turned to regard the strange woman, hovering a foot above the floor, her majestic height causing her head to nearly brush the ceiling above. She regarded them with a haughty and terrible expression, and naught but cold death burned in her dark eyes.

Dannel didn't need encouragement, as he immediately drew an arrow and fired.

The woman turned smoothly out of the path of the arrow, but it nonetheless punched through one feathered wing as it sliced past, causing the woman's face to flicker slightly in what might have been pain, but which Dannel feared was more irritation. She regarded him coldly and flicked the hand not carrying her bow at him in a desultory gesture.

Instantly a cloying, familiar cloud of roiling chaotic energy erupted around Dannel and Hodge. The elf felt a terrible rending sensation inside him as the unholy blight ripped into him, and Hodge's curses a pace away said that the dwarf was suffering as well.

Zenna's breath froze in her chest as she saw her friends swallowed up in the roiling cloud, but she realized that the creature—an outsider of some sort, she calculated—had made a small mistake. By focusing the blight on Dannel, she, Arun, and Mole had been just outside of its effects. She had no doubt that neither Arun nor Mole, seriously hurt as they were, would be able to withstand such an assault. As she regarded the woman, she doubted their ability to triumph against such a foe. Even were they not depleted and injured as they were, she knew that the creature's resistances would make her spells all but useless, and that their weapons would likely also be of little use.

The others may have felt likewise, but such despair did not hinder Arun, who hefted his hammer and charged. The outsider saw him coming and drew out an arrow, but even as she pulled the string back the dwarf rushed into her in an awkward but powerful rush, his armored shoulder slamming into her hip even as he propelled his hammer into her gut. The blow should have crippled her, unarmored as she was, but the woman was only flung lightly backward, and she effortlessly kicked off from the corner wall, drifting into the center of the room.

“You'll pay for that tickle, dwarf!” she hissed, in a manner that indicated that she could deliver on the threat.

Another arrow from Dannel's clipped her on the shoulder as she turned, a shot that should have sunk deep only drawing a slight trickle of black ichor as it glanced off her unnaturally tough hide. Hodge was charging as well, his dagger looking pathetically underwhelming in his hand, and even the pale Mole started forward, looking for a way to flank this deadly adversary.

The woman, surrounded by her adversaries, suddenly flickered, and in a slight puff of greasy brown smoke reeking of sulfur, vanished from sight.

“She's gone?” Mole asked timorously.

“Don’t bet on it,” Dannel said, clutching his side as he fought through the lingering nausea brought on by the blight.

“Our weapons barely scratched ‘er,” Hodge said, grimacing as he yanked the arrow from the wound in his shoulder. Arun did not comment, only sagging back weakly, barely able to stand.

“Did you find any scrolls?” Zenna demanded, knowing that time was likely not on their side, as she crossed to where the others stood gathered. Hodge nodded, handing over the rolled parchment he’d found earlier.

Zenna took the scroll and unrolled it, glancing at the contents. “Spread out,” she said to them. “Clumped up like this, one more blight will take us all down.” Her voice held the tone of command, sounding unfamiliar even to her, but the others nodded and complied, glancing warily at all corners of the spacious chamber, where the devil-woman might appear at any moment. “Wait, Arun,” Zenna said, reading the words off the scroll and touching the battered dwarf on the shoulder. The healing spell was only of average potency, though stronger than the curatives she herself wielded. The dwarf in turn sank to one knee and offered a prayer to his patron, Moradin, sanctifying himself against the inevitable confrontation that would follow.

Mole, meanwhile, had moved to check one of the side exits. “An anteroom, here,” she said. “Smaller than here, less room for her to ‘port around in.”

“Also less room to avoid those spells of hers,” Dannel observed. “I think we should stay here, but spread out, as Zenna suggested. If and when she appears, all attack with whatever you’ve got.”

“We don’t got a lot right now,” Hodge grunted, favoring his shoulder as he reloaded his heavy crossbow.

Zenna unrolled the last scroll she’d taken from the kuo-toa earlier, in the aftermath of their battle against the priests and warriors outside, in front of the temple. This spell was an enchantment to boost one’s endurance. It would not last long, she knew, but she suspected that the woman-outsider would not wait indefinitely to resume her assault.

She was right. Even as she laid the bear’s endurance upon Arun, the air shimmered in the center of the chamber with the now-familiar crack and hissing sound, and the woman reappeared, a blazing arrow already fitted to her bow.

Chapter 122

The companions turned to reengage the erinyes as she teleported back into the chamber, ready for battle.

Rather than fire, however, she turned instantly toward Arun, and unleashed a lengthy coil of rope at her hip opposite her quiver. The rope unwound like a whip, but its head seemed almost sentient as it twisted toward the dwarf, seeking him out. Arun had little chance of avoiding the probing rope, but even as it closed to within arm's length, Mole leapt out into the middle of the room, intercepting the untangling coil by landing on it in mid-length. The rope shot out and met its fullest extension a foot from the dwarf's face, and then recoiled upon the diminutive figure that had interrupted its mission. Mole yelled as she went down in a tangle of rope and limbs, trying ineffectually to cut at the thick strands with her sword.

Dannel reached into his quiver, and drew out an arrow—his last arrow, one of the missiles forged in silver as a gift for aid rendered long ago. The silver arrow, more of a token than a weapon, long kept in his quiver as an emergency ever since the adventurers had come up against the deadly lycanthrope Tongueater a few months ago. But without his sword, he lacked any other alternatives as he drew the unusual arrow to his cheek and released.

The silver arrow streaked into the side of the devil, hitting squarely but only barely piercing the skin. The arrow hung there in her side as the erinyes turned, plucking the arrow casually from her side as she fixed Dannel with a hard stare.

“Foolish elf,” she said. “Allow me to demonstrate the craft of a true archer.”

Even as she finished speaking she drew and fired, the arrow bursting into flame as it streaked across the room toward him. Dannel tried to dodge, but the shot was true, catching him squarely in the chest. His armor absorbed some of the force of the impact, but nevertheless three inches of sharp steel forged in the dark pits of the Hells sank into his body, and flames erupted from the point of impact, searing him with their terrible fingers.

Pain replaced all other sensation, continuing to ravage him even as he fell, until only pain and darkness was left.

“No!” Zenna screamed, turning to the demon, rage engulfing her in a torrent, replacing her fear and indecision. She spoke a word of magic, and vanished from sight as a cloak of invisibility settled about her. Beside her, Arun had already charged, his hammer lifted high, but as he rushed across the chamber one of the coils of rope snaked across his ankle, and he stumbled, falling hard to the ground.

Hodge, meanwhile, had finished loading his heavy bow, and took quick aim and fired. But his shot was ineffective, striking the devil on the hip and bouncing harmlessly from her unholy flesh.

“You, I think, I will save for last,” she said, casting an idle glance at Hodge.

Hodge spluttered, threw down his crossbow, and drew his dagger. He hesitated, however, as the devil met his gaze and laughed.

Zenna felt something tear within her as the world around her was swallowed in a red haze. Dannel was down, a long shaft jutting from his pierced chest. Mole's struggles grew weaker as the animated rope tightened its grip around her. Hodge stood transfixed, holding his dagger that looked tiny in contrast to the majestic evil of the devil. Arun scrambled to his feet... Arun, their only real chance, now...

Abruptly Zenna ran forward. Tiny splashes on the floor revealed her steps, but she didn't care. She only knew that she had to do something. She only had her color spray and shocking grasp spells... pathetic cantrips, against such a creature. She knew even without trying that her wand of burning hands would have no effect upon it.

The erinyes turned to her, drawing back slightly, not in any way a retreat, but rather just to let her squarely face the charging wizard. "Little wizard, you think to hide yourself from me?"

Zenna did not cease her rush. The words of a spell came to her lips, and she called down a blinding spray of colors that washed over the hovering outsider.

When the color spray faded, however, the erinyes was completely unfazed.

"Really, is that the best you can do?" she said. Almost casually she drew out another arrow, pulled it back, and let fly. Time seemed to freeze around Zenna, with only her, the arrow, and the devil in the entire world. She stared at the arrow that grew until it seemed to fill her vision, and then she was flying backward.

Mercifully, the blackness claimed her.

Chapter 123

Awareness came with the song. It filled her, carried her stirring consciousness along with its melody, pulling her out of the blackness into a brightness that was painful at first. She recoiled, but the song would not release her. Finally she found the brightness give way to a confused medley of vague colors and blurred images. The song was still there, a comforting presence, holding her in its embrace.

"She's coming around," came a voice through the song, a familiar voice that she couldn't quite place.

The song stopped, leaving behind a sense of sadness and loss. "Zenna," came another voice. "Zenna, come back to us," it said, insistent. Feeling a bit of annoyance—why couldn't they just leave her alone?—she stirred through the veil of gray that still separated her from the voices, and opened her eyes.

She was lying on her back, supported by a soft object beneath her. She was cold, and wet; the sensations brought memories of the kuo-toa temple and their grim battles inside. She looked up and saw Dannel, holding her against him, cradling her head in his lap. Mole was standing beside him, and as she turned her head—a mistake, that, as her vision swam out of focus for a moment—she caught sight of Hodge in another part of the room.

"Arun?" she managed to ask.

"Here," came the familiar voice, and with an effort she turned to see the dwarf, with a look more tired and worn than she could ever remember seeing on the face of the holy warrior.

“Arun was able to heal you,” Dannel said. “At least a little.”

“It wasn’t easy,” the paladin said. “That damned curse still has you in its grasp, and it resists my every effort. I admit I have fully depleted my powers, and I wasn’t sure even that would be enough to bring you back to consciousness.”

“At least you’re alive,” Mole pointed out. To Zenna’s eyes, even her friend seemed unnaturally grim, her clothes ragged from the treatment they’d suffered of late, although at least they seemed dry.

Dry? Zenna thought. She tried to get up, but found it was an impossibility even before Dannel placed his hand firmly on her shoulder to restrain her. “How long?” she asked.

Her companions shared a look that did not go unnoticed by the tiefling. “We’ve been here the better part of a day, I think,” Dannel said.

Zenna looked around as best she could from her limited vantage. It seemed like they were still in the kuo-toa temple; at least the floor was dry, which meant that at least they had left the high priest’s quarters. An odd blue flame flickered in a crude bowl that dangled from the ceiling by a rusted iron chain. She suddenly remembered something. “The demon?”

“Gone,” Dannel said. “Or at least, it teleported away, and didn’t come back.”

“After it put Dannel and you down, Arun really laid into it,” Mole said. “After it vanished, Hodge was able to help me get free of that damned rope, then we were able to stabilize you and Dannel.

“We cannot stay here,” Zenna said, but even as she spoke the words, she saw the look that passed between the others. “There’s something else you’re not telling me.”

Arun looked to Dannel, and for some reason, that made her angry. Gathering her will, she forced herself up to a sitting position, ignoring both Dannel’s attempt to restrain her and the resistance of her own body. She thought she did a fairly good job of it, trying to conceal the way that the movement caused the room to spin dangerously around her, and the pounding in her head that felt like a pack of dwarf miners excavating a vein of gold.

Dannel and Arun’s little game of looks—clearly neither of them wanted to share whatever bad news they were keeping—finally frustrated the wizard, and she turned to Mole. “Tell me,” she said, firmly.

“Well... you see, there’s this dragon...”

* * * * *

As the others filled her in on what had happened, Zenna considered that perhaps it would have been better to remain unconscious, unaware of what was transpiring around them.

Angrily she shook off such sentiments; they were going to need to focus all of their efforts to survive this situation, and there was no time for idle whims or the indulgence of self-pity.

Her body hurt and her head throbbed, but she wasn't going to let that stop her either. Caught up in her own musings, she failed to notice the concerned looks from the others, but if she had, she would have thrown them back in their faces. They were all beaten and bruised, and all had the same things at stake. Success was life, failure a nasty and unpleasant death.

After they'd fought off the devil—and there was no way to confirm that she was in fact gone for good, but no sense worrying about it, if she came back they were finished in any case—those of them left standing had tended to Zenna and Dannel as Mole had described. There was no healing magic left to them, to the best that could be done was to carefully bind their wounds and place them in a dry place, wrapped in what was left of their cloaks. They'd retired to one of the antechambers off of the hall where they'd battled Margh-Michto; the floors seemed slightly higher there and the floors of the side chamber were clear of standing water. Again they'd lamented the loss of the supplies in Mole's magical backpack, but there was nothing to be done for that now either.

They'd quickly searched both of the rooms adjoining the priest's chamber, to see if anything useful could be found there. The rooms contained a number of moldering scrolls and books in cubbies excavated in the walls, but most fell apart at their touch and none of it made any sense to them in any case. Mole had found some treasure in heavy ceramic pots present in both chambers; already paranoid from earlier experience, she used the cleric's pincer staff to force the lids open. This precaution proved quite valuable when magical glyphs exploded at the rough treatment, sending out painful blasts of sonic energy. Thankfully Mole was able to avoid the worst of the effects thanks to the added distance provided by the staff, but it was still a close call. The treasure included a small fortune in coins and precious items, but even Mole could not draw much enthusiasm for the find, given the grave nature of their situation.

Their situation grew yet graver when Hodge and Arun ventured out onto the platform to verify that no further dangers lurked out in the temple, and to evaluate the chances of recovering the weapons that they'd lost in the flood earlier. The place seemed quiet as they strode out onto the platform, but the paladin caught sight of movement in the shadows at the far end of the chamber. His shouted warning came even as a dark form lifted from the shallow waters covering the entire chamber floor, rising into the vast open space of the temple center upon the beat of powerful black wings.

Even Arun wasn't foolish enough to linger, and he trailed Hodge only by a pace as the two dwarves rushed back into the priest's chamber. Mole, who'd been tending to the unconscious Zenna, looked up as they returned, and instantly gauged the situation by the looks on their faces.

"What is it?" she asked.

"D...dd...dragon!" Hodge spat, clinging to that narrow line between mere fear and outright panic. Arun looked grim but moved with quick efficiency, reaching over and grabbing the dirk from Hodge's belt. In a smooth motion he jammed the dagger into the narrow crack of the door, wedging it deeply into place with a solid blow from his hammer.

"That won't hold it long," the paladin said. "Move quickly!"

His words shook Hodge to action, and the second dwarf rushed to where he'd left his pack. Trailing profanities, he started digging for something, even as Mole rushed over to Arun. The gnome had recovered Zenna's dagger, and brought Margh-Michto's lengthy pincer staff with her as well, the forked end trailing behind her as she dragged the cumbersome device. Arun worked swiftly, wedging the jagged pincers of the staff into the narrow space between the foot of the door and the uneven surface of the floor, stepping back to force them into place with another blow from his hammer. Then he shifted and struck the staff a foot below the joint with the pincers, breaking the length of the staff off in his hand.

Even as he hefted the staff, the door shuddered with a solid impact from without. The crude wedges held, but Arun was quick to take the second dagger from Mole's hand and hammer it into place higher up in the lintel, reinforcing his work.

The door thrummed once more, then grew quiet.

"The other door!" Mole exclaimed, already rushing in that direction, Arun a few paces behind. Hodge emerged from the antechamber bearing a number of iron wedges, miner's spikes. But before any of them could reach the second door that led out onto the platform outside, it swung roughly open, revealing the head of the dragon on its long, sinuous neck.

Chapter 124

"Well, I know you managed to overcome it, somehow, or we wouldn't be having this conversation," Zenna observed.

"Sheesh, will you let me finish the story?" Mole said, returning to her narrative.

* * * * *

Its hide was as black as night, its head angular and malicious, with twin horns jutting from its forehead and jaws lined liberally with razor-sharp teeth. Its head swiveled back and forth as it scanned the chamber for its enemies, but they missed Mole, who had darted reflexively into the shadows where the wall met the floor, the dragon's field of view partially blocked by the opening of the door. The dragon did catch sight of Arun and Hodge, however, and opened its jaws in an angry roar.

Before it could move more fully into the chamber, however, Mole, using her magical boots to cast her into the air in a broad leap, sprang up from behind the door, her sword slicing upward in a fast arc that caught the dragon off guard. In the instant that the gnome sprang past, the dragon's neck jerked up, revealing a shallow but nonetheless bleeding gash a foot beneath the base of its skull.

The dragon had immediately turned toward the gnome, who landed with a splash and tumbled forward. For a terrible instant Mole looked upon the full rage of the creature, and saw death glistening in the ebon orbs of its eyes. But then it was knocked to the side as Arun impacted the door, thrusting it closed. The dragon, caught off guard, with only its head and neck thrust through the door, was at first caught off balance, and it drew reflexively back, its head clearing the door a moment before it slammed shut hard. Hodge, sending a plume of water up around him with every splashing step, arrived with a spike that Arun slammed into the doorjam with a quick blow from his hammer. The door thrummed with the impact of the dragon a moment later, and the spike slipped out half its length as the door trembled. But both dwarves hurled themselves against the narrow portal, setting another spike and driving the first one back into place. The door continued to pound, for the better part of a minute, but held, the inexorable equation of leverage versus force working out in favor of the companions. A fizzing spray of angry green droplets emerged from under the thin crack at the base of the door, acid that sizzled and bubbled as it hit the water, but the construction of the door in its heavy stone threshold meant that the dragon's breath could not reach the spikes set into the jam on this side.

"And thus we reached a stalemate," Mole said, concluding her account of the battle. "We reinforced both doors with everything we had, but there haven't been any more attempts to force entry that we can detect. It's still out there, though, waiting for us... or at least it was a few hours ago."

"How do you know that?" Zenna asked.

"I used that potion we found, remember? In the ruins where we battled Triel Eldurast, under Cauldron. It gives the power of seeing things over a distance. It worked great, but that dragon was still sitting out there on one of the higher balconies, watching. I think it sensed me watching it, for it stirred and made an awful roar—the kind that doesn't sound like it was very pleased with the situation, or planning on leaving anytime soon."

"At least there haven't been any more kuo-toa," Zenna said. She tried to walk, and was able to manage a few steps before she reached the edge of a great stone basin set into the center of the floor. It offered a welcome respite. The basin was filled with several feet of water, and as she stared into it, the blue light of the magical flame glistening off its surface, she felt as though she could just sink into it, all of her problems falling away...

"Zenna!"

Dannel's voice of concern shook her out of her reverie, and she straightened, drawing away from the elf's reassuring hands. She wanted to lose herself in his embrace, but knew that if she let her guard down, even for a moment, she would collapse.

She turned to where the others had laid her pack, against the wall. Grateful that she was able to make it without falling, she knelt and undid the clasps, revealing her spellbook—carefully wrapped in oilcloth—nestled inside.

"It's gonna be tough," Hodge growled. "Betsy's out there in the water somewheres, the elf ain't go no more arrows, and half our knives are stuck in them doors."

Zenna looked up at her friends. They were all beaten down, ragged and exhausted. She remembered that she hadn't eaten in over a day, and her stomach rumbled. It was almost comical, through the haze of pain and stiffness that suffused her body. But there was no choice, except to give up, and that was no choice at all.

She reached up to her throat, to the symbol that hung there around her neck, her finger tracing the one cut there in silver. “I need some time,” she told the others. “Then we’ll have to see about that dragon.”

Chapter 125

The sound of metal striking metal throbbed dully throughout the huge temple chamber, muted by the slab of stone blocking its transmission.

But Dhorlot heard it.

The sound echoed once again, and then the heavy stone portal scraped slowly open, revealing a dark chamber beyond.

That was fine. Dhorlot did not fear the darkness. Dhorlot, called “the dragon-father” by the kuo-toa, was the darkness, was death as he lifted his body smoothly from its perch on the edge of the balcony high above, and glided out into the vast internal space of the chamber. Though it was sacrilege to the fish-men—and who cared, most of them were dead now, along with that puffed-up fool Margh-Michto—the drake spread its wings to arrest its flight and settled onto the shoulder of the massive statue of Blibdoolpoolp.

The doorway was quiet. No doubt the invaders were lurking inside, waiting for him to rush in again, hoping to ambush him. Well, he would show them a surprise or two...

And then a tiny figure walked into the open out of the doorway.

The dragon’s eyes narrowed as he recognized the gnome who had cut him. The gash in his sinuous neck was a scratch, a trifle, but it still hurt, and it throbbed a bit as he adjusted his position on his perch atop the statue, as if to remind him of the indignity wrought upon his majestic person.

The gnome walked calmly out onto the platform, blissfully unaware of the death that waited directly above her. She put her hands on her hips, surveying the shadowy depths of the cavernous temple chamber. Finally, she spoke, her voice echoing in the vast confines of the place.

“Well then, run off have you, mister dragon? Can’t say I blame you! There’s still plenty of this to go around!” She drew out her tiny sword, and waved it in an elaborate flourish. “We killed a red drake that was, dare I say, somewhat bigger and meaner than you on the way here. Far better for you to play the coward!”

Dhorlot’s eyes narrowed, though he did not make the slightest noise to give away his position as he leaned downward, his hind claws holding him steady on his perch, his long neck twisting until his dagger-shaped head was directly above the puny gnome with her insane threats. His jaws opened wide, and a sibilant hiss came from deep within his body. The gnome did not hear, already continuing her diatribe with another series of threats and insults, culminating with a rather provocative ditty about the ancestry of dragons that was accompanied by a little dance, her hips shaking in a twisting pattern.

The song was cut off as a gout of acid engulfed the gnome, obscuring her from view momentarily in a spray of greenish droplets that splashed up as the dragon's breath hit the solid stone of the platform. For a heartbeat the loud splash and hiss of the acid obscured all other sound, then a terrible scream erupted from where the gnome had been, a cry that quickly drained away into nothing. When the back blast from the spray had settled enough to see, there was nothing left but an unpleasant pile of smoking detritus where a vibrant, living creature had been moments before.

A shadow shifted in the depths of the doorway, and something shot up at the dragon. Dhorlot felt an annoying pinprick of pain as a heavy quarrel stabbed into its thick, muscular torso. He considered blanketing the doorway in darkness, but he'd already spent over a day waiting these intruders out, and did not want to give them a chance to barricade themselves in the high priest's former chambers again. Already hungry, the dragon was also impatient, still too young to have developed the long view of time common among the elders of his race.

Plus, he wanted them to see the death that was coming for them.

The dragon leapt from the shoulder of the statue, spreading his wings to catch the air and slow his descent. He landed heavily on the platform, his claws sending up tendrils of wispy smoke as they splashed in the remnants of acid that had lingered on the damp stone in the aftermath of its breath attack. In the shadows of the chamber beyond the doorway, there was a flicker of movement, but no one immediately moved to slam and barricade the door. And now, it was too late.

Dhorlot, the Dragon-Father, had come to kill.

[Author's note: I downgraded Dhorlot one age category, from Young Adult to Juvenile. A Young Adult black dragon would wipe the floor with this party even if they were at full strength. For some reason the builders of this mod seemed obsessed with putting in CR9+ encounters throughout Bhal-Hamatugn, even though the default party is supposed to be 7th level at this point.]

Chapter 126

"I do NOT sound like that!" Mole whispered, indignant.

Zenna, lost in the intense concentration required to maintain both her silent image and the accompanying ghost sound cantrip, did not respond. But Dannel, standing in the shadows directly beside the door out to the platform, turned and lifted one finger to his lips in warning.

They watched as the illusory Mole offered her challenge to the dragon, and Mole had to stifle another complaint as Zenna embellished her figment's challenge with the crude song and swaying dance. But they all started in surprise when the illusion was engulfed with a spray of acid that swallowed it up, splattering fat drops of acid that reached as far as the doorway where the companions huddled, crouched, waiting and watching in the shadows.

“He’s up above, on the statue!” Hodge hissed, his hands tight on the haft of his weapon. With Betsy missing, he carried the heavy shaft of the high priest’s broken pincer staff, its ends shorn in iron plate by Arun, now a crude but functional quarterstaff.

Dannel slipped into the narrow gap of the doorway, keeping his thin body close to the reassuring presence of the stone portal. He carried Hodge’s huge crossbow cradled in his hands, and even as he stepped momentarily out of the darkness of the chamber he raised the heavy weapon, sighted, and fired, drawing back into the room a moment after the quarrel left the weapon. He handed the empty bow to Hodge. They didn’t really expect to have time to reload the cumbersome weapon, but Hodge nonetheless took up his crank and started drawing back the thick string. Dannel, meanwhile, had drawn up a second weapon from where it dangled from his belt; Zenna’s light crossbow, with a bolt already slotted into the firing channel. It was a matter of a few seconds to ready the bow for firing.

A loud thump announced the arrival of the dragon outside. Even though they’d expected it, the sudden appearance of the dragon outside the narrow slit of the door sent a sudden tremor of fear through all of them. Fortunately this drake was not of an age yet to inspire the supernatural terror for which dragons were known; nonetheless, each of them felt a moment of hopelessness in the face of the considerable danger that confronted them. Dhorlot was not an especially huge specimen, clearly still in that nebulous border zone between adolescence and adulthood, but all of the adventurers knew that size, in this case, meant little. This was a dragon, a member of the species known above all in the Forgotten Realms for its ferocity and durability.

But the companions, battered as they were, were also experienced veterans, and the moment’s hesitation was just that, a moment that was quickly replaced by the execution of the plan that they’d developed earlier.

“Now!” Arun shouted, hefting his warhammer. The dwarf started toward the door, but was not the first to exit; that was the golden-scaled form of Clinger, the paladin’s otherworldly mount. Called once more from the celestial realms where it resided, its wounds healed by its rejuvenative time there, the giant lizard charged into the dragon. Though the two creatures were of like size, the dragon’s wings and long tail gave him an edge, and Dhorlot’s superior mass was evident from the first collision. The celestial lizard smote the black drake, seizing his throat with a powerful bite, trying to bring the dragon down with an incapacitating hold in the first rush. But Dhorlot, even relatively young though he was, was still far too powerful to fall to such a ploy, and within moments had both torn free from the bite and seized the lizard in his muscular foreclaws.

But before the dragon could counter the charge of its adversary, Arun and Hodge were out of the doorway, and launching their own attacks upon the dragon. The two dwarves split and came at the creature from the sides. Hodge thrust his staff at his flank like a spear, but the dragon’s struggles caused the weapon to glance harmlessly off his hide. His skin was corded and thick like boiled leather armor, and even though it hadn’t taken on the hardness of steel plate that would come with age, it was still incredibly resistant to physical assault. On the far side, Arun’s attack did not even connect, as the dragon’s tail lashed out unexpectedly, forcing the paladin off-balance even as he was hefting his hammer for a powerful blow.

The rest of the companions were not idle, each with a role that had been set in the discussion that had followed Zenna's reawaking an hour earlier. Dannel stepped into the doorway again and fired Zenna's light crossbow, biting off a curse as the dragon's movements caused the shot he'd targeted at his head to narrowly miss and shoot off into the darkness. Mole darted out beside him like a shadow, her magical boots carrying her in great strides as she broke to the left, circumventing the base of the massive statue to approach the melee from the rear.

Zenna's body felt leaden as she stepped up behind Dannel, taking his place as he leaned to the side and reached for a fresh bolt. After refreshing her spells she'd laid as much healing as she could bring to bear on her friends, but with the mummy's curse still holding its iron grip on her, she herself could not benefit from the divine power she channeled. She tried to call upon the words of a spell, and for a moment she felt a surge of panic as exhaustion overcame her, driving the trigger phrases and gestures required to tap the stored energy from her mind. Taking a deep breath, and clasping the silver amulet at her throat, she focused what was left of her strength and tried again.

The dragon responded to the attacks upon him with a terrible fury. He directed most of the force of his assault upon the lizard grappling with him, ripping deeply into its golden hide with his vicious claws. The lizard, motivated by its hatred of all things evil, tried to press its attack, but the onslaught gave the dragon enough room for his head to strike down on his sinuous neck, his jaws seizing the lizard's shoulder and literally tearing it free, hurling it across the platform. The dragon roared in triumph as his foe tried to rise, but failed, slumping wearily to the hard stone, bright celestial ichor flowing freely from its deep wounds. The two dwarves tried to press their attacks again, but the dragon buffeted them with his wings, driving them back.

Zenna completed her spell, calling forth a coruscating beam of flame that erupted from the palm of her outstretched left hand. The scorching ray flared over the dragon's chest, drawing from him a roar of pain as the heat of the flames penetrated his thick hide. The dragon, his eyes full of rage, started toward the tiefling standing unsteadily in the narrow doorway, but before he could close to attack the wizard's allies threw themselves at the dragon in a furious all-out assault. Hodge cursed as his blow again glanced harmlessly off the dragon's shoulder, but this time Arun's powerful stroke hit true, slamming into the dragon's body with enough force to draw an audible crack as bone gave way before the hammer's iron head. Even as the dragon drew back reflexively, nearly trampling Hodge underfoot, a tiny form darted in from behind, finding a very... vulnerable spot in the dragon's anatomy, and sinking a foot of very sharp steel into it.

Dhorlot felt pain everywhere as his enemies drove their attacks home. He knew that he had made a mistake by letting himself get surrounded, but his desire to crush them was now replaced by a profound desire to get away, to preserve his own life against these foes who had already proven themselves extremely dangerous.

Flapping its wings to give him a moment's space from his attackers, the dragon called down a cloying cloud of darkness upon his own position, cloaking him from view and hopefully blinding his foes. Then he spun, feeling a reassuring impact as his tail hit something small and sent it flying. A sharp stinging pain penetrated his body a foot behind his right wing, but he ignored it and with a mighty leap, his wings beating powerfully, ascended into the air toward the far balcony. He did not head toward the low doors at the far end of the gathered waters, toward his lair; no, Dhorlot was set on complete flight, to return later once these invaders had retired from Bhal-Hamatugn. The dragon flew toward the middle balcony, and the main exit from the kuo-toa temple out into the myriad passages of the Underdark.

But even as the dragon arced painfully down toward the balcony, his lower claws extended to brace himself for a hard landing, Dannel emerged from the darkness at the edge of the platform. The elf lifted Zenna's bow, and with an instinctive motion born of skill and practice, squeezed the trigger and fired. The bolt lanced through the air as the dragon, unaware of the danger, landed on the balcony and pushed at the heavy stone doors that formed the exit. He didn't even feel the impact at first, as the bolt poked neatly through his hide, disappearing into the thick frame of his body. But Dhorlot immediately realized that something was wrong, as he heaved the doors open with his powerful claws. Air gurgled in his lung as fiery blood poured in through the rent opened by the crossbow bolt. The dragon, finally realizing what was happening, turned around in desperation, unwilling to accept the reality of his death even as the world around him grew hazy and indistinct. Finally, almost anticlimactically, he sank slowly down to the ground on the edge of the balcony, a final snort sliding from his nostrils before he quivered once and fell still.

Chapter 127

Zenna felt a rush of panic surge against the bulwarks of her mental discipline as she stood within the darkness, the chaos of sounds raging around her. She heard the noise of battle as her companions struggled against the dragon; felt the rush of wind as it lifted into the air; sensed the slight shift in the currents in the room as it flew away from the platform, toward the far end of the room. Her senses seemed to grow sharper, until she almost imagined that she could smell the water glistening on the stone walls of the high priest's chamber from where she stood in the threshold of the great door. She knew that she should take cover, but was unwilling to move, to bestir herself in any way that would shatter this moment, this feeling of false security in a bubble of chaos.

She heard the clank of metal that would be Arun and Hodge, moving in the darkness, and the loud click of Dannel's borrowed crossbow. Then a dull thud from across the room, a faint sound heavy with meaning.

"What the blazes is happening?" Arun's voice came from the dark.

For a long moment, there was silence, and Zenna could hear only the pounding of her pulse within her ears. Finally, Dannel's voice cut through the quiet.

"It's dead."

Zenna felt a flood of relief, the sensation almost unbalancing her as exhaustion rushed in to replace the eager tension of battle. She needed a task to keep herself on the positive side of that brink, and crept forward to her right, guided by a faint wheeze that ultimately led her to the ravaged form of Clinger, Arun's celestial mount. She bent to touch the giant lizard's mangled hide, her fingers touching slick wetness from the ichor that oozed yet from its wounds. The creature managed a faint groan at her touch, but nothing more. She closed her eyes and called upon a prayer of healing; only a weak osiron, with most of her spells already depleted in healing her companions before the confrontation with the dragon. But the flow of blood from the lizard's many wounds eased, and the creature seemed to rest easier, its breathing growing even and regular.

"Thank you," Arun said.

Zenna looked up, belatedly realizing that she could see again, that the magical darkness created by the dragon had faded. The paladin looked a sight, his armor dirty with the blood of enemies both old and fresh, the face beneath his helm weary with the strain of constant battle. She glanced behind him, and saw only Dannel on the platform, the elf walking slowly back toward them.

"Where's Mole?" she asked, her voice thick with concern.

"The dragon knocked her into the water below, when it took flight," Arun said. "Hodge is helping her; she appears to be all right."

Zenna nodded. Even if she wanted to, she doubted that she could have gotten up without help, and she didn't want Arun to see how seriously the disease that she'd contracted from the mummy had weakened her.

But Dannel could tell, she realized, as she saw the look in the elf's eyes. Behind him, Mole, dripping wet, and Hodge ascended the stairs back up to the platform.

"I can nay believe it," Hodge said. "I thought we were deaders for sure, when that drake landed outside the door." He turned to Zenna. "Maybe there be somethin' to those 'tactics' o' yours after all."

Zenna looked at Arun, but the paladin's face only betrayed the faintest hint of what might have been a smile before he turned to his crippled mount.

"Return to the warmth and safety of your den," he said, laying a hand on the giant lizard's head. The creature's eyes opened slightly, then it faded into wisps of gray smoke that sank into the stone of the platform.

"Well, that was... interesting," Mole said. "This dragon-killing stuff isn't nearly as bad as uncle Cal made it out to be."

Zenna laughed despite herself, but the mirth was short-lived, as she took in their battered state.

"I'm hungry enough to eat a dragon," Hodge said, with a meaningful look up to the balcony across from the platform.

“And how would you cook it?” Mole said. “You’re not going to find anything that you can burn in this wet place...”

“I’m hungry enough to eat ‘er raw,” the dwarf replied.

As the two continued their banter, Dannel looked down at Zenna. Dark circles hung under the elf’s eyes. “We’re done,” he said simply. “Zenith or no Zenith...”

“No,” Zenna said, and with the word drew up enough strength from within to stand, hoping that it wasn’t too obvious how much she took out of her to do so.

“Lass,” Arun began.

“No, Arun,” Zenna said, but there was warmth in her tone to match her determination. “No, we’ve paid too much already to turn away yet. Let’s finish what we came here to do.” She looked up at the elf. “Please.”

For a moment the two looked at each other, then Dannel finally nodded. “All right. But I don’t know what we can do, if any more threats present themselves.”

“We holed up in that swamp of a room for o’er a day,” Hodge said. “Mebbe that drake was the last o’em.”

“Perhaps,” Dannel said, but his tone was doubtful.

“I say we go up there,” Mole said, pointing to the highest of the balconies, a good twenty feet above where the dragon lay, any maybe fifty feet above the water-logged floor of the temple below them.

“Oh? Why?” Dannel asked.

“Because we haven’t gone there yet, and the dragon was perched up there before, like it was guarding something.”

“Well, that be as good a reason as any,” Arun said. “Let’s move out.”

“Eh, I ain’t leavin’ without ol’ Betsy,” Hodge said. “An’ I don’t know if elfie there wants his blade back, but me axe ain’t gunna lie in some fish-man’s tidepool to rust.”

“Great, more swimming,” Mole groaned.

* * * * *

It took the better part of an hour to find Hodge’s axe in the two feet of murky water covering the floor of the chamber, by which point they were all soaked and dirty with lichens and muck. Dannel’s sword never did turn up, and the elf did not insist that they prolong their search any further for the weapon. Instead he took the quarterstaff from Hodge, keeping Zenna’s crossbow as a backup.

The companions made their way carefully up the slick stairs to the upper balcony. As they reached the top, they could see that a door was visible in the wall directly above the exit below. An obstacle confronted them as they saw that there were gaps in the balcony flanking the door, with each section bridged by a retractable apparatus of rope and leather that was set up on the far side from their approach. This was remedied as Mole, working in conjunction with the dwarves, was hurled across the gap to the far side to extend the bridge to allow them to pass.

They readied their weapons and magic, but found only an empty corridor beyond the portal, and a larger space further in. Where the temple was dim and shadowy, this room was utterly black, making it impossible for Dannel and Mole to see, but the elf remedied that by casting a light cantrip upon one of the ends of his staff. A quick look around found two exits, stone doors leading off to the left and right from the entry. They picked left at random, and continued to the door, Mole scanning it quickly for any traps or other hazards.

At Arun's insistence the door scraped open to reveal a still-larger room beyond. The ceiling curved slightly, indicating that they were near the summit of the great structure, the back of the giant stone fish. The walls were designed with frescoes that appeared to depict masses of kuo-toa descending into a great hole in the ground. Pillars flanked another portal on the far end of the room, and as the place lacked anything else of interest, they started in that direction.

Zenna, bringing up the rear, did not hear the almost silent scrape of cloth on stone directly above her, nor did she feel the black eyes that followed her progress across the room with a cold intensity. Silently steel slid from the embrace of a scabbard, reflecting an ugly greenish tinge in the light cast by Dannel's staff.

Chapter 128

The faint sound of cloth on stone went unheard as the dark shadow hanging from the ceiling above Zenna paced her, the faintest gleam from the daggers it held muted in the edges of the glow cast by Dannel's shining staff.

A fat drop of green liquid gathered at the end of one of the knives, hung for a second, and then fell to splatter on the floor a half-pace behind Zenna's booted right foot. Zenna, fixed on the far door like the rest of her companions, was not aware of the faint sound, but Mole, her sharp gnomish senses alert, turned.

"Did you hear..." Her eyes widened as she saw, too late, the dark form that leapt down from above. "Look out!"

Instinct augmented by the magical boost provided by her boots carried her forward, and she collided with Zenna a moment before the dark shadow landed in a catlike stance a foot behind where she'd been standing. The mage fell heavily to the side, an ugly sound of ripping cloth following her as the assassin's dagger tore through her trailing cloak. The creature, amorphous in a dark, hooded garment that covered its body, snarled and turned its anger upon the gnome. Mole cried out as its knife dug deeply into her shoulder, and she spun about from the force of the blow, trying to regain her balance.

“Mole!” Zenna cried.

The assassin dropped the bloody dagger and drew out another from the row belted at its hip. Zenna could see that the new weapon glistened heavily with poison. Familiar yells indicated that the others had belatedly become aware of the ambush and were turning to attack, but the creature moved fast, too fast...

The power came almost instinctively, the blast of colors from her hand flying into the face of the assassin even as it lunged toward her with the deadly blade. The assassin staggered, only momentarily stunned by the color spray, but even those few seconds were time it suddenly did not have to spare.

Dannel let out an uncharacteristic roar of anger as he swept the iron-shod staff out in a low arc, taking the creature’s legs out from under it and knocking it roughly to the floor. Zenna crawled backward away from it as Arun and Hodge joined in the battle. Even prone and dazed, and by all appearances helpless, the creature seemed unnaturally quick, squirming out of the descending path of Arun’s hammer a split second before the weapon hit the floor with a heavy crash. But it could not avoid Hodge, who was coming around from the other side.

“All right Betsy, time for payback!” the dwarf yelled, striking the creature with a heavy blow to the side. Its robe tore open, revealing a layer of dark hide armor and the sickly mottled green flesh of a kuo-toa.

“Nother goggler!” Hodge reported, raising his axe for another blow.

But the creature, even bleeding from the deep gash in its side, was quick to recover. In a sudden flurry of movement, it twisted back up to its feet. The others continued to strike at it, Dannel cracking one end of his staff into its shoulder, while Arun laid a more precise blow into its torso. The impact from the latter drove it roughly backward, but it managed to keep its footing, and used the opportunity to spin and dart for the still-open door behind them.

Only its first step carried it into Mole, who’d slipped around behind it.

The gnome held her ground with determination, and as the kuo-toa collided with her, both went down in a tangle of legs and blades. The assassin quickly slipped free, bringing one foot up with a snap into Mole’s face that knocked her roughly onto her back. Then it was up again, heading for the door and escape. Dannel nearly caught it before it could get up, but the blow from his staff narrowly missed it.

As it reached the door, however, a blast of fire from Zenna’s hand caught it squarely in the back. The searing ray drew a line of flames from the small of its back up to the base of its skull, ripping through robe, armor, and the flesh beneath. The kuo-toa tumbled forward, screaming. It tried to get up one last time, but this time the heavy iron-shot end of the staff came down once more on its spine, ending its struggles for good.

Dannel dragged it back into the room, and pushed the heavy door shut, while the others gathered around it. “Mole, are you all right?” Zenna asked.

The gnome looked pale. “There was poison on that blade, but I think I’ll survive. Gnomes are tougher than we look.” She shifted her arm to better get at the gash, and apply a bandage. “Ow, ow, ow,” she said, as Zenna knelt beside her to help clean and treat the wound.

“I’ll be able to help you more tomorrow,” Zenna promised, casting another minor healing osiron upon her friend to help staunch the bleeding.

“Ow’d he get up there?” Hodge said, looking up at the ceiling.

“Magic, I’d guess,” Dannel said, examining the corpse. In addition to the poisoned daggers, which he gave a wide berth, he saw that the creature was wearing simple cloth slippers over its scaly feet—not a common sort of footgear in a place like this.

“If I’m not mistaken, I believe we’ll find that these are slippers of spider climbing,” he told them.

“A useful spell,” Zenna said. “I wasn’t aware that it was commonly placed into an item, but it makes sense.” She shuddered, thinking of what would have happened if Mole hadn’t come to her aid.

Mole had seemingly recovered some with the news of the magical slippers, her eyes gleaming as she no doubt considered the many possibilities offered by such an item.

“Dibs?” she said, looking up at Dannel.

“I don’t think you’ll be able to wear them over your magical boots, Mole,” the elf said.

“Oh, yeah,” Mole said, her face falling precipitously. The elf shot the others a covert grin over the gnome, as she clearly battled the conflicting desires in her mind. “Well, I guess you’d better take them, then.”

“They wouldn’t long survive the treatment I’ve been giving my boots in this place,” the elf said, placing the magical slippers in his pouch.

“If you’re quite finished, there’s still a mission awaiting our attention,” Arun said, turning back to the door.

As they set out again, Dannel turned to Zenna. “Have your skills grown more potent? I thought you could only cast the scorching ray once per day.”

“In anticipation of the battle with the dragon, I memorized another in place of my invisibility spell,” the tiefling explained. “I hope I don’t regret having used it.”

“Given... your current state... you’d better keep back.”

"I don't think anywhere's safe in this place," she said, with a meaningful look back at the doorway where the body of the slain assassin lay.

They reached the double doors, and after another scan for traps by Mole, the dwarves pushed the heavy portals open. As they slid slowly apart, a knife of light from Dannel's staff shone into the room beyond, widening until a long wedge of illumination formed through which they could make out the details of another chamber.

What greeted them was a sight out of a nightmare.

The room was spacious, easily thirty feet across and maybe twice that in depth. A twin row of pillars buttressed the ceiling, forming a corridor down the center of the room. Dangling from the ceiling between those pillars were several ranks of corpses secured to the ceiling by their ankles. The desiccated bodies were of various races, but all had had the tops of their heads sheared off, revealing gaping black holes in the interior of their skulls. Worst of all, the bodies seemed to shift slightly, as if there were some invisible breeze through the place, and a faint moan seemed to come from their ranks, as if the dead were whispering amongst themselves at the coming of the newcomers.

The central aisle culminated in a mighty throne, fashioned from what looked like stretched pelts, but which, given the disfigurement of the dangling corpses, might have been something far worse. The throne of scalps was flanked by a pair of standards, each bearing the image of an axe-bearing dwarf standing upside-down.

Seated in the throne was a dwarf, clad in full plate armor, and a helm that hung low over his eyes. A massive dwarvish waraxe sat close to his right hand, propped up against the throne, and in his left hand he clutched a small glass globe, in which a faint silvery light bounced. The dwarf did not stir at their entry, and only the slight shifting of his chest gave clue that he lived at all.

The companions had found Zenith Splintershield.

Chapter 129

"Okay, what's wrong with him?" Mole asked, her voice sounding a bit too loud in the sepulchre surroundings of the chamber.

"Evil... this place is full of it," Arun growled, his fist tight on the haft of his hammer.

"Them standards... hangin' 'em upside down is a flat-out slap o' dishonor," Hodge added. The dwarf's face was pale, his eyes flicking frequently to the swaying corpses above.

"Zenith Splintershield!" Dannel said, stepping forward. The elf swept the space before him with his staff, driving back the shadows.

At the mention of his name, the dwarf stirred, lifting his head enough to look out at the intruders, but he still make no move to bestir himself.

“The rantings of that boatman make more sense, now,” Zenna said. “He’s not a prisoner... it’s almost like he’s...”

“Their high priest?” Mole asked.

“You’re coming with us,” Arun said with finality. “Your friends, if that’s what they were, have been destroyed, and your kin wants you to return.”

The dwarf’s cracked lips twisted into a mocking grin. When he spoke, his words were a hollow croak, eerily reminiscent of the language of the kuo-toa. “The many eyes of the orb see everything in their web. Soon they will see you as well.”

“He’s lost ‘is marbles,” Hodge said.

“We don’t wish to fight you,” Arun said. “But you are coming with us.”

The dwarf shifted, his armor creaking with the sound of inevitability. Slowly, he rose, his axe coming into his hand as he stood.

“Can’t we ever get through a situation without bloodshed?” Zenna asked no one in particular, as the companions readied their weapons, alert to any offensive motions from the dwarf.

Zenith turned to Zenna and met her eyes with a cold stare. “You will taste the bitter fruit of betrayal from one you love,” he said, his voice empty of emotion.

Zenna paled slightly, but she managed a dark comment, saying, “That’s the story of my life. Tell me something new.”

The dwarf did not respond, only drawing back his free hand and hurling the glowing sphere in his hand toward the south wall. The companions, close to the arc of the missile, drew back in alarm, but Mole burst forward, and with a magically-enhanced boost from her boots, she leapt up and caught the object before it could impact its target. Flipping in mid-air after the catch, she landed softly on her feet, cradling the object in the nook of her elbow.

“Nice catch,” Dannel said idly. He confronted the dwarf, and began to sing, a soft, lilting melody that filled the room with its light notes and blended harmonies. Zenna could feel the magic in the song, the web that the elf attempted to wrap around the dwarf, but the dark powers latent in this place broke up the sound, and even before the bard allowed the song to fade, the tiefling could see that the charm had failed to take hold.

Zenith took a single step forward, his boots slamming on the hard stone with cold finality. The huge axe came up into an easy battle grip.

“That’s a defensive stance,” Hodge cautioned. “He’s a defender.”

Arun nodded, recognizing the same thing. He gestured with his hammer, and the two dwarves moved to slowly flank the mad dwarven warrior. Zenith did not acknowledge them, and in fact his stare was vacant, unfocused—but the axe in his hand did not waver.

Mole, meanwhile, had vanished from view.

“This is crazy,” Zenna said. “If he won’t come with us quietly, then let’s fill him full of crossbow bolts until he decides to change his outlook.”

“That won’t work against an armored dwarven defender,” Arun said, moving into position across from Hodge, with the dwarf between them. Zenith still hadn’t moved, but none of them were willing to believe that there would be no risk in apprehending him.

“Well, it’s worth a try, still,” Dannel said, lifting his crossbow and firing.

The bolt flew true toward the dwarf’s chest, but suddenly he shifted, moving so quickly that his fist seemed a blur as he drew up his axe across his body. The steel-tipped bolt glanced off of the thick shaft of the weapon and shot up to the right, missing the dwarf’s head by about two inches.

“Okay, the hard way, then,” Dannel said.

“Let’s see if he can dodge a spray of fire,” Zenna said, but Dannel forestalled her with an arm across her path.

“Stay back,” he said firmly, handing her the bow and quiver, and taking up his quarterstaff. Zenna shot him a hard look, but her own weariness and the realization that he was right froze her retort in her throat. Instead, she turned herself to reloading the bow.

Arun and Hodge exchanged a meaningful look, and charged.

Zenith seemed oblivious to the rush of the pair of armored dwarves, but at the last moment he twisted, taking a glancing hit from Arun that slid off of the thick plates of his armor, and catching Hodge’s blow on the haft of his waraxe, deflecting the stroke wide to the right. In the same motion, before Hodge could even begin to react, the dwarven defender brought the head of his axe about in a sudden snapping motion that had strength behind it despite the shortness of the swing. Hodge cried out as the weapon dug into his shoulder, splitting the ill-fitting bands of his stolen armor and drawing a jet of blood that sprayed into the air as he staggered back.

“Get back, Hodge!” Arun yelled, as he drove his hammer into Zenith’s side in a hasty follow-up blow that seemed to have little if any effect.

Hodge hesitated, but at the command in Arun’s voice, withdrew, barely managing to keep his feet.

Zenith did not pursue the crippled dwarf, instead spinning smoothly about to face Arun. But even as he sliced out with his axe to attack the paladin, the gold dwarf’s allies joined the fray. Dannel charged with his staff, the bright light at its end distracting Zenith enough for him to land a glancing blow that caromed off of the side of the dwarven warrior’s helm. And a shadow emerged behind the embattled dwarf, materializing into the form of a gnome that stabbed her tiny sword into the leg-joint of Zenith’s heavy armor. The blow should have taken him down, but Zenith did not waver from his stance, his legs placed onto the stone like tree trunks rooted deeply in the earth.

Zenith's attacks continued unabated, oblivious to the damage that he was taking. His attack at Arun caught the paladin's shield, driving him back a step but doing no damage. But even as Mole darted in for another strike, the defender reversed his stroke and jammed the haft of his weapon backward.

"Mole, no!" Arun warned, but he was too late as the end of the axe's shaft, dressed in a jagged spike of iron, blasted into the gnome's face. Mole was flung backward, her jaw shattered, and while she clung somehow to consciousness, she was clearly out of the fight, barely able to crawl away from the melee.

"You'll pay for that, you bastard!" Dannel yelled, snapping the staff around in an attack designed to trip up the defender. The staff connected with the dwarf's injured knee, but it may as well have struck the bole of a tree, for all the effect it seemed to have. Zenith looked up at the elf.

"Your soul will be forfeit at the Smoking Eye," he rasped, before subsiding back into silence.

Arun pressed his attack, launching a series of powerful blows at their mad adversary. The dwarf took each hit stoically, betraying no feeling even when one blow broke through his defenses and battered his breastplate with enough force to dent the steel. He only lifted his axe to counter...

But suddenly a cloak fluttered down from above, landing across his face, blinding him.

Zenna fashioned a grim smile as she relinquished her concentration on her mage hand, and started to circle around the melee to get to Mole. She had only a single minor healing osiron left to her, but she had to do what she could...

Zenith swept out his axe in a massive blind arc that forced both Arun and Dannel to dodge back. He reached up and drew the cloak from his head in a rough yank. His foes pressed their attack, but the defender was quick to respond, deflecting Dannel's thrust easily and taking little damage from a strike from Arun that glanced off of one of his curving shoulder plates. A heavy bolt punched through the air a pace behind him; Hodge cursed as his aim, conservative due to the need to avoid hitting his allies, proved of little result.

Dannel and Arun continued their attacks, but suddenly the defender lashed out in an unpredictable and intense assault. Dannel overextended himself as a lunge from the staff shot two feet past Zenith's head, and paid for it as the defender jammed the head of his axe into the elf's chest. The blow did not cut through the mithral links of Dannel's armor, but the force of it was enough to knock him from his feet, landing hard a pace removed on his back, stunned. Even as Arun roared and laid into him yet again, the dwarf twisted and used his entire body as the fulcrum around which the path of his deadly axe spun. Arun tried to bring his shield around to intercept, but he'd taken just too much of a beating in the last two days, his battered muscles slow to respond to the threat. The axe crushed his side, crunching through armor and tearing the flesh beneath. Arun cried out and went down to his knees, his hammer slipping from suddenly weak fingers as blood seeped from the nasty wound.

Zenith looked down at his fallen foe. "You will be forced to pay a heavy price for choices made," he intoned.

The bloody axe came up for a killing blow.

Chapter 130

"No!" Zenna cried, from where she knelt over the prostrate form of Mole. The gnome had finally slipped from consciousness, but Zenna had stabilized her with her last healing spell. She lacked the power to stop the apparently indefatigable dwarven defender as he lifted his axe to strike the final blow against Arun, however, and her gut clenched as she remembered scenes like this one, where she'd been unable to stop the death of a friend.

A harsh battle cry tore her attention from the devastating tableau. Hodge, his armor caked with flesh blood from the wound in his shoulder, had discarded his heavy bow and shield, and now charged forward, his axe lifted high in both hands. He barreled into the dwarven defender, his axe and body both colliding with Zenith, and he actually managed to lift one of the dwarf's feet from the ground from the force of his impact. But the master warrior's imbalance was purely temporary, and as he reset his feet his twisted to face his already direly wounded foe.

Even through his incredible stamina and awesome effectiveness, it was clear, however, that Zenith's endurance was not unlimited. Blood flecked his lips as he turned to face Hodge, and despite the iron strength of his limbs it could be seen that he moved now with a certain jerkiness, the combined tally of his injuries beginning to take hold.

But Hodge had suffered even greater hurts, and as he tried to bring Betsy about for another attack, he stumbled. His stroke went awry, and he could do nothing as Zenith calmly drove his axe down in a terrible arc squarely into the center of Hodge's chest.

The dwarven miner glanced down at his chest, then shifted his eyes to Arun. The paladin, helpless and barely clinging to consciousness, met his gaze.

Hodge nodded, smiled, and then fell backward and died.

Zenith stood over the broken forms of his enemies, his face impassive. He shifted his feet, and as he slipped out of his defensive stance, he tottered and collapsed to the ground, unconscious.

Chapter 131

Zenna floated in a sea of unbroken gray. It surrounded her, broken occasionally by vivid ranges of color that she avoided, knowing that they meant pain and discomfort. But she kept being drawn back, tugged insistently into those realms of awareness for brief spaces, only to sag yet deeper back into the gray.

Memories floated through the haze, their sharpness contrasting jarringly with the blank emptiness around her.

Arun stands over the broken body of Hodge, his face chiseled like a mountain. “No,” he says, a single word fixed with certainty.

Zenith Splintershield. Arun wants to leave him. Dannel reminds him of his oath.

Dreams. Nightmares. Back when sleep was still sleep, before the gray came and carried her off.

Vague images from Bhal-Hamatugn, past mingled with present as they retrace their steps from the dark place.

They take her magical hat. Dannel is insistent; she does not have the strength to fight him in any case. At this point she can barely walk unassisted. “We have to know the truth of how fast the disease is progressing,” he says. They don’t have to tell her; she can see the truth in their eyes. The memory grows fuzzy, and she slips off into the gray...

A single sensation; fresh air blowing over the mountains. “We made it,” says a voice, young, feminine, familiar. “We still have to get back to Cauldron,” says another voice. “She’s fading, quickly...”

She feels a floating sensation, her body empty and hollow. She looks up to see warm amber eyes, lined with sadness. They look down and see her. “Hold on, Zenna,” he says. The voice—familiar, soft, its sound accompanying her down into the gray.

She wakes and feels as though the ground beneath her is rolling, moving. She cannot manage to open her eyes, but under her fingertips, she can feel soft scales, warm to the touch.

She looks up into the face of a bearded man, his hair a deep gray, his face lined, clad in expensive raiment that seems both out of place and somehow fitting. “I am sorry. There is nothing I can do for her,” the man says, his eyes sad. She knows him? His name floats away as she sinks back down into the gray.

A cold shiver slips through her, pulling her back with a suddenness that makes her groan. She sees Arun, pouring life-restoring energy into her, fighting the curse that holds her captive. He fails more often than not, but each day he tries anew, trying to give her enough life to survive, just a little longer...

Another moment of lucidity. Her eyes open to see gray clouds above. She is able to shift her head enough to see Arun, bowed under the weight of a heavy burden wrapped in plain wool. The world bounces slightly... she is not walking, she is being carried. She thinks to ask a question, but before she can translate the thought into action, the gray rushes up and catches her again.

A voice. "Hold on, Zenna. We're almost back to Cauldron, just hold on."

A face in the gray. "I'm disappointed, Zenna. I thought you were stronger than this. I thought you were a fighter."

I'm sorry, father...

The gray swallows her...

Chapter 132

"Hold on, Zenna. We're almost back to Cauldron, just hold on."

Mole thought she saw a flicker of movement on her friend's face, and leaned in worriedly. Zenna looked terrible. Her face was an ugly landscape of red lumps and mottled splotches, and her skin had sunk inward until it seemed to barely hang upon her skull. Her breath rattled in her throat like an animal in a trap, clawing its way free. The gnome knew that Arun had done all that he could, channeling divine power into her each day, even though only a dribble made it through the mummy's curse that ensnared her.

She looked over at Arun. The paladin sat slumped, his face lowered, his body heaving as he sucked in one tired breath after another. Arun had been inexhaustible, but it was clear that even he was approaching his limit. Every day he had called his ally, the celestial lizard that Mole had stylized Clinger, to bear Zenna and the wrapped body of Hodge. The lizard remained with them for the better part of the day, but even after it returned to its celestial abode, to await the next calling, they pressed on, with Dannel and their captive carrying Zenna on a stretcher while Arun bore alone the considerable weight of Hodge. They had all felt the inexorable press of time, each hour bringing Zenna that much closer to death. Their food had been whatever roots and greenery Dannel was able to find and pronounce safe; their rest was a few hours grabbed here or there in the middle of the trail. At least Crazy Jared had been able to provision them with some meat and vegetables, which had given them some added strength, for as long as it had lasted. Mole's stomach grumbled at the memory.

Her feet throbbed in her boots, but she knew better than to take them off. She unslung her water bottle, and tried to get Zenna to swallow a few drops. It was a mostly futile gesture.

A faint rustle along the trail indicated the return of Dannel. The elf looked as worn down as the rest of them, but an almost frightening determination gleamed in his eyes.

"The trail ahead is clear," he told them. "We have to keep moving."

Mole shot a covert glance at Arun, who had not responded. "It'll be dark in an hour," she said, "and with the skies this overcast, even our eyes won't be able to see."

Dannel nodded wearily. "I know, but we have to get as far as we can before the full depth of the night," he told her. "We're still at least two days out from Cauldron, and..."

He didn't have to finish. Looking down at Zenna, she understood what he meant.

Dannel looked over at Arun. "We may have to leave him, Arun. We can secure the body somewhere safe, come back for him after..."

Arun pulled himself up with a clear effort. He wore only a half-shirt of light chain links over a fragmented tunic and faded breeches, the whole overlaid with a woolen overcloak that was more holes than cloth. He'd discarded his magical armor almost casually once it had become clear that they would have to carry Hodge's body back to Cauldron. At Mole's insistence they had packed the armor as well as the captured mithral plate formerly worn by Margh-Michto; she'd wrapped both in cloth and they placed the bundle upon Clinger's harness before the lizard was dismissed each day.

Mole rose as well, and walked over to where Zenith sat.

The former dwarven hero had been her charge since they had departed Bhal-Hamatugn. Drawn back from the brink of death by their healing skill—although Arun had refused to use his healing powers upon him—Zenith had been quiescent since their initial battle. The dwarf accepted all commands mutely, moving when prodded and continuing until halted. He had not spoken a word since the battle, and had not made a threatening gesture even when confronted with Arun's anger. Faced with the demands of practicality they'd used him as their pack mule, carrying the stretcher holding Zenna when Clinger was not available, bearing Arun's packed armor when the lizard was present.

The dwarf paladin crossed to where Hodge's body lay. They'd wrapped the fallen dwarf as best they could, but a strong odor hung about the body nonetheless.

"Arun..."

"Raise dead only works within a set period of time," the paladin said, without lifting his eyes from preparing the corpse for travel.

At least let Zenith carry him for a time," Mole suggested. "Dannel and I can manage Zenna's stretcher."

"That one is not touching him," Arun said. His feet scuffing on the assorted rocks that littered the trail, he moved to the front rank.

"Let's go."

They marched until well into the night, until it was so dark that Dannel and Mole stumbled with every second step. Finally even Arun was finished, collapsing on the side of the trail, Hodge's body falling in a heap. They rested there, husbanding their strength for the next day's hard march.

They resumed their journey before dawn, and by the time that the sky had brightened enough beneath the gray pall to clearly distinguish the trail, they had already covered the better part of a mile over the rough terrain. It was clear that the sun was not going to break the clouds for yet another day, although at least it wasn't raining or snowing. At midmorning they paused briefly and Arun called upon his mount. Quickly they conducted the now-familiar daily ritual of swapping out their burdens. Zenna's condition was such that even the gentle rolling of the lizard's motion might be too much for her, so Dannel insisted on carrying her on the stretcher, Arun taking the rear of the pallet after he'd lashed Hodge to Clinger's back. The lizard obeyed without complaint, and soon they were moving again, making the best time they could over the difficult terrain.

They were tired, and focused on their burdens, so perhaps it was understandable that they didn't notice the danger until it was too late.

Chapter 133

It was Clinger who drew their attention, issuing a sibilant hiss that drew their attention up and down the trail.

The path ahead twisted up between a field of boulders before heading up a series of switchbacks to the crest of a rise ahead. A number cloaked figures had emerged from the boulders, and regarded them with hard, greedy eyes.

They were human men, for the most part, although one broad-shouldered brute looked like he had more than a splash of orcish blood in his veins. There were eight in total, and they all shared a hunted look about them, with unkempt beards and garments that bore dirt and wear in roughly equal proportions. They were armed; their weapons, a collection of various poking and cutting implements, seemed entirely functional. Two of them, remaining back among the rocks with higher vantages, carried loaded crossbows. The "armor" worn by the newcomers was a diverse medley of hides and shaped pieces of boiled leather. One, a long-limbed fellow who was missing part of his left ear, actually wore a shirt of mail links, and it was he who addressed the companions.

"Hail and well met!" he exclaimed, waving and offering a friendly smile that belied the hard looks of his fellows.

"Well met," Dannel offered. He carefully laid Zenna's stretcher down in a flat space beside the trail, but made no threatening move toward the crossbow—unloaded, unfortunately—at his hip. He had left the cumbersome quarterstaff he'd used against Zenith in Bhal-Hamatugn, but had since equipped himself with a rapier taken from a fallen kuo-toa.

"It would seem that you have run afoul of the dangers of the mountains," the man said companionably. "I am Torlan, and this crew are my band of Guardians." He indicated the sweep of his fellows with a wide brush of his hand. "You are headed back to Cauldron, then?"

"Indeed," Dannel said, his voice pleasant. "Our friend has taken seriously ill from a nasty malady; you may wish to have your friends keep their distance, lest they catch sick."

"That is terrible news, and I hope that you find aid in Cauldron; the clerics there can treat many illnesses, if one has the coin."

"I thank you for your concern, and wish you good day; we must continue to make haste." The elf shot a quick sidelong glance at his companions; Arun's expression looked like it could break stone, while Mole was nowhere to be seen.

"That there's the ugliest horse I ever did see," one of the men said, to the snicker of his neighbor, a rat-faced man carrying a hook-ended military pick. Torlan silenced them both with a hard look, before turning back to Dannel and his friends.

"Of course, I know you have no time for idle chatter. However, I must ask your tolerance for one more moment; my Guardians have worked hard to keep the high trails clear, and our expenses are significant in this venture. I am afraid that I am compelled to ask a toll, of travelers, to subsidize these efforts."

Arun muttered something unpleasant, but Dannel only smiled and nodded. "A worthy goal, although as you can see, we are not wealthy travelers by any means. What is the tally of this fee?"

"We would not want to interfere with your ability to seek treatment for your friend," Torlan said with a nod of magnanimity. "We will take a mere twenty gold coins for the toll... and that nice suit of silvery mail links that you bear. Such will greatly aid our efforts at keeping the peace. Why, just a few months back, three of my men were harshly murdered on one of the lower trails."

"Sadly, I regret..."

The elf was interrupted as Arun stepped forward. "Enough of this garbage," he said. "We do not have time for this." He held up his hammer, its heavy iron head pointed at Torlan. "Move yourselves out of our way, or you will be moved."

There were a few sneers and harsh comments from the gathered men, but Torlan's smile only deepened, though his eyes gleamed with a nasty light. "You might want to reconsider, ser dwarf. That's quite a smasher you've got there, but I must admit, Olog here has a certain fondness for cutting up dwarves." He indicated the half-orc, who unlimbered a massive two-handed greataxe.

Arun did not falter, even though both crossbowmen had now drawn a bead on him. "Last chance," he said.

One of the crossbowmen suddenly screamed, jerking roughly back, twisting around in a circle. Everyone turned in that direction, and as the man turned, they could see the feathered end of a tiny crossbow bolt jutting from his left eye.

The attention of the bandits was drawn back to the companions as Arun bowled forward, his warhammer clutched tightly in both hands. The half-orc Olog roared his own challenge and rushed ahead to meet him. The huge axe came up above the bandit's head, the thick muscles of his arms corded with amassed strength, but before he could strike the dwarven paladin leapt up and delivered an incredible blow to the brute's chest. The hammer, backed by the entire strength of the dwarf as well as by the divinely sanctioned justice of a smite evil, crushed the half-orc and drove him back three paces, to land in a heap across the trail.

For a long moment, everyone just looked at the corpse.

The silence was shattered as the second crossbowman aimed and fired. The bolt stabbed into Arun's shoulder, piercing deeply through the damaged links of his chain shirt.

"At him, boys!" Torlan yelled, drawing his own sword.

The bandits, their ardor for violence diminished somewhat, rushed the dwarf. Four of them charged at his front and flanks, stabbing and cutting. For a moment, the dwarf was obscured behind the ring of attackers.

But then Dannel leapt into the fray, followed but a heartbeat later by Clinger. The elf ran one man through with a thrust from his rapier, the bandit collapsing as Dannel withdrew his blade from his lung. Clinger took down another, seizing the man's thigh with his powerful bite, and knocking him roughly aside with a shake of his wedge-shaped head.

The second crossbowman quickly reloaded, but before he could take aim at another target he felt a sharp pain in his throat as another tiny bolt from the still-unseen Mole pierced him. He clutched at the wound and fell.

Arun, virtually unarmored, took a few hits but in turn unleashed a storm of death. One man stabbed him with his rapier but paid for it with his life, as the warhammer crashed into the side of his skull. The second turned to run but barely got one foot down before the hammer caught him in the small of his back, snapping his spine and knocking him down to flop out the last moments of his life in the dirt.

And then the battle was over. They looked up to see Torlan's departing form, already a good fifty paces down the trail and running fast.

Arun paused only long enough to yank the crossbow bolt from his shoulder. "All right, let's go," he said.

Chapter 134

The enveloping folds of the gray split open, and Zenna was immersed in light, painful in its intensity. She tried to draw back, but was propelled forward despite her resistance, until colors began to emerge within the radiance, vague forms that only gradually took on substance.

"She will recover, but it will take some time," a voice said. Jenya Urikas, Zenna realized, the fog that had hung over her thoughts now gone and replaced with clarity of memory. All that she had experienced since they had left Bhal-Hamatugn was still vague, like a dream, but at least she remembered who she was and all that had happened before.

Zenna blinked, looking around. She was in the small chapel in the rear of the Temple of Helm, in Cauldron. In addition to Jenya, her companions were there, tired but with triumphant expressions on their faces.

“Hodge?” she asked.

“He will recover,” Jenya said. “He was returned just in time for me to raise him, using one of the scrolls that Sarcem had prepared, before his death.”

“What about Zenith?” Zenna asked.

“We returned him to his kinsman,” Dannel reported. “I’ll fill you in on all of the details later.”

Zenna tried to get up, but Jenya’s firm hand restrained her. “You came very close to death,” she said, her voice warm. “You need to rest, and recover your strength.”

Zenna nodded, and fell back on the cushioned bier upon which she lay. They had made it. This mission had brought them all to the brink of destruction several times, and she knew it would take some time for her to recover from her own ordeal. But they were alive, and for now, that was enough.

THE END OF “ZENITH TRAJECTORY”

The Shackled City IV: “The Demonskar Legacy”
Begun 4-21-04

Chapter 135

Zenna woke to warm morning sunlight streaming in through the large bay windows to the left of the bed. The sounds of activity were just audible through the thick leaded panes, enough to tell her that the city of Cauldron was gearing up to face the day. It was Tenth Day, a day of rest and fun, and she remembered that she’d made plans to visit the markets with Mole later.

She stretched languidly, enjoying the sensations of her body. Finally, she rose, grabbing her new cloak from the chair beside the bed to offer some warmth against the chill of the morning. Spring had arrived in Cauldron, but the city was situated in the mountains, and the mornings in particular were still fairly chilly.

She looked back down at the bed, at Dannel lying there, still asleep. She smiled, her mind drifting back to pleasurable memories. She still wasn’t entirely sure which of them had made the first move last night, but after that initial moment, it had definitely been mutual. She remembered being nervous before, for this had been her first time being with a man, but Dannel had been gentle, and once she’d been swept up in the emotions of the moment, all fears had faded to the background...

Careful to tread quietly, so as not to awaken the sleeping elf, she crossed to the outer chamber, closing the door softly behind her. Their clothes were scattered about the floor—they had not started the evening in the bedchamber—so she gathered a few things up and laid them on the wide expanse of the desk, careful not to disturb the small heap of scrollcases she'd laid there. She grinned wryly at a fleeting thought—what if Esbar had returned last night? The adept of Azuth had given her free rights to his home in Cauldron while he was away, but she doubted that his mandate extended to what she and Dannel had been up to last night. Or perhaps it would; Esbar was a man of wisdom and understanding, and no doubt he himself had been young once. The thought made her smile.

Her gaze lingered on the leather scroll cases, bound together by a threaded leather cord. The scrolls contained an important store of lore, new spells that she'd purchased with her share of the reward from the elder Splintershield for the return of his son, Zenith. Idly she wondered if his kinsmen had been able to help the dwarf, who'd clearly been driven into insanity by his time spent wandering the Underdark, and as a captive of the kuo-toa of Bhal-Hamatugn. In all honesty, she hadn't spent much thought on Zenith, after they'd brought him back to Cauldron.

Celeste and Davked Splintershield had proven as good as their word, granting them a generous reward in the form of gold coins or dwarf-crafted arms and armor. Zenna had spent her share on the new spells, a pair of new wands from the well-stocked shelves of Skie's Treasury, and some other components that might be useful in her researches. She had a few ideas about useful magical items that she could craft for herself and her companions, and the facilities in Esbar Tolerathkas's well-stocked laboratory would prove most useful in this regard. Mole had been able to procure the mithral shirt she'd long desired, while Dannel acquired a new sword to replace the one that he had lost in Bhal-Hamatugn. Only Arun had not acquired new gear, instead giving his share of the reward to the church of Helm to offset the cost of the magic used to raise his friend Hodge from the death he'd suffered at the hands of the insane Zenith Splintershield in the Underdark temple of the kuo-toa.

Zenna turned and caught sight of her magical hat lying on the low table near the windowbench. Instinctively she reached for it, but then hesitated, finally lowering her hand and leaving the hat where it lay. Later, when she went out, she would have to don it once more, but for now, she would allow her true self to show freely, to a man who accepted her for who and what she was. The feeling was liberating, in a way.

But her smile faded quickly, for the thought reminded her of something else. Turning and returning quickly to the desk, she found her blouse, instantly feeling the reassuring solidity of her pin tucked neatly inside. She doffed her cloak long enough to slip into the garment, feeling a familiar sense of relief at the feeling of the cold metal against her skin. Last night she hadn't thought about it, the first time in quite some time that it hadn't occurred to her when removing her garments. For nearly a year now she'd worn it, even in her sleep, relying upon the defense that it offered from scrying or other forms of magical tracking. She'd pressured Mole to wear hers as well, when it was clear that the gnome was less rigorous about relying upon its protection. Well, she'd been careless last night, but just because she was in love was no reason to stop being cautious.

She paused, her mouth falling open. Well, that thought had caught her off guard. In love? Well, Dannel was a true friend, and last night had certainly been great, but... love?

To distract herself from these complicated thoughts, she busied herself with straightening Dannel's garments into a neat pile on the desk. As she lifted his tunic, something fell out from the inner edge of the collar, landing on the floor with a faint clatter. She looked down, and her breath froze in her chest.

Even before she bent low, she knew what it was. Tears blurred her vision as her fingers closed on it, and as she stood, she slumped against the desk, her muscles suddenly weak.

Remembered words sounded in her head, spoken by Zenith Splintershield to her in a dark chamber in Bhal-Hamatugn.

"You will taste the bitter fruit of betrayal from one you love..."

She fell to the ground, sobbing, and the object she'd found slipped from her hand to the ground. It was a small silver pin, identical to the one she wore covertly against her skin.

A silver harp.

Chapter 136

"Zenna, what's wrong?"

Zenna looked up to see Dannel standing in the doorway to the bedroom. The elf was clad only in his breeches, his long hair hanging loosely down across his shoulders, a look of concern on his face. As she wiped away her tears, her sadness was replaced by a burning anger that started as a flame in her gut, but rapidly built to a raging torrent as she pulled herself up, picking up the silver pin as she did so.

"What's wrong? You bastard!"

She hurled the pin at him, a bit disgruntled when his hand snapped out and caught it smoothly. At the very least she'd hoped for maybe an eye.

Dannel looked down at the object in his hand. "Zenna, please, I can explain..."

"I don't want to hear your explanation!" she screamed. "What, are you going to try and tell me it was all just a coincidence? That you just happened to be a Harper, that you just happened to be in Cauldron, that you just HAPPENED to 'run into' me on the road? Do you think I'm an idiot? No, what am I saying? Of course I'm an idiot, I never suspected anything, just let you LIE to me, SPY on me!"

"Zenna, listen to me! Yes, I admit it, your parents asked me to look after you, but they didn't send me to spy on you! I was already here on my own business, and they send a request through Esbar..."

“So they knew we were here all along,” she said, her words dripping venom. “So I was just fooling myself, the whole time.”

“Your parents care a great deal about you,” Dannel said. “Your mother—“

Zenna cut him off. “My mother is dead,” she said. “As for my father and his wife, if they’d truly cared, they would have actually been parents, rather than spending all their time running around the west! They would have been there, and my mother might still be alive.”

“Zenna,” Dannel said, his voice firm. “Zenna, I don’t know the entire story, but I do know that your parents—“ he emphasized the word, “they are responsible for a great deal of good. With great power often comes a weighty duty to use it in the causes in which one believes.”

“I don’t care about any of that,” Zenna said. “I left because I wanted to live my own life. And I will, without their interference—or anyone else’s.”

The elf stepped closer to her, until less than a pace separated them. “Zenna—I love you.”

She looked up at him, and her eyes were cold. “I may not know much about love, but I do know that it’s based on trust. You lied to me, and that cannot be undone.”

She spun away from him, and took up her breeches from the table, quickly sliding into them.

“Zenna, I’m sorry... I didn’t mean for things to happen this way, but I am not lying about my feelings for you...”

She shoved her feet roughly into her boots, painfully jamming one of her left toes. The feeling was almost welcome to her, nothing compared to the pain she was feeling inside. She took up her scrollcases and a few other things, thrusting them into her pack beside the desk.

Dannel moved around to block her. “Zenna, I’m not going to let you leave until we talk this through. I didn’t fight to bring you back from Bhal-Hamatugn to lose you now.”

She stood before him, and it was a long moment before she lifted her head to face him. “I am not yours to be won or lost,” she said. “I do not want to ever see you again. And if you see my ‘parents’, be sure to tell them the same.”

“Zenna—“

She started toward the door. Dannel moved to block her, but she suddenly issued a string of harsh syllables, and the elf abruptly froze, a look of startlement on his face.

“Goodbye, Dannel,” she said. She did not look at him again as she crossed to the door to the landing, pausing only to settle her magical hat upon her head before departing. On the landing, as the door slammed shut behind her, she stood for a moment, the tears pouring down her face, fighting a wave of grief and regret that threatened to overwhelm her.

But only for a moment. Finally she regained control of herself, fighting back the dark emotions with the hard self-discipline that she'd schooled in herself since she'd been a child, alone and different.

Alone.

Finally, she walked down the stairs, without looking back.

Chapter 137

In the city of Cauldron, situated high on the western shoulder of the Alomir Mountains, spring slowly gave way to summer, leaving behind the rough storms and accompanying rains of the annual flood season. Activity along the city's boulevards, extending in concentric circles around the caldera's central lake, continued to build, and the sounds of business and trade extended until well in the evenings, when those noises were replaced by circles of light and sound surrounding the city's numerous inns and taverns.

But the bustle of activity in Cauldron overlaid a growing tension, and stirrings of discontent, among the city's population of nearly four thousand inhabitants. Rumor and report had merged to give most of the residents of the city at least a partial overview of the tumultuous events of the past two seasons. It had started with the kidnappings, and the ultimate downfall of a slaving ring operating in an abandoned dwarven stronghold under the city. Then there had been the revelation of an evil cult operating in an old ruin within the volcano; while they too had been overcome and scattered, their operations had led to the death of Sarcem Delasharn, the former high priest of the Temple of Helm. These two events would have been bad enough, but then there had been an attack by an umber hulk in one of the mercantile districts of the city. While the beast had been slain, several buildings had been destroyed in the rampage.

It was a time of uncertainty, as the Cauldronites wondered where the next disaster would strike. The administration of the city had taken action, but the results had only further fueled the tensions within the city. Following the umber hulk attack, mayor Navalant had initiated a new tax, a serious levy that had been almost universally reviled almost from its inception by the business interests of the city. The common populace might have accepted it in the name of security, except that the collection of the tax was accompanied by large increases in the numbers of mercenary guardsmen retained by the city to "maintain the peace." The majority of these new guards were outsiders, mostly tough and grim looking half-orc veterans who were soon marching the streets in numbers. Although there were no serious incidents between this new force and the citizens of the city, the sudden appearance of what amounted to a small army in the streets of Cauldron stirred more than a few resentments among many of the long-time residents of the city.

Clarese Calloran, better known to her friends and the people of Cauldron by her chosen name Mole, understood the reasons for the unsettled air in the city. She'd only lived in Cauldron for a few months now, with a considerable amount of that time spent under or away from the city proper, but as a central participant in many of the recent troubles, she was in a good position to have a particular insight. Furthermore, she'd made it a point to get to know the town, talking to people and exploring the diverse offerings of the place. She'd even spent some time amidst the seedier side of Cauldron, a fact of which her current companions were unaware. Not that anyone who knew her would be surprised, really.

So as Mole sat casually against the frontage of a shop watching the traffic go by, she observed the faces and conversations of the city folk, gauging the sentiments of the people from their behaviors. It was a skill that she was fairly good at, although more often than not she'd still take actions that got her into trouble. To the gnome that wasn't a problem; if asked she would have said that a life without at least a good dollop of trouble in it would be insufferably dull.

The gnome looked unassuming, sitting there; just a few inches over three feet tall, clad in well-made but unassuming clothes with a light cotton jacket pulled over her torso. A small sword that would have served as a dagger for a human male hung at her hip, but that wasn't uncommon here on the frontier. Of course, casual observation would not have revealed the magical shirt of mithral links that she wore under her tunic, or the fact that the functional leather boots she wore likewise bore a potent magical enhancement.

Mole felt a flash of annoyance as she looked down the street. Zenna was late for their meeting. It wasn't so much that she was eager for shopping; in fact, with only about forty gold coins left in her pouch, she doubted that she would be able to find anything worthwhile to buy. Mole was oblivious to the fact that the sum represented more than the average unskilled laborer could reasonably expect to earn in a year; she was used to handling goodly sums of cash now, and considered her current total as placing her on the brink of poverty. The fact that she'd spend several thousand gold pieces in the last few tendays was a matter of little concern to that calculation; tomorrow had always been of more pressing interest than yesterday when the gnome was concerned.

She was still a bit piqued that she'd been unable to buy a replacement for her destroyed magical backpack. Skie, she knew, had had another handy haversack in her inventory, and when Mole had found out that it had been purchased by one of the Stormblades not two days before they had returned from Bhal-Hamatugn, she'd seethed for the better part of a day. Skie had offered a small bag of holding as an alternative purchase, and Mole had quickly accepted. She'd felt some lingering guilt afterward; the pieces of jewelry she'd sold to buy the bag had technically been "party loot", found in the private chambers of the kuo-toa high priest Margh-Michto. But the unpleasant sensation quickly faded when Mole had realized that the bag was actually a "party purchase", since the experience of the haversack had clearly shown that such an item was for the benefit of all. Her conscience mollified, Mole had immediately started buying a variety of useful products to fill her new purchase.

No, she wasn't upset at Zenna being late because of the shopping, but rather because the crowd of passers-by were increasingly headed in one direction, where something interesting seemed to be developing. That way lay the city hall, she knew, and the faces of the people passing by now seemed increasingly agitated, even outright angry.

She knew what that meant. Trouble.

And she didn't want to miss it.

She was about to abandon her post when she caught sight of two familiar faces advancing through the crowd. She leapt up onto the bench where she'd been sitting and waved to catch the attention of Arun and Hodge. The two didn't see her, so she sprang into the street—surprising a young teamster who hadn't expected to see a gnome manage an eight-foot standing leap—and darted through the crowd toward them.

She made barely a sound as she crossed to where the two dwarves were walking, approaching them undetected from behind.

“Bah, I'm not sayin' it be a poor weapon, but it ain't me Betsy,” Hodge was saying.

“Dannel and Zenna both insist that it's magical, and more effective than your old axe,” Arun said. “I'm sorry that we neglected to bring your old weapon, but we had other matters on our minds at the time, you being dead and all.”

“Bragh!” Hodge snorted.

Mole smiled. This wasn't a new subject between the two; Hodge was referencing his new waraxe, of late the weapon of Zenith Splintershield that had been used to such devastating effect against them. Davked had not referenced it when they'd returned the mad dwarf to his father, so they'd kept the weapon to replace Hodge's lost blade.

“Well, if you feel so strongly about it, you can return to Bhal-Hamatugn to recover it,” Arun suggested.

“It just needs a name!” Mole said, enjoying the way Hodge jumped into the air when she appeared suddenly between them.

“Blast, girl! Yer gotta stop sneakin' up on a man like that!”

“Hey, is it my fault that you pay no heed to your surroundings?” Mole asked.

Hodge's only reply was a curse in dwarvish that Mole duly noted for future use. “Oh, I know!” she said.

“What now?” Arun asked.

“Marjorie. That's a great name! I had a cat named Marjorie once.”

Hodge shot a deadly serious look at Arun, and said, in dwarvish, “I imagine that there be a torment in the Hells, where they lock yer in a sealed room with a gaggle o' chatterin' gnomes fer all eternity.”

Arun looked back, his expression equally grave, and responded in the same tongue, “I'm not sure I'd wish that on even the worst sinner, friend.”

Mole, for her part, interjected the dwarvish curse that Hodge had just used, accompanied by another juicy one that she'd learned from Lok a few years back. Boy, her mother had been upset when she'd whipped that one out at a family dinner...

"That's no way fer a lady to be speakin'," Hodge said.

"I agree completely," Mole said, with all gravity. "Say, where are we going, anyway?"

"Word is that the town merchants are organizing a protest this morning, in the square in front of the town hall," Arun said.

"Aye, the not be likin' those new taxes," Hodge said. "Nor all them half-orcs that been wanderin' 'bout o' late."

"Interesting," Mole replied absently, her attention already distracted by the sight up ahead.

The square before the angular, three-story complex that comprised Cauldron's town hall was already nearly full of town residents, with several hundred people milling about. As the three adventurers reached the edge of the gathering, they spotted an individual standing on a small platform, haranguing the crowd. The listeners seemed receptive, and as they watched the speaker finished saying something, drawing a number of cheers from his audience.

"Let's go over there," Mole said. Before the dwarves could respond, she was gone, blending into the crowd.

Chapter 138

Arun glanced over at Hodge, who shrugged. "We'd better keep an eye on her," the paladin said. "I don't like the looks of this, though."

"Mobs 'ave a way o' turnin' ugly," the other dwarf replied. "Tho' this lot 'as the look o' a bunch o' merchies."

Indeed the dwarf's assessment seemed true; most of those gathered had the look of merchants or craftsmen, with a smattering of those less well-off scattered into the mix. Overall a rather genteel crowd, but that didn't reassure Arun as he made his way toward the speaker's platform. Members of the crowd took one look at him, resplendent in his silvery mithral plate armor, and gave way for him.

The speaker was a well-dressed human male in his forties, with a neatly trimmed beard and piercing brown eyes that held the crowd in their grasp as he spoke. "Friends! Can you not see what is happening here? Our coffers are drained, and our hard-earned bread is going to a ragged band of outlander half-orcs!"

Arun managed not to start as Mole materialized next to him. "His name's Maavu Arlinal," she told him.

“Why does that name seem familiar?”

“It was his warehouse that was destroyed by that rampaging umber hulk, that we killed.”

Arun nodded, giving the man a more intensive scrutiny. He seemed to be a skilled speaker, his tone growing more strident as he spoke, and punctuating his words with emotive gestures.

“And I tell you, friends, that the administration of this city is corrupt! Why, I will tell you true, that Alec Tercival, a righteous and holy servant of Helm, has offered a challenge at arms to that dog Tereson Skellerang. Why has this challenge not been publicized? Where is the response of the city leaders to these charges? I think we know where our hard-earned money is going, friends!”

While the crowd roared its approval, Mole glanced up at the dwarves. “Tercival... didn’t Jenya mention him... isn’t he one of their paladins?”

Arun directed her attention back toward the crowd. “Looks like this Maavu character’s provoked a reaction with his words.”

Mole jumped into the air to try and get a look at what the dwarf had seen. A knot of armed guardsmen had issued from the main gate of the town hall, led by a bearded man of middle age in a half-helm and hauberk of heavy chain links reinforced by plate greaves. Behind him were a half-dozen half-orcs, each standing nearly a head taller than most of the people in the crowd. The crowd greeted the latter with a chorus of boos and hisses, but drew back as the guards bullied their way through the gathered townsfolk to the base of the platform.

“Maavu Arlinal, by the authority of Tereson Skellerang, I must place you under arrest!” the guard leader said, his voice determined despite the hostility directed at him by the crowd.

A youth pressed his way forward through the crowd. “Let’s teach these bastards a lesson!” he cried, steel gleaming in his hand as he suddenly drew a knife and thrust at one of the guardsmen from the side.

A roar rose up from the crowd, as the youth’s precipitous action unleashed the gathered fury of the crowd. The sea of protesters surged against the suddenly hard-pressed warriors, who were quickly forced back into a circle. Several were bleeding from wounds sustained in the initial rush; although few of the gathered protestors had weapons, they were quick to hurl small stones, foodstuffs, or whatever else was at hand. The warriors used the butts of their halberds to keep the mob away from them, and a number of protestors were quickly laid out on the cobblestones, stunned and bruised. One stepped into the sweep of a blade as its half-orc user thrust the haft of the weapon into the face of a young man in the tailored jacket of a scribe; both men went down, the scribe’s jaw broken, the other clutching a gash that stretched across his shoulder and cut down to the bone.

The leader of the guardsmen drew out a potion and tried to drink it, only to suffer from a fierce assault from a ring of townsmen that pressed in against him from all sides. One struck the bottle with a brass-weighted cane, shattering it. Several punches struck his body, doing little damage through the armor he wore, but someone managed to strike a glancing blow to the side of his head with a length of wood. Though his helm protected him from a fractured skull, it was clear that the ferocity of the assault had staggered him, and he fought for balance as angry hands clawed at him.

He did not, however, reach for the sword at his hip.

“We best clear out o’ ‘ere,” Hodge began, but as he turned he saw that Arun had already dove forward into the crowd, moving people easily with powerful thrusts of his shield and his weapon-hand. The dwarf sighed and followed. A man waving an improvised club fashioned from a fence-post stepped into his view, and for some reason he identified the dwarf as an enemy, swinging his weapon wildly at him. Hodge caught the blow easily on his shield, and countered with a solid punch from a mailed fist that knocked the attacker into two others nearby, swaying a moment before he slumped to the cobblestones, unconscious.

“Watch who yer jostlin’,” the dwarf said, trying to make out Arun in the chaotic melee. The paladin, of course, had made for the thick of the riot, heading directly for the embattled guards.

Maavu, atop the podium, tried to restore order with shouted admonitions to the crowd, but it was clear that the situation was rapidly growing out of hand. The youth with the knife, along with a few others who had drawn weapons and attacked in the initial surge, had vanished from view, slipping away in the first moments of chaos. The merchant, who was more than he appeared at first glance, realized that he’d been set up; that the situation had been manipulated to his disadvantage. Drawing back, he drew out a scroll from the pouch at his waist, opening the tight parchment roll to reveal the neat lines of runic text within. Without hesitation, the merchant began to read the words of magic scribed upon the scroll.

He could not see the individual who stood behind a narrow window within the slender tower that rose above the Town Hall, who watched the scene with great intensity. Nor could he sense the magic that was worked there, or the brief wrenching of the border between worlds that took place in a tiny room behind the slit, unobserved by anyone.

Except for one person in the crowd, who took note of an odd feeling, glancing up across the square before the roiling of the crowd around her drew her attention back to the immediate scene.

Arun’s voice boomed through the mob as the dwarf reached the edge of the melee between the protestors and the guardsmen. Maddened people drew back from the dwarf, whose magical armor seemed to glow despite the clouds that blocked the afternoon sun in the sky above. Clad head to toe in mithral plate, with a large shield of polished steel and his massive hammer at his waist, the dwarf was clearly not someone to be trifled with. He swept his shield and drove back two men who did not take the hint, continuing their attack on the guards leader, knocking one roughly to the ground and driving the second back far enough for the dwarf to steady the battered guardsman.

“Get your men back!” the dwarf roared, all but carrying the man into the ring of half-orcs. The six had formed a ring of open space, the commoners in the crowd having learned that entering the reach of those halberds was foolish. All six were battered and smeared with hurled foodstuffs and assorted filth, but at least twice as many protesters had taken wounds ranging from minor to serious from hafts and blades, and two men lay on the stones, bleeding and unconscious.

“There’s too many!” shouted one of the guards, and in fact it looked as though a sea of humanity separated them from the security of the Town Hall, sixty paces across the square. A paving stone hurtled out from the crowd, glancing off of a half-orc skull, staggering the unlucky mercenary.

“Back then!” Arun yelled, gesturing toward the end of a row of shops that jutted out into the square along Obsidian Avenue, the nearest wall only twenty paces distant. The guard lieutenant quickly took the hint and directed his men in that direction, driving back the scattered protestors with desultory thrusts of their halberds. One of the mercenaries took up his injured comrade and followed, while Arun warded their rear, blocking the progress of the crowd with his mere presence.

“Why do you aid them?” yelled one of the protestors, a man in his mid-fifties. “They take our coin, and now our blood as well!” The cry was echoed by a dozen others, but they wisely did not move to challenge the dwarf.

“Blood given for blood is never a fair trade,” Arun said simply. He came forward, and the foremost among the crowd drew back slightly in alarm. One of the protestors was pushed roughly aside as Hodge belatedly arrived, and the second dwarf joined his friend.

“Yer crazy, yer know that,” Hodge said.

Arun did not reply, instead bending to touch one of the bleeding men lying on the cobbles. A healing glow issued from his fingertips into the wounded man, who stirred, clutching his head as he groaned.

“Go,” the paladin said. “Go from here, all of you,” he said, louder, to the men and women who watched him in amazement. “There is nothing for you here, now.”

A few of the gathered crowd obeyed, filtering away toward the edges of the swirling mob. The guardsmen had pushed through to the relative shelter of the nearest shop, although objects were still being hurled at them from the crowd, and there were still at least a hundred and fifty people in the square before the Town Hall, hurling invectives as well as objects at the guards warding the main entrance to that structure.

“Yer canna stop all o’ them,” Hodge said.

Arun opened his mouth to reply, but was cut off by a cry from the direction of the speaker’s platform behind him.

“Arun! We need you, now!”

Chapter 139

When the guardsmen had arrived, Mole had quickly worked herself deeper into the crowd closer to the pedestal, giving her a clearer vantage of what was going on. She thought she recognized the young man with the knife, as well as a few of the other provocateurs who started the attack on the guards. They were rakes, associates of the Last Laugh, the leading thieves' guild of Cauldron. While not personally affiliated with that organization, Mole had met a number of its members, and had even dined with a few of them at some of the seedier locales in the town. They were a tight-lipped lot, at least when it came to their brotherhood, but the gnome had clearly discerned that the Last Laugh were intricately tied into the storm of events brewing within Cauldron.

As the crowd came alive, however, provoked to assault and violence by the actions of those agents, Mole quickly had to turn her thoughts to avoiding getting trampled by the mob. She twisted and tumbled her way to the edge of the speakers' platform, its solidity giving her some respite from the surge of angry people.

She saw Maavu cast a spell from a scroll, and then draw a potion from the same pouch at his waist. But even as the merchant uncorked the vial and drew it to his lips, she felt a sudden chill pass over her. A... thing materialized before the man, an amorphous cloud with a vaguely humanoid form, hanging in the air with twin wisps of red flame for eyes. The merchant tried to draw back, but the thing lashed out at him with a rough tentacle of its own foggy substance. The vial exploded as it struck, and Maavu's expensive cloak and tunic tore open, scoring the flesh beneath.

The merchant cried out, and leapt down from the platform to the crowd below. The nearby townsfolk that saw the creature cried out and fled, while several others just stood there, transfixed with horror at the sight of the creature. Maavu was moving quickly, although he was forced to dart and dodge around both groups of people as he sought escape. The merchant was fast, almost unnaturally so, likely enhanced somehow by the spell he'd cast earlier.

Unfortunately, the creature was even faster.

Maavu perhaps sensed its rush, for he turned just in time to meet the creature streaking down out of the sky toward it. The hapless merchant dodged aside from its first lancing attack, but even as the first wind scythe sliced past a second one was forming, tearing across the man's torso and leaving an ugly red gash in its wake.

Then the creature promptly vanished once more, cloaked again in invisibility.

Maavu drew back a step, and called upon a spell. A glittering field of glowing motes erupted into being in front of the wizard, hanging in the air and outlining the form of the invisible creature clearly. The wizard paid for his action, however, as the creature darted at him again, slashing him painfully across the body once more.

Mole drew back, her eyes flashing with the afterimages of the glitterdust that had exploded in her face as she'd rushed to the aid of the merchant. Fortunately she'd resisted being blinded, but it took her a moment to readjust and find the creature again within the field of sparkling motes. Grimly she held her sword, uncertain if such a creature could be harmed by a mundane weapon, but unwilling to allow the poor merchant to be torn to pieces while she watched.

But before she could attack, a ray of fire sliced through the crowd, tearing into the fabric of the creature. Whatever its resistance to weapons, the thing was clearly hurt by fire, as it roiled and drew back from the assault. Mole turned to see Zenna standing there, twenty paces away, a look of intense concentration on her face.

Needing no further impetus to action, Mole leapt forward. Her sword sliced through the cloudy form, meeting resistance and tearing a small portion of its substance with the passage of her blade. The thing turned on her, and for a moment, as those baleful eyes of flame fell upon her, she felt her breath freeze in her throat.

Her arms felt leaden, and refused to obey her commands as the creature menaced her. She felt a cold terror as it came closer, extending a tendril of fog toward her half-open mouth.

Chapter 140

Mole could not move as the breathdrinker extended a tendril of its own substance toward her. She felt an icy chill as the fog caressed her lips and nostrils, probing inside.

Then she was jerked roughly backward, falling on the stones. She saw Zenna step into the place where she'd been standing, a wand in her hands. She fired a spray of roiling flames into the creature, a fan of burning hands that seared the edges of the fog, but did little to stop it. The creature did not press its attack, however, instead turning back to face the critically injured Maavu.

"Arun! We need you, now!" Zenna cried, the shout lost in the chaos of the still-roiling crowd.

Maavu had used the few moments of respite to raise some magical defenses, and quaff a potion that healed some of the wounds he had taken. Realizing that he could not flee against the speed of the creature, he turned to face it even as it surged once more to the attack. For a fleeting instant his defenses held; then a final cutting slash of cohesive fog tore through his shields and into his chest, a critical hit that scored to the ribs beneath cloth and flesh. With a groan, the merchant staggered backward and slumped to the stones, blood oozing from the wound.

The creature darted forward to finish its assignment, but before it could reach the merchant an acid arrow sizzled squarely into the middle of its form. The breathdrinker spun to face Zenna, who now held a second wand, a faint wisp of smoke lifting from its tip.

"Come on then," Zenna said, a sudden and unexpected vehemence in her voice as she spat the words at the creature.

Come it did, surging toward her in a deadly rush. Zenna held her ground, her mage armor absorbing its first strike, her jaw tightening around a gasp of pain as its second cut deeply into her side.

A loud noise, a clatter of metal combined with a dwarven battle cry, drew her attention to the side.

“You had your chance,” she told the creature, which seemed unconcerned, forming another wind-scythe in preparation of another assault upon the wizard.

Before the creature could attack, however, Arun appeared from around the platform, charging headlong into the fray, his hammer clutched in a ready position. The breathdrinker shifted but did not avoid the hammer as it tore into its otherworldly substance.

And tore through it, the wisps of fog reforming in the hammer’s wake, nearly unaffected by the blow.

“It’s only harmed by magic!” Zenna exclaimed. She punctuated her point by firing another acid arrow into it, the fat droplets of searing green disintegrating the wisps of cloud as the two interacted.

As if on cue, Hodge appeared from the opposite side of the platform, charging forward with his axe raised in an echo of Arun’s rush just moments ago. The breathdrinker, perhaps sensing that this battle was lost, turned and dove toward Maavu, intent upon finishing its task. It had nearly reached the wizard when the charging dwarf caught up to it, driving his axe—late of Zenith Splintershield’s possession—through it. The effect was markedly different than Arun’s assault, and as the axe sundered its form the creature let out a hollow shriek before it disintegrated into wisps of nothingness.

Zenna quickly moved to help the crippled merchant, while Arun tended to Mole. They could still hear the noise of the crowd in the square, although the immediate area around them had grown suddenly quiet.

“You know, maybe this axe isn’t so bad after all,” Hodge said, examining his new weapon.

Zenna poured the potent energies of a cure moderate wounds spell into Maavu, and helped the wizard/merchant to his feet.

“Thank you, my dear,” the man said. “Though I fear that this is only the opening sally by my foes.”

“And whom exactly are they?” Zenna asked.

“I am afraid I cannot linger to discuss the matter,” Maavu replied. “But come to Redgorge, to the Redhead Miner’s Inn... speak the word “mortar” and they will let you in. Alec Tercival will be there, and I am certain that will wish to talk to you of the threat...”

“Wait,” Zenna said. But the man had already taken up another potion vial, and before she could do anything to stop him, he quaffed it. Almost immediately his body began to dissolve into the shape of a cloud of mist eerily similar to the form of the breathdrinker. Then it rose quickly into the sky, where it vanished amidst the rooftops of the town.

Cries of pain drew their attention back toward the Town Hall. The mob was definitely breaking up, with people fleeing out of the square along the three main avenues out from the intersection.

“What’s happenin’?” Hodge asked.

“The Town Guard is firing into the crowd,” Zenna said.

“Why, those bastards,” Arun said. He started in that direction, but Zenna held his shoulder.

“I have to put a stop to it,” the paladin said.

“The riot is over,” Zenna said. “This battle is already lost; help the injured, if you must, but it would be best if we left this place quickly.” She glanced up at the sky where Maavu had disappeared. “I will meet you at the Morkoth, later; there are things to discuss.” Without waiting for a reply, she stepped back, incanted briefly, and vanished from sight.

“Girl’s getting’ a bit hoity,” Hodge grumbled. “Tho’ she do have a point ‘bout not hangin’ ‘round ‘ere, me thinks.”

Mole, leaning against Arun, finally stirred herself, shaking off the linger effects of the breathdrinker’s gaze. Sheathing her sword, she tossed up her hands, and exclaimed, “Would someone please tell me what is going on?”

Arun and Hodge exchanged a look. They had no easy answers for her.

Meanwhile, the square emptied out, as the protestors fled the violence of the mercenaries of the Town Guard. Or at least most fled; a half-dozen bodies remained sprawled in bloody heaps on the broken cobbles, reminders of a bad day in Cauldron.

Chapter 141

“A cloud of anger and mistrust hangs over our city. There is something happening here, a shadow that deepens with each coming day...”

Jenya Urikas, High Priest of Helm in Cauldron, turned back to face the companions gathered in the forepart of the chapel dedicated to her deity. At this time of day, with the last rays of the setting sun slanting through the narrow windows high along the walls, the place was empty save for the priestess and her guests.

“I’m sorry, I have grown maudlin in my advancing years.” The priestess forced a smile. Jenya’s curly brown-and-gray hair framed a face that will still rather youthful, but it was clear that the responsibilities of her new position, gained following the murder of Sarcem Delasharn, had taken their toll on her. A number of her friends and colleagues had died in recent months, their lives spent facing the myriad troubles that confronted the town.

“The mayor has announced that the new taxes will not be collected for three months,” Zenna said. That news, still spreading through the city, had taken the edge off some of the tension following that afternoon’s riot, but there was still an understandable sense of anger and fear that roiled just beneath the surface in Cauldron.

“That’s of little concern to the families of the men and women who lost their lives in the square today,” Arun said.

“True,” Jenya said. “I have already spoken to the heads of the other churches, about starting a collection for those who lost loved ones.” She shifted her gaze to Arun. “From what I have heard, the number of dead would have been higher, but for a pair of dwarves clad in resplendent mail, who remained in the square, tending the wounded, defying the Guard.”

“What of Maavu, and Alec Tercival?” Mole asked.

The priestess sighed. “Alec and I were close friends. We served as initiates together, back at a time when both of us were younger and full of the vigor and idealism that drives the inexperienced. He’s a good man, but this challenge... it is unlike him.”

“The buzz about the city is that the mayor has declared the challenge null and void, that Alec is under the influence of ‘outside forces’.”

“I have not seen him in some time, and grow concerned,” Jenya admitted. “Whatever has happened to him, it seems he has gotten embroiled in the heart of the politics that grip our troubled city.”

“He’s a nobleman, isn’t he?” Mole asked. “From what I’ve heard, only a member of the leading families can even offer this sort of challenge, according to the city Charter.”

Jenya nodded. “The Tercival name was once revered as belonging to one of the great clans of Cauldron’s history,” she said. “Unfortunately for Alec, he came along at a time when his house was facing serious reversals, and his father ended up losing his ancestral estate in the settlement of various debts that the family had incurred. After his father’s death, Alec took service to the Church, but one of his prime motivations has always been to rebuilt the pride and repute of his name.”

“What of Maavu?” Arun asked.

“Maavu Arlinal is a member of an organization that calls itself ‘the Chisel’. They were initially organized a long time ago in the town of Redgorge, to the south. Their members are skilled craftsmen and merchants who often possess other talents as well; their founder, I believe, was a powerful wizard.”

“And what is this group’s agenda?” Arun asked.

“I cannot say, for certain. The Chisel has historically been an organization shrouded in secrecy, conducting their activities behind closed doors. Only a few of their members are even publicly known. I do know that they have been critical of the city's current administration, however, and it is likely they were the instigators of today's protest."

"Well, it seems that if we want more information, we shall have to go make a visit... after all, we were invited," Zenna said.

"Very well," Arun said. "If it will help us identify the source of the darkness growing in this town, so that we can uncloak and eradicate it."

"I will send Morgan with you, as my representative," Jenya said.

Zenna's expression betrayed her feelings, and Mole said, "No offense, Jenya, but I think we'd be better off without that windbag."

"I know he can be... difficult..." Jenya said, "but he's a skilled warrior and priest, and despite his rough exterior, he's true of heart. You may need his aid."

Arun regarded the priestess intently. "Is there something else you would share with us, lass?"

Jenya had the grace to flush slightly. "I... yes, I am sorry. In times such as these, my instinct is to keep my secrets close, but you are friends, and true ones."

She turned back to the altar at the end of the chapel atop a low dais, a broad slab of gray marble covered with a pristine cloth of white linen. Atop it, attached to the wall behind the altar, was a box fashioned of dressed stone reinforced with bands of polished steel. Around it burned six white candles in sconces set into the wall, above which hung a standard in blue and gray cloth depicting the upraised gauntlet that was the symbol of Helm's order.

She placed her hand upon the box, but did not open it. "This contains the Star of Justice, the most holy relic of our church."

"I remember," Zenna said. "It allows you to cast the divination spell, as I recall."

The priestess nodded. "When I heard of this challenge, I invoked its power to learn of Alec's fate."

"And what did you learn?" Alec asked.

Jenya hugged her arms close to her body, and looked up into empty space. When she spoke, her words were thick with the memory of her communion with her patron.

*"Late on the path of justice,
Trapped between glass and stone,
He weeps where many can see him,
But he can see only himself."*

"What does it mean?" Mole asked.

“These sorts of divine revelations are usually cryptic,” Zenna said. “Remember the rhyme we learned when we were seeking the lost children.”

“Ah, yes,” Mole said. “Yeah, that was a puzzler, but I guess it all made sense in hindsight.”

“I do not know either,” Jenya said. “But I think it is clear that Alec is in great danger. Whatever you can do to find him...”

“We are already in your debt, Jenya,” Arun said. “We will do what we can.”

“Well, when we be hittin’ the road?” Hodge queried. “An’ what about the elf, he comin’?”

“Dannel will not be joining us,” Zenna said. The others looked at her curiously, but she ignored the questions in their eyes. “And if you feel that... Morgan’s presence is necessary, then he may accompany us. There is little sense in delaying,” she went on. “We may as well set out in the morning.”

“We’ll need to secure horses, and supplies,” Mole pointed out.

“The church can assist with that,” Jenya said. “We have a relationship with one of the teamsters’ guilds, and frequently lease mounts for our various needs.”

“Hodge and I’ll get the gear we need,” Arun said.

“Very well. I will send Morgan to the Morkoth—you are still staying there, yes?—tomorrow morning.”

“Fine,” Zenna said, already turning to leave. The others, surprised at her brusqueness, said their goodbyes to Jenya, before following her out into the courtyard and the street beyond.

In their distraction, and the gathering shadows of the evening, none of them noticed the cloaked figure who intently watched their going from the depths of a nearby alley.

Chapter 142

“So, do you want to talk about it?” Mole asked.

The companions were walking quickly from the Temple of Helm toward the Drunken Morkoth, where they had rooms they’d been occupying on a semi-permanent basis for the last several months. As night descended upon the city, Ash Street was fairly quiet, with occasional people headed home after a day’s labors, or toward Lava Avenue and the various taverns there that catered toward the crowd that saw nightfall as an opportunity to throw off the restrictive shackles of the working day.

Arun and Hodge walked back a short distance behind Mole and Zenna. Mole almost had to run to keep up with the taller woman’s pace, but her magical boots made that little difficulty.

Normally Zenna subconsciously slowed her pace to match Mole's, but tonight the tiefling seemed intent on returning to the inn as rapidly as possible, with no small talk.

Zenna had not responded, and Mole started to ask again, only to be cut off with a hard, "No."

"Look, I know men are crazy and all," she began, shooting a glance back at Arun and Hodge to make sure that they were out of range of hearing. The two dwarves, their deliberate, armored steps much slower than Zenna's brisk walk, were now just shadows a half-block back. "Can't live with 'em, can't live without 'em, yadda yadda ya. But Dannel's an important part of our group, we need him—"

"Not anymore," Zenna said. She looked down at her friend without breaking stride, and smiled wistfully. "We got along all right before, didn't we? Just you and me, all those miles on that long road..."

"Well, sure. But here... well, it's clear that we're stirred up in a whole big mess of trouble. And... well, he did save your life..."

"It's done and over," Zenna said, turning back to the street ahead. Suddenly, she stopped, so abruptly that Mole had to turn around and come back several paces to join her.

"What is it?"

"Do you smell smoke?"

Mole tested the air. "Yeah. And look, down by the lake. That looks like the glow of a fire, over there, over the back of those shops..."

The clank of metal announced the arrival of the dwarves. "What's the matter?" Arun asked.

The two women shared a look. "Trouble," Mole said.

* * * * *

The four companions hurried in the direction of the fire. Even as they drew near to Lava Street, the lowest of the four concentric roads that encircled the city's central lake, they could hear cries and shouts that indicated the source of the fire.

They emerged from one of the sloped connecting alleys that linked the city's four main avenues around the crater to a scene of chaos. Before them stretched the calm black waters of the lake that filled the center of the caldera. Reflected in the surface of that quiet body were the dancing flames roaring out from the windows and eaves of a waterfront inn, a rambling two-story structure named Mintua's Board.

A number of half-orc mercenaries were gathered before the inn, hurling bucketfuls of water onto the flames in what seemed to be a fruitless gesture.

The companions rushed closer, in time to see a despondent-looking man clutching his head with his hands as he stared at the flames. "Me inn!" he cried. He turned to one of the half-orcs, a hulking brute with a patch over one eye. "Them's burnin' me in, you gots to stop them!"

The half-orc clutched the man by the throat of his torn and soot-stained jerkin, lifting him off his feet. "Demons of fire inside! They burn us! Weapons do nothing!" he screamed, shoving a hunk of metal that looked like it might have once been a weapon into the terrified man's face.

Arun rushed into the courtyard before the inn. "Is there anyone left inside?" he shouted, already starting toward the main entry, wreathed in fire and smoke.

"Arun, no!" Zenna yelled. But before anyone else could respond or take action, a burst of flame exploded from the doorway. Arun drew back, shielding his face, as the flames solidified into a humanoid form, easily sixteen feet tall, a figure shaped of living flames.

The half-orcs drew back in horror, but the fire-creature was faster as it lunged and caught up one in a fist of flame that wrapped around its throat, lifting it into the air. Its mottled gray-green flesh turned black and its screams choked off into gasps of agony that in turn died with the mercenary, falling back into a smoldering heap upon the cobblestones of the courtyard.

The elemental turned toward Arun.

Chapter 143

Arun Goldenshield had confronted dozens of terrible creatures in his career as a warrior in service to Moradin. As a paladin of his faith, he was reinforced against fear. That was not to say that he did not feel that emotion at all; a man who stood in the heat of battle and faced death without any trepidation was not of sound mind. But his faith was the bulwark that allowed him to control the instinct that told him to flee for his life, and the fear that came with the hot rush of the flame over him as the elemental turned to face him was washed away beneath an iron skin of hard resolve.

With a roar he lunged at the creature, delivering a powerful overhead blow with his hammer. The heavy iron head splashed into the flaming "body" of the creature, meeting only a partial resistance as it passed through the flames and finally clanged hard against the flagstones beneath. Arun instantly realized that the creature was resistant if not immune to non-magical attacks, but he stood his ground and unleashed another blow, putting more of his strength into a swing that unfortunately passed harmlessly through empty air as the creature flowed and reformed a pace to the side. The thing moved with an uncanny speed and grace, its body surging like a bonfire splashed with oil.

The elemental lashed at Arun with fingers of flame that blasted into him with the force of steel whips. The dwarf lifted his shield to absorb the first blow, feeling the heat that rushed around the edges of the metal barrier like a gust from a blast furnace. A second blow followed the first, and Arun was driven back a step, his arm scorched by the heat passing through the shield, his eyes watering as smoke and ash were driven into them by the ferocity of the creature's attack.

Arun's companions, of course, were not idle in those moments, and rushed quickly to the aid of their friend. However, even as Hodge charged, Mole yelled a warning, as a great gout of flame surged out from an upper window, taking form and substance after it crashed to the cobbles in the middle of the courtyard, sprouting arms and legs of eager red fire. It regarded those gathered with contempt in its twin eyes, spots of white-hot anger within the amorphous flames of its body.

The half-orcs had clearly had enough of this situation, and most fled from the scene, some clutching smoldering wounds where they had been stung by the terrible attacks from the elementals. Two of the mercenaries who had been close to the building found their route of escape blocked by the arrival of the second creature, and they turned toward the low wall that separated the courtyard from the property of the adjacent building, yelling in alarm as the elemental surged toward them.

"Bah, savin' a lot o' half-orcs... what be the world comin' to!" Hodge roared, as he lunged at the elemental from behind. The magically-enhanced steel tore through the fabric of the creature, and it instantly turned on the dwarf, driving him back with several powerful blows. One solid blast of flame set the upper body of the dwarf on fire, and he fell to the ground, trying to roll out the burning flames that seared his exposed flesh greedily.

Mole had moved to flank the creature threatening Arun, staying close to the edge of the building despite the heat and tendrils of flame rising from within. As she passed under a window opening onto the common room, however, she heard a cry from within. For a moment she looked with indecision at the two embattled dwarves facing the huge elemental monsters, then finally darted toward the door, disappearing into the thick gouts of smoke issuing from within the dying structure.

Zenna, meanwhile, held her ground twenty paces away at the rear of the courtyard, calmly firing bolt after bolt from her wand of acid arrows. Her first had soundly impacted the one fighting Arun high in its flaming body, the acid unleashing an ugly black cloud as it struck. Upon seeing Hodge get into trouble she fired her second at his foe, drawing its attention from the burning dwarf. The elemental turned from the escaping half-orcs and the injured dwarf and started toward her, crossing the courtyard in a rush of eager flame.

But as it passed, Hodge roared and leapt up once again, tearing through its body with his magical axe. The creature arrested its rush and turned once more on the dwarf, beating him down with powerful blows backed with the rush of hot flame.

Arun, meanwhile, was likewise taking a pounding from his adversary. He'd managed to connect with a powerful attack that had hurt it despite its resistance to mundane weapons, but most of his blows passed through it harmlessly. The dwarf had no such resistance to its assault, although fortunately his magical armor and shield had held up for the most part against the ferocity of its attack. His breaths were coming in agonized gasps of searing air, however, and he was nearly blind from the smoke that poured from the interior of the ravaged inn. A loud crash as part of the inn collapsed sent another blast of heat and smoke into him, and he considered retreat, drawing the elemental after him, to where he could fight it in clearer air.

But things suddenly got worse, as he heard Zenna's voice cut through the roar of the flames, behind him.

"Mole's gone in there!"

A moment later, Arun heard a dwarvish cry that drew his attention to his left. There, he saw the second elemental lay a titanic blow into Hodge. The dwarf stumbled back, blinded, his face blackened by the flames that continued to flicker from his burning beard as he fell to the ground and lost consciousness.

Chapter 144

Arun did not hesitate. Having just sacrificed greatly to see Hodge returned to life, he was not about to see the dwarf die again while he stood by unable to help. He turned away from his current foe and set out at a full run toward the creature menacing Hodge. The paladin barely felt the blow that slammed down across his back, searing the flesh of his neck and shoulders through his armor. He tossed his shield aside and took up his hammer in both hands, bringing it down in a two-handed strike into the thickest part of the elemental. The blow tore through its resistances, sundering it into wisps of flickering flame that fought to regain cohesion for a moment before whisking out of existence.

Arun turned around just in time to take an all-out pounding from the second elemental.

Mole meanwhile, found herself regarding an interior that to her mind probably had more than a passing resemblance to the Nine Hells. The common room of the inn was a raging inferno, with a river of liquid flame roaring across the ceiling, and the curtains and tablecloths separate pyres around the room's perimeter. For once she was grateful for her diminutive size, for she was below the worst of the smoke filling the room, but her eyes quickly began to water and sting as smoke filled them.

She heard the cry for help again, faintly, coming from what she guessed was the kitchen. Another person, without her gnomish ears, probably wouldn't have heard it at all... but at the moment, Mole's racial pride was overshadowed by a much more practical and immediate concern of finding whoever it was before the building collapsed onto her.

She started quickly toward the kitchen, but hesitated as the ceiling over the bar—very near to the kitchen door—sagged with an audible groan.

Oh, damn...

As so often occurred with the young gnome, instinctive action trumped deliberate thought, and she leapt forward, her magical boots once again giving her an added boost as she tucked into a roll and dove through the half-open doorway into the kitchen even as the ceiling above buckled and collapsed. Burning timbers and other debris showered down in her wake, narrowly missing the gnome as she continued her roll and recovered her feet, tamping the burning embers that had caught upon her cloak with her soot-stained hands.

So much for the way out, Mole thought, quickly taking in her new surroundings.

The kitchen was even worse off than the common room, with an entire wall already well ablaze and at least a half-dozen other small fires busy around the perimeter. There had already been a partial collapse, she saw, with burning beams blocking a narrow stair that had once led up to the second story of the inn. The collapse not only blocked the stairs, but also the rear exit.

So she was trapped as well. Wonderful. She looked around the room, seeking opportunities, but the only alternative that appeared to be available were a trio of tiny windows set high in the wall above the long table that fronted the entirety of the side wall to her left. The “windows” were really just squares of thick glass barely a pace across that appeared to be set firmly into the surrounding wall, gleaming with the reflected glow of the flames that occupied the chamber.

A sound from the direction of the ruined stair drew her attention back in that direction. She hurried over to find a diminutive figure half-visible under the debris, his lower body trapped under a heavy beam. In the thick smoke it took her a moment to realize that the poor unfortunate was a gnome, younger even than she was by the look of it. He was clad in the simple tunic of a stableboy or kitchen helper, and as she approached, he looked up at her with eyes that were wide with fear.

“Help me!” he said, choking as smoke filled his lungs at the effort of speaking.

Mole quickly darted to the boy’s side. He tried to speak again, but the effort was too great, and he sagged down, gasping for breath.

“Don’t try to move,” Mole said, examining the collapse with an expert eye.

She quickly saw that dragging him out was going to require brute strength; the debris around him could be pulled free, but the heavy beam pinning his legs would have to be lifted in order for the boy to squirm out of the wreckage. She gave it a test push only to confirm her suspicions; it was well and securely wedged. She could have sawed through it, if she’d had a saw and ten minutes of uninterrupted time.

“I have to get someone to help,” she told the boy. “I’ll be right back.”

With surprising strength, he reached out and grabbed onto her jacket. “Please don’t leave me!” he sobbed.

“I’ll be back,” she said. “I promise. My name’s Mole. What’s yours?”

“Bally,” the boy said.

Mole felt a stab of feeling in her gut. Ballander. A common enough gnome name, but meaningful to her for a more specific reason, for it was also the name of her uncle, the man whose life had inspired her to the career of the adventurer. Hearing the name made her realize how much she missed him, and (albeit to a lesser degree) the other members of her family. Forcing aside memories inappropriate to this circumstance, she forced a smile at the scared youngster. “All right, Bally, I need you to be brave. I have a friend who can lift that beam and get you out, but I need to go get him. He’s right outside, I’ll just go get him and be right back, okay?”

The boy nodded, but his fear was clear in his eyes as he released her. With what she hoped was a reassuring smile she drew back and turned toward the windows.

Okay, this’ll be tricky...

She looked around and quickly found what she wanted. She grabbed the heavy iron pot, and without hesitation charged across the room. She felt a rush of heat as she ran past a fire raging through a wooden storage locker, then she leapt onto a chair, and with a mighty boost from her magical boots jumped through one of the windows, using the pot as a battering ram to smash it clear from its mountings. Her arms jarred painfully with the impact, and she felt a sharp stab of pain as a shard of glass cut the back of her hand, but her momentum carried her through and she flipped to land on her feet—awkwardly, but intact—on the packed earth outside the side of the inn.

She had barely regained her balance before she was off and running toward the front of the inn.

She rounded the edge of the building and emerged into the courtyard just in time to see the remaining elemental lay into Arun with a mighty blow that knocked him backward to stumble to his knees.

Chapter 145

Arun thought he could feel his skin crisping from the heat of the fire elemental as he was knocked back roughly off his feet, stumbling back a pace before staggering to his knees. For a moment, all he could sense was the roar of flames, and his vision swam as his grasp on consciousness wavered. He knew, however, that if he faltered, then his friends were lost.

Not bloody likely! he thought, forcing himself to his feet and calling upon the divine energies of his patron at the same time. Healing power flowed through him, although his movements still brought pain where the eager flames had scorched his flesh.

“Come on then!” he roared in challenge at the elemental. But rather than rushing forward to match strength with the creature—a strategy that had already proven faulty—he slowly paced to the side, drawing it after him, and away from Hodge. Out of the corner of his eye, he saw Zenna was moving to help the fallen dwarf, and nodded to himself in satisfaction.

But as the elemental’s assault slammed into him again, hitting with the force of a battering ram against his shield, he knew that the situation was still grim; one more solid hit that got through his defenses would be enough to end it.

Mole did not hesitate, drawing her sword and rushing to Arun's aid. Her normal tactic in this situation would be to flank the foe, using its distraction to find a vulnerable spot to strike. But against a blazing, roughly humanoid-shaped sheet of fire, she had no idea where to begin. Blindly she lashed out at the thickest part of the flames that comprised its "body", but as her sword passed through its form she felt hot pain sear her fingers and rush up her arm. Drawing back, she lost her grip on her sword, which fell through the creature to land in the scorched earth of the courtyard.

Well, duh, it burns, it's made of fire you fool! she berated herself. The creature had not even bothered to turn, focusing its attention on the more dangerous dwarf that confronted it.

As she tried to think of something that she could do to it, she spotted a tall figure moving into the courtyard. At first she thought it was one of the mercenaries, having finally found some courage to return, but then she saw that while this half-orc was armed and armored, its raiment was distinctly different than that of the mercenary guardsmen. He wore a surcoat over his breastplate that bore the sigil of a flaming sword, and while the hilt of a monstrous two-handed sword jutted up from above one shoulder, he wielded instead a slender wand, which he pointed not at the elemental, but at the softly surging waters of the lake at the far edge of the street.

Mole quickly realized what the wand was—she should know, they'd sacrificed a lot to find several of them—and her guess was confirmed a moment later as a wave of solid water rose up above the edge of the lake, spilling out in a broad wedge that swept across the street and into the courtyard. Zenna, holding the injured Hodge in her lap, lowered her body to protect the dwarf as the wave crested over her, leaving her sodden but doing no serious damage. The wave continued into Arun, who held his ground, and then hit the elemental in an explosion of steam that rose with an angry hiss into the air. Mole, lacking Arun's solidity, was driven backward by the force of the onrushing water in a jumble until she hit the wall of the inn with enough force to knock the air from her lungs. The wave lacked enough force or height to actually penetrate far into the inn, but the smoldering flames around the perimeter of the courtyard were instantly drenched by the surge of water.

As the wave retreated, Mole was able to regain her footing with some difficulty. There was still at least two feet of water gathered in the courtyard, held there by the magical power wielded by the half-orc cleric through the wand of control water. The wave had broken around the looming structure of the inn, and steam rose from within the structure as water found its way into the building and met the flames burning within. The whole made for a powerful tableau, with water, steam, and flames forming a single union of elemental chaos.

The elemental, its body wreathed in steam, made a final swipe at Arun, but it was clear that the wave had devastated the creature and sundered its fragile connection to this plane. The dwarf struck low with his hammer, creating a surge of water that splashed over the upper body of the elemental, and with one last eruption of steam that hissed into the night air it collapsed and dissolved.

Arun turned to help Zenna, who was lifting Hodge's head above the level of the water with some difficulty. Mole had to fight through the swirling water to reach them, but determination drove her quickly even as she stumbled awkwardly on debris hidden under the surface of the water.

“Arun! You have to help me... there’s someone trapped inside, a boy...”

The dwarf glanced over his shoulder and nodded, giving Hodge a final boost to his feet before turning back toward the inn. Hodge was conscious now, bolstered by Zenna’s healing, but it was clear that the dwarf was in no condition to contribute more to this crisis. The waters were beginning to retreat now, and Mole found herself unable to progress toward the front opening wreathed in a mix of black smoke and white steam. Arun finally reached her and pulled her up, and the two pushed against the water tugging at their legs with insistency as they rushed to the aid of the trapped boy inside the inn.

But before they could reach the door, there was a loud crash, and as Mole watched in wide-eyed horror, the second story of the inn sagged and came crashing down onto the weakened common room and kitchen below. Flames roared into the sky, and smoke and burning embers billowed out into the courtyard, threatening to blind the heroes still struggling there. Instinctively Mole started forward again, although there was clearly no chance of hope. Arun held her back, his own face grim as they watched what was left of Minuta’s Board consume itself in flames.

Behind them, the cleric of Tempus and others started tending to the injured, and worked to keep the fire contained to the stricken inn. Once it was clear that Mole wasn’t going to go rushing into the building, Arun released her, and turned to offer assistance. Through it all, the gnome just stood there, watching the burning inn through tears that filled her eyes.

“I’m sorry, Bally,” she whispered.

Chapter 146

The mood was somber among the small company as the sun rose over the eastern mountains to illuminate the narrow track that they pursued southward from Cauldron. Already the city was only visible as a black line behind them that formed a smooth contrast to the rough edges of the surrounding peaks. The morning was cold, but not bracingly so, and as the sun warmed the trail cloaks were opened and the heavier coats worn by some of the company were shorn. The trail formed a winding line that descended from the volcanic peak upon which Cauldron was perched, down into a maze of smaller peaks, ravines, and valleys that undulated in a rocky wave that continued until one reached the shores of the Shining Sea. They knew that in one of those valleys, perched along the shore of the Red River, they would find their current destination, the village of Redgorge.

The only sound was the jingle of harness and the occasional snort from one of the sure-footed mountain horses that had been provided them with the aid of the connections of the church of Helm. None of them felt much like conversation. The two dwarves wore grimly serious looks and rode at the head of their small column. Mole, who’d barely spoken since their departure, looked dejected, her usual irrepressible demeanor weighed down by the memory of what had happened the previous night. Zenna would have normally spoken to her friend, but the tiefling was distracted by her own concerns, and had sunk into a depression marked by cold indifference to anything but immediate practicalities.

This indifference certainly extended to their newest member, who rose alone at the rear of the column. Morgan Ahlendraal cut an imposing figure atop his charger, of six feet and twelve stone, the latter of which was more muscle than idle bulk. His features were still youthful and angular, with a shock of orderly black hair and a carefully trimmed beard contained to his strong jaw. He might have been considered attractive, but for a certain coldness in his eyes, and the way that his lips pursed in a reflexive expression of contempt whenever he saw something that did not meet his approval. It seemed that few things failed to fall into that category.

Zenna had spared the man little attention when he had arrived at the Morkoth that morning to greet them, as punctual as she had expected, with every detail of his person in perfect order despite the early armor. At least he looked competent, with a carefully polished suit of plate armor, a large steel shield emblazoned with the sigil of his faith, and a large sword slung across his back. He looked more like the classic image of the crusading knight than a typical cleric, but Zenna knew that the former were common in the ranks of the clergy of the god whose followers stylized him The Watcher.

Morgan had said little to them, though his demeanor made it quite clear that his acceptance of Jenya's mission to join them in search of Alec Tercival was not a course of action that he embarked upon out of choice.

Zenna bristled at the man, and his distate for her was obvious, but at the moment she could not work up the motivation to care. Inside she felt a gaping emptiness that seemed to threaten to swallow her up, and she fought it by retreating into the shell of self-discipline and self-denial that she'd crafted for herself in the years growing up in a world where she perceived herself to be alone. There, in the shroud of emotional nullity forged in her mind, she felt safe. There, the pain could not reach her.

Only now, it wasn't working very well.

She was drawn back into the moment by the sound of conversation ahead of her. Looking up, she saw that the dwarves had called a halt. Kicking her mount forward, she edged her way up along the trail to join them, Mole and Morgan following belatedly behind.

Up ahead was a bend in the trail, where the treacherous path they'd been following downward for the last hour widened slightly as it curved back around to another long descent. The elbow was in the lee of a steep slope that was nearly a cliff, rising some eighty feet above. Several huge boulders had fallen from that rise over time, and the space showed signs of having served in the past as a campsite, despite the hazard of future deposits from above.

When Zenna saw the reason for their pause, her mouth tightened, and she offered a scowl that was a fair imitation of Morgan's.

"What are you doing here?" she asked, trying unsuccessfully to keep the edge out of her voice.

Dannel rode the same dun-colored mare on which they'd encountered him in another roadside meeting a few months before. That time they'd been hurrying to the Lucky Monkey to find Sarcem Delasharn, and they'd found only death.

Before the elf could respond, Zenna had already continued, "I thought I made it clear... before..."

The elf's expression betrayed nothing. "I am still a member of this company," he said. "Whatever your sentiment toward me, Zenna, I have still fought and sacrificed with all of you, and will continue to do so until the whole decides otherwise."

Zenna glared at him.

"I have not been idle," the elf went on, ignoring her hard look. "I have uncovered information that may be of use in tracking down the whereabouts of Alec Tercival."

"How do you know about our mission?" Zenna asked. "Been spying again, have you?"

He ignored the vehemence in her words, and looked to the others. "What say you?" he asked. "Is my company still valued among you?"

Arun glanced at Zenna, who looked about to explode with fury. But the dwarf only said, "You have been a true ally, and I will not stand in your way."

Hodge added, "Aye, yer prancin' about be a bit annoyin', but yer a decen' shot with that bow, and yer don't run away when things turn ugly."

The elf looked to Mole, and in his eyes she saw empathy, and understanding. "And you, Mole?"

The gnome nodded, a thin tear descending down her cheek. "Of course you're still one of us, Dannel," she said.

The elf nodded. "I do not know you, cleric," he said, with a nod toward Morgan.

The priest looked at Zenna. "The half-demon doesn't care for your company, elf," he said. "That alone is enough reason to vote for your presence."

Dannel's jaw tightened, and Zenna flinched as if struck, but neither said anything. Dannel twitched his reins, and moved his mount closer to Zenna's as if to say something to her, but she angrily kicked her animal forward along the trail.

"Let's be on our way, then," she said, anger burning in her voice. "I want to reach this damned village before nightfall."

She cantered ahead at a pace that was nearly reckless, and the others had no choice but to follow.

Chapter 147

The village of Redgorge was situated at a bend in the Red River where it descended from the lower reaches of the Alomir Mountains before turning over a series of cataracts and resuming its course to the Shining Sea. The place had an aura of ancient glory about it, primarily evidenced in the massive walls of shining black basalt that rose nearly as high as those that guarded its larger neighbor, Cauldron. From the high trail that led down out of the mountains, travelers could see the several dozen stone structures huddled securely within those walls, as well as the massive cliffs on the eastern side of the village, across the river, where red clay had been quarried and shipped down the river to the sea for centuries since the village's initial founding.

But it quickly became clear that Redgorge was well past its days of glory. For one thing, the mighty walls that shielded it were in a state of advanced decay, with several breaches around the perimeter, including a twenty-foot gap through which a new road had been blazoned. And many of the structures inside the walls mirrored that decrepitude, with several of them overgrown with vegetation and otherwise showing signs of long abandonment.

The small company from Cauldron approached the village warily, but nothing stirred to threaten them as they approached the village. The walls loomed over them like sentinels as they drew near, but there were no sentries or other guardians that they could detect. With night approaching, the black bastions took on a menacing tone as they approached the nearest open breach in the walls.

The village itself was quiet, although not utterly deserted; a number of people were visible in the streets, going about their business as they wrapped up their activities for the day. A number of curious looks were fired in their direction, but no one moved to hinder them, and they were able to quickly get directions to The Redheaded Miner. The inn was difficult to miss, in fact, a sprawling structure that was mostly stone, with an added wing of wooden construction on the west face a sign of relative prosperity. A stableboy clad in a simple tunic of brown homespun came out to claim their horses, and after a few adjustments to their gear—keeping weapons and spell components close at hand had become an instinct, by now—they went inside.

The common room of the inn appeared to take up the entire front space of the structure, and the bustle within contrasted with the quiet outside. It seemed as though the people of Redgorge preferred to end their days early, and as they watched a veritable mountain of a man behind the bar, his long reddish hair tied back into two ponytails, laid out a spread of various snacks in deep wooden bowls upon the bar.

“Arr now, ‘elp yerselves, nobody’ll go hungry while Mikimax runs this place!”

A dozen villagers gathered quickly about the bar, and the boisterous innkeeper was soon put to work filling a number of drink orders. Hodge had reflexively started in that direction, but Zenna held him up with a hand on his shoulder.

“Remember why we’re here,” she said.

“Aye,” the dwarf replied, “But me belly’s so empty it be scrapin’ me spine, and it’ll harm our quest not to have it filled!”

“Let him go,” Dannel said. “We’re all tired and hungry, and we’ll be better able to deal with the Chisel rested and fed.” The elf kept his voice low, and as he spoke he unslung his bow and removed his pack and cloak, hanging the latter two objects on one of the dozen or so hooks that stood beside the door before heading into the room after Hodge. The others, after attending to their own gear, followed him.

Zenna turned and strode angrily into a less-densely occupied part of the common area to their right, away from the centrally-located bar. How had everything gotten so out of control? Here they were on yet another mission with little in the way of direction or purpose, blundering from one danger into another. With her lover—ex-lover, she corrected herself sternly—as well as a man who openly despised her, a holy crusader whose idea of “tactics” was to yell loudly and charge, a man for whom “bathing” was an abstract concept, and finally a gnome who would no doubt stick her head into a dragon’s mouth if she thought that there was something interesting to see inside.

At the last thought, Zenna couldn’t help but smile, and she allowed herself to let the rancor go, and turned from her feelings to focus on their current predicament.

She became aware of a man sitting in the shadows on the far side of the fireplace, clad in a cloak of finely-tailored wool that looked rather expensively cut. He was still in that nebulous boundary-zone between youth and middle age, and there was a bit of a rakish look to him, with a black beard trimmed short and moderately long hair drawn back into a tail at his back. His profession became evident as he shifted to reveal a small hand-harp held against the side of his body, and he played a soft melody upon it that filled the space between them, but did little to counter the din coming from the crowd at the busy bar on the far side of the room.

Zenna felt a pang as the music reminded her of Dannel, but she squashed it with an angry thought. He finished his peace, and looked up at her, as if expecting comment. “You play well,” she told him.

“I am gratified, lady,” he said with a nod. “When first you entered, before you smiled, I sensed a storm descending upon me, and I thought perhaps I’d somehow unknowingly acquired another critic. I am pleased to see that I am mistaken.”

“You’re rather forthright in speaking to a stranger,” she said, slightly annoyed.

The man smiled, and offered another nod that drew a frown from the tiefling, uncertain if its tenor was slightly mocking. “That is why they call me the Honest Minstrel, lady,” he said.

Zenna started to turn, but there was something in the man’s look that held her there. He shot a glance at the bar, where Zenna’s companions had joined the crowd in securing food and drink. Zenna saw that Mole, despite being smaller than anyone else in the place, had somehow managed to liberate a pair of mugs and a plate of sweetloaves that she balanced in the crook of her elbow as she made her way toward her.

The bard strummed an idle tune on his instrument as Zenna turned back to face him. "Tell me," he said, "What can bind with water, sand, and lime?"

Zenna's ambivalence evaporated as she immediately made a connection. Serious now, she stepped forward. "Mortar," she said.

Chapter 148

The man who called himself "the Honest Minstrel" led the companions down a dusty staircase that descended off a narrow side-corridor adjacent to the inn's kitchens, down to a door of solid-looking oak heavily banded with iron. The noise from the common room, not more than twenty paces distant, was almost completely muted, and as they descended the only other sound was the sound of Hodge finishing the last of the sausage links he'd purloined from Mikimax's spread. The last of the fat links vanished into the dwarf's beard with a thick slurp. Zenna turned and shot him a hard look, but the dwarf merely shrugged and belched loudly.

The door opened to reveal a spacious subterranean chamber, with a look more suited to a lord's hall than an inn cellar. Great pillars of smooth stone supported the weight of the inn above, and between those bastions was an open space dominated by a great ovoid table around which a dozen high-backed chairs were situated. Seated at one of those chairs was a man, clad in a workingman's tunic of clean linen reinforced with leather patches. He was older than any of them, perhaps fifty, though he still had an air of vitality about him, and his muscled hands seemed as though they needed only tools in them to make them complete. He looked up and smiled at them as they entered, although there was something in his eyes, hooded.

"Good evening," he said to them. "I am Oliron Masht, known in this body as the Foreman. Please come in, make yourselves comfortable; we will begin once the others arrive."

"What of Alec Tercival? And the merchant, Maavu?" Arun asked.

"All of your questions will be answered as best we are able," Masht said. "It will not be long now."

The Honest Minstrel crossed the room and poured himself a glass of wine from the decanter on a sideboard butted up against the far wall of the chamber. He did not offer any such hospitality to the others, and when he returned to the table to speak to the Foreman, his soft tone and body language indicated that the conversation was not open to outside participants. An awkward silence resulted at the far end of the table, where the companions gathered. Mole, typically the catalyst for chatter, was still feeling out of sorts, and Zenna almost laughed at the various scowls on the faces of the men.

What keeps us together? she thought. Unable to simply sit still and wait, she turned and walked toward the one of the side walls that looked interesting. Although the lighting was poor, with her darkvision she could clearly discern the artistic displays that had been carved into the wall in relief. Upon closer examination she could see the quality of the work, depicting a series of scenes in sequence across the wall from left to right. A tall, robed figure, carved in profile with a noble cast to his features was prominently featured in most of them. A wizard, Zenna thought, examining one scene where the man was depicted raising the massive walls that shielded Redgorge. In other scenes, the figure was shown with a winged woman who was offering him a quarterstaff wreathed in symbolic flames; defending the city against a horde of terrible, monstrous creatures; now holding the staff boldly as he faced a huge dog-headed, four-armed demon; and finally vanishing into a mountain that hovered protectively over the town below.

“Surabar Spellmason,” a voice said, interrupting her contemplation of the artwork and drawing her attention back to the table. It was Masht who had spoken, his eyes aglow with an inner fire as he regarded her. Belatedly she realized that the far door had opened, and that two newcomers had joined the company; Mikimax the innkeep and a familiar face: Maavu. Of Alec Tercival, there was no sign. “The founder of our order,” Masht went on, “who dedicated the Chisel to working for the greater Good of the region.” The way he said it, there was no mistaking the capital; the word clearly had a greater meaning to the man.

And to his listeners. Maavu looked chagrined for a moment, an expression that he quickly mastered before heading forward toward the table, while Mikimax nodded solemnly, as if acknowledging a blessing.

Maavu pulled out a chair and seated himself near the middle of the table, straddling the invisible line that seemed to separate the Foreman and Honest Minstrel at one end, and the adventurers at the other. Mikimax, true to his role as innkeeper, crossed to the sideboard and secured the decanter there, along with a half-dozen slender glasses for those gathered at the table.

“I am so pleased that you elected to come,” Maavu said with sincerity at the companions. “I fear that I did not get a chance to adequately thank you for your intervention on my behalf... before.”

“Any further news?” the Foreman asked him.

“Nothing new,” Maavu said. “Our foe bides its time, it would seem...”

“Perhaps not,” the Honest Minstrel began, but was interrupted as Morgan asked bluntly, “Our foe?”

The Foreman sighed. “A force of chaos and evil stirs in Cauldron,” he said. “We have been tracking its development for quite some time, although the actual source of danger has remained cloaked in the shadows, not revealing its true nature. Maavu, by forcing the issue, has not helped matters... you stand to make the Chisel into a scapegoat for the people of Cauldron.”

The Honest Minstrel snickered. “I sense the hand of the Last Laugh at work in that business. Face it Maavu, they suckered you, nothing else!”

Maavu bristled at the comment and turned to face the bard. “Better dead than slaves! A wandering strummer like you should know!”

“Peddler! You count lives like money! No difference to you, eh?”

Maavu opened his mouth to retort, but was interrupted as the Foreman slammed his palm into the surface of the table. “Enough! We have enough difficulties without squabbling like children. Ekaym, you were about to say something earlier, about events in Cauldron?”

The Honest Minstrel grimaced. “Aye. My sources tell me that Skellerang has plans to move a force from the city garrison to Redgorge, to secure and search the town.”

The companions exchanged a look as the gathered members of the Chisel reacted with incredulity—even Masht’s calm façade betraying more than a hint of anger before he schooled his features to stony control.

“This does not bode well,” Mikimax rumbled. “The people will resist Skellerang’s half-orcs... at least some will.”

“I cannot believe that the Lord Mayor would allow such,” Morgan said.

“There is much that I likewise would not have believed, a year past,” Masht said wearily. “But many things have changed.”

The wizened craftsman turned to Maavu. “Alec will have to publicly renounce his challenge, to forestall this action,” he said.

“Agreed,” Maavu said, looking deflated.

“Well, that settles that,” Arun said. “Now be time for the question we brought here: where is the paladin of Helm?”

The four members of the Chisel exchanged a meaningful look. Finally their eyes settled on Maavu. The wizard-merchant looked stricken.

“We don’t know.”

Dannel cleared his throat, drawing their attention to him. For the first time since the gathering had begun, he spoke.

“I believe that I may have an answer to that question.”

Chapter 149

Mole closed the door softly behind her. She didn’t want to wake Zenna; her friend had been sleeping poorly of late and she suspected that the tiefling would need every bit of rest she could grasp before what they had waiting for them tomorrow.

The gnome was tired as well, but she was too keyed up to rest. The hallway was dark, with only a tiny slit of a window at the far end, but her gnomish eyes enabled her to navigate its length without difficulty until she came to the landing where diffuse firelight from below allowed her to see more clearly. The floorboards beneath her feet were old and had creaked earlier when her friends had retired for the night; under her light feet, however, they made not a sound.

After making a reflexive check for threats—a habit she could not easily break now, even here—she went downstairs to the common room. At this hour, in that nebulous zone between when the latest reveler departed and the earliest laborer rose, all was quiet. Flickering flames were visible in one of the hearths; the innkeeper Mikimax had built up the fire and left it to burn the night to warm the inn through the network of chimney ducts that rose up through the upper stories of the building. The room was deserted; no, she saw, there was one person there, sitting in a comfortable armchair in the shadows beyond the fire. She couldn't clearly make him out, but she had a good guess as to whom it might be.

She walked over to him, and as he looked up her guess was confirmed. Dannel greeted her with a nod, and indicated another chair across from him. She took the seat and sat there, looking at the fire. For a long moment neither of them spoke.

"A long day tomorrow," he finally said. "You should get some sleep."

Mole shrugged. She knew that the elf, like all of those of his race, did not need sleep as most races knew it, instead restoring his mind each night with a meditative trance. But she knew Dannel well enough to know that he was troubled, and she wondered if he'd been able to complete his meditations this night.

"She doesn't hate you, you know. She was just taken by surprise."

The elf nodded again, and for a moment, just a moment, he let his frustration show on his face. "I cannot suppose I blame her," he said.

"She feels as though everyone she's ever loved has let her down."

"You haven't."

The gnome fidgeted in her seat. She looked at Dannel, who simply met her gaze, waiting for her to say what she had to say.

"Well..."

The elf waited.

"I just didn't think it was right. It wasn't... I mean, I know that you may think I have a looser sense of the concept of personal property than some, and that's fine, but it's just... well, it wasn't right. I didn't earn it..."

"I understand," Dannel said. "How did you manage to fool Zenna? Surely she would have noticed that you were no longer carrying the pin."

Mole managed to look a bit sheepish. "I had a duplicate copy made, while we were in Tethyr. Zenna never thought to cast detect magic on it, I guess."

Dannel nodded.

“You won’t tell Zenna?”

“Your secret is safe with me.”

Mole looked back at the stairs before leaning forward in her chair to narrow the gap between them. “Good. Because if she found out it was my fault that you...that they... found us, she’d... well, she wouldn’t be happy.”

“Whatever Zenna thinks, your families don’t want to control you. They are just concerned.”

“Yes. Well.”

The gnome sat back, and a few more minutes passed in silence. Finally, Mole leaned forward again, and asked, “May I see the plate again?”

In response the elf drew out a flat, heavy object from the pack sitting beside his chair. The firelight gleamed brightly on it; it was a square plate of silver, perhaps a foot across, etched with a finely etched but archaic design on one side, and a crude map scraped into the other. They hadn’t been able to make much sense of the etching, which appeared to depict a six-armed creature overseeing some sort of construction project with what appeared to be humanoid slaves as laborers. But the map, which had accompanying runes marked upon it in the Giant tongue, had proven more useful.

The plate had been purchased by Dannel at a shop in Cauldron, just two days ago. While the rest of the companions had pursued their meeting with Jenya Urikas, the elf had conducted his own investigation. It turned out that Alec Tercival had sold a number of items won on his various expeditions in the region to the halfling owner of a local curio shop. The plate had been a recent sale, and Dannel surmised that it might give them a clue as to where the paladin had been of late.

Last night he had shown the plate to the leaders of the Chisel, and they had confirmed his suspicions. Maavu told them that Alec had spent some time in the jungles to the southwest of Redgorge, in a dangerous region known as the Demonskar. This locale, which was given a wide berth by most travelers, featured prominently in the legends of the town and its magic-using founder. Apparently a powerful and terrible demon had lived in the region centuries ago, leading an army of his dread kind against the early settlers of Redgorge. Surabar Spellmason had finally defeated the demon with the aid of a celestial ally named Nidrama, raising the walls whose remnants still surrounded the town today. Maavu couldn’t say exactly what the paladin had been up to in that area, but Masht noted that there was a statue of a headless demon located several hours’ travel down the Red River; a landmark that had been identified upon the crude map scratched onto the silver plate.

It wasn’t much of a lead, but with no one knowing the current location of the paladin, it was all that they had to go on.

Mole examined the design on the etched side of the plate. As before, the strange sigils and unusual depictions there made little sense to her. She didn't like the look of the six-armed creature, though.

She handed the heavy plate back to Dannel.

"What do you think, of them?" Mole asked.

She didn't have to clarify of whom she was speaking; the enigma that was the Chisel had weighed heavily upon all of them, after their meeting. After the official gathering had closed Masht had asked them to join him in a walk along the summit of the bastions that surrounded the town. He had not spoken further of their mission or of Cauldron, instead talking to them of the natural wonders of the region, and of the struggles of Redgorge's history. She still remembered something he had said at the end, as he had stared out over the darkened jungle canopy that stretched out before them to the west and south.

"Surabar's spells raised this wall in seven days. But his guidance has failed to build a righteous society in as many centuries."

The thought stayed with her as she took her leave of Dannel, returning to her room to try and grab a few hours of sleep before the coming of the dawn.

Chapter 150

The next morning there were a number of yawns and groans all around, as the companions set out with the coming of the day, replacing their mounts with a small rowboat provided by the leaders of the Chisel. Both dwarves regarded the craft dubiously, and upon first seeing it Hodge absolutely refused to embark in, "that heap o' driftwood," but ultimately they gathered their supplies and set out down the Red River.

"It's just a little water," Mole chided Hodge, but Arun's response was serious.

"Easy for a gnome, or a human for that matter," the paladin said. "Unencumbered, you float. But if you were denser than water, and clad in heavy armor to boot, you'd likely react in the same way."

But the boat proved sturdy enough, although it was a bit crowded with the six of them and all of their gear, and with the swift current descending down from the cataracts above Redgorge they had soon left the black basalt walls of the town behind them. The river led them into the dense jungle that extended for several leagues below the mountains. While this jungle was nothing in contrast to the mighty Forest of Mir, extending in a belt ranging hundreds of north along the Marching Mountains to the border of Tethyr, the companions were nevertheless awed by the looming presence of the densely arranged trees and the overall impression of teeming life that surrounded them.

Of course, some were more awed than others.

“Damned bloody blasted bugs!” Hodge yelled, snapping at his neck in an awkward motion that threatened to overturn the entire boat.

“For the last time, hold, dwarf!” Morgan complained, steadying the craft with his oar. The boat had come with two oars, and they had taken turns propelling the craft and keeping it clear of obstacles as the morning deepened. In truth, though, the current did most of the work for them, although they had to be mindful of shoals and other unexpected dangers along the fast-moving river.

Long shafts of sunshine slanted down upon the river through the gap in the trees above. At places the canopies of the trees leaned out over the river, forming a vaulted corridor of sorts with a long slash of blue between them overhead. Zenna spent the morning huddled deep within the shelter of her cloak, quietly miserable in the stern of the small craft. Mole passed the first hour dispensing various and sometimes contradictory nautical advice until Hodge threatened to hurl her overboard; while the exchange of dwarven profanities had been temporarily amusing, she soon got tired and passed out in a small space in the back of the craft near their piled packs of supplies. While Mole had taken care to see that they had everything that they might need in her bag of holding, after what had happened in Bhal-Hamatugn none of them begrudged being extra prepared this time out.

The morning passed slowly, and as the sun rose the heat grew, despite the earliness of the season, until it hung over them like a thick cloak of hot dampness. Masht had told them that the decapitated statue indicated on the silver plate was located about four hours’ passage down the river. At times they could feel eyes watching them from the fastness of the jungle to either side, but other than an occasional quiver in the dense undergrowth, or a sudden splash in the water ahead of them, there were no other indications of potential threats. Still, the companions had gone through too much together to let down their guard, especially in a region unknown to any of them.

Finally, as the sun neared its zenith in the sky above them, Dannel in the prow caught sight of a clearing in the jungle ahead on the right bank of the river. As they drew nearer they could see that the clearing formed a wedge that penetrated into the jungle for about fifty yards. A few pieces of broken stone that were yet too regular in their placement and form to be natural were visible, shrouded in tangled weeds and clinging vines that found purchase in their pocked and worn surfaces. Toward the rear of the clearing they could make out the looming figure of what had to be the statue marked on the plate; despite the distance they could see that the considerable monument reflected no human model.

Zenna shuddered. “There is a darkness gathered here,” she said. The others glanced back at her, but she did not elaborate. Morgan looked about to respond, but he apparently thought better of it, and instead turned to face the jungle, his lips pursed, his jaw tight.

The dwarves happened to be working the oars at the time, and they started directing the boat out of the main channel toward the muddy shoreline that fronted the clearing. What they lacked in nautical skill they nearly made up for in strength and determination, and the small craft was soon arcing toward its destination.

None of them detected the danger that lurked behind the wall of tangled growth at the far edge of the clearing. The first warning they had were the long shafts that shot out from the brush, sunlight gleaming from the heads of jagged iron as they slammed into the intruders.

“Ambush!” someone yelled.

Chapter 151

“Ambush!” Dannel cried, his warning punctuated a moment later by a cry of pain as a long arrow grazed his arm, the rough-edged head tearing a bloody gash as it passed.

“I think we know that!” Hodge yelled, growling his own quiet challenge as an arrow hit one of the banded plates covering his torso with enough force to dent the metal. “Close yer yap and shoot them already!” he urged. The dwarf reached for his crossbow, but then thought better of it and instead bent himself to his oar, paddling for all he was worth.

“Aye, close to land!” Arun shouted from the other side of the boat, the paladin already working his own oar. “We’re sitting ducks out here!”

Several more arrows shot through the air. One caught Morgan a glancing blow to the neck that was thankfully mostly deflected by his gorget; the cleric had drawn attention to himself when he rose to peer out toward the jungle, as if altitude could give his vision the power to penetrate the dense jungle growth. Even if he could see them, however, he lacked the power to respond; the javelins he carried could faintly carry all of the way to the thicket that shrouded their enemies. A heartbeat later another missile sliced down the length of the boat right through the space between all of them, missing several of the companions by mere inches before zipping out to finally fall into the water fifty paces behind their craft. Clearly whoever the archers were, they were using powerful bows.

“Get down, you fool, you’ll tip the boat,” Zenna said to the cleric. Closing her eyes for a moment to steady herself, she opened her mind to her magic, calling up a protective shield before her in defense.

Mole, beside her at the stern of the craft, stirred. “Are we there yet?” she asked, bleary-eyed.

Dannel had strung his bow, and was sending careful shafts into the jungle where the arrows were originating. While he could not clearly see their foes, his sharp eyes marked where the enemy arrows emerged from the jungle, and despite the slight swaying of the boat, his arrows more often than not struck within a hand’s span of where the shot had originated.

Unfortunately, his prominent position at the prow of the boat made him a prime target, and several more arrows struck him. The force of two shots was largely absorbed by the links of magical chain armor forged of mithral that covered his body, although the impacts still drew solid grunts from the elf. A third arrow, however, slammed into his thigh with a meaty thunk, the shaft penetrating so far that the bloody steel head was just visible out the back side of the limb. Biting off a cry of pain, Dannel slumped down on the forward seat of the boat, clutching onto the wale in order to keep from falling over the side.

Slowly but steadily, the boat drew nearer to the shore.

Morgan stepped forward, between the dwarves, and drew up the elf with his muscled hands. Dannel grimaced in pain at the sudden movement, and the boat shook with the motion, but the cleric kept his footing and turned, depositing the elf behind him and holding him upright between the straining (and cursing, in one case) dwarves.

“Be steadfast, archer,” he said, but gave no other warning as he reached down and thrust the arrow in Dannel’s leg deeper, drawing another cry of agony from the elf. The thrust forced the bloody head fully out of his leg, enough for the cleric to grab it and snap it off with a ruthless twist of his fist. More arrows continued to fly out in a more or less steady stream from various positions of cover—it seemed that the archers were moving about, now—although the rowboat had closed to within fifty feet of the shore. Froth rose up from both sides of the boat as Arun and Hodge drove their oars into the water with violent strokes, putting their full weight into each downward thrust. An arrow connected with the cleric’s right shoulder, penetrating the steel armor there, but Morgan ignored the wound as he drew the remainder of the arrow from Dannel’s leg and called upon the power of his god to help the stricken elf. Blue fire flared from his fingers, bloody around Dannel’s savaged leg, and the elf gasped as healing energy poured into him.

Morgan reached down and grabbed Dannel’s longbow, shoving it into the elf’s hands even as he turned and lifted his shield to form a bulwark at the front of the boat. An arrow clanged off of the front of the shield even as he moved, adding urgency to the maneuver. “Keep firing!” he ordered. He spoke more, words that none of them but Arun and Zenna recognized, words in the shining Celestial language, words of invocation to his god.

Zenna had reinforced her defenses, adding a layer of mage armor to the shield that she’d conjured earlier. She loaded her crossbow, but to her eyes the threshold of the forest looked like an unbroken sea of green and brown; she could not identify a target to shoot. Their foes had no such difficulty, evidenced a moment later as another arrow erupted from the undergrowth and sped across the clearing and to the boat. The arrow punched through Zenna’s shield as though the barrier were a mere illusion, vanishing into the darkness of the tiefling’s hood. A tight cry came from within, and Zenna fell backward hard against the rear wale of the boat.

Mole, who’d been sniping ineffectually from her position of relative cover behind her friends and the piled supplies, was at her side in an instant. “Zenna!” She drew back the tiefling’s hood, afraid of what she’d see, but Zenna seemed merely stunned, a thin line of red trickling down her temple. Her magical hat hung askew, and there was a hole in the back of her hood where the arrow had exited, but she seemed otherwise intact.

“Are you all right?” she asked, as her friend pulled herself up.

“I... I think it hit one of my horns,” Zenna said, wincing as she probed at the shallow gash with her fingers.

The boat lurched as its bottom finally scraped muddy soil. Morgan, standing at the prow, leapt the final intervening foot to stable land, his shield raised high as he continued to absorb hits from the withering barrage coming from the jungle. Despite his heavy armor and shield he bled now from two serious hits, a puncture in his right leg an inch above the knee to add to the deep wound in his shoulder. Several other arrows that hadn't quite penetrated through his armor jutted from his body, and he had the look of a pincushion as he rushed forward, not waiting for the dwarves who transitioned cumbersomely from the boat to solid ground. Dannel, meanwhile, continued his own barrage, and while he could still not clearly mark his targets, at least one cry of pain from behind the line of greenery indicated a likely hit.

Zenna looked up to see Morgan charging into the center of the clearing, not waiting for the dwarves. The sun caught full on his steel armor, setting him ablaze with reflected light, and he looked... magnificent, a god striding forth to do battle against evil. Eschewing the javelins he carried, he drew his sword as he ran, four feet of bright steel that shone with a golden nimbus of light. Zenna swallowed, and for a moment she forgot that she hated him, this man whose faith was both powerful and blind at the same time.

A volley of arrows knifed out from the underbrush, pattering off the holy knight's armor with loud pings of impact. All of the hidden archers were focusing on the cleric now, but even as another iron head found a weak point in his armor, jamming two inches into his torso below his right armpit, he continued his rush. The man cried out, a holy word of power, and his form seemed to swell... no, Zenna realized, he really was growing, recognizing the spell he had used, and then he was standing twelve feet tall, looming over them like a giant. She could feel the ground tremble beneath his boots as he charged, and she hoped that their attackers were as impressed as she was by the transformation.

"Gods, he's crazier than Arun," Mole said from beside her. Zenna turned her head, and nodded in agreement.

"Are you going to fire that thing?" the gnome asked. Zenna looked down at her lap, and realized that she'd forgotten about the crossbow, sitting ignored throughout the battle. She hadn't even cast a spell. Angry with herself, she turned to extracting herself from the precariously grounded boat, while behind her Mole aimed and snapped off a quick shot toward the jungle.

Morgan reached the wall of growth separating the clearing from the forest, and without hesitation crashed through the bushes to where the enemy fire had originated. Behind him came the dwarves, pounding belatedly across the muddy clearing, while Dannel came more deliberately, an arrow half-drawn and ready to fire.

There was some thrashing from beyond the bushes, then Morgan's head reappeared from above a thicket, still twelve feet above the forest floor.

"They're gone," the cleric reported. "Some bloodstains, a few broken arrows, that's it."

A hush fell over the clearing, as a relative peace returned to the jungle.

Chapter 152

“Ugly sucker, even without its head.”

Mole’s expression was almost comically serious as she stared up at the headless statue of the demon, but Zenna could not disagree. She did not recognize the monstrosity that was depicted in the rough-hewn carving, which even shortened stood a good nine feet tall above the chipped stone platform on which it rested. It had four arms and a muscled body, but time and the harsh environment of the jungle had removed all other details from the statue. Dannel had found its head nearby, a worn slab of stone that had a vague dog-like look to it.

“Well, the elf has found the trail, and there’s only so much day left to us. We’d best be on our way,” Arun said.

Zenna turned away from the statue, feeling a shiver despite the damp heat of the jungle. Not that the heat bothered her, really; her mixed heritage would make this journey much easier for her than for her companions, particularly those clad in heavy armor. She made a mental note to take a spell of create water in addition to the purification spell she already possessed, the next time she meditated.

She caught sight of Morgan, standing by the edge of the forest. If the heat gave him any difficulty, he refused to show it. The cleric had returned to normal size shortly after the end of the battle, and had quickly treated the wounds he had suffered using scrolls scribed with healing spells. He seemed to be husbanding his own reservoir of power, a strategy that Zenna acknowledged; they had no idea what might be waiting for them in the jungle, and she doubted that whoever had ambushed them would simply give up and let them pass unmolested. She and Dannel had used a few charges from their own healing wands to treat the injuries suffered by the others; even if Morgan hadn’t had there wherewithal to help himself, she wasn’t sure he would have accepted her assistance anyway.

On that dour thought, she walked over to join the others as they set out down the trail.

Within ten minutes, she’d mentally revised that definition of their route. “Trail” was only a loose approximation of the winding, tortuous path that wound roughly northward into the jungle, the entire route choked with dense growth that encroached from both sides. Clearly at least some traffic came though here; they could see occasional signs of damage to the brush and Dannel occasionally pointed out the prints of some unidentified creature or another.

They had to pause for brief rests frequently. The dwarves, in particular, were soon drenched in sweat, and Zenna had to chide them frequently to drink often from the waterskins they all carried. In the damp heat their supply of water was depleted quickly, with both dwarves running dry only a few hours into the trek, but Dannel was able to find a stream easily and with a purify spell from Zenna they were able to restore their caches and press on.

Throughout the hike, they could feel the jungle’s teeming life all around them, pressing in as though the forest itself were sentient and resented their intrusion. Bird calls, animal cries, and the omnipresent buzz of insects were only the most common noises they heard; many sounds that rose from deeper in the forest beyond the trail could not easily be identified. By the time that the diffuse light drifting down from the dense canopy above began to grow dim, they were all exhausted and rather ragged from nearly six hours of difficult travel.

“I thought you dwarves were supposed to have stamina,” Morgan snapped, during one of their breaks. The cleric seemed as unaffected by the heat as he’d appeared earlier, despite the fact that his armor and gear had to be a huge burden upon him.

“Bragh,” Hodge said, pausing to suck in a breath in between gulps from his waterskin. “The day I let a puny manling walk me into the ground...” He spat noisily. “Put me up agin yet on a mountain trail, I’ll show you stamina. But this damned place,” he said, wiping his brow with the back of his hand, “if this wet be gettin’ any thicker, we’ll be swimmin’, not walkin’!”

The cleric chuckled, and Zenna belatedly realized that she should have anticipated this problem, that her clerical spells could help both dwarves withstand the heat—as Morgan had no doubt already done, she now understood. But before she could make the offer, the cleric was already speaking.

“On the morrow I will ask Helm to extend his blessings to you two,” he said. “So that you can keep up.”

Hodge bristled, and looked about to retort with a curse, but Arun silenced him by standing up and hefting his pack. “Let us be on our way, then,” he said. “It will be dark soon, and we should find a secure place to camp.”

“I’d just take a slight breeze,” Mole said.

They pushed on down the trail as the shadows gradually deepened. The map on the silver plate bore no key to scale, so the short distance between the river and the first landmark, an apparent cave marked as, “Home,” could have been a few miles or a few leagues. They were a bit concerned about meeting the creator of the map, but Dannel pointed out that the fact that Alec had sold the plate suggested that said owner was likely no longer around to complain.

And then, so suddenly that they were upon it almost before they realized it, the trail emerged onto another clearing.

The clearing stretched out before them wasn’t large, perhaps fifty paces across, and was situated against the base of a hillock that rose from the jungle floor like a camel’s hump. The ground slanted slightly down toward the point where clearing and hill met, and visible there at that intersection of the two they could just make out a dark opening that could possibly be a cave.

“Are those what I think they are?” Mole asked, drawing their attention to the sloping, uneven ground leading down to the cave. The others could see what she had spotted, occasional white objects scattered, half-buried in the tortured earth of the slope.

“Bones,” Arun said, grimly.

“Well, we know Alec made it back from here, anyway, right?” Mole asked, starting forward.

Her first step into the clearing was accompanied by a loud sound that originated somewhere in the forest behind them. It sounded as though something were tearing the very fabric of the jungle asunder, a great ripping and crashing noise that was growing louder. Fast.

“Something’s coming,” Morgan said needlessly.

“Yer tryin’ to cap the elf’s rep for statin’ the obvious, eh?” Hodge said, sparing a look at the quiver of fat bolts at his hip before settling on his axe.

Morgan opened his mouth to reply, but Zenna cut him off. “The question is, do we face it in the open, or in the jungle?”

“I’d rather see what I’m facing, and have room to maneuver,” Arun said, already moving out into the open space.

Dannel, meanwhile, had dug into his pouch and had produced a pair of silk slippers, which he quickly switched out for his narrow boots. “I’ll take a look,” he said, picking the nearest tree and darting nimbly up its trunk through the power of his slippers of spider climbing.

Mole watched him ascend with a sigh of regret.

“Zenna, Mole, get behind us,” Arun said, as he, Hodge, and Morgan spread out in a concave line facing the jungle’s edge. Zenna nodded and moved away from the loud crashing sound, which was getting close enough for her to see vines, bushes, and smaller trees shuddering from the passage of whatever was approaching. Through a gap in the foliage she caught a glimpse of something bulky, and big.

Mole, of course, had vanished somewhere.

“Here it comes!” Dannel’s voice came down from above.

“Still the champ!” Hodge growled.

“What is it?” Morgan shouted up, drawing back one arm, a javelin ready to throw.

“It’s...” the elf trailed off, uncertain. Zenna saw him draw back his bow, and fire into the undergrowth.

Then a thick wall of brush ten feet to the left of the trailhead parted, and it appeared, coming at them in a full charge.

Chapter 153

It was huge, easily ten feet tall at the shoulder, and it had to weigh thousands of pounds. Zenna couldn't identify it at first... it looked almost like a giant ape at first glance, but its body was proportioned to walk on four limbs rather than two, and its head was narrow and knobby, with tiny beady eyes flanking a massive snout. Its mouth wasn't that big for its body, but with the creature's sheer size it looked quite adequate to take off a head or arm with a single bite.

Zenna had never seen a giant sloth, and the first meeting wasn't going to be a pleasant one.

The battle cries of her companions shocked her back from study into action. Arun and Morgan had both hurled their missiles, but the cleric's javelin and the dwarf's hammer seemed to have little or no effect as they glanced off of the creature's thick hide. Hodge stepped forward, his axe raised, but the dwarf looked almost comically tiny in contrast to the creature as it loomed over him. Hodge rushed toward one limb as thick as a tree trunk, but the creature sensed him coming and lashed out at him with a sweep of one forelimb. The sloth's huge claws scooped the dwarf up like a shovel, and almost casually sent him flying awkwardly away. Hodge landed hard fifteen paces distant, coming slowly to his feet, a bit unsteady.

The creature had scored first, but now it was exposed, with the companions able to pour damage into it from all directions. Dannel's arrows lanced down into its back, punching through the thick hide, seeking something vital. Zenna raised her fist and poured a scorching ray into it; or rather tried to, for inexplicably the shaft of coruscating fire lanced through empty air two feet above the creature's head, doing no damage.

"Damn!" Zenna cursed.

"Keep trying!" Arun yelled in encouragement, as he and Morgan closed to battle the beast. The dwarf narrowly dodged a clawed limb that slammed into the ground where he'd been standing a moment before, and he managed a counter than glanced off of the limb, doing little damage but drawing the creature's attention to him. Morgan rushed it from the side, thrusting his sword into the gap where the creature's arm its torso. The creature's height made it difficult for the cleric to stab his weapon overly deeply into its body, but it was clear that the attack had made an impression by the way that the creature roared and turned to face the cleric. Morgan stood his ground, but before he could manage to strike again the creature caught him up a scoop of its claws, dragging the struggling cleric up to its head. The cleric of Helm was too large to fit into the sloth's gullet, but its powerful jaws snapped down on his torso with enough force to bend the bands of metal armor that protected his gut. Morgan cried out as the jaws crushed him with the force of a vise, but through his pain he managed to bring his sword up, stabbing awkwardly toward one of the beady eyes. His stroke went awry, but nonetheless opened a bloody gash along the side of its skull. In response the sloth shook its head violently, releasing its grip on the cleric and hurtling him roughly aside as it had done to Hodge earlier.

The sloth had taken a beating, its fine brown pelt now marked with various red trails of blood from the wounds inflicted upon it by the companions. Zenna had turned to help

Hodge, but the dwarf was able to pick himself up where he'd fallen, and shrugged off the tiefling's offered aid, instead casting about for his axe, and on finding where it had fallen hefting it and rushing back into the fray. Arun continued to pound at it even as it savaged Morgan, but good fortune seemed to have deserted the paladin, as his heavy blows either missed the creature or fell obliquely and harmlessly on the creature's thick hide.

Mole appeared in her usual manner, darting from concealment to unleash a devastating sneak attack from behind. Augmented by her magical boots and her own nimbleness, she shot between the sloth's hind legs and leapt upward, kicking off against the creature's knee to accelerate her momentum up into its belly. Her sword flickered and vanished into its gut, and for a moment she hung there, suspended from the hilt. Then her weight drew it out, along with a jet of rich red blood from a punctured organ, and she fell, coming down into a smooth roll that carried her forward.

Right in front of the creature.

Which promptly roared, scooped her up, and popped her into its mouth. Mole barely had enough time to open her mouth to scream...

And then it swallowed her.

Chapter 154

"Mole!" Zenna cried, watching in horror as the giant sloth consumed her friend. For a moment an unnatural quiet hung over the clearing...

"GET THAT THING, NOW!" Arun roared, putting his own words into action as he leapt forward, tossing his shield aside to strike two-handed at the creature. He avoided the front of the creature, knowing that Mole was somewhere inside its gullet, instead taking aim at one of its front legs. The sloth, slower now that the loss of blood was having an effect, started to turn, but it could not react in time to stop the hammer that came down on its front right limb, right at the joint. There was a sickening crack, and the sloth sagged, keening in sudden pain.

From the opposite side Morgan rushed back into the fray, his sword shining in his hand as he raised it high, driving it deep into the creature's side.

Hodge rushed it from the rear, bringing his axe around in a mighty blow that nearly severed one of its hind legs.

The sloth reared up, clearly in agony now, tottering on its ruined limbs. Suddenly an arrow sprouted from the base of its skull, the black feathered shaft quivering as a shudder passed through the creature.

Then, as the companions drew back, it hissed and fell.

"Hurry... cut it open!" Zenna cried, rushing in even as the dead sloth's bulk settled to the ground.

“Where?” Hodge said, examining the body of the creature with a look of disgust in his face.

The question was answered for them a moment later, as an inch of steel suddenly jutted from a spot in the creature’s belly, twisting slightly as it tried to work a wider hole.

“There!” Zenna said, but the others were already there. “Careful, don’t cut her!” she added, as Morgan and Hodge used their blades to slice open the creature’s belly. It only took them a few moments to widen the hole enough to reveal Mole. The gnome looked rather the worse for wear, her skin blotched where the stomach acids of the creature had scored it, her entire body covered in digestive juices and gore. But she was able to flash them a wry grin as they helped her out from the creature.

“Well, now I know how an apple feels like!”

Dannel, having made his way back down from his treetop perch, jogged over to them. “Everyone all right?” he asked.

“More or less,” Mole said, holding her arms out from her body as she examined herself with a deep frown on her face. “I may need a bath, though.”

“It’ll be dark soon,” Arun said. “We need healing, food, and rest, in that order. And it seems as though there’s a ready shelter at hand.” With his hammer, he pointed toward the nearby cave at the foot of the slope.

“That place has an ill look about it,” Morgan said, a trace of uneasiness in his voice.

“True enough,” the paladin said. “But unless you’d rather camp out in the jungle, it’s our only option.

“I’m going to go look for a stream,” Mole said, starting toward the forest.

“No wandering off alone,” Dannel said. “I’ll go with you, and we can look for some wood that’ll burn as well.”

“Yer ain’t hot enough already?” Hodge asked.

“I was thinking more of dinner,” the elf said, with a nod toward the sloth.

The dwarf grinned. “Ah, in that case, I’ll go with ye as well. Yer others can get our new digs set up, all domestic-like.”

Zenna rolled her eyes, but she, Morgan, and Arun started toward the cave, while the others returned to the forest. “Watch yourself... those archers may still be about,” Arun cautioned.”

“We won’t go far,” Dannel promised.

And the twilight shadows deepened, as night settled down over the jungle. The moon was new, Selûne's glow temporarily absent from the sky, and the stars seemed tentative this night, faint glimmers in an expanse of pure black.

The cave wasn't especially spacious, and it stank of rotting hides among other unpleasant odors that were thankfully not fresh. But it was defensible, and given the two hostile encounters they'd already had since entering the jungle, the complaints against the accommodations were not that vociferous. They cooked slabs of sloth meet on kebobs that Dannel fashioned from spent arrows, and enjoyed a filling repast. Mole produced a bulging aleskin from her bag of holding, and for a time they were able to banish their internal rivalries and the complex feelings feeding the tension within the group, and simply be companions, enjoying a life of adventure and shared challenges overcome. Even Morgan was brought to smile by a joke Mole told, although his eyes still avoided Zenna, shrouded in her cloak at the edge of the firelight, far from both the cleric and from Dannel. The elf did not press the matter, and after the meal he drew out his silver flute, and played a few melodies that evoked feelings of camaraderie and victory after long struggle, through which was woven a faintly sad undertone that told a story of loss and regret. The others listened in silence as the elf wrought his music, and when it was done, Zenna turned away to conceal the tears that had gathered in her eyes.

The brief interlude passed quickly, though, with the realization that further dangers awaited them tomorrow in the jungle. After a brief discussion to include Morgan in their usual watch schedule, they banked their fire and retired to catch what sleep they could before while the night remained.

Chapter 155

Mole's eyes popped open as she woke suddenly, the lingering shreds of a dream of rushing flames hovering for a moment on the edges of her mind before dissolving. It was still late, or rather early, she supposed. She was hot, her shirt sodden with sweat and clinging to her lithe body. She'd already stood her watch, and she knew that she needed some more sleep, but she rose from her bedroll, reflexively grabbing both her magical boots and her swordbelt. She found her waterskin in the darkness by memory, and took a deep drink that did little to banish the stale taste in her mouth.

Silent as a mouse, she made her way across the sleeping forms of her friends to the cave exit. There was a shadowy form visible there, leaning against the rock face beside the gap. It shifted slightly as she approached, the rasp of metal on metal telling her that the guardian was Morgan.

Again she was tempted to return to her bedroll, but instead she walked over to where the cleric was keeping watch.

"Hot night, eh?" she said, her voice a whisper just loud enough for him to hear, but not to wake her sleeping friends.

"Aye," he said, though as before he showed little sign of discomfiture. Magic spell, the gnome thought, remembering the conversation between him and the dwarves earlier.

“Thanks,” she said. “For earlier, helping me when that... whatever it was, decided to make a snack out of me.”

The cleric nodded. His eyes shifted back toward the hillside in a sweeping glance that was probably supposed to be a hint, but which Mole of course pointedly ignored. The gnome chose a rock adjacent to the cleric’s perch and hopped up beside him.

“So, what’s your problem with Zenna? I mean, you’re a paladin of Helm. Aren’t you guys supposed to be tolerant, you know, your code, and such?”

The cleric sucked in a breath, and for a moment Mole was glad that she couldn’t clearly see his expression. Finally he let out something that Mole thought might have been intended to be a chuckle—although it was clearly forced. His voice, when he spoke, was clearly serious.

“I might ask you a similar question. You seem a goodly person, though a bit scattered... why then, do you choose to travel in the company of a demonspawn?”

Mole’s eyes narrowed, but managed a casual shrug. “Oh, it’s not so bad. But Orcus keeps hitting on me at the family reunions. And Lolth always puts spider pieces in the spinach dip, yeuck, I can tell you.”

Morgan turned away again. “You mock me,” he said, his voice flat.

“Well, yeah, but you deserved it,” she said. “Now why don’t you tell me the real reason? None of the other clerics of Helm that we’ve dealt with have had this problem.”

“Yes, and what happened to them?” he asked.

“Funny,” she said. “I thought you were actually fairly bright, but your prejudices would have to be pretty blind indeed to suggest that our actions, or lack thereof, had anything to do with the deaths of Ruphos, Illewyn, and Sarcem. I never knew the high priest, but I definitely counted the first two as my friends, and I mourn their deaths.”

She considered storming off, but something kept her sitting there, while the cleric sat beside her as rigid and silent as a statue.

Finally, after several minutes, he spoke.

“I was never supposed to become a priest,” he said, his voice distant, his gaze fixed on some distant point in that borderland where the night sky met the jungle canopy. “I was the eldest, I was to inherit my family’s estate, the wealth that my father and his line had accumulated, a good name and a favorable marriage.”

“My life was easy, the demands of who I was simple enough, my purse always full. I spent my educational years in a mélange of free spending, carousing with friends, enjoying a sequence of women.”

Mole glanced up dubiously, but didn't interrupt.

"The cult had existed as rumor for some time, but we paid little heed to it; a story to frighten children. Secret churches and dark rituals were phenomena of places like Almraiven and Calimport, not in the quiet belt of rural communities that exists in the shadow of the Marching Mountains. To this day, I do not know why they took an interest in my family."

The cleric's voice grew distant; it was as if he'd forgotten that she was there. "At first I thought it was mere fate that had brought me home at that day, at that time. Had I waited a day, I doubt the involvement of the cult would have ever been known."

"I heard the screams as I rode into the main courtyard of the estate. They had gathered everyone, my parents, the domestics, the field laborers... even the family dogs, in the plaza. They did not bother to hide their features... the indicators of their heritage varied from case to case, horns on one, hooves on another, black claws on a third. Tiedflings, a dozen of them, at least..."

"Their demons set upon me and my companions before I even knew they were there. Dretch, least of their kind, but I did not know that then. The fiends tore my horse out from under me, while their tiedfling masters called down globes of utter darkness to confound us. Claws raked my skin, though I was able to fight free, to flee, while my companions were torn apart behind me."

"They spent some time looking for me, but I knew the estate better than they, and I was able to find a hiding place. They left..."

"Everyone was dead, murdered. Most of them had been tortured. The grass in the plaza was more red than green..."

He trailed off, and after a moment started slightly, as if coming out of a dream. Then he turned to look at Mole. In the darkness his eyes were like black pits, empty.

"It is time for the dwarf's watch."

And he rose, leaving her alone without a further word.

Chapter 156

The remaining hours before the dawn passed all too quickly. Mole felt as though she'd just laid her head back down when she awoke to the sound of activity within the confines of the cave. Dannel had built the fire back up again from the remains of last night, and the smell of roasted sloth kebobs—and more importantly, hot coffee—drew her back up fully into the realm of wakefulness to face the day. Hodge, who'd taken the last watch, had retreated back into the mouth of the cave, splitting his attention between the slope outside and the meal that Arun was turning over the flames.

As she stretched and pulled on her boots and armor, she caught sight of something out of the corner of her eye. The back of the cave was littered with bones, white shards shattered into segments ranging from a few inches to over a foot in length, but among them was something incongruous, something that had drawn her special sense for detecting that which was out of the ordinary.

She walked over in that direction, careful not to step on any of the sharp pieces of bone that jutted upward. The thing that had drawn her eye looked similar to the bone fragments, but it was a wand, a smooth device of polished ivory. She drew it up and examined it.

“What have you found?” Zenna asked.

Mole took the wand over to her friend. She handed it to her in a way that made the symbol carved into its base clearly visible. The others had turned their attention to the scene now, curious.

Zenna held the wand in her slender fingers. She spoke the words of a minor cantrip, focusing a thread of magical energy into the device.

“It is depleted,” she said. “It was a healing wand, I believe. And by this carving—a gauntlet that I believe we are all familiar with—I can infer that its former owner was the man we seek.”

Morgan asked for the wand, and Zenna handed it over to him. “Well, we already suspected he’d been here, because of the silver plate,” Dannel said.

“At least it’s another clue that we are on the right track,” Zenna said. For a moment the two actually looked at each other, before Zenna turned away and busied herself rolling her bedroll and packing the rest of her gear into her light traveling pack.

Dannel sighed and moved toward the cave entrance. “I’m going to take a quick look around, make sure the trail’s clear,” he said.

“Don’t go far, and watch yourself,” Arun said without looking up from his efforts at the fire.

“Save me a kebob,” the elf said as he left.

“No promises, elf,” Hodge replied.

Mole was equally eager as she grabbed a loose piece of rag and used it to lift the small iron coffeepot from the fire. “Ah,” she said, sniffing the thick aroma coming from the spout of the pot. “So, what do you think we’ll find...”

She was interrupted as Dannel suddenly darted back into the cave. The others, seeing the look on the elf’s face, were quick to grab their weapons.

“What is it?” Hodge asked.

“There’s a good number of gnolls out there in the forest, waiting in ambush,” Dannel replied.

“Did they see you?” Morgan asked.

The elf nodded.

Frowning, Mole put the coffeepot back down. “So much for breakfast,” she grumbled.

Chapter 157

“Well, we’d best get this over with, then,” Arun said, taking the kebobs off the fire before rising and walking to where his armor was neatly piled beside his bedroll.

“Wait!” Zenna said. “I need time to prepare... I haven’t had time to memorize all of my spells yet.”

“I’d suggest you hurry then,” Morgan said, already buckling his breastplate into place across his broad chest. Hodge, already in his armor, was peering out of the cave mouth, but there was nothing moving out on the slope. Beyond, the jungle fringe hid completely whatever lay in wait.

Zenna bit back a retort, and retreated to the rear of the cave, drawing her spellbook out of her pack.

“Now that they know that we know that they’re out there, I doubt they’ll wait,” Dannel said, testing his bowstring as he gathered up his spare quivers, making sure that none of his gear impeded his movements.

As if in response to his comment, Hodge yelled, “Incomin’!”

The companions turned toward the cave entrance, in time to see a bulging, cumbersome object about the size of a human head land on the slope and bounce down to the edge of the cave mouth. It was a bundle of vegetable matter, burning, with unpleasant plumes of noxious gray smoke rising from it.

“Ugh!” Mole cried, holding her nose. “That smells worse than your cooking, Hodge!”

“They want to smoke us out of here!” Dannel said. As the elf spoke two more of the ungainly objects hurtled down the slope, fired from the cover of the adjacent jungle at the far end of the clearing. One caught in a crevice halfway down the slope and stopped, but the other landed even deeper in the cave, only a foot from where Hodge stood.

“Bah!” the dwarf said, the interjection followed by several hacking coughs as he got a good whiff of the odorous smoke. He unlimbered his axe and swung at the ball with the flat of his blade, intending to knock it back toward where it had come.

That was his intent, anyway. But as he struck the globe, it burst open in a puff of gray smoke that filled the entry of the cave, scattering bits of burning debris all around.

“Damn it, dwarf! You aid their cause!” came Morgan’s voice from the gray.

Hodge's reply was a colorful string of obscenities, but Arun's voice cut through the chaos. "All right, everyone, OUT, NOW!"

As the companions staggered out of the obscured interior of the cave, choking from the nasty vapors still seeping from the burning globes, they stepped into morning sunshine so bright that it almost blinded them—yet another advantage to their foes. A half-dozen armored gnolls were gathered at the edge of the forest trails near the top of the slope, their hyena-like features ferocious and cruel as they regarded the men and women below them. They hefted their weapons, massive pole-axes with jagged iron heads forming crescents, with sharp spear-heads at the summit of their shafts. Upon spotting the companions emerging from the cave, they barked a challenge to battle, forming a ragged line at the far side of the clearing.

Arun had already started up the hill, moving slowly but steadily across the uneven slope. Morgan, not to be undone, was only a pace behind him, drawing his glowing sword as he charged.

Dannel emerged from the smoke and quickly scanned the battlefield. "Watch out!" he cried. "They're waiting for us, it's probably a trap!"

The twang of bowstrings and the whisper of darting arrows filled the air an instant later, as concealed archers in the brush flanking the line of halberdiers opened fire. Morgan and Arun both took hits, the powerful bows of the gnoll archers penetrating their armor to dig the steel heads of their missiles into their flesh. The injuries had to be painful, but neither man interrupted his stride, continuing their headlong rush forward.

Hodge coughed and spat as he steadied himself against the uneven stones flanking the cave entrance. Seeing that his warrior comrades had left him behind, he lifted his axe and started trudging after them. Behind him, a pebble clattered down the hill above the cave, landing a pace behind the dwarf. Hodge didn't notice, slowly picking up speed as he started up the slope.

But Dannel heard the pebble, and he spun just as an arrow knifed through the air where he'd been standing. Looking up, he saw a pair of gnoll archers in positions atop the hill above the cave, settled in rocky cover a good thirty feet above them. The position—damn, I should have seen that last night, the elf thought—gave the two snipers a commanding angle of the battlefield. The second archer took aim at Hodge, and fired even as Dannel shouted a warning to the dwarf.

Hodge had no time to react, and the arrow slammed hard into the space between his shoulder blades, penetrating his armor and driving the head several inches into his torso. The critical hit drove the doughty dwarf to his knees, and he coughed again, spitting up a gob of bright red blood that splattered on the rocky soil before him.

But he did not fall. Instead, the dwarf pulled himself to his feet, swaying unsteadily for a moment before he started once more up the hill, never looking back.

Morgan grunted as another arrow glanced off of his shield with enough force to dent the thin steel plate covering its wooden frame. Ahead he saw the line of gnoll halberdiers shift their formation, forming a half-circle around the charging dwarf paladin, their weapons coming down to absorb the dwarf's rush. Arun didn't hesitate, but as he charged Morgan heard the dwarf utter a cry of battle. The words were in a language that the cleric did not speak, but he did recognize the flow of divine energy that flowed into the dwarf, who seemed to swell as the divine favor of Moradin entered him.

Morgan lifted his sword and called upon his own patron in the crystalline syllables of the Celestial tongue. Helm answered his call, and the cleric once more felt his heart sing as the world around him shrank, the seven-foot gnoll warriors becoming puny as he enlarged once more to a height of twelve feet. The morning sun blazed on his polished armor, transforming the cleric into a shining angel of destruction.

Arun crashed into the ring of blades, knocking two aside with his shield and deflecting a third with the haft of his warhammer. A spearhead glanced off of his helmet, opening a gash at his temple, but the wound was not serious. Then he was inside the reach of the long weapons, and he went to work.

Morgan rushed to the aid of the dwarf, biting off a curse of anger and pain as another arrow from the jungle ahead found him, tearing through his arm just above the greave. "Cowards!" he yelled in that direction, easily deflecting the overhead chop from the halberd of the gnoll warrior who'd turned to face him, bringing his own weapon down in a blow that clove the beast-man's shoulder down almost to its breastbone.

The gnoll crumpled, and Morgan shouted a cry of praise and triumph to his god.

Fifty paces distant, at the base of the hill, Dannel exchanged another pair of shots with the snipers in their secure positions above, darting back into cover as his shot glanced off of a boulder sheltering one of the gnoll archers. The rock overhanging the cave entrance jutted outward slightly, and in the cover thusly offered Zenna and Mole took shelter, pressed up against the cave wall.

"We've got to deal with these two, get up there and help the others," Zenna said. Her eyes were tearing from the lingering wisps of smoke.

"Make me invisible," Mole suggested. "The slope's not quite vertical, I think I can make it."

Zenna nodded and cast her spell, and the gnome vanished.

"Any more ideas?" Dannel asked her. "I think my luck's about used up." He lifted a fold of his cloak, revealing the puncture caused by the most recent arrow from above.

"Too bad it didn't hit your thick skull, that's your least vulnerable spot," she said.

"Ah, at least we're talking again, eh?" he replied, with a grin.

Zenna bit off a retort. This wasn't the time. "Draw their fire," she said. "I have a spell that should take care of one of them."

The elf nodded, and leapt out of his position of cover, dropping into a roll that ended with him coming into a crouch, his bow drawn. An arrow stabbed into the ground behind him, but even as he fired a second sank deep into his thigh.

Zenna stepped out from her position of concealment. She had none of her usual protections in place; she hadn't had the chance to renew her spells she'd used the day before. But even though one of the gnolls saw her and pointed, they couldn't reload quickly enough to defeat her magic.

She called upon the spell, drawing upon that strange power that wasn't quite magic, but was an eldritch combination of energy from within her and without. She pointed at the nearest archer, nodding to herself in satisfaction as it froze, its bow half-drawn.

She ducked back into the cave entrance, but not fast enough to escape another arrow that clipped the edge of the rock surface and scored a bright line of pain across her back. She cried out, falling back against the cave wall.

"Zenna!"

"I'm all right! Get back into cover, you fool!"

But Dannel held his ground, drawing and firing in a blur of motion. His first shot caught the enemy archer in the shoulder, causing it to drop the arrow he'd just drawn, and as he reached for another, a second shot clipped his arm, drawing blood as it passed.

Doubly wounded, the gnoll could have dropped into full cover, but it did not, instead drawing another arrow and taking aim on the injured elf. But before it could release, pain exploded through its belly, and it staggered backward. Too late it caught sight of the gnome who'd suddenly appeared at its feet.

"That's the down side of picking fights with folks smaller than you. Sometimes they're tougher than they look."

The gnoll reached for its axe, but its fingers, suddenly weak, fumbled uselessly on the handle. It tried to get up, but the gnome pressed her advantage, and soon it was over.

Arun's hammer rang out as he crushed the breastplate of a gnoll, knocking it roughly back to flop in a tangled heap on the ground. Half of the original six were down, but even as the remaining three drew back to give them room to use their cumbersome weapons against the dwarf and cleric, the brush shook and a trio of sleek, muscular gnolls darted out from cover and rushed the armored pair from behind. These three weren't as heavily armored as the others, but they moved with great speed and agility over the broken ground, and they bore battleaxes of obvious quality that cleft the air in anticipatory swathes as they joined in the attack.

Arun saw them coming out of the corner of his eye. "Back to back!" he said, rushing again at the surviving halberdiers.

Morgan moved to cover him, his enhanced size giving him reach and allowing him to strike one of the onrushing gnolls before they could get close enough to attack. He put all of his strength into the blow, but the gnoll leapt smoothly aside a heartbeat before the blade would have impacted, coming up into a smooth roll as his companions flanked the cleric. Morgan deflected the first attack with a swing of his shield, but the second drove his axe into the cleric's flank, crushing plate and releasing a jet of bright red blood from a deep gash.

The third gnoll was distracted from his rush by Hodge, who was still having a bit of difficulty, but who'd finally reached the battle through simple dogged persistence.

"Fight me, yeh... pant... bastard," he said, lifting his axe wearily.

The gnoll obliged him, coming at him in a violent rush so sudden that the dwarf barely got his shield up in time to absorb the first stroke of the axe. He tried to counter, but the gnoll was too fast, dodging back out of the way of his stroke. It drew back and snarled, its jaws twisting in what might have been a grim smile. His back felt as though it was on fire, and he could feel blood from the wound running down his spine.

"I'm not through yet," he growled, as much to convince himself as the gnoll.

The two combatants came at each other again, passing too close to evade, instead focusing on all-out assault. The edge of Hodge's axe tore a gash in the gnoll's side, but in return its stroke crushed the armor covering his shoulder, sending a steel wedge of pain down into his body. The dwarf staggered back, holding onto consciousness by only a slim margin. The gnoll, sensing victory, barked out a laugh and lifted its axe for a final strike.

The arrow sliced by so close that Hodge felt a wind pluck at his ear. The missile buried itself to the feathers in the gnoll's gut, staggering it. But it wasn't dead yet, either.

Morgan groaned as he felt a muscle in his leg tear, keeping his feet through grim determination as his two adversaries hewed at him mercilessly. The cleric had learned the hard way that these foes were too quick for the powerful but clumsy strokes he'd used to drop the first warrior, and now he was fencing with them, stabbing with short, aimed thrusts, while using his sword and shield to turn their attacks. One of the gnolls was hurt bad, a deep puncture in its shoulder, but it continued to press its attack, forcing the cleric to split his attention between the two of them, leaving him open to their attacks.

Arun took a solid hit to his side that he ignored as he barreled within the reach of the gnoll directly in front of him. The gnoll dropped his pole-arm and unlimbered an axe, but it had no chance to use the weapon before Arun caved its side in with a powerful swing of his hammer. The other two halberdiers, flanking him, swung their weapons in great arcs with their considerable strength behind the blows, hoping to crush through the dwarf's armor and mangle the muscled flesh beneath.

It was a ferocious attack, but the halberds were the product of gnoll forges, the steel of dubious quality. The dwarf's full plate armor, by contrast, was mithral, reinforced by skeins of magic. The hits were loud and the force of the blows battered the dwarf back a step, but even as the gnolls drew back their weapons for another strike Arun roared and rushed at the closest, his hammer coming down in a powerful and deadly arc toward its head.

Just five paces away, Morgan cried out as one of his opponents crushed his knee with a potent swing of its axe. His knee-guard saved the limb, but the leg nonetheless buckled, and the cleric fell. Even as he toppled, however, he lunged out and drove the length of his blade into the chest of the wounded gnoll that had struck him down. His sword stuck in the creature's chest and was torn from his hand as it fell backward, but it didn't matter, Morgan thought grimly before he handed hard and pain drove away all else. He tried to push himself up, knowing that the second gnoll would be approaching, its axe lifted to finish him, but his arms felt like lead weights, and would not respond to his commands.

"Helm..." he said, blood flecking his lips as he forced out the syllables, "Accept my sacrifice..."

A bark of pain interrupted him, and with a final heave he pushed himself over. Standing over him was his enemy, but instead of pressing its attack, it was clutching at its face, its axe forgotten at its side. As it turned, Morgan saw that half of its face had been ruined, sizzling as flesh continued to melt from its skull. Only one eye was still able to see, and through a haze of pain it focused on the helpless priest. With a roar of agony, it lifted its weapon...

"Halt."

The creature froze, trembling. Morgan recognized the word as a divine command, knew that its power would only hold the creature for a few seconds. He tried to call upon Helm, to draw upon His healing power, but the world around him was swimming in a red haze, and the words faltered on the edges of consciousness on which he teetered.

The gnoll suddenly cried out and went down, seemingly for no reason, until Morgan caught sight of a small figure that stepped into view beside his prone form.

"You don't look so good," Mole said. "Zenna!"

No, he thought, as the gnome drifted out of focus. No, not her...

The thought was the last cogent one he felt, as he tottered off the brink and fell into unconsciousness.

Chapter 158

Zenna ducked her head and slapped at the air as a bug the size of her fist flittered past, its interest in her inconclusive as it survived her barrage and continued on its way. She bit off a curse and saw Dannel's grin as he looked back at her from the head of their column. She fired off a look that bespoke grim consequences if he so much as commented, and he turned and continued down the trail.

The trail had been just as rough today as it had been on the day before when they'd first headed inland from the river. At least there were clear signs that others had come before, although the indicators of traffic that Dannel pointed out were far from reassuring. The gnolls that they'd encountered were clearly part of a larger group that frequented this region, but thankfully they had not encountered any more following that morning's battle at the cave.

She looked back covertly at Morgan, bringing up the rear of the column. The heat and arduous nature of the trek was starting to have some effect on him, she saw. Or perhaps it was the aftereffect of his injuries suffered that morning. She'd stabilized him and brought him back to consciousness with a minor healing spell, expecting no thanks and receiving none. He'd treated the rest of his wounds with his own resources, but Zenna knew from experience that being pummeled to the edge of death's door and returning was draining, no matter the benefits of healing magic.

They'd all been hurt in the brief melee, except for Mole. Hodge and Arun were both seriously wounded, and it had taken a number of charges from the healing wands that she and Dannel carried to bring them back to full health. The wand of acid arrows that she'd bought at Skie's back in Cauldron was likewise almost depleted, with at most two or three charges left in the device.

They were making as good a time as could be expected through the difficult terrain. Morgan had protected the two dwarves as well as himself with endure elements, and Zenna had prepared a similar spell for Mole as well. Dannel... well, the elf hadn't asked, and she certainly wasn't going to offer. Unfortunately the heat didn't seem to be affecting him all that much, and she was denied the satisfaction of watching him sweat.

She looked up at the sky, or rather at the thick shroud of forest canopy high above. It was starting to get dark, she thought. Her body felt like she'd been walking for days since they last rested; while the heat did not touch her, the arduousness of the trail had taken its toll upon her.

Dannel, up ahead, apparently agreed, calling a halt and coming back to address them. "There's a big tree that's fallen across the trail, up ahead," he told them. "It looks like it might be a secure place to set camp for the night."

"Hopefully more secure than last night's camp!" Mole piped in.

The men quickly and efficiently established a secure camp in the hollow below the fallen log, while Mole drew out various packages of preserved foodstuffs and began preparing the evening meal. Zenna cleared a small space that wasn't too overrun by the omnipresent bugs and sank down wearily after dropping her pack down close where she could reach it. She did not feel guilty for relying on the others to do the work of preparing the camp; they would need to have her well rested on the morrow in order to recover her spells, and while she had a certain durability to her, physically she just wasn't as well suited to carrying hefty burdens over long distances. The fact that her backpack weighed less than Arun's hammer, let alone the heavy shield and suit of full plate that he wore, was all a matter of relativity.

The night descended upon them with a startling rapidity, and it was clear that the day's hike had made an impact upon all of them, for there was little small talk as they ate their meal swiftly and retired to their bedrolls. Arun took the first watch, his keen dwarven eyes able to pierce the deep darkness of the forest floor without difficulty. They were starting to get used to the constant noises of the jungle around them, but were all still alert for the subtle differences that could indicate a more serious threat. They were all cognizant of the fact that they were outsiders here, and there were almost certainly numerous entities in this place besides the gnolls who would treat them as interlopers and respond appropriately.

Despite her exhaustion, Zenna found herself unable to sleep. After spending the better part of an hour tossing in her bedroll, she rose to a sitting position and looked around her. The darkness held no mysteries for her alien senses, and she could clearly see Arun, sitting like a stone on the edge of their camp. For all that her heritage protected her from feeling the full force of the heat, her tunic clung to her body, damp with moisture. This entire place was like a steam bath, she thought as she rose, calculating how long it would take until all of their clothes simply rotted on their bodies.

She walked over to Arun; the dwarf acknowledged her with a nod but did not shift his attention from the jungle depths all around them.

"You should get some rest," he said, his voice soft so as not to wake the others.

"I will, in a few minutes," Zenna said, although at the moment she felt as though she would never be able to sleep again. Everything had an odd tinge to it, unreal, a world of grayness in her darkvision contrasting to the vibrant colors that surrounded them in the daylight. The jungle felt like a living thing, every leaf and branch a claw turned against them. It was a morbid thought, and one that she tried to dismiss.

Arun's presence did not help dispel the dark perception of their surroundings. She knew that the paladin was a good man at heart, a devoted foe against all things evil and dark in the world, his stoic silence seemed almost to reinforce the feeling she felt building in the surrounding jungle. Normally she respected, even welcomed, his taciturn demeanor, but tonight she needed some talk, anything to drive back the ominous presence in the forest.

"Your path has taken some odd twists since you met us, has it not, Arun?"

The dwarf grunted, and his shoulders twisted slightly in what Zenna presumed was a shrug. "My road lies wherever evil is thick," he said.

"Do you ever miss... your homeland?"

The dwarf nodded. "The deep places are a part of us, in the soul of my people. Though I may be far from the great halls of the gul-dennar, those you call the golden dwarves, each time I close my eyes I can still see the majesty of those long, vaulted chambers, hewn from the living rock by generation upon generation of dwarvenkin. They say that every stone in every chamber and corridor in the dwarven halls of the the Rift sings with the heart of the dwarf who first drew its form out of the rock."

Zenna thought she detected a note of regret in the dwarf's voice as he finished, but at the same time she was moved by the obvious passion in his voice. She was used to seeing that side of him in his actions in battle, but it was a further refinement of her perceptions of him to hear him speak of his home in this way. She knew that he was an exile, though the details of his story were still nebulous to her; she made a mental note to ask Mole if she'd spoken more with Arun about his past.

"What of you, magi? Does your heart hold room for dreams of your home?"

Even though she'd suspected the question was coming, she wasn't sure how to respond. In the light of day, settled in herself, she would have had her answer ready, but here, with just the two of them together here, she felt some old feelings she'd long since banished from her heart stir inside her. Under Arun's calm, deep look, she somehow could not crush those feelings as she so often had. She cleared her throat, softly...

And as she looked up, froze.

There was something there, in the forest, not far from them, drawing closer. Unlike the vague presence that she'd felt suffusing the wood in an ambiguous sense of menace, this one was clearly something tangible, although her eyes seemed to slide off the details of its form as it drifted closer. She opened her mouth to shout a warning, but no sound came from her lips as the potency of the thing that approached swept over her like a wave.

Arun sensed it too, and rose in a sudden jerk, before a look of wonder crossed his features and his hammer fell forgotten to his side.

Chapter 159

It was a woman, clad in a gown of shimmering white, possessed of an unearthly beauty that momentarily caught Zenna and Arun up in its grasp. As she drew near to them, her feet seeming to barely brush the ground as she walked, a soft white light spread outward from her, transforming the sinister gray jungle night into a warm glow of bright greens and earthy browns. Her eyes blazed with ancient power and knowledge, but there was also a look of melancholy about her, Zenna thought, as she pushed through her initial shock and regained control of herself.

"Who... who are you?" she asked.

"I am one with the Light," she said, her voice like a joyous melody, brushing over their senses like a caress. "My name, such as you mortals use them, is Nidrama."

"A celestial," Arun breathed.

She nodded to him. "Hail to thee, servant of the Forger." And to Zenna, "And to thee, shadowed one. I offer my respect to you for the deeds wrought by you and your companions... the recovery of the children of Cauldron, holding back the floods, defending the city against rampaging monsters."

“So you have been watching us,” Zenna said. She glanced over her shoulder at their companions, but the others were still asleep, their faces limned in the soft glow coming from Nidrama.

“Powerful forces of chaos and evil are afoot. I dare not remain here long lest my presence attract the attention of those forces. Yet I could not sit by and watch you march into danger without warning you. The Lord of the Demonskar knows of your approach, and even now his minions prepare for your arrival. They shall use deceit and treachery against you, just as they have done with Alek Tercival before you. You must remain resolute; Alek Tercival must be saved.”

“I have no aid to offer you but knowledge. In ages past, I provided to Surabar Spellmason a powerful weapon to assist him in his conflict with the Lord of the Demonskar. This was Alakast, a quarterstaff infused with an undying hatred of the fiends of the outer rifts. Unfortunately, Alakast was stolen centuries ago, ripped from Spellmason's tomb by a grave robber. Yet do not despair, for it is fated that Alakast should be wielded again against the Lord of Demonskar. It has found its way to you, and all that needs be done is for you to claim it. Seek Alakast in the lair of my false sisters, beyond the watchful eyes of the north.”

“That is all that I am at liberty to say... I wish you well in your travails, heroes, and never lose sight of your goals.”

The celestial rose slowly up into the air, until she was hovering three feet above the jungle floor. “Wait!” Zenna said, a dozen questions bursting into her mind, but even as the word echoed around her, Nidrama was gone.

Chapter 160

“I am not saying that she was false,” Morgan said. “I am merely suggesting that... whatever she was, she may have... altered... your perceptions.”

Zenna shook her head, but did not respond; she'd already made her feelings known in their discussion earlier that morning. Arun, however, was not so reluctant.

“She was a celestial,” he said with finality, ending the argument that they'd had since that morning in their camp, when Zenna and Arun had shared the news of Nidrama's visit with the others.

Morgan subsided, but Zenna could tell that he still bore doubts. Zenna thought that she understood his feelings; the cleric's initial reaction to the news had betrayed a deep disappointment, that a heavenly being would choose to appear to others in the group, rather than to him. To her, in particular. In the face of this rejection, perhaps it was easier to deny the reality of what had happened, to suggest that somehow the visit by the celestial was a false vision, something to confound and mislead them.

On the other hand, they could not afford to reject the warning brought by the deva. With a confirmation that Alek Tercival might indeed lie at the end of this road, they also had to deal with the threat confronted by this “Lord of the Demonskar” she had referenced. A major demon of some sort, Zenna surmised, from the clues Nidrama had given and from what she knew of the history of this place. She knew something of such things, from the tales of her father and his companions. And she carried the blood of demons in her veins...

She shook her head, angry at herself for allowing such thoughts to creep into the disciplined corridors of her mind. No, she would need control, with what lie ahead.

The trail had begun to rise shortly after they'd departed their camp that morning, although it was still negotiable without undue hazard. By midmorning they began to notice ruins shrouded by the jungle, nothing more than a few stone blocks or shattered flagstones overgrown with weeds and other growth. Everything was crumbling with great age. Arun examined the remnants of an ancient pillar, and frowned, although he did not share his thoughts with the others.

"What's that?" Mole asked, drawing their attention up ahead.

The trail moved up a steady incline to a clearing, the far side of which was a rough-edged cliff perhaps thirty feet in height. Above them, beyond the cliffs, they could see the jagged outline of a high ridge through the jungle canopy; the outer rim of the Demonskar.

But what drew their focus was a large, dark opening, perhaps twenty feet across, in the cliff wall. Too regular to be natural, the opening was almost perfectly round, like a giant sewer pipe that had been broken off in some cataclysm.

"The round cave," Dannel said, drawing their thoughts back to the silver plate he carried.

"And beyond, Vaprak's Voice," Mole added, remembering the rest of the crudely etched map.

"This 'Vaprak' don't sound like no friendly sort," Hodge grunted.

"He is the god of the ogres, and no, he's not friendly," Zenna told him.

For a moment, they stood there, drawing in their courage as they faced the dark opening that progressed who knew how far into the earth.

"That doesn't look very appealing," Mole finally said.

"Well, it isn't going to get any easier by us standing here," Arun finally said, starting toward the tunnel.

"Wait!" Zenna hissed. The others all turned toward her in alarm.

"What is it?" Dannel asked, an arrow already fitted to his bow.

"Shhh... cannot you feel it?" They looked around, but could not see what had alerted the tiefling. "We are not alone here."

In response, a harsh, guttural laughter sounded from the forest edge, near the mouth of the huge pipe. It was echoed a moment later by another, deeper rumbling from within the dark opening, the hollow tunnel building and distorting the sound until it shook their souls to hear it.

Morgan's glowing sword slid from its scabbard with an expectant hiss. "A welcoming party," he said.

"There!" Zenna said, pointing.

They turned to see what she had seen, as its cloak of invisibility slid off from it like a slick of oil, revealing a monstrosity perched atop the jutting edge of the pipe, twenty feet above them. It had the look of a giant ape, but even before they heard the sick laughter that rumbled in its chest, they knew that what they looked upon was no natural creature. Its body was a knot of muscles and jutting edges of bone, and its black claws that clutched the pipe were rivaled only by the long teeth that protruded from its over-sized jaws. Its eyes were pinpricks of red light that flared malevolently as they stared down at the companions.

The demon laughed once more, and then attacked.

Chapter 161

Even as the bar-igura demon cackled its monstrous laugh, Dannel drew, aimed, and fired. The steel-tipped arrow found its target, knifing through the giant ape-demon.

The creature was unaffected; the arrow had simply vanished into it without a trace.

Zenna was the first to realize what had happened. "It's an illusion," she warned. "Remember the noises—in the forest!"

The companions looked around for the inevitable assault, but before they could act the world around them was plunged into shadowy darkness. Voices filled the darkness, calling out, seeking direction, and again it was Zenna, who was all too used to the power of the darkness spell, who cut through the din with a warning. "Spread out... get outside of the radius of the spell!"

She heard the clink of metal and the trod of footsteps that indicated that the others were moving, but over that she could discern the clear voice of Morgan, calling upon the power of his god. She did not speak Celestial, but she could see the results a moment later as a brilliant shine of daylight exploded from his uplifted sword, banishing the darkness and filling the clearing with its radiant glow. The light revealed the companions spread out in a ring, facing outward as they had each sought their own way out of the darkness.

Unfortunately it also revealed a trio of bar-igura demons, already closing in on them with great loping strides.

The ape-demons had been drawn to the loudest of them, and two hurled themselves at Arun and Hodge, leaping upon the dwarves to rend with claws and bite. The third was making a beeline for Morgan, although it drew back as the bright light erupted out from his sword, snarling as the holy light burned its eyes.

The cleric saw it, and turned to face the demon, lowering the sword until it pointed toward its chest. "Prepare to be sent back to the pits of the Abyss, demon!" he shouted.

Arun barely had time to lift his hammer before a demon leapt onto him, its weight threatening to bear him to the ground beneath it. With a dwarvish cry he drove it back with his shield, giving himself enough room to wield his hammer. Pain shot up from his hip where the demon's claw had slammed into him with crushing force, but the demon's other attacks had been turned by his magical armor and shield. But his elation turned into concern as his hammer glanced harmlessly off the magical hide of the bar-Igura, the creature's unholy laughs reinforcing the futility of the attack.

Hodge, on the other hand, had a magical weapon, but he also was less fortunate in the face of the second demon's rush. A claw clipped the side of his head, opening a bloody gash across his temple, and as he tried to raise his shield the bar-Igura tore his arm aside and bit down on his exposed shoulder. Hodge cried out in pain, and tried to chop at it with his axe, managing only a feeble blow that failed to penetrate its hide.

Zenna realized that her spells would be of little use against these foes; the same resistances to elemental energy that she possessed would be shared by them, only in greater potency. Instead she ran to where Dannel was trying to take aim on the demon savaging Hodge. The elf looked up at her in puzzlement, but she ignored him and reached out to touch his bow, drawing upon her power as she did so.

"That might help," she said.

Dannel nodded and took aim, releasing a shot that caught the demon high in the shoulder. The arrow, imparted with magical power through the bow by the agency of Zenna's magic weapon spell, sank into the demon's hide. The bar-Igura roared in pain, but the attack only made it redouble the violence of its assault upon Hodge.

Morgan took advantage of his adversary's pause to call upon Helm once more, enlarging himself to twelve feet in height. He took a step toward the demon, but it grinned as it called upon its own fell power, stripping away the cleric's spells, causing him to shrink back to his normal size, and the brilliant light upon his blade to fade to its normal pale glow. Barking out a foul laugh, it charged toward the priest.

Arun, recognizing that he had little chance against his foe with his mundane warhammer, held his ground against another vicious all-out assault from the demon. He shrugged off painful blows that tore skin and bruised muscle beneath his armor, but he avoided the creature's powerful grasp, and drove it back again with a powerful shove of his shield. Rather than pressing his advantage with another attack, however, he stepped back and called upon the power of Moradin, asking his patron to bless his hammer. He felt the divine surge of energy pass through him into the weapon, but before he could attack the demon was on him again, biting and clawing.

Hodge found himself hard-pressed, unable to find a moment's respite against the demon's ferocious assault. He felt his body weaken as it ripped at him again with its claws and bite, tearing another gash along the side of his jaw, one black claw narrowly missing his eye. He stumbled back, knowing that another hit would finish him, but to his surprise the demon suddenly roared and drew itself up to its full height, clutching at its back.

Mole had entered the fray, giving the dwarf the opportunity to stagger back, blood oozing from his several wounds. Unfortunately for her, the noble gesture drew the demon's full ire upon her, and its claws seemed huge as they reached down for her diminutive form.

"Back off!" Zenna yelled at it, firing a brilliant spray of colors into its face. She could feel the demon's innate resistance fighting her spell, but was gratified as she saw it hesitate, momentarily confused by the color spray. But she knew that the spell would only stun it for a few seconds... and she had no further magic with which to hinder it.

That was okay for Mole, who fearlessly darted in and stabbed it again with her tiny sword, knowing full well what would happen when it recovered.

Morgan met the demon in a violent charge. The holy knight's sword sang as it cleaved the air, biting deeply into the side of the bar-Igura, drawing great orbs of black ichor that steamed as they hit the ground, instantly charring the surrounding vegetation into ash. The demon countered with its own furious assault, but the cleric's magical armor absorbed most of the strikes, leaving him virtually unscathed.

Arun took another hit from a claw that drove pain through his armor, but now, as he lifted the hammer infused with the power of his god, the demon looked in his eyes and knew fear. The hammer slammed into its shoulder with the force of an avalanche, snapping bones and driving the demon backward. Heavily wounded, it yet had fight left in it, and it snarled as it leapt up and charged him again, seeking either its own destruction or the utter annihilation of the man who dared to stand before it.

Mole cried out as the demon seized her in its claws, grabbing her and thrusting her into its huge, gaping maw. The rogue managed to twist in its grasp, however, and instead of chomping down on gnome flesh, its jaws closed on empty air as Mole kicked off its nose and broke free, somersaulting in the air to land on her feet. She was hurt, though, and without the advantage of surprise, there was little she could hope to do to it with her non-magical and tiny sword.

But before the demon could rush forward and tear her to pieces, it staggered as a long arrow slammed into its side. The demon spun, its face a rictus of fury, but before it could respond to the attack a second arrow found its throat, sinking to the feathers in the demon's neck. Black ichor ran in a torrent from the wound down the creature's chest, dripping through its matted black fur, causing its body to glisten in the bright morning light. It let out a cough, and then, slowly, toppled backward.

Morgan's blade still shone brightly despite the black demonic blood that now marked most of its length. The demon had turned to brute force to overwhelm this foe, but the cleric's shield always seemed there to turn a claw, and the snapping jaws were met again and again by a sweep of the shining sword. Finally, the demon darted back and called upon its power, seeking to lay some terrible spell upon the priest.

But the power, whatever its nature, faltered against the grim will of the Helmite, and as he strode forward the mighty sword came down once more, and ended it.

Arun's breath burned in his chest as the demon pressed its attack again. The two combatants exchanged blows that drove through hide and armor alike, but neither faltered in the face of destruction. The demon drove the paladin back with a blow that crushed the dwarf's weapon arm, threatening his grip on his weapon. As Arun drew back to regain control of the hammer, the bar-Igura howled and leapt atop him, its jaws opening in a huge arc to enfold his face and rip it from his torso.

But the paladin stood his ground, and as the gaping maw drew down upon its target, Arun drove the hammer with his full strength into the fetid opening. The demon choked as teeth exploded and the hammer's broad head crushed its throat, but the sound drew off into a gurgle as the force of its charge combined with the dwarf's strength drove the weapon up through its head and into the tangled mess of corruption that served as its brain.

Relative quiet returned to the clearing as the companions drew together, facing the bodies of the three slain demons, the only sound the soft chants of healing spells. Morgan was the first to turn toward the dark opening of the pipe, after calling upon the power of Helm to purge his wounds and wiping the demon-blood off of his sword with an old rag.

"Let us be about this, then," he said, leading them into the darkness, the light of his sword showing them the way.

Chapter 162

Zenna woke with a sense of clarity that was so stark, it was nearly painful. It was a sensation directed inward rather than outward; in fact she did not at first register the switch from subconscious to conscious perception, or that she was lying in her bedroll, looking up at the curving surface of the ancient pipe above her.

Excitement pulsed in her veins as awareness filled her. Yes, it's so simple, she thought. The clear meaning of what Esbar Tolerathkas had tried to tell her had suddenly become fully evident to her... that the two powers she wielded, the arcane lyrics of magic contained in her spellbook, and the divine rituals she drew upon through her meditations... two sides of the same coin, anchored together in the oneness that was her being, her perception...

She finally looked to the side, saw Hodge keeping watch, a short distance away. That meant that there were at least a few hours of rest left, but despite the weariness of her physical body, her mental side was too flush with anticipation for sleep to reclaim her. Instead she lay there, running down corridors in her mind that had been shadowy, unknown before, but which now gleamed brightly with the shining light of revelation.

Finally, silently, she rose. Leaving her spellbook for now, she instead knelt and began her meditations. Her suspicions were confirmed as new avenues of power opened up before her.

Zenna had taken the first step down the path of the mystic theurge.

* * * * *

No hostile creatures emerged to threaten them during their rest in the dark fastness of the underground tunnel-pipe. Nonetheless, their rest was uneasy, due in no small part to the noise.

They had first detected the sound the previous day, on their second hour of trudging through the dark passage of the pipe. The pipe seemed to descend into the very depths of the earth, occasionally branching into side-corridors that they avoided, following the crude markings on the silver plate map. The sound was faint at first, a whistling through the corridors from very far away. It came and went with regularity, lasting a few minutes each time, and each time it grew just a bit louder, as they pressed on through the subterranean tunnels.

“Vaprak’s Voice, I’d presume,” Dannel had commented, upon one incidence of the sound.

“He doesn’t sound like he’s happy we’re visiting,” Mole had replied.

By the time they’d paused to set camp, the sound was a constant presence, loud enough to force them to raise their voices to speak when it came. They adapted to it, though, weariness giving them the ability to sleep through the disturbing phenomenon.

The next day they pressed onward, with Morgan’s sword drawn to give those without darkvision sufficient light to see by. The sound continued to grow louder as they progressed, until they could not speak at all during the minutes it filled the pipe with its echo. Finally, they saw a light up ahead, a pinprick in the distance that grew larger as they approached, until it was clear that they’d reached the end of the tunnel.

Just as they reached the opening, the loud wailing sound started up again, and for a full minute they huddled in the sides of the tunnel, barraged by the full force of Vaprak’s Voice. It was clear that the sound originated in the movement of winds through the pipes, and the large canyon that stretched out before them, but that did not reduce the supernatural horror inherent in the terrible cacophony. Mole, with her sensitive gnomish ears, was the worst affected, and she huddled against the side of the corridor for almost a minute after the sound faded, clutching her ears.

“Mole, maybe it would be best if you plugged up your ears with something,” Zenna suggested.

“No, it’s all right, I can handle it,” Mole replied. “I don’t want the first warning we have of bad guys creeping up on us to be a sword stuck through someone’s gut.”

She moved up to the lip of the pipe, joining Dannel and Morgan who were already scanning what lay ahead. The dwarves, who both seemed a bit more cautious of heights, remained a short distance back from the uneven edge.

The pipe opened at the edge of a long, broad canyon that stretched out ahead of them in wide terraces that generally rose up to a crest far in the distance. The terraces were like steps sized for titans, promising a difficult course if they were to progress in that direction. The pipe jutted from a cliff wall some forty feet above the canyon floor; a narrow, treacherous path led down along the cliff to their right. Almost directly below them they could see a pool full of thick, bubbling liquid. Noxious fumes rose from the pool, making them light-headed even this far up.

“Ugh, for once I am not grateful for having the gnomish gift of good hearing and smelling,” Mole said, holding her nose.

“That path doesn’t look all too safe,” Dannel said. “We’d better get a rope, and take our time.”

“The paladin may be in dire danger,” Morgan reminded him. “We cannot afford excessive delay.”

“Well, if you slip and fall into the pool, you won’t be helping him much,” Dannel said plainly. The point was too sensible to argue, so the cleric subsided.

It took them nearly a half-hour to navigate the difficult path down to the canyon floor, but their caution was rewarded as several of them stumbled and would have taken the quick way down but for the guide rope that Dannel and Mole strung along the route, attaching it to sturdier boulders along the way. The Voice came and went again during their trip, but they simply waited it out, continuing once the winds had died down. There was a loud whistle from the pool below during their descent, but it was apparently another trick of sound, for nothing hostile emerged to trouble them.

With the noise, stench, and the need to focus on their descent, none of them noticed the small creature that crept out of the pool and flew up toward the western wall of the canyon opposite them.

Dannel reached the bottom of the steeply descending path first, and after securing the rope to a nearby pillar of rock, he slipped out into the canyon, scanning the area for any signs of danger.

“Ah,” he said to himself almost immediately, drawing back to await the others.

Once they had all gathered safely, and Mole had reclaimed her rope, the elf reported what he’d seen.

“It looks like our foes may be expecting guests after all,” he told them, directing their attention to the far side of the canyon. There was a breach in the cliff walls there, a crevice that ran several dozen yards into the rock beyond. There, at the point where the breach began to narrow, they could see a huge iron portcullis blocking a corridor that appeared to lead deeper into the mountain beyond. The massive construct stood nearly twenty feet tall and eight feet wide, and while it did not look to be of exceptional quality in its manufacture, its sheer bulk made it a considerable obstacle.

Warily, the companions crossed the canyon, staying close to the cliff walls when they could, until they had reached the entrance of the breach.

“No guards,” Hodge said, looking around as though he expected enemies to burst from the stones at any moment.

“None that we can see,” Morgan corrected him.

“Look,” Mole said, drawing their attention upward. “There’s a little hold up there.”

They saw that she was right; a small opening, maybe a pace across, was visible a short distance above the top of the portcullis.

“A spy-hole,” Dannel suggested, drawing back the arrow he held in his bow, as if testing the potential for a shot.

“Well, if there’s bad guys beyond there, they already know we’re here,” Mole said, with a slight undertone of excitement that Zenna immediately recognized as a sign that the gnome had a plan brewing. Her suspicion was confirmed a moment later as Mole went on, “I suppose there’s only one way for us to find out...”

The elf caught on quickly too; he’d been around Mole long enough to know her ways. Shaking his head slightly, he opened his pouch and pulled out the magical slippers he carried therein. Mole was already taking off her boots.

“Just a quick look,” Zenna cautioned sternly. “Don’t risk yourself; we won’t be able to help you if there’s trouble.”

Mole put on a long-suffering look and nodded. “Yes, Mother. Don’t worry, I’ll just take a look, maybe see if there’s a counterweight for the portcullis.” Her eyes brightened, as though something had just occurred to her. “You know, I’d probably have a much better chance, if I was invisible...”

Zenna had to work to conceal her grin as she focused her thoughts on the incantation needed to invoke the spell.

With the others waiting in at least slight cover amidst a pile of boulders near the canyon wall, the invisible rogue spider climbed her way up the rugged cliff face. The surface was uneven and dangerous with loose stones half-buried in the sheer ascent, but Mole was light and a veteran climber, and the magical slippers she’d borrowed from Dannel made the climb a matter of child’s play for her. Soon she’d reached the small opening, which on close examination looked a bit snug even for her. Luckily she was fairly good at getting through small spaces, so after making sure her gear was secured and out of the way she crawled through.

And looked up into the face of trouble.

Oh, dear, she thought.

Chapter 163

“There’s three of them, in a little room up above, and there’s a balcony on the far side that overlooks the corridor below, beyond the portcullis. There’s a winch on the wall, but it looks like it would take all of you men working together to even budge it.”

The six of them had withdrawn a short distance back down the canyon, so that they would out of the direct line of sight from the portcullis and the spy-hole above. Though it seemed doubtful now that the hole was used as a vantage by the guards.

After all, for them it was at ankle-level.

“Three hill giants,” Arun said. “That will be... difficult.”

“We’ve come too far to give up now,” Morgan said softly.

“I wasn’t suggesting we give up,” Arun replied, his own voice level.

“If you men can hold off comparing the size of your egos for a moment, I need to think,” Zenna said.

“I’d wager that there’s more guardians down the corridor, at ground level,” Dannel said. “Otherwise the giants wouldn’t be a sufficient deterrent, as you could sunder the portcullis and simply run through until the angle of the corridor cut off their line of fire. There may even be an additional barrier further on.”

“I don’t like it,” Hodge growled. “It be far too neat—giants, ‘specially them hill brutes, ain’t known fer their strategizin’, and certainly not fer buildin’ fancy-all forts.”

“Agreed,” Dannel said. “There must be someone—or something—behind them, calling the shots.”

“Well then, we must fight through the rabble until we can reach the leader, and destroy him,” Morgan said, his hand tightening on the grip of his sword.

“One thing at a time,” Arun said. “The portcullis, and the giants above.”

“I could deal with one, maybe two,” Mole said with gravity. “But not three at once, no way.”

“You!” Hodge snorted. “Yer might be able ter pop a boil on the foot o’ one, with that little sticker o’ yers, but ‘e’s just as like to step on yer by mistake!”

“My sword was sufficient against the dragon in Bhal-Hamatugn, and that demon that was tearing you to pieces yesterday,” Mole said, putting her hands on her hips and facing the dwarf with an indignant expression.

“Well, she does have you there,” Dannel said, nudging the dwarf with a grin.

Hodge glared at the elf, then at Mole, then threw up his arms and turned away. “Gnomes!” he said, gruffly, but there was an undercurrent of something else that was not unfriendly in his voice.

“And let us not forget who brought this vital intelligence to the group,” Mole added.

“We are grateful for your aid, small one,” Morgan said respectfully. “And your sword will be welcome in the forthcoming battle.”

“Any ideas?” Dannel asked, looking at Zenna.

Zenna shook her head. “I’m afraid my powers don’t offer an easy answer for this situation,” she admitted. She fixed him with a stare, waiting for him to make a jibe at the expense of her honesty, but he only nodded.

Arun rose and lifted his hammer. “Then we do things the plain, old-fashioned way—full-on frontal assault.” Morgan nodded, in full agreement.

Gods help us, Zenna thought, shaking her head.

Chapter 164

They made their way cautiously back to the breach in the canyon wall, weapons in hand, all of their senses alert for any sign of danger. They knew that even if their enemies were not yet aware of their presence, a wager none of them would have taken, they soon would be.

Up close, the portcullis looked even more imposing than it had earlier. “That’s not gunna come down easy,” Hodge said.

“But it will come down,” Arun said, stepping forward, hefting his hammer.

“If you will let the blessing of Helm aid your efforts?” Morgan said, coming forward to stand beside him. Arun nodded, and the cleric called upon his patron, infusing the dwarf with strength and enlarging him until he stood nearly ten feet in height, his hammer transformed into a huge maul.

Dannel, having reclaimed his magic slippers from Mole, darted up the side of the cliff, finding a sheltered position in a rough niche in the rock where he could fire arrows into the corridor beyond the portcullis from relative security. The others drew back, but not far, covering their companion as he stepped up to the iron grille.

“Moradin, grant your servant the strength to prevail against evil,” Arun whispered in dwarvish. Already bolstered by Morgan’s spells, he felt a thrill of power as the divine favor of his patron came at his call.

The dwarf laid aside his shield, and took up his hammer with both hands.

The sound of the impact echoed throughout the canyon.

Zenna glanced around the edge of the boulder behind which she’d taken cover to see that the first blow had told upon the barrier, with a visible dent in one of the iron bars. But the dwarf did not stop with one blow. His arms were a blur as he rained assault upon assault against the portcullis, until the noise coming from the portcullis rivaled the blast of Vaparak’s Voice. The thought reminded her of something. Damn, we should have waited until the winds sounded! But it was too late to remedy that mistake now, and she doubted anyway that anything within a mile could have failed to hear the sound of Arun’s pounding upon the portcullis.

In the interval between blows she heard deep voices, coming from above. The giants, she realized. Not speaking their language, she did not know what they were saying, but she could tell that they were agitated. And no wonder, with a ten-foot dwarf laying waste to their outer defenses.

Arun lowered his hammer. The portcullis was a ruin, battered into a wreck of twisted metal, and the dwarf reached out and levered it aside, forming an opening wide enough even for him in his augmented size, if just barely.

Then Zenna caught sight of huge forms moving in the corridor beyond, approaching the barrier. Arun saw them as well, she saw, and he quickly recovered his hammer.

No, don’t charge! she thought, knowing that the giants above were waiting to pulverize an opponent entering the corridor with boulders from above.

The dwarf apparently recognized the same thing, and he held his ground, even moving back a pace to force their enemies to wedge through the remains of the portcullis, and to give him room to more effectively wield his hammer. Morgan and Hodge had moved out of cover to support the dwarf. Mole had disappeared somewhere, and Zenna belatedly followed the others, keeping an eye on the small opening above in case the giants were somehow able to mount an attack from that unlikely quarter.

Dannel opened fire from his high perch, sending arrows into the dark tunnel. The lumbering figures continued their approach, and as they entered the light, the companions saw what confronted them. They stood a good thirteen feet tall, clad in mangy, filthy hides, bearing massive morningstars and huge javelins.

And they had two heads.

Ettins, five of them, and the canyon walls shook with their coming.

Chapter 165

The lead ettin saw the mangled barrier and the huge dwarf behind it, and hesitated. While the two-headed giants were not cowardly creatures, within their dim minds they knew that they were not as powerful as true giants, and they preferred to attack from ambush rather than rushing headlong into battle with a difficult adversary.

Arun was having none of it, however. "Come on then, you blasted cowards!" he shouted, his words filling the tunnel. His challenge was accompanied by a withering barrage of missiles from his friends, several of which struck the lead creature.

The ettins could not easily retreat, motivated by fear of their masters, and so they charged, their terrible morningstars blasting shards of rock from the sides of the tunnel as they moved single-file through the relatively narrow passage.

The first ettin crashed into the remnants of the portcullis, pushing it aside with a powerful sweep of its massive left arm. As it forced through the barrier, its right arm, independently controlled by its second head, lifted its morningstar to pulverize Arun with a violent overhead blow.

That blow never landed, however. As the ettin pushed through the gap in the portcullis and straightened to its full height, an arrow vanished into the right side of its hairy, muscled chest, followed a moment later by a hurled javelin that pierced its left side. The wounds stung it, but even as it began its attack against Arun, the paladin's massive hammer came around in a powerful two-handed arc that connected mightily with the creature's side a foot above its waist. The ettin absorbed the blow, its own counterstroke falling uselessly aside. It tried to recover, but Arun's blow, driven by his enhanced strength and own skill, had done too much damage to the interior of the monster. It stumbled, and fell back hard, both heads gasping out its last as it clutched at its ruined side.

But the doom of their comrade gave the other four creatures time to full enter the fray. The heavy, ruined gate came crashing down as two ettins struck it, and Arun had to retreat to avoid being crushed under its falling bulk. Morgan and Hodge, their missile weapons now discarded in favor of sword and axe, rushed in to try and pin them in the relatively narrow opening, to hold the last two at bay and to make it more awkward for them to use their giant weapons. But the ettins were double the height and many times the weight of the defending warriors, and the two were forced inexorably back as they withstood the powerful swings from those heavy morningstars.

Dannel's bow sang as he fired arrow after arrow from his perch, just above the reach of the ettins. Some of his arrows stuck in the mangy hides that the ettins wore as armor, but the sheer volume of his barrage meant that many more would score hits. He targeted the creature on the right, the one facing Hodge, shooting an arrow into its thick arm a moment after it blasted the dwarf with a powerful blow. Hodge had caught the impact of the spiked ball on his shield, but it was clear from the way that he staggered backward several steps that he'd nonetheless felt it.

Zenna had loaded her crossbow, but she knew that the small weapon would have little effect against creatures of this size. Instead she called upon her magic, speaking the words that evoked a coruscating searing ray that erupted in a bright shaft of flame that she directed at the ettin facing Hodge. She aimed high at its chest to avoid jeopardizing the dwarf. The creature was huge and slow, so there was virtually no chance that she could miss.

Except that she did. The line of flame went high, slicing through the air between the creature's heads. The ettin was startled but unharmed by the display, and it only took a moment before it refocused on Hodge, lifting both morningstars to strike again, ignoring another arrow that poked painfully into its shoulder.

But the arrows and the missed spell had distracted the giant for a moment, long enough for Hodge to recover. And even as it looked down at him again, it was too slow to react as Hodge ran in, and with a nasty curse took the ettin's leg off at the knee with a single powerful swing of his axe. The ettin fell, stumbling into its fellow, who in turn was finding itself equally hard pressed.

As Arun had dodged back to avoid the falling grate, Morgan did not hesitate to fill the gap, although the ettin stood more than twice his height. A heavy morningstar ball came down with a crushing blow that glanced off his shoulder, sending a sharp stab of pain through the cleric's torso. But Morgan was once again lost in the glorious song of Helm's might, and ran in close enough to thrust his sword into the creature's belly. The thick layers of hide that the giant wore turned what would have been a disemboweling thrust into a mere scratch, but it was clear from its twin roars that the thrust was painful nonetheless. The cleric stood his ground as the creature unleashed both of its arms in a pair of attacks that battered him, but when both spiked balls had rebounded from their hits the cleric still stood, battered but determined.

"You've had yours, giant, now feel the fury of Helm's justice!"

The ettin didn't like the feel of Helm's justice, but he was even more concerned by the giant dwarf who rushed back into the fray, bringing with him that massive hammer.

The last two ettins found themselves momentarily blocked from entering the melee due to the confines of the narrow crevice and the violence of the melee wrought and wrought upon their companions ahead. They carried heavy spears, javelins the size of lances that they hurled at the nearest target they could see. In the case of the one of the left, that was Dannel, dangling from the cliff above. Fortunately for the elf the ettin was anything but agile, and both spears missed, one bouncing off of the cliff face a pace from where Dannel had positioned himself. The elf saw the giant, and with his companions doing well against the front two, he shifted his aim to return fire. Dannel's assault proved far more effective than that of the giant, and soon the creature had two arrows stuck in its chest, trailing blood.

The last giant was close enough to see Zenna's fire pass above it, harmless but yet a warning of what might be coming. It lifted a javelin to fire at her, but its comrade before it was blocking its line of sight. Then Hodge's attack took off its leg, and as it fell, the ettin took advantage of the opening to throw.

Zenna had not forgotten to raise her defenses, however, and while the throw was unusually accurate, at the last moment it was turned by the layered defense of her shield and mage armor.

The ettin, frustrated, stepped forward to do battle, but it failed to mark the tiny form that had crept into the tunnel from outside. It paid for that oversight a moment later, as its next step shot an explosion of pain up through its foot, through its leg, into its body. Mole had rolled unseen into its path, carefully judging its stride, extending her arm and holding her sword point-up, its hilt braced against the floor, right where the massive foot was descending. The ettin hopped back in pain, the sword stuck to the crossbar in its foot, trying to avoid putting weight on the injured member. It never saw Mole, who quietly retreated back into a position of cover just outside of the tunnel entrance, already reaching for her crossbow.

It was increasingly clear how this battle was going to end. Even as Hodge finished the one he'd de-limbed, Morgan sank his sword to the hilt in the one that he and Arun faced, and it crumpled. The two still in the corridor, one still trying to get at the tiny steel barb sunk into its foot, realized that the speed with which the first three of their fellows had been dispatched boded ill for them, and they started to fall back. Morgan started after them, but Arun drew them up short, pointing with his hammer up at the balcony that they could not see from this angle, but which knew was above, and the giants that no doubt were waiting for them to show themselves.

"We just let them get away then?" the cleric asked angrily.

In answer Arun only glanced at his companions, who were continuing the assault in their own way. Dannel put his fourth arrow into the ettin he'd been targeting, but as it moved out of sight further down the corridor he turned his aim onto the one still hobbling behind it, adding insult to injury as he sank a shot into the calf of its unwounded leg. Mole and Zenna were both adding their own fire, although it wasn't clear if any of their shots scored hits.

The cleric looked like he might defy them all and rush off in pursuit anyway, but Arun placed his huge hand upon the man's shoulder. "The battle is far from over, priest. You are seriously injured, and Hodge as well. Let us take advantage of these few moments, while we have them."

Recognizing the wisdom of the dwarf's words, Morgan finally nodded. They withdrew a short distance back to their position of cover, where spell and wand again offered soothing relief from the injuries of battle. The spell of growth affecting Arun wore off, and he returned to his normal size. Dannel had returned from his perch atop the cliffs, but he continued to keep a close eye on the tunnel mouth.

Their healing power, wielded by Zenna, Dannel, and Morgan, was potent, and it took less than a minute for them to treat the party's injuries.

"Well, now what?" Mole asked. "One of them giants still has my sword stuck in his foot, and I want it back."

The companions shared a look.

“As our esteemed knight would remind us, we’ve come this far,” Dannel said. He’d reloaded his quiver from the spare he kept slung across his back, and now tested his bowstring, making sure it was ready for resumed hostilities.

“Them giants’ probably still up there, waitin’ for us to make a move,”

“I’m sure they are,” Zenna said. “In fact, I’m counting on it.”

They turned to her. “So, you have a plan?” Mole said.

The wizard shrugged. “Well, they may be strong... but the way I look at it, you can’t hit what you can’t see.”

And she smiled knowingly.

Chapter 166

For the third time, the companions returned to the dark corridor leading into the cliffs.

They were quiet, but Zenna knew that their passage would not go unnoticed, not with three armored men in the company. But that wouldn’t matter, if her plan worked. The only concern was being cut off, since her stratagem only provided a way in, not a route back...

Well, if it came to that they would confront it when it happened. The others had agreed, and were set on pressing their advantage, to face the unknown together.

The dark tunnel was quiet, as they moved into position. Zenna turned and tapped Arun’s shoulder; the dwarf nodded. She didn’t bother to confirm with Morgan; as long as he waited for her signal, she couldn’t have cared less what he did.

She waited for what she knew was coming. A minute passed, slow and heavy. Someone behind her shifted, a faint sound of metal clattering on metal disturbing the stillness. When she finally heard it, the rising moan that indicated the latest resumption of Vaprak’s Voice, she began casting her spells.

A loud roaring echo to the windy sound of the Voice rose up above them. Zenna hoped that between the noise in the tunnels and her ghost sound, the giants above wouldn’t have a chance of hearing them.

Now, to make sure they don’t see us, she thought, calling upon her second spell.

The upper half of the corridor became filled with a dark, cloying mist, within which drifted sinister forms and shapes, huge claws forming and dissolving a terrible thread of motion. Even though she knew it was an illusion, she felt a grim shudder at the impression of what she had wrought, and hoped that the giants responded in kind.

She felt Arun issue a command, and Clinger, the paladin’s giant celestial lizard mount, started quickly forward. Zenna was strapped into the saddle behind Arun, facing backward.

The motion of the beast jostled her, but her iron focus was not disrupted, her concentration upon the spell absolute. Behind them came the others, moving swiftly down the corridors under the cover of the illusion.

A boulder appeared through the illusory mist, bouncing blindly off the walls, narrowly missing them. Arun gave a command and the lizard clambered up the wall, moving as easily on the sheer surface as it did on the solid floor below. Zenna swallowed at the disequilibrium but maintained her focus, and the mists held, growing even more ominous as Zenna had points of light that resembled eyes appear in the fog and move upward toward where the giants held their vigil. A cry of alarm in giantish was a reward for her efforts, but the mage was too focused upon the spell to notice.

Another boulder caromed down the passage, fortunately hitting no one. And then they were through, out of the line of fire from the balcony, emerging into a large, circular chamber. The place was of odd construction, its ceiling a great dome, the entire room resembling a sphere that had been cut in half. The walls were carved to resemble flowing liquid, and were done with such quality that the place maintained the illusion of water flowing down from above, even after all this time. A large construct easily ten feet high and fifteen feet across dominated the center of the room, a jumble of smooth swirls and jutting lines, the only element even remotely distinguishable being several slanted chairs, each flanked by triple arm-rests, that protruded from the overall formation. The room was lit by diffuse glowing panels set into the ceiling and floor, and had two exits in addition to the corridor they had just traversed, a smooth passageway exiting from the opposite wall, and a set of sheer panels that had the look of doors to their right.

But despite the odd wonders of the chamber, there was no time to examine the place in more detail, as the room was also occupied. The two injured ettins were present, one involved in pulling out arrows that jutted painfully from its chest; the second lying on its rear trying unsuccessfully to get its thick fingers on the tiny hilt of Mole's blade sticking from its foot.

The ettins were both seriously wounded, but of more concern was the hulking hill giant that stood before the doors to their right. The giant was shorter than the ettins, standing perhaps eleven feet in height, but his arms were like tree trunks, knotted with muscle, and the huge club it carried looked quite sufficiently deadly.

"Dismount!" Arun commanded. Zenna's concentration had already begun to slip, but their companions were right behind them, already out of the zone of danger from the giant guard post behind them. She let go of the spell and leapt down, barely letting go of Clinger's back before the lizard leapt into a powerful charge, headed right for the hill giant.

The ettin with the arrow wounds quickly rose, grabbing its morningstars, only to cry out as another arrow sped from Dannel's bow to strike it almost on top of the wound from the arrow it had just pulled out.

Morgan yelled a violent invocation to Helm as he entered the room, his sword blazing in his hand. "Your time has come, you godless hulks!"

Hodge, trailing behind slightly, entered the room and dodged aside just as another boulder rolled into the room from down the corridor, finally glancing off of the base of the sculpture in the room's center. Apparently the giants behind them weren't giving up just yet, even though they could no longer directly target them, instead angling their shots to bounce up the passageway. They hadn't hit anything yet, but Zenna knew that if one of those heavy rocks connected with someone, that person would be very sorry.

But she was secure, out of the way of the corridor mouth, and while they had won surprise it was clear that the advantage wouldn't last long. Even injured, she knew that the ettins were not foes to be underestimated. Therefore, as the one Dannel had injured rose and started toward them, she drew out her wand of acid arrows and fired a blast that caught it in the chest just below its left head, sizzling as it burned at the creature's flesh.

Unfortunately it also got the giant's attention, and it started right for her.

The second ettin dug at its bloody heel for another futile moment, and then with a frustrated growl drug itself up, using the wall as a prop as it hobbled toward the hill giant and the developing melee. Clinger's charge had carried Arun into range before it could prepare an attack, but its reach gave it an advantage as it swept its club around reflexively. Fortunately the dwarf had recovered his shield earlier, but even so the impact knocked him back and nearly drove him off his mount's back. But the dwarf was made of stern stuff, and he recovered in time to deliver a powerful blow to the giant's gut that staggered it. Clinger joined in the fun by locking its jaws on the giant's leg just above the knee, drawing from it a grunt of pain.

The giant, however, was a tough foe in its own right, and it quickly countered, tearing the lizard free and delivering a punishing blow to the side of its head with its club.

Morgan then joined the fray, the warrior of Helm canny enough to assault the giant from the flank, placing it between himself and Arun and his mount. The giant reacted slowly, bringing its club around in a sweep that the cleric ducked, before leaping in to thrust in with his sword. His luck failed him, however, and his foot slid in a patch of fresh blood that one of the ettins had dropped earlier, and his stroke went awry. Fortunately he recovered in time to dodge another swing from the club that would have spread his brains across the floor of the chamber, had it connected with full force. As it was it clipped the edge of his helmet, sending stars flaring through his vision for a moment.

Hodge saw the injured ettin heading toward Zenna, and he fired his heavy crossbow at it. The bolt punched into its belly, clearly hurting it, although now, fixed on its target, it was not going to stop short of death. Dannel obliged it, sending arrow after arrow into it until a final shot pierced its heart, and it fell to the ground two paces before Zenna's feet.

The other ettin hobbled into a position where it could get at Arun, but before it could attack it felt a sudden sting. Looking down, it saw a torrent of blood issuing from a small tear under its left armpit. Surprised at the sudden weakness it felt, it sought its enemy, expecting another knight or fierce dwarf. What it was instead was a tiny gnome, backpedaling as she reloaded her crossbow.

Furious, the ettin started after her.

Arun and Clinger redoubled their assault upon the giant, drawing its attention away from the momentarily stunned Morgan. Clinger, despite the grievous wound it had suffered, bit down again on a meaty giant thigh, while Arun, all but standing on the lizard's back now, rained blow after blow upon its torso. The giant's thick hide absorbed some of the blows, but the dwarf only added more power to his strikes, and finally there was a loud crack as a rib gave way under an impact. The giant responded with its own assault, but Arun was of a race that was expert at fighting these huge creatures, and with perfect timing he threw himself backward across Clinger's back, narrowly missing the club that swept empty air above him. He raised himself up to attack again before the giant could recover the momentum of its swing, but to his surprise the giant lashed out with the haft of the weapon, hitting Clinger again and knocking both mount and rider sprawling.

No sooner had the dwarf hit the ground, though, than he was up again, rushing at the giant with his hammer held high.

Mole retreated before the ettin's advance, its injury allowing her to remain ahead of it, even though it gained ground. But then, as it lurched suddenly forward to strike, she bounded away in a sudden burst of speed, courtesy of her magical boots. Realizing it had been tricked, the ettin roared out a curse.

A futile one, as it turned out a moment later, when Dannel's arrows started slamming into its body.

The hill giant was a powerful foe, but the combined strength of the adventurers was just too much for it. Even as Hodge entered the battle, with Morgan on one side and Arun coming again on the other, the giant tried to turn away, to head back toward the double doors and escape.

It got all of one giant-sized stride.

The companions gathered, breathing heavily after the brief but violent melee. Arun dismissed his seriously injured mount back to its celestial home to recover from its wounds, and Morgan used one of his few remaining spells to heal himself, drawing upon Helm's power yet again to restore himself to full health after the punishing blow he'd taken from the giant.

"Don't forget, there's more of them," Zenna warned. The others turned to the doors, wary of reinforcements, but when they came, they arrived via the corridor in the far wall.

And they weren't at all what the six adventurers had expected to find.

Chapter 167

Zenna saw them first, and offered a warning to her companions. "Look out," she said, but as they entered the chamber from the corridor to the west, she could not think of anything else to say, no further description that could do better than what the six of them could see with their own eyes.

There were three of them, clad in bright robes, with soft wings of voluminous white feathers arcing behind their backs. They were women, tall and stately, their features visages of beauty fashioned in glistening alabaster. They carried silver trumpets, the instruments so slender and graceful as to seem fragile. Their eyes, fixed on the companions, spoke volumes of knowledge and wisdom. When one spoke, her voice filled the room with the sound of a clarion song.

“You have done well, mortal heroes. You have defeated the giants, who have held us captive, dimming the glow of our eternal light. For the nobility of your deed, you have earned the right to drink the elixir of the gods.”

As she finished speaking Zenna belatedly noticed that another of the women bore a golden chalice, a squat, heavy object that sloshed slightly with a silvery liquid inside.

Morgan had stepped forward, his worn features shaped in an expression of awe. “I... we... we accept your gift, wondrous ones, scions of heaven...”

“Hold a moment,” Arun said behind him. Everyone, including the three archons, turned to look at him. “That’s all very well and good; we’re happy to help a couple o’ ladies in need, of course. But answer me one simple question. If you’re angels of heaven, why is that you REEK OF PURE EVIL TAINT?”

His last shouted words echoed through the chamber. The angels fixed the dwarf with a cold stare. One spoke to Morgan. “Lies! The dwarf has clearly fallen from the Light... you have clearly seen the bright purity of Heaven, golden knight... Surely you can see truth?”

Morgan’s expression had changed, although he was still half-turned from Zenna, facing the archons, and she couldn’t see his eyes. But there was a tightness in his voice as he lifted his head and addressed them once more.

“I once thought that I did, yes. But I have learned that evil often wears a pleasing face...”

And he spoke a command of power, invoking the pure light of Helm. His invocation cut through the magic surrounding the angels, shearing through the power of their disguise, and their forms shifted, the brilliant white and soft glow fading away.

What replaced them were creatures out of a nightmare. Still female, but three ancient hags, their flesh putrescent green, their skin the consistency of diseased bark. Their faces were permanently twisted into expressions of pure malice, and they cackled as they regarded the companions.

“You might have enjoyed your service to us, foolish child... but so be it!”

Their answer came immediately. Zenna lifted her magical wand, releasing an acid arrow that splashed onto the chest of the closest hag. The creature screamed. The one beside her also cried out as an arrow from Dannel’s bow bit into her shoulder. The hag’s thick hide absorbed most of the force of the attack, but she still snarled a curse at the elf, who calmly drew another arrow out of his quiver.

Arun and Hodge immediately leapt forward to the attack, rushing around Morgan, who was still recovering from the revelation unleashed by his dispel magic spell. But even as the dwarves lifted their weapons to strike down the hags, they let loose their dark powers upon the heroes.

Arun felt the full power of a hag's gaze settle on him, and felt a wave of nausea and weakness flare over him. He clutched to the source of his strength, his commitment to the god he served, and the power of the eyebite passed, leaving behind only a burning rage to strike down these foul creatures.

Unfortunately, the others lacked the dwarf's strength of will. The second hag hurled a wave of screaming, chaotic mental energy into the midst of her foes, scattering their minds with confusion. Dannel and Zenna were too far back to be affected, and Morgan and Arun both resisted the effects of the spell, but Hodge suddenly halted in mid-charge, his mind clouded by the hag's evil power, and Mole abruptly lowered her crossbow, her head spinning as she slumped down to sit on the floor.

With their enemies already reeling, the third hag focused her attention upon Morgan. The cleric withstood her gaze and met it with a cold stare of fury, but even as he lifted his sword, he felt a sinuous finger force its way into his mind. He tried to fight it, but the hag was too strong for him, and the last thing he remembered was a sinister cackle that seemed to echo within the corridors of his own mind.

"Yes, my pretty one," the hag laughed. "Yes, now you are mine." Morgan turned, his glowing sword coming up again as he shifted to face his erstwhile companions. She grimaced again as the acid Zenna had cast upon her continued to smoke and burn, eating away at her hide. She turned to look at the tiefling, and Morgan's gaze shifted to follow her own.

"Kill the wizard for me, sweetling," the hag commanded.

And Morgan lifted his sword, and charged toward Zenna, his eyes vacant pools that promised only death.

Chapter 168

With half of their number already under the sway of the foul hags, the situation suddenly looked grim for the companions from Cauldron.

To Arun Goldenshield, however, his mandate was clear. The creatures before him were evil, corrupt to a depth he'd rarely felt since he had taken the oaths of service, and had gained a sensitivity to such things. And so he leapt at the nearest hag, bringing his hammer down in a powerful smite backed by the full force of his strength.

He hit the hag squarely in the chest.

And nothing happened.

The blow would have knocked a man back ten feet, to gasp out his last seconds in agony. But the hag simply laughed, and held up a hand mockingly to the dwarf. Arun could see that she wore a thin silver ring, tarnished and greasy.

“My pretty protects me, foolish dwarf!” she cackled. Before he could adjust to strike again, she suddenly reached out and grasped his face with both of her clammy hands. Arun drew back in disgust, but as he did so, he could feel his strength leaving him, drawn out by the fell power of the hag’s touch.

“I will leave you a feeble husk, paladin,” she promised. “Then you shall be my plaything, not the toy of some dour smelly dwarf god!”

Zenna watched with horror as Morgan charged straight toward her, his massive sword lifted high above his head. Having seen him fight, she knew that she would have no chance against his strength and skill, that he would cut her down... She felt a sharp mental prod from without, a clear attack from the hags that she angrily drove out with a concerted effort of will. You may be able to convert that shallow fool, but you won’t get into my mind! she thought, knowing that the hags couldn’t hear, but letting the thought steady her as she calmly reached into herself and drew out the power of her magic.

For all her contempt of him, she could feel the power of Morgan’s will, even subjugated as it was to the domination of the hags, and it was considerable. Only desperation, she suspected, gave her the power to batter through his mental defenses, and lay her spell upon him.

The cleric halted in mid-charge, quivering unsteadily, his muscles twitching as his mind tried to shake off the power of her hold person spell.

“Zenna!” Dannel cried, turning toward her after firing off an arrow that bounced harmlessly from a hag’s armored hide.

“I cannot hold him!” she cried, seeing the effort in Morgan’s face, and even more feeling the force of his will gathering.

The elf dropped his bow and ran toward the priest, drawing his sword as he came. Morgan could do nothing to stop him, could not even turn as Dannel knocked off his helmet with his left hand, and with his right brought the hilt of his sword down into the back of the cleric’s skull.

The spell holding him snapped with the knight’s consciousness, and Morgan collapsed in a heap on the floor.

“Damn, that actually felt good,” the elf said softly, before reversing his sword and rushing toward the hags.

Sitting on the floor in the midst of a battleground, Mole found herself unable to grasp the myriad and shifting thoughts that flowed through her mind. Noise barraged her from all around, familiar voices that seemed important, but whose significance she couldn’t quite sort out from the babble in her head. Something caught her eye, and she looked up to see the looming silver sculpture, the alien table with its odd angles and uncomfortable lines.

You have to climb that, came a voice in her mind.

Grinning, she got up and rushed to comply.

Hodge, meanwhile, had started to wander off in the general direction of the west corridor, the passage from which the hags had emerged. As he passed near one of the hags, however, a sudden look of pure rage exploded on his face, and lifting his axe he charged toward the creature. The hag met him with a look of equal ferocity on her face, and the two combatants exchanged powerful blows. His axe managed a shallow cut that drew a look of surprise from the haggard creature, but she in turn tore into him with her claws, opening painful gashes on his arms and torso.

He lifted the axe to strike again, but as abruptly as it had come the rage disappeared, and he found himself beclouded again by the hag's confusion spell.

Cackling to herself, the hag reached for his face.

Having learned the hard way of the durability of his foe, Arun shifted from an all-out attack to a careful assault seeking vulnerabilities in this dangerous adversary. He feinted another powerful swing, and when the hag reached out an arm to touch him again, turned his stroke and brought the hammer up to squarely strike the hag's arm just below the elbow. The awkward blow would have snapped the arm of any normal person, but while the hag's thick skin and iron bones absorbed most of the impact, the way she painfully drew back told him that his blow had hurt it some.

But some wasn't going to be enough, he knew.

Dannel charged toward the hag threatening Hodge, his magical sword flashing in the artificial light of the chamber. As he came, he lifted his voice in song, driving back the fell cackling of the hags and reinforcing his comrades with the stirring confidence of his melody. The hag saw him coming and turned to meet him, but even as she reached for him with her claws his sword flashed, and she drew back, bleeding from a gash in her side.

"Oh, you will pay for that, elf!" she hissed.

Dannel's response was to sing louder, offering a chorus that promised the triumph of light over shadow as he leapt into another series of feints and thrusts, forcing the hag onto the defensive.

With Morgan at least temporarily out of the picture, Zenna lifted her wand once more. She could still feel a thin tendril of stored energy within it, but knew even as she called upon its power she knew that it was for the last time. The acid arrow struck the lead hag on the hip, the eager magical substance burning through her ragged shift instantly and savaging the ugly flesh beneath. The hag shot Zenna a look of pure hatred. "Sisters! Join with me!"

Zenna wasn't sure what that meant, but she didn't like the sound of it. She started running toward the hags, knowing she stood little chance against them in melee, but without any spells left with which she could hope to affect them from a distance. But if she could get close enough for a color spray or shocking grasp... a thin hope indeed, but in this desperate confrontation, with half of them already out of the fight, even a thin chance was better than none at all.

The two hags flanking the leader turned toward the one who had spoken, and Zenna felt a tingle on her skin as magical power was drawn through the chamber into the combined force of the hag covey. The lead hag laughed—

Chapter 169

The hags drew upon the combined power of their covey, seeking to unleash a power that would turn the battle decisively and finally in their favor. The lead hag laughed as dark energies flowed at her beckoning...

And then Arun brought his hammer around in an arc, catching his distracted foe solidly at the base of her neck. The hag screeched and flopped to the ground. The lead hag turned to him and let out a scream that seemed pulled from the very pits of darkness and suffering as the unity of the covey was broken.

"No!" she cried.

"Yes," Arun replied simply, bringing up the hammer again.

The hag vanished, followed a few moments later by the other one.

Zenna heard a fluttering of wings nearby. Another foe, she thought.

The voice of one of the hags sounded from the far corridor. "Get the last of those fool giants down here!" it commanded. The flapping of wings moved across the room—Dannel took a swung at the invisible form, and missed—and the double doors slid silently open as whatever it was escaped. As it fled Zenna cast a minor spell, casting about for magical auras.

"Are they still here?" Dannel asked, crossing the room to recover his bow. Arun, after making sure the hag he'd struck down was really dead, cautiously approached Hodge, who was sitting on the floor, muttering a babble of curses under his breath. Mole had disappeared, but after looking around the room Zenna finally saw her, perched atop the sculpture in the center of the room.

"They're gone, for now," Zenna said. Morgan, she saw, was starting to stir; Dannel saw as well and shot Zenna a querying look.

"If the spell was what I think it is, she's still got him," she said. That was enough for the elf, who put him down again with another sharp blow.

"We've got to get out of here, now," he said, just loud enough so that Zenna and Arun both heard. "We cannot take on more giants, not like this." He turned toward the sculpture. "Mole, come down from there!"

Arun came over, leading Hodge. The dwarf seemed quiescent for now, but still hadn't fully recovered his senses. Mole suddenly turned and leapt off of the sculpture, plummeting face first toward the ground fifteen feet below. Zenna let out a startled screech, and Dannel only barely managed to catch her, setting her down on the ground unharmed. The gnome shook her head.

"What just happened?" she asked.

Hodge, too, was coming around; Zenna recognized it by the fact that his curses took on a definite clarity and passion directed toward the departed hags.

"We've got to get out of here," Dannel repeated.

"What 'bout him?" Hodge said, gesturing toward the fallen cleric.

"Bring him," Dannel said. The dwarves shared a look and grabbed the cleric. It took the two of them to lift him enough to drag, heavy as he was with his armor.

"Bring his sword, too," Dannel reminded them. "He'll need it, when we come back."

Hodge was puffing as he and Arun struggled to drag the priest toward the exit corridor. "Yer know, yer could help a bit," he suggested, along with something else under his breath that wasn't quite audible. Zenna reached down and picked up the sword. "What do you have in mind, Dannel?" she asked.

"Rear guard," he said. "Carrying him you'll never outrun those giants, if they decide to come after us."

"But—"

"There's no time to talk about it!" he said. "No go!"

Even as he spoke, the elf darted up along the wall, using his magical slippers to scale the sheer surface effortlessly.

"Mole, come on!" Zenna said, from the corridor.

"I think I'd better hang back and make sure he doesn't get his head smooshed," the gnome said casually, standing by the base of the sculpture. "You go on, we'll follow." She grinned. "Don't worry, I can outrun them."

Even as she turned back to the tunnel, to see Hodge and Arun barely halfway down its length toward the ruined gate, she felt a rumble that she knew was the heavy tread of giant footprints, drawing nearer. She looked back toward the corridor, knowing as well that the hags could return at any moment, that the foul things were far from beaten.

She felt torn inside, looking at the man she'd loved and hated, and her best friend, then back up the tunnel at the retreating dwarves. Lingered here herself would accomplish nothing, she knew, and the dwarves would need help when they reached the steep slope at the far end of the canyon.

With a last look back, she turned and ran down the corridor. When she heard a giant's roar behind her, she did not falter, but kept running.

Chapter 170

A last bright surge of late afternoon sunlight flared over the lip of the Demonskar, illuminating the dark shadow of a figure standing at the edge of the ancient pipe, looking down over the canyon below. Zenna stared at the shadowy figure, watching him even as the sun faded and night descended with startling rapidity over them.

She felt torn inside, twisted around by all that had happened. It was not a feeling she enjoyed; her entire existence had been built around the need for control. Even if it was just an illusion.

Movement at her side drew her attention around. Her mouth tightened as she looked down at Morgan, tightly bound, gagged and blindfolded with gobs of wax stuffed into his ears. They'd removed his armor, and his clothes were dirty with mud and blood, much of it his own.

Getting him up here had been an ordeal. With one of her last remaining spells she'd been able to restore some of the strength Arun had lost to the hags' foul touch, but even so the slope had been difficult enough when they'd been coming down with ropes and without the burden of an unconscious, armored man.

The cleric shifted a bit, and subsided. Earlier, before they'd fully bound him with Mole's ropes, he'd made an all-out effort to break free, forcing Arun to bloody his face with several punishing punches before he'd quieted enough for them to secure him.

Zenna rubbed her forehead, where a headache had taken up what felt like a permanent residence. This was a complication that they didn't need.

The spell that the hag had used to subjugate Morgan's will to her own was not one that she could herself cast—only truly powerful mages could—but she knew something of it. She'd suspected that the hag would be able to control him from a distance, a suspicion that seemed to be borne out in the way he had shammed remaining unconscious, until he had tried to escape. Any doubt that might have remained in their minds was eradicated a short while thereafter, when he had addressed them.

"You're not going to get out of here alive," he had told them. "You will share the fate of that fool manling who came before you, yes. The Demon knows that you are here, and He will be coming for you, shortly..."

He'd laughed until they'd gagged him, and after that they'd covered his eyes and ears, per Zenna's suggestion. She wasn't exactly sure how much information that the hag would be able to draw from him, but by the way he'd looked at them, and by his laugh... she preferred to err on the side of caution.

"How long's 'e goin' to be like that?" Hodge had asked, after the initial fracas shortly after they'd gotten him up to the pipe.

"I don't know, for sure," she'd responded. "Days... maybe as much as a tenday."

"We don't have a tenday," Arun had said.

"Can ye break the spell?" Hodge had asked.

Again, Zenna could only shake her head.

Hodge had suggested tossing the cleric into the boiling pool at the base of the canyon below the pipe, and while Zenna had known that the dwarf was joking—or at least mostly joking—she'd felt keenly the difficulty of their situation. Dannel and Mole had returned safely, the elf favoring his shoulder where a giant's boulder had clipped him during their retreat, and the giants and the hags had not ventured an action against them in the two hours since they'd fled the complex at Vaparak's Voice. Knowing that their foes had the ability to cloak themselves in invisibility, Mole had laid simple snares and tell-tales on the path leading up to the pipe, but those rudimentary preparations left Zenna with little sense of security. If their enemies wanted to counterattack, they would find a way. At least they'd hear the giants coming—that is, if they didn't wait until the Voice was blowing...

"Rest easy, lass," Arun said, coming over to her. "There's naught we can do about it now, but gather our strength. Tomorrow, we'll do what we can."

"And if they come tonight?"

"Then we're saved a trip back down," the dwarf replied simply.

Zenna laughed despite herself. But then something else weighed in upon her, something triggered by Morgan's words earlier. "Do you think that he was... I mean, do you believe that Alek Tercival's dead, that this has all been for nothing?"

The dwarf's stare was intense. "He may be dead, but that doesn't make this journey meaningless. Evil festers in isolated places such as this one, but it is never content to remain apart. It seeks always to spread, to take hold where it can, to undermine the bulwarks of good and dig itself into the cracks that exist even in the most upright societies. Thus it falls upon those that can, to seek it out, and destroy it before it can grow to full fruition."

Zenna felt a sudden stab of feeling inside of her. Her father had said something very similar to her, not so long ago. She turned away, unable to speak.

Arun clasped her shoulder. “Get some sleep, if you can. We’ll need you on the morrow, especially with the Helmite... indisposed.” With a sound that might have almost been a chuckle, he returned to where he’d laid his bedroll out a short distance away. When she looked over at him again, amazingly, he was asleep. Hodge, who’d eaten a double ration of food and then collapsed in a heap about an hour ago, was already fast asleep, a coarse snore drifting up from his prone form.

Zenna laid out her own bedroll. They would let her sleep uninterrupted, she knew, so that she would have the focus to regain her spells the next morning. The others would watch, sacrificing their own rest for her. She closed her eyes, doubting her ability to sleep through the confused thoughts dancing through her mind, but somehow sleep crept up and claimed her.

Chapter 171

That same evening, in a dimly lit chamber deep within the fastness of Vaprak’s Voice, another discussion was taking place.

“The covey is sundered! We are undone!”

“Oh, do shut up, Olomasta. You always had a flair for drama. Has Kymzo reported back yet?”

The hag subsided into a chair and looked up at her sister, and nodded. “They have taken shelter in the pipe, near the overlook. But they will be back, Tribata, and we only have three giants left to guard us... and with our sister slain, we can no longer come together, to access the powers of the covey!”

Tribata’s mouth twisted in disapproval. “All that you say is true. And I’d only credit two giants to our cause; Dugobras may defend himself and his forge, but he won’t stir beyond for our sakes.”

Olomasta twisted her hands in a gesture of agitation. “What of the nerra? Will he help us?”

Tribata shook her head, and leaned in closer to her sister, her voice cast lower. “I spoke to him briefly—he is content to watch the Mirror, along with several of his kin. I will not press him, for if he senses that we are no longer in a position to command power, he will turn on us.”

Olomasta’s hand-wringing intensified. “Then what are we to do?”

“We are not without resources.”

“Your prize? You still control him?”

“Yes. And tomorrow, I will perhaps claim another.”

“But... why haven’t they removed the spell?”

Tribata's smile was an evil thing. "I do not believe they can. That one, the spell-caster... there was something odd about her, but did you observe how she only used magical wands during the battle, and did not engage us with her own spells? I suspect—and this is confirmed by what the giants told us—that she is little more than a talented apprentice."

"But those others... they killed the giants so easily..."

"Yes. The dwarves may cause difficulty, their natures resist our magic, and that one, that foul little thing that killed Sminelpa, I believe he is consecrated to a god, which will further enhance his resistance. But again, we are not without resources..."

"You mean..."

"Yes. After all, this concerns Him as well, does it not? Summon Kyzmo here to us. Tell him I have a message for him to deliver..."

And her cackle filled the room, sick with the promise of more blood to come.

Chapter 172

Zenna stirred to the bright glow of morning visible in the mouth of the pipe off in the distance, her nostrils full of the smell of roasting meat. Her body was a bit stiff from sleeping on the hard stone floor of the pipe, her mind was clear, the horrors of the day before faded a bit into the amorphous terrain of memory. That lasted as long as it took to sit up and see Morgan, still lying bound where they'd left them the night before.

"He'll need food and water," she said to her companions, stretching her muscles in an effort to take out some of the lingering kinks.

"Fed 'im earlier," Hodge said, stirring a few slabs of sloth meat in a small iron pot over an equally diminutive fire. There wasn't much more than scrub growth out in the canyon, anything larger smothered by the noxious gases that were given off by the pool below. But Dannel, using his magical slippers to walk along the canyon walls, had found enough dried brush to support a small fire. Hodge added a generous portion of ground pepper to the meat, which they'd salted and stored in Mole's bag of holding. Zenna wondered if the stuff would even be edible, once the dwarf had finished with it.

The familiar whistle of Vaprak's Voice began again, building quickly into the loud roar that seemed to shake the pipe with its passage. To her surprise, Zenna realized that she'd completely toned it out the night before, and had managed to sleep a full night through that cacophony. She was surprised that her hearing wasn't damaged; another benefit of her otherworldly heritage, perhaps?

During the blowing of the winds, they could not converse, so she knelt down across from the dwarf. Mole, she saw, was in her bedroll, but Dannel and Arun were absent.

When the noise had trailed off, she asked, "Where are Arun and Dannel?"

Hodge pointed toward the exit of the pipe. “They went ta take a quick looksee, just a few minutes ago, a’fore yer woke. Ah, here they be comin’ now.”

Zenna looked up to see the pair silhouetted in the nimbus of light in the mouth of the pipe. Dannel remained near the mouth, keeping a close watch, but Arun returned to their small camp. Mole, she saw, was stirring; the gnome had fashioned wax plugs for her ears from an old candle so that she could sleep over the noise of the Voice.

“Anything?” Zenna asked.

“Quiet,” Arun said. “Real quiet.”

“Hey!” Mole said, coming over to the fire. She snatched the little bag of pepper just as Hodge was about to add another dash of the spice to his creation. “A little goes a long way, you know!”

“Bah, yer all have no sense o’ flavor,” the dwarf complained.

“Is that the last of the meat?” Arun asked. The other dwarf nodded.

“How are we on supplies?” Zenna asked.

“There’s still one more sack of ground meal in the bag of holding, some potatoes and carrots, and about a half-pound of coffee, and another pound of the mixed nuts...”

“Ate those,” Hodge interrupted. Mole shot him a glare before continuing.

“As I was saying... a few spices, some salt—if we find another edible animal, we can preserve it—and I had some raisins in there, if someone hasn’t found them and eaten them...”

“Mole,” Zenna interrupted. “How many days’ worth of food do we have left?”

“Oh. Well, if we can keep Hodge out of the bag of holding, maybe three days.”

“We’ll be all right,” Arun said. “The elf can help us find edible foodstuffs in the jungle, if it comes to that.”

Zenna looked up at the paladin with surprise. Praise between the dwarves and elf hadn’t been overly generous, but she realized that they had all come to rely upon each other, and that their relationship had developed into mutual respect. It was a gratifying feeling, but still didn’t remove the sense of anticipation as they prepared to head once more into danger.

“So, what’s the plan for today?” Mole asked cheerfully. “We go in, beat up the bad guys, and take their stuff, right?”

“Aye! That sounds ‘bout right!” Hodge agreed.

“We will need to be wary of the magic of those hags,” Arun said, with a meaningful glance toward the captive Morgan.

They all turned toward Zenna, but the tiefling found herself distracted. There was something odd... a feeling that tickled on the edges of her perceptions...

Her eyes widened slightly as realization hit. “We’re being watched,” she said.

Even as the others reached for their weapons, there was a sizzle in the air, and two... things materialized at the opposite edges of their camp. The light from the pipe mouth barely illuminated their dark forms, but Zenna needed no such augmentation to clearly discern them. They were about the size of a full-grown human, gaunt almost to the point of being skeletal, their faces twisted into a permanent snarl of hatred. Their weapons were vicious claws and teeth that protruded from their angular jaws, and their black bodies were covered with a slick ooze that possessed the color of congealed blood.

Zenna knew what they were immediately. Demons. But even as she opened her mouth to issue a warning, both the creatures and her friends leapt to the attack.

Chapter 173

Faced with sudden assault by a pair of babau demons that had teleported in to interrupt their breakfast, the companions quickly reached for their weapons.

Even as Zenna shouted a warning to her companions and tried to rise, the nearest babau leapt at her, exploding out of its crouch like an uncoiling spring. Pain exploded across her face as it raked her with its claws; it was incredibly strong, and she was flung backward, narrowly avoiding falling into their fire.

The babau could not press its advantage as Arun charged into it. He brought his hammer solidly into its chest, driving it back a step, but the creature only shot him a sinister grin.

“Resistant...” Zenna groaned as she tried to pull herself up, her voice wet with blood from the deep gashes in her cheek and jaw.

Hodge leapt up so quickly that the frying pan went flying, but the dwarf’s concerns were on other matters than breakfast as he lifted his magical axe and charged at the second demon. The demon snarled at him, but instead of rushing forward to meet the dwarf, it turned suddenly to the side. Hodge’s stroke missed it entirely, as the demon charged toward the prone form of Morgan.

The cleric, still gagged and blindfolded, was apparently unaware of the threat as the demon reached down for him with its razor-sharp claws. But instead of tearing the unarmored priest to shreds with its raking slashes, it only cut the bonds holding him, opening one small gash his bicep where a claw cut too deep. For a moment the cleric just lay there, the trickle of blood oozing from the fresh wound adding to the tally of old cuts and scars crossing his body, but then he stirred into action, tearing off the remaining restraints and reaching up to pull off the blindfold covering his face.

“Bragh! Die, demon!” Hodge yelled, tearing into the babau’s back with his axe even as the creature turned to face him. This time he connected with it, but even the magical axe seemed to do little to the creature, and as he drew the weapon back he saw that some of the red gunk covering its body had stuck to the blade, which hissed with the potency of a strong acid.

The blow had clearly drawn the creature’s attention, however, and it lunged for the dwarf with its claws. It failed to see the tiny figure that rolled into place behind it, but it felt the thrust of Mole’s sword as it cut deeply into a tendon in its exposed leg. The demon screamed and spun on the gnome, aborting its assault upon Hodge. Before she could react it had grabbed her, its claws tearing painfully into her sides as it lifted her toward its slathering jaws.

Zenna felt a sense of helplessness as she watched Arun battling the other demon; few of the spells that she had remaining could hope to harm the thing, and the two combatants were too closely intertwined to risk a color spray. She turned to see Morgan rise, the cleric tearing off his gag as he drew back from the battle raging between the other demon and Mole and Hodge. Morgan was casting around with his eyes, clearly looking for something. Then, the cleric’s gaze met hers in a look that was pure venom. For a moment, Zenna thought that the dominated knight would rush her, to kill her with his bare hands if need be, but then he turned and ran full-out down the corridor.

Straight toward Dannel, who was running at full speed in the opposite direction, toward the melee. He already had an arrow fitted to his bow, and as he saw the cleric he drew and took aim, but hesitated short of releasing his shot. Morgan did not stop, and Dannel had to leap to the side in order to avoid being overrun. With one last look back at the fleeing priest, the elf turned back toward the melee.

As the babau’s claws raked his armor, Arun knew that he would need help to overcome this foe. His first blow had landed solidly but had hurt it little if at all. Holding his shield up in an effort to forestall the demon’s attacks, he called upon the power of Moradin. Pain erupted in his leg as the demon dragged his shield aside and clawed through his defenses, but through an effort of will his concentration held, and he felt the divine potency of his patron flow through him into his warhammer, transforming it into a weapon of Good. With a loud roar, he lifted the weapon and drove it into the demon’s body once more, gratified this time as it screamed in pain, staggering backward with a hiss of ugly black smoke rising from the point where the hammer’s head had struck.

Arun pursued it, bringing the hammer around again in a wide arc that intersected with its torso just above its left hip. Again the blow told, but the hammer had also begun to smoke, coated now in the caustic red gel that covered the demon’s foul body. As Arun drew the weapon back again, the wooden shaft shivered, and the heavy iron head fell to the ground in a loud clatter.

Encouraged by this development, the demon snarled and hurled itself bodily at its disarmed foe.

On the far flank of the battle, a mere five paces distant, Mole's eyes widened in fear as the demon drew her struggling body into its maw. An arrow from Dannel's bow sliced into the melee and stuck in the demon's body, but the missile may as well have struck an iron wall for all the damage it wrought to the abyssal creature. The gnome suddenly twisted her body up, lifting her legs and body up over the snapping jaws that narrowly missed tearing her in two. She followed the maneuver with a thrust of her sword that dug painfully into the demon's maw as it opened again. The demon let out a terrible scream of pain and released its grip on the nimble rogue, who twisted enough to land on her feet, her sword smoking in her hand.

Frustrated, Hodge tossed his shield aside and took up the waraxe with both hands, driving it down into the demon's back with his full strength. The blow was powerful but unfortunately inaccurate, glancing off of the heavily armored dorsal ridge of the demon. His curses, while colorful, proved equally ineffective, and it didn't bother to turn, instead reaching down again for Mole, the only foe who had managed to hurt it thus far.

Arun held his ground even as sharp wedges of pain shot through his body where the demon's claws scored him, penetrating through the gaps in his armor below his breastplate, tearing the chain links covering him there as though they were fashioned of flimsy wire rather than gleaming mithral. He reached for one of his light hammers, knowing that he had little chance of hurting it even with his full strength behind the blows.

"Arun!" Zenna cried, drawing his attention to the side. The tiefling rushed into the battle, holding Morgan's bastard sword in its scabbard. She had taken custody of it in their flight from Vaprak's Voice, and had kept it among her gear upon returning here and disarming the cleric. Morgan had looked for it on being freed from his bonds, but he'd failed to see it, half-concealed under Zenna's bedroll.

The demon snarled and lashed out at her as she drew near. She took a solid hit on her shoulder and cried out, trailing blood freely from three deep gashes that tore long rents in her tunic. But she held her ground until Arun's hand tightened around the hilt of the sword, and he drew its gleaming length free from the leather scabbard. Arun released his grip on his shield, and took up the sword in both hands. The demon, its beady eyes annoyed by the bright light shining from the sword, snarled and reached for the dwarf once more, but its charge died as Arun brought the sword around in a glittering arc, backed by his full strength, that intersected the demon's neck and took its head off of its shoulders.

Arrows thudded into the second demon's body, not harming it but distracting its attention, even as Hodge continued to rain down blows on its back. While neither assault inflicted serious hurts on the creature, they nonetheless provided openings that Mole continued to exploit, slamming her slender blade into tiny gaps in its defenses, piercing even its demonic resistances and drawing flows of black ichor that were beginning to coagulate into a pool of steaming demon blood at its feet. Mole bled from numerous injuries inflicted by the demon's claws, and her face was twisted in pain, but she held her ground, facing its full fury with stoic determination.

Finally the demon, seeing the fate of its comrade, let out a final screech and with a sudden twisting of reality teleported out of the pipe to safety.

Chapter 174

The companions sagged as the adrenaline of battle faded. Wary of another assault, they quickly tended their injuries and their weapons. Arun's hammer was ruined, while Mole's sword was pitted and of little more use. And Hodge's feelings were quickly made evident to all of them.

"Me axe!" he yelled. "Look what the bastards did ta me axe!"

Arun examined the weapon with a critical eye. The acidic goo had etched the sharp edge of the blade, and even pitted a small hole entirely through the surface, but the damage was relatively minor.

"I can repair it once we get back to Cauldron," he said, handing the axe back. "Until then, it will have to suffice."

The dwarf's mood did not improve when he discovered that the pan containing his hard-earned breakfast had been upturned in the melee, depositing the sloth steaks into the fire.

"Someone's gunna pay," he said, and he went and sat down by the mouth of the pipe, a thunderhead in his expression.

"I need some time to recover my spells," Zenna said. She'd healed her wounds, but she still looked a mess, with dried blood caked on her face and down her arm. But in her own way, she reflected a determination that mirrored that on the vulgar dwarf.

"Well, now they have the cleric, too," Arun said.

"I might have been able to bring him down without killing him," Dannel said. "But as beat up as he was..."

"It wasn't an accusation," the dwarf said simply. "In your place, I would have done the same. He is not in control of his actions."

"Yeah, he's a jerk, but at least he's OUR jerk," Mole added. "Say, Arun, you wouldn't happen to be able to do anything about this, could you?" She handed the dwarf her sword, but he only took one look and shook his head, returning the weapon to her. Glumly, the gnome tossed the pitted sword into the remains of their fire.

"What? No backup in the bag of holding?" Dannel asked her.

Mole shook her head. The elf knelt down beside her.

"Cheer up, Mole. As usual, we're outnumbered, with few weapons and supplies, and basically trapped in a distant place confronted with a deadly enemy that can attack us at will. In other words, it's an adventure!"

The gnome looked up at him, and after a moment grinned.

Arun came over to them. "What say you, dwarf?" Dannel asked.

The paladin's face was limned in the bright light from Morgan's sword as he lifted the blade to a ready position, and its gleam shone in his dark eyes. "We finish this," he said.

* * * * *

In their shadowed chamber, the hag sisters Tribata and Olomasta stood waiting.

"He comes," Tribata said.

The two creatures watched as the sound of footsteps became audible in the corridor. They grew louder, until a figure appeared in the doorway.

"Come forward, manling," Tribata commanded.

"It is a risk," Olomasta said, following her sister as she descended from the platform to meet him. "He may shrug off the magic, if we push him."

"No, I don't think so," Tribata said. She remained on the lower steps, looking down at the battered man who came to stand before her. "Not if we lead him in a direction that he already wants to go." She lifted her hand from under the cover of her dark cloak, revealing that she carried a golden chalice in her hand.

"Drink," she said, offering the cup to Morgan.

As the cleric drank the offered elixir, Tribata's eyes shone with anticipation. Finally, the man had drained the contents of the chalice, and she turned to her sister.

"Begin your preparations."

As Olomasta hurried off to comply, the elder hag turned her gaze back to Morgan.

"We have little time, my little manling, and there is much for you to tell me, if we are to prepare a proper welcome for your friends."

Morgan simply stood there, unable to do anything but obey.

Chapter 175

A short while later, the companions stood once more at the entrance to the complex of tunnels and chambers at Vaprak's Voice. The bodies of the ettins that they had slain here the day before were gone, although dried blood still slaked the canyon floor, and the ruin of the portcullis had been removed. Nothing now stood in their way to entry.

"If you lend me the slippers again, I'll go check on the guardroom above," Mole suggested.

“I’ll go,” Dannel replied, moving swiftly up the cliff face. Finally he reached the narrow opening, and cautiously peered inside, finally inserting his entire head into the opening.

“Wouldn’t catch me doin’ that,” Hodge said.

The elf quickly descended to rejoin them. “Empty,” he reported.

“Maybe they all ran off,” Mole offered hopefully.

The others all looked at her, and she shrugged.

“Come on,” Arun said. He was mounted upon his giant lizard, which he’d called back from its celestial home upon their breaking camp. He still bore Morgan’s bastard sword, and he’d lent his magical shield to Hodge. They’d left all their excess gear, along with Morgan’s armor and shield, in a sheltered niche in the stones near the mouth of the pipe.

The paladin led them into the dark crevice and into the complex beyond. They tensed as they passed under the balcony of the guard post above, but Dannel’s report proved accurate, and no assault came upon them from that quarter. The complex was eerily quiet as they pushed on to the hemispherical chamber with the odd chair-sculpture in the center. Again the place was empty, with only trails of blood remaining as a reminder of the desperate struggle that had taken place here the day before.

“They came from that direction, originally,” Dannel said, indicating the corridor in the far wall. They headed that way, leaving the sliding double doors to their right alone after a wary glance.

The corridor led them still deeper into the complex, opening again after approximately thirty paces into a rectangular chamber. This one was clearly different from the last, however, in its décor; the most dominant feature was a quartet of tall pillars that rose up to nearly touch the vaulted ceiling above. They had the look of white marble, carved into the shape of flowing liquid. Each supported a large bulb of glass or crystal at its apex, within which constantly bubbling liquid could be seen. This liquid drained down through some interior channel to the base of each pillar, where it poured in an endless stream into a small basin there. The basins in turn had an opening that disgorged the liquid into channels that ran into the center of the room, where the substance gathered in a larger basin that was carved into the floor. A soft but constant noise of gurgling liquid was the only sound in the place. The same diffuse light from ceiling panels clearly lit the entirety of the chamber.

“What in the hells...” Hodge muttered.

“Remember, they offered us a drink before,” Dannel reminded them.

“Nobody touch nothin’,” Arun said. There were two of the sliding-door exits in the side walls, but even as he directed Clinger toward the one to their right, one of them slid open. Zenna thought she heard something; a flap of wings and a faint titter that might have been laughter.

“Something comes,” the paladin said, drawing his mount back toward the center of the room, to give them both more room to maneuver.

“Zenna?” Mole asked.

“We have to wait,” the tiefling said. “The spells will only last a matter of minutes, and we must be certain it’s them...”

Their attention was drawn back to the corridor, where the pale light from above shone on long white bones. Four creatures stepped awkwardly into the room. They had a roughly humanoid shape, but with six arms apiece, and they looked... stretched, as if someone had taken a short human and tugged on his bones until he was seven feet tall. Zenna’s thoughts immediately flashed back to the silver plate, and the six-armed figure depicted on the etched scene upon it.

But her musings were interrupted, as the skeletons immediately moved to the attack.

Chapter 176

The six-armed skeletons each stood seven feet in height, each limb ending in a bony claw that reached for the companions in anticipation as they crossed the room toward them. They moved deceptively fast for their size and the fact that they were dead, and the leading pair were upon Arun before he could effectively react. One clawed the dwarf across the face, scoring a minor hit, while the second dug a claw into Clinger’s thick hide, drawing a bright line of celestial ichor from the wound.

The dwarf stood atop the lizard’s back, holding aloft one of his small hammers. “Begone, creatures of darkness!” he shouted, and the hammer erupted in light in his fist. Both skeletons recoiled from that momentary flash, but they stood their ground, resisting the power of Arun’s divine invocation.

Even as the first pair stood before the paladin’s power, the others came on, launching attacks on the others. Dannel’s first arrow glanced off a slender rib, doing little or no damage, and he barely had time for another before a skeleton was on him, forcing him to duck under its sweeping claws.

“Blunt weapons!” Zenna yelled, retreating even as another of the skeletons threatened her. Despite the evidence of Arun’s failure, she attempted to channel her own power against them, but the effort felt puny even to her, and the creatures did not pay any heed to the attempt.

“We’re not exactly carrying a wide assortment!” Dannel shouted back, giving ground around one of the pillars, drawing his foe after him. He had his sword out now, and was looking for an opening with which to use it.

Mole fired her crossbow at the skeleton threatening Zenna, but the tiny bolt did little damage and the creatures lacked the usual weaknesses that she could exploit in a living foe. The skeleton paid her no heed, instead focusing on the tiefling. Zenna darted back into the corridor leading back toward the entrance, the skeleton's claw glancing harmlessly off the protection of her mage armor.

Hodge rushed up at one of the two skeletons menacing Arun, chopping at its leg with his axe. Bone chips went flying as the axe bit deep, but in turn he drew a flurry of attacks from several of its arms, bludgeoning and scratching at the dwarf's body. His shield absorbed several of the attacks, but still the dwarf found himself bleeding from several cuts as the skeleton lifted its arms for another attack.

The last skeleton continued its assault upon Arun with sweeps of its claws that scraped uselessly against his heavily armored body. The preponderance of limbs actually hindered it, and it was only able to effectively utilize four at once as weapons. Eschewing the relatively small hammer he carried, Arun instead laid into the skeleton with a powerful two-handed swing of Morgan's sword, cleaving into the skeleton's body and sundering a half-dozen ribs from its torso. Clinger helped by clamping onto one of the skeleton's legs with its powerful bite, and as its arms converged to attack Arun swept the sword around again in a potent backswing, taking one of its arms off at the elbow.

Unfortunately it still had five more limbs with which to attack.

Zenna found herself running back the way they had come, the skeleton close behind her. She had powerful spells burning in her memory, but was loathe to use up her strongest magic now, not while deadlier adversaries lurked further ahead. It didn't look like the skeleton was going to leave her much choice, however. She shot a wave of burning hands from her wand down the corridor after her, but her only reward was a claw that she only narrowly avoided, leaving several slightly bleeding scratches on her temple as a reminder.

She ran back into the room with the giant table-sculpture, looking for an opportunity, the skeleton right behind her.

Dannel led his adversary on a chase around the room, running up on the walls when necessary, using the pillars to slow its progress. His sword darted out in occasional strikes, although it wasn't able to do much in the way of damage to the skeleton. In turn he'd taken several hits from its sweeping claws, although thus far nothing serious had gotten past his armor.

Hodge, on the other hand, was finding himself in difficulty again. Standing toe-to-toe with the skeleton was proving a flawed strategy, for even though the powerful strokes of his axe were doing damage, for each swing of his the skeleton got off four attacks of his own. Hodge's face was now marked by a number of painful scratches, and several other bruises covered his body beneath his armor. Fortunately the skeleton, while imposing, wasn't especially strong, and none of the injuries he'd taken thus far were life-threatening. But the sheer volume of hits he'd taken were beginning to have a cumulative effect.

But the dwarf, stubborn to the last, refused to give ground.

A loud clatter of bones sounded the first casualty of the battle, as Arun's foe collapsed in a mangled heap. The dwarf, still mounted, turned Clinger and charged the skeleton facing Hodge from behind, hurling one of his hammers as he came. The missile collided into the spine of the skeleton, cracking the great bones, causing the creature to teeter unsteadily. That gave Hodge the opening he needed, and he brought his waraxe up in a powerful arc that slammed hard into its pelvis, shattering bones with the force of the impact. The skeleton fell, shattering into its component bones upon striking the hard floor.

Hodge sagged back and wiped his face, drawing blood across his features in a garish mask. "Better... go... help... the elf..." he panted.

Arun drew a potion vial out of his pouch and tossed it down to his friend. "Drink that," he commanded, before turning Clinger toward the next opponent. The skeleton was already coming his way, actually, as Dannel had led it on a full circuit around the room, and was even now rounding the final pillar, drawing the skeleton after him.

The paladin looked around, realizing that the final skeleton was missing, as well as Zenna and Mole. He felt a momentary indecision, but then grimaced. First things first, he thought, urging his mount once more into battle.

Zenna raced around the perimeter of the huge chair/table sculpture in the vastness of the entrance chamber. Behind her the skeleton kept pace. The skeleton did not even notice the gnome bounding along almost silently behind it. Knowing her crossbow was of little use against such a thing, the gnome thought hard for an alternative. Inspiration finally struck like a hammerblow, and she smiled as she reached into her bag of holding. Her magical boots sent her off like a dart, and she easily caught up to the skeleton, darting between its legs and back before it could react. It started to turn, but Mole had already reached her destination, looping the other end of her rope around a protrusion from the sculpture and securing it in an instant with a simple hoist knot.

"Nah, yah!" she yelled up at the skeleton, backing up toward the corridor mouth. Zenna, she saw, had already retreated in that direction.

The skeleton, mindless and with a singular purpose, started toward them, only to stumble as the rope tied to its ankle snagged. It lurched forward, off balance, and finally clattered to the floor. Flames washed over it, as Zenna fired another blast of burning hands from her wand.

"Ah, you'll burn the rope," Mole warned. "C'mon, let's go get the guys with the big muscles to finish this one off."

They retreated down the corridor and returned to the pillar room in time to witness the destruction of the last skeleton by Arun, Dannel, and Clinger. Hodge was seriously hurt, so Zenna tended to him, using the power of her healing wand. Not many charges left in that one, either, she thought, but there was nothing to be done for that now. Mole told the paladin and elf about the one they'd trapped in the last room, and they quickly departed to finish that matter, rejoining them just a few moments later.

"Well, that wasn't so bad," Dannel opined.

"They threw them at us to force us to deplete our strength," Zenna said. "We'll have to face the two that Arun turned again, and remember there's still two giants left as well."

“Well, Mole and I hurt them a bit yesterday,” the elf reminded her.

“I wouldn’t count on it,” Zenna said. “We may not be the only ones who have access to healing potions and wands, you know.”

“Always the optimist,” Dannel replied. “Heck, why don’t we just surrender now?”

“Well, some of us have to be realists first...”

“Um, guys?” Mole interrupted. “Bad giants, ugly hags, rude cleric, remember?”

“Yeah, c’mon, I wanna chop somepin that dies when yer hit it,” Hodge grouched. He still looked a nightmare, but none of them suggested washing up in the alien fountains that continued to pour their contents into the central basin in the middle of the room. Instead he drew a tiny flask from an inner pocket and drew a swallow from it.

“Hey, you were holding out on us!” Mole said, as he tucked the flask back into its hiding place.

“Emergency supplies,” the dwarf responded. “Them healin’ wands and potions kin only put so much back, ye know.”

“Come on,” Arun said. He’d treated his and his mount’s wounds with his own healing powers, and now the companions, mostly intact, headed toward the door from which the skeletons had issued. The doors slid open silently at their approach, revealing a long corridor beyond that quickly swallowed them up, the doors closing as quietly as they had opened once they were all past.

“Hold up a second.”

Mole’s voice drew them all to a halt, the sound of Clinger’s heavy breathing echoing unnaturally loud in the confines of the corridor. Behind them, Zenna could hear the faint vibration of Vaprak’s Voice building in the distance, though sound was muted through the door behind them.

“What?” Hodge asked. “Yer see somethin’?”

“Like I could see anything over this hulk,” she said, but she patted Clinger with affection as she said it. “No, this is more of a smell, and it ain’t that nice.”

“Go ahead,” Zenna said. “Be careful.”

The gnome grinned and crept forward, virtually invisible, a tiny shape shrouded in a dark cloak. She’d turned the talent of avoiding detection into nearly an art form. Her armor was enchanted to muffle the sounds of movement, and she made barely a whisper on the odd stone of the corridor floor as she slipped onward.

Another sliding door became visible ahead at the end of the corridor. She suspected that it would open automatically once she drew near, but also knew that it would instantly alert whoever or whatever lay beyond.

For a moment she was undecided, but then she shrugged slightly. Well, you're a scout, aren't you? Scouts scout. So scout, scout.

That settled, she crept forward. Belatedly she thought about going back to borrow Dannel's slippers; that way she could come in above the door and take a quick peek from above when they opened. Whoever was beyond wouldn't be expecting that. Or heck, she could just have Zenna make her invisible...

She was about to turn back when the door suddenly slid aside.

Oh well, she thought. Then she looked through at the room beyond, and in the next instant was running back to the others, all thought of stealth abandoned, her heart pounding in her chest.

Behind her, the door slid shut once again.

Chapter 177

The chamber seemed smaller than it actually was, as it was divided into two levels, with the rear of the chamber eight feet higher than the forepart, with a curving stone stair to the right of the initial entry providing access to the higher level. Thick pillars of white stone further reinforced the illusion of a confined space, rising to join buttresses that supported another vaulted ceiling high above. The familiar light panels provided illumination, but several had apparently failed, leaving a partial pattern that left various areas of the room steeped in shadow.

The room's solitary inhabitant stood on the edge of the platform, looking down at the door below. He did not stir as the door slid open, nor did he respond as the adventurers entered.

The companions drew in a collective gasp as they saw what Mole had seen, earlier.

Morgan's muscular torso was bare, his flesh covered with crude markings hastily painted in black ink and red ochre. While clearly applied in haste, the designs contained a medley of sigils, words, and pictures that were both obscene and profane. The cleric's face was covered by a black hood cinched tightly around his neck, with two holes cut for eyes; his only other garment was a loincloth girded about his hips. He bore a wicked-looking club in both hands, a heavy piece of black iron nearly five feet in length.

"Welcome," a voice rasped from somewhere atop the platform. From elsewhere came an evil cackle. "So pleased you could join us," the first voice continued.

"What have you done to him?" Zenna demanded. Reflections of herself shifted around her; mirror images that masked her true location.

“We’ve shown him his true path, dearie,” came the voice. Zenna resisted the urge to look down at Mole, who was standing behind Hodge. The three warriors, Arun, Hodge, and Dannel, formed a half-circle in front of the two women. But Zenna knew that the true danger here wasn’t mere physical assault, but the magical powers of the hags.

“And now you will pay, for the death of our sister,” the other voice said. “You were fools to return to this place...”

“Kill them!” the first hag crooned.

The sound of the footfall was close, and heavy, echoing across the floor to their left. It was followed almost instantly by another, to their right. From the way the floor shook at the steps, it was clear to all of them what their source had to be, even if there was nothing at all there that they could see. Without hesitation Arun, now dismounted, rushed to the left, while Clinger and Hodge both charged to the right. Both dwarves were alert to the sound of the heavy footfalls that approached them, but they could not fully adjust to the invisible giants that suddenly materialized before them as they swung their heavy clubs at their diminutive foes. Arun managed to dodge aside at the last instant, and partially deflected the powerful blow with his borrowed sword, but Hodge was less fortunate, and he took a punishing blow across his breastplate that laid him out on his back, gasping for breath.

“Is that... the best yer got?” he choked out, pulling himself back to his feet. The celestial lizard gave him a moment’s respite as it seized the giant’s ankle in its powerful jaws, crushing it in a painful grip.

Zenna knew that the dwarves would not be able to stand long alone against a pair of giants, but she knew that another attack was forthcoming. And indeed, the air around Morgan suddenly seemed to shimmer, and the two hags appeared flanking the cleric, their faces twisted in a sinister expression of utter hatred, their fingers pointing at the companions.

Zenna felt a twisting in her gut as one of the hag’s gazes fixed upon her. She felt a sudden panic well up within her, and a wave of nausea that threatened to overbear her. She knew that if she gave into the hag’s power, even for an instant, she would be lost, and possibly with her all of them. She reached down into herself, drawing upon an inner reserve of fortitude, and with a shudder the power of the eyebite faded.

She felt a grim thrill of satisfaction as the hag snarled in anger.

The other hag focused her attention upon Hodge. “You cannot resist my will, dwarf,” she said with a cackle, as she snared his mind with the same power of domination that she’d used before to such great effect upon Morgan.

Indeed, she was correct. But even as the hag attempted to exercise her control through the mental link, she found herself blocked by the protective aura placed upon the dwarf moments ago, just before they’d entered the room.

“That one,” Zenna growled, calling upon her magic in a flaming blast of power. The scorching ray twisted into the hag, but even as the fiery magic struck her, it faded into wisps of nothingness.

“Your petty spells cannot harm the likes of me, apprentice!” the hag laughed. “But my pretty can do more, much more!”

And with that she pointed again, and Morgan leapt off the edge of the platform, landing squarely on the floor before them with a sound of finality as he hefted the ugly metal club.

Chapter 178

Facing two hill giants, the evil hags, and their former ally, once again the situation looked grave for the adventurers from Cauldron.

The song filled Dannel as it always seemed to, now, as he lifted his bow and took aim down the length of a long shaft. He could not keep it in, and his lips parted in a pure note of focused joy as he let the arrow fly. The missile slammed into the hag’s shoulder, drawing a cry of pain from her as it drove her back. He reloaded and drew again, lost in total focus upon the bow and the song, and even as the hag recovered he struck her again, piercing her side this time with the second shaft. But the hag was a supernatural being, infused with the darker powers of faerie, and despite the two grievous wounds she was still clearly far from beaten.

Arun did not hold anything back, laying into the giant with a two-handed smite that sent the huge creature rocking backward, pain exploding from the deep wound in its side. The giant lifted his club to strike again, but before he could swing the paladin slid six inches of steel into his groin, and the giant stiffened in agony. In desperation the giant smashed his club down into the dwarf with everything it had, the full power of its strength and weight behind the blow.

The club struck the ground with enough force to crack one of the floor tiles. But the dwarf, trained from youth in the tactics of fighting giants, had shifted out of the path of the club as it had come down, and stood unharmed.

The giant looked down into the eyes of the paladin, and saw death.

The other giant was finding itself pressed as well. It pounded Clinger with several powerful blows of its club, but the celestial lizard refused to release its hold upon the giant’s ankle. Hodge rushed back to help it, opening a foot-long gash in its other leg with his axe. The giant shifted back to the dwarf and struck him solidly in the shoulder, again knocking him roughly about, but even though it was clear that the dwarf could not absorb many more hits like that, still he lifted his axe and came in again. The giant poked the club at the dwarf’s face, but Hodge too was a dwarf of dwarves, and he easily ducked the desultory attack, coming up in a roll that ended with his axe coming up into the giant’s thigh.

The giant roared in pain, its legs now twin channels of agony running in parallel up into its body. It lifted its club again, but even as it shifted its weight it felt an explosion of pain in its lower back. It felt as though a spear of flames had been thrust into its spine, and as it staggered, the sensation grew as it lost its balance and plummeted forward, falling to its knees and only barely catching itself from falling on its face. It saw the dwarf and his damnable axe coming again, and tried to grab him, but again the dwarf was too quick and his fingers closed only on air.

As the giant fell, Mole let go of its belt and fell smoothly to the floor. She looked at her bloody knife with amazement and smiled to herself.

It's not how big it is, it's where you put it, she thought. But then, leaving the crippled giant to Hodge to finish, she turned and headed swiftly to the stairs that led up to the platform.

But even as the dwarves battled for their lives against the giants, Zenna's attentions were focused on the cleric who started toward her, the club coming up menacingly.

"You don't have to do this, Morgan," she said. "You can fight them!"

But the cleric did not respond. Zenna hurled a spell at him, to hold him again, but this time her magic slid off the focused shield of the cleric's will.

This time, he would not be denied the vengeance he had desired, ever since he had met her.

She saw Dannel turn toward them. "No!" she cried. "You know what you have to do!"

She saw the pain in the elf's eyes, but also saw the acceptance, knew that the key to their victory lay in overcoming the hags, in breaking the spell that held Morgan captive.

Leaving her to face the wrath of the dominated cleric alone.

Chapter 179

The elf continued his barrage, trying to force arrows through the terrible defenses of the hag. The other hag shifted the dark power of her gaze to fall upon him, and for a moment he felt that same surge of evil that had threatened Zenna. But Zenna had also laid a protective ward upon him as well, and after a moment the agony of the eyebite faded from him as well. He drew yet another arrow, sighting at the injured hag... and she vanished, drawing down once more a cloak of protective invisibility. Instinctively he fired his arrow, but the hag must have moved swiftly, for it only passed through empty air.

He shifted his aim toward the second creature, but felt a redoubling of the earlier evil assault upon him as the hag focused upon him yet again with the fell power of her spell. This time his defenses failed to hold, and his bow fell from nerveless fingers as he fell back, waves of pain and nausea washing over him, the hag's cackles echoing through his mind.

Zenna drew back as Morgan whipped his club through one of the mirror images, the glamour vanishing as though popped by the force of the blow. She had no more spells to hold him or sway his mind; she'd used up the bulk of her clerical powers on protection from evil spells for her allies.

Still, she was not without resources. She fired off a color spray into his face, a brilliant barrage that had left tough foes stunned and vulnerable.

But even as the colors faded, he was attacking again. This time a pair of images vanished before his fury, and the cold eyes on the other side of the black mask promised death.

So be it, then, she thought.

Even as the cleric lifted his weapon to strike her down, she unleashed her second scorching ray at point-blank range into his chest. His skin blackened and crisped where the ray tore into him, but the man did not cry out, nor did he falter, though the wound had to be incredibly painful. Instead he lashed out again, and this time his club clipped a solid form, tearing through her shield and her mage armor and striking painfully against her shoulder. She fell back against the nearby wall. The club came in again, but once again, distracted by the last remaining image, which continued to shift around her, he missed and drove the club heavily into the wall a foot from her face.

Not hesitating, she reached out and grabbed the club, releasing a powerful jolt of electrical energy through the metal weapon into the cleric. The shocking grasp tore into him like a raging flood, and he stiffened, dropping the heavy weapon from charred fingers.

But driven by a combined fury that originated both within him and from outside, the cleric surged at her again before she could pull herself up, and his powerful fingers locked onto her throat, driving her back into the wall.

Even at that moment, as the dwarves finished off the two giants, and Dannel succumbed to the fell power of the hags, Mole reached the top of the platform, her cloak drawn close around her, a dark shadow amongst the confusion of the battle. She saw the one hag, but while she could see bloodstains on the floor where Dannel had shot the other, she could not see it. That was the leader, she knew, the one that had dominated Morgan, the key to this confrontation. But where is she, she thought, suspecting that she knew the answer. She heard a flapping sound in the air above, among the pillars, but when she looked up she saw nothing there either.

"Damn you, Kymzo," she heard a voice say quietly, so close that she almost jumped up and gave away her position. She crouched lower in the lee of the stairs, and focused her senses out over the platform.

There. A droplet appeared in mid-air, falling to the floor, smeared a moment later by a passing foot. Heading for one of the two doors that exited the chamber from the platform.

Mole was off like a shot, crouched low to the ground.

"Come sister, we must flee this place..."

The voice, coming from thin air, gave Mole her target, and she leapt. Belatedly the consequences for a mistimed attack flashed through her mind, and then she was hanging on the hag's back, to all outside observers dangling there in mid-air three feet off the ground.

The hag hissed in anger, and Mole could feel powerful claws tearing at her arms and face. But the hiss had been what she was waiting for, and it guided her as she tore with the knife. The hiss turned into a broken gurgle as the hag staggered and fell, Mole following her down, driving the knife again and again into her throat. It was like trying to stab a tree, the hag's thick skin like bark, but the initial surprise assault had done its work, combined with Dannel's arrows jutting from its gnarled body. Splotches of blood appeared on the floor beneath her, and then the hag appeared, quivering as it bled out the last of its life upon the stone tiles of the floor.

Mole drew herself up and looked up at the other hag, who had turned to see the death of her sister. She was a sight, blood covering her sleeves and splattered on her face, the knife in her hand a mess of gore. She lifted her arm and pointed at the hag with the knife.

"You're next."

The hag turned invisible and fled.

Zenna saw flashes of light flare across her vision as Morgan squeezed, cutting off the flow of air and blood through her neck. She struggled against his grip, which felt like iron, but he was too strong.

"I... I didn't kill your family," she gasped. Mole had told her the whole tale of woe, but it didn't seem to matter now, as the cleric strangled her.

Dimly she heard the cry of the hag, somewhere beyond the face of the man whose hate-filled visage dominated her vision. But then, as she looked up into his eyes, she saw the spell that had controlled him snap, sensed the iron bonds of control that the hag had established over his mind and body shatter with its death.

But the hatred was still there, and the pressure around her throat hadn't eased. If anything, it grew stronger, infused with the madness that now burned through the narrow slits in the black fabric.

Consciousness faded, and the black embraced her.

Chapter 180

"GET OFF!"

Arun grappled Morgan's arms and heaved, trying to break the cleric's grip on Zenna, but the man's hands were knotted around the unconscious woman's neck, and his arms were like iron bars, rigid and unyielding. The dwarf didn't hesitate, bringing his sword up and slamming the hilt into the cleric's face, shattering his jaw. Morgan went limp, flying backward to land semi-conscious on the hard stone tiles of the floor.

The paladin knelt by the unmoving woman, and found that she was not breathing. His powers of healing were somewhat depleted from their earlier encounters, but he drew deeply upon his reservoir and channeled positive energy, the gift of his god, into her.

She did not stir.

"Zenna!"

Dannel staggered forward, all but falling at her side. He had his healing wand out, but ignored it as he drew upon a pure song of grief and love that poured out of him, into her. Sparkles of blue light formed in the air between them, borne on the notes of the song, vanishing into her body.

Her body arched as she drew in a sudden, desperate gasp of air, then she started choking, feeling at the tender flesh of her throat that was already beginning to bruise.

"Hold still," Dannel said. "Let the magic do its work."

She nodded, forcing herself to breathe calmly through her nose until the urge to gasp faded and she could breathe normally. An ugly necklace of purple welts remained where Morgan's fingers had pressed, however. She rose, the elf helping her stand. The room was quiet again, with the massive bodies of the giants flanking them in the center of the room.

The companions gathered around the figure lying on the floor. Morgan, still groggy, pulled himself up until he knelt there in their midst, his eyes lowered, blood still oozing from the cracked and burned flesh tight across his chest where Zenna had hit him with her spell. He reached up and tore the hood from his head, revealing a face that was a mask of blood and suffering.

"Kill me cleanly," he said, his words slurred due to his damaged jaw. "I do not deserve mercy, but still I ask it, a clean, quick death."

"I think we've had enough killing here," Arun said, softly.

"You were under the control of the hags' magic," Dannel added. "There is no fault, no shame in it." He shuddered at the remembered power of the eyebite to which he had succumbed.

Morgan's gaze did not waver, fixed upon Zenna. "I have failed," he said, his voice thick with emotion. His body shook, and they could see the despair flowing out from him like waves of heat from a roaring fire.

Dannel's voice was soothing, although Zenna could see that it struck the man like a spearpoint. "Morgan, you are still needed..."

His stare remained fixed on Zenna. “Tell them!” he commanded. “Tell them, that they may hold their false pity!”

Zenna stepped forward. She did not have the quiet nobility of Arun, or the smooth presence of Dannel, but there was still something that shone in her eyes when she took them all in with her gaze, before focusing back on the fallen cleric.

“Yes, you have failed,” Zenna said. “You have failed us, and we have failed you.” Morgan opened his mouth to speak, but Zenna kept on talking over him. “And perhaps you have failed in your compact to your god and your church; that is a matter for you and your oaths to resolve. But mark this, priest. This is not a game, here. We are in a struggle for our lives, and the defeat of one foe does not necessarily mean that the danger is past. We are a team, here—“ she indicated her companions with a wide sweep of her hand—“and we have to rely upon each other, if we hope to complete our mission here. Remember the paladin, and the lives that will be lost in Cauldron and Redgorge if we do not return with him, or at least word of his fate.”

Her gaze intensified, and for a moment it was as if the two of them, wizard and cleric, were the only people in the room. “I offer you no forgiveness, nor do I proffer pity, Morgan of Helm. But nor do I release you from the oaths you swore to us, when you became a member of this company. Oaths perhaps not in the language of ritual and tradition, sworn on an altar in a church, but oaths nonetheless. You are not finished here, Morgan Ahlendraal, and I do not release you.” The last words were almost a whisper, but she could see the force with which they struck him.

The cleric rose. His face was an iron mask, but Zenna knew him well enough to see the storm of turmoil that lay behind that barrier. He could barely stand. Zenna knew that there was one thing more that needed to be done. She stepped forward.

“You must ask,” she said, and she saw that he flinched. Would her words be enough?

“The elf...” he rasped.

“No. From me. You must ask, cleric of Helm, if your honor is truly more than just words and inflated pride.”

Morgan sagged, and for a moment Zenna thought that he would collapse. But then his eyes came back up to meet hers, and while there was no peace there—there would not be, not for some time, if ever, she knew—there was at least a return of the old determination that she’d come to know there.

“Heal me... please...” he said.

Chapter 181

They were running out of healing magic, Zenna thought, as she replaced her healing wand back in its pocket sewn into the lining her belt pouch. As far as she knew, they were completely done with the healing potions they’d brought with them from Cauldron, and after treating the injuries they all suffered—well, except for Mole, she'd hadn't been scratched—the stored energies in her wand were nearly depleted.

Still, they were going to push on. What else could they do? They'd defeated the hags, at least—though Mole had told them that the last one had escaped—and now they had to confirm the grim outcome of Alek Tercival's fate with which the hags had tormented them.

Morgan had not been able to help them with that; the channel of mental contact established by the hag's dark magic had only been one-way, and while he'd been able to perceive what was happening, as a helpless observer in his own body, he could not tell them if their taunts had been based in truth. He did report that he hadn't seen any more giants, although the mystery of the flapping wings that Zenna and Mole had both heard was revealed as the cleric told them of a small imp-like creature, which had served the hags as a spy and messenger.

"They spoke of someone named Nabthatoron," he told them. "From their words and tone, I gathered that he was someone of great power in this region."

"The demon," Dannel said, and Zenna had nodded.

But there was nothing for it but to continue.

They retreated out of the complex, but only temporarily, to recover Morgan's armor and shield. Arun had dismissed his companion again following the battle, so they all walked together, their sounds of their footsteps echoing hollowly off the walls of the canyon. The cleric had accompanied them stiffly, his pain not entirely physical. He'd tried to wash off the sigils painted onto his body by the hags, but even though he was able to blur some of them beyond recognition, scrubbing his torso with a lye cake provided from Mole's bag, Zenna knew that they would likely remain intact, inside of him, for some time to come.

They ate a somber meal, and drank deeply from their waterskins, and then gathered up their weapons and returned to the complex. Arun had offered Morgan his sword back, but the knight refused. Instead he took up the blackened iron club that the hags had given him. Zenna suspected that there was some overwrought meaning in the gesture from the man's point of view, but she didn't feel like debating it with him. She too was tired, eager for this journey to end, whether the outcome was for good or for ill.

They returned to the complex, still wary, but nothing emerged from the quiet halls to challenge them this time. They returned to the room where they'd battled the hags, and climbed to the top of the platform. The chamber smelt of blood and death, and they knew that in the warm, damp climate, rot would soon follow. They gave the corpse of the dead hag a wide berth and headed toward one of the sliding doors.

The door slid aside at their approach to reveal another corridor, ten feet wide with a vaulted ceiling fifteen feet above. The corridor deposited them in another room, a relatively compact chamber roughly thirty feet square.

"Home sweet home," Mole said.

Indeed the place had the look of a residence, and even before one looked at the three beds arranged against the far wall it was evident that this was the demesne of the hags. A series of golden baboon masks were hung along the north wall, and rich carpets and tapestries covered the floor and walls. Several skeins of fine yarn were laid out around chairs to their left, suggesting that at least some of the designs in the place were the product of the chamber's former owners. A chest to their left in the corner completed the décor.

"It's sad," Dannel said, examining one of the tapestries with a critical eye. "Some of this stuff is really good, actually, and yet it came from minds steeped so in evil."

"Bah," Hodge said, but the dwarf fidgeted, unable to think of anything further to say.

"They chose their fate," Arun said, closing the matter, at least in his mind.

Mole had made a beeline for the chest. "Well now, what do we have here?" she said, flexing her fingers before examining the lock.

"Careful, there might be traps," Zenna said.

Mole shot her a look—well, duh—before returning to her work. But her examination did not find any obvious dangers, and it appeared that the chest was unlocked as well. Apparently the hags had been confident in their ability to repel intruders in their lair.

Mole opened the chest, revealing an assortment of neatly stacked items of value. With a small cry of glee she began digging through them, cataloguing each and placing them on a nearby carpet.

"Good stuff," Hodge said, picking out a golden armband. "All this," he added, indicating the contents of the chamber, "Worth more 'an a few coppers, me thinks."

Mole nodded seriously. "Yeah, but how are we going to lug it all out of here?"

Morgan cleared his throat tentatively. "It is clear that Alek Tercival is not here," he offered, but it was clear that he still lacked his old fire, for he did not press the matter, and the others ignored him.

Mole found a scroll and unrolled it, giving its contents a quick scan. "Here, Zenna, this is for you," she said.

Arun was watching them from nearby, and took interest in a number of securely stoppered vials that Mole next drew from the chest. "Healing potions?" he asked. Mole opened one, took a sniff and a tiny taste, and nodded. "Those will be useful," the paladin said.

Zenna, meanwhile, had examined the scroll. It was clearly arcane, although the complex formulae were beyond her. She cast a read magic cantrip, and sucked in a startled breath. There were some powerful spells here! She felt a tingle as she looked over the spell titles... prying eyes, greater dispel, sequester...

Dannel, meanwhile, had turned to examine the rest of the room. “I saw a mask like these in Cauldron,” he said, noting the baboon masks affixed to the walls. In the halfling’s shop, Alek Tercival had brought it back, sold it to him.”

Zenna and Morgan both turned to him. “I wonder if he got it here?” the tiefling asked.

“Perhaps. Or perhaps they are remnants of some larger ancient civilization, with artifacts like these scattered throughout the area.”

“Okay, I think that’s all of it!” Mole said. She indicated the spread of treasure. In addition to a small bag of gold coins, there was a set of assorted silver dishes, a plain copper chain necklace set with small brass orbs, four potions, and a light mace with a handle crafted out of bone. “Zenna, what’s magical?”

The tiefling returned to that side of the room and cast another cantrip, scanning the items. “The necklace, the potions, and the mace,” she said.

“Ah,” Mole said. She took up the mace, her small hands barely fitting around the thick haft. “Well, this isn’t as good as my sword, but it might do a bit more damage than that little knife of mine. If no one minds?”

Hodge took up the necklace and shrugged it over his head and thick beard. He looked down at it, his eyes widening in surprise. “This be gold!” he said in surprise.

Dannel came over and examined it closely. “Interesting,” he said. “I have seen the like once before only... a necklace of missiles. These orbs can be hurled at a foe, and explode in a magical fireball. A potent device, but one must be careful, lest an orb be detonated by mistake.”

Hodge quickly—and carefully—removed the necklace, shoving it at the elf. “Bah, I only wanted honest metal and a nice gem or two!”

Mole was already packing some of the silver dishes into her bag of holding. She looked wistfully around, as if regretting the treasure that they would not be able to carry out of here.

Zenna’s gaze had returned to the baboon masks. They were well done, and seemed to be watching their movements. She shuddered, but the feeling brought back a memory, of something she had been told earlier...

“Arun,” she said. “Does it seem like those masks are watching us?”

The dwarf looked at her in confusion, but then a realization hit. “The celestial’s message.”

Mole looked up, interested again. “What?”

“The celestial who spoke to us, told us of a great treasure, in the lair of her ‘false sisters,’ ‘beyond the watchful eyes of the north.’”

The gnome bounced up and ran over to that wall. “Damn, too heavy,” she said, examining one of the masks. “I wonder if we could scrape some of the gold off though...”

“Mole,” Zenna said.

“Yes, yes,” she replied, searching the wall behind the masks. “Hello, what have we here...”

She pressed something, and a small part of the wall folded out, revealing a hidden compartment beyond. She reached in and drew out a long object shrouded in silk.

“Cool!” she said, drawing back the covering to reveal a thick quarterstaff, fashioned from a wood so pale as to be almost white in coloration. She swung it through the air, and it almost seemed to thrum eagerly in her hand.

“Give it to Morgan,” Zenna said. “He needs a decent weapon.”

The cleric shook his head, and swallowed. “It is a gift of the gods...” he said. “A holy weapon, I cannot...”

With impatience written on her face, Zenna walked over to Mole, took the staff, and thrust it into Morgan’s hands. “We don’t have time for this foolishness,” she said. “We have a man to find.”

Over Mole’s protests, they quickly gathered what they could of the remaining treasure, shared out the healing potions, and turned to leave. Two pairs of eyes, one gnomish, one dwarvish, lingered on the wealth remaining behind, but soon the room was empty once more, the smooth door sliding shut behind the departing adventurers.

They returned to the large outer room and chose the other exit, which led to a virtually identical corridor, ending in another door.

The door swished open to reveal another small chamber. The room’s dominant feature was set into the opposite wall, a giant pentagram set into the wall. The interior of the pentagram was a glistening wall, almost as if a pool of water were somehow being kept within in defiance of gravity. Shadows flickered in that surface that might have been a distorted reflection, or might have been distinct images of something deep beyond.

Facing the pentagram was a large chair, an angular construction of white stone. The chair was situated in the midst of a circular carving in the floor, within which there were evenly spaced designs, a set of five small pentagrams that were each laid in a different colored tile.

Seated in the chair was a man, his back to them, his head tilted as if in rest—or dead, perhaps.

Mole, faced with a situation almost guaranteed to prod her curiosity, was the first into the room, giving the carving in the floor a wide berth as she circled the room to get a look at the seated figure. The others were more cautious, but they followed her, with Morgan, Arun, and Hodge moving to the right, and Zenna and Dannel following Mole around to the left.

The seated figure was clad in the familiar raiment of a knight of Helm. Morgan confirmed their suspicion, speaking his name.

“Alek Tercival.”

The man stirred at the sound of his name, lifting his head, looking as though he'd just come out of a deep sleep. “Yes,” he said, and it was as if the word had been drawn from a deep place within him.

“Brother,” Morgan said, his voice thick, “We have come far to find you.”

The paladin smiled. “Your timing is precipitous, friend. For a great evil is descending upon the land, and the time fast approaches when the forces of Light and those of the Dark will be tested one against the other.”

Zenna felt a twinge of uncertainty as the man spoke, a vague sense of unease. Using Dannel's body to shield her movements, she cast a minor cantrip, focusing upon the man seated in the chair.

“How did you get here? What about the hags?” Dannel asked.

The paladin smiled, a sad, deep smile. “They ensnared with their fell magic, friend. In my pride I sought to defeat their evil alone... but they were too strong for me, and I fell into their power. But now you have come to save me, and together we can confront the evil that stirs in Cauldron...”

“Aye,” Arun said. “It's past time we left this place behind.”

“What is this?” Mole said, looking up at the great pentagram.

“It is called the Starry Mirror,” Alek replied. “It is a gateway between worlds, created by a civilization now long-lost to legend.”

Zenna leaned forward over Dannel's shoulder, so that her lips were close to his ear. “There's illusion magic at work here,” she whispered.

The elf nodded. Turning to the seated man, he spoke.

“A great many people have been very worried about you, Sir Tercival. Above all, your close friend, the current High Priestess of the Temple of Helm in Cauldron. Surely you recall her name?”

The others looked at Dannel in surprise, but Zenna kept her eyes on the seated paladin. The man laughed. “Very well then,” he said, rising from the chair to stand before them.

Mole had been keeping an eye on the Starry Mirror, so she detected the shimmering as the mirror's surface distended and something passed through into the room behind them.

"Something's coming through!" she yelled in warning, even as the form of Alek Tercival fell off of the man before them like water flowing from an upended pitcher. What remained was a thin, amorphous figure of a man, his body a smooth, reflective surface that shone like quicksilver. He lifted a sword that looked like a single great shard of reflective glass, and their combined looks of horror were reflected in that plane as he lifted it over his head in a promise of blood to be shed.

Chapter 182

Arun wasn't possessed of the fastest reflexes among them, but nor was he one to hesitate when a clear enemy presented itself. Thus, even as the creature released its magical disguise to take its true form, and hefted its mirror-like sword, the dwarf growled and charged, swinging his sword at its body.

The bastard sword clove into its torso, releasing a sound that resembled the noise of shattering glass. Its "blood" was dozens of tiny shards that tinkled as they struck the stone floor, before dissolving into silvery globules that formed tiny bubbles at their feet.

The rest of them turned to face four more of the creatures, slightly smaller versions of the one Arun had struck, but which each carried two of the wicked-looking shard-blades. They moved with the smoothness of liquid as they entered the room and swept ahead to the attack, spreading out to flank their foes. Morgan cried out as one slashed him with his sword, tearing through a gap in his armor and slicing a deep gash in his muscled side. A piece of the sword seemed to sheer off with the hit, jutting from the wound, which fountained bright red blood.

Too close to effectively use his bow, Dannel drew his sword, pushing Zenna behind him as he faced another of the creatures. The monster facing him held both of its blades in a ready position, but instead of attacking, its form suddenly shifted, and several identical images of itself formed out of it, blurring and distorting its location in a way that the companions were already familiar with, from their exposure to Zenna's magic.

The others, including the one Arun had injured, likewise conjured up mirror images, except for the one that had chosen instead to press its assault upon Morgan.

The cleric, in turn, lifted Alakast with both hands, and driving the long white shaft down, smashed it through the body of his foe. The creature's chest exploded with the force of the impact, and it crumpled in a shower of broken glass that soon became a hundred tiny globes of liquid scattered across the floor.

Morgan looked down at his handiwork in amazement, surprised with the strength that had filled his muscles with the attack.

But the rest of the nerra pressed their assault, the mirror images concealing their movements as they darted in among the companions. Hodge cursed as his axe clove through an image, and Dannel likewise thrust harmlessly through another on the opposite flank. Mole dodged nimbly through a swarm of blades, some real, some duplicative, although she was unable to successfully counter with the still-awkward oversized mace she bore.

Before the stone chair, Arun and imposter Alek faced off with full fury, trading blows. The dwarf's assault was stronger, but the mirror images turned the favor to the nerra, as two powerful strokes of the sword clove through empty figments. Its attack, on the other hand, managed a glancing blow on the side of the dwarf's helmet, the uncannily sharp mirror shard shivering and driving an inch-long segment into the dwarf's temple. Arun ignored the blood pouring from the wound, lifting his sword to strike again. Two illusory images yet remained, forming a mélange of three enemies who shifted and separated in a blur.

"Your false friends won't hide you for long," the dwarf growled.

Zenna twisted around Dannel and fired a spray of burning hands into the ranks of the nerra. Mole was on the edge of the effect, but Zenna trusted to her friend's nimbleness to help her avoid the blast. Mole did tumble out of the way, but as the flames hit the lead creature, there was a flare of light and suddenly a wave of heat as the fan of fire surged back into the faces of Dannel and Zenna. The tiefling was not harmed, her innate resistance protecting her, but Dannel drew back in alarm, his face scorched some by the spell.

"Hey, watch it!" he cautioned.

"They have some sort of reflective spell resistance!" she returned.

"Looks like we do it the old fashioned way then!"

He parried a slash from a darting shard that turned out to be real, but before he could riposte, one of the nerra drew its arms close to its body and... shuddered. A spray of razor-sharp shards erupted from its body, lancing into the elf and tiefling. Dannel staggered back, bleeding from a number of cuts, and Zenna was scarcely better off, clutching at a painful, bleeding cut from a shard that had only narrowly missed her eye. What was worse, the shards stuck in the wounds they caused, digging deeper into their flesh and widening the wounds as they went.

Seeing the injuries wrought upon his allies, Morgan waded boldly into the midst of the nerra and their false images, swinging Alakast in a powerful, sweeping arc. Images popped and vanished as the magical staff swept through them, and one of the nerra went flying as the weapon clipped its shoulder, blasting shards of its body free in an explosive rush.

Hodge managed for once to avoid being hit, his shield darting back and forth to absorb repeated blows from the two shard-swords wielded by the nerra facing him. He'd stayed close to the wall, and Morgan's charge had removed the threat of being flanked, so he was able to keep all of the various images surrounding his foe safely in front of him. Conversely, however, his own strikes were notably ineffectual, although he did manage to destroy another image, leaving a mere three shifting forms facing him.

As Morgan knocked back the nerra closest to her, Mole turned to help Dannel and Zenna. The creature ignored her—ah, your mistake, she thought—and thrust its weapons at the elf, scoring a long bleeding gash in Dannel's right leg. But Dannel held his ground, and while his own counter punctured an image, that made it easier for Mole as she brought her new mace squarely into the back of the nerra. The blow wasn't especially powerful, but was perfectly placed, and with a loud glassine snap the creature collapsed forward, shattering as it hit the hard stone floor.

Arun's foe was now giving ground, the dwarf following him step for step, his sword tearing through the last remaining mirror images. Desperate, the nerra thrust his sword at the paladin's face, but Arun batted the thrust aside, and with a mighty two-handed stroke shattered the creature in twain.

The battle quickly ended. The last surviving nerra tried to retreat to the mirror, but with Hodge and Morgan right behind them, and Dannel and Mole converging from the other flank, they were cut down, the last shattering into its component shards within a pace of the opalescent surface.

"Damn," Morgan said, pausing to draw a length of shard out of the vicious wound in his side, pressing his hand against the blood that continued to well from the deep gash.

"We have to treat those cuts quickly, before you bleed to death," Zenna said, drawing out her wand. Dannel followed with his own device, and after painfully drawing out the wounding shards, the two of them quickly closed the bleeding wounds that Zenna, Dannel, and Morgan had suffered in the brief but violent melee.

"What were those things?" Mole asked no one in particular.

"I don't know, but they were nasty," Dannel said, feeling his leg to verify that he'd fully stopped the seeping blood from the wound.

"I dunna believe it," Hodge said.

"What is it?" Mole asked him. The dwarf was examining himself, looking for something.

The dwarf spat and grinned. "We made it through a battle, and I ain't bleedin' out!"

The others couldn't help but laugh.

With the guardians of the mirror defeated, the companions turned to examine their prize.

The Starry Mirror was a plane of rippling translucence imprisoned within the barrier of the pentagram threshold. Mole walked right up to it, drawing a cautionary warning from Zenna. The gnome looked back her with a grin and a slight shrug, as if to suggest, Hey, it's my nature, then she turned back to examination of the portal.

"Look, there's stuff in there," she said, drawing their attention toward the shifting patterns that drifted in and out of focus through the blurry surface.

They all stepped closer, wary of another intrusion by more of the mirror-creatures, until they could make out what Mole had seen. There were a number of images floating within the surface of the mirror, mostly small chambers fashioned from slab rock with unobtrusive features. But in one...

"The paladin!" Dannel said, pointing to a form in the depths of the mirror. The others followed his direction to see the armored figure that had to be Alek Tercival, slumped in the corner of a rocky vault, his blonde hair hanging down about his temples in a chaotic tumble, his face turned away from them, a glowing sword laying on the dusty stone at his feet. And then the image drifted out of focus and was gone.

"Are you certain it was him?" Zenna asked.

"It was him," Morgan said. "I saw the symbol of Helm, on his shield."

"Trapped between glass and stone," Mole said.

"Eh? What?" Hodge asked.

"One of the lines in Jenya's divination, Mole explained. The rest of it went, "He weeps where many can see him, But he can see only himself."

"How do we get him out of there?" Dannel asked. "Alek Tercival!" he shouted into the mirror, but there was no reply.

Arun cautiously reached out and probed the surface of the mirror with his sword. The blade sank into the shimmering pool, and was drawn out unaffected a moment later.

"We already know it's a portal," Mole said. "Those creatures came out of it, earlier. But there were other places than the vault with the paladin in those images. How do we know which destination we will get?"

"There's only one way to find out," Morgan said, squaring his shoulders toward the mirror.

"Wait," Zenna said. "I bet there's a pattern in these colored sigils..."

But the cleric did not hesitate, striding boldly into the mirror, vanishing into its depths.

"Well, now what do we do?" Mole asked.

"There's Alek Tercival, again," Dannel said, pointing toward a particular spot in the Starry Mirror. "I don't see Morgan, however."

"Like as nay he stepp'd into the flamin' pits o' Hades," Hodge grumbled.

Arun looked up at Zenna. "The knight has presented us with a difficult choice," he said.

The tiefling nodded. "Yes. He had his faith..." Is that enough? she added, in her own thoughts.

"If we go through, we should go through together," Dannel said.

"Yer all crazy," Hodge said. "But I ain't stayin' here in this demon-damned place alone."

"Wait," Zenna said, turning back to the ring of six colored tiles in the floor. Drawing out her notebook and a well-worn quill, she quickly noted down the order and placement of the design. The others watched her as she carefully slid the quill back into its holder, and rejoined them.

"All right?" Dannel said, looking at all of them.

Mole grinned, and looked as though she was barely keeping herself from hopping in anticipation.

"Yer all crazy," Hodge repeated, under his breath. But when Arun looked at him, the dwarf nodded.

The five stepped forward, into the Starry Mirror, and vanished.

Chapter 183

Zenna looked around at her new surroundings. Her first thought was of Morgan.

What have you gotten us into now, priest?

The room was small, fashioned of seamless blocks of perfectly smooth stone. There was a decided yellowish tint to the diffuse light that seemed to shine from everywhere at once. The only feature were the five portals set into each of the room's five walls.

There was no sign of the others. She was alone. As far as she could tell, she'd just materialized in the center of the room.

She studied the five portals. Each had an opening shrouded in vague mists that bore a slight coloration. They matched the colors on the floor of the chamber of the Starry Mirror, she realized.

There has to be a pattern here, she thought.

"Zenna?"

The voice was Dannel's, and it sounded faint, distant, as if echoing through a dozen twisting tunnels to reach her.

"I'm here!" she shouted.

"It looks like we're all in different rooms," the elf replied.

“I told yer this be foolish!” Hodge’s distant yell came.

“Morgan? Are you there?” Mole’s voice came.

There was a delay of a few seconds, then they all could hear the cleric’s words. “Yes, I am here as well. I am... sorry. I have tried several portals, but they all lead back to these rooms.”

“Maybe we can meet up,” Dannel suggested. “What color rooms are you all in?”

They discussed the situation further, but from what they revealed, and what Morgan told him of his own experiments, it seemed as though each of their rooms were unique and apart from the others. Morgan had started in a blue room, and had left a coin lying on the floor. Later, when he returned through another blue portal, the place was again empty.

“An endless maze,” Mole said.

“There must be a pattern,” Zenna insisted. “Alek found it, even if by accident.”

“With six colors, the number of permutations is very, very high,” Dannel reminded her. “We could be here for some time.”

Zenna considered it intently. “Perhaps not. I wrote down the color pattern from the exterior room, remember?”

She read off the colors in order, and they decided to follow the order, stepping through the proper sequence of portals. But the experiment failed, and they found themselves in empty rooms again, no closer to an exit.

“What about magic?” Arun asked.

“The entire complex radiates magic,” Zenna said, having already thought to use detect magic. “But I have no spell that can give us an easy answer.”

“What about you, Morgan?” Dannel asked. But the cleric had grown silent, and did not respond.

“Well, if anyone else has any ideas...” the elf began.

A distant sound of metal crashing on stone became audible to all of them. It took Zenna only a moment to figure out the source.

“Hodge, I don’t think that bashing down the walls will be a solution.”

The dwarf’s voice was tinged with a bit of exertion. “Well, blast! I’ll be damned if I’m gunna be trapped in here fer’ever now! What kind o’ crazies would build a place like this?”

Dannel said something dry in response, but Zenna barely heard him. Her mind was whirling, following something Hodge had said...

“Dannel,” she finally interrupted. “You still have that silver plate, right?”

A pause. “Yes, it’s right here. Did you have an idea?”

“Those six-armed skeletons, that odd chair-sculpture... I think that the creature on the plate is the race that build the Voice, at least the complex where we found the hags and the mirror.”

Dannel’s voice came back marked with excitement. “Yes, and there’s a five-sided figure here, and some markings!”

“What are the markings, again?”

The elf described them, a series of ovals with dots or bars beneath them.” Zenna drew out her notebook again, and wrote them down as he spoke. For a long minute she studied them.

“Zenna?” Mole asked.

“I think I have something,” she said. “These symbols could be numbers... if I had a guess, I’d say they form a sequence: four, five, six, one, two, three.”

“All well and good,” Arun said. “But what does it mean?”

But Zenna had already turned to the notes she’d taken in the room with the Starry Mirror. “The ring in the floor,” she told them. “It forms a progression; from the carving it was clear that there was one intended route around the circle.”

“Ah, and the numbers tell you which color to choose,” Dannel said. “Brilliant, Zenna!”

“This is all just theory,” Morgan said.

“Well, I can think of one way to test it,” Mole said. “Zenna, I’m in an orange room. What door do I choose?”

Zenna read her the correct pattern, using the numbers and the color-circle. Mole’s voice followed as she walked through the path of doors, and finally her voice came to them, excited. “I’m in a room with only one exit! I can see the vault, and Alek!”

“Great job!” Dannel said. “Zenna, you have the key, you’ll have to walk us each through...”

As the others followed her directions, the echoing voices of her companions disappeared, one by one. Finally, she was alone. Taking a deep breath, Zenna followed the pattern herself, passing through empty rooms and selecting the right portal in the order that she had deciphered from Dannel’s silver plate.

Finally, she reached the last one. She could see the vault, her friends visible together on the far side. Pausing to take a deep breath, she stepped through...

Chapter 184

After directing the others through the maze, Zenna was the last to step through the final portal, passing through another mirror-doorway into the small stone vault where Alek Tercival was imprisoned.

Morgan and Dannel were crouched over the paladin, with Arun and Hodge close enough behind to block a clear view. Instead, she turned her attention to the rest of the vault.

The place was fairly cramped, a cube of empty space perhaps fifteen feet on each side, surrounded by seamless heavy stones. A heavy iron door, its frame marred by hundreds of shallow gouges—no doubt inflicted by Alek, in his desire to escape—was the only means of exit apart from the mirror-doorway. She turned back to the portal, knowing already what she would find, even before Mole said it.

“The portal’s one-way only from this side. No going back,” the gnome said. She went to take a look at the door, but Zenna could already see that it was similar to the slab portals in Vaparak’s Voice, with no keyhole or other apparently mechanism that might grant them easy egress. Well, if it came to that, she figured that Arun and Hodge would be able to figure out a way to force it open.

She walked over to where she could get a clearer look at their reason for coming. Morgan was speaking to the paladin, but he seemed insensitive to their presence, and when Zenna got a clear look at his face, she saw that his eyes were vague and distant, lost in some private abyss. The paladin was older than most of them, maybe thirty, and while he was still ruggedly handsome, it was clear that he’d suffered a great deal of abuse. How he’d survived here, without food and water, Zenna had no idea. In fact, if it wasn’t for a small crack visible at the base of the iron door, she suspected he would have suffocated. Even so, with seven of them now here, she wondered whether that vent alone would suffice.

“How long have you been here?” Dannel prodded, to no avail.

Morgan placed his hand on the paladin’s shoulder. “We have come for you, brother. We have slain the evil hags and their servants, and will find a way to get you out of here. Do not fear, your shadowed journey has come to an end.”

“Bah, he’s gone daft,” Hodge said. Morgan looked up and shot him a dark look, but Arun drew his cohort aside. “We’d better take a look at that door,” he said to his fellow dwarf.

Morgan, however, did not give up on his colleague, fighting to reach through whatever trauma had disengaged his conscious mind. Zenna, looking around the bleak emptiness of the vault, thought she could understand the root causes of his despair; all that he’d believed in had come crashing down around him, leaving him bereft of the lifeline that had anchored his life. How long had he spent in this place, sealed in, awaiting death?

The cleric had taken up Alakast, and placed it standing on the floor between them. He took up the paladin’s limp hands, and drawing off the man’s gauntlets wrapped them around the smooth white bore of the blessed weapon. “An angel has guided us to this ancient weapon,” he said, earnestly, his hands embracing Alek’s, holding them to the staff. “Feel the power within it, a power that also flows within your veins, my friend...”

Alek Tercival’s eyes seemed to flicker, and he blinked. “Angels... my angels... they... they...”

“Yes, what is it, my friend?” Morgan encouraged him.

The paladin’s body was wracked by a terrible sob. “They betrayed me! The three archons... my angels... they told me I was worthy! Their false promises were a test... and I failed!”

“Angels, hah,” Hodge snorted. Dannel elbowed him.

“I understand,” Morgan said, and although Zenna could not see his face, she could hear the depth of pain in the cleric’s voice.

“We have to get out of here,” Mole said, softly so that her words would not disturb the fragile connection between Morgan and Alek. “And that door’s not coming off unless forced.”

Arun had already taken up position at the door, running his thick fingers along the cracks in the threshold. “I’ll need a lever,” he said.

“I left all me tools behind,” Hodge said. “Me pry-bar would’a made short work o’ that door, gods be damned!”

Morgan and Alek both turned to look at the dwarf, the cleric’s face disapproving, the paladin’s stricken.

“Um... yeah, I think I gots a spike or two in ‘ere...” the dwarf said, digging in his pack.

“So, the ha—um, angels, they sent you into the portal maze?” Dannel said to Alek.

But the paladin’s gaze had fallen back to the white shaft between his hands. He ran his calloused, weather-cracked fingers up its smooth surface. “When the final cage is shackled, the burning doom shall rise,” he said, his voice so low that they had to lean in to hear him.

“What’s that?” Mole asked. She’d been “helping” with the door, and turned to make sure she hadn’t missed something interesting.

Dannel looked at Zenna. “Do you know what he’s talking about?”

Zenna shook her head, but she felt a strong sense of unease, along with a tickle at the edge of her memory. Something...

A loud banging noise made her jump, and Alek Tercival drew back, his hands leaping from the bore of the staff as if burned by it. The sound was Arun, driving a spike into the frame of the door with one of his light hammers, while Hodge, using his dagger as a wedge, tried to widen the gap below it.

Morgan was still talking earnestly to Alek in a low voice, but it appeared as though the paladin had withdrawn inside himself again.

The noise redoubled as the dwarves intensified their efforts upon the door, driving larger the crack in the threshold, then using their larger weapons to lever the portal open further. Finally Arun was able to get his fingers into the crack, and he and Hodge combined their strength to slide the door into its jam, the metal protesting loudly with each inch.

Mole, of course, hopped through the instant that the opening was wide enough to accommodate her. Behind the door was a steep staircase that led upward; they could see light that appeared to be natural daylight filtering down from above. The fresh air was hot, and dry.

The dwarves finished open the door, and recovering their weapons, started up the stairs. The others followed behind, Dannel helping Morgan lift Alek to his feet. The paladin complied woodenly, but leaned heavily against Morgan as the cleric directed him toward the stairs. Dannel took up Alek's glowing sword from the floor of the vault, and slid it back into the paladin's scabbard. Zenna was the last to leave, taking one last look about the vault before following them up the steps.

They emerged into a larger chamber at the top of the stairs. Four thick stone pillars supported a vaulted ceiling almost twenty feet high above them. The opposite wall was breached, leading outdoors, and a wide landscape of rolling sand dunes that extended as far as they could see. A pile of sand gathered by the wind had collected at the base of the opening, spreading out across the floor of the room. A bleached skeleton lay on the floor, its lower body buried under the sand, a rusted pick-axe lying beside one outstretched hand.

"This doesn't look like anywhere near Cauldron that I'm aware of," Dannel said, regarding the vista through the gap in the wall. The others had already moved out into the room; Mole standing near the doorway, the dwarves a short distance behind her, near the skeletal remains at the edge of the pile of sand.

Zenna stepped out from the staircase into the room, but suddenly felt an oppressive feeling descend over her. It was a feeling she recognized, as her eyes were drawn to a high corner of the chamber. Something's scrying us...

She opened her mouth to shout a warning, but before she could speak, there was a loud noise directly to her left, a sudden bang accompanied by an eruption of noxious wisps of cloying gray smoke that appeared out of nothingness. The gray pall persisted only for a heartbeat, dissolving to reveal a monstrosity.

Zenna's eyes lifted up... and up... to look into the face of the horror that loomed over her. It was huge, easily fifteen feet tall, its body roughly humanoid, a pastiche of bulging musculature and bony ridges. It had four arms, two massive limbs that ended in pincers big enough to slice her in twain, with two small arms with articulated hands that jutted from its chest. And its face... its face was a horror, looking at first glance like that of a hound, but with huge, slathering jaws, and eyes that burned red with a fearsome, malevolent intelligence.

The demon regarded them with a look of hateful contempt. “No, you shall not have him,” it said.

Chapter 185

Nabthatoron, the glabrezu lord of the Demonskar, had arrived to take matters into his own hands.

Zenna felt her gut clench with sick horror as she looked up into the utterly alien face of the demon. Her legs barely responding to her commands, she stumbled backward, unable to break away from that unholy stare. Almost casually, the demon swung one massive pincer-claw at her. The movement broke the spell of immobility, and she dodged back just as the pincer closed on where her neck had been a moment earlier. Still, the edge of the claw clipped her body with the force of a battering ram, and she was knocked roughly sprawling, rolling to a stop before one of the pillars on the far side of the room, her entire body throbbing in a medley of shooting pains.

Dannel fitted an arrow to his bow and without hesitation fired. The long shaft struck true, hitting the demon in the chest between its two protruding short arms, but the arrow’s tip barely penetrated its thick hide, and the impact appeared to cause it no damage.

“Puny,” the demon hissed. It spoke a word of power, and chaos filled the room.

A storm of multicolored, flashing, darting energy exploded throughout the chamber. Zenna, struggling to get up, felt a brief twisting sensation as her equilibrium faltered under the force of the demon’s chaos hammer, but she focused her will and it soon faded.

Unfortunately, Morgan, Alek, and Arun, each dedicated to the precepts of Law, were not so resistant to the dark power’s effects.

Alek and Morgan both screamed as the chaos storm tore through them, overwhelming their senses. The two men stumbled apart, each fighting just to stay standing. A few paces away, Arun gritted his teeth and weathered the worst effects of the blast. Beside him, Hodge grunted but likewise the hammer washed over him without the dramatic effects it’d had upon the Helmites. Dannel and Mole were unaffected, and the gnome had already started moving around the perimeter of the room, looking for an opening—although her hands shook when she looked up at the demon, and she wondered what her pathetic little mace could do to such a thing.

But she was who she was, and doubt did not arrest her progress.

As the power unleashed by the demon cleared—it had only lasted a few heartbeats—Alek Tercival screamed and drew his sword. The holy blade flared in his hand with golden light, as if eager to engage this adversary. The paladin headed directly for the demon, though his steps were jerky and uncertain, and his limbs moved as though leaden weights had been attached to them. The demon saw how heavily his spell had affected the man, and laughed, a vile, mocking sound that rumbled within its massive body like an earthquake.

Morgan and Arun also moved forward, the cleric also slowed from the lingering effects of the hammer. Arun roared a challenge and an invocation to his god as he charged, but the demon's attention was focused upon Alek Tercival.

"Your soul will be mine, foolish manling," he said.

Alek raised his sword to attack, but before he could strike the demon's massive pincers came down and tore into him. One clipped him on the shoulder, driving him down with the force of an avalanche, though he somehow kept to his feet, his eyes burning with a combination of fury and madness.

"Beware the Unseen Mark!" he cried. "Beware the eyes that kill!"

"Beware the wrath of the lord of Demonskar," the glabrezu replied, grabbing the paladin around the torso with his other pincer, and lifting him up into the air.

Alek screamed as the demon tightened its grip, crushing his body.

Chapter 186

As the demon lifted Alek into the air, crushing him with its pincers and tearing at him with its claws, the paladin's rescuers rallied desperately in an effort to somehow destroy this dark knight of the Abyss. The glabrezu seemed an implacable and invincible adversary, filling the vault with its massive and terrible form, but they all knew that they had to stop it, or none of them would leave this place alive.

Zenna used the pillar against which she'd been thrown to pull herself up. She staggered over to where Dannel stood, a grim look on his face as he drew out another arrow that seemed useless against the abyssal resistances of the demon.

"Zenna, get back!" Dannel said. He fumbled his arrow as Zenna stumbled into him, but as he turned to support her she laid her hand upon his quiver, and called upon her power. Dannel, no stranger to magic, looked down at the container on his hip as she channeled a complex stream of divine energy into the long shafts—not so numerous, now—in the container, aligning them, infusing them with the power of Good, anathema to such things as the demon.

"Shoot true," she said, backing away from him.

The elf nodded, and drew out one of the enchanted shafts. He felt the song stir in him again, and without conscious thought drew his own magic through the melody filling him and focused it upon the arrow. The melee across the room was pure chaos, the demon holding Alek in its grasp, Arun and Morgan attacking it to either side, but as the song drew focus everything seemed to slow down, and he calmly aimed his arrow and released.

The shaft sped true, striking the demon in its chest once again, but this time the missile sank deep into its body. The demon let out a roar of pain.

The elf reached for another arrow.

Alek, pinned by the demon's grasp, still somehow managed to lift his sword, still shining brightly in his hand. Nonsensical syllables continued to issue from his mouth, as if drawn from him by some power beyond his ability to control. "By treachery and deceit shall the true Lord fall and the false Lord rule!" he cried. But as the demon's claws rent his body, tearing through his armor as though it were parchment, he could not manage to gain enough leverage to strike.

Morgan, however, lifted Alakast, and with a cry to Helm, slammed it down into the demon's torso.

The staff flared in his hand, and when it struck the demon a potent sound like air being sucked out of a vacuum filled the vault. The demon roared again in pain, and turned its dark gaze upon the cleric.

"That staff... Alakast, it cannot be!" Then its already cruel features twisted into a visage of pure fury. "I will rend you, human! But first, bid farewell to your friend!"

Arun slammed his sword into its leg from the opposite side, but the demon paid the attack no heed, the powerful stroke sliding off of the limb without harming it. Instead, it lifted the claw bearing the struggling Alek, drawing the paladin up over its head, until he nearly brushed the ceiling of the vault. Then, as the others could do nothing but watch in horror, the muscles in its arm clenched, and Alek Tercival screamed as armor plate and the bones beneath crunched and collapsed. Blood fountained from the man's mouth as a final gurgling noise issued from his crushed lungs, and then the demon hurled him across the room, a discarded piece of meat, no longer a threat.

The paladin's sword fell, tumbling end over end to clatter on the floor, its light, it seemed, now faded and dull.

Chapter 187

Morgan lifted Alakast to strike again, but his actions were still slowed from the aftereffects of the chaos hammer, and the demon responded faster.

Ignoring the other companions, who thus far had not greatly hurt it, the demon reached down with its other pincer-claw for the cleric. With his reflexes already impaired the knight of Helm had no chance to evade the attack, and the glabrezu easily caught him up, lifting him into its body where its smaller claws could rend him, and his slavering jaws bite at his flesh. Those jaws caught his arm, crushing the limb through his armor, and he nearly dropped Alakast. But the cleric, bleeding from his wounds, his breath crushed from his body by the demon's fell strength, nonetheless refused to surrender. Drawing upon a strength that had been augmented by the amaranth elixir, the same beverage given him by the hags that had weakened his will and helped hold him to their service, he jammed the magical staff into the joint of the demon's pincer. The glabrezu loosened its grip as the staff drove painfully into the joint, and Morgan fell free, landing on the hard stone with a hard jolt. Battered to the edge of consciousness, his legs gave out and he fell prone, gasping for breath.

Thus far the battle had only lasted moments, and already two of them were down, one almost certainly dead.

Mole had moved around the perimeter of the chamber, coming up on the demon from the side. She was confident that it hadn't seen her. If she'd known how sharp the senses of demons were, honed by centuries in the unforgiving cesspot of constant betrayal that was the Abyss, she might have hesitated, but the fact was, Nabtharon saw her and dismissed her, a puny threat compared to the warriors of Helm and the blessed weapons that they carried.

And in fact, it seemed as though the demon's assessment was correct, for Mole's first attack, a leaping blow at the back of its knee with her mace, did not even draw its attention. She considered climbing the wall, to give her a shot at its head, but the surface was smooth, with few cracks to offer a viable ascent. She drew out her small crossbow, and took a shot at one of its eyes, but the bolt merely grazed an ear, not even sticking in the thick hide. The demon didn't even acknowledge that she was there.

Biting her lip in frustration, she tried to think of something to do.

Hodge had recovered swiftly from the fell chaos power of the demon, but he hadn't followed Arun into melee. As he looked up at it, he felt a horror fill him that he hadn't experienced since they had fought the dragon, back in the mountains north of Cauldron. His knees buckled, and it was only through an effort of will that he kept himself from falling to the floor, to hide from the monstrous and alien majesty of this terrible thing.

It's just another monster! he growled at himself, in his thoughts. Attack! Attack!

But he could not, he could only watch in horror as it caught up Alek, crushed him, and tossed his corpse casually across the room. A splatter of something struck his cheek, and he slowly lifted a finger to touch it. His fingers came back wet with blood.

The knight's blood.

Like Mole, Arun was likewise frustrated, as another powerful blow glanced harmlessly off the demon's thigh. Its hide was like steel plate, and his sword was unable to penetrate its resistances, even with his strength behind the blows. He felt a grim chuckle within his mind, and he knew that the demon was exulting in his ineffectiveness, knew that he was next, once it had finished off Morgan. He lifted Morgan's heavy sword above his head, knowing that it was hopeless, determined nonetheless to go down swinging.

Then the sound of the clatter of metal on stone reached him over the sound of battle, and he turned to see Alek's sword lying there, a few paces away.

Calling to him.

Dannel continued firing arrows into the demon, the enchanted missiles digging into its torso. Several had failed to penetrate its hide, but still black ichor drained from three deep punctures in its body, and it could no longer afford to ignore him. Even as it dropped Morgan, and Dannel took aim for yet another shot, it extended a long arm—the one splashed with the blood of Alek Tercival—and swept it across the vault. Too late Dannel realized that the thing's reach extended all the way to where he stood, and the claw cuffed him a mighty blow that knocked him flying sideways. For a moment he felt himself being drive inexorably toward one of the pillars, but he managed to disengage himself from the claw and tumble free a spare moment before the claw slammed into the pillar with enough force to crack the massive stone. The elf rolled back, his side throbbing where the demon had hit him, but he already had another arrow in his hand, fitting it to his bow, the song filling him once more.

Zenna, meanwhile, had crawled to where Morgan lay, his body heaving as he tried to fight through the pain and rise to face the demon again on his feet. The demon could have crushed her, but Dannel's painful sacrifice bought her the few seconds she needed to reach him, and to pour one of her last remaining divine spells into his shattered frame. Morgan's gaze met hers, and he nodded, using Alakast as a prop to draw himself up, turning back to face the death embodied in the demon's ageless and purely evil gaze.

Nabthatoron had been hurt, but in turn he'd dished out incredible punishment among them, killing Alek, critically injuring Morgan, and inflicting serious blows upon Zenna and Dannel. And the demon knew that few of his enemies could hurt him; the dwarves had thus far proven utterly ineffective, the gnome with her puny attacks had yet to scratch him, while the piddling tiefling woman had yet to demonstrate any usefulness at all, save for putting that damned knight back on his feet again. Nabthatoron looked once more at the weapon once wielded by his nemesis, and felt his rage build once more. There was also a faint undercurrent of fear, but among these foes was no Surabar Spellmason, of that it was certain.

No. This would end right now.

The demon's massive claws came up once more, to end it.

Everything seemed to happen at once.

Dannel released an arrow that stabbed through the air, knifing into the thick bicep of one of the demon's huge arms. The wound wasn't serious, but it added to the demon's tally.

Arun leapt for Alek's fallen sword. The demon saw him, instantly realized the threat, and brought a huge claw down to strike. The claw slammed across Arun's back like a sledgehammer, and the dwarf was blasted down to one knee. For a moment, there seemed to be no way that his spine could be intact, after such a blow.

And yet, somehow, inexplicably, the dwarf got up. He lunged for the sword, which almost seemed to spring into his hand, and he brought it up even as the other pincer came down toward his head. With a dwarven cry of battle, invoking the name of his patron god, Arun brought the holy sword around in a glittering arc, the shining steel intersecting with the descending limb.

There was a clarion note, like a tuning fork being struck, that filled the vault with a momentary sound of peace. Then the demon's roar shattered that idyll, and it fell back.

Leaving a great, oozing claw lying on the ground at the paladin's feet.

"I AM NOT FINISHED WITH YOU!" the demon roared, and then, suddenly, it vanished, leaving a faint miasma of ugly gray smoke in its wake.

The companions just stood there for a moment, overwhelmed by what had just happened.

They had won.

Chapter 188

They were victorious, but the cost had been great.

Zenna was the first to reach the body of Alek Tercival. His body was slaked in blood, running down from his mouth to cover his jaw and throat, and oozing from the great wounds torn in his body by the demon's claws. Worst of all was his chest, distended by the crushing pressure of the demon's pincer.

But as she looked down at him, his eyes suddenly opened.

Zenna jumped in surprise. Then she was kneeling beside him, casting a healing spell, to save the life that was inexplicably still trapped in this battered body.

Alek's mouth opened. For a moment only blood hissed out, but then, he spoke, his voice warped by pain and the agony wrought upon his body.

"There is naught for you in Cauldron, heroes! To return is to enter your own graves and bring doom upon all that you love! Seek the sign of the smoking eye if you wish to save them all!"

And with that, he fell back, dead. Zenna knelt there, stunned. Her spell had dissolved without effect; it was as if he'd already been dead...

She felt the presence of her friends behind her. Looking up, she saw them, battered, weary.

Except Mole, she didn't appear to be hurt at all.

"It may come back," Dannel said, still wary.

“No, I don’t think so,” Zenna said, not sure how she knew, but feeling a strong sense of conviction as she spoke the words. “But I think it was right, we will face that demon again at some point.”

Morgan, barely able to stand himself, even with Zenna’s earlier healing spell, looked down at the body of Alek Tercival, his face a stone mask.

“I’m sorry,” Zenna said, and there was real pity in her voice.

The knight nodded, and turned back toward the center of the room.

Mole had returned to the doorway that looked out over the desert. The others slowly gravitated toward her, standing behind her, looking out over the bleak landscape. There was nothing as far as they could see, save for the rolling dunes. No vegetation, no sign of habitation by any living creature.

“Where are we?” Mole asked, and none of them had an answer for her.

THE END OF “THE DEMONSKAR LEGACY”

The Shackled City V: “Test of the Smoking Eye”
Begun 6-24-04

Chapter 189

Kaurophon’s life had been cursed with an unending string of bad luck.

Or at least that was how he tended to see it. While it was true that the vicissitudes of fortune had often barraged him with unpleasantries, Kaurophon lacked sufficient distance from his situation to recognize that many of his misadventures were rooted in his own poor choices. He was canny, and possessed of a personal presence that was nothing short of overwhelming. When he put his mind to it, he could be charming, and utterly persuasive, even when evidence was not upon his side.

Unfortunately, he was also petty, conniving, greedy, and selfish.

Kaurophon’s situation was complicated by an accident of birth that placed him in an unenviable position. A product of mixed bloodlines, he drew perhaps from the worst of both. Had he been more fortunate in his early surroundings, he might have someday overcome those failings inherent to his personality, but from his youngest years he was surrounded by violence and ruthless struggles for survival that instilled in him a simple creed.

Take what you need, and damned be all the rest.

His innate talents allowed him to survive when others might have been crushed utterly in similar circumstances, and as he developed to adolescence the marginal talents that were the gift of his father's blood expanded into a genuine talent for sorcery. For all his other failings, Kaurophon turned to the development of his powers with due diligence, and by the time he had reached the tender age of twenty years, he had already mastered spells that many human mages spent the bulk of their adult lives pursuing.

Of course, for him, these abilities were just a stepping stone, toward the greater powers upon which he had already fixed his avarice.

Now older, though perhaps not wiser, the object of his current fixation was before him. The power that he'd spent a good part of the last several years pursuing was almost within his grasp, and as he stared into the image suspended in the depths of his scrying mirror, he felt a tingle of anticipation.

Soon...

Then the words of a dying man threw all of his carefully wrought plans askew. Thinking quickly, he turned from his mirror and hastily gathered up several of the items he had prepared for just such an opportunity. Belatedly he returned to the mirror, and carefully inserted it into his bag of holding. He didn't often take the device from his laboratory, as it was expensive and not especially durable, but with his objective drawing close to his grasp, he wasn't going to let it slip away through lack of preparation.

His arrangements complete, he unrolled a scroll, and started to read. For an instant he felt a twinge of uncertainty, remembering the omnipresence of his bad luck, but he shook off the feeling and completed his spell, and vanished, leaving the laboratory empty behind him.

* * * * *

Half a world away, in a small vault of weathered stone situated in the depths of a vast desert, several other individuals were also musing on the question of luck.

"What are we going to do now?" Morgan asked. "We could be a thousand leagues from Cauldron.... If we're even still on Toril!"

"Calm down," Zenna said. She looked up as Mole and Dannel reappeared at the only exit, an uneven gap in wall of the vault that led outside. It might have once been a doorway, but wind and sand had widened it, whatever seal or portal that might have once been there either buried or decayed through time. "Anything?" the tiefling asked.

"It's open desert as far as the eye can see in every direction," the elf reported. He'd used his magical slippers to climb up the outer wall of the vault, giving him a good vista over the surrounding area.

"We don't even know which direction in which to start," Morgan pointed out.

"I be more worried with what be in the gnome's bag," Hodge said, the first words he'd contributed to the conversation since the battle's end. "Or what may be in it, as it be."

Zenna turned to the dwarf. "If need be, Morgan can create magical food to sustain us," she said.

But the cleric shook his head. "I have sundered myself from Helm by my weakness," he said, his voice cold. "I must seek atonement, before I may seek his blessings anew."

"Look, Morgan, I thought we had discussed this..."

"This has nothing to do with my covenant with you," Morgan interjected. "This matter is between myself and my god."

And with that he turned and walked away. For a long moment an awkward silence filled the space between them.

"So what yer sayin', then, is that don't got any food, right?" Hodge finally said.

"We'll face what comes when it comes," Arun interjected. "For now we must attend to matters of the moment." He glanced down at Alek's body. The fallen paladin's upper body had been covered with his tattered cloak, which still bore the faded sigil of Helm's armored hand.

"Come, help me with him," Arun said, and together the companions lifted the body and headed outside to bury the lost knight of Helm.

Chapter 190

Kaurophon felt a wash of hot, dry air surge over him as he materialized at his destination. The hot weather did not trouble him; he'd been to far more inhospitable places than this one. He turned to see the sheer stone wall of the desert structure rising behind him, its edges worn smooth by long centuries of abrasion from the harsh winds that occasionally swept across the desert.

The doorway would be on the opposite side, he knew, and there he would find those he'd come to seek. But first, he needed to complete the last of his preparations. He began by casting a minor spell that slightly modified his appearance, including one fairly subtle but very important change to his attire. Then, he drew out a small bit of something from one of the pouches at his waist—a powder that glittered in the bright afternoon sunlight—and spread it carefully in a circle around his feet, muttering an incantation as he did so. That done, he unrolled a scroll, and after scanning its contents, began to read.

The scroll had not come cheaply, and the spell was technically beyond his powers, but he'd often used such in the past without mishap. This time, however, his bad luck intervened, and as he read the final line, a stray thought popped into his mind, a tickle of the power he hoped to achieve once this course of action had been completed. He crushed the thought and refocused his mind on the task, but the damage had been done, and he translocated the two syllables in the last word, switching them. He realized instantly what he'd done, but it was too late; the spell had been cast.

The air shimmered around him, and three babau demons appeared, called by the powerful summoning spell on the scroll.

Unfortunately, rather than awaiting his commands, they instantly attacked.

* * * * *

“Did you hear that?” Mole asked.

Zenna shook her head, her attention focused on Arun, who stood over the slight mound that marked Alek Tercival’s grave. Digging a grave in the sand had been difficult, but they’d found some loose stone in the vault that they used to stack a cairn over the site, which hopefully would offer some protection against the elements.

Not that it mattered, really, she thought. Alek’s soul, the core of what he was, had already moved on to a different reality, and while she respected the rituals and forms that were used to treat the bodies of the dead, she didn’t really see the point.

Morgan stood a few steps back from her, his attention on the ritual, but not truly a part of it. The cleric—fallen cleric, she amended, if that was truly how he saw himself—would have preferred to take the body back to Cauldron, she suspected, but at the moment they had the far greater problem of getting themselves back to civilized lands intact.

Arun spoke a benediction over the man, his words plain but sincere. Zenna listened but didn’t really hear the words, for now she’d heard the same thing that Mole had, a faint, bestial cry that seemed to be coming from behind the vault structure...

“Something’s coming!” Dannel said, shattering the ritual entirely, hefting his bow as they all turned toward the source of the sound. Then they could see it, a humanoid form wrapped in a flapping robe of gray cloth, rushing around the edge of the building toward them. He was being pursued by a trio of forms already familiar to them, tearing at his flesh with their claws, trying to bear him down by a relentless assault. Several deep gashes in his arms and torso were already visible, drawing streaks of blood down the length of his robe.

“Help me!” the figure cried, as he caught sight of them.

“Demons!” Morgan cried, and all hell broke loose.

Chapter 191

Dannel immediately fired an arrow at one of the demons, but Zenna’s align weapon spell had already faded, and the missile, while accurate, failed to pierce the babau’s tough hide. The attack certainly drew its attention, however, and the demon turned and charged toward the companions, leaving its two fellows the task of tearing the hapless robed man to pieces.

The robed man proved himself not totally helpless, however, as he pointed a wand at one of the demons attacking him and spoke a word of magic. Teal-colored bolts of liquid energy spat from the wand into the chest of the demon, blasting black pits into its ugly gray flesh. The demon roared in pain and rage, and redoubled its assault, digging great bleeding gashes in the man's sides with its claws.

Morgan rushed to his aid, brandishing Alakast above his head as if the staff were a two-handed sword. The sand slowed his steps, but his charge still carried him close enough for him to swing the staff into the back of the demon that the magic-user had just injured. Alakast struck with the force of a sledgehammer, and the demon collapsed, its spine snapped, to vanish in a cloud of sickly black vapors.

Arun and Hodge trudged through the sand to reach the charging demon before it could reach Dannel and Zenna. Their short dwarven legs had particular difficulty in the sliding sand, but the demon saw them coming and veered to meet them, snarling out a challenge. Hodge lifted his axe, but hesitated; his weapon had been damaged in their last confrontation with babau, and Arun's hammer destroyed. Dare he risk his prized axe again?

But Arun demonstrated no such quandary, meeting the demon with a powerful swing of Alek's holy sword. The blade clove deeply into its shoulder, and its left arm fell limp, the tendons and muscles anchoring it torn asunder by the power of the blow. Still it hacked at the dwarf with its other claw and its vicious bite, managing a glancing hit against the paladin's helmet with its claw that staggered him briefly.

Arun's determination finally made up Hodge's mind, and he charged at it from its wounded side, swinging his axe. The danger posed by its caustic skin coating was moot in this case, however, as the demon dodged back, and the stroke missed entirely.

Dannel, realizing that his arrows were useless, sang a battle song to inspire his companions. Zenna, with most of her spells depleted, likewise lacked an effective counter, so she started toward the melee between Morgan, the last demon, and the injured spellcaster, to lend healing aid if needed.

Mole, of course, had disappeared somewhere.

The third demon ignored the foe that had struck down its ally so easily, and in an almost blind fury assailed the robed man in a last attempt to bring him down. The man cried out as the claws dug deeply, but then it was driven back by another blow from Alakast, and Morgan stepped in to defend the grievously injured magic-user. The man staggered backwards and nearly fell, and Zenna quickly rushed to his aid, burning one of her last remaining spells to fuel a cure light wounds. The man looked up at her, nodding gratefully.

The demons fought to the last, but facing Morgan and Arun, each armed with a weapon deadly to their kind, both creatures soon joined their ally, their bodies dissolving upon their death.

"Summoned creatures," Zenna said to herself, seeing them disappear.

"Yes," the injured man said. He pulled himself up, grimacing as his wounds protested the treatment. "It would seem that you have enemies here."

“Who are you?” This from Morgan, who after scanning the horizon for more threats, returned to them, Alakast shining in the bright afternoon light.

“I am Kaurophon,” he told them. “And I will tell you my tale in full, heroes.”

“You’d better tell it in the vault,” Arun said. “The wind’s starting to pick up.”

The seven returned to the shelter, while the gusting winds obliterated all signs that they had ever been there at all, save for the rocky cairn close in the lee of the looming stone structure.

Chapter 192

Back in the shelter of the vault, the companions gathered around their unusual visitor, with Dannel remaining by the entrance to keep watch. Zenna loaned Kaurophon a relatively clean cloth and a half-full waterskin, so that he could cleanse his wounds and some of the desert dust from his weather-worn features.

The delay offered her an excuse to study the stranger. He looked to be about forty, thin and wiry, though certainly not frail. His eyes were a penetrating blue, and the wispy hair drifting about his head was so pale that it was more white than blonde. His robe, she saw with surprise, bore a sigil on the front, a stylized drawing of a half-skull with a plume of smoke rising from its eye socket.

The others had seen it too, she realized, as Morgan, who’d paced impatiently throughout the stranger’s ablutions, came forward and boldly confronted the wizard. “I think you’d better tell us why you’re here, and why you bear that symbol on your robes.”

Kaurophon looked down at his garment with some surprise, as if reminded about something he’d forgotten about. “The Smoking Eye is why I have come,” he said, leaning back against the pillar behind him. “Do you mind if I sit?” he asked. “The journey here has been... difficult, even leaving aside the unpleasant welcome.”

“I am a sorcerer, a weaver of magics of some small talent,” he told them. “If our relationship is to dwell on a sound footing, I must also share with you a secret about myself of which I am not proud. I am an entity of mixed heritage, a stranger to this mundane realm. I bear the blood of fiends, and am the product of an unnatural liaison between outsider and mortal.” He lowered his head, as though the admission had wearied him further.

Zenna glanced at Arun, who’d shifted noticeably at the man’s revelation, his hand coming to rest on the hilt of the sword at his belt. Morgan, too, had reacted, his body tensing in what she’d come to learn was a sign that he was agitated by something.

“I tell you this so that you will know my desire to be frank and truthful with you, but also so that you may take what I am to tell you within its proper context.”

“For many years I was an orphan among the planes, traveling from world to world, seeking something... some sense of belonging. In these searches, I came across a place called Occipitus. Its current location is in that dark torus, the lacing of planes known as the Abyss.”

“So you admit trafficking with the nether powers?” Morgan said, pacing once again with nervous energy. Arun’s hand, Zenna saw now, was openly wrapped around the hilt of his sword. “One who comes and goes freely from the Abyss is not someone with whom I would have any dealings.” The cleric shifted slightly, turning his body away from the robed figure, punctuating his statement with his body-language.

“He hasn’t yet told us about the Smoking Eye yet,” Mole said. “It cannot be coincidence that he appears right after Alek gives us that message, with his dying breath.”

Morgan looked down at the sorcerer. “Get on with it then, demonspawn.” Zenna grimaced, having felt the cleric’s ire toward those of fiendish ancestry.

Kaurophon, however, merely nodded deferentially. “I appreciate your forbearance,” he said. “All will be made clear, I promise you.”

“It is true that Occipitus lies in the Abyss,” he told them. “But it was not always so. The layer was formed during an invasion of the celestial realms, an eon past. The demonic forces that penetrated in a raving horde into the higher planes were repulsed, but in the process the location of their intrusion was tainted, and as the demonic force was cast out, a portion of Celestia was torn away, to coalesce into what is now Occipitus.”

“I know a little of planar cosmology,” Zenna acknowledged. “I have heard of such things happening in the past, reorientations of entire realms by such cataclysmic events.”

Kaurophon nodded to her. “Indeed,” he said. “Occipitus was tainted by the demonic incursion and by its new proximity to the ‘nether realms,’ as the holy man of Helm has noted. But it also bore strong remnants of its original origins. The two ultimately blended into an odd juxtaposition of reality, though the darkness gradually subsumed the light, over the millennia.”

“Occipitus eventually fell under the rulership of a powerful entity known as Adimarchus, also a creature of multiplanar origin, though I fear you would simply call him a ‘demon’. He was a powerful being, and for centuries held sway over this new realm, shaping it gradually in his image.”

“This dinna sound like a place I’d want ta visit,” Hodge grumbled. He hadn’t spoken loudly, but Kaurophon heard him.

“No, ser dwarf, and in the days of Adimarchus’s rule, I would have most fervently agreed with you. But at some point, years past, the powerful lord of Occipitus disappeared from view. The tales of his departure vary—some say he was destroyed in a confrontation with one of the greater powers, such as Prince Graz’zt. Others report that he left voluntarily, in search of a new, greater realm to conquer. The evidence is uncertain, but it was immediately clear that Adimarchus had left behind a contingency to ensure that rulership of the plane would not fall to one whom he did not find worthy.”

“This contingency is known as the Test of the Smoking Eye.”

There was a momentary silence as the companions absorbed this information, each in their own way. Seeing that he’d drawn his audience into the tale, Kaurophon continued.

“The test was created by Adimarchus to grant dominion over Occipitus to one with both power and insight, as well as a certain philosophy of rule. I have spent time on the plane. It is dangerous, of course—for all its initial origins, the plane is effectively still part of the Abyss!—but the faint tendrils of celestial influence that remain make it a place that most demons find unpleasant, and it is relatively quiet compared to other Abyssal layers.”

“What is the nature of this test?” Arun asked.

“It is a series of challenges prepared by Adimarchus,” Kaurophon replied. “I have learned that each challenge provides the clues needed to reach the next. The first challenge is located in a ruined celestial cathedral, and involves a choice of two foes—a bebilith demon and a guardinal celestial—one of which must be slain to advance. I was not able to defeat the demon alone, so I could not progress further in the test.”

Morgan cut him off with a slash of his hand. “And so you seek our aid, so that you can overcome the challenge and become ruler of this land? Do you think us so simple that we would aid you, demon?”

Zenna was looking at Kaurophon, so she saw his eyes narrow, and the bright eyes grow intense. But after a moment, he relaxed. “Your verbal darts are not undeserved, perhaps. I am of a sort that your kind find anathema.” He shifted his gaze, and looked meaningfully upon Zenna before turning back to regard the rest of them. Slowly, his face twisting slightly in pain as his movement reopened some of his wounds, he drew himself up to face them again. “I ask only that you hear me out, and judge me not on your preconceptions, but on the value of my words, and my actions.”

“Your kind are expert at shaping your words to trick and deceive,” Morgan said, but he subsided, allowing Kaurophon to continue. When he spoke again, his voice was thick with feeling.

“I ask you not for your trust, for you barely know me, but I would wish that you understand my motivation. Long have I searched for a place, but only recently have I come to understand that what I truly want, what I truly need, is a way to reconcile the dark and the light that dwell within me. I would have you come with me to Occipitus, to complete the Test of the Smoking Eye. I seek this not for my own glory; in fact, I would have it that one of you, rather than myself, complete the final test, and ascend to rule Occipitus.” He looked again at Zenna. “For the nature of this plane is such that it may be bent to the heart of he who holds suzerainty over its realm. Through the stewardship of one dedicated to the precepts of Good, it is my belief that Occipitus may be redeemed, and its lingering currents of Light strengthened over the current power of the Dark that holds sway there.”

“You would have us rely solely upon your word, to embark upon this quest?” Morgan asked, but his tone was even, and Zenna thought she detected some uncertainty in him. It was something new in the man, born of his recent travails, and she couldn’t be sure of her reading of him now. It had been easier, she thought, when his personality had been more one-dimensional.

“No,” he said. He reached into his pouch, and drew out a tightly rolled scroll. Two scrolls, Zenna saw, as he unrolled them and separated them. Even as he handed one to her, and offered the other to Morgan, she could see that they were covered with the runes of magic. Divine magic, she saw, as she examined the scroll. Then she sucked in a breath. Momentarily forgetting the rest of them, she cast a cantrip to verify that the magic contained in the scroll was real.

“This is a potent spell indeed,” she said.

“What is it?” Mole said, hopping slightly to get a better look at the writing.

Morgan, too, was looking at his scroll intently. “It is a spell of plane shift, he said. It allows for the caster, as well as those he touches, to travel through the barrier that separates the planes.”

“Both spells are oriented to this reality, your Forgotten Realms,” Kaurophon said. “So you would be able to return whenever you wished. I am afraid I must keep the means of getting to Occipitus to myself... I hope that you can understand my motivation.”

“This spell is well beyond my abilities,” Zenna admitted. “But I could probably manage it, from a scroll. It looks genuine,” she told the others.

Morgan looked uncertain. “I will not use such magic, without knowing its source.”

“I purchased the scrolls from the church of Oghma, in Calimport. They bear the mark of that faith at the bottom of the text.”

“I have a question,” Zenna said. “Why us?”

Kaurophon nodded, as he’d anticipated the question. “When it became clear that I would require allies in my quest, I embarked upon various divinations in an effort to clarify the road I would need to take. Such aid was difficult to procure and murky in its revelations, but one such seeking revealed to me that a holy man, a prophet, would be able to guide my path truly. I was greatly encouraged and sought about locating this man. My search drew me here, to your Realms, where I have spent nearly the last half-year trying to track down this, my only lead. Sadly, though, my pursuit ended too late... as I finally located him with my magic just in time to watch his death.”

“Alek Tercival,” Zenna said.

“I did not even know his name. But I heard his final words to you, and immediately came here, using a spell of transportation from another scroll. I lack another, and therefore cannot return to my laboratory. My path, too, likes in one direction... ahead, to Occipitus.”

“Why the urgency?” Arun asked. “If you had identified us, wouldn’t it have made more sense to contact us in a less precipitous fashion?”

“I believe that time is becoming a factor. Throughout my search here I have continued to monitor events in Occipitus, and I believe that others have learned of the test and are seeking to complete it. Two such rivals I have specific knowledge of—a succubus and a renegade rakshasa. If they succeed, either of them, then it will be too late, and they will gain dominion over Occipitus, and shape it to their whim.”

“So you would have us accompany you to this plane, pass this ‘test’, and gain control of the plane? Then what?” Zenna asked.

“Then you could do as you see fit, returning here to your world, or whatever you saw fit,” Kaurophon said. “I want only to end the division there, and it is my hope to see the plane restored, someday, to a true state.”

Zenna glanced at her friends. Even though they tried to hide their feelings, she knew them all well by now, enough to gauge their sentiments. Their feelings ranged from indecision to obvious reluctance.

“We’ll need to discuss this,” she said.

“Of course.” The sorcerer bowed, and walked over to the far side of the vault, near the tunnel that led back down to the underground chamber where they’d found Alek.

Chapter 193

“Well?” Zenna asked, once Kaurophon had gotten out of earshot.

“Well what?” Hodge asked. “It be insane, and that’s all there be to it.”

“Ah, come on,” Mole said. “Haven’t you ever wanted to visit the Outer Planes? My uncle Cal told me stories... he visited the Abyss once, did you know?” Her eyes glimmered with what could have been curiosity, the thrill of adventure, or madness—or maybe all three.

“I want to visit one plane, and that be Moradin’s Forge. An’ I ain’t in no hurry to be goin’ there again either!”

“Arun?” Zenna asked.

The paladin wore a thoughtful look. “He bears taint,” the dwarf said.

“Well, that’s obvious,” Morgan interrupted, but Arun forestalled him with a raised palm.

“It’s there, true, but the man is not as steeped in it as some. It could be that his two sides are warring, as he said, or he could be masking his aura in some fashion.”

“Even if he is lying about his motivations, we also have to consider these rivals of which he spoke,” Zenna noted. “If either of them secures control of the plane, then it definitely will be lost to evil.”

Hodge smacked his hand into his fist. “What business of that be ours?”

Zenna’s reply was soft, almost under her breath. “Those who follow the Path of Light are not always allowed the luxury of choosing their own battles.”

Morgan flinched as though he’d been struck. He knew the words she’d quoted, although they were not spoken by his patron, but by the god Torm, the divine being incarnated as a man in the Time of Troubles. Torm and Helm were rivals, but shared many of the same precepts of faith, and both stood strong against the forces of the Dark. She knew that Morgan knew the words, and kept them to his heart, but she did not know the extent to which they now ruled in a heart sundered by his own sufferings.

“But can a mere man always know where the path lies?” he whispered.

“There’s one other thing,” Mole pointed out. Zenna suspected that she’d already hopped merrily onto the Lets All Go To The Abyss bandwagon. “In case you hadn’t noticed, we’re stuck somewhere in the middle of an apparently endless desert, without supplies. If we do go with Kaurophon, we can always use one of his scrolls to zip back to Cauldron, if things go bad.”

“A caution,” Zenna insisted. “The spell is not an exact means of travel. You appear anywhere from a few miles to a few hundred miles from your destination.”

“So you could pop in o’er the bloomin’ Shinin’ Sea!” Hodge exclaimed.

“Yes, that is correct,” Zenna said. “Although you can target an area more inland, to mitigate that possibility.”

“Have I pointed out that yer all a bunch o’ ravin’ lunatics lately!”

Morgan’s head had dropped until his forehead was nearly touching the shining white shaft of Alakast, held upright in both of his fists before him, its base touching the floor at his feet. Finally he looked up, and there was a clarity in his expression that Zenna found reminiscent of his “old” self.

“So our options are thus: remain here, and slowly starve to death, or travel on a mission to a realm of great evil, to pursue a quest that may end in our destruction, or may redeem a plane for good.”

“I am only one of six, but I say that the road lies forward, not back.”

“Me too!” Mole said instantly, her hand shooting up.

Hodge looked almost beseechingly at his mentor, but Arun’s gaze was fixed on the knight of Helm. “Very well,” Arun said. “But we must be vigilant.”

"I may know something about vigilance," Morgan said with what was almost a chuckle, as he touched the sigil on the holy symbol at his throat.

"Zenna?" Mole asked.

She had helped prod this along, she knew, but had her own misgivings. How could she not, she thought... given that they were for all intents and purposes going to be traveling to the place where her own dark side had its origins? And yet, like her father before her, she felt a grim fascination with what she would find... and a part of her needed to confront what it was, what was inside of her, part of her being.

She nodded.

They all turned to look at Hodge, whose face had twisted into a grimace. "Well, I guess me choice is made fer me, since I ain't gunna stay here in this godsforsaken sandbox an' starve. Though I ain't gunna stray far from yer two that got them scrolls, mark me!"

And with that he strode off, though only a short distance.

"There's one more," Mole said, but Dannel, whose sharp elven ears had listened in on both exchanges from his position watching the exit, had already made his decision, and he nodded as Zenna's eyes met his own.

"Then we're decided!" Mole said, her obvious excitement failing to ease the anxiety clearly visible in the faces of the others. Even as she ran across the vault to fetch Kaurophon, they struggled with the reality of what they were doing, and where they were going.

The Abyss.

A realm of nightmares.

Chapter 194

For all that she was now as much a cleric as she was a wizard, Zenna did not think of herself as very religious. But when she got her first look at Occipitus, her first thought was, By all the gods...

The place was utterly alien, rushing in to assault their senses from the moment that Kaurophon's plane shift spell ended.

They were on a great open plain. Visible in the distance was a great line of black mountains that formed a curving line across the horizon. Turning, Zenna saw that the mountains appeared to encircle the entire plain, forming a great bowl that had to be hundreds of miles across.

Above, the sky was a sea of roaring flames, a flowing red conflagration that swirled only a few hundred feet above them. Prominent in that ember sky were cohesive eddies of living fire, maybe a dozen paces across, that danced in the maelstrom, occasionally dipping down from the higher reaches to flirt with the more open sky below, as if considering dropping down to the ground below.

Belatedly she realized that the plain was flat, that the reason that she could see so far was due to the fact that there was no curvature to the world beneath her feet. And thus she could clearly mark the white mountain in the exact center of Occipitus, an unnaturally-shaped mound that Zenna was quick to identify.

A giant skull, lying on its side. And out of the dark, empty shadow of its eyesocket, a steady stream of ugly gray smoke streamed. As she watched, one of the fiery plasms erupted from that fissure, rising slowly up to join the others in the flaming sky above.

She looked down, at the ground beneath her feet. The soil was spongy, and textured strangely. Not soil at all, she realized, her stomach twisting with understanding. Like flesh...

To turn her mind from that disgusting thought, she lifted her gaze and took another look at their immediate surroundings. There were few terrain features of note close by, just some pale pillars that jutted from the landscape like the rib bones of some huge creature that had fallen and been partially absorbed into the landscape.

Hodge was right beside her, and she could hear his reaction to Occipitus. "Oh, great, just bloody flaming dark-double-damned great. Bloody bloomin' fantastic. 'Oy, let's take a little outin' to the bloody Abyss, eh?' Damned demon bloody damned..."

She saw Morgan sink down to one knee, and stepped toward him with concern. Arun, too, she saw was experiencing difficulty, his face pale, though he fought to conceal his discomfort. The cleric extended a hand as if to block her, and grimly pulled himself to his feet. "I am all right," he said. "It passes..."

"What happened?"

"This... this place. Chaos... taint... It is... overwhelming."

"Arun?"

The paladin grimaced. "It is powerful, but it can be borne."

She looked around at her other companions, but while they all seemed uncomfortable as they adjusted to their surroundings, they did not seem as affected as Morgan and Arun. She looked over at Kaurophon. Their guide was also scanning their surroundings, getting his bearings, she thought. Finally, he turned to them.

"What are those things?" Mole said, pointing to one of the drifting clouds of fire.

"Plasms," the sorcerer replied. "Very dangerous, and the reason why flying is not practical here. If you see one drifting down too close to the ground, best run away as fast as you can."

“That giant skull,” Dannel asked. “Is that the location of the test?”

“It may be part of it,” Kaurophon admitted. “The central plain is... not hospitable. But our immediate destination is the ruined cathedral of which I spoke, which lies in an area of celestial ruins about a hundred miles north of here.”

“And your magic cannot transport us there directly, I presume,” Morgan said.

The sorcerer shook his head. “I am afraid we will have to walk.”

“Walk a hunnerd miles, w’out food?” Hodge said.

“I thought dwarves were stout folk,” Morgan retorted. Hodge’s face turned red with anger, but Kaurophon quickly interjected.

“The landscape here is not friendly, but there are resources here for the clever traveler. Fiendish bison, for example, which may be used as provender.”

“Demon steak. Great.”

“We should get going,” Dannel suggested. “I presume there is no cycle of day and night here, Kaurophon?”

“No. In that, at least, Occipitus is constant.”

They gathered themselves, and started north, their footsteps making only the slightest noise on the spongy surface of the plane.

Chapter 195

Zenna leaned against a pillar that still bore faint markings in Celestial. She was tired, but she suspected that the exhaustion that suffused her to her very bones was not just due to the long hike. Occipitus... wore on you, and she wondered again, not for the first time, and Kaurophon’s revelation that he’d spent a fair amount of time here. What did that do to a person... or did his partly fiendish nature protect him? What might it do to her, whose ancestry was also rooted to the dark planes?

For all her complaints, she knew that the others felt it worse. Especially Arun and Morgan. The paladin withstood it stoically, but Morgan... Morgan had grown irritable and cantankerous, alternating between moody outbursts and periods of long, sullen silence. She saw that he now carried Alakast like a standard, both of his hands wrapped around the pale wood so tightly that his hands were nearly as white as the staff. His face had grown pale to match, his features tight and drawn, looking unnatural under the flaming red glow of the burning sky above.

Mole trudged up to her, plopping herself down on an uneven shelf of shattered white marble beside her. “Are we having fun yet?” she opined. Zenna forced a smile. Her friend, if anything, seemed immune to the weighty impact of Occipitus, although her upbeat attitude had been somewhat muted by the sheer overwhelming force of their surroundings. But likewise her curiosity had been fully unleashed in this strange place, and she eagerly absorbed both the wonders and the horrors that they had encountered over their journey.

The last four days, since their arrival here, had not been easy. Kaurophon had told them that the outlying edges of the plain were scarcely populated, but that hadn't stopped them from encountering a demon on the first day, just a few hours after they had set out. It had come up on them from ahead along their course of march, flying low to avoid the plasms, a terrible combination of humanoid and vulture. A vrock, Kaurophon had called it. It had obviously seen them, and despite being outnumbered, it let out a nasty screech and dove straight for them. Dannel struck it with an arrow as it dove, but its demonic resistances clearly protected it from harm. The rest of them readied their weapons to meet its diving rush. Kaurophon cast several protective spells upon himself, and laid a spell upon Arun to bolster his stamina.

That was about all she remembered of that encounter. Just before the demon reached them, it let out a terrible screech, and she vaguely remembered falling, stunned. Afterward, Dannel had told her that the battle had been brief; Arun and Morgan had both laid into it with their powerful weapons, and rather than remain the demon had elected to teleport away to recover from its wounds.

After that, she resolved to meditate on magics that would prove effective against demons.

The next day they'd had another encounter, with a giant lion that had likewise bounded across the plain upon detecting them. This one did not retreat until Arun had cut its head off with a powerful stroke of his sword, and afterwards her healing talents were needed to help Dannel and Hodge, both of whom had been injured in the brief but bloody battle.

Later that same day—although by now, it was getting difficult for her to separate time into those units, without a day or night to mark the passage of days—they had encountered a small herd of the fiendish bison that Kaurophon had mentioned. The creatures looked much like the ones Zenna had seen in her travels across the vast eastern plains of Tethyr... except that their hides were mottled and ugly with diseased gray splotches, and their eyes shone with a bright malevolence. Instead of retreating at their approach, the bison had pawed the ground and snorted angrily. Finally, without warning, they had surged toward them, in a stampede that shook the ground beneath their feet.

"Run!" Dannel had yelled. "Take shelter among those columns!" he'd added, identifying another of the bleached-pillar formations nearby. "I'll draw them off!"

The elf augmented his speed with an expeditious retreat spell, and firing arrows to draw the attention of the herd, he drew them in a wide circle that ultimately brought them back to where the companions had taken shelter. The twenty bison made a fearsome sight, but they weren't overly intelligent, and they weren't much of a threat to the companions behind the cover of the thick stone pillars. When the herd finally broke off and fled, they'd left half of their number behind, lying in heaps across the barren landscape.

Hodge and Mole had initially been excited at the prospect of a real meal, but the meat of the bison had been tough as rawhide, and suffused with an oily taste that had left it barely palatable. The only fuel they'd been able to find were the long, twisting strands of fibrous material that jutted from the plain at uneven intervals, and that burned fitfully, releasing clouds of noxious gray smoke that caused violent coughing when inhaled.

Still, with their own stocks depleted, "demon steaks" was all that they had, and so they made the best of it, Mole salting some of the meat to carry with them as they departed. At least with her ability to create water, they wouldn't die of thirst...

Zenna's thoughts were drawn back to the present by the sounds of shouting nearby. She rose, Mole only a step behind her, and found Dannel and Morgan facing off, arguing about something.

"Bah, it's truth and you know it, elf! I'll not take it back, not for all your threats!"

"You're walking a thin line, priest," Dannel replied, and there was iron in his voice.

"I walk where I care to, elf," Morgan spat back. "You can have your little fiending, if you wish..."

Zenna suddenly felt cold. They were arguing about her, she knew it as sure as she knew her own name. Dannel saw her and flinched, but Morgan, unaware of her presence, opened his mouth to say something else stupid and hurtful, no doubt. Rushing forward, she hurried to forestall him.

"Idiots!" she said, letting her fury fuel her words. "Do we not have a difficult enough time in this place, without you fighting like spoiled boys! Are you fool enough not to see what this place is doing to you?"

Arun and Hodge were approaching, Kaurophon walking in their company. The dwarves had demonstrated their endurance over the long march, but their short legs meant that they had to work harder to keep up with the rest of them, and they'd gone from leading to bringing up the rear. Kaurophon seemed content to blend into the background, and often hours passed without Zenna even noticing that he was there.

"What's going on?" Arun demanded.

"Nothing," Morgan said, his anger fading, though his lips remained tight in an expression of barely-contained contempt as he strode away.

"We draw near to the cathedral," Kaurophon said. "We should be able to see it soon, I think."

"Not soon enough," Dannel said. He too turned away, walking forward but not quite in the direction that Morgan had gone.

"Men," Mole said softly, but Zenna could hear the sadness in her voice. She couldn't blame her friend; everything had grown so complicated...

Trying to ignore the protests of her tired muscles, and the aching in her tired heart, she joined the others as the companions resumed their march.

Chapter 196

The cathedral rose out of the ruined expanse before them, a shattered remnant that still bore enough of its former grandeur to hint at what once had been. The entry, a recessed archway of cracked white marble, contained a pair of heavy doors of patterned stone.

“Well, here we are,” Dannel said, testing his bowstring. He’d replenished his store of arrows from Alek Tercival’s quiver back in the vault, but even so his remaining supply was dwindling, a few more used up in each encounter, and it did not look like they would encounter a fletcher anytime soon.

“And this first test lies inside?” Morgan asked. He frowned, examining the designs etched into the stone, designs that still seemed incongruous in this alien setting.

“Yes,” Kaurophon replied. “There are chambers under the place, that contain the trial.”

“Anything inside we should know about?” Arun asked.

“No, the cathedral itself is empty,” Kaurophon said.

“Very well then, let’s get about it,” the paladin replied, moving to the doors. The one on the left opened easily at his prodding, but the one on the right ground against the floor, resisting his efforts. Finally he gave up on it and pushed the left door open fully so they could enter.

Beyond the doors lay a wide foyer. The place was scattered with odd clusters of rubble, and while most of the ceiling was intact, there were sufficient cracks to allow the ruddy crimson glow of the fiery sky above to enter. The floor was slightly off-kilter, as though the entire building lay upon its foundations at a gentle but noticeable slant. In the center of the floor was a great open pit, about ten feet square, descending deep out of sight. Across from them lay another set of doors nearly identical to the ones through which they’d entered.

“I do not recall that pit being here before,” Kaurophon said.

Zenna frowned; there was something odd here, something she couldn’t quite place. She stood there in the doorway, as Morgan and Arun moved forward around the edge of the pit.

“Ewww, do you smell that?” Mole said.

Zenna cast a minor cantrip, enabling her to sense magical auras. She scanned the room, noting immediately the pale glow surrounding the pit. But there was a stronger aura, drawing her attention upward, to the ceiling...

Too late, she saw the danger, as the magical shrouds of invisibility fell from the two creatures hovering near the ceiling. They were horrible things, an unholy combination of a giant spider, grafted to the upper body of a dark elf. She opened her mouth to scream.

But the driders were already launching their attack. A dense explosion of sticky, clinging webs filled the foyer, snaring them around the legs, tugging at their arms. Zenna's gaze was held by the malevolent look of the second drider, magically floating in a far corner of the ceiling above, its eight legs positioning it against the touching walls. Dannel yanked an arm free from a cloying strand and lifted his bow, but before he could fire the creature pointed at him, and unleashed a jagged bolt of lightning that darted down from its corner into the elf. For all that the webs were wrapped around his lower body, Dannel still managed to twist out of the path of the bolt, although tendrils of energy scored him as it passed.

Zenna, however, standing right behind him, cried out as the lightning bolt caught her squarely in the center of her torso. Her innate resistance to electrical energy did not obviate the burning pain that erupted from her body from the point of impact, and she felt her muscles quivering uncontrollably, only barely able to keep from collapsing.

Despite the entangling effects of the web, the companions were quick to respond to the drider ambush. Arun threw one of his light hammers at one, while Morgan unlimbered one of the javelins he'd been carrying around unused all this time, and hurled it at the same foe. Unfortunately the obscuring webs, clinging insistently to the warriors' arms, impaired their accuracy, and both missiles missed their targets.

Dannel, however, would not be hindered by a few spiderwebs, and his first arrow sank meatily into the spider-body of the drider that had cast the lightning bolt at them. The creature snarled at them in pain, uttering a curse in its own speech that sounded unnaturally like the screech of a wounded beast.

Kaurophon, standing slightly ahead of Zenna, opposite Dannel, focused his concentration and cast a spell. As he vanished, Zenna's first thought was that he'd turned himself invisible, but then she saw that the webs that had held him had collapsed, that he was truly gone.

Great, she thought. Why am I not surprised?

Of course, getting out of this situation suddenly looked like a really good idea, as the driders started casting spells again. She elected to go for defense, conjuring a magical shield canted upward toward the driders.

The driders unleashed their second round of spells, reversing their initial volley as the lightning-caster added to the entangling mesh surrounding them with another web, while the second shot its own lightning bolt. The target was again Dannel, who seemed most able to threaten the floating driders with his bow. Again the elf avoided the worst of the blast, but again Zenna was blasted by the follow-through, the left leg of her breeches turning black as the bolt mercilessly scorched the limb beneath.

"Zenna, get back!" Dannel cried, drawing another arrow.

Have you not noticed the webs, you fool! she thought, but she bit back the words, not wanting to distract him from the important task of putting arrows in their enemies. She was standing in the open doorway, only a few feet from cover, but the webbing held her fast, and with her limited strength there was no way she would be able to pull herself free.

There was another option, she thought, remembering her wand of burning hands, but with the webs wrapped around their bodies, the cure might in this case be worse than the disease...

Arun let out a curse as his second hammer missed. Morgan's second javelin scored a glancing hit on one of the creatures, but now both warriors were without missiles, unable to effectively harm the two driders.

Hodge let out a few general-purpose curses as he fought the clinging webs to load his heavy crossbow. He finally managed to lift the weapon and fire, but several strands of webbing had fouled the bolt, and the shot veered pathetically wide.

"Somebody get these damned blasted webs off us!" the dwarf demanded.

"I can burn them off, but it'll hurt you as well!" Zenna said.

"Do it!" Arun's cry came back to her.

Grimacing, Zenna reached for her wand. But before she could unleash its power, the dense lacing of webs shimmered, and vanished.

"Right! Good job!" Hodge said.

"But I didn't do anything!" Zenna protested. She realized what had happened, and even as she drew back out of the now-clear doorway, she saw Kaurophon standing outside. The sorcerer nodded to her, and she felt a momentary twinge of guilt at judging him prematurely earlier.

But first things first, and they were still in a lot of trouble here. Unfortunately the driders had been outside of the range of Kaurophon's dispel, and from their secure position they continued their spell assault upon the companions.

Mole had been quiet in the initial moments of battle, but again that was by design. First she'd tried to slip free of the double-nest of webbing, but when that failed she focused instead on remaining undetected and loaded her small crossbow. When the webs were dispelled by Kaurophon she moved quickly into the shadows, moving until she was almost directly under one of the driders.

Then she shot her bolt right up into its abdomen.

The drider didn't like that one bit. The creature twisted its body so that it could look down at her, and then fired a trio of magic missiles at her. She tried to dodge, knowing it wouldn't work, and stifled a cry as the three glowing darts stabbed painfully into her body.

Dannel continued his barrage, firing arrow after arrow into his target. The drider now looked like a pincushion, with multiple feathered shafts jutting from its body. The thing hissed at him, like a serpent. It lifted a slender black arm as if to hurl another spell at him, but it hesitated, perhaps doubting that a continued exchange of lightning bolts for arrows would work in its favor. It could not know that Dannel was laboring, his chest and arms burning where needles of electricity had stabbed into them. The elf, lost in the song of battle that he poured into his missiles, revealed nothing save grim efficiency, one with his bow.

So instead the spider-thing summoned another spell, and vanished.

Dannel had already drawn out another arrow, and as the drider disappeared he closed his eyes, drawing the feathers of the long shaft back to his cheek. He listened, and in the purity of the song he heard the clatter of its feet along the stone, as it skittered along the border of wall and ceiling. Almost reflexively, he loosed, opening his eyes to see the arrow stab into nothingness, almost its entire length vanishing from view. There was a loud, almost painful screech, and moments later a loud concussion as the drider fell, becoming visible as it convulsed for a moment amidst the rubble, finally falling still.

Upon regaining his freedom from the webs, Arun leapt forward, seeing one of his hammers lying upon the floor. He seized it up, and with a powerful snap of his wrist sent it flying up into the body of the drider who had just blasted Mole.

The drider was now injured from several wounds, and with the death of its fellow the tide of the battle had shifted decidedly against it. The ghastly creature, however, did not yield, nor seek quarter. It did shuffle across the ceiling, its levitation power holding it upside-down against the cracked ceiling of the foyer. Its movement took it to a position almost directly above the exit doors, indicating a possible intent to seek escape.

Dannel was blocking the exit, however, and he quickly shifted his aim to this adversary, bending backward to give him an angle to shoot. Before he could fire, however, the drider pointed at him, unleashing a coruscating beam of deep violet that struck the elf and splayed over his body in a nimbus of fey light. The effect was instantly obvious, as the elf staggered, greatly weakened by the ray of enfeeblement.

The drider started down the wall toward the doors, but it had to contend with Morgan, who lifted Alakast above his head and charged at it. The drider hissed and drew out a pair of slender steel daggers from sheaths strapped around its torso, but the fallen knight's longer weapon allowed him to inflict a punishing blow to its chest before it could move into position to strike. Blood fountained from its jaws as the staff's impact drove a rib into its internal organs. All thoughts of battle replaced by an instinct to survival, the creature released its spell of levitation, all but falling onto the ground in an awkward clutter, its bulk knocking Dannel roughly aside. It turned toward the open doors, startling Zenna and Kaurophon with the suddenness of its appearance. Before it could seek freedom and escape, however, it felt the bite of Hodge's axe, cleaving deeply into its bulbous spider-body. The creature sagged against the doors, dying, until finally another series of bloody strokes from the gathered warriors put a final end to it.

Hodge and Morgan drew the dead creature aside, out of the doorway, so that the two magic-users could enter. Hodge grimaced as the thick, sticky gore from its wounds clung to his hands, sticking in his beard.

“Gads, that’s foul!” he said, trying to wipe the gunk from his beard, and mostly managing to bury it deeper in that filthy nest.

“Are you all right?” Zenna asked Dannel.

The elf nodded. “Weak...” he said, tiredly, sagging under the weight of his armor and equipment. “Need... a few minutes... spell... temporary...”

“I thought you said that this place was empty,” Morgan said, shooting a hard look at Kaurophon.

The sorcerer looked apologetic. “It was, the last time I was here,” he said. “This place, it bears a strong celestial... ‘echo’, I guess, I guess, would be the best word. Most fiends avoid it, from my experience, unless they have a strong reason not to.”

“He aided us greatly by dispelling those webs,” Zenna said.

Morgan turned away, dropping the matter. He took out a rag from his pack, and started cleansing from Alakast the patters of drider gore that had marred its smooth length during the battle. Dannel used healing wand to treat his injuries, and after a few minutes indicated that he was feeling better, the effects of the drider’s enfeebling spell wearing off. Arun led them to the doors on the far side of the foyer, which appeared to lead into the main part of the cathedral.

At the dwarf’s insistent push the doors swung open. Beyond lay a great hall, nearly a hundred feet in length. Here the damage they’d seen earlier was even more pronounced, with great gaps in the ceiling that showed the bright burning sky above. Rubble choked off great areas of the room, forming jagged mounds. About halfway down the hall the chamber narrowed, with doors offering onto side chambers, but at its far end it opened again to a broader space. There was a stone statue there, a good ten feet tall, of a dusky gray stone that contrasted with the white everywhere else, but it was too far distant for them to clearly identify.

They scanned the chamber cautiously, but there was nothing threatening evident, at least not that they could see from the shelter of the doorway. The rubble could have concealed anything.

Afterwards, Zenna would wonder why none of them had thought to look up as they entered, especially after what had just transpired with the driders.

Arun entered first, followed by Morgan. The rest of them had just started into the room, when a lithe, female form swooped down from above, landing directly before Morgan. Startled by the suddenness of its appearance, they could not react in time to stop it from lunging at the knight of Helm. She was an amber-skinned beauty, if one could ignore the great bat-wings, the claws, and the tiny horns that jutted from her head. She carried a slender spear, but did not hold it in the manner of a weapon. Morgan's eyes widened, caught off guard by the startling juxtaposition of loveliness and horror. But instead of tearing into him with its slender claws, the demon-woman grasped his head with both of her hands, and sank into him with a deep, penetrating kiss.

"Hey!" Mole said, shattering the spell of surprise. "Hands off our cleric, demon!"

They started to Morgan's aid, but suddenly a violent wall of roaring flames rose up from the floor, drawing a line twenty-feet tall across the room, driving them back with the searing heat of the flames.

Separating Arun and Morgan—and the succubus—from the rest of them.

Chapter 197

Morgan reeled, stunned. The kiss had nothing of love in it; it was a taking, violent, and he could feel the life energy escaping from him, leaving him diminished.

Unfortunately, he felt as though his will was lost in the flood, and as the succubus drew back, her eyes glistening terribly, he knew that he was in her power. He felt a surge of desire course through him like a flood. He knew it was false, hated himself for it, but he could not resist. Alakast fell from fingers that had suddenly grown soft, and the staff clattered harmlessly on the bare stone floor at his feet.

"Get off of him, demon bitch," Arun snarled, his sword a gleaming shaft of steel in his fist.

"Protect me, lover!" the succubus said to Morgan. Her sibilant voice tickled at his consciousness, and he felt compelled to obey. But his muscles felt stiff, reluctant. He looked down for his weapon, and the staff seemed far away, as if he had suddenly become thirty feet tall, looking down from a lofty height.

Arun was faster.

The succubus screamed in alarm as the dwarf charged her. She tried to dodge behind Morgan, but the holy sword lashed out, the full force of the dwarf's strength behind the blow. He smote her, the sword cleaving into her torso squarely, and her scream halted as the sword tore through her tainted body, and the two halves, upper and lower, flopped to the ground below.

Surprisingly, there was very little blood.

"Naugh!" came a loud, angry voice from the far side of the cathedral, by the statue. Arun and Morgan, the latter still somewhat unsteady, turned to see a terrible, flaming creature emerge from behind the statue. It had the body of a serpent, but with muscular arms jutting from its torso, and a face that, while bestial in its visage, showed clearly the look of intelligence. It slid forward, upright, carrying a longspear its hands, its body surrounded with tongues of flame, the air around it distorted by the heat radiating off of its form.

Arun took one look at it and charged. Morgan, fighting through his own disorientation, reached down and recovered Alakast. Behind him, the wall of fire shimmered and disappeared, removed by Kaurophon's magic.

Suddenly, their surroundings... changed.

Zenna's nature had partially protected her from the wall of fire, but the others, she saw, were not so fortunate. Hodge looked as though he would charge right through the roaring flames, but the intensity of the roaring barrier drove him back, patting furiously at his smoking beard. Kaurophon, she saw, also appeared to be little affected by the flames, and as she watched, he called upon his magic, sundering the tendrils of magical power that maintained the spell. He was powerful, she knew, noting his calm control in a chaotic situation, his focus upon the energies that he was manipulating.

When the flames ceased, she stepped forward. She saw the dead succubus, Morgan and Arun, and the huge flame salamander. But she started as there was a faint flash, and everything around her changed. No, not everything... the combatants were still there, both her allies and their enemies, but the cathedral...

The cathedral was as it had been, when it was whole. The walls and ceiling were fully intact, shining with a benign white glow. White feathers drifted idly through the air, and a song, faint but distinct, filled her with an overwhelming sense of peace and contentment. The statue at the far end of the cathedral was likewise different, the blunt stone shape replaced by a glimmering marble statue of such beauty, she felt her breath catch in her throat...

And then it was gone, back to the way it had been, ruined, desecrated. The transition was so jarring that it was almost painful, and she felt a profound sense of loss.

"Did you just see that..." Mole asked.

"Yes, but we don't have time to talk about it now!" Dannel said. He'd drawn out an arrow, and he took aim at the salamander.

But the fiery creature beat him to the attack, pointing at them. A small dot of flame darted from his fingertips, streaking down the length of the cathedral. Zenna watched it come, frozen, knowing what was going to happen, unable to stop it.

The world exploded in fire.

Chapter 198

The fireball lasted only an instant, but when the roaring flames faded, the devastating effects of the blast became evident.

Zenna lay on her side, pain flashing through her body. She forced herself to move, even though every slight adjustment sent fresh jolts from her blackened flesh through her already savaged nerves. She'd been at the center of the blast, and this time her natural protection had availed her little against the power of the flames.

She drew herself up and looked for the others. Morgan was lying on his face, the armor across the back of his body scorched terribly, as she knew was the flesh beneath. But the knight drew himself up in what had to be agony, reaching out, taking his staff into his hands. Rushing into battle like that was suicide, she knew... but he went anyway, limping slightly.

Hodge was little better off; the dwarf's beard had been partially burned away, along with his thick brows. But he too was already stumbling forward, and for a moment Zenna felt a stab of pride, that these men were her companions, men who would simply not accept defeat.

Mole and Dannel looked far better off, having rolled with the force of the blast, although Dannel too looked more than a bit scorched, his fair features marked with the red glow of fresh burns. She glanced up and saw that Kaurophon had drawn back; his robes were not marked, but she could see the slight blackening of his exposed hand, a sign that he had not escaped the flames unscathed earlier.

Okay, the battle's not over, girl! she thought, drawing herself up. She was not going to rush into battle tottering on the brink of consciousness, though, and paused to call upon a potent healing spell, letting the positive energy wash away some of the pain of her wounds. She was far from "okay," but it would have to do for now.

She hurried after Hodge and Morgan, hoping to do some good before they got themselves killed.

Arun's charge had carried him beyond the radius of the fireball. But the salamander, seeing him coming, calmly set its spear to receive his charge, the steel head of the weapon, glowing red with heat, pointed unerringly at the dwarf's chest. Arun was too experienced to rush blindly in and impale himself on that deadly point, so he drew up, lifting his shield and moving in cautiously.

The salamander was fast, though. It adjusted to his shift in speed and approach, and the paladin felt an explosion of pain as the spearhead drove into his shoulder, penetrating his armor and searing through him like a wedge of liquid flame. He tore himself away from the spear before the salamander could drive it through him, knocking the shaft of the weapon aside with his sword. Damn, that thing's strong! he thought, realizing grimly that he was outmatched by this foe.

But he'd seen the fireball that had streaked past him to blast into his companions, had felt the fierce roar of its burst, and he knew enough about magic to know that his friends would not be able to take another shot like that one. He knew also that the other warriors, Morgan and Hodge, were behind him, wounded. The salamander would tear them to pieces, he thought, even without having to resort to another magical attack.

And so the dwarf lunged forward, feeling the heat radiating from the salamander scorch his face. The creature seemed taken aback by the ferocity of his assault, and it hissed in pain as Arun's holy sword clove into its torso, release a steaming cloud of ichor that filled the air with a sickly stench.

It drew back slightly, to give it room to wield its huge spear, shifting its grip before driving it down into the dwarf.

And as it tore into him with a violent storm of blows, tearing through his defenses as if they were nothing, he knew he'd been right.

Chapter 199

Morgan was sometimes brave to the point of recklessness, but despite what Zenna thought, he was no fool. As he rushed toward the salamander he drew out one of the small vials that they'd won in Vaprak's Voice, doffing the cap and downing the contents in a single draught. The powerful healing potion eased his wounds, but he knew that he was far from at his best. He could also feel the lingering effects of the succubus's kiss, the weakness from the life energy she'd drawn out of him.

But what he had left would have to do.

Hodge half-ran, half-hobbled forward, a few paces behind the taller human. His face felt as though it had been cut by a thousand tiny pixies with daggers dipped in salt. Looking upon the salamander, he saw a creature beyond his comprehension. A year ago, he'd have run, no question. But now, he'd been changed somehow, had undergone a transformation into someone or something new. Whatever it was, it seemed to involve him charging into sudden death repeatedly... But each time he'd come out alive, and he knew the reason, knew it in the form of the man who'd rushed alone ahead of them against a terrible foe, greater than all of them.

And so he ran once more at Death.

"Hodge, wait!"

Zenna's voice drew him around. To be honest, he'd been nearly about to collapse anyway, and he fought not to show her how weak he was as she ran toward him.

"Canna wait, girl!" she said, gesturing with his axe at the salamander.

"Go then," she said, touching her hand to his scorched face. It was a tender gesture, one that caught him off-guard, but he understood an instant later as healing energy poured into him. Feeling restored, he nodded at her, and ran toward the fray.

The salamander's long body shook as an arrow caught it in the shoulder. Arun could see, however, that Dannel's shot hadn't penetrated far, and even as the missile stopped quivering its long wooden shaft was consumed in a blast of flame. The shot was followed by a series of pale blue darts, magic missiles that smoked briefly as each was absorbed by the burning monster.

Dannel came walking deliberately down the center aisle of the cathedral hall, drawing and firing as he came. His second shot narrowly missed as the salamander reared up and laid into Arun, slashing him across the body with its spear. Although designed as a thrusting weapon, the spear nonetheless tore through his layered armor, opening a gash in his belly that was instantly cauterized by the heat of the steel.

Arun grimaced but did not cry out. But the salamander struck again, tearing the dwarf's helmet from his head by another expert slice from the spear that left him a smoking, three-inch gash in his temple that laid the white bone of his skull out bare. Arun staggered, and suddenly the salamander swung its body around with surprising quickness, slamming its tail into his chest. The dwarf went flying, and landed a few feet away on his back, smoke rising from him, unconscious or dead.

"Arun!" Zenna cried, already starting toward the dwarf. But her allies—friends, too, of the fallen man—responded to the defeat of the paladin not with fear, but with rage, rushing forward into a blind assault upon the salamander.

Morgan ducked a powerful sweep of the spear as he entered the deadly radius of the salamander's reach. By some miracle the steel head failed to connect with his head, although he could feel the heat as it passed inches above him. He swarmed in, driving Alakast ahead in a sweeping arc. The staff, created to destroy evil outsiders, seemed to sing as it carved the air, striking the creature with a reverberating bang. The salamander, clearly hurt by the blow, let out a foul curse in its alien language, its eyes promising death to the warrior as it recentered itself and drew its spear back for another combination assault. It paid no heed at all to Hodge, whose rush, though brave, ended in a wide swing that missed its torso entirely. Another arrow slammed into its body, but it likewise ignored that assault, focused entirely upon the knight of Helm.

Morgan, knowing what was coming, stood his ground.

The spear came down in violent fury. He somehow caught the first thrust on Alakast, narrowly deflecting the weapon. But with an almost insane speed the salamander drew the long spear back and stabbed again, and this time the cleric could not withstand it. Pain blossomed in his chest as the spear drove through his armor and into his lung, and he was falling, backward, his lifeblood pouring down over his body from the terrible wound, even as it smoked and bubbled from the heat. He looked up at the monster, which as an almost casual afterthought swept its tail out at Hodge, knocking the doughty dwarf to his knees.

They were done, he thought, defeated.

Consciousness, mercifully, fled.

Chapter 200

Seeing the salamander destroy her friends, one after another, Zenna felt her heart freeze in her chest. The thing was wounded, seriously it seemed, but with their three warriors all dead or dying—no, she saw, Hodge somehow still clung to consciousness, kneeling almost at its "feet"—how could they withstand its power?

Even as that thought filled her mind, she was rushing forward, inexplicably, to try and save one of them. To her own surprise she ran toward Morgan, who was closer, true, as Arun lay nearly on the far side of the creature, as well a thousand leagues away. She'd watched the cleric struck down, and knew that she only had a few seconds to do anything, if it was not already too late.

But she underestimated the salamander's reach. She saw too late the glowing red spearhead, threw herself forward as pain exploded across her shoulder and back.

Strangely, it was not as bad as she'd thought. She was lying on the ground—could not remember how, there was a gap of a second or two between when she'd seen the descending spear and now. She could not see the salamander, but knew it was close, perhaps already lifting the spear to end her life. But she saw Morgan, lying on the ground just a few feet ahead of her, looking at her, the light in his eyes already fading, blood covering his lips.

She would never know why she did it, why she chose to save him, of all people, instead of herself. But she reached out, and as she touched him, life flowed from her fingertips, and she knew that he would live.

For a heartbeat, at least... before the salamander killed them both.

But the salamander was having its own difficulties. Three arrows now jutted from its body, and it turned from its spear-work to deal with the elf. Safely thirty feet away, Dannel was out of the immediate reach of the spear, but as the creature lifted a hand to point at him, the flames building in its grasp, he knew that this time, dodging aside would not be enough to save him.

Then a tiny form darted out from the shadow of the rubble along the edges of the great hall. The salamander saw her, but like so many foes before it, deemed her a lesser threat than the other foes that had already hurt it. Indeed Mole looked puny in contrast to the deadly monster as she ran up, holding her little mace. But then, to everyone's surprise, especially including the salamander, she bounded up into the air, landing atop Hodge's back, and using the startled dwarf as a springboard, arced out in an unbelievable leap. The salamander twisted around, but too late, now, and as the gnome passed it, she drove her mace with the full force of her tiny body and the inertia of her leap into the side of its head.

There was a loud crack.

Mole cried out, dropping her weapon as the searing heat of the monster passed through it into her hand. She landed in a smooth roll, however, and her knife came out as she regained her feet.

It wasn't necessary. The salamander gyrated in place, unsteady, its deadly spear falling from its hands. Then another arrow slammed into it, sinking six inches into its chest.

The monster tottered, and fell in a smoking heap.

Chapter 201

They spent the better part of a full day in the cathedral, tending their wounds and slowly recovering their strength.

Morgan and Arun had both come close to death, only the quick application of a potion from Mole drawing the paladin back. Zenna recovered consciousness, thanks to Dannel's own healing bard song, and she was able to summon enough divine magic to bring all of them back far enough to be safe from the lingering temptation of death.

They secured the cathedral as best they could, and rested.

Mole explored the side rooms, finding a few valuables of celestial origin in one. Morgan frowned at her when he saw her examining an ancient oil painting of a winged celestial, but he didn't say anything. The other room contained a welter of animated books, flying tomes that launched themselves at her threateningly, but she was able to close the door before any of them reached her.

They had secured some other treasure as well; both of the spears they'd taken from the succubus and the salamander radiated strong magic. Zenna took custody of the shorter weapon that the succubus had carried, for now; although she did not look very threatening with it, perhaps it might give a careless foe pause. Morgan refused the long spear, so Hodge carried it, though he looked a bit foolish lugging around the cumbersome weapon. It grew cool after the salamander's death, indicating that the heat it bore was simply transferred through the metal haft, but Zenna insisted that the enchantment upon the blade was considerable, so they were not foolish enough to simply leave it.

They slept at the far end of the cathedral, away from the statue. The stone monolith was carved into the shape of a huge, bloated, roughly man-shaped figure with a head vaguely like that of a ram, clutching a massive mace with a skull for a head against its breast. It was disquieting, and none of them wanted to spend much time near it.

On the far side of the statue, they found a staircase that descended into darkness under the cathedral. The location of the first test, according to Kaurophon, but none of them wanted to consider such right now.

They didn't speak much of their confrontation with the salamander; well, all but Mole, who happily chattered about her triumphant defeat of the monster. Finally even patient Arun sent her off to "search for hidden treasure".

They rested, and slowly regained their strength. They had little healing left, just a few potions and a handful of charges in their wands, and Zenna insisted on husbanding those resources. The occasional shifts of their environment—Kaurophon called them "flashbacks"—were disorienting, but preferable to the wilds outside the cathedral, and Zenna even discovered that their healing powers were augmented during those brief interludes, facilitating their recovery.

They had almost nothing left in the way of supplies. Mole had brought some of the bison-meat, which was nearly rotten, in her magical bag. Zenna purified it with her magic, and they found some old wood and tattered parchments to serve as fuel to cook it, but the meal was poor, and they ate mechanically, without pleasure.

Finally, their bodies restored, if not their souls, they returned to the stairs.

Kaurophon left them at the threshold of the staircase. "There is a ward here, that I cannot pass," he told them. "It bars one of my ancestry."

For a moment, Zenna was afraid that she would be restrained as well, but only felt a faint tingle against her skin as she moved onto the staircase.

"I thought you said that you'd failed at the first test," Morgan said, his voice tinged with a hint of anger. "You said that there were two doors, a demon behind one, and a celestial behind the other, and that the tester has to kill once to win past."

"That is true, I promise you," the sorcerer assured them. "My knowledge of the first test is not first-hand, I admit, but I assure you, it is accurate!"

"What, did you get another band of gullible fools to essay this far before us, only to be destroyed by the test?" the knight asked, his voice rising almost to a shout.

Kaurophon vehemently denied the charge, and offered as a gesture of goodwill the loan of his wand of magic missiles to Zenna, to use in the first test. Zenna took the device, but saw that Morgan was not convinced; in fact the cleric's eyes shone with the same distrust that he'd evidenced on their first meeting. Even though she had saved his life several times now, she wasn't sure if he still felt that way about her now. Did he still consider her little better than the sorcerer? Or even better than the fiends they were battling in this place?

Ultimately they had to press on; they had come too far to turn back now, in Zenna's estimation. In any case, their resolve to keep a wary eye on their "patron" had been redoubled, for all he'd proved helpful to their cause thus far. Over the course of their journey, Zenna had covertly used her magic to scan the sorcerer, and she knew that he carried a variety of objects of power, ranging from minor to considerably potent. They would be fools to trust him blindly, and yet there was a part of her that wanted to believe his claims, needed to believe because of the implications that Kaurophon's quest held for her own mixed heritage, and the meaning of who and what she was.

They made their way down the stairs, alert for any sign of danger. Dannel conjured up a magical light to brighten their steps, although Arun's glowing sword made that more a convenience than a necessity. Morgan had the poorest dark vision of all of them, so the elf placed the spell atop Alakast, transforming in the staff into a beacon that guided them forward. As they descended, the walls changed from the faded white marble of the cathedral to a dense gray stone, slightly slick with condensation.

The stairs gave way onto a bottle-shaped vault, the entry at its neck, carved from the stone in smooth lines. The two doors they'd expected were evident, one to each side, but their attention was drawn to the elaborate desk situated between them, at the far side of the room.

The desk was carefully crafted from a dark, almost black wood, and looked quite heavy. A few random artifacts were positioned on its surface; some papers, a quill and ink dispenser, a few aged tomes, and some glass objects that were not immediately identifiable. But of more immediate import was the figure seated behind the desk, who looked up as they entered.

It had once been a man, perhaps. Whatever it was, it was clearly dead, its flesh desiccated and sunken, clinging to its bones under a layer of funerary wrappings bound tightly about its limbs and torso. It wore plate armor fashioned in an archaic style. Its head was a terrible mask, a skull covered by dried skin, its eyes points of fire that fixed them with grim immediacy.

“Undead,” Morgan said, his hands tightening around Alakast. For a moment she thought that the cleric would rush blindly into battle with the creature, for all that it had made no threatening gesture toward them, but then, with an effort, he mastered himself. The mummy regarded them without concern for a long moment, and then it spoke.

“Adimarchus, Most Potent Ruler of Occipitus, bids you welcome to the Test of the Smoking Eye. If you are here, then Occipitus lies fallow, without a strong hand to guide its development. Know then that you are pretender to Adimarchus’s throne. If you are worthy, step forward and undertake the Test of Judgement.”

A withered hand pointed to the door on their left. “Behind that door lies Thatnak the bebilith.” Gesturing to the other door, he went on, “Behind that door lies Halalia the avoral guardinal. Choose one door, slay the occupant behind it, then pass through the door on the other side. I will meet you there.” With that, the creature waved its hand, and vanished.

For a moment the five stood there in silence. “Well, thus far, it’s as Kaurophon said,” Mole observed. “But which door do we choose?”

“I am not going to slay a celestial to pass some demon’s game,” Arun declared. “However, destroying a demon does have its appeal to me. Come on.” He started toward the left door.

“Wait!” Zenna warned. “We have the advantage of being forewarned, for once. Let us not waste the opportunity.”

The suggestion was too reasonable to refuse, so they made their preparations. Zenna considered going back up to Kaurophon, to beg a few spell protections from him, but ultimately rejected the idea. The others were already too on edge when it came to him; no sense in provoking another confrontation between them.

So she handled the preparations herself. She’d adjusted her spell selections somewhat earlier, and she hoped that they would prove effective against whatever lay beyond the door. Kaurophon had mentioned the bebilith, but the word had no meaning for her.

If she'd known its significance, then she might have been less willing to pass the door.

When they were ready, Arun opened the door. The portal led to a broad platform, nearly thirty feet square. To their right, the chamber opened out onto a great chasm, crossed by several oddly-fashioned bridges of wood and rope. The bridges twisted and turned over the chasm, attached to dozens of mountings from both above and below, and connected with another ledge barely visible on the far side.

The area on and above the bridges were choked with thick webs. A big, heavy shape, amorphous in Zenna's darkvision, hung in those webs, filling her with a sense of foreboding. The mystery of its identity was quickly revealed, as Morgan stepped forward, boldly presenting Alakast, shining the light at its tip out over the chasm. The shadows withdrew, revealing the dark shape. It seemed to fold outward as Zenna watched, long, slender legs reaching out to the surrounding webs, drawing out the body beneath.

It was a spider, but unlike any spider that Zenna had ever seen. It was horrible, massive, maybe fourteen feet from where one leg touched to its opposite, with fangs like huge scimitars. Its body was all plates and edges, as if it were clad in armor.

For a heartbeat the demon and the companions confronted each other. Then, as the companions reached for their weapons, the bebilith rushed forward to meet them.

The first part of the Test of the Smoking Eye had begun.

Chapter 202

The bebilith's target was clear from the start; it made a bee-line toward Morgan, who, true to form, stood his ground before its rush.

"Come on, demon!" he cried, brandishing Alakast.

Arun likewise moved forward to intercept, his holy sword glowing brightly. The demon saw the dwarf and his blade. The radiance of the blessed blade seemed to give it pause, and it hesitated in its rush long enough to hurl a compact bundle of webs at the paladin. For all his strength, the dwarf was far from agile, and the sticky bundle caught up his legs, snaring him and binding him to the floor.

"Blast!" he yelled, trying in vain to snap the strands, which held him like steel cords.

Dannel started firing arrows, his quiver already augmented by Zenna's spell, the aligned missiles tearing through the demon's defenses. But his initial shots fared poorly, and he scored only one hit, the others glancing off of the demon's thick hide-plates.

Likewise, Hodge thrust at it with his new long spear. The weapon that had inflicted so much damage upon them in the hands of the salamander proved ineffectual here, scratching one of its abdomen-plates but doing no real damage.

The demon resumed its charge, and ignoring Hodge barreled forward onto the platform, seeking its target in the form of the armored knight of Helm. Morgan met it boldly, but as he lifted Alakast to strike the demon lunged in at him with surprising quickness, stabbing its long fangs into his shoulders. The cleric cried out as the vicious pincers penetrated his armor, injecting foul toxins into his bloodstream. But Morgan was made of stern stuff, and he drove Alakast into its head, drawing a chittering refrain from the slavering gap of its mouth.

Now it was really mad.

Mole moved to aid Arun, slicing at the webs holding him with her knife. But the tiny weapon was too small to be very effective. Still, Arun saw the efficacy of the strategy, and turned from trying to break free through brute strength to hewing at the webs with his sword. Slowly, the strands began to part from his efforts.

Zenna added her own efforts to Dannel's barrage, firing a volley of magic missiles from Kaurophon's wand. The bolts stung the spider-demon, but the thing was so huge, so imposing, she knew that it would likely take a lot of punishment to bring down.

All they could do was keep up their efforts, she thought, unleashing another series of blasts.

The bebilith was in a rage, now. Another thrust from Hodge did nothing, but the blow from Alakast had hurt it. It lunged again, striking with its foremost limbs at the knight, drawing him up to its foul jaws, the vicious hooks on its legs tearing at the man's armor. The magical steel groaned before the demon's strength, bending and twisting like a tin can being torn open by a determined child. The fangs darted in again, and Morgan's cry was one of anguish, now, blood pouring down his body from the deep punctures. Once again he was nearly on the brink of destruction, helpless in the grasp of an enemy.

But somehow, the former cleric hung on, and his face twisted into a mask of grim determination as he lifted Alakast once more.

With a dwarven roar of triumph Arun finally tore free of the sticky webbing, and charged headlong at the demon. Even as it reveled in the destruction of Morgan it sensed him coming, and another armored leg shot down to greet his arrival. Arun took the stabbing thrust on his shield, and before the arachnid fiend could draw it back he sliced out with his sword, the holy blade sundering the limb from its body.

The bebilith drew back in pain, unbalanced. An arrow slammed into its face, just below one of its eight bulbous eyes, and as its grip on Morgan loosened, the knight drove the end of Alakast into one of those gleaming, unblinking orbs. Now in real distress, the demon reared backward, revealing its less-protected underside. Now finally Hodge was able to add his mark to the tally of damage, thrusting his spear deep into it, driving it backward, until it lost its balance on the edge of the precipice, and fell screeching into the void.

Morgan, his body ravaged, his armor peeled away from his torso, wavered, and collapsed.

Chapter 203

“Hurry, he needs healing, or the venom in his bloodstream may yet kill him,” Zenna said.

She laid another healing spell upon him, while Dannel and Arun held his arms, adding their own power to the seriously injured knight. His wounds closed, but Morgan’s body trembled, fighting off the deadly spider poison. Zenna had held a spell of restoration in reserve, and that had been the first spell she’d cast, but she suspected that the healing power she possessed was like a droplet in the face of the raging flood of the bebilith’s powerful poison.

This place... it's one nightmare after another, she thought.

Morgan began to stir. Weakly, he opened his eyes. He saw Zenna, bending over him.

“Again... again you pull me back,” he said, blood flaking his lips. He was weak, very weak, but he insisted on drawing himself up, to a seated position.

“Well, that’s one suit of armor that won’t see much more use,” he said, fingering a bent plate.

“I may be able to repair it,” Arun said. “Difficult, though, without a proper forge.”

“We can pack it in Mole’s bag, bring it back with us,” Zenna said. “But right now, I think we’d better move forward. Can you walk?”

Morgan nodded, but he required Arun’s assistance to stand, and wavered even with Alakast to steady himself.

“You know, priest, you’re one crazy warrior,” Arun said. But his voice was warm, and he clasped the knight on his shoulder.

Morgan, uncharacteristically, grinned. “You know, dwarf, I think you may be right.” Summoning his strength, he drew apart from Arun’s supporting arm, and walked away under his own power, leaning heavily on his staff.

“I can help you more tomorrow,” Zenna said.

“Don’t worry,” Morgan said. “I’m fine, I can keep up.”

“Still, maybe you’d better leave the insane frontal assaults to Arun for a day or two,” Dannel suggested.

With the bebilith destroyed, it was a fairly simple matter to make their way across one of the bridges, Mole going ahead to check for traps. On the far platform they found another door, and passed into another chamber beyond. There was another door to their right, presumably to the other chamber of the Test, but again they saw the mummy, waiting for them as it had promised. Once more Morgan tensed upon seeing it, but again the undead creature made no hostile move toward them. Looking around, Zenna saw that the chamber was decorated with frescoes showing a black-feathered angel doing battle with hordes of demons and devils. Where the wall met the ceiling of the chamber, a single sentence was carved in a repeating pattern around the entire perimeter of the room. The words were clearly legible to Zenna, although they did not look like the common speech: KNOW WHO MADE YOU. A dais was visible on the far side of the room, upon which lay a lantern attached to a four-foot pole by a short chain. Glowing red sigils floated in mid-air about the dais, although Zenna could not decipher their meaning without closer examination.

The mummy strode up to the dais, stepping through the glowing runes, and took up the lantern. Crossing the room toward them, it addressed them. "Heed the words of Adimarchus," it said. "You have passed the Test of Judgment. Attend to the wisdom of Adimarchus! Always deal with rivals first, and enemies second. This lantern shall guide you to the second test: the Test of Resolve."

It extended its arms to Zenna, who took the lantern. It was heavy, and its narrow beam of light pointed north, back toward the chamber of the bebilith. And with that, the mummy vanished, in a flash of light.

"Well," Dannel said. "It seems we made the right choice, but for the wrong reasons."

Zenna was having difficulty juggling the spear and the heavy lantern. "Would you like me to carry one of those?" Dannel asked her.

At first she shook her head, but then she realized that they most likely had more days of walking ahead of them. "Thank you," she said, offering him the spear.

Mole had poked around the dais a bit, but other than the glowing runes, which didn't seem to do anything, there didn't seem to be anything else of note in the place. "Well, we'd better get back up to Kaurophon, I guess," she suggested.

"Be ready for anything," Morgan added. "Now that we have this lantern, he may decide that we are no longer necessary."

"Let 'im try something," Hodge growled, the threat apparent in the way he gripped his spear.

"Perhaps it would be better if we left him behind us, at this point?" the cleric said.

"I don't think so," Zenna said. "He knows this place well, well enough to follow us wherever we go, I suspect. Don't forget that he has the power to scry, and I wouldn't be surprised if he was carrying a focus on him; all you'd really need is a good-quality mirror. And his knowledge may prove useful to us yet. Better to keep him with us, where we can keep an eye on him."

Morgan clearly didn't like it, but ultimately he nodded. Just the effort of standing here, talking, was obviously wearying him.

"Let's get back up to the cathedral," Zenna said, not unkindly. "We could all use more rest."

"Not yet," Arun said. "There's one more thing that we need to do first."

Zenna turned toward the dwarf, curious.

* * * * *

Author's Note: so at this point, Morgan has -1 negative level (from the succubus), 6 CON (from the bebilith's poison), no clerical spells, and mostly ruined armor. You'd think that this is as bad as it can get for the fallen cleric, eh? ;)

Chapter 204

The chamber was smaller than the one where the bebilith had waited. The only feature of note was a faintly glowing circle inscribed in the floor, laid with silvery runes that seemed to pulse slightly, and rippled with apparent movement when one turned one's gaze away, and saw them out of the corner of one's eye.

Standing within the circle was a seven-foot tall humanoid creature, an odd cross between a bird and a man. It watched them intently with penetrating eyes set in a face resembling that of a hawk, complete to the angular beak and pale feathers that covered its body. Great wings rose out from its torso where arms would have been on a human, but while it was at rest, as now, they folded against its body, revealing small hands at their ends that seemed fully articulated, folded together in a contemplative gesture that was somewhat at odds with the fierce look of the creature.

Its beak opened, and it spoke, something soft and melodic.

Morgan's face was transformed by the words, and he half-fell to his knees, bowing before the creature. He responded in the same language.

"What's it sayin'?" Hodge asked.

"It is a celestial," Arun said, "No doubt imprisoned here by Adimarchus."

The hawk-man spoke something else again, clearly addressed at Morgan. Before the cleric could respond, however, Arun strode boldly forward, until he stood at the edge of the circle.

"Careful, Arun!" Zenna cautioned.

The dwarf stared intently at the creature, which withstood his gaze with equanimity. Then, as if satisfied, the dwarf extended a booted foot and smeared one of the runes forming the circle.

The glow instantly faded, and the avoral stepped free from the circle. It turned to Arun, and bowed to him.

“I thank you for my freedom, dwarf,” it said, speaking common in a clear and unaccented voice that seemed strange, coming from that beak.

“I’ll not tolerate one such as you being held captive,” the paladin said simply, inclining his head in respect.

“No... no, one consecrated to the Soul Forger would not,” it replied, offering another bow before turning to the rest of them.

“Long have I been trapped in this place, conjured and bound by the dark powers that rule this pit. I had not expected to see wayfarers from the Material Plane here, in the Abyss. What transpires, above?”

They updated the avoral on what had happened, including the departure of Adimarchus and how they had been drawn to this place to match themselves against the evil forces seeking to gain control of Occipitus. The celestial listened carefully, and nodded thoughtfully when they were finished.

“You have embarked upon a dangerous quest, mortals. I will offer what aid I can, but I cannot in good conscience join you in a mission so torn with ambiguities. I would warn you, though, to be wary, and to watch this sorcerer of which you speak with great care.”

“Oh, we intend to,” Arun said.

With the avoral in their company, they returned to the cathedral. Kaurophon was not pleased to see the avian creature, Zenna thought, although he hid his feelings well. The celestial, on the other hand, utterly ignored him. Once the sorcerer learned of the success against the first test, however, he perked up, showing great interest as they described what had happened.

“Then we have a clear path to the second test!” he exclaimed. “Come, we must be on our way immediately!”

“Hold yer horses,” Hodge said. “The priest’s sick, and we can all use a breather ere we start marchin’ back an’ forth across this gods-forsaken pit—no offense, birdie.”

“None taken,” the avoral said, a hint of amusement in its voice.

Kaurophon protested, but he could not sway them; the companions were united in their desire to avoid blundering into danger again unprepared. So they set camp once more in the cathedral, and rested. The avoral proved a boon companion, telling them tales of Celestia and the other higher realms, tales that inspired them in this dark place. His very presence helped keep some of the darkness of the plane at bay, and they had a peaceful sleep for the first time in days.

In the “morning” they prepared to set out once more. Arun did what he could to patch up the knight’s damaged armor, using the limited tools available to him; although it still provided far less protection than it had when whole, it was better than no protection at all. Arun and Zenna both cast spells of restoration upon Morgan, and he looked much better afterwards, though still somewhat pale. Taking their leave of the celestial, they set out on a course that roughly continued their earlier path to the place, following the long beam of the magical lantern.

Ahead, somewhere in the distance, lay the second part of the Test of the Smoking Eye.

Chapter 205

Zenna cast a long, sweeping glance across the vast plain that surrounded them in all directions. Due to the flat nature of Occipitus, they could see clearly all the way to the surrounding mountains that held the flatlands in their grasp, and the omnipresent skull-mountain that issued smoke and plasms in an unceasing trickle. That long vista gave the place an illusion of compactness, but having walked over a goodly part of the plane since their arrival, she knew first-hand how big this region was.

It was their third “day” since their departure from the cathedral. They counted the passage of time by the number of sleeping-breaks they took, an inexact measure at best. At least the soft, slightly spongy ground and flatness of the plain made their travel very efficient, and they covered many miles in each long march. They had come across another herd of evil bison, who had responded with much the same aggressiveness as the first group. This time there had been no convenient barrier to shelter behind, but there were only fifteen in this herd, and their weapons made short work of the fierce creatures. Dannel had taken a hard hit this time, butted almost senseless by one of the charging beasts, but healing had been quickly forthcoming, and none of the others had been seriously injured in the brief clash.

Occipitus’s sheer... presence continued to weigh upon them, and there had been occasional scenes of conflict on the long trek, but for the most part, they had settled down to a grim equilibrium, marching forward along the path indicated by the lantern.

Occasionally she transferred the device to Dannel, or Arun, or even Mole, but for the most part she bore the glowing lamp herself. Kaurophon did not offer to bear it, perhaps knowing that they would have refused him had he offered. In covert moments, away from the sorcerer, they agreed to always keep at least two of them in proximity to the lamp at all times, and to avoid leaving it unguarded for even a moment. Zenna had shared enough of what she’d learned about Kaurophon, especially his ability to dimension door, so that they could all be on guard against betrayal.

Still, oddly, for all that she found herself liking the quixotic outsider. Kaurophon had a strong presence about him, and his manner was always observant and often friendly. He kept himself apart from them for the most part, recognizing their suspicion of him, but there were times when he told them tales of the varied wonders of the Outer Realms, spoken vividly enough to give Zenna the impression that she’d actually visited some of these places.

She felt stronger now, more comfortable in herself. At the cathedral, during their rests, she focused her thoughts and continued her meditations, extending what she had learned and accommodating it to the altered realities of this place. She felt her consciousness expanding, and felt new avenues of power open to her explorations. She regretted the lack of access to new wizard spells, and the inks, quills, and other supplies to add them to her spellbook. But she could feel the divine magic at her command grow stronger.

“Something’s coming up behind us,” Dannel said, stirring her again from her thoughts. They all turned to look back, staring across the plain. Zenna thought she saw a speck in the distance, along their line of march.

“What is it?” Mole asked, sheltering her eyes with her hand, staring out over the distance.

Dannel didn’t respond for several long seconds. When he finally spoke, however, his words brought a familiar feeling of anticipation, mingled with dread.

“The vulture-demon, it’s back. And this time, it looks like it’s brought a friend along with it.”

Chapter 206

The two vrock demons flew rapidly closer, their wings beating powerfully as they sped over the landscape, close to the ground to avoid drawing the attentions of the plasms above.

The companions prepared themselves. Kaurophon cast several spells, putting his defenses in place, and laid an enchantment upon Arun to enhance his already-considerable stamina.

Zenna renewed her mage armor, bolstered it with a shield, and then turned toward Dannel. He’d drawn out an arrow, and was judging the distance toward the demons. They were still fairly far off, but growing rapidly nearer.

“Hold a moment,” Zenna said. She looked in his quiver; there were six arrows left inside, not counting the one he’d just drawn. “Put it back.”

He replaced the arrow, and she cast an align weapon spell upon them, drawing into them the power of good, anathema to the demons. “Make them count,” she said, drawing back. The elf nodded, and drew his arrow again.

The elf fired the first shot, his arrow lancing through the air, cutting the distance between them and the low-flying demons. One of them squawked, seeing it coming, and its fellow twisted to the side, the arrow knifing harmlessly between them. Dannel frowned and took aim for a second shot, altering his aim slightly. Beside him Hodge and Mole also opened fire with their crossbows, although there was little chance of doing damage with mundane weapons.

Again the demons dodged, but this time Dannel had adjusted, and the demon, fooled by the slight change in arc, darted to the same side only to have the arrow punch through its wing. The aligned missile hurt it, and it let out a loud, angry cry. Both demons started pounding their wings, gaining some altitude, presumably in preparation of a diving attack. Hodge and Mole’s shots both missed, and the dwarf dropped his crossbow, focusing instead on lifting his heavy spear into position to brace for their rush.

The demons, after the speed of their initial approach, now seemed content to move gradually into position. Now about thirty feet above the ground, they both suddenly seemed to shimmer, and numerous shifting images sprung out into the air around them. More missiles rose up to meet them, Zenna adding a cautious shot from her own crossbow, holding her other spells in reserve for the moment. She was rewarded by connecting with a mirror image, causing it to vanish. But still several remained around each demon.

One of the demons abruptly spread its wings wide to their full extension, and offered a loud, shrill cry. The ground beneath it began to shift and twist, a foul black cloud gathering out of the spongy turf. It took but seconds to form and then dissipate, leaving behind a pack of small, fat, slavering demons.

“Dretches!” Morgan warned them. Lesser demons, but there were nearly a dozen, and they immediately started rushing toward the companions.

The vrock rose up yet higher, fifty, sixty, seventy feet high, now at risk from the roiling plasms above. But they only remained there a moment, hanging at apogee eighty feet above them, before winging over and diving at them. They screeched as a spell from below interrupted their defenses, and the mirror images dissolved, revealing their true locations. Zenna glanced around her, but saw no sign of Kaurophon. Invisible, she thought, adding that bit of knowledge to what she knew of his powers.

As if he'd been waiting for that moment, Dannel lifted his bow and fired, the arrow slicing up into the gut of the demon he'd wounded before. The demon let out a cry of pain, but continued its dive, taking aim at the elf with its outstretched talons.

“Remember the stunning screech!” Zenna warned, but it was too late to do anything about it. The demons had timed their dive to coincide with their summoned dretches meeting them, and battle was joined.

“I'll hold the dretches!” Morgan cried, and he rushed out from their defensive ring to meet the small horde, Alakast lifted to attack. He drove the magical staff almost literally through one of the small demons, which erupted into a noxious heap of bone, gore, and black goo that quickly dissolved into nothingness. A second demon leapt at his arm, but he jammed the staff quickly back into its face, and it too fell, the putrid mess that passed for its brains leaking out from the gaps in its sundered skull.

Two were down almost immediately, but the other nine swarmed on Morgan from all sides, tearing with their ugly claws and biting with their protruding teeth.

The rest of the companions could offer little immediate aid, for the vrock were upon them. Hodge kept his spear aimed at the first as it descended, and although it tried to veer aside at the last instant, the canny dwarf shifted in time to drive the magical shaft through an extended wing. The vrock tore free and landed hard on the ground, immediately turning at the dwarf in a furious rage.

The second vrock assaulted Dannel, who drew his sword while keeping his bow close in his other hand. A claw clipped him across the shoulder, drawing long gashes down his arm even through his shirt of mail. He pulled free and lifted his sword, but too late realized that the weapon had almost no chance of harming the creature. Instead he stabbed it into the ground at his feet, and darted backward, trying to gain room to use his bow.

Arun roared one of his battle-invocations to Moradin as he laid into the demon threatening Hodge from behind. His holy blade tore through its thick hide, releasing a jet of black ichor, drawing an ear-shattering shriek from the creature. The other demon took up that cry and redoubled its force, their fury echoing across the plain.

The companions, their senses overwhelmed by that terrible sound, reeled. Even Arun, with his incredible fortitude, was momentarily overcome by that fell screech.

Morgan reeled, stunned by the vrock screech, and the demons facing him exploited that fact mercilessly. His armor, already ravaged by the bebilith, now had to withstand tearing claws and biting teeth, seeking gaps. Bloody wounds appeared in his arms and legs, and one demon even grabbed hold of Alakast, its nearly-mindless expression twisting in pain from the very touch of the weapon, as it tried to pull the staff from his grasp.

That crude attempt to disarm him finally shook him from his daze. A flare of rage seemed to flow out of the weapon into him, and he swept the weapon in a violent arc, driving the demons back. Two fell, their bloated heads laid open by blows from the staff, but the others barely hesitated, leaping at him again.

The vrocks had not wasted the momentary advantage provided by their stunning screeches. The one that Arun had wounded in the paladin's initial assault turned upon him, and unleashed a flurry of attacks upon him. It pumped its wings and lifted itself a few feet above the ground, so that its hind legs as well as its forelimbs could rake him with their claws. The dwarf's armor kept him from being torn apart, but even so a claw tore several gashes in his jaw, while another crunched heavily into his hip, driving pain even through the armored plate protecting him there. Finally the creature darted its vulpine beak at his exposed face, but he managed to recover enough to lift his shield, deflecting the powerful blow.

The second vrock continued its attack upon the stunned Dannel. Like its fellow it flew up to unleash a full assault upon him. Without the ability to dodge, the hapless elf had no chance. By sheer chance one claw missed, turned by the chain links of his armor, but the other three all dug painfully into his flesh, and when it darted its beak down to finish him, only the fact that he was already falling kept the demon from taking half of his head off. The elf went down hard, blood gushing from the wounds in his arms, body, and face.

The companions were nearly overcome... but in that moment of near-defeat, a power filled them, a pulse of energy that flowed into the veins like a bracing mountain torrent. Their bodies responded, moving with great speed, and they took the attack back to their enemies.

Morgan laid about him with Alakast, and every time he struck, a demon went down. One of the dretch tried to scare the knight, but the spell faltered against the man's mental focus, and the staff tore through them like a scythe cutting through a swath of ripened wheat. Soon the demons were intent only upon flight, but none got more than a few paces away before the white wood found them, and sent them back to the pits where they had originated.

Arun held nothing back, driving his sword into the body of the demon with thundering force, smiting it with the divine power at his command. The demon reeled before the dwarf, humbled by his strength and skill, and it fell back, its body covered in its own blood. It came to the belated realization that coming to the aid of its comrade against these outsiders had been a bad, bad idea, and it drew back from the dwarf, preparing to call upon its power to teleport from this place of death—its death, if it didn't flee.

It never saw Hodge come up behind it, or the descending axe, until it was too late.

The demon saw that its crippled foe still stirred, although with the amount of blood jetting from his wounds, death would not be long coming. Even though it had foes remaining, however, it could not resist the killing stroke, and it flapped forward, a talon poised to strike.

Flames washed over it, knocking the vrock off-balance. Even though it was resistant to fire, these flames still hurt it, scorching its flesh, sending a tendril of hot pain through its hide before they flickered and died. The vrock turned, furious, to see a woman, unarmored, facing it only about fifteen feet away.

"Face me, coward," she snarled at it.

The demon grinned, knowing that if the scorching ray was the best she had, she would soon be joining her dying friend. It launched itself at her, a claw tearing at her head.

Zenna felt pain blossom through her skull as she was knocked roughly backward, the vrock ripping through all of her vaunted magical defenses as though they were not even there. It would tear her to pieces, she knew, but she had no choice; she'd seen it move to finish off Dannel, and could not let that happen.

The demon let out a sudden cry of pain, and while Zenna hadn't seen the source of its distress, she knew what it had to be. Mole! she thought, and indeed there was her friend, visible as the demon turned in mid-air, the gnome dangling from her knife buried deep in the back of its leathery thigh. The demon snarled and lashed out with its claws, scoring the rogue deeply, forcing her to drop off and roll away, bleeding.

The demon turned back toward Zenna, but now there was a dwarf standing there, holding a sword that burned its eyes painfully with its bright glow.

"You die, demon," the dwarf said.

The vrock's anger, and perhaps its success versus the first few foes, overrode its caution, and it lunged at the dwarf, its claws tearing and slashing.

It was its last mistake.

A few moments later the companions gathered over the broken bodies of their enemies. The dretch had dissolved into greasy black stains on the ground, but the vrocks lay in bloody heaps, bones jutting from their broken bodies. Zenna had run over to Dannel, stabilizing him with her magic, and he was slowly coming around.

It had been a close call. Dannel had been very close to death, and Arun and Morgan both bore serious wounds. But they were still alive, and all too soon they were marching forward again, leaving another bloody battlefield behind them to mark their passage.

Chapter 207

“The Plain of Cysts,” Kaurophon said. “The site of an ancient battlefield between celestials and demons, cast down with the rest of Occipitus when the plane was torn from the celestial realms.”

“Wonderful,” Zenna said. The light of the magical lantern shone directly ahead, into the battlefield.

“What’s in those?” Mole asked, pointing at the nearest of the objects that gave the region its name.

The cyst was a grayish globule perhaps five feet in length, hugging the ground like the cocoon of some huge caterpillar. A black tube was visible protruding from one end of the cyst, sinking into the ground beneath. There were hundreds of them, spread out around the battlefield, as far as they could see.

“The remains of the celestials who fell here,” the sorcerer said. “Some demons say that as the plane absorbs their essences, it becomes more hostile to their kind.”

“So Occipitus is just... sucking them up? That’s disgusting,” Mole said, even as she edged closer to the cyst to get a better view.

“Leave the fallen be,” Arun said. “Our way lies forward, then. Would you like me to carry the beacon?”

Zenna shook her head. “I can keep it. Something tells me that we might need your sword, in there.”

The dwarf nodded, and they started forward, into the ancient battlefield. The companions formed a wedge around Zenna, the magical lantern clearly identifying their path ahead. They passed numerous cysts, including a few that were several times the size of the first, almost as if they were giant pale boulders rising out of the plain. Abruptly the lantern twisted on its pole, its light now shining to their right, perpendicular to their original course.

“That’s odd,” Dannel said. “So we’re supposed to change course, just like that?”

“Apparently so,” Zenna replied. “I don’t understand it any better than you do.”

They moved onward, but they’d only gone a few dozen paces when Dannel raised his hand in caution.

“What is it?” Zenna whispered, stopping.

“I heard something... just ahead, behind those big cysts.”

Warily, the elf started forward, while the rest of them silently drew weapons, prepared spells, and waited. But the elf had gotten barely ten feet ahead of them when there was a bright flash, and they found themselves standing at the entrance to the field of cysts, back where they had started.

“What was that?” Morgan asked, looking around in confusion.

“A part of the challenge, I would presume,” Zenna said. “Apparently there’s some property to the plain that removes intruders.” She glanced at Kaurophon with a questioning look.

“I have heard of no such property,” the sorcerer said. “But I admit I have not spent much time in this particular place here myself.”

“Well, how are we supposed to get through?” Mole asked. “The lantern is shining forward again.”

“Perhaps we can go around it?” Arun suggested.

Zenna shook her head. “I may be wrong, but I’d wager that whatever we’re supposed to find is in there somewhere.”

“I agree,” Dannel said. “So we just need to figure out what triggered the teleportation.”

“Maybe it was that what yer heard, elf,” Hodge said.

“Perhaps. Let us try again.”

They entered the plain again, quickly retracing their steps to where they’d reached before. Once again, they heard the faint sounds of activity ahead, although they could not see what it was through all the obstructing cysts.

“Maybe we’re supposed to stay together,” Dannel suggested. They all moved forward, cautiously. The lantern shifted again, drawing them around another tight turn to the right. They had to be heading back along their initial route, Zenna thought, wondering if there was a logic to this maze, or if it was just a random course, indecipherable to one not bearing the lantern. Given what she knew of demons, she suspected the latter.

Then they moved far enough around a series of cysts to see what had alerted them. Not far off the “path” stood a small group of humans, gathered around an opened cyst. All were lean and muscular, their flesh marked with tattoos inked in colorful patterns of red and violet. Three were men, clad in flowing robes gathered in at their calves and forearms with leather cords, while the fourth was a woman, clad in plate armor, with an odd symbol bearing a fierce female visage cast in gold fixed across the brow of her open-faced helm. They looked up as the companions drew near, and Zenna felt a twinge of revulsion as she saw the corpse lying at their feet. It was mostly dismembered now, its head and spinal column torn from the body, but enough remained, particularly the blood-stained white wings crushed beneath its body, to identify what it had been.

“Whut valud, nass talath ‘ar phaland Wee Jas?” the woman said, her voice stilted and formal, each syllable clearly fashioned.

Zenna looked at Dannel, but the elf only shrugged. “I’ve never heard the like,” he said.

“We don’t know what you’re saying,” Zenna said. She saw that the travelers were tense, and several of the men were slowly reaching for the daggers at their belts.

“Lesset tarun chakkar noth,” the woman said, making a slashing gesture with her hand to punctuate her statement.

“We do not mean to intrude upon your ritual,” Kaurophon said, his voice even, reassuring. He gestured toward the left, along their path, indicating that they would move on.

And then, there was a flash. Zenna had almost forgotten about the teleportation, but she wasn’t surprised to find themselves back on the edge of the plain once again.

But this time, they weren’t alone. The strangers were here as well, and they clearly weren’t happy about it. The woman let out a trill that sent a chill down her back, and as she lifted her spear, her three fellows leapt to the attack, daggers hissing from the sheaths at their belts.

Chapter 208

Caught off-guard by another involuntary teleportation, the companions found themselves attacked by another group of odd planar travelers.

The lightly-armored men seemed insane, charging into battle with daggers against foes with the advantage of both superior gear and superior numbers. But they moved incredibly fast, and even as Morgan lifted Alakast to strike, two flanked him, stabbing him with their daggers. Both blows found openings in his armor, and the cleric staggered. Zenna saw the greasy slickness on the knives as they struck, and shouted out a warning to her companions. “Poison!”

But her friends were already responding to the attack. Arun shifted to avoid being flanked by the last rogue, who’d tried to put the dwarf between himself and one of the pair assaulting Morgan. The rogue’s blade glanced harmlessly off of the dwarf’s armored torso, but Arun’s counter tore mercilessly through his robes, slicing through the layer of studded leather armor beneath and digging deeply into his body.

The armored woman, meanwhile, began uttering words that Zenna recognized as a clerical spell. She did not recognize the language, but recognized the familiar flows of divine energy, a spell of protection that settled around the woman.

“We should deal with the spellcaster,” Kaurophon, standing beside her, suggested.

Zenna didn't respond, having already come to that conclusion herself. Lifting her hand, she drew upon her own magic, speaking the words that triggered her scorching ray spell. The flaming blast seared into the woman, drawing a cry of pain from her.

Hodge was standing in the middle of the melee, too close to effectively use his spear. Dropping the long weapon, he unlimbered his trusty axe, and hurled himself at one of the two rogues threatening Morgan. The man dodged back, narrowly avoiding the dwarf's first attack, but his evasion left him open to a solid blow from Alakast, which cracked him on the shoulder.

Arun's foe tried to hold his ground, tumbling again to the flank, but the dwarf simply adjusted, slicing him again with a powerful blow that staggered him. Seriously wounded now, he saw but could not avoid being flanked in turn as Mole rolled behind him, and cracked her mace solidly into his back. With a groan, the man slumped to the ground, dying.

The enemy cleric tried to call upon another spell, but even as she began her invocation two attacks poured into her; an arrow from Dannel's bow and a quintet of glimmering magic missiles from Kaurophon's wand. Her concentration broken, she staggered backward, shouting a command to her allies even as she dug in the pouch at her waist for a scroll.

The two rogues drew back, taking up defensive positions around the cleric.

“Should we finish ‘em?” Hodge said, lifting his axe.

“No, let them go,” Zenna said. “This was largely a misunderstanding, I suspect, anyway.”

The woman unrolled her scroll and read the words upon it, and the three strangers shimmered and disappeared.

“That was a mistake,” Morgan said, grimacing as his body fought against the lingering effects of the poison on the rogues' daggers. “They were clearly enemies, and may return with more forces later.”

“I don't think so,” Zenna said. “And in any case, we'll find plenty of fights here without looking for more trouble.” She stepped over to the injured knight, to heal him.

But Morgan turned away. “I'm fine,” he said. “Let's get this over with.” Without waiting for her, he started down the familiar path again into the Plain of Cysts.

“What about him?” Dannel said, glancing down at the last rogue.

“Dead,” Mole said, checking his body. “It's too bad... the first real people we've seen since coming to this place, too.” She looked down at the dead man sadly, but that didn't stop her from taking his dagger and a few other things she found on his body.

“I guess they'll know better ‘an to attack strangers, next time,” Hodge said.

“Where’s that blasted knight headed?” Arun said. “Without the lantern, he’s going to get himself lost.”

“Maybe he’s already lost,” Zenna said, too softly for the others to hear, as they hurried back into the maze, to catch up to the diminishing form of the injured knight of Helm.

Chapter 209

“I think we have to keep moving, that stopping our progress triggers the teleportation,” Zenna said.

They were deeper into the field of cysts now, a few turns beyond where they’d initially encountered the strange and hostile planar travelers. The path continued to shift, turning occasionally to a perpendicular course to their left or right, sometimes doubling back on itself. The lantern allowed them to follow the route without error, but they couldn’t see any landmark that it might be leading them toward.

“You may be right,” Dannel said. “It would fit the pattern of what we’ve experienced thus far.”

Mole had drifted off of the “path”, and was heading toward one of the cysts. “Careful, Mole,” Dannel cautioned. “We should stay together.”

“There’s something here,” she said, pointing toward the cyst. Looking in that direction, they could see that there was in fact a faint glow coming from within.

“What’cha got, girl?” Hodge asked. “An enemy?” He lifted his spear at the thought, orienting the weapon in the general direction of the cyst. “Or maybe some loot, eh?”

The gnome was now standing over the cyst. “It’s a glowing sword!” she said excitedly. “Magic, no doubt.”

“We cannot stop,” Kaurophon said. “Already we have been delayed too long, here; we cannot keep retracing our steps.”

“Hey, it looks like there may be some other stuff in here, too,” Mole said.

Zenna had slowed her steps, but she was still being carried past Mole and the cyst. “We cannot stop, Mole.”

The gnome shook her head. “Well, I’ve been stopped, and I haven’t vanished yet. Go on, slowly, and I’ll catch up once I get this open.” She drew her knife, and started hacking at the cyst.

“Mole!” Zenna said, but the gnome had chosen to ignore her.

"I like this not, looting the dead," Arun said, frowning. "Though I detect no specific taint here, save for the general aura of the plane."

"Well, if it is a celestial weapon, then its former owner clearly has no use for it, and we can put it to better use than letting Occipitus slowly absorb it," Dannel said.

"It's too tough!" Mole's voice came back to them. "I need help—Hodge, how about that axe of yours?"

"I'll go," Dannel said, trotting back to her.

Zenna watched for the flash that would send them back to the start of the path, but nothing happened. Finally the elf and gnome came running back, carrying their prizes.

"What did you find?" Zenna asked, curious despite herself.

Dannel held up the sword, a sleek hand-and-a-half weapon with a glimmering white blade, marked with runes in what Zenna recognized was the celestial language. For all his earlier focus upon completing the challenge here, Morgan was clearly drawn to the weapon, and he stared at it in amazement as Dannel hefted it, its radiance clean and reassuring as it drove back the sickly red glow that shone everywhere upon Occipitus.

The knight swallowed. "This is a holy blade," he said.

"Go ahead, take it," Arun said. They were still moving forward, though their pace had slowed as they examined the sword. The path bent again to the left, and Zenna absently led them around the bend. Distracted, she didn't see the pile of debris that rose up out of the plain maybe a hundred yards ahead, which they were now approaching.

Morgan shook his head, clearly still mired in his own doubts, and his hasty oath to refuse the chosen weapon of his deity until he'd redeemed himself in the eyes of his god.

"Arun has proven the utility of such a weapon, priest," Dannel said. "You should take it... you'd put it to better use than any of us."

Slowly Morgan nodded, and took the sword gingerly, as though afraid that it might bite him. Once in his hand, though, it looked as though it belonged there.

"Here... take Alakast," he said, handing the staff to Dannel. "You are nearly out of arrows, in any case." Dannel accepted the weapon.

"We also found a cloak, and a set of bracers," Mole said eagerly. "Zenna, you want to check them out?"

But before Zenna could answer, a chattering noise drew their attention back toward the path ahead. There, behind one of the larger cysts, they could see a long, slender limb jutting out from cover. Its owner rose up from behind the cyst... a horror of a thing, resembling a giant spider, about the size of a warhorse, with multisegmented legs that extended outward in a spread that had to be six or seven paces across. Its body was oddly segmented, as if a deranged craftsman had built it out of black iron plates, and the four slender, multi-jointed pincers flanking its mouth were surmounted by a row of four strange, multifaceted eyes, each glowing slightly in a different color, and mounted in such a way that they could twist to face nearly any angle around the creature. Taken it all it was bizarre, alien, and utterly frightening.

“Another spider-demon!” Morgan exclaimed.

“Nay,” Kaurophon said. “A retriever!”

“Whatever it be, it be trouble!” Hodge yelled, clutching his spear with the head pointed in the direction of the monster.

The companions hesitated, reluctant to blindly charge at the creature. Zenna knew that if they stopped, they would be returned to the start of the path again, but faced with this thing, she thought that it might not be a bad option.

The thing let out a loud metallic screech, and one of its colored eyes flashed. A bolt of jagged electrical energy surged from the eye, blasting into Zenna’s chest. The tiefling was knocked off her feet by the force of the impact, and she felt everything around her spin as pain radiated out through her body from where the bolt had struck her. She heard her comrades shouting, and then, belatedly, the white flash came.

They were back at the beginning, once again. Zenna listened for the sound of the creature that would indicate that it had teleported with them, but the area around them was quiet, and her companions, while wary, looked calm. Arun knelt beside her, and gently touched her face, filling her with healing energy. She nodded gratefully, pulling herself up to a sitting position.

“Gods, that thing packed a wallop,” she said.

“You might try ducking, next time,” Dannel said lightly, but it was clear from his expression that he was concerned for her.

“How we s’posed to get past that thing?” Hodge said.

“The same way we got past everything else,” Morgan said grimly, tightening his grip on his new sword.

“You’ll get your chance,” Mole exclaimed, looking out across the field of cysts. “It’s coming!”

Chapter 210

“Kaurophon!” Dannel said. “You knew what that thing was... how do we beat it?”

“I presume you hack it to pieces,” the sorcerer said, speaking a word of magic and disappearing from view.

“Not very helpful, eh?” Hodge said, setting his spear with hands that trembled slightly. They could all see it, now, making a beeline though the plain, stepping over cysts that blocked its path as it rushed rapidly toward them.

Zenna stood, grimacing as the motion sent a new surge of pain through her body, despite Arun’s earlier healing. She rushed over to Hodge, laying her hands upon the head of his spear, aligning the weapon.

“Thanks,” the dwarf said.

“Zenna, get back behind us,” Arun said. “You won’t survive another one of those blasts.”

Nodding, Zenna retreated. Mole had vanished—no, there she was, crouched in the lee of one of the nearer cysts, out of the direct line of sight of the oncoming retriever. Kaurophon was likewise invisible, but she suspected he was somewhere close, probably laying additional magical protections upon himself.

Dannel drew out an arrow from his quiver; his last one. Carefully he fitted it to his bow, and pulled the heavy string back until the fletchings brushed his cheek. The demon was now just over a hundred and fifty feet distant, and closing fast. The song filled him, and he knew even before he released that the shot would be perfect. It sliced through the air, slamming squarely into the face of the demon. The sound of the impact was a clear note, a clang that reached them over the ancient battlefield, but the damage, if any, was superficial.

The thing drew closer, and released a scintillating bolt of pure white from another of its eyes. Dannel followed his own earlier advice and ducked, but the edge of the ray still grazed his side, and white crystals of frost formed along his shoulder and bicep as he spun around, dropping his now-useless bow.

“Draw it to us!” Morgan shouted, hurling a javelin. At a hundred feet of distance, the cast was improbable at best, but he nearly struck it anyway, the head of the weapon sticking in the ground a pace from its body. Arun’s throwing hammers were well out of range, but the paladin had taken up Hodge’s crossbow during its rush, and released a shot that clanged against its metallic body.

“Stand fast, warrior,” Kaurophon’s voice whispered in Morgan’s ear, and the knight felt energy flowing into him, fortifying his stamina.

“Here it comes!” Hodge yelled, as the demon launched into another frenzied rush, heading straight for Dannel. Arun and Morgan surged to meet it, but its speed was such that it barreled right past them to lunge at the elf, lifting a leg to stab down at him. Dannel threw himself to the side, but the leg still sliced through his cloak and tore at the mail-links protecting his torso. The edge of the limb was serrated like a bent saw, and even though the elf’s roll helped him move through the worst effects of the blow, he was trailing blood as he regained his footing, Alakast held in a defensive position before him.

Morgan and Arun each yelled a cry of battle as they rushed the demon. Arun’s blow came first, but the dwarf put too much power into the swing, which unfortunately only glanced off of its armored body. Morgan, recognizing the durability of the creature, focused on a spot that looked vulnerable—the joint where its head met its abdomen. The holy sword clanged into it with violent force, and a seam opened, releasing a nasty, pungent gel that bubbled down about its frame.

The demon instantly turned upon Morgan, and fired a green beam into his chest. The fallen cleric staggered and cried out, and looked down with horror as the splaying beam spread out across his torso.

And where it touched, his armor, and the skin beneath, started to turn gray and stiff.

Slowly turning him to stone.

Chapter 211

Morgan cried out, unable to resist the terrible transformation that threatened to destroy him.

And in that cry, he spoke a name that he had not used since before coming here, a name that he'd left behind in shame and guilt.

“Helm!” he shouted.

Drawing upon a reservoir of fortitude deep within him, and the anchor of that name, the knight roared and twisted away from the creature and that fell ray. The eye-beam flickered out, and after a tense moment of uncertainty, Morgan felt his skin returning to normal.

“Destroy it, now!” Arun yelled.

The companions, knowing full well the potency of the demon, assaulted it with everything they had. Hodge drew up his spear and charged it from the flank, slamming the head of his weapon deep into its armored side. Mole came up from behind, but even though her mace struck a thick leg solidly, it didn't seem to have much effect upon the creature. But it felt it when Dannel drove Alakast into its head, and it staggered.

But it was not finished just yet.

The retriever lashed out with vicious strokes of its blade-limbs, tearing fierce wounds in those it struck, hurting Dannel, Arun, and Morgan. Dannel went down, hurt bad, blood gushing from his bleeding leg. Morgan, already wounded in the battle with the rogues earlier, fell back, clutching at his gashed and bleeding side. The demon lunged at him before he could escape its reach, lashing its pincer-fangs around him and drawing him roughly up into the air, securely held in its bite. Morgan screamed once and crumpled as the creature crushed him, drawing him into unconsciousness and toward death.

Arun lifted his sword and immediately rushed again at the demon, which was turning back toward the cyst-field, as if intent now upon retreat with its captive. But the last gem-eye, a brilliant red ruby, swiveled and flashed, blasting a stream of fire into the dwarf's chest. The dwarf staggered back from the force of the blast, and it was clear that the flames had hurt him, hurt him bad.

But it would take a lot more than that to stop Arun Goldenshield.

The dwarf roared an invocation to Moradin as he leapt inside the reach of the demon's stabbing limbs, under Morgan's dangling legs, and drove his sword straight up into its body. The demon convulsed, twitching, stumbling as Hodge drew his spear out and stabbed it in again, this time into the joint directly behind its head. It screeched and finally fell, still holding Morgan tightly in its grasp.

Arun was there in a flash, prying the crippled knight free, stabilizing him with a trickle of healing energy, until his reservoir of divine power was empty. Zenna had already tended to Dannel, but the elf was still very pale.

The dwarf stood, gingerly, his own body blackened and battered. "I think," he said, sucking in a deep breath, "I think, that maybe, we should rest a bit, before heading back in."

No one disagreed.

Chapter 212

They were getting close, Zenna thought; she could feel it.

Slowly, each step deliberate along the path illuminated by the magical lantern, she walked onward. Her new cloak flapped against her legs as she walked. It was a bit large for her, but she didn't begrudge that in exchange for the benefits of its magical protection. Both she and Kaurophon had examined it during their last rest, and it radiated a potent, if unspecific, abjuration effect. With some time and a decent laboratory she could no doubt pinpoint its precise protective spell, but for now, the others had agreed that she should wear it.

"Need yer to keep standin' to keep them healin' spells comin'," Hodge had commented.

Neither of them had been able to decipher the function of the bracers they had found, except to confirm that they were in fact magical. For now, they rested secure in Mole's bag of holding.

They were getting a bit spread out, and she considered stopping, letting them teleport back to the start of the invisible maze. But when she looked back, Mole and Dannel were returning from their excursion to the heap of debris where the retriever had made its lair. Mole had the look of someone who'd just found a treat hidden under her dinner plate, and Dannel was carrying something heavy... a suit of armor?

"Good news!" the elf said, as he rejoined them. "This suit of plate is in almost perfect condition... and it looks right about your size, Morgan!"

"We also found a lot of gold, and this dagger," Mole added, holding up the weapon gingerly by a bit of cloth wrapped around its hilt.

"What's wrong with it?" Hodge asked.

"It doesn't... well, feel right," the gnome replied. "But it's clearly magical, it even gives off a bit of a glow when you draw it."

"Bah, it's just a knife," the dwarf said. "Give it 'ere."

But Arun blocked him with an outstretched hand. "It is evil... I can feel the Taint seeping from it even from here," he said. "Discard it."

Mole's interest in her find was not diminished by the dwarf's revelation; if anything, she seemed more intent upon it. "Really? Evil? But... if we toss it, maybe a demon will find it, and use it against something good."

The paladin frowned. "You raise a good point. Then keep it for now, until we return to Faerûn, where we can see about destroying it. But don't carry it on your person."

"Arun's right," Zenna said. They were all still walking forward, but the discussion over the demon's treasure had slowed the others, until she was now a good ten paces ahead of them. "Wrap it up and keep it buried in your bag of holding, and don't play with it; such weapons can sometimes have an ill effect upon their users."

"Perhaps you should take custody of it," Morgan said, looking up from where he was examining the armor, taking the pieces from Dannel's grasp.

"What do you mean by that?" Zenna returned, her eyes narrowing.

"Just that you are a spell-weaver; you would best know how to deal with any ill effects it might produce."

"Maybe Arun should take it," Kaurophon suggested. Zenna jumped slightly; as he often did, the sorcerer had a way of fading into the background, and she'd almost forgotten he was there. "As a soldier of the Light, he may best be able to resist the call of the Dark."

"I've packed it away," Mole said. "Don't worry, I promise I won't look at it again until we get back home."

"Home," Hodge said, wistfully. "We be a long ways off."

The beam of light from the lantern turned again to the left, and Zenna, walking forward ahead of the rest of them, abruptly vanished without warning.

"Zenna!" Dannel shouted, running forward. As soon as he reached the point where Zenna had disappeared, he, too, vanished.

"An invisible portal," Kaurophon suggested. "Teleportation."

“Or a trap,” Hodge said. “Fer all we know it’s dropped ‘em off the edge o’ this crazy world.”

“Only one way to find out for sure,” Arun said, already clanking forward. The others followed close behind. One by one, they stepped over the invisible threshold and faded from sight.

And appeared someplace different, Zenna and Dannel already there waiting for them. They were not alone; another desiccated mummy stood there, clad like the others in resplendent ritual armor that jarred incongruously with the shrunken remnants of its flesh. Their surroundings were rather different as well, the familiar emptiness of the plain replaced by a forest of tall, slender brown stalks, forming a dense but not impenetrable thicket all around them.

The mummy shifted its attention from Zenna to the others as they appeared, and lifted its hands, showing that it bore no weapons.

“Heed the words of Adimarchus,” it intoned, in the same deep sepulchral voice they had heard from the first mummy, if this was not indeed the same creature. “You have passed the Test of Resolve. Attend to the wisdom of Adimarchus! Let neither riches nor weaponry, neither allies nor enemies, tempt you from your course. Instead, spread such distractions before your rivals. The lantern shall guide you to the final test: the Test of Sacrifice. Your ascension to the throne of Adimarchus draws nigh!”

Having delivered its message, it waved its hand and disappeared.

“Charming fellow, this Adimarchus,” Dannel said.

“Well,” Arun said, “It looks like we’d better...”

He was interrupted by a loud crashing noise almost directly behind them. Zenna spun just in time to see a huge, four-armed ape, with reddish-brown fur, reach out towards her with claws outstretched...

Chapter 213

Caught off guard by the sudden appearance of the giant mutant ape, Zenna screamed.

“Back, monster!” Morgan yelled, stepping in between her and the creature, driving his sword down into its chest. The fiendish nature of the ape was revealed in the way that the holy sword blazed as it struck, opening a massive gash in its torso, black blood pouring down its body. The ape, critically wounded, nonetheless reached for the knight with all four of its claws, only to stagger to the ground as one of its legs crumpled under its weight. As it fell, it revealed Mole standing behind it. The gnome casually flicked her mace end over end, the hilt snapping with a satisfying crack into her palm.

“The bigger they are,” she said, with a smirk.

They drew back from the still-thrashing ape, only to hear loud roars from deeper in the thicket, from where the creature had appeared.

“More of them!” Dannel said.

“Again with the obvious!” Hodge said, trying with some difficulty to set his spear with all of the intervening strands rising up around them.

“Battle-wedge!” Morgan cried. “Spellcasters in the rear, warriors to the front!”

They barely had time to shift their formation when two more of the huge girallons appeared, charging full-on toward them.

A bright scorching ray of flames exploded over the chest of the first creature. The girallon’s fiendish resistances absorbed some of the force of the blast, but only some, and it roared in pain as it rushed toward her.

But Arun and Morgan were in its path. The ape’s long reach gave it first stroke, and it pounded Morgan with enough force to stagger the knight. But then the two warriors were surging forward to attack, their holy blades tearing into it with violent force. The creature wailed as blood exploded from the violent rents in its torso, and when a series of magical bolts seared into it from an invisible Kaurophon, it fell.

The second girallon all but impaled itself on Hodge’s spear. Still it managed to stagger forward, smashing the dwarf across the temple with a claw. The dwarf’s helm saved him from a crushed skull, but as he spun around, unsteady, blood was visible trailing down the side of his head. He released the spear and drew out his heavy axe, leaping forward to drive the weapon into its left knee. The axe bit deep, and the girallon went down, screaming. Before it could rise Dannel was there, driving Alakast into its face, and with a sickening crack the creature fell back, still.

“Quite a welcome,” came the sorcerer’s voice from nearby.

“We got lucky, that they attacked so readily, and without any benefit of tactics,” Arun said. “If they’d survived long enough to get those claws into us...”

He didn’t have to finish his thought.

Morgan cleaned his blade on one of the girallon’s hides, before slipping it back into its scabbard. Dannel came over to him, holding up his wand, and after a brief hesitation the knight nodded, accepting the healing energy. After that, he treated Hodge.

“That’s it for the wand,” he said when he was done, tossing the depleted wand into his pack.

“How are we set for potions?” Zenna asked.

A quick survey found that they only had a pair of healing draughts left to them. The companions shared a grim look, but their faces also revealed hard lines of determination.

Zenna thought of the scroll in her pouch, the option out that she'd carried since they'd agreed to come here. But they had come this far, and she knew that her friends would stay the course until there was no other alternative but to retreat.

"Here, Dannel," she said, unslinging her crossbow and quiver. "You're far more effective than I am with these."

The elf accepted the weapons silently.

"Ew, look!" Mole said, drawing their attention back to the slain apes.

They turned to see that several of the fibrous tendrils had snaked around the corpses of the apes, slowly tightening their grasp upon them. The companions drew back in alarm, but none of the tendrils seemed to be approaching them.

"I hate this place," Hodge said.

"Let's get out of here," Arun said gruffly.

Turning, they started walking in the direction indicated by the lantern.

Chapter 214

Zenna figured where the lantern was leading them even before the fibrous forest began to thin out, depositing them back out onto the plain.

There, directly ahead of them in the center of Occipitus, lay the great skull. Streamers of flame, smoke, and the occasional bulbous plasm rose from the uppermost eye socket. The skull lay in the center of a blasted landscape that was sparse even for this place, and it seemed to stare balefully at them, waiting.

"Why am I not surprised?" Arun said, sounding tired. The sheer weight of Occipitus upon the psyche had to be having an effect upon him, she thought.

There was nothing to be done but to set out walking. A long day passed, with them slowly drawing closer to the skull, although by the time they finally broke to rest Zenna thought that the mound looked little nearer than it had when they had started. They encountered nothing, not the slightest stirring of life as far as they could see. It was as if the entire plane had fallen into a deep somnolence, with even the ever-dancing plasms in the sky above seeming to drift sleepily on their random courses.

They were tired and hungry, but Zenna was finally able to ease the latter problem. Their stores of buffalo meat had rotted to the point where even Zenna's purify spell could not make it edible, and they discarded the remainder soon after leaving the fibrous forest. Mole turned out her bag of holding, but only found a few loose grains and other scraps of food that did little to assuage their hunger. Zenna knew that whatever tests waited at the skull would demand the most of them, and that they could not afford to be weak from incipient starvation. So after that rest, while preparing her spells, she focused her meditations upon their need, finally nodding as a trickle of divine energy echoed in her mind.

The food she conjured with the create food and water spell was gray and bland, and it bore the same faintly rancid taint that everything in this place possessed, but that didn't stop any of them from eating their fill. Even with Hodge and Mole each eating enough for two people there was still a lot left, which Mole carefully packed up and stored in her bag of holding.

"Well, I mighta preferred a side o' beef and a keg o' ale, but damned if that didn't hit the spot," Hodge finally said. "But why didn't yer magic us up a meal before, when we was chokin' down that damned fiend-cow meat?"

"My powers have only recently augmented to the point where I can draw upon the third valence of divine energy," Zenna explained. At Hodge's blank look, she added, "I couldn't cast that spell before."

She didn't see the thoughtful look that Kaurophon wore as he considered this new development.

"Let's get moving," Morgan prodded. In his new armor, and with the holy bastard sword slung across his back, he looked again the vision of a veteran knight, although dark circles still hung under his eyes, and the muscles of his jaw were constantly tight, giving him the tense look of a hunted man.

The second day seemed to go much easier, with plenty of food to sustain them, and no obstacles to bar their way. They encountered a number of shallow pools, thin cuts like ulcers in the spongy ground, filled with a noxious, thick red fluid that looked and smelled like fresh blood. They gave those a wide berth, but they began to appear with more frequency as they drew nearer to the skull.

"Another day, maybe two," Morgan estimated, as they began to flag, and started looking for another place to set up a camp. It didn't take long; everyplace they looked seemed pretty much the same as the others, except that they wanted a spot well away from any of the bubbling ulcer pools.

"Well, elf, you going to lend a hand, or are you just going to stare at that skull?" Morgan said, as he laid out his ragged bedroll, and started undoing the straps on his breastplate.

But Zenna saw Dannel's body suddenly tense. "What is it?" she asked.

"Something's coming," he reported. "Flying this way."

The companions leapt up, reached for their weapons, and stared out at the distance. It took them a moment to see the tiny speck that the elf had spotted, but after a minute or two there was no doubting that he was right, that whatever it was, it was coming right for them.

Kaurophon's soft voice sounded behind them, casting spell after spell in anticipation. Zenna followed his lead, summoning both her mage armor and a shield.

Whatever it was, it was flying fast, maybe eighty feet above the plain, high enough to give it a clear vantage over the surrounding area, but not high enough to draw the plasms. Finally, while it was still little more than an amorphous black shape to most of them, Dannel's sharp eyes identified the enemy.

"It's a dragon," he said. "A big one."

Chapter 215

A large black dragon shot forward on beats of its powerful wings across the plain of ulcers, flying like an arrow toward the small group of adventurers.

Hodge, fumbling with the winch he used to load his heavy crossbow, exclaimed, "What is it with yer people an' dragons?" His voice was tense, expressing the fear that they all felt even now, despite their experience, as the creature of countless legends and tales made real drew steadily nearer.

"We'll need to bring it down to the ground, to have a chance," Dannel said, his voice calm, Zenna's crossbow cradled lightly in his hands. His words, even and in control, helped Zenna master the panic she felt fluttering in her gut.

It's just a dragon, she thought. We've killed those before. "Spread out," she warned them. "So it cannot get more than one of us at a time with its breath weapon."

There was no cover, nowhere to hide.

"Well, now we know why there aren't any beasts out here on the plains," Morgan said, clutching his javelin tightly, though it looked as though the dragon was maintaining its altitude rather than diving toward them, which made even a strong cast unlikely to score a hit.

Zenna noticed something as it drew nearer. "It has spells up," she warned, seeing the tell-tale glow of a magical shield.

"Leave that to me," came Kaurophon's voice. The sorcerer, of course, was nowhere to be seen.

Thinking that perhaps he had the right idea, Zenna paused to cast an invisibility spell upon herself as well.

Now that it was closer, they could all see it clearly, a sleek, graceful shape, with long horns jutting from its head, and wings that clutched the air and drove it forward. It wasn't as large as she'd first thought, Zenna saw, with its body proper maybe nine feet long, with its long neck and tail, not to mention its broad wings, adding an illusion of size.

Still, it didn't help ease the sudden rush of dragonfear that washed over her like a wave as it approached, gliding eighty feet above them, unleashing a roar that echoed over the plain. Zenna drew upon her well-honed discipline and the fear subsided, but she heard the cries of despair from several of her companions, and knew that the dragon's fearful presence was having an effect.

But that didn't stop them from pressing their attack.

Missiles rose up into the air as the dragon flew over them; bolts from Dannel, Mole, and Hodge, and a hurled javelin from Morgan. Zenna felt a brief moment of satisfaction as its shield wavered and faltered—Kaurophon's early contribution to the battle—but even so the majority of the shots either missed the creature entirely, or stuck harmlessly in its hide. She thought that Hodge's shot may have penetrated, a suspicion confirmed a moment later as the dragon's head turned, seeking out the dwarf. Hodge tried to run, but could not escape as the dragon's jaws opened, releasing a great gob of sizzling green acid. Hodge roared in pain as the acid splashed into the soft turf just behind him, splattering his body with the caustic gunk.

The dragon continued past and began a broad turn. As it began to draw away a small bead of flame rose up to meet it, exploding into a blazing fireball that engulfed the dragon. The beast flew out of the flames still intact, but Zenna thought it wobbled slightly, affected by the blast.

"All right!" Mole yelled. "Nice shot, Kaurophon!"

Indeed, Zenna thought. Another power he didn't bother to share with us before...

"It's coming around again!" Dannel said, watching as the dragon swung about in a leisurely arc.

"I'm all right... gah!" Hodge said, as Arun helped him up, healing some of the damage he'd taken. Zenna started toward the injured dwarf, but was captivated as the dragon finished its turn and started toward them again, its jaws opening again expectantly. Zenna noticed that it had renewed its shield.

"We need to bring it lower!" Dannel said.

"Here!" Hodge said, shoving his crossbow and a bolt into Arun's hands, before pushing off and staggering out of the way, so that the two of them would not be caught together in another blast of acid. But there was no time to reload the weapon, as the dragon flew straight at them for another attack.

Zenna concentrated on the sky above. Calling upon her magic, she focused her thoughts on the swirling plasms...

A fat, amorphous plasm descended from the sky toward the approaching dragon. The creature saw it and instantly changed course, turning to the side and accelerating downward to avoid the threat. Once it got closer it quickly recognized that the plasm was merely an illusion, but it was too late to change its course now. As it flew over the companions for a second time, it searched the battlefield, looking for the invisible spellcaster who was proving such an annoyance. Zenna realized what it was doing and held her breath in fear, hoping that the dragon could not detect the sound of her heart pounding in her chest.

Several things happened at once. Another bolt from Mole and Morgan's second javelin both struck its body and glanced off. Dannel had tugged a small object from the necklace at his throat and hurled it at the dragon. The sphere from his necklace of missiles struck the dragon on its shoulder, exploding into a small fireball that buffeted it roughly backward. But even as Dannel hurled his missile, the dragon unleashed another line of acid. It seemed to be a miss, landing far away from any of them, but then they heard Kaurophon's scream of pain, and saw droplets of red mixing with the smoking green of the acid upon the turf.

But in the moment before he was struck, Kaurophon had also managed another attack. Streaming strands of adhesive webs appeared directly ahead of the dragon's path. Without stable anchors, they quickly started to collapse in upon themselves, but then the dragon flew into their midst, and they snared on its wings, entangling them.

Dragonflight is not merely a product of flapping wings and physical strength; the mass of the creatures is too much for even their great wings to effectively lift. But likewise the magic that infused the drake could not alone keep it aloft, and although its strength and bulk instantly snapped dozens of the entangling strands, the dragon nonetheless could not avoid plummeting awkwardly to the ground. It managed to spread its wings enough to guide its fall, landing upon its hind legs with enough force that the companions, nearly a hundred feet away, could feel the ground tremble beneath them.

The dragon was injured, but still dangerous, and it turned toward the companions with a surging rage, tearing away the last strands of webbing clinging to it with an angry snap of its wings. Arun and Morgan were already charging toward it, and it moved forward to greet them, preparing its deadly claws and bite, its wings and tail, all its weapons ready to destroy.

Zenna was running toward it too, as her scorching ray had a much shorter range than the fireballs hurled by the others. I need to learn that spell, she thought to herself. She saw that the dragon and the two warriors were rushing toward each other, and added a mental shout, Let it come to you! Don't charge into its full attack!

To her surprise, as if they'd heard her, Arun and Morgan abruptly stopped their charge, and spread out to flank the dragon's stampede.

The dragon didn't hesitate, choosing Morgan as its target, spreading its wings to help carry it in a blazing leap that carried it over the final thirty feet that separated them. Its jaws snapped down in a powerful bite that would have torn the knight's head from his shoulders, had it caught its target. But even though Morgan dodged back, the dragon's wedge-shaped head slammed into his chest with the force of a battering ram, and he spun violently back, nearly losing his footing, his shining breastplate dented where one of the dragon's horns had struck him.

Dannel ran toward the battle as well, but instead of rushing straight at the dragon, he came on in a wide arc to approach it from its rear flank. He was moving incredibly swiftly—his own preparations for the battle had included an expeditious retreat spell—and as he drew near, he tossed aside the spent crossbow, lifting Alakast in both hands.

Hodge, likewise, cautiously approached the dragon from the opposite direction. His spear gave him a long reach, but despite Arun's healing his entire back felt aflame, and he knew all too well that he was not invincible. Still, the sight of Morgan and Arun rushing to meet the creature gave him courage, and he pressed forward, the spearhead bouncing slightly with each long stride.

Morgan held his ground against the dragon's rush, stepping forward to swing his sword at its darting neck. The dragon's shield rose up to block the descending stroke, and his blade flashed aside, utterly ineffectual.

But the knight's assault gave Arun a chance to strike at its body without the benefit of the shield, and the dwarf's stroke sliced deep into its flesh, the holy power within the blade eagerly cutting into the tainted fabric of the dragon.

The dragon instantly turned on this new adversary, unleashing a full assault upon him. Arun wrenched himself from the grasping claws, leaving glistening red on their dagger-like tips, and he stumbled as a wing buffeted him across the brow. Finally the dragon's tail lashed around its body like a whip, stinging the dwarf solidly across his face. Blood spurted from his broken nose, and his face was a gory mask as he somehow regained his balance and lifted his sword in challenge.

"IS THAT THE BEST YOU GOT?" he screamed.

In response, the dragon roared, and opened its jaws wide to finish him.

Chapter 216

A steaming hiss came from the dragon's jaws as the dragon reared up before him, and Arun knew that a jet of acid was about to end his life.

But the dwarf's companions had not been idle since their initial rush, and now they descended upon the creature with a violent fury.

Dannel and Hodge came at it from opposite flanks. Dannel leapt over a sweep of its tail as it swung back from striking Arun, and he thrust Alakast into the joint where its hind leg met its body, stabbing with it like a spear. Unfortunately, the dragon's incredibly tough hide foiled the stroke, and the dragon, though both fearsome and evil, was not an outsider, and therefore not vulnerable to the staff's special power.

On the far side, however, Hodge met with more success, puncturing the dragon's hide with a thrust of his spear. The wound was not serious, but it was another tally upon the stamina of the dragon, which was clearly beginning to show the effects of its wounds.

A flare of red-hot flame washed over the head of the dragon, as Zenna unleashed her scorching ray. But instead of searing it, the flames flickered and died, their potency weakened by the magical resistances possessed by the creature.

Damn! she thought, noting clearly that while her own magic had failed to harm it, Kaurophon's spells had penetrated its defenses earlier. At that moment, she took little solace in the fact that her path as a mystic theurge gave her increased flexibility with her magic, at a cost in terms of potency.

With the dragon momentarily distracted by the attacks upon it, Arun slashed at it again with his sword, but with the shift of the dragon's attention so too did its shield come around, and the dwarf's assault was turned harmlessly aside. Now it was the dragon's turn, and Arun drew back, lifting his shield...

Acid blasted into him like water from a sundered dam. For an instant he was lost behind the flood, which flared out around the shield, forming a dense cloud of liquid and smoke that splayed out on the blasted landscape, turning it black wherever it landed. Then it was over, and as the smoke cleared, each of the companions started in horror.

Arun still stood, somehow, although his shield was gone, with bits of metal that had once been part of it smoking as they clung to his flesh where they had been seared into place. The dwarf's left arm was a ruin, the bones of his fingers jutting out of his melted flesh. Streams of melted mithral ran like drops of water across his helm and greaves, his armor having barely held up against the deluge, protecting the vulnerable flesh beneath. It was clear that he hung onto consciousness by only the thinnest of margins, and his face was a mask of pain.

"Go... to... hell!" he croaked, lifting his sword again in defiance of the inevitable.

The dragon's eyes widened slightly, perhaps, surprised that this foe somehow still stood in the face of everything it threw at him.

While it knew that even one more attack would end the resistance of this stubborn enemy, the dragon was starting to realize that it was in trouble. Blows slid off of its armored hide, but more got through, and pain tore through its body mercilessly. Morgan cut into its shoulder with a two-handed strike from his holy sword, releasing a searing jet of glistening black blood, and as it turned toward him a bone in its left forelimb abruptly and unexpectedly snapped, Mole's tiny figure tumbling away as she made her voice felt in the melee. The dragon drew back, the dwarf's defiance forgotten as it focused now upon escape. Fortunately it was still faster than these humanoids, and even though it felt another stabbing pain in its side as it burst from the circle of foes around it, it was clear, and lifting into the air with a powerful if painful leap.

And then the world around it was fire, and it was falling, falling...

Chapter 217

The dragon was dead, falling to the ground with a loud thump, but the companions barely spared it a look, intent upon more immediate concerns.

“Arun!” Zenna cried, rushing over to him as he slumped to the ground, his ruined hand clutching at the air. Dannel quickly joined her, the melody of his healing song already issuing from his lips.

Zenna channeled her most potent remaining divine spell into healing magic, and the dwarf’s ragged breathing eased as the soft blue glow faded into him. Skin reformed over his fingers, but they remained stiff and unnatural, the damage done to them incapable of being healed without a greater intervention that they lacked here. As she worked Dannel pried the burned scraps of metal from his ruined shield from his exposed flesh, channeling his own healing into the blackened scars beneath.

Arun’s eyes remained fixed on her throughout their efforts. “Help me up,” he said to them.

“Arun...”

“Help me,” he commanded. It took both of them to assist him back to his feet.

“Are you all right?” Zenna asked Hodge, who’d come to stand behind them. The other dwarf nodded in response, though it was clear that he was still in a lot of pain.

“Help... me...” came a voice from behind them.

Zenna turned and looked up, and sucked in a breath.

Kaurophon looked better off than Arun, but the difference was not great. The sorcerer’s robes had been burned away in great swathes, revealing a sickly, mottled gray flesh underneath. He limped heavily, and she saw that each step left a footprint of blood in his wake.

Zenna walked over to him. “Hurry, woman!” the sorcerer hissed, pain clouding his normally even tone.

“Arun was more seriously hurt,” she said, increasing her pace, laying her hands upon him and summoning one of her remaining spells to ease his suffering. Kaurophon let out a deep breath as the healing spell took effect.

“My injuries still pain me,” he said. “Give me one of the healing potions, or a more potent curative, if you possess it.”

Zenna shook her head. “I will do what I can for you, but we must preserve our remaining potions against what lies ahead.” She started to concentrate on another minor healing spell, but the sorcerer’s angry retort cut her off.

“Without my aid, the dragon would have slain you, all of you!”

“We all fought together, and we all risked our lives,” Morgan said, coming to stand behind her. “Or perhaps you are starting to forget that, now that we draw near to our goal?”

With an obvious effort, Kaurophon mastered himself. He nodded to both of them. “Of course, forgive me,” he said. “It is only that my wounds... I am not accustomed to having the skin burned from my bones. I apologize for my outburst.”

“I will do what I can,” Zenna said, channeling more healing into him. “I will be able to do more tomorrow, after we rest.”

The sorcerer nodded.

Dannel had helped Arun wrap his damaged arm in cloth, Zenna saw. With nothing else to do here—even Mole did not suggest wasting time searching for the dragon’s lair—they gathered up their gear and set out once again.

At one point, Zenna glanced back at Kaurophon, and wasn’t all that surprised to see his robes intact once more, his body whole. She knew it was an illusion... and yet, could not forget the mottled, uneven flesh she’d seen beneath the ravaged robes, or the violence in his words. Had she seen the true man beneath his careful façade? Or had it just been the pain of his injuries, as he’d claimed?

With the fiery sky burning uninterrupted above them, they continued their journey toward the great skull, and the final Test of the Smoking Eye.

Chapter 218

It took the better part of a day to finally reach the skull. As they drew nearer, it became clear that the skull was huge, hundreds of feet in height, dominating the plains. The lantern continued to focus directly at its base, making it increasingly likely that whatever the nature of the third test, it lay somewhere within the huge construct. Above them, plasms roiled as they rose from the opening of the skull’s eye socket and drifted up into the sky above to join their brethren.

The ground near the base of the skull was bleached and lifeless, and instead of its usual springiness it crunched under their feet. White dust rose in a slight cloud with each step, but thankfully Occipitus lacked wind, so their approach was not limited as they reached the base of the huge mound and started around to the left, following the slender beam of light projected from the magical lantern.

“I cannot tell if this is stone or...” Arun said, running a hand along the pocked and weathered surface of the skull.

“Nothin’ here be natural,” Hodge growled.

Morgan had taken the lead, and none of them begrudged the knight the privilege. His face looked tight, his skin sunk against his skull, dark shadows gathered under his eyes. Zenna wondered if they all looked like that, bearing the mark of Occipitus clearly upon them. Of course, she could alter her appearance as she chose, with her magical hat, but it could not hide the reality beneath. She knew that her own frame was lean, every ounce of fat she'd been carrying burned away by the scanty food and hard exertion that they'd all experienced since coming here.

They spent the next quarter hour trudging around the base of the massive formation. Its sides near the base were sheer and almost vertical, making an exterior ascent a very dicey proposition. Fortunately, the lantern seemed to indicate an alternative, continuing to guide them around the skull, rather than inside it.

Finally, their course revealed a large ulcer pool ahead, in a depression that directly abutted the chalky white cliff of the skull. Lying on the ground directly in front of the pool, impaled by several spears, was a man.

"What in the name of the gods..." Dannel exclaimed, echoed by similar sentiments by several of the others.

They moved quickly ahead, wary for any signs of ambush. As they drew nearer, they could see that the staked victim was not a man at all, but an unusual creature that defied clear classification. Its faded gray wings were those of a celestial, but its lean, muscular body was marred with hundreds of intricate scars, obscene designs and fell runes hacked into its flesh by an obviously twisted mind. The spears holding it were thrust through its wings, pinning it, but it was clear that the creature had also suffered recent tortures, with fresh blood running down its body from numerous cuts and gashes in its naked torso.

As they drew nearer, the creature struggled against its restraints for a moment in a futile gesture to free itself, before sagging, unconscious.

"Saureya!" Kaurophon exclaimed, once he'd drawn close enough to see the dying figure's face.

"You know him?" Zenna asked.

"He's a fallen celestial... once a servant of Adimarchus!" the sorcerer explained.

"In a moment, he's going to be a corpse," Mole said, noting the blood oozing from his body, the faint trembling of his chest as his breath rattled in his throat.

Arun had already moved over to his side. With a heave he pulled the wickedly barbed spears out of the ground.

"Careful," Zenna said. "He may be dangerous."

"Fallen or not, I'll not leave a creature to die like this," Arun said, bending to channel enough divine energy into the celestial to stabilize him.

Morgan drew his sword, the pale light from the blade, highlighting the crannies of his face, giving him a sepulchral look. "If he is hostile, I will send him back to the pits," the knight intoned.

Saureya stirred, his eyes opening slowly. He looked up at them, and then, slowly, ignoring the blood that jetted from barely-healed injuries at his motions, stood.

"Interesting," he said.

"That's all yer have ta say, after we save yer life?" Hodge asked. "No thank ye?"

"Thank ye," the fallen celestial said. There was no life in his words, and barely a flicker of interest as he looked over them. "Greetings, Kaurophon," he said, when he saw the sorcerer.

And then he turned to leave.

"Wait!" Dannel said, moving quickly to block his path. "We have questions. Who are you, and what happened to you?"

The fallen celestial regarded the elf for a moment, as if weighing his decision to answer. "I am Saureya," he said. "As for... that," he said, gesturing to the discarded spears and the blood smeared over the cracked ground, "That was the work of a rakshasa and a fire giant, who are trying to complete the Test of the Smoking Eye."

"The Test!" Kaurophon exclaimed. "Have they gone inside the skull, then? How long?"

"Oh, not long, I'd imagine, or I'd have been dead when you encountered me."

"What is the final test?" Morgan asked.

"That I'll not reveal." At Morgan's darkening expression, Saureya continued, "And don't think that you can coerce me to tell you, either. I've been worked by masters of the torturer's art, well beyond whatever persuasions you could master. The rakshasa was a crude amateur, by contrast."

"We're not going to torture you," Arun said. "We just want information about what we're facing."

"Ah," Saureya replied. "Well, I will tell you this. The test has a flaw."

"A flaw?" Dannel asked. Zenna looked at Kaurophon, but the sorcerer's attention was fixed entirely upon the celestial.

"Yes. I helped Adimarchus design the Test, you understand. He did not want a native of the Abyss to succeed him as ruler of Occipitus, so he built in the restrictions to the first Test. But you don't actually have to complete the steps in order, to overcome the challenge. Really, all you need is to confront the final Test; the difficulty is in finding it."

“Inside, I would presume,” Arun said. He pointed to Zenna’s lantern, which had swiveled to direct its light straight into the bloody waters of the pool.

“We have to swim through that? Ewwww,” Mole said.

Saureya nodded. “I’d suggest you get to it, unless you all want to grow whiskers, once the rakshasa passes the Test.”

“What do you mean?” Zenna said.

“Oh, you don’t know?” Saureya said, with a notable glance at Kaurophon. “Whoever passes the Test and succeeds Adimarchus will have the power to shape Occipitus to his—or her—will. Places like this, islands of reality that don’t really fit in either to the higher or lower realms, are mutable. Over time, who knows what outcome will be revealed?”

“What happened to Adimarchus?” Arun asked.

The fallen celestial shrugged. “He left. I’m not really certain of his fate. Maybe he ran afoul of one of his demonic rivals; he and Prince Graz’zt were engaged in some covert clashes over the centuries. Or maybe he had some private agenda of his own to fulfill; Adimarchus was never one to be very revealing about his intentions.”

“And what of you, celestial?” Morgan asked. “You bear marks of great evil, and you seem barely to care what happens to you.”

“I don’t care. And do not lay your claims of shallow morality upon such as me. Coming from you, especially, I find them galling.”

Morgan’s sword came up fractionally, but Zenna stepped forward to stand between them. “What now, then?” she asked.

Saureya fixed her with a gaze that for a moment swallowed her up in its depths. So much was there... and for the briefest instant, she thought she felt some shred of understanding as to the depths of suffering that this being had experienced. Without even realizing what she was doing, she reached out, and her fingers brushed against the defaced copper skin of his chest. Saureya watched her without emotion, but deep inside, where only she could see, he flinched at her touch.

“I do not know,” he said, and for a moment she did not understand, only belatedly returning to the present, and remembering that she had asked him a question.

“It is never too late to change one’s path, even in the last instant, so long as the spark flares,” she told him. It was something that her mother—step-mother, she corrected herself, without rancor, this time—had told her once.

“Perhaps,” he said. He turned around, and without another look at them strode away, out into the shadowless plains of Occipitus.

Chapter 219

“I am not certain that we should have let him go,” Morgan said, as they watched him depart.

“He will not hinder us further,” Zenna said with confidence. “I won’t say the same though for the two he mentioned, however.”

“A giant I understand,” Hodge said. “But what be this ‘rak-shaw’?”

“Rakshasa are feline humanoids, magical outsiders, masters of deceit and illusion,” Kaurophon said. “They are resistant to most weapons and spells. Very smart. Very dangerous.”

“Why’d I know I warn’t gonna like it, a’fore I asked,” the dwarf grumbled.

“If they’ve found the way to the final Test, we must stop them!” the sorcerer persisted.

Mole had examined the bubbling ulcer pool. “Well, there’s a dark opening back there that could be a tunnel,” she reported. “But that’s stuff’s caustic all right... we swim, we’re going to pay a price.”

“We’ve paid the price already,” Morgan said. “And we’re still paying it.”

There was an awkward moment of silence. Zenna wondered how firm the knight’s grip on sanity was. But then she laughed inwardly. How crazy were all of them, given what they had done and seen since coming here?

Arun broke the pause by walking over to the edge of the pool. “I’m going in,” he said, and without waiting for a response stepped into the pool. The weight of his armor pulled him down under the edge of the fluid quickly, and all they could see was the dark shadow of his form as it moved swiftly to the dark opening and disappeared from sight.

The dwarf’s example fortified them against their own fears, and ten minutes later found themselves in a long, twisting tunnel that rose steadily upward. The caustic fluid in the ulcer pool had seared their skin, as Mole had predicted, but they hadn’t spent enough time in it to do serious damage. Zenna conjured up enough water for them to at least wash off some of the acidic gunk that clung to them on escaping the pool. Still, as she looked around, she thought that they resembled horrible ghouls, drenched in the blood of their victims, clad in the rags of what had once been noble garments.

Okay, get a hold, girl, and lighten up a bit, she thought, hugging her arms close against her body. But it was impossible to banish dark thoughts in this place, especially here, knowing where they were.

They started up, the light from the lantern illuminating their way. The corridor twisted back on itself in a great spiral, and soon Zenna’s thighs were burning with the effort of the ascent. They were all tired, but none called for a rest, eager at least to be done with the trial ahead of them. Kaurophon seemed reenergized, and the passion that burned in his eyes was at least a bit contagious, as they began to hope that perhaps the end of the Test of the Smoking Eye was drawing near.

Dannel had moved to take the lead once again, moving along the inner wall of the spiral, a shadow at the edge of the ray of light cast by the lantern. The heavy iron of the lamp weighed heavily against Zenna's arms, but by now, it almost felt like a part of her, just an inconvenient extension of her arms. The light suddenly shone across Dannel's back, and belatedly she realized that he's stopped, that all of them had.

"Ahead," the elf whispered, his voice just loud enough to carry to those behind him.

Zenna could see a flicker of light, and a long, vague shadow splayed against the curving wall to their left. She thought she heard voices, and a moment later a sound of metal grinding against metal, a sound she knew all too well from time spent accompanying armored men.

Dannel started moving back toward them. "Now we just need a plan..." Arun began.

"Mawr!"

The loud feline cry echoed down the corridor from around the bend. The amorphous shadow shifted, grew suddenly huge, and the clank of metal became a cacophony. Zenna heard soft words, and although she did not understand the language used, she knew instantly what they signified. She glanced over at Kaurophon, and saw that he, too, recognized them.

"Spellcasting!" she warned.

"They know we're here," Dannel said, unnecessarily.

"Well, let's be about this, then," Arun said, lifting his sword and stepping forward.

"Wait!" Zenna hissed. "What about the plan?"

"You're just giving them more time to prepare," Morgan said, his own sword shedding a bright wedge of light across the curving walls of the tunnel as he drew it from its scabbard.

"We can deal with their spells!" she insisted, fixing Kaurophon with a stare, until the sorcerer nodded, reluctantly she thought. "But these foes are too great for us to simply rush in and hope for the best!"

"What would you suggest?" Morgan said scathingly. "That we cower here until they are content to come down here and attack?"

"Damn it..."

"Um... guys?" Mole interjected. "I think they're coming..."

The tunnel shook, pulsing with the heavy footsteps of an approaching foe descending toward them.

* * * * *

The giant rounded the corner first. Even though she knew what was coming, Zenna felt a stab of anxiety despite herself.

This creature made the hill giants and ettins they'd faced earlier seem puny by comparison. It was only—only!—about twelve feet tall, but by the way the corridor shook with its steps it had to weigh many thousands of pounds. Unlike the ungainly forms of the hill giants its body was broad and powerful, and it wore actual armor, black steel half-plate that covered its body like a second skin. It carried a huge sword half again as tall as she was, and its visage was fierce, its bright red hair flowing around its skull like a burning flame. Even without a detect magic, Zenna could sense the power radiating from it, recognized the signs in the way it carried itself, the unnatural speed with which it moved toward them.

The warriors stepped forward to meet it, forming a line to block the corridor against its rush. Zenna knew that her scorching ray would have no effect upon it, and she'd already conjured her wards and protections. Dannel had her crossbow, and the elf snapped off a shot at the giant's first appearance, the quarrel sticking almost pathetically in its arm, little more than a splinter. The other missiles that struck it—a javelin, a hammer, another bolt from Mole—either bounced off its armor or grazed its skin, doing little in the way of real damage.

And then there was no time for anything else, as it charged straight at them.

Zenna glanced over at Kaurophon, not surprised to see that the sorcerer had taken shelter again in invisibility. A good idea, she thought, but before she could cast the spell, the giant struck their line with a loud crash of clashing arms. Hodge's spear, set against its charge, stabbed through the plates covering its side, finally drawing blood, but the force of its rush knocked the dwarf backward roughly. Zenna saw a pale nimbus flare about the giant, and immediately saw its movements slow slightly, and she knew that Kaurophon had kept his unspoken promise to slice away the spells that bolstered the giant's power.

But the loss of its magical enhancements seemed not to hinder it in the least as it continued its charge. Morgan stepped forward to bar its path, but the giant simply strode through the knight, his holy sword glancing harmlessly off one of the giant's greaves as it knocked him prone with enough force to blast the air from his lungs.

And then, before she could react, he was right there, looming over her, his huge sword already beginning its inescapable downward path. She could not even manage a scream as the sword clove through her, striking the ground with enough force to tear a huge gash in the soft stone.

Chapter 220

The sight of the giant slamming his huge sword through her shook Zenna into action. Even as the mirror image of her vanished, she staggered back, trying to grab the trigger words to the spells bouncing about in her startled mind.

Her allies were already attacking the giant, trying to draw its attention from her. Dannel drove Alakast into the base of its spine, but the giant was not an outsider, and the impact did not seem to faze it through the thick layers of plate and leather covering its body. But it could ignore Arun so carelessly, as the dwarf hewed at a massive leg like a lumberjack assaulting a stubborn bole. His holy sword shone brightly as his stroke rang off the giant's greave, splitting the black iron and slicing open a foot-long gash in the meaty thigh underneath. The giant roared in pain, and turned from the shifting images that remained around Zenna to sweep his massive sword around toward Arun. The sword caught Arun in the side, and while the mithral armor held, saving the paladin from being hewn in twain, it was clear from the way he favored his side that ribs had been bruised if not broken by the terrible impact. The giant did not hesitate to follow up his advantage, lifting his sword for another powerful overhead strike, and it was only by throwing himself to the side at the last minute that Arun avoided a second hit that might have taken him out of the fight for good. Again the sword ripped into the ground, and a tremor shook the tunnel, ignored by the combatants intent upon the desperate melee.

Let alone for a handful of seconds, Zenna's mental discipline reasserted itself and she completed her spell. "Drop!" she commanded it, the word echoing off the narrow confines of the tunnel, worming into the subconscious of the giant. It had a strong will, Zenna could feel, but her magical studies had focused upon enchantments, and her own strength of mind was not inconsiderable. The giant shook his head, but his fist loosened its grip, and the heavy sword clattered to the ground.

A small form darted into the melee, unnoticed by almost everyone until it hopped up onto the giant's knee, balancing for a moment upon his kneeplate before lunging up and grabbing onto one of the thin plates that surrounded his hips in a broad skirt. Mole hung onto the plate with one hand, her knife bare in the other as she swung up into the crevice between its legs, disappearing from view for a moment as she darted in between the long slats.

The giant roared, a fierce, angry sound that filled the corridor. It slapped down violently at the gnome as she reappeared from between vertical plates of armor, her knife dripping blood drawn from a quite private location on the giant's anatomy. Mole went flying, impacted roughly by the edge of the giant's palm, but she was able to roll with the impact and tumbled in a series of somersaults that carried her almost to the side of the tunnel fifteen feet away.

Morgan had pulled himself to his feet, and now ran at the giant, drawing its attention with a loud cry of battle. It grunted as the knight's sword drove through its armor and tore into its gut, the glowing steel flaring sparks as it tore the black steel of its mail. The giant drew back a step, freeing itself from the sword, but instead of bending to recover his weapon he simply reached out and closed his fist over the knight's arm, crushing it in his incredible grip and lifting him off his feet. Arun was already maneuvering for another attack, but with a snap of his wrist the giant hurled his captive roughly to the side, slamming Morgan into the dwarven paladin and knocking them both down in a sprawl of arms and legs.

Zenna saw the giant's movements subtly accelerate, and realized that the rakshasa had replaced his magical enhancement upon the seemingly invincible ebon warrior. The feline humanoid had not yet shown himself, and Zenna assumed that he, too, was likely nearby, cloaked in invisibility.

She was about to belatedly follow the same course herself when a rumbling noise from behind drew her attention around. Her eyes widened as she saw a massive wave coming toward them; the stone floor, walls, and even ceiling were... flowing toward them in a potent pulse, like ripples in a rug that someone had grasped at the end and roughly shaken.

Then the wave struck, and all conscious thought was replaced by chaos as everything was flying out of control all around her.

Chapter 221

The world was flying around her... no, she was flying, picked up by the peristaltic wave rippling down the corridor and tossed roughly forward. Her eyes widened in surprise as she went flying past the giant, who size and bulk allowed him to weather the pulse as it passed, narrowly missing an armored elbow that jutted out into her path. Then she was falling again, and she barely managed to get her feet out under her again before she hit the ground in the wake of the wave, and rolled, coming to a stop a good fifteen feet from where she's started, now on the opposite side of the giant from where she's started.

She looked around in confusion. The shape of the battlefield had changed. The wave had passed, but everyone had been shaken by its passage, and almost everyone was down, a few feet or further from where they had started. The giant was up, and looking for his sword, which had been jostled now almost ten feet away from it. Arun was standing as well, and as the giant started toward its weapon the dwarf charged him again, his sword forming a bright arc of light in his hands as he came.

But the giant, his reflexes enhanced by the haste spell, was ready for him. He turned to face the dwarf, and met his charge with a fist that slammed into the side of his helm with enough force to dent the metal. Arun staggered, seriously injured by the blow, but stubbornly refused to stop, stepping forward and tearing another gash in the giant's leg with a powerful sweep of his sword. Blood was now pouring down the mangled limb from the two deep cuts, but Arun in turn paid the price for his attack as the giant's other fist came around and slammed with a meaty thunk into his face. The dwarf went down like a sack of potatoes, struck unconscious by the sheer force of the blow.

The giant turned back toward its sword. The other companions were already rising on unsteady feet, trying to shake off the effects of the tunnel wave, and quickly leapt to the attack. Zenna cast another spell, firing off a color spray into the giant's face, but luck was not with her this time, and the huge warrior shrugged off the effect. He ignored a feeble thrust from Hodge's spear, which glanced harmlessly off of his breastplate, and bent to reach for the hilt of his sword.

Once again a tiny figure shot out from the shadows. Mole leapt up onto the giant's outstretched arm, and even as the giant reared back in surprise, ran up the extended limb to its shoulder. The giant tried to swat at her with its other hand, but the nimble gnome darted forward and under the stroke, and as she ran across the top edge of his breastplate, she flicked her knife into his left eye.

The giant screamed in pain, and staggered violently, dropping Mole to the ground to roll out of the dangerous and chaotic stomping of his feet as he clutched at the hilt of the knife jutting from the ruin of his eye. The giant never even saw Dannel and Morgan run forward, but it felt the consequences as first Dannel drove Alakast into his already blood-slicked knee with enough force to shatter the bone beneath the joint. Then Morgan stepped forward, and with a shouted cry to his god slid four feet of holy steel up through the gap at the base of his breastplate into his chest cavity and the soft organs beneath.

The sound that the giant made when he fell was catastrophic, echoing up and down the tunnel.

Zenna watched the giant fall, but even as she felt a thrill of excitement flush through her, knew that another dangerous enemy still lurked for them. But even as she started to turn around pain exploded through her head, and she staggered, lights flaring in glorious bursts across her vision. Danger! screamed a voice in her head, but she was unable to clear her mind in time to react before a second impact caught her solidly, and she toppled forward. The tunnel floor rose up to meet her again, this time embracing her in merciful unconsciousness by the time she struck the stone.

Chapter 222

Dannel turned in time to see Zenna struck, and his cry drew the attention of the others around. He could not help her as she crumpled unconscious—gods, let her be only unconscious! he thought—but at least he could do something about the figure that became visible behind her.

It looked like a cross between a tiger and a man, with a fierce feline visage complete to a powerful set of jaws full of sharp teeth. An intense intellect shone in its eyes, but there was also a corruption there, a passion for dark things and raw power. It held a lantern similar to Zenna's, its edge smeared with blood from where it had struck Zenna down with the improvised weapon.

"You may have struck him down," it hissed at them, "But you will not stop me from achieving my goal!"

Its response was an angry roar of battle as Morgan charged toward the rakshasa. The tiger-man stood his ground, but as the holy sword struck a light flared around it, indicating that it had magical wards upon its person. Even so, the knight's blow penetrated and should have cut deep... only the rakshasa's hide absorbed most of the force of the stroke, and only a faint blackened streak from the holy energy of the sword marked its fur as it spun back and recovered its equilibrium.

“You cannot defeat me... flee this place, weak human!”

The words carried the force of a suggestion spell, but Morgan had been driven beyond the point where even magical compulsion could sway him, and he came on again in an all-out assault. This time the holy sword drew blood, though the wound still did not look serious, but the rakshasa’s confidence seemed shaken by the fierceness of this attack, and the rage that burned like a fire in the eyes of the man who swung that blazing sword with total abandon.

Hodge and Dannel, meanwhile, had rushed to the assistance of Arun and Zenna, respectively. Hodge was no cleric, but he knew that Arun had been carrying one of their last remaining healing potions, and he quickly found it in the paladin’s pouch, trickling the precious fluid down his friend’s throat. Dannel relied upon the power in his bard song to achieve the same result, drawing Zenna slowly back into consciousness with the healing power infused in the melody.

But even as Hodge started to help Arun back to his feet, the dwarven cohort saw another wave rippling up the tunnel toward them. “Watch out, ‘ere come another one!” he shouted, trying to stabilize Arun before the surge running up through the ground reached them.

This wave was not as forceful as the first, but it still wrought havoc in its wake. The dwarves, holding to each other, kept their footing, but Dannel found himself torn from Zenna, the elf knocked roughly to his back while Zenna was thrust semi-conscious twenty feet down the passage. Both the rakshasa and Morgan were likewise knocked roughly prone, but Mole, who’d been moving around to flank the melee between the two, did a back-flip that carried her over the cresting surge to land lightly on her feet.

The rakshasa and knight both clambered awkwardly to their feet, each staring at the other in a gaze that shared an equal portion of hatred on both sides. The tunnel-wave had separated them, and before Morgan could charge forward again, the rakshasa spoke a word of power and disappeared...

Or rather, started to disappear, for a moment after he flickered out of sight, he suddenly materialized again, a look of confusion on his face.

Arun thrust his sword into Hodge’s fist. “Go, join the attack!” he yelled.

“Yer can barely stand!”

“Go!” the paladin retreated, thrusting the other dwarf forward to punctuate his statement. Hodge obeyed, glancing back once before turning and rushing to catch up to the ongoing battle, the holy sword blazing brightly in his hand.

The rakshasa spotted both Hodge and Mole moving to join the battle, and while it could not see the enemy mage who was counter-spelling its own magic, it knew it was outmatched by these foes. Thus far its potent resistances had protected it from serious harm, but the holy weapon carried by its foe hurt it, and it knew that its defenses could not protect it for long.

It avoided the knight's initial rush, abetted by the fact that Morgan was still launching an all-out attack, powerful swings lacking any finesse whatsoever in an effort to cut through the tough outsider's resistance to physical attacks. It retreated and drew out a scroll, but before it could begin reading the magical words scribed upon it, a third wave rolled down the tunnel. Once again the combatants were knocked prone, driven a few paces down the length of the twisting passageway by the force of the pulse.

Zenna had regained awareness, and clung precariously to it despite the battering she was taking from the tunnel waves. She found that staying prone helped her to weather them better, and she called upon her clerical powers to channel positive energy through her body, clearing the stabbing pain from her head and steadying her grip on consciousness.

The rakshasa stood once more, but was forced to retreat again as Mole flanked it, trying to drive it back toward Morgan. It slipped around her, ignoring the ineffectual blow from her mace, and once clear began reading the scroll again.

But once again, a dispel sliced into the fragile lattice of gathering magical power, and the rakshasa snarled in frustration as the assault disrupted the strands of energy that would have carried it from this place, to escape.

With an angry cry it lifted its weapon, the magical lantern that served effectively as a flail, and rushed at Morgan. The two weapons clanged off of each other in a noisy cacophony. Another pulse rippled through the tunnel around them, but this time it was weaker, and they only fell back a moment to steady themselves before the two combatants met again in another violent exchange. Morgan took a solid hit across the shoulder that drove him back a step, but in turn the rakshasa suffered a cut across its body that was a real injury, now, bright red blood pouring from the cut to clot in its mottled fur.

Then Mole and Hodge arrived belatedly, and surrounded, the feline outsider was quickly overwhelmed.

The companions gathered again, fighting to keep their footing as the pulsing waves continued to roil through the corridor at regular intervals, each just a few seconds after the other.

"We can't stay here!" Morgan exclaimed. He'd taken up the rakshasa's magical lantern, which appeared to be similar to the one that Zenna carried, its shaft of light paralleling hers in pointing up the tunnel ahead.

"We're not ready for another battle!" Dannel noted, gesturing to Zenna and Arun, both of whom bore serious injuries despite the healing they'd received.

"I can fight, if need be," Arun said, taking his sword back from Hodge. He'd used up some of his daily reservoir of divine magic to steady himself, although he still looked battered.

"Forward, then!" Morgan said, cursing as another pulse knocked him roughly to his knees.

Alternating staggering with running as the waves passed, the companions rushed up the tunnel. The peristaltic pulses slowly began to fade, but it was a good twenty or thirty minutes before they were finally able to slump to a more stabled ground, exhausted.

“Hey, I think I still see the rakshasa,” Mole said. As her companions hastily drew weapons and looked back down the corridor in alarm, she quickly amended, “No, I mean the body. I think the tunnel waves pushed it up after us.”

Morgan sheathed his sword with a grunt. “If that was an attempt at humor, little one, I think we can do without.”

“Hey, that wasn’t a joke, honest! But hey, have you heard the one where an elf wizard, a dwarf fighter, and a halfling rogue all walk into a bar...”

“Hsst,” Dannel interrupted. “Do you hear that?”

They all drew quiet—even Mole, reluctantly—and listened. The noise was only dimly audible, an irregular pounding noise that drifted down from around the bend of the tunnel up ahead.

“That doesn’t sound promising,” Arun noted.

“Prolly some’pin else that wants to kill us,” Hodge grumbled.

Zenna noticed something else. “Where’s Kaurophon?”

Chapter 223

“I knew that he could not be trusted,” Morgan said, while Zenna cast a cantrip to scan the area around them for magical auras.

“Now that we got ‘im this far, ‘e’s takin’ the gold fer ‘imself,” Hodge said.

“Gold?” Mole asked.

“Yer knows what I mean.”

“I’m detecting something,” Zenna said, drawing their attention toward the tunnel ahead.

A figure appeared, materializing from the darkness as he dismissed his invisibility. It was the familiar figure of Kaurophon, and he regarded them with a calm expression upon his face, despite the intensity of the attention directed at him by his companions.

“Where did you go?” Morgan demanded.

“I heard the noise, and went up to investigate,” the sorcerer replied.

“Without us? Figured you’d take a quick look, see if you still needed us to help you pass the Test, eh?”

Kaurophon shook his head. “I am here,” he said. “Still you doubt my sincerity? I suppose I cannot blame you, you being what you are, and I being what I am. But does not your own creed proclaim the worth of deeds? Did you not overcome that dragon, the giant, and the rakshasa? Or perhaps, in the intensity of the fray, you did not observe the flames engulfing the drake, or the magical enhancements slide off of the giant, or the rakshasa’s spells foiled, allowing you to ply your blade without interference.”

“I value deeds,” Morgan said, “But I also know that what looks like sacrifice can in fact be self-serving. I ‘observed’, for instance, the fact that you turn yourself invisible at the start of almost every battle, and when we are all bruised and bleeding, more often than not you are still fully intact.”

“Ah, so it is my blood that you want, then?” he said. He pulled back his robes from his legs, revealing gray limbs scarred with acid burns, healed now, but still bearing the marks of the dragon’s breath. “I bled my blood, knight of Helm. Or do you want more? Shall I lay open my veins for you? Will you trust me more, when I am lying dead at your feet?”

“I do not think I shall trust you even then,” Morgan snarled.

“This is getting us nowhere,” Arun said, stepping in between them. “In the future, leave the scouting to our scout,” the dwarf said firmly to the sorcerer. “We will have more need of your magic ahead, I suspect.”

Kaurophon nodded, and stepped to the side of the tunnel.

“Well, since you did scout, what did you see up ahead?” Mole asked.

“There is a chamber up ahead, at the top of the tunnel,” Kaurophon replied. “A spacious hemisphere, with a large stone throne situated in the center. There is a large creature in the room, apparently engaged in smashing the walls of the room.”

“What manner o’ creature?” Hodge said, his eyes narrowing.

“I could not identify it clearly, as the throne blocked my view of it, and I deemed it more practical to come back here and notify you, rather than risking engaging the thing upon my own. But it had the shape of an elemental or golem, rather than a living being, and it seemed quite mindlessly set upon its task.”

“Maybe we can get around it without a fight,” Mole suggested.

“Bets?” Hodge asked.

“All right, let’s get going then,” Morgan said. “Don’t wander off,” he added, with a glare at Kaurophon.

“Hold a moment, Arun,” Zenna said. She cast a potent healing spell upon him, but even though the paladin nodded gratefully, she could see that he was still hurting. For that matter, she herself didn’t feel all that steady on her own feet, although the pain from the blows she’d taken from the rakshasa had faded to a dull ache. They’d only had one encounter in the skull thus far, and already her healing magic was nearly depleted.

But both of them kept up as the company moved cautiously up the tunnel. The pounding noise grew louder until they saw the corridor widen into a chamber up ahead.

“There it is,” Kaurophon breathed.

They could all see it, a huge, hulking form, partly shielded by the massive stone throne in the center of the room. It was mindlessly engrossed in delivering punishing blows to the far wall of the chamber, each one filling the place with an echoing noise that was still fading when the next one started. Near it, Zenna marked a shadow that looked like it might be an exit, the only one evident in the room. The floor of the chamber was covered in a ruin of broken pottery and some uneven lumps that could have been anything.

“What is it?” Mole asked, hopping up to try to get a better view.

“It’s a clay golem,” Morgan said. “I have seen one, once before, in the Sanctum of Helm in Almraiven.”

“The creation of a powerful cleric,” Kaurophon said, nodding. “But this one has slipped beyond the control of whomever built it.”

“Once they go berserk, there’s no way to stop them short of destroying them,” Morgan said.

“Weaknesses?” Arun asked.

The knight shook his head. “Few. Resistant to weapons, all but immune to magic, and furthermore, the wounds caused by them are very, very difficult to heal.”

“Wonderful,” Arun said. “Well, any ideas?”

“I could try to distract it,” Mole began...

But whatever strategy she’d been about to suggest was made moot, as Hodge, moving up to get a better look, stepped upon a stray shard of pottery, which crunched loudly under his boot.

The golem instantly turned from the wall, and started lumbering toward them.

Chapter 224

“Spread out!” Arun shouted, as the warriors moved forward into the room to meet the charging golem. The golem moved slowly, ponderously, enabling the companions to meet its charge on their own terms. Energy infused them as Kaurophon ensorcelled them with the potency of a haste spell.

With the reach granted by his spear Hodge was able to strike first. The magical spearhead sank into the thick clay of its body, but the thing kept right on coming, and a moment later the weapon passed harmlessly out of its torso, trailing a few sundered clods that fell to the ground. The golem swung a massive fist around, catching the dwarf with a solid blow to the shoulder that spun him roughly around with the force of the impact.

But Hodge's allies were quick to join the fray, attacking the golem from all sides before it could pummel the dwarf into submission. Seeing Morgan's earlier words proven in the relative ineffectiveness of Hodge's attack, Arun and Morgan both launched powerful attacks with their holy blades. But whatever the motivation of the golem's initial creator, the creature itself bore no taint, and the swords were merely normal implements against it. More clods of clay fell from its body to splatter on the ground, but they were only a small part of its form. Dannel struck at it with Alakast as it turned to face the two holy knights, but the blow did not even faze it, and it lashed out with its meaty fists. Arun, his reflexes enhanced by Kaurophon's spell, dodged enough to avoid a stroke that merely clanged against his armor, but Morgan was hit with enough force to drive the priest back two steps, coughing as he fought to regain the wind that had been knocked from his lungs.

"They can barely hurt it... we have to do something!" Zenna urged. For once, Kaurophon had remained visible, standing beside her in the entrance of the chamber. Her own remaining spells would be of no use directly against it, and she did not have any other spells that could assist her friends.

"If the dwarf had not blundered, drawing its attention, I may have been able to lay a few more wards upon the fighters," the sorcerer replied, his voice its usual even calm. "But as it is, there is naught more to do than wait, and hope that they are up to the task."

Zenna turned on him. "I won't accept that. You have more resources than you let on... and if that thing defeats us... well, you don't know what trials lie further on; you may never see the Test of the Smoking Eye beaten!"

He looked at her, a long, weighing look. Finally, he turned back toward the battle—Morgan had just taken another punishing hit, and now looked nearly ready to fall. Mole darted into the melee, trying to draw the golem's attention away from the stricken cleric, but the construct was immune to her sneak attacks, and it paid her no heed.

"Your logic is inescapable," the sorcerer said, as he drew a scroll out of his pouch—a bag of holding, Zenna suspected—and read the spell stored upon the parchment.

A bright green ray darted from Kaurophon's fingertips as the writing on the scroll flared in an echo of color. Zenna sucked in a surprised breath; if that spell was what she thought it was, it was a potent enchantment indeed. The ray struck the golem in the chest, and it seemed to stiffen, tiny cracks of green flowing through its body. But that was it; no dramatic explosion, no collapse, not even a visible wound.

"Attack it, now, fools!" Kaurophon exclaimed.

The ring of warriors complied. Dannel's slam again was useless, but this time Hodge's thrust rang on something hard, and a gob of clay the size of his head came free when he drew back the spear. Arun carved an equal segment from its thigh with a stroke of his sword.

But it was Morgan who came rushing in, all pretense at defense abandoned, his sword, held above his head with both hands tight around the haft. The golem lifted its arms to smite this human that looked puny in contrast to it, but before it could strike the sword descended in a gleaming arc, driving down into the construct's chest, cleaving apart not only the packed clay of its body but the fundamental magic that held it together. The thing let out a sound, like a sigh, and then it seemed to split down the middle, falling into piles of shattered clods that lay still upon the floor.

Chapter 225

"But we cannot stop now! We are close, I can feel it!"

Kaurophon's urging met mostly sullen looks from his companions. Morgan didn't even bother to get up, sitting on the floor wearily with his back up against the amorphous stone throne in the center of the room, facing the rubble that had been the insane golem.

"We're battered, sorcerer," Arun said. "We need to rest, and restore our healing powers."

"But you said that the injuries from the golem were untreatable..." Kaurophon persisted. The earlier words from the knight of Helm seemed to be borne out, as Zenna had tried a few healing osirons upon Hodge and Morgan—just about all the divine magic she had left—upon the conclusion of the battle, and while the spells soothed the earlier wounds the two had suffered, the pain from the injuries they'd taken from the golem lingered, unaffected by her magic.

"We rest," Arun said, turning away and decisively ending the conversation.

For a moment Kaurophon looked like he would say something else, but finally he lowered his arms to his sides and released a tight breath.

"Look, you want to go on ahead, feel free," Dannel told him. Morgan looked up at that, and Zenna saw his hand steal to the hilt of the sword lying beside him. It was almost a reflex, now, she thought. "You have the power to turn invisible, to transport yourself through a dimension door... we can't stop you. But remember that every test thus far has been accompanied by a deadly adversary, and there's no reason to assume that this one, if it is the final test, will be any different. There's no sense at all in rushing blindly ahead now, to be destroyed because we grew impatient at the end."

Kaurophon nodded. "Your words ring with truth. Very well, we shall restore our strength... I only hope that our delay does not give another rival a chance at completing the Test."

With that final shot, which none of them bothered to respond to, he moved to another part of the room and started drawing his bedding from his bag of holding. But Zenna, who was watching him closely, saw that his eyes had lingered on the dark exit on the far side of the room. When she looked away her gaze met Dannel's briefly, and the elf nodded. He'd seen it too, and a silent communication passed between them, to continue their vigilance on their guide.

They rested their bodies, but the sense of anticipation they all felt combined with the cumulative weight that Occipitus had upon them to give their minds and souls little real respite. Zenna fell into a deep, dreamless sleep, waking later feeling more tired than before. There was no sense of time here, and she'd almost stopped associating periods of time with day or night in her mind. There was just motion, and rest. No real sense of security, not anywhere, here.

But she went about her business, focusing her tired mind upon the discipline required to study her spellbook and complete her meditations. They'd eaten the last of the food she'd conjured before their rest, and she debated whether to prepare another creation spell, or focus instead on more healing magic.

Finally she went ahead and created more food for all of them. They were all ragged and weak from their trials here, and she thought they would all need their strength to face whatever lay ahead.

She and Arun performed what healing they could manage, leaving as much as possible in reserve for the upcoming test. The wounds suffered by Morgan and Hodge in the battle against the golem still refused to respond to their treatments, but both warriors simply accepted the pain, gathering their weapons and strapping themselves back into their armor without complaint. Well, without much complaint, anyway; at least Hodge kept his grumbling to a relatively low murmur, so that Zenna could not make out the specific curses that he was using.

Once they had all prepared themselves, and Mole had packed away the rest of the food in her magical bag, they continued forward.

The dark tunnel quickly gave way to a steep set of stairs that curved back in upon itself, rising up higher into the skull. Zenna calculated that they had to be at least halfway up to the summit of the great mound, but at least the throbbing in her legs had subsided to a dull ache that she could almost ignore. Finally the stair turned back once more and deposited them into a large cavern.

The place had a rough, unfinished look to it, although its shape was altogether too uncluttered to be a wholly natural construction. Nearly a dozen small tunnels branched off of the main chamber, twisting rapidly into shadow. The place was dominated by a startling sight; a blazing nexus of black flames, a conflagration that burned without an obvious source of fuel, a good three paces across and at least that high. The black fire gave off an eerie light that cast an unnatural radiance on the cavern walls, and somehow, it did not seem to cast shadows. Instead the light appeared to be absorbed by every surface it touched, giving it a unhealthy sheen. Zenna tore her gaze away from the nexus and stared at her companions, seeing their faces appear sunken and hollow, the light transforming their healthy visages into ghoulish, necrotic flesh.

Dannel looked at her and cried out, his song conjuring a bright nimbus of light around the white shaft of Alakast. The light flickered and faltered against the unceasing radiance of the nexus, but was bolstered by the twin lights of the holy blades wielded by Morgan and Arun, as they drew their swords and held them boldly aloft.

“This be not natural!” Hodge exclaimed.

“I thought I was the one who stated the obvious,” Dannel replied, trying unsuccessfully to keep the tension from his voice.

Zenna’s gaze returned to the nexus. She could sense the strands of power that flowed into and out of the flames, and as she stared into the swirling black conflagration, she thought she saw something there, an outline within the black...

But before she could clearly identify whatever it was, her focus was broken as a hollow burst of sound and energy erupted before the nexus. The disruption was gone in a heartbeat, but in its wake a pair of giant wasps had appeared out of nowhere, seven-foot bodies hovering on flashing wings.

Wherever they had come from, the wasps instantly buzzed forward to attack.

Chapter 226

Faced with a clear enemy, the companions rushed into the chamber to meet the darting giant wasps.

The vermin were fast, and struck first, diving down at the warriors and stabbing at them with the long stingers that jutted from their abdomens. One thrust glanced off of a shoulder plate of Morgan’s armor, while the second avoided Hodge’s spear and narrowly missed taking the dwarf’s left eye. Hodge dropped his weapon and tried to shield his face, the stinger glancing off of the side of his helm, leaving a dripping trail of venom.

The wasps’ assault was fierce, but they faced veteran warriors who knew how to coordinate their attacks. Arun came to the aid of Hodge, drawing the wasp’s attention with a potent swipe of his holy sword while the latter dwarf unlimbered his huge axe. The blessed blade tore deeply into the wasp’s body, and its body seemed to deflate as the holy energies infused in the weapon tore mercilessly into its fiendish essence. It only took a single powerful stroke from Hodge to end it, the dying creature flopping to the ground before it dissolved into a streamer of noxious black smoke.

The second wasp came under similar heavy assault from Morgan and Dannel. The elf’s thrust with Alakast failed to connect, but Morgan laid into it with a heavy blow that sheared off half of its abdomen. Black ichor fell from the wound to sizzle on the stone floor at their feet, but unfortunately the stinger remained intact, and despite being crippled the wasp did not retreat, lunging at the knight and managing to drive the tip of its weapon into the man's forearm just above his greave.

Farther back in the room, the air sizzled and hissed again, and a trio of hellish black hounds materialized.

"In the nexus!" Zenna warned. "Something's summoning these creatures!" She fired a scorching ray at the nebulous outline she'd identified within the twisting black flames, but although the ray seemed to strike true, she could not tell if it had had any effect at all.

Arun had started toward the hell hounds, but at Zenna's shout he diverted toward the nexus. The paladin reached the edge of the black flames but could go no further, staggering backward as eager tongues of the unholy fire reached out and painfully caressed his flesh. He could not get close enough to strike, and thought that he heard laughter from within the nexus.

Then flames washed over him, as the hell hounds unleashed their fiery breath upon him.

Morgan dispatched the wasp with another powerful swing of his sword that bisected the creature. Even as it began to dissolve, he was rushing to aid Arun, but before he could reach the embattled dwarf another disturbance behind him—close to where Zenna stood near the cavern entrance—resolved into a trio of massive, twisting centipedes, each at least ten feet in length.

"Go!" Dannel urged the knight, turning to aid the tiefling. "We have to destroy the source!"

Unable to get at the spellcaster hiding within the protective shield of the nexus, Arun turned toward the more immediate foes. The hell hounds leapt at him, their huge jaws snapping at his arms and legs in an attempt to drag him down and tear him to pieces.

Unfortunately for them, they underestimated the strength of a dwarf paladin.

The first hound went down with its head staved in, its skull split apart by a critical hit from the dwarf's sword. A second hound leapt over the dissolving corpse in time to absorb Arun's backswing, the sword tearing a foot-long gash in its shoulder, driving it roughly aside.

Into Hodge's chopping blow, which severed its spine.

The third hound managed to seize Arun's injured arm in its jaws, but before it could get a good grip the dwarf ripped the limb free, turning to bring his sword to bear once more.

Zenna had just enough time to get her mirror images up before the centipedes attacked. The mindless vermin had difficulty getting through the layered defenses she'd prepared, although she felt a hot stab of pain as a drop of venom splashed on her thigh, the bite narrowly defeated by her mage armor.

"Kaurophon!" she cried, although she could not see the invisible sorcerer. "We have to get that spellcaster out of the nexus!"

Kaurophon had not spent the first few moments of the battle idle. He'd turned himself invisible immediately, of course, although he suspected from the potency of the conjurations being worked that the spellcaster could likely detect him anyway. He drew himself away from the developing melees, careful not to do anything—yet—to focus the unidentified foe's attention upon him. He saw Mole circle around before him, trying to keep to the shadows, and moved in her wake. Even before he saw Arun attempt to penetrate the nexus and fail, he knew that simple mundane means would not suffice here. It might not affect him—he could feel its pulsating power resonate to the demonic side of his nature—but that did not mean that he was about to move in to face the spellcaster alone. Nor did he want to highlight to his allies the difference separating him from them; they already had more than enough suspicion of him to threaten his objective.

While he studied the nexus and the spells coming from within he added to his magical defenses, adding wards from his reservoir of spells almost without conscious thought.

Arun let out a roar as he drove the hell hound roughly backward with a thrust of his injured arm, giving him enough space to bring his sword around. The sword caught the infernal canine solidly across the side of its head, cutting to the bone and ruining one eye. The creature did not relent, surging at the dwarf again. Hodge circled around and slashed at its body, seeking another killing blow like he'd managed earlier, but this time his blow was poorly aimed and it glanced off its thick hide without doing damage.

Arun heard Morgan approaching and glanced over at him. "The spear!" he said, indicating Hodge's discarded weapon. The knight followed his gaze and nodded, turning to pick up the magical longsword before returning his focus to the nexus.

Even as he did so, the air rippled again, and a quartet of giant scorpions, each roughly the size of a man, materialized near him.

Zenna fought back a cry of pain as sharp fangs stabbed deep into her leg. She could feel the sting of poison that flushed through the wound into her bloodstream, and her muscles started to twitch uncontrollably as the venom worked its fell potency upon her. She pulled away from the centipede, trying to clear enough for her remaining two mirror images to confound the huge bug.

Dannel tried to reach her, but he had his own hands full with his own adversary. Alakast had been quite effective against the creatures, and he'd destroyed the first centipede with a pair of well-placed thrusts. But a second centipede had turned to face him, blocking him from Zenna with its long, twisting body, biting him in the side and slowing his reflexes with its poison. The thing quivered, damaged by another blow from the enchanted staff, but it continued pressing the elf, who narrowly avoided another lunging bite.

"Hold on, Zenna!" he cried in encouragement, as he struck it again.

"I can handle it!" she returned, reaching out to touch the centipede, unleashing a painful shocking grasp.

Kaurophon clucked as his bad luck reasserted itself. He could almost feel the enemy spellcaster's latest conjuration spell falter before his counterspell, but at the last moment his dispel faltered, and the giant scorpions appeared near Morgan. He suspected that the nexus was fueling the conjurer's magic in some way, and turned his thoughts to a way of getting it out of the black flames.

Unfortunately for him, his attempt to interfere with the unseen enemy's spells had drawn its attention. The sorcerer felt a twinge of dread as the shape in the flames shifted to face him. He felt a power rising from within the nexus, and then a roiling, terrible cloud of pure darkness erupted around him, tearing at him with tendrils of negative energy.

Kaurophon nearly laughed. Of all the spells that could have been hurled at him, an unholy blight was probably the least effective! His choice of allies had served him yet again, as the enemy had judged his nature based on the company he kept...

Still, he thought, as the blight dissipated, he could not afford to be too confident. But an idea had occurred to him, how to draw the enemy out of the nexus, into the blades of his allies.

"Blasted bugs!" Hodge cursed, as a scorpion tried to seize him in its considerable claws. The vermin was strong, but not strong enough to grapple the dwarf, who took its entire claw off with a powerful chop of his axe. Likewise Arun, having finally put down the hell hound, slew the second scorpion with a powerful thrust of his sword. The two dwarves fought together well, keeping the scorpions back, out of Morgan's path as he made his way toward the nexus, charging with his spear at the ready.

The magical steel head of the spear disappeared into the flames, striking square at the center of the shadowy form inside. A sound of metal striking metal echoed from within the nexus, and at that moment, as the dark figure stumbled back, off balance, one of the scorpions threatening Arun was suddenly hurled across the chamber by some invisible force. The vermin shot into the nexus like a stone kicked by a giant boot, colliding with the spellcaster, knocking him roughly backward, stumbling out of the flames to fall prone just a pace outside of the radius of the black fire.

The enemy was clad in plate armor in an archaic style, covered with ancient runes of secret power. Its head and hands were naked bone, that of a skeleton. As its head came up, it fixed Morgan with a terrible stare from twin points of dread fire within its cavernous eye sockets, hatred burning in those fiery orbs.

Even though Morgan no longer called himself a cleric of Helm, still he instantly recognized this foe. "A lich!" he breathed, fighting the doubt and terror that threatened to unman him at its dread stare, dropping the spear to draw his holy blade once more from its scabbard.

The lich pulled itself up, its armor clanking emptily about its skeletal form at its movements. It carried a slender wand of bone, its head surrounded by a red nimbus of light that promised pain and suffering. It evaluated the situation about it in a glance—clearly outnumbered, its summoned allies clearly on the losing end of the still-raging melee scattered throughout the chamber—and turned back toward the shelter of the nexus. The flames reached for him, as if to welcome his return.

But the undead thing did not reach its shelter. Even as it took its first step, a small form tumbled into its path, tripping it up, tangling herself in its bony limbs. The lich fell, but responded quickly, digging its bony fingers into Mole's hair, pulling her away from its body. The gnome screamed at the evil touch, her body stiffening, and she fell away, blue trails marring her skin where the lich's fingers had touched.

The lich stood again, but staggered as Morgan laid into it. The unholy creature, infused with the dread power of unlife, withstood a blow that would have torn a mortal enemy into pieces. But the lich was now just a step from the dark power of the nexus, promising recovery and succor.

"You cannot defeat me holy knight, not here," it said, its voice an empty dirge sounding within the caverns of its empty skull.

It stepped toward the flames, but even as the dark fires started to envelop it, Arun came running around the far edge of the nexus, a giant scorpion right behind him still trying to grapple him with its claws. The lich released an evil screech and fixed its dark gaze upon the paladin, but Arun merely shouted a dwarvish invocation to his god and swung his sword. The blessed steel struck ancient bone with powerful force, and the latter gave way. As its skull disintegrated, the holy sword tore through the unholy glow of its eyes, unleashing a blinding flare of light that for a moment made the nexus pale in contrast.

When that momentary brilliance faded, the lich was gone, leaving behind an empty suit of armor and the other trinkets it had carried.

Chapter 227

With the lich destroyed, the companions made short work of the remaining summoned creatures. Within a few moments they were alone again, drawing back to the edges of the chamber to put as much distance as possible between them and the continuing surge of power represented by the black nexus.

"A deadly foe," Morgan said, sliding his sword back into its sheath.

Zenna bent over Mole. For a moment she didn't detect any breathing, and a feeling of cold terror washed over her, but then she felt the slight flutter of her friend's pulse. "How is she?" Arun and Dannel both asked, at nearly the same instant.

"She's paralyzed. I can help her, but I will have to recover my spells first."

Kaurophon had reappeared, and several of them looked up at him. "You know my arguments, and I know yours," he said with a shrug. "I will defer to your judgment."

"Several of us have been poisoned," Dannel said. "You yourself can barely stand, Zenna."

"I do not have any more restoration spells, but I will include some in my meditations," Zenna said. He was right; her body felt stiff and awkward, but she forced herself to stand straight, ignoring the painful tingling she felt in her limbs. "Arun can help with that as well." The dwarf nodded in acknowledgement.

"Armor's good stuff," Hodge said. He'd dragged the lich's possessions back from the edge of the nexus, and was examining them with a critical eye. In addition to the armor and the bone wand, he found an amulet, a pearl the size of a marble on a silver chain, and a pouch that contained a tightly wound scroll.

"Another plane shift," Morgan reported, after examining the scroll.

"For an out of the way place like this, there sure are quite a number of planar travelers here," Zenna commented. She looked around for Kaurophon, but the sorcerer had wandered off a short distance, examining the perimeter of the room.

"What do you think?" she asked her friends, softly.

"You know what I think," Morgan growled. "He cannot be trusted."

"We would not have gotten this far without him," Dannel pointed out. "He drove the lich out of the nexus, in case you did not see."

"I saw," Morgan replied. "Yet another power that he did not see fit to reveal to us before."

"We may still need him," Zenna said. "And in any case, I'd rather have him somewhere we can see him."

"Agreed," Arun said. The paladin knelt over Mole, gently covering her with a blanket, his hand glowing with a soft blue light as he laid his palm across the ugly gray scars left by the lich's touch.

Zenna healed the injuries they'd suffered in the battle with the lich. Less than an hour had passed since their last rest, and she didn't think she'd be able to sleep so soon, but no sooner had she laid her head down upon her bedroll she fell once more into the black oblivion of a deep slumber.

* * * * *

Dark shadows swarmed around her, taking on form briefly as they passed close by, almost recognizable. Strangely, she was not afraid; although surrounded by blackness, somehow this place seemed familiar, almost welcome. A few of the shadows were frightening horrors, faces from her past that had brought suffering and pain to her and those she cared about. But even they did not penetrate the cloak of nullity around her emotions; they were dead and gone, unable to harm her now, even in this place of dreams.

The landscape of shadow shifted, and she found herself looking at Cauldron. The city was familiar, but far away, as if she were in a great dark tunnel. She could feel the pulse of life that filled the city, and the whisper of voices, a soft, almost inaudible compendium of the lives that were crowded into the volcano town. A story in each voice, all blending together into an unending tapestry.

There was something here she was supposed to see; she felt it with a certitude that filled her very being. But the vista of the city was somehow more unreal than the vague shadows she had sensed earlier. There was something underlying it all, a presence just beyond the edges of her perceptions, a sinister force that she couldn't quite reach...

"Zenna."

Dannel's voice, and his soft touch upon her cheek, drew her instantly back into wakefulness. For a moment her muscles wouldn't respond to her commands, and she felt a rush of fear that she too had become paralyzed, but finally she forced her sluggish body to obey her orders and she pulled herself up to a sitting position.

Belatedly she sensed that something was wrong. "What is it?" she asked.

"Kaurophon is gone."

Chapter 228

"I knew all along he could not be trusted," Morgan spat. "He gave us ample reason to mistrust him. We should have destroyed him when we had the chance."

"Now that's a bit far," Dannel began. "We all agreed—"

"I dinna agree wit' nothin'!" Hodge said. "I told yer all that yer were crazy, when yer first talked o' comin' to this place!"

"Enough," Arun said, the single word cutting through the argument. "What's done is done. It is time to finish this."

"Good," Morgan said. "But mark my words, the next time I see that sorcerer, he's going to feel the touch of my blade." His gaze was fixed on Zenna as he spoke, but the tiefling ignored him, as she'd ignored the rest of the argument; her attention was on the small motionless form wrapped in a blanket at her feet. She knelt, drawing upon the tendrils of power that she accessed through her mental deliberations. She felt that same momentary surge of awe that she always did, in that moment where she reached outside herself, and drew upon that deep well of power that thrummed just below the surface of reality, linking all worlds with its currents of energy.

Mole stirred, her groan drawing everyone's attention to her.

"How do you feel?" Dannel asked.

"Weak," she managed. "Anybody got something to eat?"

It took the better part of an hour to get ready. Zenna and Arun prepared spells to purge the remaining poisons from their bloodstream, and they treated the lingering injuries that they'd had left over from the prior day's battle. Zenna altered her spell selection subtly, suspecting that a confrontation with their former ally might be close at hand. The others checked weapons and armor, spoke quietly of meaningless things, or in the case of Morgan, paced impatiently before the twisting stair that marked their path forward.

Finally they were prepared.

The staircase ascended in a tight spiral much like the one they had traversed to get to the nexus room; this second stair, however, was much longer. Onward they trudged, forming a long string that moved slowly but steadily upward, step by step. By the time that they neared the top, with another large chamber visible above, Zenna's impression was that there was no way that they could still be inside the skull, but that could have just been an illusion fostered by her tired muscles.

"Careful now," Dannel's voice came back down to them, softly, as he led them out from the stair into the chamber beyond. Zenna paused at the landing to cast a few spells, but a few moments later joined her companions. She was invisible, her soft boots making barely a whisper on the stone floor.

The room was a vast circle, easily fifty feet across, a huge bubble in the stone. A large round opening was visible in the ceiling above them, and Zenna realized that they had to be behind the eye socket of the skull. A thick, raging pillar of burning plasma rose from a point a few feet above the ground on the far side of the room, ascending to the opening. From that geyser, the familiar plasms took form and rose out from the eye, beginning their journey to the eternally burning sky above.

Someone was here, standing in the center of the room, and for a moment Zenna thought it was Kaurophon. Her companions apparently agreed, by the way they readied their weapons. But then the creature shifted and faced them, and they could see that it was another mummy, its gilded armor glimmering with a bright red glow reflected from the plasma geyser.

"Spread out," Arun cautioned, as they moved slowly forward, alert for an ambush.

The mummy lifted a hand in greeting. "Adimarchus, Most Potent Ruler of Occiptus, bids you welcome to the Final Test of the Smoking Eye," he intoned. "A worthy successor to the throne of Adimarchus must complete only one more task. To rule Occipitus—to grasp its power and use it for good or ill—means to sacrifice everything you hold dear. The final test is this: sacrifice an ally to the plasma, and Occipitus is yours!"

"Simple, isn't it?" came a voice from elsewhere in the room. Over the noise of the roaring geyser, and the cavernous acoustics of the chamber, it was difficult to place its source with any precision. The identity of the speaker, however, was completely evident.

Kaurophon.

"You always intended to betray us," Dannel said, scanning the shadows, Zenna's crossbow loaded in his hands, Alakast slung across his back by a leather cord. "All your fine words... just empty lies."

“I honestly did not know what to expect, nor do I wish you any particular ill,” came the sorcerer’s distorted voice. Zenna continued scanning the room, using her just-cast detect magic to try and locate sorcerer by the various spells he no doubt had folded upon himself. As she swept the room, she detected various auras, but upon closer examination none of them seemed to reflect the potencies she’d expected to find, given what she knew of Kaurophon’s magic.

“We can still settle this without violence,” Arun said, although the way Morgan, standing ten feet to the right of him, carried himself, it was clear that the knight was only waiting for a clear target before unleashing a storm of death with his shining sword.

“Unfortunately that is not possible. You heard the proctor; one of you, at least, must be sacrificed, for me to ascend to Adimarchus’s place.”

Morgan suddenly lunged and swept his sword out at empty air; his sword cutting through nothing. But even as he recovered, Zenna realized what she had missed. She turned her attention back to the aura that she’d detected and skipped over, the glow surrounding the one obvious figure before them...

“The mummy!” she yelled. “He’s standing by the mummy!”

They all turned toward the silent guardian, but before Zenna could do anything else a wave of utter cold blasted over her, transforming her world to white pain.

Chapter 229

The cone of cold was perfectly placed for maximum effect, catching up Arun, Morgan, and Zenna in the blast. Mole was on the edge of the spell but darted like a shot out of its freezing path, coming up in a roll with her crossbow already seeking out a target.

Morgan’s exposed skin was blue, and frost caked the joints in his armor, with tiny icicles falling to the ground with a faint tinkle as he stepped forward, his muscles stiffened into near immobility. For a moment it seemed that somehow, impossibly, he would still attack, but he’d taken too much punishment from the golem, wounds that could not be healed. He managed two steps before he toppled over, his armor clattering loudly as he impacted the floor.

Arun had taken the full force of the blast as well, but despite the obvious damage he’d suffered, the paladin drew upon his incredible fortitude and rushed forward toward the mummy. He’d seen the point where the cone of cold had originated, just beside the mummy, and rushed toward it with his sword trailing bits of ice that dropped from the blade as he ran. The mummy ignored him, but his stroke met only empty air—the sorcerer had already moved aside.

Dannel too had seen the blast, and even as his friends were engulfed by the cone of cold he lifted his crossbow and fired. His bolt hit something, but glanced off instead of penetrating to cause damage. Rather than bothering to reload, he dropped the bow and started running forward, unlimbering Alakast.

As awareness of her surroundings returned in the wake of the cone of cold, Zenna teetered on the brink of unconsciousness. She'd thought that her innate resistances and her magic would have given her at least some protection against Kaurophon's spells, but the sorcerer's power was greater than even she had imagined. She felt a momentary tendril of despair that she crushed ruthlessly. She called upon a potent healing spell, letting the positive energy bring warmth back into her body, and started running forward.

And as she ran ahead, Kaurophon appeared, twenty-five feet away, moving back around the perimeter of the room near the geyser, revealed by the invisibility purge that she had cast upon entering the room. He was moving fast; too fast, suggesting haste. A magical shield was hovering before him, and Zenna could see the faint shifting of his outline that indicated that he also had a displacement spell up.

More surprises, she thought, figuring that he probably had a few other buffing spells in place in addition to his obvious wards. Unfortunately she'd had to sacrifice her dispel for the invisibility purge spell, although she suspected that she'd have had little chance of affecting him with the former in any case.

The sorcerer instantly realized what had happened, and turned to face them. "Cleverly done!" he exclaimed. He began casting a spell. A dart from Mole's crossbow bounced harmlessly off of his shield, and he did not flinch as Hodge came running at him, his spear lowered to skewer him. Zenna was not surprised when the spear passed harmlessly through him; the dwarf had been fooled by the displacement. Dannel and Arun were close behind, but before they could reach him Kaurophon completed his spell and disappeared.

"Is he still here?" Arun asked, sweeping his head around.

"No, my purge is still active—he must have teleported out," Zenna said, even as she knelt beside Morgan. "But he's somewhere close," she said. She cast her last cure moderate wounds on the knight, who started to stir, his body still shaking from the blast of cold he'd suffered.

"Where could he have gone?" Mole asked, as she reloaded her crossbow.

"The stairs!" Dannel exclaimed.

"No..." Zenna said, even as the elf darted back toward the entrance of the room. "No, he'll probably just transport back in..." Knowing that her purge only covered a fraction of the room, she elected to remain in the center, casting another detect magic to begin sweeping the room in a slow turn. At the stair, Dannel had done likewise, conjuring the same spell with his magical song, watching the stairs for the sorcerer's return.

Morgan groaned and stood. Zenna ignored him, focused intently upon her scan, so he recovered his sword and stepped away, toward Arun.

"Stay spread out," the dwarf cautioned.

Hodge moved back toward the entrance, giving the mummy—which continued to watch them impassively, not interfering in the Test—a wide berth.

“Maybe he’ll wait, until our spells expire, until we let down our guard,” Mole suggested.

“No,” Zenna said. “He has to act now, lest we complete the Test ourselves.”

“But we wouldn’t—“

“It doesn’t matter, not to him,” Zenna interjected, cutting her off. “He doesn’t think like that. I should have seen it, before, but I wanted to believe that he could be better than that...” She trailed off, her brow furrowing as her scan detected an aura...

And then a brought shower of glittering motes exploded around her. She was nearly blinded for an instant, but her vision cleared to reveal tracers of the glitterdust covering her, outlining her invisible form.

“Zenna, are you all right?” Dannel asked.

She’d lost her concentration upon her detect magic, but she remembered where she’d detected the aura earlier. “There!” she said, pointing at a location along the wall. She’d been the only one caught in Kaurophon’s spell, and while no permanent harm had been done to her, he’d successfully pinpointed her location...

She felt a sharp pang stab through her, as a dispel magic slammed into her with a force that felt like a punch. Her spells dissolved; the invisibility, shield, and mage armor she’d conjured upon entering the room.

And more importantly, her invisibility purge, their only means of defeating the sorcerer’s invisibility.

Chapter 230

With their primary method for defeating his greater invisibility gone, the tactical advantage shifted from the companions to Kaurophon. The sorcerer had clearly spent as much time studying them as they had spent watching him; now he used that information to good advantage.

And he had lots of spells left.

Dannel, Hodge, Arun, and Morgan rushed in at the position that Zenna had indicated, forming a collapsing half-circle in an attempt to pin down the invisible sorcerer. Dannel lunged at a soft voice, as Kaurophon began yet another spell, and finally was rewarded by a solid contact as Alakast penetrated the sorcerer’s layered defenses and scored a solid hit. Kaurophon’s mixed heritage served him ill here as the staff’s bane power did what it was created to do, and he staggered back, hissing in pain. Arun and Hodge were there quickly, but Kaurophon maintained his concentration, and finished his spell, opening a dimension door that took him out of the closing circle.

“He’s gone again!” Arun said, as Hodge swept the area with the shaft of his spear.

“No...” Zenna said, even as she heard a soft voice behind her.

“It is only fitting that you should be my sacrifice,” he said. “You, who are closest among these to what I am...”

“He’s here!” Zenna cried out, knowing that the others would not get there in time.

A powerful surge of magic struck her, stronger than anything she’d ever felt before. She felt it closing around her body like some great invisible fist. Instinct took over, and she hurled her will against the spell. All of her mental discipline, all of the painstaking discoveries she’d made in becoming what she was, all of it flashed in a fraction of a heartbeat against the full force of Kaurophon’s power.

And then, the spell was gone, failed.

“Perhaps I underestimated you,” came the voice. But I suppose another of weaker will shall suffice...”

A cry turned her attention around, behind her. Her eyes widened in horror as she saw Mole hurled into the air, flung across the room by Kaurophon’s magic...

Directly toward the plasma geyser.

Mole screamed.

Chapter 231

While the sensation of being hurled by telekinesis across a room was interesting to say the least, the sight of the plasma geyser rushing up at her was definitely unappealing. A scream filled the air—her senses were too busy for her to realize it was hers—as death drew nearer.

She twisted her body, snapping her torso to the side, trying to alter the inexorable course of her passage. It wasn’t enough; but at the last moment something hard slammed into her body, and she was jerked roughly to the side. Pain jolted through her side where she’d been hit, but it was nothing compared to the searing wave of heat that scorched her side as she narrowly passed along the fringes of the plasma geyser.

But then she was through, and she somehow managed enough presence of mind to flip and land gently on her feet, using a few forward somersaults to eat up her forward momentum.

Glancing back, she saw the object that had struck her, saving her life.

A small hammer.

Zenna had already turned back toward Kaurophon, and her own power coursed through her frame at her command. The bright surge of a color spray washed over him, the lights parting around the empty bubble where the invisible sorcerer stood.

“Surely you did not expect that such a puny spell would affect me,” he said.

“I didn’t mean for it to affect you,” she replied. “I meant for it to show them where you are.”

The sorcerer turned and dodged back, but was too late to avoid fully the assaults focused on his position. Hodge’s spear again thrust through emptiness, and Dannel’s probe with Alakast slid off of the sorcerer’s shield.

Morgan let out a desperate cry from deep within him as his holy blade cut the air in a broad arc. For a moment it looked like he, too, would miss his target, but then the edge of the sword unleashed a spray of red as the sword bit deeply into the body of the half-fiend whose actions had opened this entire course of events, the man whose misguided passion had drawn them into this place of shadow and evil. Kaurophon screamed, and they could see the droplets of blood that fell upon the ground smear as he landed upon them.

“It ends here,” Morgan said, bringing up his sword with the blade pointing straight down, both hands wrapped tight around the hilt.

Kaurophon let out a pathetic sob and reached for the amulet at his throat. There was a flare of light and a faint sucking sound. The sword descended, but only struck empty stone.

“He may still be nearby!” Dannel said, turning to scan the room.

“No,” Zenna said, sagging wearily to the floor. “That was a plane shift. He’s gone, truly, and won’t be back anytime soon.”

“It be over, then,” Hodge said, wiping sweat from his brow with the back of his hand.

“No, not yet,” Morgan said softly. His stare was fixed at a point across the room, drawing their attention around as they followed the path set by his eyes.

Toward the pulsing geyser of liquid flame.

“Then our road ends here, at least,” Arun said. “For none of us will make the choice that Kaurophon was willing to make.” He said it firmly, as if defining a fundamental truth for all of them.

“No,” Morgan said, stepping forward. The knight wore a strange expression, a look that combined wonderment with determination.

“There will be no sacrifice today,” Dannel said, echoing Arun’s words, stepping protectively in front of Zenna. But the knight ignored both of them, and continued walking toward the geyser.

Zenna was the first to realize what he intended. “What are you doing?” she said, rushing around Dannel to block his advance upon the geyser. Morgan did not stop until she was directly before him, and when he met her gaze, she saw something she’d never seen before in his eyes.

“Kaurophon was right about one thing,” he said. “Whoever completes this Test will have power—too great a power, the power to reshape an entire reality. We cannot just leave it here, for Kaurophon or another like him to seize it.”

“Maybe there’s some way we can destroy the geyser,” Mole suggested.

“No... no, the power gathered here represents the power of this entire place. Can you feel it, any of you? There is a deep current of Taint here in this place, the darkness that lies over this entire plane magnified and concentrated a thousand times over. It sickens me, and is almost irresistible, here. But there is also an undercurrent... Kaurophon did not lie about that, either. There is a fragment of what Occipitus once was, the power of Good...”

Arun looked around, as if seeing the chamber anew, and nodded, but did not speak.

“The cathedral,” Zenna said. “And the bodies on the plain of cysts.”

“Yes, and currents deeper yet,” Morgan said. “That is why the sacrifice must be made, and that slender thread given a chance to flourish, for the original destiny of this place to have its opportunity to emerge anew.”

“But how can you be certain,” Zenna asked. “Would you surrender everything—perhaps even your soul—on such a tenuous hope?”

Morgan smiled, and for the first time since she had known him, it was an entirely genuine gesture. “I know,” he said, and she was surprised to see tears in his eyes. “I know, because I hear his voice again... I can hear Helm speaking to me...”

“Morgan...” Dannel said.

“You cannot dissuade me, any of you, from what I know must be done. You were right, Zenna. I came with you for a purpose, but it was not to free Alek Tercival. I know now that I was wrong about that, and about a lot of things.”

He reached out and laid a hand upon her cheek. She felt a soft flush as the glow of healing energy spread from his fingers into her, easing her own hurts and suffering.

“I am sorry,” he said. “For everything.”

The others gathered around him, but he did not look back. He walked toward the geyser, and as he went he unslung his sword, letting it fall to the ground with a clatter. Then came his shield, his pack, and the pouch containing its precious scroll of plane shift. Finally it was just him, standing there clad in his resplendent armor, the raging column outlining his body.

Then the cleric of Helm stepped forward, and was consumed by the wild torrent.

Chapter 232

For a long minute they just stood there, watching, silent.

Finally Mole spoke. "Is that it?" she asked. "He's just... gone?"

Zenna lowered her eyes. "I don't know," she said. "I honestly don't know."

"Should we wait here, then?" Dannel asked.

"There is no need," came a voice, from the fire.

They turned to see Morgan step from the geyser, falling from the embrace of the pillar to drift softly several feet to the ground. His armor was gone, his body covered only with a shimmering white tunic. His skin was a clean white, the accumulated dirt and blood that they all wore from their travails in Occipitus scoured away. Most alarming was the fact that his left eye was gone, replaced by a bright point of fire that danced within the socket.

"Morgan?" Mole asked.

The man smiled. "I am still Morgan Ahlendraal," he told them. "And I am something else as well, though the full knowledge of what that is has yet to be fully revealed to me. But I have begun a journey, a new road that may end in something new not only for this place, but for all of us."

"Speak clear man," Hodge growled. "What do this mean fer us?"

"It means that the dark road has come to an end," Morgan said. "I must remain here, to explore what my own new destiny has in store for me... but for you, my friends, it is time to return to your home. Cauldron waits, and I fear that she will have need of you sooner, rather than later."

"Are you certain, Morgan?" Zenna asked. "To remain here, alone?"

He nodded. "As certain as I have ever been in my life, Zenna. And I will not be alone. Already we have met some allies here; the avoral, perhaps even Saureya, someday. And there are others, whose presence I can now feel upon the sadness that is Occipitus. You will hear from me again... this, I promise."

"Good luck, knight," Arun said.

"Aye," Hodge said. "I'll be glad to leave the stink o' this place behind. No offense," he added, with a nod to Morgan.

"So I wonder what's been going on in our absence?" Mole asked.

Dannel and Arun gathered up Morgan's discarded possessions—he had no need of them now, he insisted—and they gathered again in the center of the room. Zenna unrolled one of their scrolls of plane shift.

“Are you all ready?”

“Take us home, Zenna,” Dannel said.

Zenna read the words scribed upon the parchment, and the air around them shimmered briefly... and then they were gone.

THE END OF “TEST OF THE SMOKING EYE”

The Shackled City: Interlude
Begun 7-23-04

Chapter 233

Jenya Urikas stood on the eastern balcony of the Temple of Helm, and felt the weight of the world heavily upon her shoulders.

She was still young, in her late twenties, but she felt much older. The events of the past months had aged her prematurely, had forced her into a position of responsibility years—decades, perhaps—before she'd expected to ascend to such heights.

The fact that she'd taken such eventual advancement as a given testified to the innate self-confidence that lay deep within the woman, a sentiment reinforced by the strength of her faith. Helm's favor had been extended to her during these months of crisis, and despite the days of strain she often spent hours alone in seclusion in her private chapel, exulting in the glories bestowed upon her by her divine patron. There was a glow about her, now, and if she could not fully see how others perceived her, she could sense the deference that was given to her. Even if it was reluctant, in some cases.

She sighed. Despite the power she now wielded, the questions that confronted her were becoming more difficult, not easier, to answer. And she had to face those questions largely alone, now. She'd lost good friends, too many good friends, of late. Ruphos Laro... Illewyn Lannertes, Sarcem Delasharn, Morgan Ahlendraal, Alek Tercival. The list was long, and she feared it would get longer before the year was out. She had only a handful of staff left to her, mostly acolytes with little in the way of experience or power.

One of the first things she'd tried when the power was granted to her was to attempt a resurrection of her predecessor as High Priest, Sarcem Delasharn. She hadn't been surprised, not truly, that his spirit had refused to return from its well-earned place at the side of the Vigilant One. Still, she'd felt a guilty regret, a moment of self-pity, for it meant that she would have to rely on herself to forge ahead, to provide the leadership that both her church and the entire city of Cauldron so sorely needed now.

So many friends lost... At least she had some sense of resolution regarding Alek and Morgan. Morgan had departed in the company of a group of adventurers—friends—to seek the lost paladin, whose sudden disappearance had contributed to a political crisis in the city. As the tendays had passed, turning into months, she'd begun to lose hope. Her attempts at magical detection and divination revealed nothing; it was as if the expedition had simply vanished from the face of Faerûn. She'd accepted the reality of their loss, and shed her tears in private. The tension over Alek's challenge to the city leadership was defused when the merchant Maavu Arlental made a public apology, paying a hefty fine for the damage wrought during the riot that his words had helped spawn. Soon the population had moved onto other topics, though a haze of discontent hung over Cauldron, kept under control by the heavily armed guards who now held the city under a state of virtual martial law.

Finally, a little over a tenday ago, she'd received a surprise. A sending from Zenna, one of the adventurers she'd sent with Morgan. Jenya hadn't even been aware that the tiefling woman had possessed such power, but the short message seemed to imply that much had transpired since their last meeting. Alek was dead, and Morgan... well, Zenna had revealed that he lived, but even though there hadn't been enough detail in the message to elaborate, Jenya sensed that there was more to it than that. The adventurers were in Saradush (another mystery!) and would be returning to Cauldron as soon as they could make the journey. In her short response to the sending Jenya had urged haste. Things were coming to a head in Cauldron, she could sense it, although the exact form and shape of the threat was still nebulous, buried deep within the city, shielded even from the shining sight that was her gift from Helm.

A sound, a soft clink of metal, drew her attention around.

"I apologize for disturbing your meditations, priestess," came a deep voice. Its owner, an armored woman, stepped out from the stairwell onto the balcony.

She was a dwarf, a foot shorter than Jenya, although she was probably twice the priestess's weight. Few would have called her attractive, with plain features, a splayed nose that looked to have been broken a few times, and more than one scar visible on her weathered skin. Her hair was the color of obsidian, cut short against her scalp to better fit under the full helm she carried under the crook of one arm. She was clad from neck to boots in a suit of full plate armor that was of odd manufacture, fashioned out of a dull gray metal that seemed to have hints of violet in it when viewed from the corner of one's eye. The hilt of a bastard sword, the chosen weapon of Helm, jutted from over her left shoulder, and the end of a small bow was visible over the right.

"Templar," Jenya said, with a nod. "Welcome to Cauldron. How was your journey?"

"Long," the dwarf woman said, coming out onto the balcony. She glanced out over the city, absorbing the vista with a grunt, and then dismissing it.

"You have just arrived?" The coating of dust on her armor seemed to prove the question even before she answered.

“Aye. They’d warned me that things had gotten bad here, but it would seem that matters have gotten quite out of hand in Cauldron. I saw a bloody ogre in the street on my way here, and nearly clove the damned thing in twain before I was informed that it was part of the City Watch.”

“I have tried to impart the seriousness of the situation in my reports, Templar,” Jenya said.

“Yes, yes,” she said dismissively, waving her hand. “I read them. You’ve lost a lot of clerics lately, it seems.”

Jenya bristled at the implied critique. “We’ve done the best we can with limited resources. And I’m glad at least that the church in Almraiven has finally elected to send aid. How many priests did you bring with you?”

“Just me,” the dwarf replied. She now turned and walked to the edge of the balcony, her armor clanking softly about her person. She removed her gauntlets and tucked them into her belt, revealing thick, muscular hands that looked as though they could have snapped Jenya in two without exerting much effort.

“Oh, don’t worry,” the dwarf continued. “I’m not here to take your church away from you, priestess. I was sent to find the evil that dwells in this place, and destroy it.”

“That has been my goal as well, Templar,” Jenya said.

The dwarf gave her an appraising stare. “Well, I can see you’re Favored, that’s plain enough. I’ve never been one to second-guess the Vigilant One, blessed be his blade. And I don’t suppose it’s been easy at that, keeping a church together in a place like this.”

“No, it hasn’t,” Jenya said, almost to herself.

The dwarf nodded. “Very well then. I imagine you’ve got some vacant acolyte quarters in the rectory; I’ll just move my gear in there, after I’ve tended to my horse.”

Jenya flushed slightly. “I can make quarters available in the higher orders...”

The dwarf cut her off. “Not necessary. Never did like all that fanciness. In fact, I’d prefer it if you kept my visit as quiet as possible. Never can keep the acolytes from gossiping, of course, but you know what I mean.”

“Of course, Templar.”

“And you may call me Beorna, in private, priestess.”

Jenya nodded. She already knew the woman’s name, knew a fair amount about her, in fact. Most of the higher clergy of Helm in the southlands had heard of her, and more than a few in more distant lands as well. Beorna of Helm—she was an orphan, and if she’d had a surname, she never used it now. The dwarf was a true knight, sanctified to the ranks of the Order Templar within the church within two years of reaching her majority. She’d crafted her life in service to the church that had taken her in, and brought her back from whatever abyss she been tossed into as a child.

“I will, Beorna. And call me Jenya, in private.”

Beorna nodded, and without further farewell, turned and departed, the clank of her armored form fading as she made her way back down the stairs into the temple.

Chapter 234

“We’re getting close, don’t you think, Zenna?” Mole asked. “I think some of these hills are starting to look familiar.”

Zenna, her head deep in her cowl to protect her from the sun, shrugged. To her eyes, the hills surrounding them looked the same as the hills they’d seen every day over the last tenday. And probably the hills over the next tenday would look the same, she grumbled inwardly. In all honesty she knew that Dannel was setting a brisk pace, but at times it felt as though they would never reach Cauldron.

At least this time they were traveling faster, and in more comfort, than the first time she and Mole had come alone along this long road, less than a year ago. They had horses, now; and a pony for Mole that the gnome found absolutely delightful. She’d mastered a potent new spell, and each night used it to conjure up a secure shelter to protect them from the elements and wandering creatures that made their way either down from the Alamirs or up from the Forest of Mir. Mole’s bag of holding contained ample foodstuffs, supplemented by Dannel’s hunting, and if both of those sources ran dry, she could always conjure up more supplies with her magic.

Yes, travel was much easier, now...

But she still felt a vague sense of unease that grew stronger with each league that they drew closer to Cauldron. A lot of time had passed; more than they’d realized, when they’d first reappeared on the soil of Faerûn, a little over two tendays past. Zenna’s mind wandered back to that arrival, and the tumultuous events that had followed...

* * * * *

At first, they had no idea where they were.

The mountains that surrounded them could have been anywhere on Faerûn; Zenna explained that the margin of error of a plane shift was anywhere from a few dozen to a few hundred miles from the intended destination.

“So realistically we’re looking at the Alamirs, or the Marching Mountains... maybe the Omlarandins,” Dannel had reported.

“It’s pretty warm,” Mole observed. “We’re probably not that high up. It’s still early summer, but some mountains keep snow on them year-round, in the higher elevations.”

“The Alamirs ain’t that high,” Hodge said. He looked around suspiciously, as if the land itself was hiding secrets. “Yer sure this be Faerûn?”

“Certain,” Zenna said. “Come on, let’s see if we can find a trail out of here.”

They started out in a broad ravine that didn’t give them much of a view, but by late afternoon they crested a ridge that gave them a good vista of the surrounding area. To their east they could see a broad sea, while to the north the mountains gave way to expansive plains. Dannel was the first to identify where they were.

“Were in the northern spur of the Alamirs,” he reported. “That’s the Lake of Steam to the east, and Tethyr to the west.”

“Long way from Cauldron,” Hodge said.

“Well, it’s not going to get any closer standing here,” Zenna said irritably.

“We’re not blaming you for the misfire,” Arun told her.

Zenna nodded. “I know. It’s just that... well, we’ve been away for a while now.”

“I’m sure Cauldron has managed to get by without us,” Dannel said. “I don’t know if there are any settlements around here, but if we head northwest, we should exit the range and enter the plains of Tethyr in a few days. The best road to Cauldron from here is the one that leads down from Saradush, but may be a few tendays, walking.”

They discussed many things on the walk; Cauldron, their adventures both here and at Occipitus, and myriad other random topics that companions share on long journeys. The first day they did not cover much ground, all of them still tired from their trials in the Abyss, but that night they got a good rest, and with the morning’s sun and the cool wind blowing across the peaks they felt restored. Zenna conjured more food to sustain them, and Arun began treating the cursed wound Hodge had suffered in the battle with the clay golem. The injury resisted treatment, but Arun was persistent, and eventually the paladin’s dedication overcame the injury.

The next day they found trouble; or rather, it found them.

It was still early, maybe an hour short of noon. They were moving gradually down through a maze of twisting canyons and ravines, covering perhaps two miles of actual distance for every mile they drew closer to the plain. But without Dannel to guide them, it probably would have been closer to three or four miles per mile of progress. The sun was shining, the breeze was cool, and there was plenty of water at the streams they passed to drink and wash, so there were little complaints. In hindsight, they were perhaps lulled a bit by the ease and beauty of it all, after a tenday in the harsh landscape of Occipitus.

Actually, they could be considered lucky, in that the orcs were just as surprised as the adventurers were, when each side rounded the bend in a canyon to find the other just a few dozen yards away.

Arrows and spears filled the air, accompanied by the sound of battle cries. There were over twenty orcs in the party, and they attacked fearlessly, confident in their overwhelming numbers.

That sentiment wavered somewhat when they ran into the charging front of Arun and Hodge.

Less than a minute later, the surviving orcs were retreating back into the mountains. Only about a half-dozen made it, but the companions knew that even one would have been enough to bring help. In all, they'd suffered only a few minor wounds, which Zenna quickly healed.

Dannel rose from an orc corpse, slinging the dead creature's quiver over his shoulder, and taking up its bow. His own custom-made bow had taken too much of a beating in their long trek through the jungles of the Demonskar and the fiery expanse of Occipitus, and he'd discarded it soon after running out of ammunition there.

"We'd better find someplace defensible," he said.

Chapter 235

Kavorek had been enjoying a pair of wenches when the scout returned. Every warrior in the tribe knew that interrupting his interludes was a risky prospect, so he knew immediately that the matter was urgent. He let the scout get off with a cuff that broke a few teeth, then tossed the wenches out and grabbed his breastplate and axe before stepping out into his antechamber to receive the report.

It was brief and to the point. Kavorek might have suspected exaggeration, but he accurately read the fear in the survivors of the clash, and he was far too canny to make the mistake of underestimating travelers that would brave the northern Alamirs, even in summer.

Well, no matter. Now that the intrusion had been made, and his warriors killed, a response was necessary. And even if these flatlanders were tough; well, his troops needed a bit of a blooding, before the raiding season began.

And just maybe, these travelers might have a bit of loot themselves, to make it worthwhile.

"The fists have assembled, Great One," his second, Av'chek, said with a bow. The action was a bit above himself, Kavorek thought; the assembly was his to call, not the province of a subordinate. But he let it go, already feeling his blood begin to surge at the approach of the hunt.

Taking up his axe, he left the cave to stand upon the ledge at the end of the canyon.

Before him the canyon stretched like a dagger thrust into the mountains. The mouths of a hundred caves were visible, some screened by tacked furs, here or there the faded colors of woven cloth stolen from some flatland merchant or farmer. But the war-leader's attention was focused on the gathered warriors that filled the canyon. Not a great host, but all one hundred and seventy seven orcs were fierce, skilled hunters. As he appeared, they lifted their weapons in salute; morningstars, war axes, clubs, swords, spears, bows. And at the forefront, the hammer of his army: six huge ogres, clad in breastplates of dull black metal, their visages masked by great black helms fashioned in the shape of a tusked skull. They were tough even for their kind, barbarians he'd recruited from the Omlarandins to the north.

Kavorek shifted his attention briefly to the shamans gathered to his left. The leader of them was a scarred old witchdoctor named Uk'bek, who nodded deferentially, dipping his sacred totem staff. Kavorek knew that the shamans resented his leadership over them, but he also knew that they feared his power, and the sheer might of his ogres.

The huge orog stepped forward to the very lip of the edge. "Enemies have entered our lands, brothers!" he cried, his booming voice filling the canyon and reverberating off its walls. "It is time for the hunt!"

As the orcs and ogres uttered a cry that shook the stones of the canyon, Kavorek lifted his huge axe above his head. The blade caught the sunlight and blazed brightly, and suddenly erupted into actual flames, their ruddy light forming an unholy nimbus around the figure of the armored orog, driving his warriors into an even greater frenzy that promised death and blood to come.

Chapter 236

"They're coming," Mole said, jumping down from the house-sized boulder where she'd been looking out over the trail behind them.

"Damn," Dannel said. "How many?"

"I only saw a few, but it sounds like a lot of them."

"Bah," Hodge said, turning and hefting his spear. "Let 'em come, they're just rabble. Kill a few, and the rest will turn tail and run, sure enough."

"We're too exposed here," Dannel said. "Orcs are stupid and not known for their discipline, but they'll circle around us and overwhelm our flanks here, sure enough."

"So yer sayin' that we should tuck our tails and run from them? Good strategy for elves, mebbe, but dwarves don't be runnin' from no blasted bloomin' orcs!"

"This isn't the time for a stupid argument!" Zenna said. She looked at Arun.

The paladin nodded. "I'm sure there will be plenty of orcs to go around," he said. "Find us a good spot, elf, but you'd better make it quick."

Dannel led them quickly down a trail that was little more than an old animal path. Soon they could all hear the sounds of pursuit; the orcs were not bothering to hide their approach, and the noise behind them drew steadily louder.

Finally the trail passed through a low defile that narrowed to maybe four paces across before opening onto a broad plateau. The dominating feature here was a rocky outcropping perhaps eighty paces across, its summit a good thirty feet above the surrounding terrain. Only one side was sheer enough to actually be called a cliff, but the other slopes were steep enough to offer a real hindrance to anyone seeking its summit, and rocky enough to provide good cover. A ring of maybe fifteen huge boulders formed a circle at the top of the tor, like a jeweled crown on the brow of some great king.

“A respectable fortress,” Arun offered.

“Why not just fight here?” Hodge asked, pointing to the defile. “Arun and me could hold a hunnert orcs here, while the rest of you cast yer spells and fire yer bows over our heads.”

Dannel pointed up, to the cliffs to either side, their tops about fifty feet up. “It would only take a few up there to roll boulders down on you, and that would be that. There’s too many approaches, and I’d bet that these orcs know every back trail and hidden path in these mountains. They can surround us there, but at least we can see every approach, they can’t get above us, and we can defend from all directions.”

“Of course, that doesn’t mean we need to just let them walk through this nice narrow space unopposed,” Mole said, darting into the rocks, gone in a flash.

“Be careful!” Zenna cried after her, knowing it was useless; Mole was Mole, that’s all there was to it.

“I’ll keep an eye out for them as well,” Dannel said, pulling out his magical slippers and putting them on. “The rest of you had better get over there and get into position.”

“Why don’t we all wait ‘ere, take a few down before fallin’ back?” Hodge suggested.

“Because they’d run us down before we reached the outcropping,” Arun answered for him. “Come on, let’s get going.”

No sooner had they reached the outcropping, and started up its surface, than they heard Dannel’s cry of alarm. The elf had descended the cliff and was running toward them at great speed, augmented by an expeditious retreat.

“What is it?” Arun yelled.

“There’s a big party coming along a trail that runs up along the tops of the cliffs!” he said. “And more approaching by the defile... they’ll be here in five minutes!”

“Mole!” Zenna yelled. “Get back here!”

“I tried to warn her, but she didn’t show herself,” Dannel said.

“Blasted fool gnome,” Hodge grumbled.

“She can handle herself,” Arun said. “We’d better get into position.”

The four companions scaled the rocky slope, all too aware of the growing intensity of the cries that sounded throughout the mountains behind them.

Chapter 237

Mole thought she had found a perfect position from which to lay an ambush.

She lay crouched in a narrow crevice in one of the cliffs overlooking the defile. From her position she was invisible from below and above, and her cover include a protruding boulder almost as big as she was that she rapidly discovered could be worked loose without much effort. From where she was she could look out over the approaches of the defile, and if she retreated to the crevice there was a relatively easy and secure route back up to the top of the cliff behind her. From there, she was sure she could circle around the plateau without exposing herself to too much fire from any archers that weren’t actually standing atop the cliffs.

Dannel’s warning was the first catch in her plan, but she was still sure that she could do more damage from here than in cover with the others, so she held her ground as the elf retreated. She had one holdout, a potion of invisibility that she’d picked up somewhere on Occipitus, so she was confident that she’d be able to get out of a sticky situation. She had a great location, multiple weapons at hand, a clear avenue of escape, and the potion for emergencies. Everything was set.

She loaded her crossbow and gathered about a dozen stones the size of her head that would prove effective missiles against anyone traveling through the defile.

But the second catch in her plan was the sight of the charging rank of orcs running up the trail toward the defile. They weren’t being cautious, they weren’t checking for traps, they weren’t doing anything but charging ahead, and there were a lot of them. Somehow she figured that dropping a rock on the head of one wasn’t going to faze the next fifty. Or, she thought, swallowing as the line of orcs exploding from the mountains onto the trail grew longer, the next fifty after that.

And then she saw the first ogre.

So much for the perfect plan.

An arrow shattered against a boulder right where Zenna had just had her hand an instant ago. The tiefling darted into the lee of the stone, shading her eyes against the afternoon sun just beginning to descend over the mountains to the east. The archers moving along the clifftops were easy to spot, dark shapes outlined brightly by the long rays of the afternoon sun. She knew that orcs were sensitive to bright light, and the archers were probably firing blindly at their positions, but that would be little solace if one of their long shafts found its mark. More arrows were falling, now, their steel heads clinking angrily against the stone as they impacted.

Dannel, on the other hand, was not hoping for lucky shots. He'd laid out one of the orc quivers he'd captured on a boulder in front of him, and with methodical efficiency drew and fired. As Zenna watched in amazement—the orcs were five hundred feet away!—the first arrow slammed into the chest of an orc archer, dropping it. Even as it fell, Dannel's third arrow snapped from his bow with a twang that sounded like a clear musical note. Zenna followed its path in fascination as it rose high into the air, a bright gleam as the sunlight caught the steel head, then descended... falling from the sky...

Landing in the throat of an orc archer. Even as it fell, she realized that his second shot had scored a hit as well, and an orc was staggering back, the feathered shaft jutting from its thigh.

"I've never seen anyone shoot like that," she said. "Not even my father can use a bow like that."

Dannel grinned, drawing another three arrows from the quiver. The remaining orc archers apparently had drawn a similar conclusion, for they were taking cover, finding what shelter they could among the bare rocks strewn along the ridge.

"My father would have killed all three," he said, before turning to take aim for his second flight.

Zenna didn't have a chance to respond, for a loud roar sounded from the defile.

The rest of the orcs were on their way.

A few paces below her, Arun and Hodge had taken up a position near the summit, giving them a broad command of the front approach up the face of the tor. Hodge had laid down his spear, and was winding his heavy crossbow, the trusty weapon he'd lugged across hundreds of miles both on this world and in the Abyss. Arun did not have a missile weapon, but he stood his ground stoically, awaiting the enemy. With Hodge's help he'd strapped Morgan's magical shield to his injured arm, one of his light hammers ready to throw in his other hand.

A crash and a loud cry of pain sounded from the direction of the defile, and Zenna grinned despite herself. Then another arrow landed a few feet away, and she realized that she had her own defenses to attend to. Focusing her thoughts, she began summoning her magic.

In the crowded confines of the defile, Mole could hardly miss. Although there was a brief unpleasant moment when she pushed the boulder free, nearly going over with it before she caught herself, the heavy stone tumbled down into the narrow space and crushed the head of a charging orc with a very satisfying smack. As a bonus, the stone then tumbled to the side as the orc fell, landing on the calf of a second orc and smashing the bone, crippling it.

Even as the orcs shouted in pain and rage she was tossing her other ammunition down at them, picking up the smaller stones in both hands and hurling them down at the orcs. One orc looked up in time to take fifteen pounds of rock on the center of its face, and went down in a thrashing heap.

The charge had stalled, but the orcs were quick, very quick, to respond. Arrows and spears blasted Mole's position, but she was well-protected by the jutting rocks and her magical armor. One orc archer got lucky and hit her on the arm as she hurled another stone, but her armor absorbed most of the force of the impact, and she quickly worked the nasty barbed head of the arrow free of the wound, grimacing against the pain.

She peeked out from her shelter long enough to see that the ogres had reached the entrance to the defile, and she started thinking that it might be a good time to retreat. Then she saw an ugly orc covered with tattoos and fetishes, clad in a hide shirt decorated with equal garishness, and she felt a sudden sinking feeling as it pointed at her, shouting a word that was no doubt the trigger to some unpleasant spell.

Chapter 238

Dannel continued his barrage against the orc archers along the ridge of cliffs that surrounded the plateau. At that extreme range, and hindered by the bright light of the late afternoon sun, they had yet to score a hit. But even though most of them had sought out cover, the elf continued to score hits. But even though almost a half-dozen of them had been taken out by his shots, there were easily twice that number left along the ridge, and it was clear that many times more that number were coming through the defile.

Zenna watched the entrance of the defile intensely, wishing she could see what was happening. She had a spell that could allow her to see across the intervening distance, but it would take a long time to cast, minutes that they just didn't have. Already the first orcs had emerged onto the plateau, and they were spreading out, some pausing to fire arrows uselessly at the dug-in companions.

Mole twisted back deeper into the crevice, trying to stay as clear as possible of the sticky strands that had penetrated back into her avenue of retreat. The shaman had conjured up a web that had effectively defeated her ambush, forming a lattice that filled the defile from the tops of the cliffs down to about twenty feet above the ground. Orcs now poured through the tunnel thus formed, the hulking ogres close behind, the noise of their progress echoing against the cliffs.

The companions watched as the orc horde poured out onto the open plain from the defile. Clearly they already had orders from their commanders, for instead of rushing straight at the companions atop their impromptu fortress, they spread out to both sides, forming a ring whose obvious purpose was to surround the defenders, to prevent them from escape. One or two fell here and there, a bolt jutting from one orc's side, a long arrow stuck through the eye of another. But by the time that the ogres appeared the ring was nearly complete, and behind them came a huge, muscular orc clad in a black steel breastplate, holding aloft a huge axe with a head surrounded by angry red flames.

"That's the leader," Dannel said.

“Yer daft, elf,” Hodge growled. “Of course that’s the damned leader! What gave it away, the bloody flamin’ bloomin’ gods-damned flamin’ axe?”

“Get ready,” Arun said simply, and Hodge turned to reloading his heavy bow.

Behind the war leader Zenna saw several other figures, clad in hides and dark cloaks, that she figured were shamans. Those had to be watched carefully, she thought.

The din of the orcs filled the plateau, resounding off of the surrounding cliffs. Damn, there’s over a hundred and fifty of them! Zenna thought grimly, surveying the gathered army that surrounded them. They’d fought demons and survived, and orcs were individually no big threat, but so many...

“We don’t want them to wait,” Arun said calmly. “We want to provoke them to attack now, while the sun’s in their eyes.”

“One provocation, coming right up,” Dannel said. He bent his bow, and death began to spread again among the orcs. He focused on the front ranks of the encircling ring, but sent a shaft almost incidentally toward the shamans. Zenna observed that the arrow was turned at the last instant, confirming her suspicion that those orcs were magic-users. They were too far to see clearly, but she suspected that they were using their spells to prepare the orc leaders for battle.

Well, she could deal with that, if need be.

“Come on then, you cowards!” Arun yelled, his stentorian voice overshadowing the raucous cries of the nearest orcs. His holy sword was a bright shaft in his hand, gathering up the rays of the setting sun and reflecting them outward in a brilliant radiance.

Zenna cast a minor spell, and a loud crashing noise echoed over the plateau. It was followed by a rhythmic sound, a deep, challenging shout. She didn’t know much of the guttural orcish tongue, but Lok had taught her a few curses, insults that would get the blood of the fiercest orc warrior boiling, and those words now sounded through the power of her ghost sound cantrip, taunting the gathered army.

The orcs, already raging, were driven over the edge. In a violent surge they came rushing forward, weapons aloft, shouting out a cry of doom and battle.

Chapter 239

Zenna loaded her last crossbow bolt and fired at the onrushing horde. She scored a hit, the orc falling back to vanish into the ranks around it, but then there was no time to think, only to fight against the surging tide.

They’d taken up positions so that Zenna was on the side of the tor that was nearly vertical, an almost sheer thirty-foot wall. That cliff channeled the assault toward the opposite side of the bluff, but there were numerous workable assents, including a comparatively gentle slope up the front that was wide enough for twenty orcs to come up it at once. It became more narrow at the top, where the ring of boulders formed a defensive wall around the summit.

It was there that Arun and Hodge stood waiting. Missiles glanced off of their armor, but thus far neither dwarf had taken a serious injury from the attacks from below. Both knew that this would change, once their foes closed to melee range.

Arun brained one orc with one of his light hammers, knocking the warrior into several of its peers struggling up the slope behind it. The positioning of the outcropping was such that the orcs were charging into the setting sun, nearly blinding them, but that barely seemed to faze them. They knew that enemies were at the top of the hill, waiting, and they would find them by touch and smell, if their eyes failed them.

Dannel, on the other hand, had a clear shot down the hill. Every arrow he fired seemed to find an orc chest, or throat, or face. He'd already discarded his first quiver, and was well into the inventory of missiles in the second. At close range now he was truly devastating, and for a moment the orc rush faltered in the face of those shafts of death.

But he was only one elf, and they were many orcs.

"Here come the ogres!" Arun warned, even as he dodged an orc spear and drove his holy sword into its chest. The orc wailed and fell back, even as Arun turned and impaled another that had managed to slip up the flank of the hill, trying to get behind the dwarven defenders.

Then the crashing wave struck, and both dwarves were surrounded by a storm of blades, the boulders at their backs the only thing keeping them aloft against the raging tide.

Zenna stood from her position of shelter and moved to the far side of the hill. A dozen orcs were visible, climbing the steep slope. One spotted her and let out a cry, and the others soon echoed it, eagerly rushing forward to claim apparently easy prey.

She disabused them of the notion with a color spray that blasted into them. Several orcs were knocked unconscious, and tumbled down the hill, their bodies crashing into the rocks until they came to a stop near its base.

But the others came on. One reached the summit and rushed at her, confused by the shifting mirror images that surrounded her. Finally it cut at one, but its choice was unlucky and an empty image vanished at its stroke. Three others clambered up behind it, eager to overwhelm her by sheer numbers, but before they could strike she unleashed a spray of burning hands from her wand that engulfed all four. Two staggered back, their flesh crisp and smoldering, but the other two pressed their assault, driving her back. Behind them, other orcs continued their ascent.

On the other flank, the slope was equally tricky, but another dozen and more orcs were pressing from that direction. One cried out an alarm as a lithe form appeared atop the boulders, looking down at them. Dannel's bow sang, and orcs fell, clutching at the arrows jutting from their bodies as they slid down the hill. Several archers at the base of the hill took shots at the elf, but just as quickly as he appeared he'd vanished again, dropping back behind the boulders.

Meanwhile, the wave of orcs rebounded from an implacable force; the two dwarves. They were outnumbered twenty, thirty, forty to one; there was no way they could have stood before the onrushing tide, but somehow they did. Hodge stabbed an orc through the chest with his spear, and drew it out to catch a second in the gut. The spear was wrenched from his hand as the orc fell, but then five more had closed to strike, assaulting him from all sides with greataxes and equally huge blades. He brought his shield up, and took the hits. On his other side orcish blades clanged against his magical armor, driving him back against the stone. Arun had laid a ward of protection upon his friend, against the evil that filled these creatures like a cancer, and that protected him, and none of the initial attacks penetrated his defenses. But even so, for a moment it looked as though he would go down from the sheer weight of the charge.

Then his fist closed around the hilt of his axe, and the weapon swept out in a broad arc. Two orcs fell, the first with its face laid open to the skull, the second clutching at the bloody stump where its arm had been.

Seven feet away, Arun stood his ground. He'd infused himself with the power of Moradin, and against his strength, the orcs found themselves unable to stand. His sword pained their eyes even more than the sun, and every time it cut, they bled. Two burly orcs leapt at him, hoping to grapple him and drag him down, but he tore himself free easily, driving his shield into the face of one orc with enough force to shatter bone, and crushing the other's skull with the hilt of his sword.

But even as he repelled the grapple, another pair of orcs that had managed the flank clambered up atop the boulder at his back. One raised its maul to strike the still-unaware dwarf in the back of his skull, but before it could deliver the punishing blow a shadow shifted within the ring of stones. The orc's companion shouted a warning, but it was too late as a large form exploded upward from a shadowy crevice between two boulders that seemed barely large enough to contain its bulk. The orc tried to shift its attack to strike down this new adversary, but Clinger was too fast, seizing the orc in his powerful jaws, crushing its body. The second orc stumbled backward and tried to get away, but the celestial lizard dropped his first victim and sprang after it, taking it down before it got ten steps distant.

A wall of bodies had risen around the two dwarves, and for a heartbeat the assault faltered, the orcs stunned even in their fury at the ferocity of the defense.

But then, behind them, came a reassuring cadence, a thump of heavy bootprints against the stone.

The ogres had arrived.

Chapter 240

“Thus far, your spell-weaving has done little to impress me,” Kavorek said, regarding the shamans with thinly veiled contempt.

Uk’bek drew himself up to confront the war-leader. “We have laid our most potent wards upon you and your ogres, Great One! The foe will not stand against your charge!”

“Thus far they seem to be standing well enough,” the orog said, turning toward the battle. He nodded to the first of his brutes, and the creatures started forward. Kavorek intended to join them, but a cry drew his attention around.

Uk’bek was clutching at his back, twisting around, his acolytes rushing about him in confusion. Kavorek saw that a small crossbow bolt jutted from his back, perfectly positioned for maximum effect.

“Ambush behind us!” one of the lesser adepts cried, darting for cover behind some nearby rocks.

“Oh, Gruumsh’s balls,” he cursed, tempted to strike the idiot down and be done with him. No doubt the hidden archer was the same one who’d conducted the ambush, and he suspected that there was only one foe up on the cliffs, perhaps two. He caught the attention of some of the archers still up there, and pointed toward the sniper’s approximate location with a slash of his hand.

The archers nodded, and a half-dozen hurried in that direction.

“Stay here then, and pray for victory,” Kavorek said, before turning his back on the shamans in disgust and starting after his ogres toward the battle. The adepts were incompetent for the most part, but as the orog exulted in his enhanced strength and stamina as he ran across the field of battle toward his foe.

Zenna felt a stabbing pain in her side as one of her remaining foes caught her with a glancing blow that managed to cut through both her shield and her mage armor. Grimacing, she blasted both with another burning hands, and the orcs collapsed, their flesh blackened by the flames. She could see that other orcs were pushing up the slope, however, and would be upon her in moments.

Zenna retreated into the ring. She met Dannel, who tossed aside his second quiver—empty, now.

“There’s more coming behind me!” she warned.

“Yeah, me too,” he said, dropping the orc bow and taking up Alakast. “Go help Arun and Hodge. Those ogres are coming and they look tough.”

“What about you?”

“I’ll hold your backs.”

“There’s too many...”

“Go. Trust me,” he added, with a wink.

Reluctantly, she did as he said.

The elf turned to see several orcs already appear through the gaps in the ring of boulders. They were cautious, now, willing to wait for numbers before coming at him.

Dannel laughed, and let the song fill him. As the melody washed through his body, bringing his magic with it, he felt his body... change subtly, his skin growing tough and leathery, his facing reforming into a reptilian visage.

“All right, whenever you’re ready,” he hissed, facing them now with the form and features—and the natural armor—of one of the lizardfolk.

The first ogre charged up the steep ascent, heedless of the orcs it trampled in its rush. The others were close behind it, and the ground shook at their coming. The orcs gave way, forming a cheering corridor around the charge, eager to watch these enemies that had blooded them so destroyed. The ogres carried massive two-handed swords nearly as big as they were, and as they came ahead they flew into a violent rage. One stumbled on the loose rock and fell, delaying it for a few moments, but the other five formed a wedge that drove straight toward the waiting dwarves.

And then, suddenly, the upper slope was shrouded in murky darkness.

Some of the orcs cried out in superstitious fury, but the ogres, blind in their rage, paid barely any heed, rushing into the shadowed zone heedlessly. They knew where the enemy was, and would not be denied the death and destruction they had been promised.

Unfortunately, that upper slope was littered with orc corpses and loose rocks. A loud crash echoed from within the darkness, and then another, as charging ogres stumbled and fell.

The lead ogre let out a resounding roar of pure guttural fury as it exploded from the darkness and saw Arun standing before it. It brought its sword up to strike down the paladin. There seemed no way it could miss...

And yet, somehow, it did, the heavy blade crashing down into the rocks less than a hand’s span from the dwarf. For the two dwarves there was no mystery, for the warriors of their kind, whether a shield dwarf of the North or a gold dwarf of the Great Rift, all share that special skill and training that allows them to avoid the powerful yet clumsy attacks of giants. Arun came up under its guard, stepping forward and drawing his holy sword in a brilliant arc across the ogre’s gut, sundering its armor and smiting it with the pure holy energy of his divine patron. The ogre staggered back, its entrails draining from the massive gash drawn across its lower body, and it toppled slowly backward like a great oak felled by the skill of a veteran lumberjack.

Two more ogres emerged from the darkness, slightly disoriented, but quick to spot the two dwarves. Hodge had recovered his spear, and stabbed one in the torso, driving the weapon deep into its body. The ogre roared in pain but quickly countered, smashing Hodge's shield to splinters and catching him on the shoulder with the tip of its blade. The dwarf's armor plate held, but the blow nonetheless staggered him.

But that didn't stop him from dropping the spear and hefting his axe, and rushing at the ogre. It tried to bring its sword to bear again, but the dwarven miner-turned-warrior was faster. He didn't even bother to go for its body, sweeping the axe low and taking off one of the ogre's legs at the knee.

The ogre fell, but Hodge didn't have time to finish it off, as the last few ogres had already recovered from their falls, and were coming forward cautiously through the darkness, their huge forms reduced to amorphous blobs in the shadowy depths of Zenna's spell. The dwarf rubbed at his wounded shoulder; he knew that he couldn't take many more hits like that. And there were still all those orcs on the far side of the darkness...

"All right, come on already!" he yelled, brandishing his bloody axe, careful to move out of the reach of the still-thrashing ogre he'd crippled. To his right, Arun stepped forward to join him, limping slightly. He'd taken out his second ogre in much the same manner as the first, although that one had managed a crushing blow against his thigh that his armor had only barely held against.

Even as another ogre materialized from the shadows, a bright lance of coruscating flames shot down over the heads of the dwarves, flaring over the giant brute's body. The ogre cried out in pain, but did not falter. Hodge glanced over his shoulder and saw Zenna standing between the boulders, the familiar glowing shield before her, bright nimbi of magical energy outlining her hands as she worked her magic. Hodge had never been all that impressed with her spell-working (although he certainly had come to appreciate her healing talents), but at that moment she had the look of some avenging spirit, wrapped in shadow, the very powers of the universe coming at her call.

But that instant was all the time he had for such musings, as the ogre was joined by the last two of their kin, and as they emerged from the darkness they hurled themselves at their enemies in a final violent rush.

Chapter 241

Dannel stood in the center of the ring of stones that circled the summit of the tor, watching as more orcs filtered in between the gaps in the looming boulders. There were at least twenty now, and they drew courage from their numbers, for despite the death he'd already unleashed upon them, ultimately he was only one enemy. And Dannel had no illusions about his fighting prowess, even with Alakast at hand and his defenses augmented with the lizardfolk form he'd borrowed with his alter self spell.

So he had to even the odds a bit.

He reached up and grasped the necklace he'd worn since they'd found it in the hag lair in Vaparak's Voice in the Demonskar, snapping one of the golden globes from its setting. He hurled the tiny sphere at the largest group of orcs, six of them standing in a cluster around one of the openings in the boulder ring. Even as the sphere exploded into a blazing fireball, incinerating all six orcs, he charged at the survivors nearest to the blast, laying about him with Alakast. The orcs, caught off guard by the fireball and the suddenness of his assault, drew back. A few thrust at him with their spears or swung their swords and axes at him, but his armor turned most of the blows, and the one blade that gashed across his exposed bicep failed to penetrate his thick new hide. In turn that orc's sword went flying a moment later as Alakast crushed its arm, snapping the bone, and even as another tried to attack him from behind the staff swept around in a deadly arc that collided powerfully with its head, knocking it off its feet.

Dannel had taken the initiative, but the remaining orcs were not craven goblins, to run screaming when confronted with a tough foe. They still had numbers on him, and as they rushed at the darting and spinning elf, attacking from all directions, their attacks began to have an effect. It took all of his effort just to keep them at bay, but even as he continued to land violent blows with Alakast, soon runnels of bright red blood decorated his arms and legs, and a spreading splotch appeared on his left shoulder, where a spearhead had torn through his defenses.

And still more orcs trickled into the melee, as the creatures continued to press the flanks.

Not so far away at that same moment, Mole was finding her own situation growing equally grim. She'd stuck that head shaman good earlier, and by the continued exclamations she heard from the below she figured he was finding the poison she'd swiped from that follower of "Wee Jas" in Occipitus to be most unpleasant. But the orc commander had seen her, and now a half-dozen orcs were pursuing her. Her arm hurt where another arrow had hit her... stupid dumb luck! She muttered a curse she'd picked up from Hodge. The arrow had been doubly unfortunate for her in that she'd been carrying her potion in that hand, and when hit she'd dropped it to shatter on the rocks at her feet. So her holdout was gone, and her hiding place revealed. Now she was running along the ridgeline at the summit of the cliffs, six orcs chasing her, and arrows still knifing past her from the other surviving archers back near the defile. Luckily they were too far away to have much of a chance of hitting her, but as she'd already proven, luck was a fickle ally...

Proven again as she leapt over a slight rise to reveal that the ridge came to an abrupt end just ahead, with nothing but a sheer fifty-foot drop to a rocky ground below. She skittered to a halt, inches from the edge. Her magical boots and nimbleness had allowed her to gain a lead over the pursuing orcs, but as they saw her suddenly stop they redoubled their efforts, clearly eager to do unpleasant things to her with those various weapons they carried.

Great swords smashed stone and clattered against magical armor plate as a huge melee raged at the summit of the rocky slope. Less than thirty seconds had passed since Zenna had called down the darkness, and yet each tick seemed an eternity in the chaos of the melee. Hodge cried out as a ogre sword crunched into his side, and he fell back, nearly finished. Zenna, standing just a few feet behind him, almost within the the ogre's reach herself, calmly blasted the already wounded ogre with a second scorching ray, and it fell, its face charred and blackened.

And Arun. Arun Goldenshield, Divine Champion of Moradin, stood his ground as two ogres laid into him with all of their considerable strength behind the blows. He took hits, and narrowly dodged others, but throughout it he did not falter, and when his blade swept it brought Death. The first ogre was already bleeding from a deep gash in its thigh, and as it lifted its sword to strike again Arun lunged in and sank three feet of blessed steel into its body, stabbing up through its gut into the vital organs above. The ogre spat blood and crumpled, falling across the body of the first ogre he'd killed earlier. The second ogre shouted a cry of frustration and disbelief and drove its sword down two-handed into the paladin's back, hoping to somehow defeat this little creature that would just not die. The ogre had killed armored men before, but somehow the metal plates held and the sword slid off, slamming into the ground with enough force to split the stone. The paladin turned, and the ogre saw the promise of death in the dark eyes beneath that silvered helm. Arun stepped forward and unleashed a full attack.

Seconds later, the last ogre went down.

Zenna was quick to reach Hodge's side, pouring healing energy into the stricken dwarf. More shapes were materializing within the darkness, smaller forms, but many, many more. Knowing that the orcs would be worse off in the light, she dismissed the spell and stood, looking down the slope.

There had to be at least sixty orcs there, with a huge brute at their forefront, a giant of an orc with a massive axe with a head surrounded with flame. The orcs did not charge forward; shielding their light-sensitive eyes from the last rays of the setting sun, they looked with dismay at the hacked and burned corpses of their mighty ogres, and the three foes that yet stood before them. Four foes, as Clinger rose from the rocks behind them, a limp orc still dangling from his jaws.

Arun stepped onto the pile of ogres he'd killed, standing on the top creature's chest. He was injured, but he channeled Moradin's power into himself, and his sword did not tremble as he swept it over the gathered orcs, before it settled on their leader.

"If it is blood and destruction you seek, orcs, then you shall find it here!"

Kavorek stepped forward. He'd lost here today, he knew. Even if his orcs could still prove victorious, the base of his power had been sundered, and the tribe had been decimated. If that idiot Uk'bek survived—and his kind usually did—then his shamans would no doubt make arrangements that would see him quietly killed at some point when he wasn't expecting it.

So he basically had two choices. He could retreat, lose face, and depart this particular band of orcs, striking out to seek a new opportunity elsewhere. He'd had to do that before, and while there were always risks involved, he was confident that he would survive and adapt.

On the other hand, there was personal honor, and defeat of this foe. The dwarves had to be injured, and that spellcasting woman had clearly used up some of her resources already. And there were more of his orcs atop the tor behind them; he could hear the ongoing sounds of battle.

Kavorek was an unusual creature, part orc, part ogre, gifted with an intelligence unusual among either race.

But ultimately, he was what he was.

Lifting his axe, he roared a challenge, and charged.

Behind him, his orcs came on in a wave.

Chapter 242

Dannel staggered as another axe clipped his side. His armor held, but he felt the pain slam through his body like a hammer. He'd already broken a rib, he suspected.

There were orcs all around him, over a dozen now, although he'd killed at least that many with his fireball and Alakast. At least there didn't seem to be any more coming; though that was small enough comfort with the current contingent apparently enough to finish him off.

He swept Alakast around in a broad arc, and the orcs fell back for a moment. They could see that he was weakening, though, and no sooner had he finished his sweep than they were rushing in again, weapons seeking his flesh.

But he'd gotten what he wanted, an instant's respite. He smiled, a grim smile, as he lifted his prize—the last missile from his necklace—and slammed it into the ground at his feet.

Even as he lifted his weapon and roared his challenge of battle, Kavorek felt his magical augmentations slide off of him. He fixed the spell-woman with a hateful look, but spared her no further attention; his focus was on the dwarven knight, who likewise had fixed his attention upon his greatest foe. The dwarf was no fool, rushing ahead to meet him and be overwhelmed from all sides; the two dwarves and the woman calmly retreated so that the boulders were again at their backs.

The orcs surged ahead. A number hurled spears or light axes before them, but those were easily turned by the shields of the dwarves and the magical defenses of the woman. The dwarven knight stood at the forefront, awaiting him, and Kavorek felt the song of battle fill him as he outdistanced his troops, leaping forward to smite the dwarf with a powerful, inexorable assault.

The blow crunched into the dwarf's armor with crushing force. The plate held, but Kavorek knew he'd hurt his foe. He laughed, the insane sound of the battle-mad warrior, and brought his weapon up to attack again.

And met the eyes of the spell-woman.

And froze.

It was as if ice had been poured into his veins. His body stiffened, his muscles refusing to obey him. He could do nothing, even as inside his mind he raged and screamed. He could only watch as the dwarven knight lifted his sword, and with a single powerful stroke took the mighty orog's head clean off his shoulders.

Behind him, the orc charge faltered at the ease with which their battle-champion, the orog who had led them to victory in dozens of raids, was dispatched. Behind the stones, they watched as a blazing fireball rose up, accompanied by the screams of their fellows as they burned. They looked again at the bloody corpses of six ogres, once armored titans, and at the gathered bodies of dozens of their own.

Then the woman raised her hands, and a fell mist rose up out of the stones. Cloying, red, it roiled and burned, holding them with a superstitious awe. When a demonic face began to take shape within the living fog, looking over the host with a hungry look, they'd had enough. They broke, fleeing, their bloodlust replaced with a desire for escape.

Atop the cliffs, Mole watched them go. She bent to clean her knife on the dirty coat of one of the dead orcs. She looked at the bodies around her speculatively. Six orcs, six bodies. On reaching the cliff, she'd hidden among the rocks there, pretending that she'd jumped off. The orcs had bought it, and the first two were dead before they even realized otherwise. Then she was jumping and darting and tumbling among them, avoiding their clumsy attacks, springing in to attack and then dodging back out before they could counter. They'd chased after her, and a few had even managed to hit her, but her magical chain shirt had held against all of the blows. Her mace had killed three, and when the last one had turned to flee, her knife had found its back.

She shook her head in amazement. She remembered orcs as being a bit tougher than this.

Back on the tor, Zenna returned to the interior of the ring of stones. Blackened orc bodies were everywhere. She finally found Dannel half-buried under an orc whose face had been staved in—clearly the work of Alakast. He was still in his altered form, and for a moment her heart clasped tightly in her chest as she thought he was dead. But then he groaned as she pulled him free, and moments later a healing spell brought him back to consciousness.

“You're a great big stupid idiot,” she said, through her tears.

His form shimmered and returned to its normal features. He reached up with a slender hand marred with dried blood, and touched the tiny droplets before they could fall free. “I do love you, Zenna,” he said.

She shook, the tears redoubling, and he took her in his embrace. Behind them, the last rays of light from the fading sun disappeared as the golden orb fell below the horizon. The two dwarves stood there, silent, watching as the day slowly gave way to night.

Chapter 243

“Look!” Mole shouted, leaping up onto her feet on the saddle of her pony, pointing at the horizon to the south. The pony, used to her antics, merely kept plodding on. “Cauldron!”

Zenna, drawn back into the present by her friend’s shout, stared into the distance. Although she would not have seen it without Mole’s direction, she could now make out the dark line that was the black malachite walls of the town, still miles distant.

A rush of conflicting emotions came over her as she looked upon the faraway city. Odd, that she and Mole had only lived there for half a year, not even that, really, considering the various expeditions out of the city they’d been on, and much of that time had been spent dealing with nearly constant threats to their lives. Yet somehow the place had crept into their hearts, and there was a part of her, at least, that considered Cauldron home. They’d made enemies, it was true, but also friends, allies who had helped them before, and who could be called upon again if the need arose.

And it probably would, she thought, remembering the tumultuous state of the city when they’d left.

They hadn’t found out just how long they’d been gone until days after leaving the mountains. They’d seen the signs before then, of course; the weather was a dead giveaway. But she supposed none of them had truly wanted to believe, until the people in that isolated Tethyrian village they’d stopped at had confirmed it.

By her counting, they’d spent a tenday in Redgorge and the jungles near the Demonskar, and maybe another tenday in Occipitus. The time spent in the latter locale was more difficult to quantify, but certainly not much greater than her estimate.

Only they’d learned that four months had passed here, on Faerûn.

When she’d finally thought about it, it made sense, in an odd way. Her studies of the planes had revealed that the passage of time was a mutable quantity in some places away from the Prime. The others took some more convincing, but ultimately they all had to confront the reality of what had happened.

“We need to get back to Cauldron,” Arun had said.

“If it even still be there,” Hodge opined.

But then, on the borders of Tethyr, they’d had to confront a choice. The southern road along the Alamirs was a long and difficult one, and they were in need of both weapons and supplies. Their clothes and armor were in terrible shape, the former in tatters and the latter battered. They had wealth—Mole had seen that little of value over the course of their journeys had escaped her bag of holding—but it would do them no good here. Zenna had gained access to new powers, but some of that potential was not usable without the spells she wanted to add to her spellbook.

Ultimately she'd been able to prevail upon the others to agree to a diversion, to the Tethyrian city of Saradush. It took them the better part of a tenday to reach the city, but part of the logic of the trip would be the availability of good horses that would speed their return to Cauldron.

After spending so much time in the relatively small city of Cauldron, Saradush was a boiling jumble of people and activity. Summer lent a frenetic activity to the place, although the stifling heat of the afternoon put something of a damper on the otherwise constant bustle of its markets. With Mole and Dannel taking the lead, they found willing buyers for the various items they'd acquired in their recent adventures, and plenty of others eager to relieve them of that wealth.

Zenna's first priority was to gain new spells for her book, and she quickly secured new scrolls and the inks and other ingredients needed to transfer them. She met several powerful mages with whom she spent hours in conversation and discussion, and even another priest of Azuth, a half-elven woman who seemed impressed by her rapid rise to power at such a relatively young age. The days passed quickly, too quickly, and despite the eagerness of her friends to be on their way another tenday passed before she was ready to depart. Even then she often looked over the additional scrolls she carried, powerful magics they'd found at Vaprak's Voice, spells that she could not yet cast, but which someday, she was confident she would be able to grasp.

But the others had not spent their time idly. One of the first things they'd accomplished was the restoration of Arun's crippled hand. Poorer by a donation of nearly a thousand gold pieces to the temple of Lathander, they departed with a two-handed paladin.

Even with that cost, and the thousands of gold that Zenna was using to buy and transcribe new spells, they still had a fair amount of coin to spend. They had a number of extra weapons that they sold for decent profits, including the wounding spear they'd taken from the succubus, Morgan's old bastard sword, and the two magical lanterns. Although the primary purpose of those last items was now meaningless, they still bore a potent aura, and functioned quite well as magical flails. Arun did not forget about the evil-tainted dagger that Mole had taken, and he insisted that they destroy rather than sell that item. The paladin also insisted upon keeping the extra holy sword that they carried, stating that he would much rather prefer to see it conferred upon a group that would put it to proper use—such as the Temple of Helm in Cauldron—rather than trading it in a marketplace like just another magical trinket.

Mole grumbled a bit at the coin lost by such niceties, but even so they had a considerable cache to spend. Dannel found via a few covert inquiries a dealer who possessed a fabulous weapon, a magical bow that imparted electrical energy to each missile it fired. The cost was extravagant, but after witnessing the elf's marksmanship against the orcs, they all agreed to pitch in part of their shares to enable the purchase. They also applied the full pressure of the group to force Arun to acquire a non-magical bow. The paladin grumbled about dwarves and "elvish weapons," but Zenna's logic was ultimately too straightforward: they often engaged enemies at a distance, and the ability to hurt a foe at range was too useful an ability to snub. The dwarf ultimately gave in, and although his shots were nowhere near as smooth or as accurate as Dannel's, he surprised them all with his ability to drive arrows through practice targets.

Mole acquired a new rapier and some magical gloves that enhanced her agility somewhat. Hodge got a new shield, and finally, they all agreed to collectively finance the recharging of their healing wands, an essential purchase for people in their line of work. Arun spent time repairing their weapons, and he modified the ornate plate armor they'd taken from the slain lich into a form suitable for Hodge to wear. The dwarf complained at first about having a yet heavier burden, but he soon adjusted, and they sold his old battered suit of banded armor and used the proceeds to acquire the fine horses that they now rode.

Zenna and Dannel's relationship had slipped back into a more or less stable détente. The others, Mole in particular, was frustrated by the inability of their friends to overcome the gap that still remained between them, given their obvious feelings for each other. But Zenna still had her own issues, and one of the first things Dannel had done on reaching Saradush was to disappear for the better part of a day and a half. He didn't share with them what he'd been up to, and Zenna immediately suspected that he'd been contacting his friends in the Harpers. The incident renewed the chill between them, but at least there was no open conflict, and each took it as a given that the other would be present when they rode south again.

So much had happened, and they didn't really know what to expect, now that they had made it back. Upon realizing her most recent rise in power Zenna had prepared a sending to notify Jenya that they were alive and returning, but the response had been too brief to really convey anything meaningful. Zenna watched the black walls draw nearer, and wondered what challenges would lie ahead.

NEXT: "SECRETS OF THE SOUL PILLARS"

The Shackled City

Book VI: "Secrets of the Soul Pillars"

Begun 7-28-04

Chapter 244

Two men met in a darkened room. The only illumination came from a struggling candle in a golden censer laid atop a small stone table decorated with a rich red velvet cloth. The light was not strong enough to reveal more of the chamber, but neither of the two men required additional light to see. They knew each other, that was clear by the way they carried themselves, but there was also a tension between them.

Each man radiated power, but otherwise they seemed total opposites. One was tall, broad of shoulder and muscular, if somewhat bulging about his gut. He was clad in plate armor that was clearly well-crafted, by the way it fit about him like a second skin. The other was slight and was clad in very expensively cut fabrics, and there was at least a pound of gold laid about him as decoration, and the stones on the rings he wore on his fingers were the kind that could feed and house a man comfortably for a year. He looked to be of half-elvish ancestry, and he moved with a subtle grace, as if each step he took had been thought over and prepared at some earlier time in advance.

The armored man overwhelmed the other fellow in physical presence, but the faint light caused the beads of sweat on his brow to glisten, and when the dandy turned, the pale light seemed to catch in his eyes, glimmering as ten tiny motes that danced merrily within those cold orbs.

“Those troublesome adventurers have returned to Cauldron,” the half-elf said.

“Yes... yes, I had heard that,” the armored man replied. “They have active dealings with Urikas at the Temple of Helm, and we have been watching them for some time.”

“They have grown beyond themselves, too quickly,” the other replied. “Matters rapidly approach a critical phase. They must be dealt with, now.”

The armored man seemed to stumble over his words slightly. “But... Embril Aloustinai, she is not here...”

The half-elf pursed his lips slightly. “Yes, I know that. In her absence, you will have to provide leadership, like Iverson.”

“Yes, of course, my lord Vhalantru... but...”

The smaller man strode around the armored figure, almost casually. “Your organization has benefited greatly from our arrangement, cleric. This does not seem like too much to ask... is it?”

He'd suddenly come to a stop behind the armored man, but Iverson did not turn. “No, my lord. I will see to it personally.”

“Excellent.” The half-elf resumed his strides and soon faced the other again. “I knew those fools would be trouble, when I first saw them in Kazmojen's bazaar.”

The other man did not respond.

The half-elf laughed. “They have come far fast, those outlanders. But it is time for their adventuring careers to come to a sudden, and painful, end...”

Chapter 245

The sky was an ochre tapestry quickly darkening toward black when Zenna spotted the familiar gables of “The Drunken Morkoth” come into view around the bend in the avenue ahead. There were still a good number of people in the street, but the activity was muted, the citizens of the town exuding that generalized sense of anxiety and evasion that Zenna had felt like a palpable wave since she'd returned to the city.

“Patrol,” Dannel said quietly, beside her.

Zenna saw them coming, and also noted the way that the commoners moved quickly to get out of the way of the heavily armed band of the Watch as it made its way down the avenue. Zenna felt a momentary flashback of memory at the sight of the armored half-orc mercenaries that made up the bulk of the patrol; they were a bit too reminiscent of the orcs they had battled in the northern Alamirs for comfort. At least this wasn't one of the "special" patrols; she remembered vividly how Arun had nearly had a fit when they'd seen an ogre serving in the Watch.

Yes, things had changed in Cauldron.

But as they reached the Morkoth, and entered the expansive common room through the wide double doors, some of the oppressiveness they'd felt out in the street slipped away. To be sure, the crowd was somewhat more muted than it had once been, but here was warmth, and conversation, and even the music of a fiddler in a back corner that was all but drowned out by the general din of the place. There were maybe fifty people here now, but as Zenna scanned the room, she didn't see Mole or the dwarves.

"They're probably in the back room," Dannel said, leading her past the bar toward the low archway that opened onto the quieter chamber in the back of the inn.

Zenna and Mole had once let a room in the loft above the adjacent secondary building behind the Morkoth, but the owner had understandably rented it out to someone else in the months of their absence. The adventurers had since found rooms elsewhere in the city. It hadn't been hard; a good number of people were leaving Cauldron, and with the obvious tension here Zenna expected to see more of an exodus with the end of summer.

The situation with Alek and Maavu had blown over, but the overall level of stress was still high in the city. While some of the tax increases that had spawned the riots had been eased, they'd been replaced by a series of smaller levies that had been implemented gradually. All of it was supposedly to support "security", in the form of the mercenaries that had largely taken over the duties of the existing Watch. There was a big camp of them outside the city, Zenna had learned, and from what she'd heard it seemed to get a little bigger with each passing tenday.

Jenya had briefed them on the situation in the city, their first day back. Things had been mostly quiet in Cauldron, although there was a fair amount of grumbling, and occasional outbreaks of violence that were put down ruthlessly by the new Watch. At least monsters had stopped appearing in the city, although rumors continued to weave tales of terrible creatures that moved around in the shadows, waiting for the right moment to strike.

It had been three days now, and they were starting to get a feel for the city again. Or rather, Mole and Dannel were; they reported to the others what they found when they gathered for supper each night at the Morkoth. Arun and Hodge spent much of their time at a dwarven tavern on Obsidian Avenue, although Mole had told Zenna that she'd heard that the dwarves were also helping out at the Lantern Street Orphanage, and doing some other small jobs of building repair in some of the poorer neighborhoods of the city. Zenna managed to establish a relationship with Vortimax Weer, an arcanist who ran Weer's Elixirs, a small potion shop on Obsidian Avenue. In exchange for a few spells, and one of the scrolls she'd found in Vaprak's Voice, the mage had agreed to lend her the use of his laboratory, to pursue some of the projects she'd been tossing around in her head of late. She'd already managed one successful creation, a vial filled with a silvery gel that could temporarily infuse a weapon with the properties of alchemical silver. The stuff would be very useful if they encountered another monstrosity like Tongueater, the were-baboon who'd taken over the Lucky Monkey soon after their arrival in Cauldron. She'd given the silversheen to Dannel, and was toying with a few ideas for some elixirs that could help Mole. Assuming she had the time to work on them; for some reason she'd felt a sense of anticipation building since she'd gotten up this morning, as if something important was coming, something that she couldn't quite yet identify.

She frowned, and thought back to the words of the divination that she and Jenya had performed together yesterday evening. The two of them had combined their powers in an attempt to pierce the veil that Zenna was convinced concealed something that linked all of the recent events together... the abductions and the beholder, the attack on the Lucky Monkey, the cult of Triel Eldurast, the umber hulk rampage, and the troubles with Alek Tercival and the Chisel. Nidrama had spoken of great forces of evil and chaos, and Alek had warned them not to return to Cauldron, before his death. It was all part of a puzzle, and it confounded Zenna that she could not solve it.

Their divination had revealed the following verse, in response to Zenna's question, "Who or what is behind the troubles facing Cauldron?"

*Cages above and bones below
Death the door and magic the key
Knives but dust and souls the prize*

"Ah, there they are," Dannel said, drawing her out of her thoughts, gesturing toward a booth in one of the curtained alcoves that lined the back room of the inn.

But even as Zenna turned in that direction, someone bumped into her, and as she turned to apologize she found herself looking at Annah Taskerhill.

Chapter 246

For a moment, Zenna was too surprised to do anything but stare. The young, beautiful noblewoman was the leader of the Stormblades, a rival band of adventurers who'd been a thorn in the collective sides of her and her companions since shortly after they'd arrived in Cauldron. They'd had a few ugly confrontations with members of the Stormblades, and the noble brats had taken credit—and a good percentage of the treasure—from some of the notable deeds they'd performed, such as breaking up the slaving ring of the half-dwarf Kazmojen and recovering magical wands of control water from the cult of Triel Eldurast.

But it did not look as though the recent months had been friendly to Annah Taskerhill. She was still attractive and exotic, her dark skin smooth and unblemished, her features formed as if cast by an inspired sculptor. But her eyes were troubled, and darker circles hung under them, wrinkles that Zenna knew all too well, the marks left by stress, loss, and pain. She was dressed in the same style that Zenna remembered—expensive fabrics, fashionably cut, in all, rich—but she noticed a few small unmended tears and other slight blemishes that contrasted jarringly with the unnaturally perfect appearance that the bard had worn on their last meeting.

The noblewoman recovered first. “Ah. I’d heard you were back in town,” she said, her voice flat and without emotion, although Zenna thought she saw a hint of the fire she’d remembered in her eyes. “I thought maybe you’d all died, but Cara insisted you’d abandoned Cauldron, and gone onto greener pastures.”

“No, we’re still here,” Zenna said.

Dannel stepped forward, forming a tight triangle between them. “I have heard that things have gone badly for you of late.”

Annah bristled. “If you’re referring to Todd’s death, yes, that counts as ‘gone badly.’ But you’d be making a mistake, if you were to count the Stormblades out so quickly.”

Todd... ah yes, that jerk, Zenna thought. Todd Vanderboren had reminded her of nothing more than a weasel, and their last meeting at the Cusp of Sunrise had been an acrimonious one. Mole had gotten two thousand gold pieces out of him there, she remembered, gambling for high stakes in a dramatic game of gemsnatcher.

But she held her tongue, and Dannel was quick to reply, “No, I didn’t mean it that way,” he said soothingly, in that annoying way he had of making your anger drain away like water through a sieve. “I only meant... well, we’ve come to understand how important some things are, and how you don’t really appreciate them until you lose them.”

Annah looked at him in surprise, but then nodded. Zenna could sense the barrier still between them, but was surprised to find herself feeling sympathetic toward the woman as she turned away.

“I have to go,” she said, heading back for the front room.

“Hey, did I miss something?” Mole said, coming over to join them. “The dwarves didn’t wait—oh, was that Annah Taskerhill?”

“Come on, or there won’t be any food left at all,” Dannel said, directing the two women toward the long booth where the dwarves were already seated.

The back room was mostly empty, with most of the inn’s guests apparently preferring the more dynamic environment of the main room at the front. A few of the other patrons eating at the booths scattered along the walls shot them curious looks as they passed, but the air of tension hanging over Cauldron had inculcated in most people a strong interest in focusing on their own business, and although Zenna thought that she recognized a few faces, no one offered so much as a greeting.

Arun, however, gave them a wave and a nod, and gestured for them to take places at the open end of the booth. Hodge, who was flanked by a pair of tall steins on his left and a platter piled with the bones from what looked like a whole family of birds on his right, spared them a grunt as he continued stuffing bits of meat from his current project into his mouth. From the accumulation already present on his beard and his jacket, Zenna figured that he'd already been at it for quite some time.

"Nice of you to wait for us," Dannel said dryly. Hodge's reply was garbled over a mouthful of meat, but Zenna knew him well enough to guess at the content.

"Dwarves," Mole said, hopping up onto a bench in an adjacent, vacant booth. "I just can't do anything with these boys, and the gods know I've tried."

Zenna saw that both dwarves were wearing their armor, and Hodge's new axe was propped up against the wall within easy reach. She hadn't seen him without the weapon since they'd won it from the orog chief, and while he hadn't named it so far as she'd heard, Mole had already provided at least a dozen suggestions.

"Expecting trouble?" she asked, as she took a seat at the far end of the booth from the noisome dwarf.

Arun nodded grimly. "This city's on edge," he replied. "And I don't care if they're lawfully deputized or not, so long as half-orcs and ogres are walking the streets, I'll keep my weapons close at hand."

"Defying the law? How un-paladinlike of you, Arun," Dannel said. "There may be hope for you yet, my friend."

"A law that begets evil is the antithesis of justice," the paladin replied. "And I am sensing much evil in Cauldron since our return."

"Well, what I'm sensing now is the absence of a waitress," Dannel replied lightly. "While yon dwarf's antics have a way of reducing the appetite, I haven't had anything to eat since breakfast, and even 'prancing elves' need to eat."

"Mra'ap ar'll 'ak yer a froofy sarad," Hodge said, over a mouthful of food.

Zenna glanced over at Mole, and saw that the gnome had turned her attention from the light-hearted exchange out toward the front room. She followed her friend's gaze, and saw a stirring of some sort in the front room. The angle through the arched exit didn't give much of a view of the common beyond the edge of the bar, but there was something... an odd lull in the din, followed by a couple of surprised exclamations a few moments later.

A figure appeared under the low lintel, his head nearly scraping the weathered wooden arch. He was a half-orc, and at first glance Zenna thought he was one of the many mercenary soldiers who were ubiquitous in Cauldron now. But even before the man reached for the massive sword slung across his back, Zenna sensed something wrong. It took her a few heartbeats to register the discordant element.

The man was absolutely silent; he made no noise when he walked, and the sword slid from his scabbard without even the faintest whisper of sound. When he leapt forward, his heavy boot landed on the smooth floorboards without noise. Behind him, Zenna caught a glimpse of a slender woman, clad in studded leather armor with a billowing cloak spreading in her wake as she followed the warrior into the room.

“Ambush!” Zenna cried, an instant after Mole shouted a similar warning. Even as the others looked up from their conversation to see the intruders, Zenna opened her mouth to speak the words of a spell, knowing she was too late.

She managed one word before the charging warrior drew near enough for the magical silence surrounding him to envelop them, and her magic fled.

Chapter 247

A clinical part of Zenna’s mind recorded the details, even as her spell dissipated and her heart pounded in her chest at the brutish hulk charging them. He was moving incredibly fast, too fast, and a faint glow surrounded him. She suspected that at least one enhancing spell, and probably more, had been placed upon him.

The plates and mugs on the table started sliding downward as Arun lifted the table. Hodge’s exclamation was silent, the dwarf’s mouth moving soundlessly, Mole leaping back to hit the floor with a roll, Dannel lifting Alakast...

The sword came crashing down, and with horror Zenna realized that it was coming for her. She tried to duck down beneath the edge of the booth, but the blade tore into the seat behind her and kept going, and she felt pain explode in her back as it slashed through her clothes and bit deep into her flesh. She tried to roll with the hit, but only staggered awkwardly from the booth, trying to get away, but there was nowhere to go.

She looked up and saw the woman pointing at her. Her eyes fixed on a silver icon that she’d worn concealed under her cloak, visible now that she was moving quickly. A silver skull...

Pain struck her again like a wave as a bolt of searing, white-hot light erupted from the woman’s outstretched hand, slamming into her with the force of a hurled brick. She staggered back against the adjacent booth, knocking the table ajar, her thoughts jumbled with the ferocity of the attacks against her.

But she was sufficiently aware to see the streak of red flame that appeared from thin air, flashing across the room to strike her in the shoulder. Her cloak helped deflect the scorching ray, but even as her mind registered the attack from an invisible mage, a second bolt shot solidly into her chest, and she fell back into the booth, consciousness fleeing from her in a torrent.

Dannel watched with horror as the assassins—three, he realized, reaching the same conclusion as Zenna about the hidden mage—focused their attacks on Zenna, taking her down with a combination of powerful attacks. These foes were powerful and well-prepared, but he and his friends were experienced veterans, and they were quick to respond.

Even as the elf vaulted the sundered partition that separated their booth from the adjacent one, leaping to Zenna's aid, Arun hurled their table into the attacking half-orc. The huge sword struck the table solidly, smashing it with a single blow, but behind it came the dwarves, lashing out with their weapons. Arun's sword slammed into the torso of the half-orc, cutting through the chain links of the mailshirt he wore, the holy power of the sword flaring as it found evil to destroy. The warrior dodged back, but only a step as he sought to recover for another attack, but that maneuver did not foil Hodge, whose axe burst into eager flame as he brought it around in a wide arc, catching the would-be slayer solidly in the side.

But the half-orc seemed possessed of a considerable fortitude, and he lifted the sword with incredible quickness, ready to fight on.

A slight form darted under Hodge's swing and rolled between the half-orc's legs, coming up out of her tumble with her rapier already darting into the warrior's back. The half-orc stiffened and let out a silent cry as the length of Mole's new weapon vanished under the trailing edge of his mailshirt, reappearing a moment later drenched in his blood.

Dannel bent over Zenna's blasted and bleeding form. He was frustrated by his inability to magically heal her wounds, as neither his bardic powers nor his healing wand would function in the area of magical silence. He had to rely on basic first aid, tearing a strip from Zenna's torn shirt and using it in an attempt to staunch the bleeding from the deep gash that the half-orc had torn in her back with his sword.

The enemy spellcasters, on the other hand, did not appear to be hindered by the magical silence in the least. The woman, holding a slender black wand in her left hand, darted nimbly forward toward Mole. The gnome saw her coming and turned to face her, but the woman was faster, extending a slender hand to touch the rogue lightly on the shoulder.

Mole stiffened and staggered back, her mouth opening to release a spray of blood as the inflict serious wounds spell from the priestess tore mercilessly through her insides.

Even as the gnome suffered, a pale violet ray appeared out of thin air, narrowly missing the injured half-orc before it struck Arun. The ray of enfeeblement poured dark energies into the paladin, and his movements became leaden, the very weight of his armor and weapons bearing him down as his strength faded.

Despite being weakened, Arun continued to press his attacks. But with his strength drained from him, his attacks were far less effective, and he managed only one glancing impact that barely cut through the warrior's armor.

Seeing the paladin's difficulty, Hodge surged forward with an all-out attack intended to take out this foe once and for all. As he shifted his position, however, he trod heavily upon one of the large metal steins that had been upon their table. Losing his balance, he fell heavily to the side, his axe falling from his hands as he splayed across the hardwood floor.

Dannel looked across the crowded battleground and felt a cold chill. These enemies fought together with a grim precision, and they seemed to know exactly how to counter their own tactics. He felt rather than heard Zenna cough as blood from her wound fouled her insides, and fear gripped his heart as he felt her slipping away from him, despite his efforts to stabilize her.

Together, they had faced dragons, demons, and terrible foes. But he could not escape a grim, unmistakable fact.

They were being beaten.

Chapter 248

Confronted with an effective ambush by skilled assassins, his friends taking a beating at their hands, Dannel reached for Alakast. He knew, however, that if he left Zenna, it was very likely that that woman he loved, the woman he'd been charged with protecting, would bleed to death here in the back room of an inn in Cauldron.

And then he saw a familiar face at the entrance of the room, as Annah Taskerhill stepped into view.

The noblewoman's eyes widened in surprise, but the bard too was an experienced adventurer, and she quickly evaluated the situation. She spread her hands and opened her mouth wide, and unleashed a discordant shriek that tore through the room.

The sound was more than a scream, it contained the force of a dispel magic spell that pulsed through the room and warred with the spells that surrounded the assassins. Each bore many enchantments, and the spell, unfocused as it was, could not affect them all, but the results were still dramatic as the silence collapsed, and the sounds of battle filled the confined space. At the same instant, the air in the middle of the room shimmered and a lean, lanky man clad in a loose gray robe appeared, turning to face this new threat.

Dannel did not hesitate, unleashing his healing song, pouring magical power into Zenna's stricken body. She jerked as the positive energy flowed into her with a torrent, dragging her back to consciousness.

"What..." she mumbled.

"You're badly hurt," he told her, interrupting the song only long enough to grab his wand from its pouch. "Heal yourself."

"Take out the paladin!" the enemy wizard said, lifting his hand and firing a pair of scorching rays into Annah Taskerhill. The bard managed to dodge partly out of the way of the first blast, but the second caught her solidly in the torso, and she fell back out of the doorway, her fine clothes smoldering where the magical flames had struck her.

The half-orc tried to obey the command, laying into Arun with a series of potent blows. Arun deflected one stroke with his smaller blade, and grunted as a second landed heavily on his shoulder with enough force to slightly dent the mithral plate.

“Enough, assassin,” the dwarf said, gritting his teeth as he tried to fight through the magical weakness that had stolen over him.

Even as the warrior of Moradin raised his holy blade to strike, the priestess stepped back and invoked the dark power of her grim god. A storm of negative energy swept through the room, an unholy blight that tore mercilessly through the chamber. Two commoners who’d been hiding under their table during the violent battle had their lives snuffed out by the dark power of the spell, and the companions—particularly those whose hearts clove truest to the path of good—suffered as well as the fell wave washed over them. The assassins, dedicated to selfishness and evil, felt nothing but a fell exultation, and as the cloud dissipated they readied themselves for a final attack that would overcome their targets, and earn their pay.

They had come close. But not close enough.

Arun roared out a dwarvish cry of rage and battle as he thrust the full length of his sword into the half-orc’s chest. The warrior cried out, his huge sword falling from his suddenly limp fingers to clatter on the floor.

Belting out a loud string of profanities in both dwarvish and the common speech, Hodge pulled himself up off the floor and picked up his axe, charging toward the priestess. She dodged back out of his way, but was unable to avoid Mole, who tumbled into place behind her, stinging her with a deep thrust of her rapier into the meaty muscle of her left leg. The assassin limped back, trying to keep both of her enemies in front of her.

“Kemock! We must flee!”

Arun leapt over the body of the half-orc as he fell, and rushed toward the sorcerer. But before he could reach him, Kemock unleashed his most powerful spell. A cone of cold slammed into them with the force of a hundred winters, filling the room with icy death.

Dannel threw himself over Zenna’s still-ravaged body, shielding her from the worst effects of the blast. When the spell had ended, however, both were clutched together in a frozen embrace, unmoving.

Mole and her adversary had both been at the edges of the spell’s effect, and both evaded it easily. Hodge, however, lacked their speed and agility, and he staggered as frost coated his squat frame, driving through his clothes to chill his flesh.

And Arun, already heavily wounded... Arun was caught with the full force of the cone. For several seconds he was lost in the roiling pulse of cold, completely shrouded in its power, blasted backward by its force.

“Taste frozen death, holy warrior,” the man mocked, exulting in his power.

But his smile vanished as the storm ended... and a gleaming steel blade came crashing down, slashing through his shoulder and driving magical steel deep into his torso. Kemock staggered backward, a bright line of red gushing down over his robe. The sorcerer snarled and called upon his greater invisibility spell to cloak him once again, but even as he spoke the words of power a voice sounded behind him.

“A useful spell. But it will not save you now, assassin.”

He felt the touch that sent a surge through his body, countering his magic, matching the arcane currents exactly and disrupting them. He turned to see the dark-skinned woman there, and hissed, “I will destroy you, bitch!”

“I don’t think so,” Arun said, and that was the last thing that Kemoch Brage heard before the paladin’s sword ended his life.

The woman found herself hard-pressed as well. Facing both Mole and Hodge, sporting several wounds, she finally abandoned the fight, turning and running toward the exit. Hodge swung at her with his axe as she fled, but he narrowly missed. Annah, focused on the sorcerer, turned to late to be able to hinder her escape, and while Arun took a few steps after her, Mole’s voice drew him around.

“Arun! It’s Zenna and Dannel... come quickly!”

Chapter 249

“You saved our lives,” Dannel said to Annah, still shivering even as Zenna continued to cast healing spells upon him.

Both had come to the very edge of death, before Arun’s healing powers had drawn them back from the brink. Only Zenna’s innate resistance to cold, and Dannel’s selfless sacrifice had saved her life, and it had quite nearly cost him his own in the bargain. She was quick to tell him that once she’d been revived, but the scolding was not fierce, and it was clear from the way her eyes shone that she knew just how close both of them had come.

The bard shrugged. Zenna had offered to heal her, but she’d declined, using her own bardic powers to treat the burns she’d suffered from the sorcerer’s fiery blasts.

“I may not be a shining scion of Good,” she said, “but I have no patience for assassins, especially ones that try to trash my favorite inn.”

“Those three knew a lot about us,” Zenna said. “They knew our abilities, and how to neutralize our tactics.” She coughed, her own body slow to recover from the beating it had taken, despite the healing that Arun, Dannel and she herself had channeled into her.

“Stupid to attack us ‘ere, all together,” Hodge said. “Ida waited ‘til we was alone, or sleepin’, or somesuch,” he said.

“This was no casual assault,” Annah said. “They had a number of powerful spells layered on them, spells that my dispel slid right off of.”

Zenna nodded. "She's right, this was coordinated by someone more powerful, and they had to attack us quickly, together, before all of the spells wore off," she said. "It was an all-or-nothing ambush."

"They will learn soon enough that their effort failed, if they do not know already," Arun said. "When that woman reports their failure, they may try again."

Loud shouts from the front room drew their attention around. Mole was standing near the archway, and she looked through and reported back. "Looks like the Watch, finally," she said.

"Let me do the talking," Annah offered, as a patrol of muscular half-orcs led by a tall human lieutenant of the Watch entered the room.

They followed her advice, and after an hour of questions, with the occasional threat inserted for flavor, they found themselves out in the street again. The Morkoth had been closed for the rest of the night, and a few patrons lingered on the street, talking about the attack in small, quiet groups. The companions could sense the covert attention focused upon them, and Zenna felt particularly exposed here, where eyes could be watching them from any of a hundred hiding places.

"I must be going, to speak to my friends," Annah said.

"Our thanks, again," Dannel said.

"It would seem that I was in the wrong place at the right time," she replied, turning away. Zenna, however, forestalled her.

"Wait, a moment."

"Yes?"

"What happened to Todd Vanderboren?"

The other woman's face clouded for a moment. "We were ambushed in the tunnels under the city. We were sent to investigate reports that band of kuo-toa had come up close to the surface, and were threatening the city. A wizard attacked us... in hindsight, he seemed to be quite knowledgeable about our tactics. He struck us with several lightning bolts before we even knew he was there... Todd was too slow, and was killed. The rest of us barely escaped with his body and our lives."

The companions shared a look, and Annah looked thoughtful. "Do you think there is a connection between this attack and the ambush on us?"

"I don't know what to think anymore," Zenna said. "But I'd watch yourself."

"You as well."

“One last question,” Zenna said. “You said you were ‘sent’. Who hired you, to investigate these tunnels?”

Annah’s expression darkened. “Ike Iverson. The second-in-command at the church of Kelemvor.”

* * * * *

“What interest would the church of Kelemvor have in killing adventurers?” Mole asked a short time later, as the companions made their way down Obsidian Avenue. “Half the town worships there, or at least pays the monthly tithe.”

“Yeah, everybody dies,” Hodge said. “So they be guaranteed business from ever’body, at least once.”

“I don’t know,” Zenna said. “I find myself saying that an awful lot since we got back here, and I don’t like it.”

“The matter bears investigating,” Dannel said. “But first we need to talk to Jenya, and see what she can tell us.”

Darkness had fallen over the city, and the streetlamps were mere pale, flickering orbs that turned the familiar street into a netherworld of shadows and mystery. The curfew that had been placed over the city after the tax riots had been eased, but there were few people on the streets, and the patrols of the Watch shot them hard looks as they passed.

“I think it would be a good idea if we all took quarters together, at least for the moment,” Zenna suggested. “I have a spell that can give warning if someone else tries to break in while we sleep.”

“Bloody hells, let’s just find us a vacant lot and sleep in yer magic house,” Hodge said.

“I could ask around, see if I can find out who wants us dead,” Mole suggested.

“Well, let’s see, shall we?” Zenna said. “There’s the survivors of that slaver operation we broke up. The Last Laugh, though we haven’t heard anything from them for a while. The cultists we defeated in the ruins under the city. The kuo-toa. That demon that almost killed us. Kaurophon. Did I miss anyone?”

“Oh, don’t forget that one of the hags got away,” Mole added helpfully. “Oh, and that beholder we saw, in Kazmojen’s bazaar.”

“Beholder?” Hodge asked.

“Sounds like you all were getting in way over your heads long before I came along,” Dannel said.

“Let’s focus on the current threat, shall we?” Zenna said. “Maybe Jenya will be able to tell us something.” She gestured ahead, where the tall cupola of the church of Helm was just becoming visible around the bend.

The wide front doors of the church were closed, and the lantern that often shone above them as a welcome to worshippers was unlit, leaving the recessed nave of the entry dark. The companions, frequent guests of the clergy of the Vigilant One, turned instead to the narrow gate that led to the courtyard beside the main temple building, and provided access to the low buildings that made up the rest of the complex. A soft light shone through the shutters of the rectory, indicating that at least someone was up and about at this hour.

The gate creaked slightly as they opened it and stepped through, but a moment later a familiar hiss interrupted them—the sound of a sword being drawn.

“Hold it right there, and nobody loses an arm,” came a rough voice behind them.

Chapter 250

“We’re friends, don’t attack,” Zenna said, turning to see who had threatened them.

It was a dwarf, a powerfully built woman clad in a simple robe of soft homespun. The plain garment was that of a religious petitioner, an appearance reinforced by the symbol of Helm stitched in black threads across the chest, but no one would have mistaken this figure for a humble pilgrim. Her arms were corded with muscle, and she held a bastard sword one-handed with the point toward them, and the blade did not quiver in the slightest.

Arun did not flinch at the sword whose point was held a mere two hands from his face. “Adamantine, impressive,” he said, eying the long shaft.

“This ain’t a smithy, and these ain’t working hours,” she said. “What is your business here?”

“We’re here to see Jenya,” Dannel said.

“High Priestess didn’t say anything about no visitors.”

“Look, lady,” Hodge said, sidling forward toward her, until the blade shifted expertly, its point about an inch shy of plunging into his beard. “Um... that is...” His hand tightened around the haft of his axe, and flickers of flame began to appear around its head.

“Hodge!” Dannel said. “We mean no disrespect, madam,” the elf said. “I can assure you, we are long-standing friends of the High Priestess. I can only assume that you are a recent arrival, or you would know who we are.”

“Oh, I know who you are,” the dwarf said, with a wry grin. The sword came up with a snap to lay against her broad shoulder. “Come on then, into the church with you, enough of this damned sneaking around. I’ll go see if the High Priestess is still awake, but if she’d not, damned if you’re not coming back in the morning, no matter how urgent your business is.”

They followed her instructions, even Mole caught short of a snappy comeback by the abrupt nature of the dwarven woman.

* * * * *

“And so we came here,” Dannel concluded, his voice echoing slightly off of the cavernous interior of the temple.

“The woman escaped,” Mole said.

Jenya Urikas paced across the floor in front of the great altar of Helm, her slippers padding silently on the huge blocks of white marble. She wore a troubled expression, and looked tired.

“And the woman was a cleric, you said?”

Zenna nodded. “She wore a skull icon, although I could not see more details.”

Jenya nodded. “Probably Cyric or Vesharoon. Either one introduces a new level of trouble for us, I fear.”

“I think that they were just hired assassins,” Dannel said. “And at least two of them won’t be giving us any more trouble, at least.”

“And the guard took away the bodies?”

“Yes. Though they weren’t much help, otherwise.”

“Stupid,” the dwarven woman—Beorna, she’d been introduced as—spat. She stood behind the High Priestess almost protectively, her arms folded in front of her chest. “If we still had access to them, we might have been able to figure out who sent them. Given how this town’s run, I’d not be surprised if they haven’t already been fed to that damned Watch of theirs.”

“Well, given that we’d just fought a major battle, we figured that picking a fight with the city authorities might be a bit much,” the elf replied dryly.

“And we might have an idea of who sent them,” Zenna said. She quickly summarized what they’d learned from Annah Taskerhill.

“The church of Kelemvor?” Jenya said, ceasing her pacing and sitting down on one of the pews in the front of the church.

“You don’t seem surprised at the suggestion,” Arun said.

“Over the last year, we’ve had... difficulties... with the clergy of the Lord of the Dead.”

“Difficulties?” Dannel asked.

“Embril Aloustinai—the leader of Kelemvor’s church here in Cauldron—“

“I’ve heard of her,” Zenna interrupted. By all reports, she was a mystic theurge like Zenna, one of the rare spellcasters who combined the arcane and divine paths.

Jenya nodded, not disturbed at the interruption, although Beorna frowned. “She’s always been an elusive figure,” the high priestess went on. “But in the last year, the higher ranks of the church have gotten more secretive, while at the same time gaining a larger share of influence over the city government. My sources suggest that Aloustinai is a key figure in the higher circles of power in Cauldron, and that she has the ear of the Lord Mayor.”

“During the crisis last year, with Sarcem’s murder and the theft of the wands of control water, Aloustinai offered nothing in the way of aid, despite the fact that she was then one of the only clerics in the town capable of creating the devices. And since then there’s been a clash between her order and Kristof Jurgenson, prior of the small church of Lathander located near the Hall of the Dead. The Kelemvorites have been constructing a great new spire atop their already-considerable cathedral, and Kristof charged that Aloustinai had deliberately designed her spire to block the rays of the morning sun from the House of the Morninglord.”

Beorna’s scowl deepened. “Sounds pretty petty, if you ask me,” she snorted.

“So what happened?” Mole asked.

“Nothing; Kristof’s tiny congregation lacks both wealth and power, and Aloustinai runs in the noble circles with the powerful. But the whole affair helped confirm the impression of arrogance and heedlessness of the leadership of the church of Kelemvor.”

“Although perhaps,” Dannel said softly, “some are dissatisfied at the increase of their position, as their own power and prestige has suffered... some setbacks recently.”

As his words provoked a momentary silence, Beorna stepped forward with a menacing look. “I don’t think I favor your implication, elf,” she began, her arms coming down to her sides, her hands tightening into fists.

Jenya forstalled her with a firm sweep of her hand. “No, he has the right to speak his mind,” she said. Turning to Dannel, she said, “It is true that there is some history here, and it may be clouding my judgment. But given what you’ve told me, it would be reasonable to seek out more information, and find your own answers.”

“We’d hoped you could assist us in that effort,” Zenna said. “Perhaps a commune...”

Jenya nodded, although it seemed that the gesture was accompanied with some reluctance. “I attempted such a communion with Helm shortly after I rose to this position, and had granted the power needed for such an act. I received little in the way of helpful information...”

“Maybe you did not know the proper questions to ask,” Zenna suggested.

“I will seek again, but I will need time to prepare for the ritual, at least a full day. In the meantime, you should stay here, under the protection of the church. I will have quarters prepared in the acolytes’ quarters in the rectory; goodness knows we’ve not been able to gain new recruits in recent months. ”

“And tomorrow, we’ll go pay a visit to the Temple of Kelemvor,” Arun said.

“From what I hear, Aloustinai has been away from Cauldron for the last tenday,” Jenya said. “But Ike Iverson, her second, should be there. I will send Beorna with you, as my representative.”

The dwarven woman shifted. “High Priestess...”

“I know your concern,” Jenya said. “But I think that this errand may be consistent with your mandate.” The dwarf woman nodded.

“It’s settled, then,” Jenya went on. “Come, I will see to your quarters.”

But Arun forestalled her. “There’s one other matter I wanted to speak to you about, priestess.”

The others turned to face him. “Yes, Arun?” Jenya asked.

Arun turned to Mole, who nodded, withdrawing a long, slender object wrapped in soft cloth from her bag of holding. Arun took the weapon from the gnome and held it out before him. Jenya, curious, drew back the cloth to reveal a weathered hilt—the hilt of the holy bastard sword they’d found on the Plain of Cysts on Occipitus.

“Morgan used this blade,” Arun said, “But he urged us to bring it back with us... he believed that we would have greater need of it than he.”

Jenya took the blade, a bit awkwardly, for it was nearly as tall as she was, and heavy for a sword of its size. The sword slid easily from the fine leather scabbard they’d had made for it in Saradush, revealing a blade that blazed with a pure white radiance.

“It’s... beautiful,” Jenya said.

Arun cleared his throat. “It is a holy sword, priestess. We have the weapons we need, and you have given much to defend this town from shadow... I grant it to you, to use as you see fit.”

Jenya looked surprised, and even Beorna was taken aback, although her eyes remained fixed on the impressive sword. But the dwarf woman finally realized that Jenya had turned to face her, and she lowered her head in deference.

“Templar... I bestow this gift upon you, then, that you might wield it in the service of your mandate.”

Beorna's head came up. "I accept, and swear to wield this blade with honor in the service of the Vigilant One."

Chapter 251

The morning was bright and crisp, with the morning sun already a blazing white ball in a sky of cloudless blue. It looked to be a glorious late summer day, although the occasional breeze coming down off the mountains hinted at the approach of autumn.

The companions, accompanied by Beorna, walked down Obsidian Way around the broad outermost curve of the bowl of the town. Below them to their right the city sloped down in concentric rings to the still waters of the central lake. The lake was visible occasionally in the breaks in the rows of buildings made by the steep alleys that led down to the lower avenues that ran in tighter circles around the interior of the caldera. Ahead their destination was clearly visible beyond similar breaks in the line of buildings. The tall spire of the Temple of Kelemvor was a landmark visible from most sites throughout the town.

Zenna absently adjusted her new bracers, thin silver guards more ornamental than defensive. She hadn't gotten quite used to them, and they chafed where her wrists met her hands. Still, given the power they possessed, she would learn to adjust.

Last night, after Jenya had shown them to the room that they would share, Mole had opened her bag of holding to reveal a surprising collection of magical goodies that she'd pilfered from the bodies of the two slain assassins. Zenna didn't know how she'd managed such a thorough looting in the handful of moments between the battle's end and the arrival of the Watch, who'd taken the bodies of the villains into custody pending their investigation. Her mouth tightened. No doubt that "investigation" would end up in a dusty file folder somewhere, while some politically connected guard officer would be wearing the half-orc assassin's armor and carrying around his magical sword before too long. She wouldn't have been surprised if they even cleaned the bloodstains out of the sorcerer's robe and sold it...

But in the meantime, she and Mole had examined their prizes. They hadn't found anything revealing clues about the assassins' identities or their employers—not that Zenna had expected to find such—but they had been exceptionally well equipped. In addition to a few healing potions, they found matching pairs of rings and amulets with minor protective properties; a pair of gauntlets that enhanced one's strength; the bracers she now wore, which surrounded their wearer with a defensive aura; and finally a cloak that seemed to reinforce the physical presence, the charisma, of its wearer. That morning over breakfast they'd apportioned out the new items among the group. The dwarf templar had been absent from that gathering, although Jenya had stepped in briefly to greet them. They met Beorna again at the main gate, looking impatient to be about their business.

Beorna had changed since their last meeting, clad now in a suit of adamantine full plate fitted to her like a second skin, the symbol of her god featured prominently upon her breastplate. Her new sword was slung across her back, twin to the adamantine blade she'd already carried. Zenna wondered at this woman. She seemed to radiate a devotion to her chosen faith that the tiefling had seen in many of the servants of the Vigilant One she'd known. At the same time, however, there was a sort of somber depth to her, deeper currents that Zenna could not read. As a woman who herself had long kept shields up around her private emotions, Zenna was quick to recognize the same in others.

Beorna walked in the company of the two dwarves, not quite ignoring the others, but not attracting idle conversation from them, either.

"So, axeman," she said to Hodge, as they made their way down the avenue. "Last night... would you truly have lifted that weapon of yours against me?"

Hodge shot her a hard look under shaggy brows; clearly the vulgar miner was taken a bit aback by the woman, and hadn't quite figured out how to deal with her. "I nae be wantin' to kill a woman dwarf..."

Beorna snorted. "Well then, you really are as dumb as you look. A woman'll slide steel into your intestines as fast as any man, faster if you're too mooney-eyed to notice she's carrying a blade."

"I don' raise me axe unless I be meanin' to use it," Hodge said, trying to recoup something from the exchange. "An' you or anyone else give me reason, then they get a taste o' the blade." He lifted the heavy axe, and its head burst into flame.

"Strong words," she said. "A potent weapon, to make one wonder at the steel of the man who bears it." She gave him an appraising look that caused him to flush at her scrutiny. "Tis a pity that you have not mastered the art of bathing. As for the rest, we shall see."

She turned her gaze toward Arun, who'd feigned disinterest in the conversation. "And what of Golden Boy?" she asked, speaking to Hodge, although her voice had been pitched to carry clearly. "I was not aware that they were now accepting beardless youths into the Order of the Hammer." Though her words were biting, her tone was light, and she'd looked at Arun differently since the exchange with the holy sword the previous night.

Arun's look was hard, but he did not reply.

"Cat got your tongue, boy?" she said, with a broad grin that seemed slightly salacious.

"Arun's slain giants, demons, and even a few dragons," Mole said, piping into the conversation.

"Oh?" Beorna responded, with a raised eyebrow. "An impressive list." Chuckling as if remembering some private joke, she turned her attention back ahead to the road.

"And what of yourself, Templar?" Zenna asked. "What great deeds should we know of from your résumé, if we are to accept you into our company?"

Beorna did not turn nor shift her stride, and for a moment Zenna thought she was ignoring her. But then the dwarven woman said, "I walk the path of Justice," she said. "That is all you need know of me."

Dannel glanced over at her and shrugged, as if to say, Not so different from all the other Helmites we've known, is she?

A commotion in the crowd drew her attention to the left side of the street. They were nearing one of the massive gates in the city wall, one of four that each gave onto a narrow road that wound its way down the side of the volcano, each heading in a different direction into the surrounding lands.

There was a definite motion in the group of people moving along the street, away from the direction of the gates. And a moment later, she realized why.

There was a massive creature standing there, coming forward toward them. He—assuming it was a he—stood easily nine feet tall, with muscles corded like tree trunks. He was humanoid in form, but his face was unlike anything that could even be remotely called human; the shape of his features were clearly draconic, and a pair of massive horns with a slight curve jutted from the sides of his head. Instead of scales, black fur covered his exposed skin, creating an odd juxtaposition that hinted at a mixed racial ancestry. He was clad in a shirt of chain links pulled tight over the vast spread of his chest, and he carried a length of chain that trailed a huge, spiked ball that scratched noisily on the cobbles in his wake.

Zenna's first thought was to wonder how this... thing had gotten through the gates of the town unhindered by the guards.

Her second thought was that it was coming straight toward them.

There was a slight stir of activity as the companions readied themselves for a confrontation. The monstrous stranger came forward until he stood before them, dominating the street about twenty paces distant.

"Of course, the one time we need the Watch around, they're nowhere to be found," Dannel said dryly.

"This smacks of a set-up," Zenna returned quietly, and the elf nodded.

Mole, never one to pass up the opportunity to look trouble in the eye—although she barely came up to its knee in this case—stepped forward, but before she could utter a no-doubt creative and provocative greeting, Beorna had eclipsed her.

"Ho now, what's this?" the dwarf said. "I don't know who or what you are, ugly, but you'd best be moving along." She rapped the shoulder plate of her armor with the blade of her sword, and then gestured with it down the street.

The giant beast peered at them intently. When it spoke, its voice was a bellow that rebounded off the fronts of the buildings that faced the street.

"Did you kill the dragon-father?"

Hodge's face was limned in the red glow of the flames that engulfed the head of his axe. "Well now, that's a tough one... we've killed a fair num'er o' drakes, it true... could yer be a bit more specific, now?"

Zenna bit back a curse. She glanced at Beorna, but the dwarven priestess wasn't even bothering to hide her mirth at Hodge's comment. Dwarves! She stepped forward quickly, lamenting the lack of anyone in her group who possessed any skill at diplomacy whatsoever.

"Careful, Zenna!" Dannel whispered, but he didn't otherwise act to hinder her. Well, that was something at least, but as she looked up at the giant hulk looming over them, a part of her wished that he'd made an effort to stop her.

"We seek no trouble with you, mighty one," she said, raising her hands to show that they were empty, drawing the monstrous warrior's attention to her. As she did, she twisted her hands subtly in the gestures that triggered one of her spells. "We respect your power," she went on, bowing her head, her cowl concealing her face momentarily as she quietly uttered the arcane incantation that summoned the magic. "What is your name, great warrior?"

The dragon-kin looked at her with suspicion, the links of his huge spiked chain rattling slightly with the movements of his fists. "I am Zarik Dhor," he said, his chest swelling with pride. "Dhorlot the Black was my father."

Currents of power flowed out from her into him, carrying a powerful enchantment designed to snare his mind and bind him to her. But as the spell took hold, it slid from a will that to Zenna felt like a solid wall, fashioned of granite blocks. She drove at the wall, abandoning subtlety, but each mental thrust simply glided from the considerable discipline of his mind.

But she got a reaction. The dragon-man's eyes widened as he realized that he was under attack, and with a mighty roar he leapt forward with surprising quickness, the chain snapping forward with blinding speed. There was no time for Zenna to duck or dodge, and the heavy iron sphere at the end of the chain slammed into her with colossal force, knocking her roughly backward to land hard on the smooth stone cobbles of the street.

Chapter 252

True to form, the companions found themselves confronted with another dire foe out for their blood.

But this time, the setting was a very public one, smack dab in the middle of one of Cauldron's busier streets. Nearby townsfolk screamed and scattered, leaving the six adventurers to face the rage of the half-dragon, half-minotaur warrior named Zarik Dhor alone.

The huge warrior was an imposing adversary, but the companions had faced down tougher foes, and been thrust into deadlier confrontations and survived. Even as Zenna went down, and Dhor whipped his lethal chain up around his head in a rushing arc, the dwarves rushed to attack. Beorna lifted her sword and called upon the power of Helm, invoking her patron's divine favor to guide her strokes in the melee. Arun and Hodge didn't bother with such niceties, leaping forward to directly assail the huge monster. The chain, however, gave it an incredible reach, and before they could close to striking range it swept the weapon down into both of them. Hodge grunted and staggered as the heavy ball clipped his shoulder, and Arun took an equally devastating hit a few seconds later as it clanged into his shield with enough force to dent the magically reinforced steel.

But the dwarves were made of stern stuff, and they pressed their attack. Hodge thrust his spear at Dhor's chest, but underneath the chain links of his armor the draconic minotaur was possessed of an incredibly thick hide, combining the gifts of both sides of his ancestry. The thrust had no apparent effect.

Arun darted in and slashed with his holy blade at one of Dhor's muscular thighs. His chain armor did not reach so low, but even so the paladin's powerful stroke only barely injured the giant warrior, drawing a shallow gash across the limb. Dhor held his ground, altering the swirling circle forged by his spiked chain to bring the heavy head to bear at the enemy at his feet.

Mole darted in to Zenna's side. "Are you all right?" she asked, as the tiefling slowly pulled herself up, clutching at her wounded chest.

"I will be," she said, forcing the words out through clenched teeth. "Go, help them!" she urged her friend, staggering back out of the range of the melee and the long reach of that spiked chain. Dannel watched her with concern, but thankfully he did not rush in to aid her; better by far that he continued doing what he was doing, in this case firing arrow after arrow in a rapid blur into the hulking form of Zarik Dhor. Zenna thought she heard the stirrings of a melody as she neared the elf, the twanging of his bowstring a musical sound followed by the siren song of each arrow as it sliced through the air toward its target.

Shaking her head to clear it of such fancies, she turned and summoned the words of one of her spells through the pain that still knifed insistently through her battered body. There would be time for healing later; right now they had to deal with the threat.

And Zarik Dhor seemed indefatigable, a deadly foe that continued to lay about him with powerful swings of his chain. Hodge rushed in with his axe raised to deliver a strong blow to the half-dragon's side, but the heavy ball came crashing down, and the dwarf folded, struck with a critical hit that sent him to the ground. Seeing his friend struck down, Arun lunged with his sword, this time aiming for the thick mass of the huge warrior's torso. But again Dhor demonstrated his blinding speed, and the chain came down in a deadly sequence of blows, the warrior snapping the chain in a vigorous action that sent the ball pounding down repeatedly into the paladin. The first blow came in low, tangling Arun's legs in the chain and flinging him roughly onto his back. Then, before he could recover, Dhor snapped the spiked ball back down, slamming it into Arun's body with incredible force. There seemed to be no way that even Arun could absorb such punishment, but still Dhor attacked again, twisting his wrists and whirling the chain around once more, driving the iron head down toward the paladin's head.

Somehow, the battered dwarf found the breath and the energy to roll out of the way, and the chain slammed into the cobbles scant inches behind him, crushing several paving stones into rubble.

Beorna's yell announced her arrival to the fray, the sunlight gleaming dully on the long length of her adamantine sword. But Dhor had still more surprises, and as she charged he swept out his chain in a wide arc that skittered across the cobblestones. The armored dwarf was unable to evade the chain as it snaked around her ankles, and as Dhor drew his weapon up with a rough jerk she joined Arun, falling facedown on the street.

Zenna focused her mind through the pain, and drew upon the energies of a spell. Her scorching ray extended in a twisting blast of fire that arced over the battlefield into the upper body of the draconic warrior. Tough as he was, he appeared to lack any particular resistance to fire. Zenna, lost in the depths of her concentration, drew deeper upon her reservoir of energy, and through the sheer force of her will maintained the spell, launching a second ray of flame into him. She'd never managed two blasts from the same spell before, and exulted in her power as the second ray of flame drew a black line across Dhor's muscled body.

But even though she was out of the reach of the spiked chain, Dhor had another surprise in store. The half-dragon opened his great jaws wide, and as Zenna's eyes widened in realization, he unleashed a great gout of acid that shot unerringly toward her.

Chapter 253

Zenna hurled herself aside, but even as she moved, her cloak billowing out behind her, she felt the first fat globules of acid impact her side, followed instantly by a burning sizzle of hot pain. The magic of her cloak had helped her avoid the full force of the blast, but that was of little consolation at the moment as Dhor's acid tore mercilessly through the sleeve of her tunic and seared the white flesh beneath. Big yellow drops had landed on her side, each a white-hot point of fire as they wrought their deadly work. Her lungs were seared as she drew in the poisonous vapors from the acid, and mercifully the pain eased as she fell into unconsciousness.

Dannel was quick to rush to her aid, but at the moment the entire group appeared to be in quite dire straits. Hodge was out of the fight, and both Arun and Beorna were down, while the wounds that Dhor had suffered seemed puny, and appeared to have slowed the massive warrior little as he whirled the chain in a great circle above his head.

"All you die!" he roared, and it seemed that the very walls of the buildings on Obsidian Avenue shook with his pronouncement.

"Not so fast," Beorna said, pulling herself up, her armor clanking slightly at her movements.

"Aaaarrgh!" Dhor screamed, whipping his chain about his head once more, driving it to an almost insane velocity, before swinging it down at Beorna.

The dwarf woman made no move to avoid the blow. It slammed into her with colossal force, sounding a loud ringing noise as iron hit adamantine.

Beorna was unmoved.

“That the best you got, ugly?” she shouted, lifting her sword and running forward. To her right, Arun was getting back up as well; his movements drew Dhor’s attention and the chain swept around again, slamming into his body, driving him back down to his knees. The paladin had taken three solid hits now, and even with his incredible fortitude it was clear that he could not take another.

But he got up.

A nimble form tumbled into the deadly radius of the spiked chain, approaching Dhor from behind. Mole had circled around the melee, moving at the fast pace augmented by her boots, and now she somersaulted forward, coming up into a springing leap that carried her up onto Dhor’s back. Her rapier drove unerringly into her chosen spot, sinking in and out of the warrior’s torso so quickly that at first it looked as though she’d missed. By the way that the half-dragon reared up and roared in pain, however, it was quickly clear that she’d accomplished her objective.

Beorna laid into Dhor with a mighty two-handed stroke of her sword. The holy blade tore through mail links and leathery hide as though neither were there, savaging the organs beneath. Red blood and garish entrails showed through the three-foot gash in the giant warrior’s belly, and he staggered back, droplets of blood now flecking the space before his jaws as he drew in labored breaths.

But the half-dragon, driven on by his rage, did not go down. He lifted the spiked chain again, seeking to drive it into his foes without finesse, now, crushing them through brute strength.

An arrow slammed into his chest, followed within four heartbeats by another. Dannel having healed Zenna with his bardic powers, bringing her back to the edge of consciousness, had resumed his barrage.

Zarik Dhor began to feel the cold hand of death tighten around him. His wounds were dire, and he could feel the blood pumping out of his body through the red haze of his rage. He felt that he was already dead, only his hatred and passion for revenge keeping him standing now, and that was already bleeding out of him along with the substance of his life. But before he would go, he would take at least one of these enemies, the slayers of Dhorlot, with him.

Looking down, fighting to focus his eyes through the blood and the fog that had descended upon his vision, he searched for the one that had been described to him, the dwarven knight with the silvery armor and the sword of light.

He saw him just as the sword was thrust to the hilt into his body.

Chapter 254

Beorna looked down at the carcass of Zarik Dhor. Blood and grime slaked the dark surface of her mail, and sweat damped her thick hair down against her scalp. "Tis a shame," she said. "He was a worthy adversary."

"He damn blasted pounded us all into next week!" Hodge said, spitting loudly as Arun helped him up. "I kin stand," he said, though his spittle left a red spot on the cobbles, and he seemed more than a bit unsteady as he bent to recover his axe. "Me head still feels like a bunch o' gnomes are 'avin' a party in there," he grumbled.

"I don't think that this fellow's appearance was a mere coincidence," Dannel said.

"Well, he does look kinda like that black dragon we killed in Bhal-Hamatugn," Mole said, looking up from where she was giving the corpse a good looting.

A number of people had reappeared on the street, and were casting cautious but curious looks at the slain warrior. Zenna looked down the street. "I think that a patrol of the Watch is coming," she said.

"Convenient timing, as always," Dannel said with disgust.

The patrol was led by a familiar face, a sergeant named Skylar Krewis who they'd helped escape a riot in front of the town hall a few months back. Surrounded with a motley band of hard-eyed mercenaries that in some cases seemed more orc than human, it was reassuring to see him at least nominally in charge.

"Why am I not surprised to see the lot of you in the middle of trouble again?" Krewis said, as he caught sight of them.

"If the lot of you were doing your jobs properly, this brute would've never gotten into the city," Beorna said.

A few of the half-orcs muttered darkly, but the sergeant kept a grip on his temper. "Times are difficult for all of us, priestess," he told her. Turning back to the others, he said, "Now, who would like to tell me what happened here?"

Dannel served as spokesman, delivering a summary of their encounter with Zarik Dhor. A few locals had appeared, corroborating his account for the most part. In the meantime the half-orcs gathered around the body, exchanging crass comments amongst themselves and generally ignoring the proceedings.

In the end there was no reason to hold them, so after sending a townsman to fetch a heavy cart to carry off the corpse, Krewis bid them go. "Be careful," he told them. "Trouble seems to follow in your wake."

"We're getting used to it," Arun replied. The companions moved off, Mole's attention focused on her bag of holding, where she'd tucked her latest finds.

“He had a lot of money on him,” she reported once they’d moved off a short distance from the guards. “Gold coins, Calimshite mint, most still pretty shiny.”

“A payoff?” Arun asked.

“Perhaps,” Dannel replied. “It seems he had his own reasons for wanting us dead, but it does stretch the bounds of coincidence that he’d just appear like that.”

“But no one knew that we would be there this morning, except the priests at the temple,” Zenna noted.

“None of them would aid one such as that,” Beorna said.

“I’m not suggesting they did,” Zenna said. “But it’s clear that whoever our foes are, they have the ability to track our movements.”

“Well then, let’s be about our business,” Beorna replied. “We still have some answers to get from this Ike character.”

Zenna shook her head. “We’re too battered; Hodge and Arun are still seriously hurt, and you took a good pounding as well, priestess. We should withdraw, and restore our strength before pressing ahead with our mission.”

Beorna snorted. “Bah, that tussle was barely a warm-up.” She turned to the dwarves with a critical eye. “You boys can’t take much punishment, eh? Come on, Beorna’ll make it all better, and maybe we can actually get something done here, rather than waiting for the next bad guy to show up and try to kill the lot of you.”

“We can press on,” Arun said. “Only a fool would head into a dangerous situation injured, but we have healing magic of our own.”

“We just replenished our wands and stock of potions,” Zenna insisted. “We should not waste them needlessly.”

“Just stay back and let us dwarves handle any problems, seer,” Beorna said to her. “Clearly your approach to... ‘negotiation’ could use a bit of polish, eh?”

As opposed to rushing in and hacking everything to bits, and getting stomped in the process! Zenna thought, but she held her tongue. Instead she replied, “As you wish, then. I will do what I can, but do not complain if you find ourselves depleted in the next encounter.”

“Bah, those Kelemvites are no warriors,” Beorna said. “If they offer any trouble, we’ll be able to handle it.”

Those would be fateful words, as it turned out.

Chapter 255

For all her earlier protests, Zenna dug deeply into her reservoir of power to treat the injuries they'd suffered in their brief but violent confrontation with Zarik Dhor. She also expended a good half-dozen charges from her recently recharged wand of cure moderate wounds. At this point, we're going to qualify for a bulk discount, she thought grimly. At least Beorna could heal herself.

When she'd gotten to Hodge, she'd been surprised to find the dwarf in better shape than she'd expected. It turned out that the dwarf had made an investment of his own in Saradush: an iron flask nearly a quart in size, which the enterprising miner had filled to the brim with cure light wounds potions. Or at least mostly with potions; Zenna thought she smelled something else from the flask. But while there might be something vaguely sacrilegious in the idea of cutting healing potions with strong whiskey, as long as the dwarf's concoction worked, preserving her own limited supply of healing, she was willing to accept it. And if the dwarf's steps were a bit more unsteady after his "treatment," at least he wasn't going to bleed to death.

Thus fortified, the companions continued their way down Obsidian Avenue toward their destination.

Up close, the Church of Kelemvor was even more impressive than it had been from a distance. The structure was fashioned of gray volcanic stone, but there were no obvious seams in the stone, and the overall shape of the building had too many curves to be entirely natural. Atop the great dome of the first level—itsself a good fifty feet in height—rose the tall cylinder that culminated in the great, slender spire that formed a point that was the highest spot in Cauldron.

Magic, Zenna thought.

"No honest hands made that," Arun confirmed, a moment later.

"Let us be about this then," Beorna said, starting toward the great double doors, each fifteen feet high and six feet across, that fronted the street. Zenna felt a strong feeling of unease as they approached the temple; in all the place was too quiet for even a weekday morning, the grounds around the temple sterile and empty, although the gardens that fronted the structure on its north side were pristine and meticulously trimmed. But it was as if the building emitted an invisible aura that kept the townsfolk at bay. Even the avenue in the general area was virtually unpopulated, with just a handful of pedestrians and a single horse-drawn cart visible nearby.

Beorna reached the double doors and pushed; the heavy door swung open easily at her pressure. With a half-glance to ensure that the others were following, she headed inside.

For all their travels and diverse experiences, the interior of the temple gave them pause. The place was huge. This single chamber, the central nave of the great cathedral where worshippers gathered to offer their prayers to the Eternal Judger, seemed to encompass the entire radius of the great cylinder that made up the bulk of the temple structure. The chamber seemed architecturally impossible, a dome over a hundred feet across, with the great spire atop its apex rising above even its considerable height. A narrow metal staircase curved up along the wall to their right, offering an apparent access to that spire and whatever chambers lay above.

The place could have accommodated hundreds of worshippers without difficulty, but the place was uncannily silent. Their footsteps sounded eerily loud on the marble floor, the center of which was designed into a massive mosaic depicting the scales of Kelemvor that was nearly sixty feet across. Tall windows of colored glass set high in the walls around the perimeter of the dome filled the center of the room with glorious light, drawing the eye to that design. Below the windows the walls had been covered with cloth hangings dyed in soft, unobtrusive colors, pale whites and grays that seemed to enfold and reassure. In the shadows along the edges of the room dozens of wooden pews had been pushed back to the walls, leaving the center of the chamber unobstructed. A set of double doors easily twenty feet across—it seemed nothing was of small scale in this place—was visible in the far wall, standing open to reveal a raised dais with an grand altar of some sort upon its surface.

The companions could not help but gape a bit as they looked about the place. Even the Moontower in Iriaebor could not compete with the quiet majesty of this temple, Zenna thought, and she could feel the constant thrum of power that seemed to reside in the very stones of the structure.

Beorna seemed less impressed, and was already walking out into the room when Dannel stopped her with a warning.

“Someone’s there,” Dannel said, drawing their attention back to the open doors and the dais beyond.

They all saw him as he stepped into the light, a tall human clad in a robe that did not fully conceal the hard lines of armor underneath. He had a sour look to him, as though everything he looked upon evoked disfavor.

“We’ve been expecting you,” he said, his nasal, pinched voice nonetheless filling the vast interior of the temple. Behind him, other figures appeared at the doors, armed men who resolved into grim-faced half-orc warriors, clad in full plate with shields and huge waraxes. They spread out before the priest, eight in all.

“Seems you can’t turn around in this town without tripping over an orc,” Beorna said, calmly drawing her sword.

“Priest of Kelemvor!” Dannel said. “We do not come seeking violence... we wish only to speak with Ike Iverson, on behalf of Jenya Urikas of Helm...”

But he never got a chance to finish, for two other forms appeared in the sanctuary behind the altar stone. They filled the doorway behind the cleric, and even though the doorway was ten feet tall, they had to duck as they stepped through.

“Stone giants!” Hodge exclaimed.

“Don’t do this!” Dannel shouted, but the intent of the others was clear even before the giants lifted their arms and hurled boulders at the companions.

Chapter 256

Although they had not come seeking a fight, the companions found one nonetheless as the great domed cathedral of Kelemvor exploded into the chaos of battle.

The boulders thrown by the giants hurtled into the companions like balls fired at a line of waiting tenpins. One narrowly missed Beorna, who had calmly lowered the tip of her blade to the marble floor, sinking to one knee as she pressed her forehead against the crossguard. The boulder caromed off of the ground and nearly took Hodge’s head off, the dwarf’s curses resounding loudly in the chamber as the miner-turned-warrior fumbled with his spear.

The second boulder struck Dannel in the hip, the glancing impact still enough to knock the elf backward, spinning full around before he was able to stabilize. Gritting his teeth against the pain, the Harper arcane archer said, “So be it,” and lifted his bow, opening his mind to the song of power that bound him to the weapon, and the long shafts that carried death to his enemies.

The half-orcs rushed forward, moving together like veterans, their ferocious cries of battle filling the cathedral more strongly than any choral hymn could have done. That song was a melody of violence, and the half-man, half-orc brutes slavered at the anticipation of it, the clash of blades and the screams of pain that were part and parcel of the dirge of war.

That song was interrupted briefly by a roar of flame as Zenna hurled a fireball into their midst, the brilliant orange burst engulfing the giants, the cleric, and most of the warriors. When the flames had faded none of them had gone down, but all sported burns, many of which were serious.

“Destroy the wizard!” the cleric commanded the giants, followed by the mystic words that invoked a divine spell. But even as his protective ward settled about him, the robed priest staggered back as an arrow slammed deep into his shoulder. He barely managed to lift his shield to deflect the second shot from Dannel’s bow. The giants each withdrew a second boulder from the huge sacks slung across their hips, and lifting them in both hands hurled them at Zenna. The tiefling did not have time to cast another spell or dodge, and both boulders struck her. Fortunately both hits were just glancing impacts, one grazing her left shoulder, and the other smashing her leg, but the impacts were still devastating, and she was knocked roughly prone.

Their damage done, the giants lifted their clubs and followed in the wake of the half-orc warriors.

Arun and Hodge moved forward to intercept the charge of the half-orc veterans. Hodge set his spear, and looked over his shoulder at Beorna, who had not moved from her position of devotion. “Yer want to join the battle or not, woman!” he yelled, but he then had to turn his attention to the enemy as the half-orcs rushed into them. The lead warrior tried to turn aside the point of Hodge's spear with his shield, but the canny dwarf eased the spearhead under the half-orc's guard, the warrior's own momentum driving him against the enchanted steel. The half-orc screamed in pain, but Hodge had to drop the weapon and unlimber his axe as another pair of warriors leapt in and attacked him, forcing him back before the ferocity of their assault. Fortunately his new heavy armor protected him from the worst of the initial attacks, although one blow managed to crush his left wrist painfully even through the protective bracer he wore.

Just a few paces away, guarding his friend's flank, Arun met several other warriors. The dwarf took the first stroke from a waraxe on his shield, but even as the second glanced off the edge of the barrier, striking his breastplate, the third was moving to flank him, abandoning his charge to gain the advantage of position.

Zenna pulled herself painfully to her feet in time to see the last pair of warriors moving around the flank of the bulwark formed by Hodge and Arun. Seeing a relatively soft target in front of them, one gestured to his fellow, and both ignored Beorna to come running at her.

Swallowing back her fear, she waited until they were nearly on top of her, before unleashing a color spray. For a moment she feared that they would resist the spell overcoming her with their axes before she could escape... but then the blazing lights faded enough for her to see both warriors, stunned by the blast.

But the respite would only be momentary, she knew, already retreating to give her more room.

Mole had been darting to help Arun and Hodge, but when she saw Zenna threatened she changed her course to aid her friend. Knowing Zenna's tactics, she recognized her preparations and waited for the color spray to temporarily incapacitate her enemies before she rushed in. The stunned half-orc could not defend himself as she slid her rapier into his body through a tiny gap in his armor. The brute groaned as blood fountained out of the deep thrust, but as his head cleared he turned on her, his ferocious expression promising revenge for the injury. His fellow recovered a moment later, and took a step after Zenna, before his attention was drawn by a sudden movement to his left.

That movement came from Beorna. Lost in the devotions to her god, she now drew upon the power of Helm to aid her. First, she began to grow, her body expanding under the familiar effects of an enlarge person spell. Then, even as she reached a height of ten feet, looming over even the considerable bulk of the half-orcs, she drew the divine power of her patron into her. For a moment she seemed to glow, the bright light of Helm shining about her.

She moved straight forward, toward the embattled dwarves and the warriors facing them, and behind them, the approaching giants.

Hodge and Arun laid about them with their weapons, returning the assaults of the mercenaries with deadly force. Hodge delivered a crushing blow with his flaming axe that drove one of his enemies back two steps, but the half-orcs were as heavily armored as the two dwarves, and appeared to be possessed of an equal stamina. Arun seemed intent on countering with a sheer volume of attacks, his holy sword slashing about him as though it was a light dagger, and while the half-orcs tried to deflect those strokes with their shields, the paladin seemed to find the smallest gaps in their defenses more often than not.

Both dwarves fought with bravery and tenacity, but outnumbered six to two, it seemed as though even that might not be enough.

The cleric, meanwhile, was finding it difficult to conjure up his spells. Every time he launched into a new incantation, arrows struck, punching through his heavy armor as if it were cheap leather. He'd managed a potent curative that had eased the burning pains from the fireball, but as another arrow sank into his thigh, he began to fear that this confrontation might prove disastrous.

Darting back into the shelter of the doorway, he pulled a scroll from his pouch and began to read.

Pursued by one of the half-orcs, Zenna was quickly running out of room to retreat. But she was not lacking for options, conjuring up a spell that struck just as the half-orc was lifting his axe to cut her down. The hold took effect, freezing him with a ferocious look on his face that was belied by the fear that suddenly shone in his eyes as she calmly stepped forward, sparks already starting to dance around her outstretched hand.

Mole, meanwhile, found herself outmatched by her foe. Rolling with a cut from his axe that she wasn't quite fast enough to dodge, she shifted from an attack posture—her rapier wasn't likely to hurt him much, now that the advantage of surprise was lost—and started a twisting, tumbling defense. The half-orc swung at her again, narrowly missing, and a counter a few moments later came nowhere near her as she tumbled around him in a tight loop, feinting with her rapier in attacks designed to confound rather than to harm.

Buying her time.

Beorna arrived at the line of battle at the same time as the giants, the three huge foes standing over the melee between the other two dwarves and the half-orcs, the latter groups like children in contrast to the titans behind. The giants lashed at her with their clubs. The templar dodged the first stroke, but the second landed heavily on her arm, drawing a grunt of pain from her.

Then she lifted her sword, and returned the favor. Her blade came crashing down onto the first giant's chest, slicing through the thick, oily hides he wore easily, digging a deep furrow in his torso. Even as the giant staggered, blood pouring from the violent wound, she shifted from her backswing and stepped in again, driving the length of the blade into the giant's body, sliding it into the narrow gap between two of his ribs. The giant gurgled in pain and fell backward... and collapsed onto the polished marble, pouring out the last of its life through the two huge holes in its body.

For a moment, the intensity of the melee eased, as both sides sensed that the battle had taken a decisive turn. But the half-orcs continued to press the assault even in the face of this deadly new adversary, redoubling their efforts to cut through the armor of the dwarven defenders.

Arun took hits that drew blood even through his magical armor, but the only result seemed to be to drive the paladin into a greater fury of battle. He sliced out with his sword, cutting under a half-orc's helm to sever the throat beneath, and even as the warrior fell he continued his swing into the next one, crushing his side in a blaze of holy light that drove him back, whimpering. Hodge, too, finally took down one of his enemies, his flaming axe sundering his breastplate and smiting him down to the ground.

"Stand still!" Mole's opponent growled in frustration, as the gnome nimbly avoided another attack. The half-orc was a skilled combatant, though, and he adjusted, stepping to the side just as Mole tumbled into reach. Lifting his axe to strike, he suddenly staggered, turning to reveal a long arrow stuck deep into his back. A moment later a second shaft hit, burying itself in the half-orc's throat, and the warrior crumpled. Mole saluted Dannel, and after a quick look to confirm that Zenna's adversary was down, leapt into a somersault that carried her quickly toward the rapidly-diminishing line of foes facing the dwarves.

The half-orcs had been paid well, but never had they faced a trio of foes like this. Hodge was hurting now, his breath coming in gasps as blood trickled out from the gaps in his armor where half-orc axes had struck. But as Beorna dispatched the second giant much as she had the first, and turned her attentions to the remaining warriors, their heart for the fight evaporated. The survivors drew back, another falling as Arun's blade crushed armor plate, and finally turned to all-out flight.

Meanwhile, the cleric emerged from his position of cover, his wounds mostly healed, now surrounded by a shifting field of mirror images. He'd readied a dispel to remove the enchantments boosting Beorna, but as he saw his second giant go down, and his hired warriors fleeing, he abandoned that tactic. Instead, he started running toward the stairs.

"Escaping cleric!" Mole shouted.

"I see him," Dannel said, lifting his bow and taking aim.

Chapter 257

"That cleric really wanted to get up those stairs," Mole observed, tugging another pair of iron-studded gauntlets from one of the dead warriors. The two dead giants had proved disappointing for treasure, but the warriors had glowed brightly to Zenna's detect magic spell, a veritable treasure trove of magical goodies.

"I wouldn't be surprised if he has friends up there," Dannel commented, reloading his quiver from the spare he kept in his pack. The cleric had headed up the stairs with single-minded determination, and had nearly gotten to the door on the landing thirty feet above the floor; fortunately for them his heavy armor had slowed him enough for the ranged attacks from those below—primarily Dannel's arrows—to bring him down.

"Then that is where we shall go," Beorna said, already moving toward the stairs, her boots thumping loudly on the marble floor, blood from the bodies scattered in the center of the room leaving a red splat with each step. Still enlarged, she made an impressive sight.

“Wait!” Zenna said, resisting the urge to add you fool! “We’ve taken a beating, and we need to heal and recover.”

“Evil does not wait for the hand of justice to descend,” she said, but she paused at the foot of the stairs. “Any foes up there have no doubt heard the sounds of the fray. Already the High Priest is likely preparing for our arrival, and our delay only strengthens his hand.”

“Iverson’s not the High Priest,” Zenna said absently, but she was already focused on helping her injured friends, and herself. She saw Hodge take out his jug and quickly walked over to him. “Let me,” she said, and she laid a hand upon him, drawing upon a potent healing spell. She’d initially reserved that slot for a discern lies spell for their interview with Iverson, but from this encounter the intentions of the church of Kelemvor were now clear.

“It still makes no sense,” Dannel said, sliding his own healing wand back into its pouch after treating his own injuries. “Why would the most powerful and prestigious church in Cauldron do this, hire assassins to kill us?”

“Church o’ death,” Hodge said, as if that explained it. The dwarf sucked in a breath as Zenna’s cure critical wounds flowed through him with the shock of a glacial pool, closing his multiple wounds and driving the pain and weakness of his injuries from him. “Aye, that’s the stuff!” he said, favoring Zenna with a broad smile. That didn’t stop him from taking a covert swig from his “jug o’ healin’,” though, Zenna observed when he thought she wasn’t looking.

“The Kelemvorites are not evil,” Zenna said. “They take their duties as guides in the transitions between worlds seriously, but while they venerate death, they hate those who practice it without discernment.”

“Well, these are clearly evil,” Arun said, walking to join Beorna. She greeted him with a faint nod.

“You fought well, Forger-knight,” she said simply.

“And you, warrior-maiden of the Hand,” he replied.

She raised an eyebrow at the appellation, but did not reply, instead turning toward the stairs. They creaked a bit under the weight of her enlarged form, but they held.

Zenna looked down at Mole. “Here we go again.” The gnome’s only response was a grin, and the speed with which she dashed after the others, still tucking loose items she’d collected into her bag, testified to her eagerness to see what dangers lay ahead.

With a sigh, Zenna threw up her hands and followed. Given enough time, she could have used her powers of clairvoyance to scan the interior of the spire above and see what, if anything, awaited them there, but as it was the impatience of her companions would not allow for such cautious—and reasonable—tactics. She only hoped that their haste would not get them killed.

Well, she wasn't going to be a target again. Pausing to summon a spell, she felt a sudden backlash of power that caused her to miss a step, and nearly fall before she regained her balance.

"What is it?" Dannel asked.

"Be warned, this entire place is protected with a ward," she said. "It appears that no invisibility magic will function in here."

The elf shrugged. "Well, it's not like we're going to be surprising anyone anyway, not with them," he said, gesturing toward the dwarves who were nearly at the top of the stairs.

True enough, Zenna thought, but she still didn't like it as they hurried to catch up to the others.

The door at the top of the stairs led to small chambers that looked like personal quarters for the higher-ranking clergy of the temple. On seeing that they were empty, the companions gave them a cursory look—in Mole's case, "cursory" involving the transfer a several items to her bag of holding—before continuing up a second stair that continued up into the spire above the temple fane.

As they made their way up the narrow steps, Beorna's hulking form blocking the view ahead, Zenna felt a cold chill creep up over her. She looked up at Arun, and saw that he was affected by it, as well.

"There is a deep taint here," the paladin said.

Zenna cast a spell, conjuring a potent protective aura around her that extended to those nearest on the stair. "If you can, stay close to me," she said. "My spell will provide some protection against evil."

Several of the others cast spells as well. Beorna laid several protective wards upon herself, then turned and touched Arun, adding some protection to him as well. Thus fortified, they pressed on.

"Do you smell that?" Mole asked softly. Zenna took a deep sniff, and regretted it as the stench of rot filled her nostrils. She fought the urge to gag.

"Undead," Dannel said.

"The followers of Kelemvor abhor the undead," Zenna said, but her words were not convincing even to herself. It was obvious to all of them that a deep evil had taken root in this place, and while none of them—well, none except for Beorna, Arun, and probably Mole—were eager to proceed, they swallowed their fears and pressed on.

Finally the stairs opened onto a chamber ahead; they had to be inside the spire now, a good sixty feet or more above the level of the street below. The interior of the spire was a single great hollow chamber, rising nearly a hundred feet above them. Other than a small, low platform in the center of the floor, the chamber was empty of either furniture or decoration. The place was mostly dark, with only a few tiny slits providing illumination. But Dannel's and Mole's sensitive eyes adjusted quickly, allowing them to see what the others, with their darkvision, had already detected.

The room was occupied. Five hulking forms stood arrayed around the central dais; giants, Zenna thought, until one turned and she saw that its features were bestial, its face dominated by a set of huge jaws. Then she realized that the sickly waft of decay came from them, and as she saw them shift awkwardly she realized what they were. Zombies, among the least of the undead, but these were huge and no doubt far more dangerous than their man-sized equivalents.

But then she saw the two forms atop the dais, and realized that there were far greater threats here, waiting for them. One was a vague outline of darkness that hovered a foot above the smooth surface of the platform, an undead wraith, a creature of shadow whose very touch was death. The second Zenna recognized instantly as a fiend, although she could not identify the exact species. It was a bony creature that at first glance appeared to be a skeleton, a gaunt thing vaguely humanoid in form, but with an oversized, distended skull, and a long tail that jutted up over its back and above its head, tipped with a wicked stinger that was no doubt infused with some deadly venom.

There was no sign of Ike Iverson, but Zenna had a feeling that the cleric had to be around somewhere. She looked up into the shadowy heights above them, but the top of the spire was a jumble of struts and structural supports, a tangled jumble even with her darksight to pierce the shadows. She spotted something dangling down from the pinnacle of the spire, a long, black object that hung there like some fiendish chrysalis. As her gaze lingered in that direction, she felt a sudden, terrible feeling wash over her, a sense of foreboding that almost threatened to overwhelm her.

Beorna had already stepped forward, her gleaming blade lifted high above her head in both hands in a symbol of defiance. "Prepare for your destruction, fiends!" she roared, in challenge.

But before she or the rest of them could take further action, a spiraling column of liquid fire tore down from the heights above and slammed into them with the force of divine retribution.

Chapter 258

Zenna felt the backblast of heat, intermixed with divine power, as the spillover from the flame strike poured into the stairwell where she and Dannel were standing. Her magical defenses, combined with her innate resistance to fire, had helped her resist much of the effect, and Dannel had dodged quickly back, likewise avoiding the full force of the flames. The dwarves, in the van, had taken the full force of the blast. But as the flames cleared she could see that Arun and Beorna appeared to be only slightly wounded, and Hodge, while his upper body was charred, was already reaching for his jug for a bit of restoration. Even as she watched, the templar lifted one hand and unleashed a blast of searing light that sank into the undead form of the wraith. Mole, of course, had tumbled out of the radius of the blast and had vanished somewhere along the perimeter of the chamber.

The five hulking gray render zombies started toward them, while the wraith sank into the platform, disappearing from view. The bone devil chattered something in its Infernal language, but seemed content to hold its ground for the moment, no doubt preparing some dread power from the hells to unleash upon them.

“Look!” Dannel hissed, drawing Zenna’s attention up toward the ceiling high above. Where the elf had seen only a shifting shadow, Zenna could clearly identify the figure hovering there above them, near the black object she’d seen earlier. It was a man, clad in full plate armor, surrounded by a bevy of mirror images, sparking with the aura of protective wards. Zenna realized that this had to be Iverson, and that he’d just become visible with the unleashing of his potent blast of divine fire.

Dannel was already lifting his bow to fire. Beorna and Arun stepped forward to face the oncoming zombies. Hodge took a deep swallow from his jug and then dithered, reaching for his crossbow before eschewing it for his long spear.

Zenna felt as though time froze around her, as her thoughts raced through the options available to her. She still had most of her spells left, even after the confrontations with Zarik Dhor and the lesser priest below, but she knew that Iverson was a powerful cleric, obviously prepared for them, and that he no doubt had other fell magics at his call. The physical foes she entrusted to her allies, but she knew she had to do something to deal with him...

She had a dispel remaining, but doubted that her power could pierce the stronger potency of the high priest’s magic. For a moment she thought of Kaurophon, who had mastered her so easily, and doubt filled her.

Then Iverson began to incant again, and she just did it, just hurled her spell at him the way a desperate man might throw his knife at a charging swordsman.

That part of her that was sensitive to the Weave could feel the energies of her spell impact the layered wards that Iverson had conjured around him. Her heart froze in her chest as she felt the spell sliding from each of his wards like water striking glass. He was literally armored in magic, and her own puny abilities paled in contrast to the level of skill he commanded.

But then, just as she was about to give up, the last threads of her spell found something pliable, a current of energy that extended outward from the man, into the very air around him. As the dispel snapped those strands, Iverson’s air walk spell ended.

The enemy cleric fell fifty feet to the floor below, landing in a quite satisfactory cacophony of metal and pain just beside the room’s central platform.

Ike Iverson got up slowly, clearly hurting, although Zenna knew too much to mark him out of the fight just yet. “The cleric!” she cried, alerting her friends to the danger.

But Arun and Beorna had their own difficulties. The shambling render zombies were slow and cumbersome, but they were strong, a fact proven as one slammed a meaty claw into Beorna's side. They seemed to focus more on her, her enlarged size making her a more obvious target. Arun intercepted one as it was about to seize her from behind, tearing a huge gash in its leg with a powerful swing of his sword.

Beorna seemed more than able to handle herself even against the remaining four renders, at first; her blade, backed by the full force of her augmented strength, tore incredible wounds that even the already dead renders could not ignore. One fell back after taking a pair of hits that laid its body cavity open, one arm dangling uselessly from nearly severed tendons. But the undead life force that powered it was likewise strong, and it slowly recovered and came forward again, reaching for its living foe's flesh with its remaining claw. The others pounded at her repeatedly, but her armor, fashioned from one of the most durable metals known on Faerûn, held against their assaults.

Hodge finally started forward, but before he could reach his friends a shimmering white wall of solid ice appeared directly in front of him. The wall of ice divided the chamber in twain, with Zenna, Hodge, and Dannel on one side, and Beorna and Arun on the other.

With all of the bad guys on their side of the wall.

And if that wasn't bad enough, shadowy arms rose out of the floor at Beorna's feet, followed a moment later by the body of the wraith. As it plunged its claws through her armor into her body, the templar screamed, her very life force riven from her body by the sinister touch of the undead monstrosity.

Chapter 259

Zenna, Dannel, and Hodge heard the templar's scream, and knew that they had to get through or around that wall of ice, and quickly.

Dannel didn't hesitate, turning to the wall behind him, and using his slippers of spider climbing to run up the wall. He quickly gained enough height to see over the fifteen-foot high wall, and through the raging melee in the center of the room, took aim at his target.

Beorna stabbed her sword through the wraith at her feet, but her sword passed harmlessly through it to clang loudly against the floor below. She tried to draw upon the power of Helm, but in this place, consecrated to darkness, the bright light of her patron seemed like a mere trickle, barely enough for the undead swarming around her to even notice.

And then a cold wave of death descended over her, and for the first time she felt a tremor of involuntary fear.

Arun felt the cold touch as well, and he was in a position to see its source: the cleric Iverson, unleashing a powerful burst of negative energy. Several of the wounded zombies glowed briefly with a pale red light, their wounds knitting shut, and the priest himself seemed fortified, his own hurts eased by his spell. Arun had no idea how that could be, unless the man himself was undead, but he had more immediate concerns. His route to the cleric was blocked by the surging zombies, and anyway, an ally beside him was in danger.

He turned and lunged forward at the wraith, taking a hit from the render behind him but shrugging it off. The undead creature screeched, a terrible, hollow sound as Arun's sword tore through the fabric of its being. It started to sink back into the floor, but Arun followed his initial swing with a low sweep of his sword that bisected the glowing red points of its eyes, and with a final whisper it disintegrated into wisps of fading blackness.

Beorna looked down at him. "Thank you," she said.

Arun nodded. "Let's get that cleric!" he urged.

Meanwhile, unseen by the cleric or his undead servitors, Mole had circled around the edge of the chamber, nearly invisible in the shadows. On Iverson's fall she'd adjusted her course and now came at him from behind, her dark cloak trailing behind her, her soft boots making barely a whisper on the stone floor.

Iverson, already preparing another spell, did not detect her.

But the bone devil turned, and she looked up in horror as it fixed her with its terrible, evil gaze. Then it was gone, and the chamber around her was replaced by the interior of a hemispherical wall of ice, shutting her off from the battle. Rendered all but harmless, she hacked at the thick ice in vain.

Then something occurred to her, and she reached for her bag of holding.

The initial wall of ice blocking off the stairs suddenly began to glow brightly at a single point along its length. The ice retreated as Zenna's scorching rays blasted through it, providing an opening that Hodge leapt through, his flaming axe bright in his hands, shivering as he passed through the thick plane of frozen air that remained in the breach in the ice wall. Zenna followed, although she remained on her side of the wall, and she began once again to work her magic.

Iverson took an involuntary step back as an arrow from Dannel's bow slammed into his shoulder. His mirror images had served their purpose, absorbing most of the elf's shots thus far, and his armor, reinforced with a shield of faith, had taken care of the others until this one had wormed its way through. He was not hurt seriously, though, and his mass inflict spell had restored most of the damage he'd taken in the fall earlier.

In the space between heartbeats he called upon a quickened divine favor to prepare him for melee, and then unleashed a destruction upon the priestess of Helm who was thus far holding up well against the battering his undead were working upon her.

A vortex of unholy fire gathered, surging as it swept up Beorna in its eager grasp.

Chapter 260

“Helm’s glory!” Beorna said, lifting up her holy sword in both hands, as the dark flames of destruction engulfed her. For a moment, the shining warrior was lost in the black storm, but then the flames froze, caught in a surge of light that shone from her body in a fleeting instant. The flames fell, disintegrating into nothingness as they struck the ground, leaving the templar unharmed.

“Impossible!” Iverson said.

“Nothing is impossible when a god shelters you with his hand,” Beorna pronounced. She stepped toward Iverson, ignoring the pounding she took from the zombie renders that continued to press her. The creature she’d wounded before shambled forward to block her path to the cleric, slamming her across the face with a massive claw. Beorna snarled and laid into the zombie with a powerful stroke that sundered its decrepit form, driving it to the ground. Another claw tore at her shoulder from behind, but with her backstroke she cut deep into the limb of the zombie attacking her, nearly severing the arm from its body.

Zenna aided her efforts by casting a haste spell, centered on the dwarves.

Iverson did not waste the momentary respite he’d gained through his servants, and began preparing another spell. Before he could summon the power, though, another arrow slammed into his arm, driving a hot jab of pain through him as a jolt of electricity flowed from the missile into his body. Snarling, he turned to the devil.

“Deal with that elf!” he commanded.

The osyluth bowed and lifted a few feet into the air before vanishing.

Arun’s sword sliced through the leg of one of the zombies, severing the limb and sending the creature falling awkwardly aside. Another render reached for him as he started toward Iverson, but Hodge ran at it and clove it with his axe, drawing its attention from the paladin.

Even as Arun tried to reach Iverson, the cleric released his spell. A shimmering surrounded Beorna, stripping away each of her magical protections as the priest’s dispel sundered them. She returned to her regular size, her muscles slumping as her endurance and strength spells evaporated, and the full force of the loss she’d suffered earlier at the touch of the wraith hit her. Also lost was her shield of faith and divine favor, as well as the haste she’d just gotten from Zenna. The zombies, as if sensing her sudden weakness, tore at her with renewed fervor even as she tried to hack her way through them with her holy blade. She was showing the signs of her wounds now, slowing under the continued assault.

From behind the cleric, the hemisphere of ice that held Mole captive began to glow. A bright spot appeared that grew suddenly white-hot with the familiar shine of burning alchemist’s fire as a round opening appeared in the side of the frozen prison. No sooner had it appeared than Mole dove through it, somersaulting to land on her feet, her rapier at the ready in her hand.

“Ta da!” she announced, to no one in particular. Iverson acknowledged her with a glance, then returned his attention to Arun, who appeared around the edge of the melee between Beorna and the zombies, charging at the cleric with his holy sword raised to strike. Iverson seemed unconcerned, his sword still sheathed at his belt. Arun did not hesitate, leaping in to smite the unholy priest.

But even as Arun prepared to strike, the cleric lunged forward quickly, laying a slender finger upon the dwarf’s breastplate. The action left him completely open now to attack, but Arun was suddenly in no position to deliver the blow. The paladin’s face became a rictus of agony as the dark energies of Iverson’s harm spell tore mercilessly through him. Driven to the brink of death, Arun somehow managed to stay standing, although his entire body quivered with pain and weakness, and runnels of bright red blood began to appear at the crevices of his armor, running down his legs to gather in small puddles at his feet.

“Now, paladin, we shall see,” the dark cleric said, laughing.

Even as Arun had begun his charge, Dannel had drawn another arrow out of his quiver and prepared for yet another shot at Iverson. He’d seen the devil vanish, but had been too far distant to hear the cleric’s command to him, even his keen elvish ears not able to overcome the sounds of the melee that still raged in the center of the room. But even as he took aim down the long shaft of his arrow, a faint stirring above him gave him warning.

Looking up, he saw the bone devil, hovering in the air barely ten feet above him, an evil grin on its inhuman features.

Dannel knew from hard experience that even the arrows magically enhanced by his song would be unlikely to hurt the fiend that loomed over him. Fortunately, he had another weapon that could, but even as he dropped his bow and reached for Alakast, the devil surged down at him, reaching for him with its claws even as its long stinger darted over its shoulder, stabbing several inches into Dannel’s body.

The elf stiffened as poison coursed into his body, and as the devil’s claws tore at him he felt his connection to the wall through his magical slippers tearing. Pain exploded across his torso, and then he was falling, the ground rushing quickly up to meet him.

Chapter 261

Dannel’s body felt like it was a single raging sea of pain, but he was still conscious. He still clutched his staff with the fingers of his left hand, which had clenched around the white shaft so tightly that he felt it even through the pain. Rolling over onto his back, he looked up to see the devil dropping straight toward him.

Oh, crap!

Desperation and adrenaline briefly overcame his pain, and he was able to get Alakast up enough to strike it a glancing blow on the shoulder, using the devil’s downward momentum to add to the effectiveness of the blow. The osyluth shrieked in pain as the weapon, created to destroy creatures such as it, unleashed its destructive power into it. But Dannel paid for his effort a moment later as the devil lunged and snared his arm in its powerful jaws, crushing the limb and snapping its head to the side to slam the elf into the wall with enough force to knock him unconscious. The staff fell from his hands, harmless now. The devil smiled, its stinger dancing eagerly as it rose up over the elf...

“GET AWAY FROM HIM!” Zenna cried, leaping at the devil from behind. The osyluth turned, its stinger snapping out... to vanish through one of the mirror images that she had conjured in defense. She stabbed a short wand into the devil’s side, the bone device she’d won in their clash with the lich in the skull mountain on Occipitus. The wand unleashed a sharp red jolt of energy that overcame the devil’s magical resistance to open a splay of ugly red wounds in its body, running out from the point of impact like cracks on a pane of glass.

The devil hissed in pain, but Zenna knew she’d gotten lucky with the wand, and that the initiative had now passed to the terrible fiend.

Arun, staggering backward, called upon the divine power of Moradin to heal his wounds. Iverson, calmly following, had still not drawn his sword, but he had already proven that he needed no greater weapon than his touch, and the dark power of whatever god—clearly not Kelemvor—that he worshipped.

One of the massive zombies clattered to the floor, its body riven by huge gashes, the unholy life force that animated it failing. Over its body staggered Beorna, her breath coming in huge gasps, her face haggard and pale. But the sword in her hand still glowed with pure light as she lifted it and pointed the blade at Iverson.

“Back... off... priest...” she said.

Iverson shrugged, lifted his hand, and called upon his dark power once more.

The dark power of the mass inflict wounds spread outward in a wave. The priest’s own wounds knitted shut, and Arun crumpled, dying. Beorna’s face twisted in anguish, although she did not fall, and some distance away Hodge, still fighting the last of the zombies, let out a stream of expletives as the wave impacted him.

“Aaaaaaaa!”

Mole’s inarticulate yell drew Iverson’s attention around. The wiry gnome, bleeding from her nose and ears, tumbled at the surprised priest, tangling herself in his feet, applying leverage to the back of his left knee as he turned. Iverson, caught off balance, fell forward, landing prone.

“Die! Die!” Mole shouted, stabbing her little knife into a gap in the man’s armor. The tiny blade did little in the way of damage, and Iverson quickly recovered. He turned onto his side, and reaching down grasped Mole by the throat, unleashing a powerful surge of negative energy into her. Blood gushed out of Mole’s mouth as the spell ravaged her insides, and her eyes swept back in her head as she lost consciousness. With a look of contempt, the cleric tossed her aside.

Zenna dodged back as the devil came at her again. She only had two mirror images left, now, and she bore gashes along her side where its claws had already successfully found her. The stinger waited, poised to strike once her protective distractions were depleted. She knew that Dannel was dying, that he needed her, but she also knew that if she paused to heal the elf, the devil would tear her to pieces.

She turned and ran toward the fallen elf. The devil was quick to move to intercept, but instead of forcing past it toward Dannel, she turned to the side, where Alakast lay. Bending down, she took up the weapon, staggering as hot breath followed by angry pain erupted in her side, as the devil tore into her shoulder with its protruding jaws.

Who am you kidding! a voice sounded deep in her mind as she fell back against the nearby wall, turning to face the devil. You're no fighter!

But then she caught sight of Dannel, lying there, blood smeared across his face.

Almost blindly, she thrust Alakast at the devil.

A sharp sound like a miniature thunderclap stunned her. When she regained enough control of her senses to realize what was happening, she saw the devil standing there, a great hole burned in its chest where the staff had struck. For a moment, she felt a giddy, desperate hope that she'd killed it.

But then the devil lifted its eyes to meet hers, and it moved, coming forward again, the stinger hovering eagerly in wait.

She'd given her best shot, and it hadn't stopped it. She saw her death, and knew with a grim inevitability that there was nothing that she could do to avert it.

Chapter 262

The devil seemed to savor Zenna's expectation of death, but instead of moving to finish her, it inexplicably held its ground.

A voice that she instinctively knew was the devil's sounded in her mind. "You are not to be killed," it said.

Confused, Zenna just stared at it, unable to even think. But when it turned from her and took a step toward Dannel, her indecision evaporated, and she quickly moved to block it, bringing up Alakast again.

"If you try to hurt him, either I'll kill you, or you'll have to kill me," she said.

The devil regarded her silently for a few seconds; to Zenna the interval seemed like an eternity. Then it smiled, a grim, sardonic expression that seemed horrific on such an alien face.

And then it vanished.

Ike Iverson stood, ignoring the faint twinge where the gnome had managed to get a puny attack through his defenses. He'd been hurt, but his various inflict spells had poured new life into him. That was a gift of the darkness to which he'd sold his soul, a trade that he'd never regretted, in that it had given him the power that he'd always craved.

And now he relished that power, as his foes finally began to fall around him. The paladin had gone down, the dwarven woman—though she'd annoyingly defied his most potent spell—was battered to the brink of defeat, and that gnome had merely been an annoying distraction. And he was confident that the devil would deal with the elf; while he was a skilled archer, Iverson knew he was far less of a threat in close combat.

But even as he rose, a gleaming silver blade appeared before him, a sword that floated in mid-air, darting toward him as though wielded by an invisible swordsman. Iverson simply let his layered defenses absorb the first stroke, more annoyed than threatened.

“A spiritual weapon? A minor annoyance...”

But as he saw the dwarf woman helping the paladin to his feet, the bright glow of healing energy still shining around her hands, he realized that he might not be done here just yet.

“He said you were trouble,” Iverson said, finally drawing his long bastard sword from its sheath. Almost as an afterthought, he dispelled Beorna's spiritual weapon, and the force-sword winked out of existence.

“Who?” Arun said. “Who pulls your strings, cleric?”

But Iverson's only response was, “Let us finish this, then.”

The priest's initial concern was that the dwarves would try to flank him, but the two actually gave way before his approach. The woman's reservoir must have been running dry; the paladin still looked barely able to stand despite the healing he'd received. And for all her earlier bravado, the woman warrior—templar, he now realized—seemed small and hesitant. The paladin said a few words to her in a guttural language; dwarvish, Iverson realized, though he did not speak the tongue.

“Not so bold now, are we?” he said, with a laugh. With a sudden movement he hurled a spell at the paladin, hoping to end it quickly, but he wasn't especially surprised that the dwarf resisted his magic. Tough creatures, those dwarves... a pity that their durability so rarely survived the transition to undeath.

The templar channeled a few more dribblets of positive energy into herself. The paladin just stood there, a slightly vacant look on his face. Iverson waved his sword in front of him to distract them, while drawing upon his most potent valence of spell energy into another deadly inflict wounds spell. With a grim smile, he started forward....

Movement behind him drew his attention in time for him to receive the charge from the giant golden-skinned lizard that had appeared seemingly from nowhere. Iverson snarled as the creature tried to bite his arm, and he stabbed a finger into its body, pouring the terrible energies of his spell into the creature. Forgot about the damned celestial mount, the cleric berated himself. The entire temple was protected with an unhallow spell laid by Aloustinai herself, but paladins called their pets, which got around the inability of good creatures to be summoned inside its precincts. Still, from the way that the creature shook and trembled at the negative energy pouring through it, it wouldn't last very long. Perhaps it could even be captured, and turned to his use...

A jolt of pain that stabbed through his back reminded him that he still had living enemies to deal with. Iverson turned, the lizard still trying in vain to get a grasp on him, to see the paladin dwarf lift his sword for another strike. Iverson met the swing with his own blade, turning it aside.

"My power runs deep," the cleric said, taunting him. "I have plenty left for your destruction!"

They exchanged another series of blows, and Iverson took another hit that sent pain surging through him. "Your sword is potent," he said. Ignoring the lizard, which still had not managed to hit him, he defensively cast another inflict spell, catching the paladin on the arm when he launched another attack. Arun's body stiffened and he nearly dropped his weapon, and he stumbled back. Iverson sensed that he'd partially resisted the spell, but even so the dwarf was right back on the edge of unconsciousness once more, with only a gentle nudge to push him over. And this time, he would not be coming back.

But then he realized that he'd lost track of the other dwarf, the templar.

Even as he turned, the dwarf woman appeared at the edge of his vision slit, leaping at him with her sword blazing. Again the assault faltered against his layered defenses. He lashed out at her, driving her back, his sword tearing through her battered armor to add a shallow gash to her tally of wounds.

"I am not so bad with the blade, either," he laughed. The lizard, working persistently at him, finally managed to grab hold of his leg with enough of a grip to cause pain, and he absently reached down to finish off that annoyance.

Pain—real pain, this time—exploded through his lower back. Staggering forward, he looked down to see that gnome, that ANNOYING GNOME!—with her little toy rapier in her hand, its length slick with his blood. "I thought I killed you!" he snarled.

"No, sorry," she said. "I'm pretty tough to kill, actually."

"Well, then I will make certain of the job!" he yelled. He unleashed his reserve, a quickened inflict serious wounds that healed most of the damage he'd suffered. Then, turning to face his enemies, all of which were nearly dead—had to be!—he called upon the dark power of his patron yet again.

But before he could strike, a bright light filled his eyes. Within that glow, a painful nimbus that drove into his eyes like twin nails, came a pair of holy blades. They struck his defenses and parted them, slamming into his body with the full force of two smites behind them. In disbelief he staggered back, not even feeling pain as he looked down to see huge rents in his torso, his sundered organs visible beneath a sea of blood and bone and ruined tissue.

“No...” he said, calling a spell that evaporated, the magic just outside his reach. “No, it cannot be... I was promised...”

Then he slumped to the ground, dead.

For a few heartbeats, the three companions stood there, looking down at his body. Iverson’s assessment of their condition had been not far off the mark, and their own wounds left them barely able to stand. Then a loud crash drew their attention back to the center of the room. Hodge stood there as the last render zombie slowly twitched and fell still. The dwarf was drenched in blood and gore, much of it his own. Behind him they could see Zenna and Dannel standing at the breach in the wall of ice, too badly hurt to push through the opening, the elf leaning heavily upon Alakast to keep him upright.

Hodge looked around at the scene of carnage around him. “Aye, now that were a battle,” he said. He reached for his jug, but before he could grasp it, his eyes rolled up into his head and he toppled over onto his back.

Chapter 263

“So what in the ‘ells is that blasted thing?”

None of the gathered companions had an answer for Hodge. Standing in the private chapel of the High Priest of Helm, the current holder of that title frowned as she stared down at the focus on their interest.

The object that they’ taken from the cathedral of Kelemvor lay on a flat stone table covered with a white cloth. It was a cage, just about large enough for a man, decorated with unholy motifs—skulls, bones, and dark runes that seemed to move when the viewer started to look away. It was made of metal, but that was all they could discern of its manufacture from casual observation; even the dwarves were confounded in identifying the alloys. Despite its solid appearance, it weighed no more than about fifty pounds. They’d had little trouble bringing it here, wrapping it in one of the tapestries that had adorned the walls of the temple of Kelemvor, but none of them felt at ease being in the same room with the device.

“I cannot answer you, dwarf,” Jenya said. “But it is a magical item of incredible power... and infused with the pure essence of blackest evil.” She rubbed her head, which probably still ached with the surge of power she’d been hit with when she’d used divination magic upon it earlier. Zenna understood; her own detect magic had almost overloaded her senses, but had confirmed that the cage radiated a powerful aura of abjuration, conjuration, and necromancy magic.

“I am more concerned with this,” Dannel said, stepping back over to the altar, where he recovered another of the items they’d found. This article was less imposing than the cage; a collection of papers they’d found in a secret drawer in Embril Aloustina’s quarters in the temple. Her room had been richly decorated but devoid of personal effects and other valuables, suggesting that she'd planned to be away for quite some time, when she'd departed Cauldron some months back.

Dannel took the last page in the papers, and read a passage that they'd already heard once before.

High Priestess,

As many have heard me say, the cages alone will not allow the completion of the ritual. What more is needed I cannot say, as so I continue to explore the mysteries of the soul pillars at great peril. The guardian grows ever more restless, and the insanity that lies frozen in Karran-Kural is beginning to stir.

My price has doubled.

-F.

"So this Karran-Kural place may be a hideout for these... cultists? We still don't even know exactly what we're dealing with, here," Arun said.

"We have little more than a name, and a place," Zenna said. "Those papers refer to a 'Fetor Abradius,' probably the 'F' who signed that last note. It sounds like he was conducting research into a ritual of some sort, something that probably involved that," she indicated the odd cage, "or others like it."

"You think there's more of them?" Mole said.

"Well, the note used the plural," Zenna replied.

"Bah, 'ow er we s'posed to find this bastard, w' just a few scribbles and this 'ere hunk o' metal?" Hodge said.

Zenna looked to Jenya. "I've prepared my commune, and will do my best to get some answers," the priestess said.

The door opened suddenly, and they turned around to see Beorna walking heavily into the room. She'd stolen a few moments to towel off her armor, but she still looked a sight, her short hair sticky with sweat and blood, her clothes ragged from the beating they'd taken over the course of what had been a quite busy day.

"How has the situation developed, templar?" Jenya asked.

"The city authorities are up in arms, of course," the dwarf replied. "The evidence that the Kelemvorites were up to no good was pretty hard to refute; hells, just the bodies of those undead monstrosities alone made a damn near irresistible case. I think you'll need to talk to Skellerang again yourself, though; the man looked right about to pop a blood vessel when I spoke to him."

Zenna smiled to herself ruefully; she could imagine how that conversation had gone. From all accounts Skellerang, the leader of the Watch, was close-minded, arrogant, and utterly full of himself.

Oh yeah, she could imagine how that conversation had gone.

“There haven’t been any inquiries about... that, have there?” Dannel asked, gesturing at the cage.

“Not that I’ve heard,” Beorna said. “But whoever Iverson was working with, I’d wager they know, by now.”

It was not a wager that any of them would venture to take.

“So what now?” Mole asked.

“You should stay here again tonight,” Jenya said. “When the sun sets I will commune with Helm... but not here,” she said, looking down with disgust at the cage.

“What should we do with that, High Priestess?” Beorna asked.

“For now, put in the sanctum.” At Beorna’s frown she added, “I know, I know, but it is the most secure place in the temple, and is warded from divination magic as well. As you said, our enemies likely know of our involvement, but we shall not make it easy for them.”

“Guards?”

Jenya lowered her head, a sad look weighing down her features. Zenna realized that she hadn’t seen the young woman, who had been so forceful and inherently optimistic when they’d first met, smile in quite some time. But for all the pressure on her, Jenya Urikas was still that strong woman at heart. “No,” she said. “Alert the acolytes, but I’ll not put them in the path of danger if I can help it. I will see to the defenses of the church myself.”

Zenna stepped forward. “If I may, High Priestess, I might be able to offer some suggestions, in terms of the questions you will ask in your commune.”

Beorna’s frown grew even deeper, if that was possible, but Jenya quickly nodded. “I appreciate your counsel, Zenna. Come to my quarters in an hour, and I will prepare some tea.”

“I could use a bath,” Arun said. He looked tired, as well, but there was nothing of surrender in the paladin’s bearing; to Zenna, he was as he had always been, a rock, the foundation upon which their company rooted their strength.

“Eh, I could use a drink o’ three,” Hodge said.

“Thought you might,” Beorna said. She drew out a half-gallon jug of thick, clouded glass from her pack, and tossed it to the dwarf. Hodge dropped his axe and barely caught the missile, turning the jug over to reveal dwarvish runes on a slap of paper affixed to the front.

“Gutbuster Fifteen!” Hodge exclaimed. “Woman, I could kiss yer!”

Beorna smiled. "Maybe... if you were ten years younger, thirty pounds lighter about the gut, and doused in the lake first!"

The exchange added a needed moment of levity, and the companions all laughed heartily before the cage dragged them back into the depth of the moment.

"I'm going to go to Skie's," Mole said. "Trade in some of our excess swag, see if there's any new rumors on the street." She started toward the door, but Zenna stopped her.

"Don't go alone," she said. "Remember, those assassins found us once..."

Mole shrugged. "All right, 'mom,' I'll take Dannel. Satisfied?"

The elf smiled as he joined her, but the look he and Zenna shared was full of meaning. Be careful, each seemed to say.

Beorna glanced over at Hodge, who'd already taken a deep swallow from the jug. "All right, Golden Boy, your friend's not going to be much good for anything in a few minutes, so help me get this hunk of junk into the Sanctum." She grabbed onto the cage and lifted it from the table, waiting for Arun to take the rear end of it before starting toward the chapel exit.

"Wait," Zenna said. She grabbed the tablecloth and draped it over the cage, hiding the terrible thing from view.

Chapter 264

Afternoon turned quickly to evening, and evening deepened even faster into night. Over the town of Cauldron, a preternatural hush descended, even the usual night sounds muted as its citizens retreated to their homes and rooms to await the coming of another troubled day.

Mole and Dannel returned shortly after sunset. The gnome was all excitement, and quickly found the others—at least some of them; Zenna was still in seclusion with Jenya, and Hodge had already passed out—to share her news.

"Great news!" she said to Beorna and Arun. "Since we've been such great customers, Skie has signed our company up for her 'Adventurer's Discount'. We get special deals on magic items, and special bids on new items that come into stock!"

"Don't forget the name," Dannel prodded her with a smile.

"Oh, right! We also get the name of our adventuring company on the panel in front of her shop; she's got a whole stone porch covered with them!" She paused, a wide grin on her face.

"And?" Arun finally asked.

"And so we need to come up with a name for us! For our company!"

The paladin rubbed at his temples. “Mole. We just got back from a ten-day’s holiday in the Abyss. We’re in the midst of a town cursed by unholy dangers and hidden evil. We’ve just uncovered a plot that had risen to the highest levels of the most popular church in town. We just finished a day of desperate battles, and most likely tomorrow will be just as intense, if Jenya’s divination is successful. Assassins that want us dead are in all likelihood still out there, and no doubt the evil intelligence that came up with that cage now has an interest in us as well.”

Mole listened patiently throughout Arun’s diatribe. When he’d finished, she just stood there, blankly, before turning to Beorna. “So, Beorna, what do you think we should be called? I kinda think ‘Mole’s Crusaders’ has a nice sound to it, don’t you agree?”

Arun glanced over at Hodge, for the moment envying him his unconsciousness.

Seeing that her audience wasn’t quite prepared for the momentous duty of selecting a name for their adventuring company, Mole turned to the items she’d bought for them at Skie’s. Her bag of holding had picked up a surprising quantity of loot for a single day of trouble, and she had tried to buy something for everyone in the group.

Dannel already bore his prize, a magical quiver that contained an extradimensional space that could hold several times the typical quantity of arrows. Given their difficulties in finding a fletcher on Occipitus, it seemed a useful thing to have.

Mole had bought herself a small magical dagger, a weapon superior to her tiny knife, but otherwise of the size that a human would use to cut bread. She’d also acquired a small rust-colored sack that Skie had been delighted to demonstrate for her; the bag contained a tiny furry ball that could be hurled from the bag to become a real live animal. The animals only lasted a short time, and they weren’t truly real, she knew, but the device was just too fascinating to pass up, especially at the discounted rate.

Perhaps feeling a bit guilty at buying two things for herself, Mole had splurged on items for the others. For Hodge she’d bought a pair of heavy winter boots, enchanted with magic that protected their wearer from cold weather. For Arun, she’d gotten several vials filled with potions that offered various enhancements useful in battle. And for Zenna, knowing her friend’s constant obsession with magic, Skie had provided a select choice of potent arcane scrolls, for addition to her spellbook.

The gnome turned to Beorna, a guilty expression suddenly appearing on her face. “I am sorry, Beorna... I forgot to get you something. A share of the treasure is properly yours...”

“Don’t worry, Mole,” the dwarf woman replied. “Doing good can be its own reward. And besides, I have already gotten several items; this ring, and the cloak and amulet that your fellow priest will not be needing anymore.”

“Oh, okay then!” Mole said cheerfully.

“Any rumors on the street about today’s activities?” Arun asked.

Dannel responded for her. “No, it’s surprisingly quiet,” the elf said. “It can’t be a secret that something’s wrong, not with half the Watch going in and out of the temple of Kelemvor all afternoon.”

“These people are cowed,” Beorna said. “They have been humbled into huddling like cravens in their homes, and not asking questions that might have unpleasant answers.”

Dannel frowned. “They’re good people, at heart. The folk of Cauldron have suffered greatly in the last year, however. Anyone would be changed some, under such conditions.”

“Well, that is what I am here to change,” the templar replied simply.

The door down the hall opened, and Mole darted off to share her tales with Zenna. Dannel followed, after a nod to the two dwarves.

“You travel with interesting companions, Golden Boy,” Beorna said, when they had left.

“My name is Arun.”

“Well, what do you know, you can speak to me after all,” she said. “For a moment, I feared that your tongue tied into knots at the appearance of one of your own kind.”

Arun glanced at Hodge.

“Aye, yes, he’s your friend, and a stout fellow he is, although I’d prefer it if he bathed at least once a year. But that’s not what I’m getting at. You’re an odd fellow, Arun Goldenshield... a puzzle, and I don’t generally like puzzles that I cannot figure out.”

“I am what you see before you,” the paladin said simply.

“Aye, and I saw what manner of man you are, this day.”

“I do what I feel that I must.”

“A philosophy that I share. But beyond that simple answer lies deeper truths, I suspect.”

He looked at her. “Is that not always the case?”

She nodded, and for a long moment they sat there, silent. Finally, she rose.

“We shall have another long day tomorrow, and my bed seems preferable to the floor,” she said, indicating Hodge’s snoring figure with a nod.

Arun stood, out of politeness. The slightly archaic gesture seemed to amuse the dwarf woman. But when she turned to him again, for a final farewell, her expression was serious.

“Would you like to join me?”

It was generally held that the dark-skinned gold dwarves could not flush the way that fair-skinned folk could, but at that question Arun made a fair effort. "We have known each other for barely a full day!" he finally managed.

Beorna shrugged, and smiled. "So? We are holy warriors, but not humans, with their silly vows of chastity and asceticism. My faith does not require that of me, and neither does yours, from what I know of the Soul Forger's code. Today we strode into the gates of fire and destruction and emerged, still drawing breath. Tomorrow we return to the jaws of battle, and may die. Who can say?"

"I said before that I didn't understand you, Arun, but maybe I do. I've walked a solitary path all my life... an outsider even among those I called my brothers and sisters. Our path, it's demanding of even the strongest soul... and it can be lonely, too."

For just a moment, she let her defenses down, and he could see inside, to the depths that she kept bottled away under her tough outer shell. It was very familiar, for it was a reflection of what he himself had kept buried ever since he'd been banished from his people, with only his honor to keep him company. Since coming here to Cauldron, he'd found the warmth of friendship, but Beorna's words reminded him that there was more, something he'd nearly allowed himself to forget.

He came to her, and his smile was deep.

Chapter 265

Their first attempt to reach Karran-Kural ended in failure.

Jenya's commune had been at least partially successful, as it had revealed that the place was linked to both the cage they'd captured and the greater danger threatening Cauldron. In response to a question to the celestial agent of Helm contacted via her spell, she'd learned that Karran-Kural was beneath Cauldron, somewhere in the structure of the volcano, and that evil still dwelled there.

The companions quickly decided to seek out this place, and hopefully find more answers. Jenya promised to continue her divinatory efforts, to try and prove the veil of shadow that covered the conspiracy that had included the church of Kelemvor in its ranks.

Although they only had a name, and a general location from the commune, again magic stepped in to offer a solution. Jenya had prayed to her god for a powerful location spell named find the path, which should have guided them directly to Karran-Kural.

Perhaps it would have. But they'd only barely entered one of the dozens of old lava tubes that tunneled under the caldera when they reached a tunnel entirely flooded with cold, clear water.

"Looks like we're going to need to take a swim," Dannel had commented.

Hodge had reacted with more vigor. "In that? We ain't fishes, elf! This Kural place could be a mile under that, fer all we know!"

But Dannel had looked to Zenna, and she nodded. "We'll try again tomorrow," she said. "But first, there's someone we should talk to, someone who may be able to help..."

* * * * *

The grove was quiet, even somber, a respite from the sounds of activity at the nearby docks and shops on the lake. Once a park, the small haven had become overgrown and fecund, with thick tangles of brush choking the once pleasant walking paths, and the trees forming an interlacing canopy that left a deep shade under their expansive boughs.

There were no signs of other visitors. It was as if the grove were in a different world entirely, with an invisible boundary separating it from the rest of the city.

"Beautiful... but also sad," Dannel said, fingering a drooping flower that protruded out from a bush that nodded out over the path.

"This friend o' yers, she lives out 'ere in the open?" Hodge said, regarding the vegetation dubiously. He rubbed his nose, stifling a sneeze. "Gah! Flowers." He swept out his axe, removing several of the offending blossoms in a single sweep.

As if in response, the wall of brush stirred, then thrashed wildly with sudden motion. The companions drew back as a dark shadow appeared in the bushes, which parted to reveal a huge, ferocious-looking bestial face, with beady eyes and dark brown fur. Its body was huge; the whole of the creature had to be at least ten feet long. It snarled, its huge jaws opening to reveal a copious quantity of pointed teeth.

"Umm... nice doggy," Hodge said, weakly.

Chapter 266

The companions drew their weapons as they faced a giant dire wolverine, trying not to provoke the creature that looked as though it could handle Hodge with a single bite.

"Bristle!" came a voice from further down the path. The wolverine turned its head in that direction, and then subsided, drawing back a pace and lowering its head with a final threatening growl at the companions.

A slender figure stepped onto the trail from behind a gnarled old tree. She was elvish, or at least partly so, with dusky gray skin and long, straight white hair that cascaded down across her shoulders and down her back. She was clad in a soft green tunic that blended in with her surroundings, over earthen brown breeches that culminated in a pair of soft leather boots.

"Shensen," Zenna said. "It's good to see you again."

The half-drow druidess nodded. "I see you have found some new friends."

"As have you," Dannel said, with a nod to the wolverine, who continued to watch them intently, as if still hoping that these strangers would be someone that he could devour.

Zenna introduced Beorna and Hodge to Shensen Tesseril, who the group had first encountered in the cellar of the Lucky Monkey, a roadhouse near Cauldron that had been taken over by bandits. Since then she had spent a fair amount of her time here in the town, choosing as her place of dwelling this abandoned grove.

"Come," Shensen said. "I know a nice quiet place where we can talk."

She led them to a pleasant hillock covered in bright green grass with a clear view of the lake, surrounded by a dozen trees that all but shrouded it from the surrounding city. Bristle, the wolverine, followed them but remained on the edge of the hillock, fading back into the bushes until only his face was just visible.

"It's surprising to see a creature such as that in the midst of a town," Arun said.

"I found Bristle on one of the game-trails on the outer slope of the volcano," Shensen said. "He was seriously injured, near death when I found him. I helped him, and brought him back here to recover. Only now he's gotten comfortable, and he doesn't seem to want to leave," she added, with a grin.

"I'm surprised that the Watch allowed him into the town," Beorna said.

Shensen's eyes sparkled with a hint of mischief. "There are ways into the town besides the four gates."

"Yeah, it seems lately that they'll let just about anything in, anyway," Mole added dryly.

"You have a strong connection to the natural landscape, Shensen," Zenna said. "Have you felt anything... unusual, of late?"

The druid pulled her knees close against her chest, and looked out over the lake. "You mean besides the general undercurrent of fear that pervades Cauldron? Yes. The natural currents of this place are in flux; there is something disturbing building in and around the town, something unnatural."

"What is it?" Arun asked.

"I cannot say, for certain. For one, there is something dwelling in the lake, a shadowy creature. The fishermen have been uneasy; a lot of dead fish have risen to the surface, their bodies black and rotting. I have explored the upper levels of the lake, but even I know better than to plumb the lightless depths alone..."

"Great. Another monster, that's all we need," Hodge said.

“I will speak to Jenya about it,” Zenna promised. “But for the moment, we have had our own dealings with shadows...”

She shared their recent encounters, culminating with an overview of the revelations they’d had regarding Karran-Kural. “We believe that whatever’s going on there deep under the city, it’s connected with all of the recent troubles.”

“We sure could use your help getting down there,” Mole added. “What with all your druid magic and stuff.”

Shensen looked thoughtful. “Well, I would as soon see the evil in the city uncovered and destroyed as any of you,” she finally said. “And I am still indebted to you, for your bravery at the Lucky Monkey.”

She stood up; Zenna observed that the grass where she’d been sitting sprang up easily, as if her weight had made no impression upon the hill at all. “Very well,” she said. “Where is the entrance to this tunnel of which you spoke?”

“It’s on the northeastern face of the caldera’s outer rim, about a half-mile down from the town wall,” Dannel said.

“I assume that this adventure is one that you would prefer goes unnoticed?” At their nods, she went on, “Then I will meet you there, an hour after sunset.”

“In the meantime, we’ll go back to the Temple of Helm, and see if Jenya is ready to try again with her spell,” Zenna replied. “And I too need to ready what magic I can, to aid in this difficult journey.”

The druid escorted them back to the edge of the grove. As the noise and bustle of the town returned around them, Zenna looked back to see Shensen wave once, then vanish back into the brush, the dense vegetation swallowing her up into its embrace.

Chapter 267

The cavern was cold and dark, filled almost to the brim with water, the only noise an occasional drip that sounded overly loud in the confined space.

A flicker of light disturbed the stillness of this place, far from the benevolent light of the sun. The light came from under the surface of the water, and it slowly drew nearer, twisting and shifting position, as if struggling to escape from its liquid prison.

The light had only just grown bright enough to cast faint glimmering reflections on the slick walls above the water when something emerged from the pool. A long, twisting tentacle snaked out of the water, grasping onto a nearby rock. Several other followed, slender lengths of pale, translucent flesh with pink suckers running along their undersides. Once enough had attached, they drew the mass of their owner out of the water, a bulbous figure with great, unblinking eyes.

The octopus sat there on the edge of the pool for a long moment, then its form began to shift and distend, growing taller, the tentacles sinking back into its body. The transformation lasted only a few seconds, and when it was done Shensen Tesseril stood there, shaking off a few stray droplets of water that clung to her long hair.

She reached down into the icy water, helping a sodden Dannel up onto the ledge. The elf bore the light, a magical continual flame set onto a small piece of wood that he'd strapped to his armor across his chest. Mole sprang up out of the water a moment later, a wide grin on her face. Zenna arrived a minute after that. The dwarves were the last to arrive. Their heavy armor had made passage through the flooded tunnels difficult, but it had also served as a useful anchor in several places, when sudden rushes of rapid current had threatened to fling some of them into alternate passages against their will.

Hodge burst the plane of water and spat out a big gout of water, splashing all of them as they helped haul him up onto the ledge. "Bragh!" he roared. "Blasted water! It ain't natural!"

"Okay, now that we've alerted every living thing within five miles that we're here," Dannel said, drawing his new magical quiver out of a sealed oilcloth bag, one of several that they'd purchased to protect their equipment from water damage. The quiver served him in much the same way as Mole's magical bag, storing not only his arrows within its extradimensional space, but his bow and Alakast as well. The others had had to take more precautions to secure their gear, but at least their magical weapons and armor weren't susceptible to rust.

"Hey, look at it this way, you get to do it all again on the way back up!" Mole said with a coy smile.

Hodge's sudden look of realization was priceless.

"We should start a fire, and dry ourselves off," Arun suggested. "We don't want to freeze when those cold-protection spells wear off." His breath made a plume in front of his face, confirming the low temperature in the cavern.

"They'll last a full twenty-four hours," Shensen reassured him.

"I can already feel Jenya's direction spell fading," Zenna said. "I hope that wherever 'here' is, it's where we're supposed to be."

"Where does the spell point now?" Dannel asked.

Zenna pointed toward the only choice that was apparent to them, a dark tunnel that extended away from the water's edge.

"Let's be about this, then," Beorna said, drawing her holy blade out of its scabbard. "Plenty of time to rest when we're dead."

"Cheerful prospect," Dannel said, following the dwarves as they started down the passage.

They didn't get very far before the passage ended in a huge, sheer wall of frozen ice. A narrow tunnel had been hacked in the wall, revealing another corridor beyond.

"This was done with tools," Arun said, examining the gap.

"The air is colder beyond," Dannel added.

"I'll go check it out," Mole offered, hopping into the opening.

"Mole, wait!" Zenna said, but she was already gone.

"Gnomes," Hodge said, clutching his axe tightly. He'd left his spear behind for this one, unwilling to deal with the large, cumbersome weapon in the flooded tunnels.

After a long, tense minute, Mole reappeared. "There's another passage further down," she said. "It's lit, and cold, and..."

"What?" Dannel asked.

"You guys need to see it for yourselves," the gnome replied. "It's... weird."

Chapter 268

Weird was an understatement, Zenna thought, when they'd all negotiated the bore through the ice wall and joined Mole in the corridor on the far side.

The tunnel here was cold, far colder even than on the other side of the ice wall, just fifteen feet or so away. Their breathing sent out plumes of white that hung in the air for a few seconds before dissipating, and they all knew that without the spells that protected them against the cold, they would all soon be freezing. The moisture still clinging to them from their swim quickly began to freeze, tiny bits of ice dropping from them to clink softly on the smooth stone at their feet.

They passed a mangled wreckage of iron bars, covered with frost. It took a moment to realize that the thing had once been a portcullis, a barrier now removed by some great force. Mole said that there were no traps remaining now upon it, and they pushed cautiously through the large gap into a narrower tunnel beyond.

About twenty feet beyond the ruined portcullis, they came to a set of large iron double doors, likewise rimed with frost. The portals looked sound, frozen in place, but one was slightly open, the gap large enough for them to negotiate without having to free the portals further. A soft blue light shone from the area beyond. As they drew near, Zenna could see that the doors were engraved with runes and sigils. They were difficult to make out, but the looked somehow familiar...

"Okay, you gotta see this," Mole said from beyond the doors, drawing her attention forward. Leaving the doors behind, she slipped through the join the rest of the companions.

The passage beyond the doors was completely smooth and square, ten feet wide and ten feet high. Small square plates that looked like iron were set into the ceiling at even intervals; they produced the diffuse bluish radiance that they'd seen earlier. In here it was even colder, and they shivered even through the magical protection of Shensen's warding spells.

But the odd construction of the tunnel was nothing in comparison to the crystal coffins.

Mole led them to the first, set into the floor at the edge of the passageway. Its surface was smooth, like glass, with a greenish tinge. But resting inside...

The creature was vaguely humanoid, in the way that an orc was vaguely like a human. The crystal distorted the light slightly, making the details of its form nebulous, that distortion adding to its menace. It was tall and lean, its flesh a pale green through the vista of the coffin, its body apparently perfectly preserved. Its face was bony and angular, as if a sculptor had begun work depicting a man and given up halfway through his work. Six arms protruded from its torso, and as she saw those Zenna's mind traveled back, to a place that suddenly seemed not unlike this one in its sterile décor...

"Vaprak's Voice," Dannel said, echoing her thoughts with his words. "The skeletons we fought."

"And that weird chair-sculpture thing," Mole added. "Built for six-armed people..."

"But what the 'ells are they?" Hodge asked, sidling up to the second coffin to get a better look at another of the creatures, a short distance further down the passage.

None of them had any answer.

"Well, they're long past..." Beorna began.

"Bloody criminy!" Hodge exclaimed, stumbling as he fell back quickly from the second coffin, his axe bursting into ready flame as he lifted the weapon.

"What is it?" Arun asked, scanning the hall for danger.

"That... thing!" Hodge said. "It moved!"

Mole looked up at the dwarf dubiously, then walked over to the coffin. She gave its resident a quick examination, then rapped on the top of the crystal. "Seems pretty dead to me," she said.

"I saw it!" the dwarf insisted.

"Either way, we should tread carefully," Dannel suggested. "Whatever they are, we already know that their workings are dangerous." The elf moved a short distance further into the passage, and bent to examine the floor. "There are faint marks here," he said. "Others have come this way before us."

“There is a door at the end of the passage,” Shensen said, coming up to stand beside the elf. “Shall we?”

They passed another half-dozen of the crystal coffins. Dannel had placed his continual flame into a pocket, leaving the strange ambient illumination to brighten their way. The blue glow from the ceiling panels glinted oddly off their metal gear, and the effects of the lighting in combination with the plumes of their breath gave them a grim appearance, their skin looking as pale as the dead.

The corridor ended in another set of iron doors. These had not been conveniently left open for them, so after Mole and Zenna had given them a cursory examination for mundane or magical hazards, Beorna and Arun went to work. A few blows from Arun’s hammer helped loosen the ice that had sealed the doors—the others cringed at the noise, but there was nothing to be done—and then the two dwarves, pushing side-by-side, pushed one of the doors open, the metal scraping on the floor as it resisted their efforts.

The room beyond the doors was apparently spherical, although two vertical walls of ice partitioned off two spaces in the rear of the chamber, making the place seem smaller than it was. There was a pillar of ice erected across from them, near the center of the room, but their view of it was obstructed by the dozens of strands of ice that extended across the room. These strands, each maybe an inch thick, connected the walls, ceiling, and floor, forming an intricate latticework. They did not block movement through the room entirely, but there were enough of them so that any sort of rapid progress through the chamber would be difficult.

“Those shouldn’t exist,” Zenna said, examining the closest of the strands. “That much ice, over that distance, it should break.” She began casting a cantrip, to delve more deeply into the nature of the place.

“This place is steeped in taint,” Arun growled. He too began to focus, scanning the chamber for the evil that his paladin’s gifts detected.

Beorna’s holy sword slid from its scabbard, and she spoke the words of a benediction, summoning the blessing of Helm.

Mole, naturally, stepped over to where she could touch one of the ice strands. “Ow!” she exclaimed, drawing back, shaking her injured hand.

“What is it?” Dannel asked.

“It... burned...” Her hand was white where the strand had inflicted a surge of magical energy upon her.

“Don’t touch ‘em,” Hodge said. “Right.” He lifted his magical axe, and flames burst eagerly upon the metal surface.

Zenna and Arun both started as one and turned toward the ice pillar.

“There!” Arun said, pointing with his holy sword, at the same moment that Zenna exclaimed, “It’s an illusion!”

But even as the two warned their companions, a tall figure emerged from the illusory pillar. Standing nearly twelve feet tall, the creature was a hideous insectoid monstrosity, with a malevolent intelligence shining in its bulbous red eyes. It bore a spear with a jagged blue steel head, and a nimbus of roiling black energy surrounded it like a dark halo. It did not hesitate, and as soon as it had appeared it extended a slender hand, chittering a word of power.

Unleashing a powerful cone of cold into the faces of the companions.

Chapter 269

The companions had been hit with the devastating icy blasts of cones of cold before. The ice devil’s power was considerable, but so to had the seven heroes gathered here been toughened in the forge of constant struggle, and they withstood the force of the terrible blast. Mole easily dodged aside from the spread of the cone, and Dannel dodged back behind the shelter of the doors, avoiding most of its force as well. Zenna turned away, her magical cloak helping to absorb some of its energy, while Shensen, who’d warded herself against cold upon entering the complex, took almost no damage from it at all.

The dwarves, on the other hand, arranged in a neat row in the front rank, absorbed the full force of the blast, and remained standing only through sheer stubbornness and dogged fortitude.

But even as the three dwarves shook frost from their blasted frames, it was clear that the tactical situation still favored the devil. Several of the proven-dangerous ice strands blocked the companions from its position, and while it might have been possible to dodge them, that would give the devil free rein to unleash more spells upon them, or strike at them with its spear while they were trying to reach it.

But Zenna made that question academic, as she turned back around, a cascade of tiny icicles falling from her cloak at the movement, and unleashed a fireball into the room.

The whoosh of heat exploded over the companions in a wave as the flames hungrily filled the open space of the room, engulfing the devil momentarily. When the blast cleared, the devil stood unharmed, its infernal resistances easily proof against the spell. But the ice lattice had been shattered, the strands of dark power melted, and the two flanking walls of ice had been partially melted as well, although neither had yet been fully breached.

The devil drew back slightly, as if given pause by this display of power.

Dannel’s first arrow struck it solidly on the torso. The arrow failed to penetrate, and glanced harmlessly off its body, but it drew back slightly as the jolt of electrical energy generated by Dannel’s bow seared into it. But the injury was only pathetically slight. The elf was already drawing his second arrow, but it was already obvious that the fiend was insanely tough, its chitinous hide thicker and more durable than even steel plate armor.

Beorna called upon the power of Helm, infusing herself with her patron's divine power. Thus fortified, she hefted her sword above her head and closed with the fiend, careful to remain out of the reach of its spear until she could find an opening to strike.

Arun's reaction was even more straightforward; instead of pausing to cast a spell he hurled himself straight toward this adversary. The devil was quick to react, and as the dwarf closed its spear sliced out, catching the paladin on the shoulder. The spear, infused with the frozen power of the devil, sent a deep chill through Arun's body, but he grunted and fought through the numbness threatening to catch him up, and swept his holy blade at the devil's narrow torso. The stroke was powerful, but as the blade intersected the dark field of energy surrounding its body it was turned, meeting a resistance born in evil magic.

Hodge lagged behind the other warriors for a moment, the seriously injured dwarf pausing to grasp his jug of healing liqueur with hands that shook from penetrating cold. Thus it was that he was caught on the far side of the wall of ice that the devil conjured, adding another thick divider that separated the room in two.

With the devil, Beorna, and Arun alone on the other side.

Chapter 270

Things suddenly looked bleak for Arun and Beorna, trapped alone in a prison of ice with a fierce gelugon. The dwarves, though tough, had already taken a beating, while the ice devil had been barely scratched.

But neither dwarf hesitated to consider the grim nature of their situation. Taking for granted that their allies would hurry to their aid, both dwarves stepped forward and unleashed a full series of attacks upon the devil, leaving nothing back.

"Blasted thing's tough!" Beorna grunted, as her first attack glanced off of the same dark shield that had foiled Arun. But her second swing found a narrow opening that she exploited, driving her holy blade through its defenses and opening a shallow gash in its thick hide. Ugly black ichor spilled from the wound, smoking as the liquid hit the frozen air.

Arun unleashed everything he had, trying again to smite the devil with a powerful blow. His sword tore through its shield and into its body, cutting a swath across its body just under its left arm. He followed with another series of rapid strikes, but the devil was quick to recover, and none of his other attacks penetrated its defenses.

Only a few heartbeats had passed since it had separated itself and these two foes from the others, but already it seemed that the devil was having second thoughts about its tactics. Rather than attack, it let out an inhuman screech, and with a faint flicker of white light it vanished.

"Gone already?" Beorna asked, slicing her sword through the space it had occupied to verify that it had not merely made itself invisible.

"I doubt it," Arun said, already looking around for a reappearance.

The wall of ice behind them began to glow, the barrier melting before the force of several scorching rays from Zenna. As an opening appeared, Dannel asked, "Are you two all right?"

"The beastie didn't like what we had to offer," Beorna said. "But it may be back for more, on terms more to its liking." The templar paused to cast a healing spell upon herself, easing some of the injury it had suffered from the cone of cold.

"Should we retreat?" Dannel asked. "Face it in the outer hall?"

"Might as well just line up for another cone of cold," Shensen suggested. "At least in the chamber, we have room to maneuver."

"All right, we're coming through," Zenna said. "But careful, the area around the breach is still deathly cold; do not dally."

Soon the companions had gathered again in the chamber. They spread out, alert for further signs of the devil. Spells were cast, wounds treated, wards laid.

Seconds ticked by with agonizing slowness; barely thirty seconds had passed in all since they devil had first appeared.

Mole yelled a warning from beside one of the other walls of ice, partially melted by Zenna's fireball. "I see something moving back there!" she shouted.

"I'll open us a winder," Hodge growled, lifting his flaming axe.

"Ready, everyone!" Zenna said, casting one last spell.

"It's gone!" Mole reported, peering through the translucent wall.

A faint sound was their only warning, but it was enough for Dannel's sensitive ears. The elf looked up...

The devil was there, crouching against the apex of the ceiling twenty feet above, defying gravity through the use of some sort of magic. Even as Dannel shouted a warning to his companions, and lifted his bow to fire, the gelugon made a gesture and spoke infernal words of arcane power. The air around the devil seemed to ripple, and then a storm of huge oblong hailstones began to plummet down upon the companions below.

Chapter 271

"I'm starting to get a little tired of this thing!" Beorna yelled, holding up her arm to protect her face as the driving hailstones of the ice storm pounded her, glancing off of the solid adamantine plates of her armor. All of them were blasted by cold and the hard impacts of the stones; even Mole's speed and agility were of no use, as the hailstones seemed to be everywhere at once.

Zenna staggered backward as a hailstone clipped her on the shoulder; her innate resistance to cold protected her from some of the power of the devil's spell, but that proved of little help against the physical impacts. She looked up to see Dannel standing his ground a few paces away, trying to ignore the hits that drove painfully into him, sending arrows up through the storm at the devil. A screech from above told of a hit; in the brief interlude since the devil had teleported away Zenna had aligned his arrows, and now his shots had a more telling impact. But the devil's black shield protected it from most of their attacks, and even those that got through that outer barrier had to content with its unnaturally thick hide.

"We have to disrupt its magic!" Shensen shouted. Zenna had had the same thought, but she knew her own abilities—and limitations—too well to hope that her powers could foil the potent magic of the fiend.

Still, she had to try, and she wasn't alone; her companions likewise unleashed their most powerful spells and other attacks upon the creature. Beorna spoke a word of dismissal; the clarion tone of that spell momentarily sang through the chamber with bright energy, but the devil resisted it, and the spell dissipated without effect. Similarly Zenna's dispel faltered without effect, and while Shensen's effort a moment later had a slightly greater impact, its unholy aura fading, the magic that kept it aloft continued to function, and a few moments later the devil simply restored its protective shield, gesturing almost contemptuously at them as it worked its magic anew.

Arun had unlimbered his large but infrequently used bow, and was fitting an arrow to the string when Zenna shouted, "Arun! Use Dannel's arrows!" The dwarf nodded, recognizing her intent, and joined the elf, who continued his barrage, his magical quiver producing the aligned arrows in a steady stream upon demand. Zenna was about to cast a haste spell, but seeing how badly Dannel was hurt, she instead stepped up to him and unleashed a powerful healing spell into his nearly-frozen body.

Her aid came not a moment too soon, for the devil, hurt now by several of the arrows from Dannel's persistent barrage, chattered out an inarticulate statement of rage and lowered its spear toward them, diving toward the floor. For an instant Zenna thought that the devil intended to simply impale Dannel with the force of its descent, but then, cleverly, it arrested its dive a good nine or ten feet above them. She recognized instantly its strategy; that distance was just outside of the effective reach of the dwarven warriors, while its own long limbs and spear would allow it to strike effortlessly in return. And in proof its first thrust tore deeply into Dannel's shoulder. Without Zenna's healing he would have been crippled or killed by that strike, and even as it was he staggered back in pain, half-frozen blood trickling out from the wound, his nimble motions slowed by the devil's numbing chill.

Zenna looked up into the fiend's glowing eyes, and felt a cold terror surge over her. An aura of fear radiated out from it, engulfing those closest to it. For a moment, it felt as though sheer panic would overwhelm her senses...

But only for a moment. Even without her own formidable mental discipline to consider, she and the others had a lifeline in their midst, a bulwark that fortified them all against the devil's fear. Arun radiated a sense of calm, of courage that reinforced them against the fear. The dwarf drew back his bow and fired, and while the missile glanced harmlessly from the devil's unholy aura, just the sheer act of resistance seemed to bolster them all, and drive them to press their attacks.

Hodge, thankfully out of the radius of the fear aura, had winched a bolt into place in his heavy crossbow, and now he fired as well. His shot, however, was no more effective.

Beorna unleashed a ray of searing light at the devil, but cursed as the beam of energy struck the unholy aura and dissipated.

"Keep at it!" Zenna urged, casting her haste spell now, canceling the power that had numbed Dannel, and enhancing the speed of her friends. The devil's long, slender tail struck out at her with sudden speed, but she had not neglected her own defenses. The devil's attack impacted the layered protections of two magical shields, one arcane, the other divine, and was turned by the barest of margins.

But its attack upon her was just a feint, as it turned the full force of its efforts on Arun. The spear darted down once, twice, and yet again, driving through the dwarf's armor with the first powerful thrust, knocking the bow roughly from his hands as the second clipped his arm and tore through his greave. Arun staggered, but it was not yet done, keening as it suddenly flipped in mid-air, its alien head snapping down to deliver a powerful bite that might have decapitated him, had it not been for the protection of his mithral helm. Even with that moderate protection, though, he was hurt bad, and he fell back, reaching for his shield and sword.

"Hands off him!" Beorna shouted at the demon. Calling upon Helm's power once more, the templar enlarged, her body seeming to swell with divine fury as she lifted her sword in challenge.

A moment later, the air above the gelugon flickered in a shimmer of light and air. The companions tensed, fearing some new devilry, but as the distortion took on form, an amorphous, nearly invisible vortex of moving air, it drove down into the devil from behind, slamming at it with powerful slams of concentrated air. The elemental did not harm it seriously, but the devil was caught off-balance, and was driven down almost to the floor, within reach of the companions' weapons.

Mole had been waiting for just such an opportunity. With the devil's attention more than a bit distracted, she ran in and leapt at its back, hoping to land a sneak attack. Unfortunately her tiny weapon was little able to penetrate its thick hide, and she landed in a soft roll, darting back to await another chance.

Thus far, the gelugon seemed nearly invincible, taking everything that the companions could throw at it, its innate resistances and the dark mantle of power with which it had cloaked itself absorbing their best efforts. But slowly, it was taking hurts, injuries from blessed weapons that even its phenomenal regenerative powers could not restore. But while it was possessed of a fierce diabolical intelligence, the devil had been driven half-insane by centuries of confinement to this place, trapped by the eldritch arts of the spellweavers who had passed centuries ago, leaving their guardian to languish in solitude. Only once before in recent memory had its prison been disturbed, and that time its foes had retreated and bypassed it, mocking it in its captivity. Now, faced with enemies who shone with goodness, carrying hated weapons of light, an overwhelming surge of anger filled it, and it unleashed the full force of its hatred upon them, seeking vengeance upon the only convenient outlet it had had in five hundred years.

An arrow stabbed into its shoulder, breaking through the red haze of its fury with pain. The archer was that damned elf, and almost without thinking the devil pointed and unleashed another cone of cold that engulfed him. The elf was fast, but when the force of the blast dissipated, he was satisfyingly on his back, covered in a rime of white frost.

Unfortunately for the fiend, the attack had only taken down one of its foes, and it was still within their reach. The elemental continued to pound on it from above, mostly ineffectually, although its assault made it almost impossible for the devil to regain altitude. Zenna rushed to Dannel's side, while Arun slashed at it with his sword, managing to add another gash in its right leg to its overall tally of injuries.

Hodge lifted his axe and came at it from the side, but as he entered the radius of its fear aura he stumbled back, his eyes widening in sudden horror. Unable to resist that dark power even with the countering effects of Arun's aura of courage, the dwarf fighter dropped his weapon and ran, screaming.

But then, Beorna came forward.

Her sword, blazing with holy light, was a good seven feet long now, enlarged with the rest of her by her earlier invocation. She used her extended reach to good advantage, driving the weapon down in a powerful two-handed arc that the devil saw coming too late. The edge of the sword intersected with its neck, and with a final truncated screech the gelugon's head went flying, the dark energy surrounding it vanishing with a jarring suddenness as its body crashed down lifelessly to the ground.

Chapter 272

It took them the better part of an hour to recover and get ready to move out again. The devil had been a fierce adversary, and nearly all of them bore wounds, although Mole and Shensen were comparatively uninjured in comparison to the rest of them. Zenna and Beorna used their healing spells to restore nearly all of the injuries they'd suffered, with minor potions and a few charges from their wands making up the difference. Dannel had been most seriously hurt, nearly slain by the second cone of cold, and he continued to shiver for some time even after Zenna had treated his wounds. They recovered Hodge, the dwarf's glare daring them to make a comment on his inglorious retreat, and for the moment they agreed to quietly drop the matter.

Although Mole's semi-covert giggling whenever she looked at the dwarf suggested that the story would be recited later in more detail.

The wall of ice conjured by the gelugon vanished shortly after its death, but the other two appeared to be more durable, permanent in nature. Sparing their spells for later use, they relied upon their weapons, in particular Hodge's flaming axe, to open breaches in both. They had to wait for some time for the field of magical cold around each opening to fade, after which they explored the spaces beyond. Both walls warded exit corridors, but the one on the left culminated in a total collapse after only about twenty feet. The other one led to doors, which in turn deposited them into a corridor that led off in several directions. There were more of the crystal coffins here, several of which were occupied by more of the six-armed sepulchral residents.

They headed right, giving those glassine cairns a wide berth. This part of the complex seemed to be in poor repair, with more partial collapses evident here and there, although the corridor they were in seemed secure and intact. The light panels continued to issue their radiance, and nothing living stirred in reaction to their footsteps.

The corridor ended in an intersection, with another large iron door to their right. The corridor continued to their left, while directly ahead of them a wide staircase descended a short distance before ending in a total collapse.

"Let's check out this door," Mole said, giving the portal a quick but thorough examination. Upon pronouncing it clean, the dwarves went to work, forcing it open with a fair amount of effort.

Beyond the door was another chamber, slightly smaller than the one where they'd battled the devil. The ceiling was lower, about fifteen feet, lit by the ubiquitous metal panels. Their attention was immediately drawn to the chamber's sole feature of note, a massive iron statue of an unidentifiable humanoid, a faceless figure a good twelve feet in height. Its "hands" were fashioned into forbidding bludgeons, and it was covered in a thick layer of frost that obscured any details of its craftsmanship.

"Big 'un," Hodge commented, as they stepped warily into the room, their weapons at the ready.

"I bet it's a golem," Mole said.

A moment later, as if her words had triggered it, the statue shifted, and with a grating sound of metal protesting against its movement, the construct took a ponderous step forward.

"Sometimes, I hate being right all the time," the gnome sighed.

Chapter 273

Faced with a hulking iron golem guardian, the companions gamely surged forward to meet it.

Dannel's arrows were first to strike; the missiles shattered harmlessly against its body, but with each impact a pulse of electrical energy sizzled through its metal body. The golem reacted noticeably to the assault, its movements becoming jerkier and slower.

“Keep shooting it!” Zenna encouraged. “The electricity is slowing it!” She could offer little more than verbal support, however, as she knew that her remaining spells, mostly enchantments, would have no effect upon it. Instead she cast her second haste spell, bolstering her companions.

Arun and Hodge rushed forward to meet it, but their weapons clanged harmless off of its iron hide. Beorna paused a moment, drawing out her adamantine sword and calling again upon Helm’s intervention to enhance her battle prowess. Shensen, likewise, cast a spell, moving forward to do battle with the massive construct. Though taller than the dwarves, she looked far more fragile, without even the benefit of armor to protect her. She moved with a smooth, willowy grace, however, a stark contrast to the awkward but powerful movements of the golem.

The golem delivered a crushing blow that slammed mightily into Hodge’s chest. Even slowed, the punch drove the unfortunate dwarf backwards several paces, and his face turned red as his lungs fought to recover the air that had been blasted out of him. Arun tried to distract the golem back toward him, but again his attack was completely ineffectual. Dannel continued to impact it with arrows, but most of his shots bounced cleanly off of it, not even sticking long enough to impart their electrical shocks.

Beorna rushed forward with a loud cry of battle, her sword raised high. The golem stepped forward to follow its initial attack on Hodge, but she intercepted it, bringing her blade down solidly upon its leg. The enchanted iron of its construction gave way before the awesome durability of adamantine, one of the strongest metals known on Faerûn. The blow opened a crack in the limb, and hot steam issued from the wound.

Clearly injured, the golem turned its attention to the templar. She tried to dodge back from its attack, but the edge of the bludgeon still caught her painfully on the edge of arm, spinning her around with the force of the blow.

Shensen, moving around the fringe of the battle, took advantage of its distraction to lunge in, her hand surrounded by a pale green glow. But whatever rudimentary intelligence drove the golem detected her coming, and it turned, bringing its other arm around in a broad sweep. Shensen leapt over it, but the edge of the hammer that replaced its hand impacted heavily on her ankle. The druid managed to recover, rolling with the impact and catching her weight on her hands, somersaulting forward to land painfully on her feet. Favoring her injured ankle, she darted into a crouch and reached out to touch the golem’s leg.

At her touch, a patch of brown began to spread outward across the golem’s thick leg. Her rusting grasp crept slowly out across the limb, bringing corrosion, undermining the integrity of the construct.

But the golem was a tough foe. Ignoring the still futile assaults from the other warriors, it turned to focus its efforts upon the injured druid. Shensen did not retreat, though she faded into a defensive crouch, still favoring her ankle.

Beorna continued to hack at it, but after the effectiveness of her initial attack fortune seemed to have deserted her. Though her attacks were powerful, she seemed unable to land a solid blow, her sword striking at an angle and bouncing off of the golem's thick hide.

Mole, coming up behind the golem, tried to distract it, but the golem had no critical points that she could sneak attack, and her tiny weapons had no chance of harming it. Hodge, recovering from his initial injury, launched an all-out attack upon it with his axe, but he over-compensated, and he managed only a glancing hit that failed to distract it from the embattled druid.

Shensen tensed as the golem twisted, its massive arm coming down to pulverize her. She bent to leap aside, but at that moment her ankle buckled, and the quick jump she'd intended became a half-fall, half-stagger. The golem's fist slammed into her with a solid thump, and she went flying backward six paces to land unmoving on the hard floor.

Chapter 274

"Face me, you bastard!" Beorna yelled, slamming her sword ineffectually again into the golem's lower body. The construct granted the templar her wish, turning from the defeated Shensen to lay into her with a solid punch that she simply absorbed, gritting her teeth against the pain as even adamantine plate buckled under the force of the impact.

"Is... that... the... best... you got?" she shouted, swinging her sword again, this time hitting it on the joint of its elbow as it drew back its arm, releasing another jet of hot steam as her sword managed to crack its frame once more.

Zenna ran over and knelt at Shensen's side, relieved that the woman still drew breath. Clearing her mind of the chaos of battle that raged just a short distance away, she focused upon her power, channeling life-giving positive energy into the battered woman.

Slowly, Shensen stirred, groaning.

"Beorna! Fall back!" Arun shouted as the golem struck her again, driving her to one knee.

"Like hell!" she returned, standing with a scream of rage and pain, smiting the golem with another two-handed swing that unfortunately did not appear to have any effect. Arun, realizing that his attacks could not harm this thing, moved toward her, intending to lay on hands to help the embattled templar. But his shift took him too near the golem's legs, and one suddenly shifted, slamming into his side without enough force to knock him down.

Gritting his teeth, the paladin looked up to see the huge foot coming right down toward his body.

"Help me... up..." Shensen said, her face contracting as she battled the pain that continued to stab through her body, despite Zenna's healing.

"You're still too hurt..." Zenna began, but the determination in the druid's eyes silenced her, and she complied. Shensen closed her eyes and touched the torc she wore, a necklace fashioned from the branches of several kinds of trees and bushes interwoven into a green disc. Zenna thought she smelled the fresh odor of pine needles as a soft glow spread outward through the druid's body, and when she stood she seemed whole, even her ankle supporting her weight without protest.

"Thank you," Shensen said. Then she turned and ran straight toward the golem again.

A hand reached in and grabbed Arun, dragging him out from under the descending foot a moment before it slammed down into the floor. Beorna smiled as she pulled the paladin up beside her, but her movements were pained, and her body heaved with each breath she took.

"Not a time... to be fallin' down on the job!" she said.

"Look out!" Arun warned. The two dwarves split apart as the golem swung at them again. Beorna swung her sword, and a piece of the golem's fist was actually cut free from its body by her stroke. But an instant later the smoking remnant slammed into her, knocking her roughly backward.

The templar had taken just too much punishment, and although she managed to lift her sword, a moment later she fell back and toppled to the floor.

Arun immediately rushed to help her, but the golem had paid no heed to his attacks thus far, and he wondered how he could possibly keep the thing from crushing her.

But then he saw Shensen, charging in from the flank. The golem shifted almost exactly as before, but this time the druid ducked low under its sweeping arm, springing up to leap at its side. Her hand, fully extended before her, struck it solidly just under its armpit, and she hung there for a heartbeat before falling back, landing smoothly on her feet and darting back into a ready crouch.

The golem creaked and turned again, even as another patch of brown spread through its torso. At its sudden movement its shoulder buckled, and a huge rent appeared as the weight of its arm began to tear the joint that Shensen's touch had weakened. The golem staggered, steam pouring out of its body, and as the companions drew hastily back, Arun and Hodge together dragging Beorna, it teetered and collapsed in a smoking heap.

Chapter 275

Following the battle with the golem, the companions quickly decided that they needed to retreat and rest, to recover from the beating they'd taken in their two encounters thus far in Karran-Kural. In the rear of the chamber they found a shaft, a perfectly smooth cylindrical opening that appeared to provide access to some lower level of the complex, but despite Mole's curiosity even the gnome had to admit that they were in no shape for further exploration.

They retraced their steps all the way back to the outer ice wall, and set up camp at the edge of the pool that gave access to the flooded tunnels. Shensen transformed herself into the shape of an octopus again and returned to the water long enough to catch a half-dozen fish. Planning ahead, Mole had brought a compact package full of charcoal pieces in her bag of holding, so they were able to warm themselves and cook their repast at the same time.

“Now, this be more like it,” Hodge said after picking one of the fish clean, leaning back against the rocks and letting out a large belch. To Shensen, he said, “Yer all right, lady, fer a drow.”

Zenna elbowed him, but the druid only laughed. “I am pleased to be able to rise to your high standards, ser dwarf.”

“So, what do you think we’ll find on the next level?” Mole asked.

“Whatever it is, it’s something that someone really doesn’t want others to find,” Beorna commented. “Ice devils and iron golems just don’t randomly appear. Those were guardians, and tough ones.” With that statement she kicked off her boots and leaned back against a sloping rock, and within a few moments was asleep.

It was a sobering thought, and it followed them as they set watches and prepared for rest. Zenna cast a spell that would alert them if any foes approached, but their sleep passed without interruption, and soon they were readying themselves once more for battle, talking about tactics over a cold breakfast of rations from Mole’s ever-useful bag.

“Whatever’s down here, it seems to be ready and waiting for us,” Beorna said. “So my suggestion is this: quit mincing around. We command both considerable fighting strength and potent magic. So we buff up to the gills, and head straight in.”

“Scouting ahead isn’t necessarily a bad thing,” Zenna said. “Trust me—we’ve walked into enough traps and ambushes to know better.”

“I’m not saying walk in blindly,” Beorna persisted. “But we go in ready for trouble, and when it appears, we hit it with everything we got, and take it down.”

They could agree on that, at least, and so it was with a renewed sense of purpose that they returned to Karran-Kural. They still had a good twelve hours or so left on their endure elements spells, so the icy chill that greeted them again as they reentered the complex was just an annoyance, rather than a life-threatening affair. Per Beorna’s suggestion the spellcasters had shared out the various longer-lasting protections they’d possessed. Shensen had protected Beorna with a ward that turned her flesh a chalky gray color, the stoneskin giving her a potent resistance to physical attacks.

They soon had retraced their steps to the shaft leading down. The light from the ceiling panels was bright enough to reveal that the shaft’s bottom was only about twenty feet below, and that it opened onto another larger space below.

“We’ll need rope,” Dannel suggested, but Mole was already removing her coil of good silk rope from her bag.

“Getting up will be harder than getting down,” Shensen pointed out. “Especially for the dwarves.”

“Yer sayin’ I ken nay climb a rope as good as an elf?” Hodge bristled.

“Not at all, but neither are we carrying fifty or so pounds of metal on our persons, as are all of you.”

“When it comes to it, we’ll manage,” Arun assured her. “I have a friend who may be able to help in this sort of situation.” He took one end of the rope, and attached it to the arm of the iron golem nearby.

“Well, looks like we’ll need a scout,” Mole said. With a mischievous look on her face, she edged over to the rim of the shaft... and jumped in.

Without the rope.

“Mole!” Zenna said, hurrying to the shaft in time to see her friend falling, kicking off against the sides of the shaft to slow her descent. When she reached the bottom she tucked into a roll and tumbled out of view.

“One of these days, that girl’s going to jump headfirst into a dragon’s mouth,” Beorna observed.

“Oh, she already has,” Zenna replied.

“Anything?” Dannel called down the shaft, his feather fall spell at his lips to leap to Mole’s aid if needed.

Mole’s face reappeared below. “All clear,” she reported. “Come on down.”

With the aid of the rope, the descent was easy enough, and soon they had all reached the bottom of the shaft safely. The room below was almost entirely collapsed, frost-rimed rubble forming an impenetrable wall around them, but there was an intact door that led out into another corridor.

As they moved out into the passage, Beorna paused to touch Arun briefly. A tremor of power passed between them. “A ward, to keep you safe,” she said, with a faint smile. Before any of the others could notice their delay, she turned and took up a lead position in the new tunnel.

The lower level was quiet but held a certain heavy air to it, as though they could consciously feel the weight of the thousands of tons of rock above them. The omnipresent cold was here as well, but the air was dry, and the stone floor at their feet was free of ice and easy to navigate.

They reached an intersection. To their right the corridor was truncated by another collapse, while directly ahead of them the passage continued for a short distance before culminating in another iron door. But to their left, they could see another ice lattice a short distance ahead, all but blocking the passage. The tunnel was narrow, and they would have to go single-file, in that direction.

“Well, thus far we’ve had bad luck with doors,” Dannel said, looking down the passage. “Zenna?”

“I’d rather save my fireball for an enemy, rather than clearing a passage.”

“I have a spell that can help, but it may not reach the upper part of the lattice,” Shensen said. “We taller folk might have to duck.”

“Ah, just stand back and let me do it,” Hodge grumbled, holding aloft his axe, calling forth the burning flames that surrounded its head.

They started cautiously down the corridor, with the dwarf in the lead. They found that his weapon could burn away the strands without injuring him, so they slowly made their way forward. Zenna, stationed near the rear of the column, tried to stay close to those ahead so that they could benefit from the magic circle against evil that she’d cast upon their reentry to the complex. She was acutely conscious of the rapid passage of minutes since they’d returned to Karran-Kural, but even though she knew that their warding spells were of limited duration, she knew from experience that being hasty could have an even greater cost.

Finally, Hodge had cleared a way through most of the obstructing strands within reach, and the rest of the corridor stretched unobstructed before them. They could see that another door marked the end of the passage not too far ahead.

Mole slipped ahead of Hodge to take the lead. “You’d better let me check ahead,” she said. “No offense, but you wouldn’t see a trap if its maker outlined it in red chalk and put a sign over it.”

“Bah!” Hodge said, but he offered no other complaint.

Mole turned toward the door just in time to see it swing inward. Standing there, in the doorway, was a tall human dressed in thick robes lined with rich fur. His profession was instantly obvious by the shifting mirror images that came into view with him, darting in and about his true location in a confusing shimmer.

“Wizard!” Mole cried, in case one of her friends hadn’t seen him.

The man pointed toward them, and Mole opened her mouth to shout another warning, but before she could a sizzling, empowered lightning bolt slammed down the length of the tunnel.

And then, even before the first had fully discharged, the screams of pain from the companions still echoing through the haze of burned flesh and stinging ozone, he laughed and added a second, quickened bolt on top of the first.

Chapter 276

The adventurers had encountered Fetor Abradius, and in the crowded confines of the narrow tunnel they fell victim to the same deadly stratagem that had undone the Stormblades.

The twin lightning bolts were absolutely deadly. Mole had instantly thrown herself prone, avoiding both blasts, but the others were not so lucky. Hodge went down, his beard charred, his face edged with black where the bolts had seared his flesh. Behind him, Beorna took the full force of the first, empowered bolt, and only the fact that she staggered and fell to the side saved her from being finished by the second. Arun fared only slightly better, his incredible stamina preserving him, but it was clear that he too was hurt bad. And the bolts kept going, through the dwarves, into the rear ranks. Zenna's magic circle bolstered her innate defenses, allowing her to weather the first bolt, but the second passed through Arun and impacted her squarely in the chest, knocking her back into Dannel. The elf, barely conscious, held onto her as she blacked out. Finally Sensen, in the rear of the company, was able to avoid the full force of the still-potent bolts, but was likewise seriously hurt.

The wizard, meanwhile, had stepped to the side, out of their line of sight.

Another one of those, and we're finished, Mole thought to herself, springing up lightly to her feet. She'd taken in the effects of the bolts upon her friends in a single glance, and knew that she was the only one able, at the moment, to offer a counter to the deadly mage. But charging forward to meet him alone didn't seem very appealing, even to her often-reckless inclinations.

Then an idea flickered into fruition in her mind, and despite the circumstances a wide smile appeared on her face. She reached into the bag tucked into her belt, kept close at hand for the opportunity she'd been waiting for since she's bought it. She grabbed the small furry object held inside, and with a smooth snap of her wrist tossed it forward, into the open doorway. The little ball suddenly swelled into a snorting, snarling boar, four feet long, which instantly turned to the left and started attacking.

Even as she drank in the glories of her new magic item, Mole was rushing forward to join her newfound ally. She threw in a forward flip to carry her over the boar, landing on her feet a few paces into the room.

Ignoring her own wounds, Beorna was quick to kneel at Hodge's side. The dwarf fighter looked an utter mess, but he still drew breath, though each gasp rattled in his throat as he fell closer toward death. The templar did not hesitate, pouring her most potent healing spell into him, and his eyes popped wide open in surprise as the torrent of positive energy scoured through his body.

Arun, seeing that his friend was in good hands, pushed past them, careful not to disrupt the priestess's concentration. Despite his own wounds, he made his way toward the doorway, drawing his holy sword as he came.

“Zenna!” Dannel cried, holding her up, uncertain if she still lived. Desperately he called upon his healing song, channeling its energy into her, when she stirred, faintly, he felt a deluge of relief. Behind him, Shensen healed herself, then turned to the elf.

“You’re both hurt bad,” she said. “Fall back, I’ll help the others deal with the arcanist.”

Dannel nodded, but Zenna shook her head weakly. “No, we’ve got to help the others,” she said.

“You’ll not help them by getting yourself killed,” he told her. “Another blast like that will finish both of us!”

Reluctantly, she let him drag her back down the corridor to the intersection.

Mole drew her rapier as she landed on her feet, and looked up at the wizard. The man had a hateful look to him, and he sneered as he looked at her. “Is that the best you can do?” he said, with a contemptuous sneer at the boar. The summoned animal tried to gore him, but it only managed to pierce an image.

“Okay, I’m sure you’ve got a million spells protecting you, but I’m going to kill you anyway,” Mole said, threatening him with her admittedly tiny rapier.

But the wizard only laughed, and turned back into the doorway, ignoring both her and her boar to deal with the greater threats posed by her companions. He found himself facing Arun, the dwarf just a few paces away. Arun lifted his sword and charged, but Abradius pointed and spoke words of mystical power, summoning a spell. Darts of liquid energy blasted from his fingertips into Arun, each one driving through his armor and searing the flesh beneath. Five bolts stabbed true, and then, even as the dwarf grimaced in pain, another five exploded into him. There was no way that even Arun, already devastated by the twin lightning bolts, hit now by ten magic missiles, could withstand such an assault.

And yet, somehow, impossibly, the dwarf remained standing, hovering on the brink of destruction.

“Aaaaarrrrgggg!” Mole yelled, charging at the wizard, leaping into a cartwheel that caught even the veteran wizard off guard. The images shifted around him, trying to confound her, but through blind luck she leapt up and stabbed in a sudden thrust that found real flesh. Abradius cursed and staggered backward, clutching at the deep wound that spread crimson across the chest of his robes.

“You’ll pay for that!” he hissed at her.

Arun knew that he was in bad shape, and that another spell from the wizard would likely kill him. But he also knew that if he delayed, even for the few seconds needed to heal himself, the wizard might instead kill Mole. Grimly he started forward, feeling the wet trails of blood pouring down his body. But before he could pass through the doors, a familiar voice sounded behind him, and a familiar touch poured life into his battered body.

“Go,” Beorna said. “Kick some ass.”

Abradius had been hurt, but the wizard still had surprises left, which he proved by reaching out and roughly grasping Mole by the shoulder. A hungry red glow flared between them, and Mole screamed as she felt her very life being torn from her. Even worse, that energy was absorbed greedily by the wizard, and she watched the wound she had inflicted swiftly close. Abradius laughed and released her, seeming even stronger than he had been before.

Arun appeared in the doorway, followed a pace later by Shensen. The paladin immediately laid into the mage with his sword, but the blow impacted an image. Even as it vanished, several others shifted forward to take its place, making the wizard's true position almost impossible to discern.

Shensen helped cut down those odds by hurling a pair of tiny shuriken, the steel throwing stars spinning through the air at him. The first passed harmlessly through an image, disrupting it, but the second hit something solid, and all of the images suddenly sported the star, jutting from his bicep.

"Bah!" he said, pulling out the weapon and dropping it to the floor. But he quickly began to feel the effects of Shensen's "surprise", as the scorpion venom she'd coated her stars with began to creep into his system.

Shrugging off the pain of his vampiric touch, Mole moved to flank the wizard. The boar continued to attack with dogged persistence, despite the fact that it hadn't hit anything yet, but Abradius was starting to run out of mirror images. Mole missed cleanly, though, her thrust not connecting with anything at all, real or illusory, and she spat one of her favorite Hodge-curses in response.

The odds were turning against the wizard, but he held his ground, summoning the power of another spell. A wave of mental energy swept over them, trying to cloud their minds with a cloying confusion. Shensen's mental discipline was far too great for even Abradius's expert magic to overcome, and Arun, fortified by his divine calling, was likewise just able to resist.

Unfortunately, Mole's will had never been her strong point. Suddenly overcome by the barrage of conflicting mental images, she lowered her weapon and began babbling incoherently.

But the wizard paid for that a moment later, as Arun tore into him. There were not enough images now to foil the paladin, and this time the holy sword cut flesh, the wizard falling back as he clutched the deep gash in his side. Behind him, Shensen began casting a spell, and behind her, Beorna and Hodge appeared, both still hurt but fortified by the templar's healing powers.

"This isn't over!" the wizard shrieked. "The secrets of the soul pillars are mine, and mine alone!" The companions rushed at him, weapons raised to strike, but Abradius spoke another word of power, and reality shifted around him, and he vanished, transported away by a dimension door.

“Damn,” Hodge said, slumping back against the wall, wiping his blackened forehead with the back of his hand.

Chapter 277

Arun and Beorna grappled Mole—normally a difficult task, but made easier due to her confusion—and held her until the power of Abradius’s spell had faded. The companions gathered in the circular chamber where the mage had waited, healing their injuries and discussing their next course.

“That was close... too close,” Dannel commented. “Those lightning bolts nearly killed several of us, and that was just the first few seconds of the battle.”

“We fell prey to the same ambush that caught the Stormblades,” Zenna said. “He was waiting for us in a confined space, where we could not avoid the bolts. He was powerful... his spells were improved through the use of metamagic, a talent well beyond what I can manage with my own magic.”

“What do you think he meant by the ‘soul pillars’?” Mole asked.

“What we’re here to find, I’d presume,” Arun said.

“What do you make of this?” Shensen said, drawing their attention to the center of the room.

They gathered to examine the only distinct feature in the room, a patch of what looked like black ice that covered the floor in a roughly circular outline about eight feet across. Dannel bent to examine the floor, his skilled eye noticing faint scuffs where the others only saw gray stone. “I’d say our wizard friend spent a good deal of time standing here,” he told them.

Zenna came over, and cast a spell, focusing on the ice for some moments. “It’s a divination device,” she finally reported. “Let me see if I can discern its operation...”

She closed her eyes, her brow furrowing in concentration. Flickering images began to appear within the ice, finally coming into focus with a startling rapidity.

They could see the evil loremaster, Feto Abradius, standing in a darkened chamber. Before him, in the shadows, a pair of slender pillars rose out of a great pit in the floor to ascend high above, out of their field of view. For some reason, even through the shadowy image of the magical viewer, those pillars filled each of them with a sinister feeling of dread. Hodge muttered a curse, and Beorna added a whispered prayer to Helm, her hands tightening on the hilt of her sword.

Something stirred in the shadows, a long, sinuous form. Then Abradius spun suddenly, snarling as he looked directly at them. The companions drew back in alarm, but then the mage waved his hand, and the ice went black once more.

“Well, I guess he doesn’t like being spied upon,” Dannel commented.

“So much for him fleeing the scene,” Beorna said. “And more importantly, we know he’s gathering reinforcements. Whatever that... thing was, I didn’t like the looks of it.”

“Should we retreat?” Dannel asked.

Arun shook his head. “He knows we’re here, and we’d never get out of the complex before he could attack us, if that is his goal.”

“And even if he did allow us to retreat and recover our strength, the next time we meet him he’d have those same spells ready again, or something even more nasty,” Zenna said.

“Well then, let’s be about this while our wards persist,” Beorna said simply, leading them out of the room back into the corridor.

They returned to the intersection, and the iron door there. Beorna started toward it, but Zenna held her up. “Wait,” she said. “Each door we’ve opened thus far has concealed an enemy. And for all we know, the wizard’s ambush lies beyond this one. Maybe, just this one, we should be prepared.”

“What do you propose, Zenna?” Arun asked.

“Give me some time,” she said. “I know that the minutes are precious, but in this case, I think the knowledge we may gain may be worth the cost.”

She knelt before the doors, and began an intricate casting. The others waited—some, like Beorna, clearly impatient—as she wove a complex divination spell. Finally, she lifted her hands to her forehead and raised her head, her eyes shut. Almost immediately she jerked back, and quickly stood, letting the spell dissipate.

“What is it? What’s the matter?” Dannel asked.

Zenna looked at the door as if she thought the portal itself would animate and attack. “Behind that door, another chamber filled with an ice lattice. And waiting in the middle of it... another fiend.”

“What kind?” Arun asked.

“I did not recognize the species,” she said. “It was big, fat and bloated with some sort of greenish sludge covering its form. I think it sensed something, because it started turning toward me, and so I quickly broke the spell.”

“Well then,” Beorna said, and her voice held a surprising degree of satisfaction as she lifted her sword to her shoulder.

Chapter 278

The kebular demodand Olarithusk wasn't a very happy fiend. Ripped from a grim but ultimately satisfying existence as the Subcommanding Warder for Block Fifteen-Four Sixty-Six, he'd been called to this uncomfortable place and bound, compelled to sit here in this ugly chamber and serve as a guardian. He knew the identity of those who had bound him, and he was even sympathetic to their goals, but his cooperation had not been petitioned, his aid not sought voluntarily. No, he'd been yanked from his duties on Carceri, dragged here and forced to service. If he ever found out who'd given these mortals his truename...

Olarithusk wasn't even sure what it was he was guarding, and the brusque way that his captors had all but ignored him since he'd been held here was... annoying. He hadn't been here long by the standards of his kind, but he thought of his prisoners back on Carceri and the torments that they would be missing in his absence, and seethed.

He thought he sensed a magical viewing, but by the time he'd turned around, it was gone. Blasted wizards, keeping an eye on him. Oh, he'd love to have one of them in his cellblock for a few hours...

The demodand was savoring that thought when the door to his chamber abruptly burst open, revealing an armored dwarf female. Before he could react, the female dodged out of the way, revealing other mortals behind, weapons at the ready.

Intruders! Olarithusk thought. Finally!

Pain shot through his body as arrows slammed into him, piercing his resistances and his thick hide alike to stab deep into his flabby torso. Well, that was all right. Pain was something that Olarithusk was accustomed to. The arrows were followed by a bead of flame that blossomed around him into a fireball. The ice lattice surrounding him shattered, releasing their intertwined energies in a cold flash, but that didn't bother him either. For Olarithusk was immune to both fire and cold.

Let's give the mortals some pain to enjoy! he thought, conjuring up an acid fog in the space around the door. The thick, greenish vapors engulfed the mortals quite satisfactorily, and while he couldn't see it, Olarithusk imagined their thin, weak flesh puckering and running as the acid burned through it.

But then the still-expanding cloud shimmered, and vanished from view.

Blasted wizards, Olarithusk thought. Very well, he thought, clenching his huge fists in anticipation of doing this the "old fashioned" way.

But more of the arrows knifed out of the corridor, and while his thick hide turned a few, more stabbed deep. He could feel the goodness infused in the shafts as each drove into him, and for a moment his fury was tinged with a sudden hint of fear.

For that, if nothing else, he would make these mortals suffer.

But the barrage of missiles did not stop... how many of them are there? Olarithusk thought. Invisibility was starting to look like a really good alternative to attack... but before he could summon the comforting shroud, the dwarf woman was charging, her sword glowing brightly in her fists. The woman, and especially the sword, virtually reeked in goodness, and the kebluar hesitated, for all that he dominated the dwarf with his physical presence.

That moment cost it. For Beorna, infused with both the divine power and divine favor of her patron—not to mention a few other useful buffs—drove forward, and at the last instant brought her sword down in a glimmering arc, slicing down through the demodand's body, opening a gash seven feet in length from its breastbone down to its groin.

The fiend... deflated, its bloated body collapsing as its life poured out from the terrible wound.

Beorna stood there for a moment, covered in the steaming, acidic ichor of the demodand, looking down at her foe. Then she lifted her hands in triumph, holding her sword high above her head.

“By Helm!”

Chapter 279

The companions did not waste any time savoring their relatively easy victory. After checking the room for further threats, and healing the minor acid burns suffered in the brief exchange with the demodand, the adventurers gathered before the door on the far side of the chamber. As usual, Mole and Zenna each examined it for dangers of a mundane and magical nature, respectively, and then Arun dragged the heavy portal open, revealing another corridor beyond.

This passage only progressed a short distance, perhaps ten feet, before reaching another intersection. Corridors branched off from the right and left, and continued forward a short distance before ending in another iron door, this one partially open to reveal blackness beyond. The passages were tight, each only about five feet across.

“I don't like it,” Dannel said. “More narrow tunnels. This would be a good place for an ambush; too many hiding places for our friend the wizard...”

Beorna started to push past him. “Only one way to find out...”

“If that last battle taught us anything, it's the advantage of scouting ahead,” Zenna began. “It would be foolish now to return to blindly stumbling forward...”

“Wait!” Mole said. “I've got an idea!”

The templar looked at her dubiously, but Mole's eagerness was evident as she reached into her bag of tricks again. She drew out the fuzzy ball, and tossed it out into the corridor. The magical object grew into the form of a sleek, muscular wolf, who turned and looked at the gnome expectantly.

“Go check and see if there’s an ambush!” she said, pointing down the hallway. The magical wolf probably did not understand her speech, but it apparently apprehended the gist of what she wanted, for it turned and padded off toward the intersection.

“I’m not sure I approve of this,” Shensen said with a frown.

The wolf interrupted whatever response Mole would have made, for it abruptly stopped right at the point where the passages intertwined. Its gaze was fixed on the half-open doorway, and it growled, clearly sensing something there.

A dark shadow moved in the depths beyond the open door. Zenna had just enough time to shout out a warning—“Enemy magic!”—before the walls, floor... even the threshold of the doorway separating the room from the corridor distended and shifted, and dozens of long, rubbery tentacles exploded from the bare rock, eagerly lunging out at them, entwining themselves around the surprised companions.

Chapter 280

“Fall back, into the room!” Dannel cried, darting back out of the reach of the black tentacles, before seeing that a pair of the long tendrils had caught Zenna around the waist, and were even now beginning to tighten their grip painfully. The elf turned around to help, but hesitated; at least a dozen tentacles filled the space between them, and he knew that he would be of little help to her if he managed to get himself entangled as well.

Mole and Shensen were also ensnared, but both were able to slip free and dart back out of the radius of the spell. The three dwarves made up in strength what they lacked in nimbleness, but as the tentacles converged on them they had to fight for each step. Hodge was caught by a tentacle that snaked around his ankle, threatening to trip him up, but Beorna, who was nearby, grabbed him by the arm and helped him pull himself free. The dwarven woman, still infused with power from her buffing spells, shrugged off the tentacles that tried to ensnare her, snarling with frustration as she joined the others in retreat.

Arun was also able to fight free, and he moved to help Zenna. She was well and truly caught, the tentacles lifting her a pace into the air as they crushed the breath from her body. The paladin had already learned that his sword was of little use against the tentacles, so he sheathed the weapon, slung his shield, and simply grasped onto the pair holding her, drawing them apart just enough for the tiefling to slip free. With Arun protecting her retreat from the tentacles trying to snare her anew, the pair fell back until the last of the tentacles were left behind them.

But even as the companions withdrew to relative safety, their strength suddenly seemed to drain from their bodies. Their armor and weapons suddenly felt several times heavier, their limbs leaden and unresponsive. Zenna, already staggered from her clash with the tentacles, sagged and nearly fell, her strength barely enough to keep her upright.

“What be happenin’?” Hodge exclaimed, slumping to one knee as the weight of his armor, weapons, and gear threatened to overbear him. Some of the others unshouldered their packs, trying to lighten their loads.

“It’s another spell,” Zenna gasped out.

“Well, do somepin’ about it!” the dwarf replied, staggering back from the danger zone near the tentacles.

Zenna was about to reply that she could not, when the tentacles suddenly vanished, evaporating into air as if they had never been. The companions turned back toward the door, readying themselves for whatever threat might approach with the cessation of the spell. Zenna spoke the words of a spell, and became invisible, while the others readied weapons or spells in anticipation of battle.

A skittering sound accompanied by a sibilant hiss became audible through the open door, followed a moment later by the familiar clank of heavy armor. A man stepped through the portal, a heavily armed and armored figure equipped with a massive greataxe. His unnatural origin was instantly visible, for his armor had been designed to allow for the vestigial wings that jutted from his back, and the foot-long ebon horns that jutted from his temples.

The fiendish warrior was imposing enough, but on his heels came another entity, a grim monstrosity that Zenna knew instinctively was responsible for the black tentacles and the waves of exhaustion. It had the look of a giant serpent, but without skin, muscles, or organs; it was a creature of bones alone, a skeleton. Their gazes were drawn upward, to the head that reared up above as soon as it had cleared the threshold of the door. That head had belonged to no snake; it was vaguely humanoid, but with great flanges of bone on the sides of the skull, framing deep eye sockets in which bright points of blue flame burned with evil malevolence. Somehow in its presence the deep cold of Karran-Kural grew even deeper, as the undead thing radiated an aura of frozen death.

“More lackeys of the wizard, eh?” Arun said, unsheathing his sword, letting its bright radiance play over them, drawing the attention of their foes.

The bone naga reared, lifting its evil skull even higher above them, until it nearly brushed the ceiling fifteen feet above. It released a foul keening, a bitter noise that assaulted their senses, an unnatural sound that seemed to coalesce into ripples in the air that took on substance, solidity. Those waves of energy formed into an impermeable barrier of force, bisecting the chamber in two.

With Arun, Beorna, and Zenna on one side with the two enemies, and the other adventurers trapped on the far side, unable to help them.

Chapter 281

Separated by a wall of force, the divided companions confronted a pair of terrible foes.

The fiendish warrior rushed forward, bringing his axe around in a wide arc designed to take Beorna's head from her shoulders. The templar stood her ground and shifted her body to take the hit on her armor. The adamantine plate held even against the magical sharpness of the evil fighter's blade, but she felt the force of the impact nonetheless, a hard wedge of pain driving through her body. The man—an orc, Beorna realized, as she saw the sinister features through the slit of his helm—was incredibly strong, and unlike her, not affected by magical exhaustion. What was worse, the blow had landed a foot from where she'd expected it; that and the faint shimmering around the warrior's body spoke of a magical ward about him, a displacement that would make it difficult to score a telling hit in return.

Arun's muscles seemed intent on defying him as he started to the templar's aid, but a reassuring warmth suddenly flowed through him, dispelling his weariness. Zenna's whispered voice sounded close to his ear, "I will assist her... you must defeat the naga! Its magic is the greater threat!"

Arun nodded, and reluctantly turned away from Beorna to charge the undead creature. It too was clearly protected by magical defenses; a glowing translucent shield hovered in the air before it, and its position also seemed to shift slightly as it moved, betraying the presence of another displacement spell. None of that stopped Arun, of course, and he rushed boldly at the bone naga. His sword clove the air in a wide arc, tearing through the shield, and although it struck empty air as it hit the apparent location of the creature, an instant later it slammed into hard bone. The naga keened, a terrible, high-pitched sound that seemed loud enough to shatter glass. Arun tried to follow-up his advantage with another assault, but the naga spoke the words of a spell, and a glowing hand of force, five feet across, appeared between them. The forceful hand immediately thrust the dwarf backward, driving him back ten feet despite his efforts to brace himself against its pressure.

Dannel grimaced in frustration as he could only watch his friends engage the naga and the fiendish warrior. "We have to find a way through, to help them!" he said.

Hodge grunted as a full-strength blow from his axe glanced harmlessly off of the wall of force. "If yer have any ideas, I'd love to 'ear 'em!" he shouted.

Mole had run along the entire length of the wall, looking for the slightest gap anywhere, from the floor to the ceiling. "There's no way through!" she said.

Dannel turned to Shensen, but the druid seemed to have withdrawn from them, lost in the casting-trance of a spell. Finally the vacant, distant look in her eyes faded, and she gestured to the ground at her feet, which seemed to rumble ominously.

A figure rose up out of the hard stone, a roughly humanoid form that continued to grow until its head touched the ceiling fifteen feet above. As the others looked on in amazement, Shensen spoke to it in a harsh, gravelly language, pointing toward the far end of the room and the battle there.

The elemental turned, and sank back into the floor at the base of the wall of force.

"Shensen..." Dannel began.

"I know," she said, rushing to the point where her summoned ally had disappeared. "Be ready..." She knelt and touched the stone, running her hand along it in a long swath that paralleled the perfect smoothness of the wall of force. She touched her necklace, and spoke words in a tongue similar to that she'd used with the elemental, Dannel thought.

Once more the stone obeyed her call. The floor where she had touched buckled, twisting outward on both sides of the wall. Dannel saw what she was doing, and even as the opening appeared beneath the wall he was running toward it, his bow at the ready.

Mole, naturally, beat him to it, and darted through to the other side.

Beorna grunted in frustration as her blows glanced harmlessly off the heavy black plates of her foe's armor. Her divine power had left her, the blessings of Helm but temporary in their duration, and with her strength drained, her attacks felt feeble and ineffective. The warrior, on the other hand, seemed possessed of an inexhaustible fortitude, and as he lifted his axe for another assault, Beorna braced herself for some more pain.

But before he could strike, the warrior hesitated.

"We are not your enemy, brave warrior," Beorna heard from behind him, a familiar voice from over his shoulder. "The wizard and the naga have both betrayed you... they are your true foes."

The warrior turned as Zenna became visible. The templar acknowledged the gutsiness of the ploy; if the spell failed, there was nothing stopping him from chopping her into two with that cleaver of his. But even though she could not see his face, Beorna saw the axe come down, and knew that the charm had been successful.

Zenna reached up and drew back her cowl, revealing her own features twisted into a ferocious, demonic leer, her flesh a bright red, her horns and teeth ebon mirrors to the features of the fiendish warrior. "I am one of you!" she hissed. "Use your strength to destroy your true foes!"

The warrior turned to his ally, and with a terrible roar rushed at the naga, his axe raised in challenge. The naga turned from Arun to face the charge, and as its first stroke passed through air, fooled by its displacement, the undead creature cast another spell. The warrior's axe came down again, and he looked around, confused, as the naga's dispel returned him to his senses.

"Well, at least he lost his wards," Zenna began, reaching out to restore Beorna. But before she could touch the templar, a green flash filled her vision, and her body exploded into a haze of pain. She felt as though every part of her body was trying to come apart, and as the green glow brightened, she could feel her death clasp down tightly around her.

Chapter 282

Beorna saw the green beam stab from the doorway, past the naga and the warrior, and impact Zenna squarely in the back. She knew the source, and shouted a warning to the others. "The wizard!" But she was helpless to assist Zenna as the green glow pulsed over her, too quickly for her to stop it with a dispel.

It lasted all of a second, and in that time Zenna fought for her life. Her own innate fortitude, reinforced by her wards and resistances, warred against the pulse of Fetor Abradius's disintegrate spell. A scream was dragged from her body as the ray tore through her, but when it faded, after that long second, she was still there.

Still there, but weakened and damaged. She staggered back, half-caught by Beorna, who steadied her. "Are you all right?"

Zenna nodded, and tore herself free, nearly falling to the ground. "GO!" she yelled.

Arun fought against the forceful hand, but though he was able to stand his ground, and avoid being pushed back further, he could not draw any nearer to the naga. The undead monstrosity reared up, no doubt preparing to cast yet another terrible spell, when suddenly the ground below it buckled. Slabs of stone rose up out of the ground, resolving into the powerful arms of Shensen's elemental. The naga twisted and tried to break free, blasting a spell into it. But Shensen's magic held, and the naga screeched its terrible cry again as a massive stone fist crushed into its skeletal form. The elemental grappled it, and for a moment the two titanic creatures struggled in a raging melee. The fiendish warrior swung at the elemental with his axe, knocking several head-sized chunks of rock free from its leg, but then Beorna laid into his back with a vicious two-handed stroke of her sword, driving him down to his knees with a single mighty blow.

A sinuous ray of black energy appeared from the shadows of the doorway, stabbing into the naga, filling it with dark energies that healed its injuries and redoubled its strength. But Abradius's aid came at a price, as Dannel leapt up from the breach in the base of the wall of force with his bow fully drawn. Despite his lingering exhaustion his accuracy was still true, and a cry of pain rewarded his first shot as it knifed into the narrow opening, finding its target.

Mole was already moving toward the melee, looking for a spot where she could make a contribution without being squashed. Shensen came out through the gap below the wall of force on Dannel's heels, already beginning a new spell, while Hodge, the last to squeeze through, promptly got stuck in the narrow opening.

The naga, still twisting in the elemental's grasp, bent its head around on its long neck and fired a series of scorching rays point-blank into its tormenter. The elemental began to crumble as the fiery blasts played across its body, but it tenaciously maintained its grasp until a series of energy bolts appeared through the doorway, blasting into its already battered body. The elemental crumbled, falling into a heap of scattered stones.

Unable to get around the forceful hand, Arun finally just let out a dwarvish battle cry and hurled himself with his full strength against it. Step by step he pushed forward until the elemental's demise dropped the naga, and its gyrations brought it within reach. Calling upon the power of Moradin to guide his hand, he brought up his blade, and with a resounding roar smote the creature.

The naga screamed as the holy blade blasted into it once more, blasting fragments of bone from the interlocked segments of vertebrae that comprised its body. Still deadly dangerous, bolstered by Abradius's enervation ray of moments ago, it unleashed a powerful cone of cold directly into the paladin's face.

But the dwarf, protected by wards, and beyond that a stamina beyond the ken of most men, simply shook off the terrible, numbing frost, and struck again.

Behind the naga, meanwhile, Beorna stepped over the twitching body of the fiendish warrior—his head lay a few paces further distant—and joined in the assault, laying into the undead creature from behind. Her first swing was foiled by its still-potent displacement, but she stood her ground, and adjusted for a second strike.

A shaft of white lightning darted down from the ceiling, slamming into the naga. Shensen held her hand aloft, drawing upon her power to call lightning once more, watching the doorway for another sign of the wizard. Beside her, Dannel was doing the same, but when Abradius did not present himself for another attack, he unleashed his shot at the naga. The shot glanced off its head, doing little damage, but sending a small surge of electrical energy through it that added to its tally of injuries.

The naga tried one last gambit, rising into the air above its foes, out of the reach of the dwarves with their holy blades. It conjured its favorite black tentacles again to confound its foes, the long tendrils rising out of the floor grabbing and snaring the adventurers. Zenna was caught up instantly once more, and the dwarves had to dedicate their efforts to fighting off their grasp, unable to reach the naga ten feet above their heads.

Dannel and Shensen were caught as well. The elf dropped his bow as one tentacle wrapped around and crushed his arm, but the druid ignored the pain of their constricting grasp, all of her attention fixed upon the naga above.

Another bright line of electricity flashed from the ceiling, striking the naga directly below the base of its skull. Again Shensen was able to penetrate its resistance, the bolt of lightning running up and down the length of its body, driving up into its skull. The spell would have barely discomfited it when whole, but the naga had already taken a pounding. Blue flashes of light stabbed through its skull, exploding out from the gaping openings, and then the creature fell, a lifeless hulk that was quickly ensnared by the mindless, grabbing black tentacles.

Beorna and Arun helped the others free themselves from the tentacles, and the companions withdrew to the very edge of the wall of force, the only corner of the room not covered with the twisting black filaments. Hodge continued spitting curses until Shensen and Arun helped pull him free from the narrow opening under the wall, and they cowered back just out of reach of the tentacles, which continued to gyrate and twist probingly in their direction.

"Well, now that was a fight!" Beorna said, casting a healing spell to restore some of the color to Arun's frost-blasted skin. "That warrior was nothing special, but that demon-snake put up a struggle!"

Zenna suddenly sat up. “Where’s Mole?”

Indeed, there was no sign of the gnome, or of the wizard Feto Abradius.

Chapter 283

The raging cadence of the battle in the large chamber behind her grew strangely quiet as Mole somersaulted across the threshold, landing in an easy crouch in the lee of the half-open door in the corridor beyond.

She’d half-expected to find the wizard there waiting for her, but the loremaster had retreated to the intersection of the three corridors. He was surrounded by a shifting dance of mirror images, and although he was half-turned away from her, some sixth sense must have warned him of her presence, for he turned toward her as she appeared.

“Ah, the little rogue has come to chase me down again. What, no little animal helper, this time?”

“You’re not the first to underestimate me, Abradius. And my friends will be along in a few moments, once they’ve finished mopping up your ugly pals back there.”

The wizard sneered. “Come then, little one. Shall we dance?”

Abradius launched some sort of spell, but she must have resisted it, for nothing happened. She was already moving toward him, leaping in a slashing cartwheel that culminated in a springing leap, her dagger flashing out toward his throat. The loremaster had seen that move before, but he didn’t move, and too late Mole realized her mistake as she passed through an image, which popped as she impacted it.

“Nice try, little fool!” he said, reaching out and grabbing her on the shoulder. Mole cried out and staggered back, breaking the contact too late to escape the draw on her life force as the wizard’s vampiric touch worked its deadly effect upon her again.

She tumbled back out of reach, her side feeling like it was on fire. The wizard regarded her with a confident smile. “The taste of your life... quite satisfying. Perhaps I will keep you alive once I have dealt with the others, penned in a little cage in my laboratory, where I may... sample... you at my whim...”

“Save the pep talk, wizard. Time is running out for you...”

“Yes, yes, your friends, I know.” Without taking his eyes off her, he gestured vaguely toward the door. “Have you considered, perhaps, that they may have their hands quite full? You see, I’ve known Xail far longer than you have, my little sweet... and he has quite a few surprises in store...”

A loud crash and a chattering roar, accompanied by inarticulate cries from her friends, sounded from beyond the door. Mole took advantage of the momentary distraction to reach again into her bag of tricks, but before she could take out the animal-ball, a sea of black tentacles erupted from the floor and walls. Abradius, in the middle of a spell, was taken by surprise, and four of the tentacles lashed around him, tangling his arms and body and lifting him a foot into the air. The wizard cursed, but he was clearly not strong enough to break free on his own from the ensnaring spell.

A tentacle tried to grasp Mole's body, but she easily slipped free and darted back out of their range. "Well, well," she said with a nasty grin, as she unloaded her crossbow and calmly loaded a bolt into the mechanism.

Abradius twisted enough to face her. "Enjoy your temporary victory," he snarled. "You have made an enemy today..."

"For a few seconds, anyway," Mole interjected, as she lifted her loaded weapon and took aim.

"The guardian will destroy you! The pillars will not reveal their secrets to you!" Mole tightened her grip on the trigger of her bow, but even as the bowstring snapped taut, the wizard spoke a word of power, and vanished from the grasp of the tentacles. Mole looked for her bolt, but did not see it in the obscuring tangle of writhing tendrils.

"Well, maybe I gave him something to think about, anyway," she said, looking unsuccessfully for a viable route through the tentacles. There didn't seem to be one, but on the other hand, the sounds of the battle in the far room seemed to have eased off some. That could have meant one of two things, and as curiosity and concern overcame caution she was about to brave the spell when a voice came to her through the doorway.

"Mole? Are you all right?"

"Just fine, Dannel!" she yelled back. Belatedly, she looked around, in case the loud noise drew anything yucky to investigate, but the corridor behind her was quiet, as was the rest of the place other than the squishy sound made by the tentacles. Even so, the wizard's final words made the place suddenly seem even more spooky, so she summoned another creature—a wolverine, this time, she observed with delight—to keep her company.

"Just wait until the spell runs its course!" Zenna yelled to her.

"Okay!" Mole yelled back. She looked around. In the odd blue light, everything looked... bad.

For once absent of curiosity to do some exploring, she sat down against the wall, and rubbed the wolverine under its chin.

"So, know any good stories?"

Chapter 284

The black tentacles faded away in about a minute, so the companions quickly rejoined Mole and exchanged the usual barrage of healing magic. Zenna found that her new wand was already nearly half-depleted, but she didn't begrudge its use, not here, with the series of deadly threats that they'd already confronted. Mole shared Abradius's final words about another guardian, presumably something deadlier than what they'd faced thus far. Their resources were already considerably depleted, and most of them were still suffering from exhaustion as a result of the naga's spell. But they were also wary of the wizard returning again with reinforcements, so they elected to press on cautiously, ready to withdraw if they encountered something beyond their abilities.

Zenna marveled at that; for all that their percentage of dwarven crazy-bravery was increasing, their tactics were almost approaching something resembling common sense.

The corridors were silent as they moved cautiously forward, deeper into the complex.

They entered a room that was mostly a huge, deep pit, its bottom beyond the range of their sight. A catwalk ran around the perimeter, and in the center of the pit a pair of pale pillars rose out of the darkness up to the ceiling high above them. The pillars were carved with the faint outlines of faces, each different, twisted into expressions of torment. That alone was disturbing enough, but when they stared at the pillars, the faces seemed to... move, writhing in frozen agony.

"Foul witchery!" Arun said, holding his sword up as if its light could banish the terrible sight.

"I take it these are the 'soul pillars'," Mole suggested.

"I don't know," Dannel said, casting wary glances both up at the ceiling and down into the pit. "I don't see a guardian..."

Zenna stared at the pillars with a fixed gaze, so intent that she jumped slightly when Arun grasped her arm. "Come on," he said. "Let us complete our search."

They passed through a long, narrow tunnel lined with iron doors. The doors warded empty cells with deep holes in the floors, approximately the size of the glass coffins they'd seen up on the upper level. These gaps were all empty, although in a few of the small rooms they found some frozen supplies, carefully packed containers of food and water most likely left by the loremaster and his allies earlier.

Pressing on, they found a pair of rooms that clearly showed the mark of the wizard. One room was empty save for an intricate summoning diagram etched on the floor. Zenna confirmed that it was probably used for conjuring extra-planar creatures; each of them had their own ideas about the exact sort of outsider that one such as Feto Abradius would summon. They left that room and investigated the other, a small room outfitted as a bedchamber. The most interesting thing there was a cache of papers they found in one of the drawers in Abradius's desk. Zenna had hoped to uncover the mage's spellbook, but apparently Abradius kept that essential artifact with him. But the papers nonetheless contained a number of interesting secrets.

They were written in the same hand as the note they'd found earlier, and outlined the searches by Abradius and his allies—a brief scrawl referred to "Cagewrights"—for information here in Karran-Kural. Zenna remembered the evil cage that now rested in the vault of the Temple of Helm, and shuddered. There were other references to the “guardian” that Abradius had mentioned to Helm, but no details that she could find about the nature of the creature. Apparently Abradius had established a relationship with it, whatever it was, and in exchange for information about the outside world—gathered from the scrying crystal, presumably—it had granted him access to the soul pillars. Zenna felt as though there was something just beneath her perceptions here, something about the purpose and intent of these “Cagewrights” that she just couldn’t quite discern from the admittedly rambling and disjointed notes of Abradius.

Her frustration must have been evident in her face. “We’ll take them with us,” Dannel said, placing a hand on her shoulder. “Maybe Jenya can help us decipher their meaning.”

“The Striders include someone who may be of use as well,” Shensen said. “Meerthan is very knowledgeable about such things.”

Zenna saw that the others had already secured the room, with the door wedged slightly open to release the smoke from the little fire that Mole and Dannel had built. She must have spent longer than she thought reading through the notes. She rubbed her temples, where the genesis of a headache was just beginning to take hold.

“I’ll keep looking for more information,” she began, but Dannel forestalled her, taking the papers and putting them down on the desk.

“Later,” he told her. “For now, you need rest—we all do. Look at you; you can barely stand. We’re all worn out, exhausted from that spell.”

“I call dibs on the bed!” Mole said, jumping onto Abradius’s cot.

Their rest passed uneventfully, although Zenna felt uneasy when she woke from a deep sleep. She did not detect any magical auras, in particular a scrying sensor, so she tried to put her fears into the back of her mind. The next “morning” they gathered again for a meal provided out of the stores in Mole’s magical bag. Shensen and Zenna restored their protections against the dire cold of Karran-Kural, and they prepared their usual array of wards to be cast as soon as they were ready to move out and continue their explorations.

They had passed one more long corridor adjacent to the wizard’s rooms, and after reading his notes, they had a strong suspicion that its terminus was their final destination. Moving cautiously forward in single file, they finally came to another door ahead.

They were all on edge. A heady sense of anticipation hung in the air. This time, it was Beorna who first turned to Zenna, who nodded and slipped to the fore, kneeling before the doors as she cleared her mind to cast her clairvoyance spell.

The others watched as Zenna went through the complicated and lengthy ritual of casting the spell, the only sound her soft incantation and the occasional creak of armor as one of the dwarves shifted slightly.

Finally, she looked up, her eyes closed, facing the door. Again she lifted her hands to her forehead, turning slowly in a broad arc. And sucked in a startled gasp.

“What is it?” Beorna asked, her hands tightening on the hilt of her sword.

“The Pillars,” she breathed, continuing her scan. “Five of them... much larger than the others... I can feel the power from out here...”

“What about the guardian?” Arun asked.

“I do not see anything... Wait...” she said, turning in a broader arc.

She was nearly facing them when her eyes suddenly burst open, and she fell back, trembling, her hands clawing the air.

“Zenna!” Dannel exclaimed. “What is it?”

She landed against the iron door, and rebounded from it as if scalded. “Retreat! Back to the main corridor!”

“What is it?” Beorna repeated, facing the door as if it would grow fangs and attack them.

“Back, now!” Zenna said, all but pushing the dwarves ahead of her.

Her terror was contagious as they withdrew, although Arun and Beorna remained calm as they warded their retreat from behind. Zenna did not let them stop until they had returned to Abradius’s quarters, and shut the door behind them. She leaned against it, shaking. Dannel put his arms around her, and she accepted the solace, leaning back into him.

“Well?” Hodge finally said.

Zenna sucked in a deep breath. “Dragon,” she said.

“Bah! That it? You had me goin’, girl,” Hodge replied. “Why, how many o’ those ha’ we killed now, Arun? Three? Four?”

But none of the others responded, their eyes on Zenna’s grim face. “No,” she said. “It not like any of the others...”

“I don’t think I’m going to like this...” Mole said, but there was something eager in her fear, as she sat on the very edge of the wizard’s desk chair.

“It was clinging to the wall, above the door. Waiting for us. It detected my sensor...” Again, she shuddered, collecting herself with another deep breath before continuing.

“It’s undead. A skeleton, but intelligent. It had spells... I saw a shield up before it, and in its eyes... power...”

“A dracolich,” Beorna said. The word sounded through the room with the finality of the last nail being driven into a coffin.

Chapter 285

“A draco-what?” Hodge said.

“A dracolich,” Zenna said. “Undead. Immortal. Virtually invincible; even if you kill it, their spirits live on in a magical phylactery, and can take over another body, and rise again.”

“Uncle Cal’s tales, the Reaching Wood,” Mole said, and Zenna glanced at her and nodded.

“I have heard of such things,” Shensen said, her face troubled. “They are abominations, raised through eldritch magic, or through the activities of mad groups such as the Cult of the Dragon.”

“Okay, I get the idea. So why ain’t we dead?” Hodge asked.

“Abradius said it was a guardian,” Dannel said. “It may be trapped here, compelled to remain as a guardian of the Soul Pillars.”

“How big?” Beorna asked.

“I don’t know...” Zenna said. “Big. Huge. It was difficult to see.”

“Well, physically it wouldn’t be able to fit through that tiny corridor,” Beorna said.

“So then,” Hodge said. “It can’t get out. So what’s the problem? We got the wizzerd, we kin just leave.”

“I don’t think it’s quite that simple, Hodge,” Dannel said.

The dwarf shook his head. “Nay. It never be.” Tossing his axe onto the desk, he stepped over to the cot and settled heavily onto it, drawing out a flask from his pouch.

Beorna stepped in front of the door, drawing their attention to her. “This thing is a horror beyond imagining,” she said. “If it were to be released, it could destroy Cauldron, and wreak havoc on the surrounding region. Here, with it confined, and with forewarning, we may have a chance.”

Hodge muttered something that wasn’t quite audible. Beorna glanced over at him, and then shifted her gaze to Shensen.

“I fear that this enemy is beyond anything any of us have faced before. Together, we may defeat it. But I understand if... if you feel that you cannot continue.”

Shensen nodded. “I stand with you.”

Hodge looked up. “Hey, I dinna say nothin’ about backin’ down!”

“My uncle and his friends killed one, once,” Mole said. “And I bet we’re at least as tough now as they were, then.” Her grin betrayed her own eagerness, although Zenna thought that her legs would buckle under her, if Dannel loosened his arms around her body.

Beorna turned back to Zenna. “Could you tell what manner of dragon it had been, in life? If we know its type, we can prepare wards against its breath attack.”

Zenna’s brow furrowed in concentration, but she finally shook her head. “I... I’m not sure,” she said. “I only got a brief look; it seemed like it was mostly a skeleton.”

The templar frowned. “The more we know, the better our chances against it.”

Zenna nodded. Drawing upon a reserve of strength, she squeezed Dannel in thanks and then stepped away from him. She crossed over to the desk, leaning against it as she turned to face them.

“There may be an answer,” she said. “Abradius’s notes... I believe that they held enough information for me to delve into the lesser pillars, the ones we encountered earlier in the pit chamber. Abradius mentioned secrets, of mysteries and lore possessed by the spirits trapped inside them. I may be able to use them to get the information we need about the guardian.”

“Those pillars were suffused with taint,” Arun said. “An evil like that is not easily tamed, even for a good purpose.”

“And that taint may spread to those who seek to touch it,” Beorna echoed.

“I can ward myself,” Zenna said. “If you have a better idea...”

“I do,” Beorna said. “I may implore Helm for guidance, seek a divination that may help us.”

Zenna nodded; she herself had access to the same spell. “That may work,” she said, “Although as you know, even such revelations are usually murky.”

“Better to risk that, than blindly risk your very soul.”

“Very well.”

So once more they rested, ate, and kept a vigilant watch. Karran-Kural was silent, although each of the companions thought they could feel the malevolent presence of the guardian even through dozens of yards of stone separating them from the dracolich. Could it sense them, here? It knew that someone was there, that much was certain from Zenna’s viewing. How many centuries had the creature lived... no, “existed” might be a better word, for the grim unlife of such a thing was wholly unlike their mortal lives. How many foes had it faced and overcome? How much life-knowledge existed in the spark of its brain?

Later, Beorna knelt on the hard stones of the floor, lost in prayer. She invoked the power of Helm, and finally lifted her head, and spoke words in a deep voice not entirely her own.

*In the depths, the guardian of the pillars waits
The drake eternal, yet bound by ancient lore
He brings the storm, stealing breath, stealing life
Yet the secrets he guards may mean life for many* “Cryptic, as always,” Arun commented.

“You’d think that as a god, Helm could be a little more plain-spoken,” Mole said.

“Well, it reinforces the importance of beating the creature, if we didn’t already have enough reason,” Dannel said. “But it doesn’t tell us what we wanted to know.”

“Yet I think the clue we need is there,” Zenna said. “Stealing breath, stealing life... That suggests poison gas.”

“A green, then,” Shensen said.

“The same kind Uncle Cal and the others fought,” Mole said.

Zenna nodded. She remembered the tale. Remembered also that some of their allies didn’t survive that fight.

“Let us make our preparations,” she said.

Chapter 286

The door opened slowly, the frost-rimed iron resisting before finally swinging fully open with a loud creak.

The chamber of the Soul Pillars was exactly as Zenna had described it to the others. The place was huge, maybe a hundred feet across, a circular chamber bored deep down into the depths of Toril. A broad, ten-foot catwalk spread out along the near wall, while a bridge fashioned apparently of solid ice led out over the chasm, toward the five massive pillars that stood in an irregular collection in the center of the chamber. Frozen air whistled up from someplace deep below, and the ceiling above was lost in shadow. The faint glow from the ceiling panels behind them was the only illumination; this place seemed somehow more suited to darkness.

The companions had prepared for an immediate attack upon opening the door, but when the cavern appeared empty, they were quick to put their plans into action. Zenna spoke a word of command, and a small winged imp, a four-foot creature wreathed in wisps of flames, flew out into the chamber. It went reluctantly, it seemed, sputtering curses in its own language, but that was fine from Zenna’s perspective; the creature’s role was primarily to serve as bait.

The mephit was followed a few moments later by a pair of sleek dire bats, each with a copious fifteen-foot wingspan, that materialized in the air above. The bats glided out across the room; one started to dive toward the mephit, but a spoken command from Shensen, who'd prepared the ability to speak with animals, sent it back out on its gliding course around the perimeter of the room.

The companions filed through the doorway, spreading out into a broad half-circle centered on the door. Dannel tossed his stick bearing the continual flame forward, out onto the ice bridge, its flickering light casting deep shadows around the perimeter of the room. For good measure, he'd cast a light spell on the peak of the steel skullcap he customarily wore, to ensure enough light for him and Mole to fight by.

Zenna and Arun were at the center of the circle, the dwarf protecting the tiefling with his body. They were the anchor, important for the paladin's ability to protect the others from fear, and the positive influence of Zenna's magic circle against evil. The others were heavily warded as well, and as Shensen stepped through the threshold, already casting another spell, Beorna clashed her sword against the hard stone floor, sounding a ringing note of their arrival.

"Well, come on, drake! We haven't got all day!"

Even as her words sounded throughout the chamber, the templar invoked the power of Helm, and began to grow in size. This had been one of the disputes in their plan, for while being enlarge enhanced her strength and reach, it would make it difficult for her to retreat, if things turned out poorly.

Mole had fearlessly darted forward to the edge of the platform, and thus was the first to detect the danger. "From below!" she shouted, dropping back as a rush of air arose from the chasm. "Incoming!"

The mephit chittered and flapped its wings madly, gaining altitude. The bats swept around the far side of the room, giving the Soul Pillars a wide berth, and headed back toward the entrance where the companions stood in a soft bubble of light against the dark.

And then, Vittris Bale arrived.

The dracolich surged out of the chasm, spreading wings that no longer bore flesh to bear it aloft, the sheer force of its hatred of life, the undying power that animated it, now powering its flight. It rose up over them, a huge monstrosity, its wingspan nearly thirty feet across, a skeletal horror whose eyes burned with a cold blue flame.

The dracolich's huge jaws opened, and it unleashed a fury of poison upon them with the force of a driving gale.

Chapter 287

The toxic gas breathed by the dracolich was corrosive, capable of burning the flesh and searing the lungs of any living thing. And its transition to undeath had not weakened the power of Vittris Bale's breath weapon in the least. If anything, the dracolich's breath had the force of a tempest, driving into the companions with the impact of a powerful storm.

But the companions, armed with forewarning, were prepared, and when the noxious cloud cleared, they were all but unharmed. Mole and Zenna had been knocked down by the force of the blast, but none of them had suffered from the effects of the gas, the protection from acid spells that each of them had received holding up—thus far. A cold surge of fear swept over them as the full force of the dracolich's presence hit them, but the companions, veterans and bolstered against such terrors by Arun's stalwart influence, were able to control their fear enough to stand fast before the beast.

The adventurers counterattacked, laying into the undead dragon with everything they had. The plan had been to wait for Zenna to attempt to bring down its magical defenses with a dispel, but with her prone, they did not hesitate. Dannel's arrows knifed out at it, but the ancient creature's frame was incredibly durable, and none of his initial volley hit. Beorna and Shensen unleashed spells, the dwarf blasting it with a searing light, the druid adding a flame strike that coursed down from above into its body. But the dracolich's spell resistance was too powerful, and both spells dissolved as they struck it.

Zenna pulled herself up, and staggering back to regain her footing on the slick stone, she finally managed to fire off her dispel. White light flared briefly around the dracolich's body, as its shield and mage armor dissolved. But even without those protections, Vittris Bale's body was still nigh-invincible, a fact proven as Hodge's heavy bolt and Mole's much smaller missile both bounced harmlessly off it.

Perhaps ironically, it was Zenna's tiny, summoned mephit that inflicted the first damage upon the dracolich, breathing a small gout of fire upon it from behind. But the damage was minimal, and Vittris Bale, confident in its might and the security of its defenses, surged down onto the ice bridge, its skeletal claws finding solid purchase on the slick surface.

As the dracolich's dread gaze swept over them, the companions fought another kind of fear, this time an icy numbness that spread through their muscles, threatening to steal their ability to react, to fight back against the skeletal horror. Again, bolstered by magic and the protective aura of Zenna's spell, the companions were mostly able to fight off the effects of the creature's gaze. But Mole, blasted outside of the radius of Zenna's spell by the dracolich's breath, looked up into the creature's burning eyes and knew terror, and she huddled there against the wall, unable to do anything but shake uncontrollably. And Dannel, likewise, was affected, his drawn arrow falling from his hands as Bale's sinister power crept through his body.

Arun stepped forward to meet the creature, stepping boldly into its reach to swing at its leg as it landed. The dracolich snapped its head out and caught him up in its powerful jaws. Its touch was infused with the fierce chill of the grave, but Arun had been protected against that as well, and he was able to jerk free before it could lift him off his feet. The paralytic numbness of the lich's touch was nothing against his enhanced stamina, and his blow, guided by the divine favor of Moradin, bit deep into its skull as he smote the undead drake. Vittris Bale felt a sharp pain that penetrated even through the emotionless halo of its undead existence, and drew back, a wide crack gaping with blue fire along the side of its massive skull.

The dire bats flashed down from above, keening with sonic pulses just beyond the edges of mundane hearing as they attacked the dracolich. Its fell presence affected them as powerfully as the half-drow woman they served, but driven by the power of her call, they nonetheless pressed their attacks. But both bats were buffeted back as the dracolich reared from Arun's attack, and they had to pound their wings furiously as they swept away, gaining altitude for another pass.

Zenna, careful of the dracolich's long reach, cast a spell upon Dannel. The elf nodded gratefully as the paralyzing terror left him, and he ran along the catwalk to the side, seeking an angle for an effective shot.

The dracolich had taken one serious hit, but its fury was now unleashed in full upon its enemies. The creature's rage at its centuries of captivity found fruition now in the assault it unleashed upon these intruders that had dared to intrude upon its confined realm. It spread its attacks upon the nearest foes, hoping to paralyze at least a few of them with the creeping effects of its frozen touch.

But unfortunately for Vittris Bale, it faced dwarves this day.

Arun staggered as another deadly snap of the dracolich's jaws nearly tore his sword—and the arm with it—from his body. The creature's claws tore at his armor, opening wide rents, the blood freezing as soon as it pulsed from the wounds. Beorna, her heavy stride sounding loudly on the stones, was struck by a pair of lashes from the dracolich's wings, buffeting her with the force of a giant's punch. But Shensen had warded her again with stoneskin, and the wounds were relatively minor. The creature's tail snaked out and smashed into Hodge even as the dwarf rushed forward with his burning axe, slamming him back to land heavily on his rear.

Their luck, fortified with divine protections and magical augmentations, held. None of the dwarves succumbed to the icy paralysis of the dracolich's evil touch.

But Arun, even with his enhanced stamina, had clearly taken a beating. His breath plumed out in great white gout as he fought for air, and his swordarm was a red mess, cut almost to the bone by the creature's great teeth. The paladin's face was a mask of determination, however, and no doubt or hesitation shone in his eyes. He would stand his ground, and only his death or the death of his adversary would change that equation.

The dwarves attacked. Beorna swept her sword around in a brilliant arc, crushing the blade into the dracolich's body. Arun, half her size, could not match her reach, but he managed an aggressive swing that smashed several of the creature's ribs. Hodge got up and ran forward, but as he reached the edge of the ice he lost his footing, and slid forward precariously close to the edge. The dracolich shifted its footing under the assault from the paladin and templar, and as hard bones of its right foot slammed into him Hodge went flying backward, sliding back along the way he had come. For a single heartbeat he leaned out over the chasm, his eyes widening as he beheld a long, long drop... and then he was clear, and he rolled to a stop, clutching his side where the beast had inadvertently slammed him.

The others kept up their attacks as well, and the dracolich was now showing clear signs of the damage wrought upon its skeletal form. Dannel finally got a telling shot through, his arrow caroming off its skull, and Shensen raised her hand, calling down a lightning bolt that blasted through its spell resistance. Zenna's scorching rays, however, failed to do so, and as she looked around she saw Mole, lying helpless, and ran to her friend's assistance.

Vittris Bale was not accustomed to fearing for its existence; it took immortality as a matter of course, as much a curse as a blessing. Now that it faced defeat, however, it found that it craved the continuation of what passed for its "life", miserable and empty though it was. It had battered one of the dwarves near to the point of death, and the two others were injured, but it knew that it would not win if it continued this head-on confrontation.

The dracolich lurched to the side, and fell off of the ice-bridge, plummeting into the chasm below.

"Is... it... gone?" Hodge said, pulling himself back up to his feet.

Beorna and Arun's gazes met, and both shook their head, the same thought running through their minds.

No...

Chapter 288

At a cry from Shensen, the summoned dire bats dove into the darkness where the dracolich had disappeared. "We don't have long," the druid said, running over to lay a healing spell upon Hodge, then immediately launching into another casting.

"We'll be ready," Beorna said. She'd burned most of her spell slots for the various protections and wards they'd prepared, but she used one of her reserve spells to fuel a cure critical wounds spell for Arun, kneeling beside him. The paladin, in turn, healed her, laying hands upon her face... it was an odd, tender gesture, made strange by the fact that Arun seemed a child in the grasp of the enlarged templar.

Mole had shaken off the effects of the dracolich's paralyzing gaze, and despite the danger she moved immediately once more to the lip of the catwalk, staring out into the darkness with a look that combined excitement and terror.

Zenna commanded the mephit to also delve into the chasm, and with a dark look and a chattering protest he complied, his tiny wings flapping as his flame-wreathed figure descended into the darkness. The companions watched as the creature descended, a bright point in a well of shadows.

A loud screech echoed up from below. The companions shared a look.

"Well, that's the giant bats, I'd imagine," Mole said. "Oh, the mephit disappeared!" she added, a moment later.

"The summoning spell only brings the creature here for a short time," Zenna acknowledged.

The loose hairs framing Mole's face fluttered wildly upward as another powerful gust rose up from below. "I think he's coming back!" she said.

"Prepare yourselves!" Beorna cautioned. Her divine power spell had faded, and while she'd prepared a second one, she had just used its power to heal Arun. She laid another healing spell upon the paladin, restoring him nearly to full health, before stepping back, her sword raised in a guard position.

"Mole, get back!" Zenna warned, casting her second haste spell to renew the waning magic on her companions.

Shensen completed a summoning of her own, and a sleek, muscular griffon appeared on the catwalk beside her. She spoke to the creature, and with a powerful spring it leapt into the air, its wings beating fiercely as it let out a harsh avian screech that echoed throughout the cavern.

A dark shadow swept up out of the darkness. Vittris Bale ascended in a rush, half-flying, half-running up the smooth wall of the bore, the Soul Pillars and the darkness obscuring its form, transforming it into a malevolent shadow that was almost more menacing than the natural appearance of the creature. The darkness seemed to cling to it as it entered the pale radius of their light, and with her darkvision Zenna could just discern that it had restored its magical defenses, including a jumble of mirror images that darted in and around its form.

"Shensen!" she cried.

"I'm on it!" the druid responded.

The griffon dove toward the dragon as it rose up, but Vittris Bale turned its head up and unleashed a blast of corrosive gas that engulfed the summoned creature. The griffon, buffeted by the force of the undead drake's tempest breath, was hurled roughly back. Its wings scored by the acidic vapors, it dropped out of sight below, still trying to recover.

The companions were already attacking, launching missiles and spells at the dracolich. Shensen hurled her own dispel at it, and was mostly successful, as the mirror images and shield vanished. But the faint haze of its mage armor remained intact, and the spider climb spell it had cast was clearly still potent as well, as it clambered yet higher along the far wall, carrying itself to a position well above them before it pushed off, spreading wings that could no longer catch the wind out of reflexive habit as it swept across the room toward them.

Arrows and bolts glanced harmlessly off its body as it flew toward them. Despite being battered in the initial confrontation, with great rents hacked in its form by the holy weapons of the dwarves, the creature was still imposing, magnificent in its sheer destructive potential. It flew through a fireball from Zenna unharmed, its spell resistance shielding it from the vivid blast of flames. Its flight was taking it directly toward Dannel, out on the left wing of the catwalk, but the elf stood his ground, calmly drawing another arrow, aiming, and releasing in a single practiced motion. The missile slammed into the undulating column of the dracolich's spine, penetrating its defenses to blast away a fist-sized chip of ancient bone from its frame.

But the wound was just another minor mark on its tally, and it did not stop Vittris Bale from its target. The dracolich spread its wings and slammed hard into the wall fifteen feet above Dannel, its skeletal claws splaying out to grasp the frozen stone, the magic of its spider climb spell taking hold to affix the mighty creature in place. Even as Dannel turned the dracolich's sinuous neck snapped down, and while Dannel tried to hurl himself aside, Bale's jaws clamped down on his torso, dragging him roughly into the air.

"Dannel!" Zenna cried, a cold terror gripping her chest even as the methodical part of her brain recognized the way that the elf stiffened, paralyzed by the creature's touch, unable to fight back or free himself. She dared not hurl another fireball at it, not with Dannel so vulnerable in its grasp, and in desperation launched a pair of scorching rays at it, praying that they would penetrate its resistance and harm it, and save the elf.

But both streams of fire flared out when they struck the ancient drake.

The dwarves tried to help, although the dracolich had cannily positioned itself just out of even Beorna's extended reach. The templar conjured a glowing spiritual weapon, a sword of white flame that rose to attack the dracolich, but its initial swing failed to penetrate its defenses. Arun rushed directly beneath it, daring it to attack him, but he was too late to seize Dannel as the creature lifted him higher in its massive jaws.

And then, as the companions watched in horror, unable to stop it, Vittris Bale tossed the paralyzed elf out into the chasm.

Chapter 289

For a split second, Dannel Ardan seemed to hang there in the air, as time froze in a single dramatic moment. Then gravity overcame the momentum of the dracolich's throw, and the helpless elf plummeted down toward his death far below.

Zenna could do nothing but stare as the man she loved—yes, still loved!—fell. But then, a flash of movement shattered that terrible moment. It was the druid, Shensen, leaping into the chasm, diving off the edge of the catwalk as if she were plunging into a lake, rather than the black depths of darkness and whatever lay below. She fell toward Dannel like a dart, and as they reached the edges of her darkvision first he, than her, disappeared as suddenly as if they'd been plunged into a pool of black ink.

And then she could only pray that whatever Shensen planned through that desperate maneuver would work, as the harsh reality of the ongoing battle with Vittris Bale dragged her back into the moment.

The dracolich roared a terrible challenge at them as their attacks continued to lash out at it without effect. For a second time Beorna's animated divine sword clashed harmlessly off its body, and a bolt from Hodge's heavy bow was likewise ineffective. But Mole finally made her presence known as she ran forward along the curve of the wall, careful to avoid staring directly at the drake, and hurled a sealed clay flask up at the wall where it was perched above them. The flask shattered on impact, releasing a blossoming orange flower of alchemist's fire that splattered in burning gobs onto the dragon's legs.

Bale lunged down again, this time intent upon seizing Arun. But the dwarf had readied himself for just such a strike, and as the dracolich's jaws snapped down the dwarf sliced out with his sword, cleaving through the undead creature's already-damaged lower jaw. Bone fragments shattered with the impact, and although it still slammed into Arun with the force of a battering ram, driving him back several steps, it seemed clear that the dwarf had come out better in the exchange. As the creature's head reared back up on its long neck, the lower part of its skull came away, falling to the ground fifteen feet below, shattering on the hard stone.

But the dracolich fought on, and it stepped back another pace as Beorna joined Arun. The paladin hurled one of his light hammers up at the creature, but the weapon bounced harmlessly off one of its ribs without causing damage.

"How in the hells are we supposed to stop it!" Hodge exclaimed, cursing as he worked the winch of his heavy crossbow.

"Just keep attacking!" Zenna urged, though the same exact thought had been whispering in her own mind, warring with her dread over Dannel's fate, both threatening to overcome her will and send her fleeing down the tunnel toward escape.

But she overcame her fear, and stood her ground. She launched her second—and final—fireball at the creature, but was not surprised to see it unaffected when the flames and smoke cleared. She cursed her limited spellbook; the most powerful spells in it were useless against an undead foe, but she had not had the time or the resources to add to her store of magic. At times it felt like they had all been running a race over the last few months, with one crisis after another sucking them up into a vortex of never-ending struggle against evil. Would that struggle end here? The dwarves were tough fighters, but their ability to hurt a distant foe was far less than their effectiveness at close quarters, and it seemed that the dracolich had recognized that fact.

Vittris Bale, however, could deal death at range, and its ruined jaw was not an impediment to the effectiveness of its breath weapon. Once more the roiling cloud of white vapors spilled out over them, engulfing all three dwarves and Zenna. Zenna tried to hold her breath, but she could feel her skin burning as the cloud poured over her, and realized with horror that this second blast had overloaded the remaining power of her protection from elements spell.

The next one was going to hurt, if they gave the dracolich the chance to recharge its breath for another attack. But given that it had taken everything they could throw at it, how were they going to stop it?

Chapter 290

An avian cry drew Zenna's attention to the side, and she turned toward the chasm to see a huge eagle rise up into view. For a moment she thought that she'd lost her senses, but then, as the mighty bird lifted higher on the beats of its powerful wings, she saw that in its claws, clutched tightly...

“Dannel!” she cried in relief. The giant eagle, or more accurately the wild shaped Shensen, came forward and dropped the elf lightly to the ground at Zenna’s feet, then lifted into the air again with another loud screech, winging over toward the dracolich.

Arun, unable to reach the dracolich, had not spent the last moments in vain. Even as its breath blasted over him he focused his thoughts and sent out a call for aid. And that call was answered, as a familiar reptilian figure appeared, clambering over the edge of the catwalk, a calm intelligence shining in its amber eyes as it took in the situation, and approached Arun, waiting to be commanded. The paladin leapt smoothly into place atop Clinger’s back, loosing his shield and grasping onto the harness there with his off-hand, holding his sword aloft in challenge as the celestial lizard started toward the wall.

Beorna’s spiritual weapon finally scored a hit, as Helm’s Blade drove solidly through the bones of one wing, smashing the entire limb and sending a clatter of loose bones falling toward the ground below. The templar, lacking another spell that could harm it, drew out her bow, and was sending huge arrows up at it, trying to find a weak spot where the missiles could do damage.

Shensen flew past, just out of the dracolich’s reach, and let out a loud screech. A bolt of lightning lanced down from above, drawn by the power of the druid’s still-active call lightning storm spell. The bolt lanced through the weakened drake’s spell resistance, sending a bright flare through the unholy light the shone within the depths of its damaged skull.

Turning away from the ineffective barrage from below, and the mounted dwarf just beginning to essay the slick vertical wall, the dracolich leapt into the air after her.

“Shensen, look out!” Mole yelled.

The eagle darted around the Soul Pillars, slicing between them in a tight acrobatic turn. But although Vittris Bale was less agile in the air, the dracolich was surprisingly fast, and in its centuries of captivity it had come to know this place very, very well. The eagle emerged into the open air to find the undead dragon looming over it, Bale’s claws extended toward her.

The companions could only watch, their missiles passing around or through the skeletal dragon’s fleshless body without harming it, as the eagle turned and floated up into the dracolich’s waiting embrace. Even as its claws pierced her, tearing at her adopted body, she released a final furious cry. At that call a last bolt of liquid energy stabbed down from above, striking the dracolich solidly in the skull. Vittris Bale let out a terrible scream, a cry of torment and suffering that went beyond mere pain, and then with a bright flash of white light its skull exploded.

The draconic body, trailing smoke and lingering sparks of light, plummeted into the darkness below, the giant eagle still trapped in its embrace.

One by one, the companions—including Dannel, who'd come to slowly from Zenna's cure critical wounds spell—gathered at the edge of the catwalk and stared into the black abyss below. They had won, but again the cost had been high.

“Shensen...”

Chapter 291

They found her body, returned to its natural form, among the shattered bones of the dracolich on the uneven stones at the bottom of the shaft. Arun traveled down on Clinger to recover her body and confirmed that the dracolich was truly destroyed. Mole and Zenna went with him, not only to help him search, but to see if the dracolich's phylactery could be found.

The cavern floor was a jumble of piled stones, a haphazard, treacherous mess, slick with centuries of accumulated ice. But Zenna's detect magic spell proved up to the task, and they soon found a deep crevice where Mole was able to recover a fair amount of treasure stockpiled by the dracolich. Much of it, she said upon examination, looked to be fairly recent acquisitions, suggesting that Abradius or his associates had bestowed it upon the dracolich as a bribe for access to the Soul Pillars. Why an undead dragon trapped in a cavern for hundreds of years would have need of such valuables was beyond Zenna, but she was aware of the avarice of dragonkind—an attribute that apparently transcended such creatures' mortal lives.

They carefully wrapped the slain druid's body for transport. “A glorious sacrifice,” Beorna commented. “Confronted with a superior foe, she took her enemy with her. Truly a heart of great valor resided within her.”

“She risked her life without thought to save me,” Dannel said.

“Jenya should be able to raise her,” Zenna said. “We'll bring her back with us.” She didn't add, After we finish our business here, but she didn't have to. Even with the dracolich's menace destroyed, they could all sense the lingering evil in this place, given substance in the shadowy forms of the five Soul Pillars.

“I still do not like this,” Arun said. “Those... things... should be destroyed.”

“I do not believe we have the power to do that,” Zenna told him. “They are ancient, and the power within...”

“Evil power,” the dwarf returned.

“We need the knowledge held here. Or have you forgotten the last line of Beorna's divination?”

The dwarf did not respond, but his feelings were clear on his face. Beorna, too, frowned, but she would not openly question the apparent mandate of Helm in this matter.

Before they turned to the Pillars, they examined the objects that Zenna and Mole had recovered. Most prominent was a bastard sword of unblemished, shining steel, crafted in an archaic style that could very well have been a thousand years old. There was a silver amulet that radiated transmutation magic, which Zenna judged to be of similar nature to those they already possessed, that enhanced the health and fortitude of the wearer. There were a number of items of platinum jewelry set with precious gems, including several rings, a scepter, and a crown. They seemed to be a matching set, and Zenna figured that they were probably stolen, finding their way here through the activities of the still-nebulous “Cagewrights”. There was also a fair amount of coinage of mints both recent and ancient, all of which was sorted and placed in small sacks into Mole’s bag of holding.

But most disturbing was a small jeweled box, which seemed to flicker with a faint inner light when glanced at out of the corner of one’s eye, but which seemed unremarkable when viewed directly. Arun pronounced it as filled with a resounding taint, while Zenna’s direct magic immediately gave her a splitting headache.

“I’d say we’ve found our dragon’s phylactery,” she said, recoiling from the box.

That was enough for Beorna, who with a resounding blow from her holy sword sundered the box into a thousand tiny pieces.

“So much for that,” she said.

Mole started to collect the pieces, which included a fair number of good-sized gems, but Dannel forestalled her. “We’d better keep that separate from the other treasure, and take them to Jenya for divine cleansing, just in case.”

With all of the preliminaries resolved, there was nothing left but their final errand here. Slowly they each turned to face the looming pillars.

Zenna stepped forward, alone. With the others watching intently, she stepped out onto the bridge of ice, moving forward the power that, she hoped, held answers to the questions that had brought them here.

Chapter 292

A web of shadows enveloped her. Within that darkness ran currents of being, the warped essences of once-living things that were drawn to her, whispering secrets of lore and madness that filled her, threatened to drag her down with them. It was only through a supreme effort of will that she remained afloat in that sea, keeping the essence of who she was, what she was, intact.

The souls seemed to accommodate themselves to her presence, surrounding her, caressing the disembodied form of her spirit-self in a way that was profoundly disturbing. She probed through the endless web, seeking the specific information that she wanted, trying to focus the disordered chaos to her need.

And then, so suddenly that it sent a tremor of shock through her even through the numb reality of this place, the living black parted, thrusting her into an empty void of nullity. In that space, vacant of anything save her own thoughts, she felt a brief flare of panic. Was she trapped here? No... she could feel the slender thread that connected her to the other reality, the place where her body waited, along with her friends...

Then she realized that she was not alone. There was a presence here, surrounding her... belatedly she realized that all of this, the gray emptiness, it was this... what? She could not put it into mundane words of description. But this was what she had been seeking, she knew. Now that she had attuned herself to it, she could sense the currents of power here.

Tenuously, she extended a probe to meet it.

Awareness exploded through her... too much... she could not contain it, and she drew back, her consciousness threatening to come apart under the barrage. Conscious though was driven away by it, and that part of her that was still Izandra... clung desperately to the slender lifeline back, buffeted mercilessly by the sudden storm. There was no gravity in this place, no “down”, yet she knew she was falling...

falling...

Zenna’s eyes popped open to reveal the familiar outlines of her room. The only sound was the hard rasp of her breathing, her heart slamming like a hammer inside her chest. She instantly realized that the experience had been a dream, another reflection of what had happened back in Karran-Kural...

She knew from experience that she would not be able to sleep more than night, so she got up, pulling a light robe from the bedpost to wrap around her slender frame. It was the deep of the night, and even the mundane sounds of the predawn hours in Cauldron that drifted in through the open window were muted. It was as if the entire city was wrapped in an enfolding blanket, collectively waiting for the return of the light to stir.

Mole’s bed was vacant; not a surprise. The gnome’s curiosity was insatiable, and she saw sleep as an unfortunate necessity, when there were new things waiting to be discovered. She’d spent a fair amount of time with Dannel pursuing leads in the city, and Zenna suspected that not a good percentage of that time was spent dealing with less-than-savory figures, courting danger. That was just the way she was, and the fact that people still wanted them dead—and others who didn’t fit into the category of “people” as well—could not change that.

She looked at the books lying upon her desk, but did not go to them. She just sat there, on the edge of the bed, staring out in the darkness that held no secrets for her. Unlike the world outside that door, she thought.

They’d taken a victory with them from Karran-Kural, but more, too. Zenna’s power had continued to grow, opening up new valences of both arcane and divine power. Even though she’d long sought exactly that, she was surprised at the speed with which she was rising, and in times of introspection felt far, far older than her still-youthful body belied. But introspection was also a rare thing of late, as events continued to surge forward at a desperate rate.

Cauldron was under siege. There were no armies of men, no beasts in the jungles threatening, but the danger was there nonetheless. The knowledge they'd brought back was vague, fragmentary; the scrolls of the evidently mad wizard Abradius, the scraps that Zenna had been able to delve from her brief communion with the Soul Pillars. Perhaps if she returned, spent more time delving into those secrets, they could connect more of the pieces... but even that brief communion had been enough to show her that the end of that road was insanity...

They'd sealed Karran-Kural behind them as best they could. Shensen's druidic powers might have been able to do a better job of it, but the fact was that they'd really lacked the power to destroy the pillars themselves. But from what she'd learned, the Cagewrights had already gotten what they needed from the ancient citadel.

The Cages. They were key, though they did not know exactly how, of yet. The Shackleborn. Another term without meaning, a scrap of knowledge, the piece of a jigsaw puzzle where they did not even know the shape of the final design. One thing, however, was clear, at least to Zenna; she felt it to the core of her being.

The plans of the Cagewrights would involve the utter transformation of Cauldron, and everyone in it.

And somehow, it was up to them to stop it.

Something came together in her thoughts. Rising from the bed, she crossed to the table where she'd left her things. She dressed quickly, needing no light to find every item in her inventory, to verify that every pouch, every scroll, every wand was in its proper place. Once readied she turned to the books, and slid them into their proper places in the light pack that she wore under her cloak. The cloak came last, falling off her shoulders around her body like a black shroud.

Only then, when fully prepared, did she hesitate. Finally she turned to the desk, and taking a quill and a small fragment of parchment she quickly scribed a note, folding the message over to write Mole's name on the back of the paper. She slid the note under the edge of the inkwell to hold it shut, and then stepped back, straightening.

She took a deep breath. A tiny whisper in her mind told her that this was foolish. But if there was ever a time for precipitous action, this was it.

She spoke a brief incantation, and vanished from her room, and from Cauldron.

THE END OF "SECRETS OF THE SOUL PILLARS"

Chapter 293

Dannel felt some of the stress that had accompanied him as a nearly constant companion ease from his shoulders as he entered the relative quiet of the grove. This place, so near to the bustle of the town, indeed seemed like a different world entirely. It was a shame that more of the townsfolk didn't come here, he thought.

This day there was a cool breeze off the lake rustling through the dense, overgrown brush that formed a low wall to either side of the twisting path. The sun was already well on its way to touching the curving black line formed by the hulking wall that ran around the entire circumference of the volcanic caldera in which the city of Cauldron rested. The elf walked down the path, making no effort to conceal the noise of his passage; indeed, he began to whistle the melody of an elvish song of traveling as he penetrated deeper into the grove.

When the bushes ahead began inevitably to shake, he stood his ground, trying not to look worried. It became somewhat harder, when they parted to reveal a snub head with jaws big enough to take off his head in a single bite.

"Hello, Bristle," he said. "I'm just here to see Shensen."

As the dire wolverine peered at him, he wondered just how "tame" the druid's animal companion was. But finally the thing leaned in to give him a good sniff, then, as if satisfied, it turned and disappeared back into the brush. "Disappeared," that is, if you considered the noise of the passage of an eighteen-hundred pound animal through dense bushes to be unremarkable.

Dannel did not follow the creature; he already knew his destination, knew where he would find Shensen.

The hillock was as he remembered, a grassy knoll surrounded by trees, topped by a single lonely blueleaf whose boughs spread out over its slopes like protecting arms. She was there, her back to him, watching the sunset. His booted feet made barely a whisper as he walked through the grass, but she knew he was there nonetheless.

"Hello, Dannel," she said, without turning. "I told Bristle I didn't want to see anybody; damn but that beast has a stubborn streak a league across."

"Maybe he knows you need a little company now and again," he said, sitting down next to her, facing in the same direction as she. "We all do, you know. Even hermit-druids."

He shot a covert glance at her, thought he saw the faintest hint of a smile.

"Why did you come today?" she asked, finally.

"I just wanted to see how you were doing," he said. "What you went through... it's not easy, for all that veteran adventurers like to make an almost cavalier reference to resurrection."

She shuddered. "You cannot understand."

He touched her shoulder, lightly. "I'm afraid I can."

She looked at him then, delving into his eyes with hers. Her eyes were a bright blue, the color of the lake under the full sun. "You were raised?" she asked.

"Yes," he admitted. "It was ten years ago; I had only just become a Harper." Her eyes widened slightly; that in itself was an uncommon admission. That society was known for keeping close counsel and weaving secrets; it was said that by the time you knew you were dealing with a Harper, they likely had already attached a few strings to you.

"What happened?" she asked. "If you want to talk about it."

"I was shot in the back with a Zhent crossbow," he said. "It was my own damned fault," he said quickly. "I dismissed someone as harmless who turned out to be anything but. Fortunately I had friends close by, so the Zhents did not have time to dispose of the body. Still, it was not something that I would want to go through again, understand."

She nodded. "Why did you decide... to come back?"

"It wasn't an easy decision," he said. "For all of the emphasis upon the power of the cleric... or druid," he added, "very few people talk about the agency of the soul. Ultimately, even in that, we have choice..."

"Not everyone does," she said, turning back to the sunset. "People die every day across the Realms... thousands, more. Not everyone is lucky enough to know a High Priest."

"I've thought about that often. For all that our clerics have dominion over life and death... whether they follow the path of good, evil, or the balance, order or chaos... for all that, the ultimate power to draw someone back across the veil is rare. And I think that's a good thing."

"Oh?"

"Consider our lives," he said. "We know that our time here is transitory, but we also know that our souls will continue after our physical bodies end, that we will have... something... waiting for us after this life. And yet we fear death. Why?"

"It is because life is precious to us, because of that very fact that we cannot easily tread that boundary between realities. Whatever our beliefs, whatever our causes, or struggles, we know that every moment here is vital, and ultimately limited. Thus it's a terrible, terrible mistake to waste any of it."

"I had no idea you were a philosopher as well as an archer," she said.

“Most bards I’ve met are a little of both,” he replied with a smile. “Although in some cases the philosophy can be a simple one, such as ‘wine, women, and song,’ or somesuch.”

“I’ve heard of worse approaches to life,” she said, her own mood lightening. She turned back toward the setting sun. “I’ve always loved this part of the day,” she said. “I do not know how my people, the drow, have managed to live, cutting themselves off from this beauty.”

“Many who live up here on the surface cut themselves off from it as well,” he said. “Maybe we can help at least a few remember, what it means to enjoy a sunset, in peace.”

She turned to him. “How is Zenna?” she asked.

Dannel lowered his head. “She is... she has had a difficult time.”

“We all have, of late,” she said. “If... if you love her, you cannot let her use that as an excuse.”

The elf chuckled wryly. “She doesn’t need excuses to be mad at me.”

“What are you going to do now?”

It was one of those questions that could go in a few directions, and Dannel clearly chose one in his response. “We’re not certain. Mole and I have continued to try to track down leads on these ‘Cagewrights’, while Jenya has been talking to the heads of the other churches, trying to learn what they can via divine means. But the gods have not been wholly forthcoming with hard info, it seems.”

“Helping those that help themselves,” she said.

“Yeah, something like that.”

“This is my favorite part,” she said, turning back as the sunlight touched the horizon of the wall. The golden orb seemed to flare brightly, as if resisting its decline, and the inevitable return of night.

The two sat there, silent, for some time, sharing a quiet moment in a chaotic time.

Chapter 294

“She’s gone to Saradush.”

“Saradush? Alone?” Arun asked.

Hodge snorted. “Hoy, that’s two ‘unnerd bloomin’ miles! What, the girl grew wings now?”

“Close,” Mole said. “She’s mastered teleportation, apparently.”

“Let me see the note, Mole,” Dannel said. His face was already a thundercloud, but the storm deepened as he scanned the short message. “That fool!” he exclaimed. “That fool girl! As if we weren’t being hunted by assassins... you know, it isn’t just the good guys who have access to scrying magic, or magical means of transportation...”

“She says she knows what she’s doing,” Mole said. “She’ll take precautions...”

“Bah! That’s what the man on the bridge of glass says...”

“Well, she has already gone,” Arun said. “Cursing it cannot make it not so.”

“She took some of the remaining jewels with her,” Mole said.

“May’ap she decided she’s ‘ad enough o’ this madness, thinkin’ it’d be a good time to up and get out’a this asylum,” Hodge said. “Might not be such a bad ideer at that now, mind yer.”

“No, Zenna would never abandon us like that,” Mole said, with firm sincerity.

“She ain’t been actin’ quite right o’ late, that girl,” Hodge persisted. “Even fer her. Ever since we came back from that damned ice-locker, and them pillers...”

“No, I agree with Mole,” Arun said. “Zenna knows what is at stake here, and has given us no reason to mistrust her motives. We shall have to trust, eh?” The last statement was made with the paladin staring at the elf, and Dannel finally nodded, reluctantly.

“C’mon Dannel, you said you’d go with me to Weer’s,” Mole said. Although they’d agreed to stay together in pairs, at least, when going out into the city, that cautionary stricture had already been disobeyed more than once by both the elf and the gnome. But both, it seemed, needed a friend now, and Mole’s own concern was not hidden well as the two left.

“I’m goin’ fer a breath o’ air,” Hodge said. Arun turned a hard look at him—the paladin was not as relaxed on the issue of splitting up in the town—but the dwarf only shook his head. “Quit cher worryin’, I’m only goin’ o’ver to the stables. Them new fawns o’ yers seem far too dainty entire, and if yer goin’ to let ‘em stick ‘round ‘ere, they’s goin’ need to know the hilt o’ a blade from the sticker.”

Arun nodded. “A wise precaution. I will come join you shortly.”

The older dwarf winked and put on a knowing look. “Aye, I get yer meanin’, friend. Goin’ to get yerself a quick one ‘ere supper, eh?”

Arun’s look was cold enough to cut iron, but the other dwarf only laughed the louder as he turned to go. As he was leaving, he paused in the doorway. “Tell yer missus that if the two o’ yer are goin’ to bring in any new ‘recruits,’ try and get at least a few dwarves, eh? An’ a looker o’ two wouldn’t be amiss nay no how, eh?”

Arun waited until the other dwarf had left, then he let his hard look loosen into a smile. There was no changing Hodge, but the man was a boon companion, and loyal, and that was enough for Arun Goldenshield.

“That man is a boor,” came a voice from behind him, in the other doorway. “He’s loud, obnoxious, odorous, and overly fond of the drink. But damned if he can’t swing an axe, and that counts for a lot in our line of work, I’d say.”

Arun’s smile deepened as he turned around to see Beorna standing there, regarding him with a quizzical look on her face.

“What’s so funny?”

“Nothing.”

“Well, wipe that silly grin off your face, then. We’ve got another recruit, another of them boys who wants to slay dragons and fight off evil; it’ll have to be with his forehead, ‘cause I’m not sure I’d trust him even with a blunt weapon. Come on, you’re the one they always ask about, and so it’s your duty; I’m no nursemaid...”

“How many is that now? Sixteen? At least Jenya doesn’t have to worry now about her church being understaffed.”

“Well at least they can muck stables and slap whitewash,” she agreed. “Well, come on then; I want to get this new one settled before supper, if he isn’t just here to mooch a meal before he disappears, like that half-elf kid.”

Arun nodded, but the templar’s point wasn’t really serious; in fact, of the recent initiates, only that one she’d mentioned had proven less than true in his desire to serve. They were a diverse lot, men and women of almost all the civilized races, mostly young, although one old fellow who had to be pushing fifty had appeared at the gate of the temple one afternoon, offering his skill to “that brown dwarf that’s been cleanin’ up this here town.” Jenya had been surprised, but after the first few of the new volunteers had been given quarters in the nearly empty temple rectory, she’d told the paladin that it made sense, in a way. The people of Cauldron had been through a lot in the last year, and there were many who felt that they needed to do something, to strike back in the only ways they could. And so they found themselves drawn to the front lines of the battle against the darkness spreading through the city, drawn to the place where people of reputation were fighting back.

Arun started toward the waiting templar, but before he reached it a commotion drew him around. Mole burst into the room—for someone who could be utterly silent when she wanted to, she could make a lot of noise—followed by Dannel, and behind him a third figure partially obscured in by the doorway. From the look on his friends’ faces—Mole eager, Dannel worried—Arun knew that their sudden return likely meant trouble.

“Hey Arun, look who we ran into!” Mole exclaimed, as their companion entered the room.

It had been over six months since he'd last seen Fario Ellegoth, and at first glance it did not appear that the intervening time had been friendly to him. The half-elf had a haunted look to his face, his smooth, lean features pinched and tight with layered worries. He looked as though he hadn't slept in days, and the paladin could see that he was highly agitated.

"What's happened?" he said. He shot a quick glance at Beorna, who nodded. "I'll get our weapons," she said, turning quickly and departing.

"I need your help," Fario said. "Fellian's been taken."

Chapter 295

Night came quickly to Cauldron, as the sun vanished below the artificial horizon of the city's walls and the cold evening breeze down off the mountains urged people into homes and taverns to escape the deepening dark. With all of the troubles facing the people of the town in the last year, the night had taken on a sinister cast for many honest folk, and the omnipresent clomp of booted feet and the clank of armor from the patrols of the Watch did little to instill a sense of security. While there was no curfew in place at the moment, strictly speaking, the streets quickly became all but deserted after the setting of the sun, and even those who left the taverns and inns late did not linger, walking quickly home to close and bar their doors to await the return of the dawn.

But this night, there were at least a few folk who were out and about, engaged in a business that was of the sort to end in blood and violence. In a dark alleyway just off Lava Avenue, Dannel eased out of the deep shadows just long enough to peer up and down the street, before sliding noiselessly back into cover.

"Where is that girl?" Arun muttered.

"I cannot wait anymore," Fario said, starting to get up. Beorna grabbed him by the shoulder, and pressed him back down, a bit more roughly than perhaps was absolutely necessary.

"Charging in isn't going to help your friend, and it may get him killed," she said.

"She's right," Dannel said. "They'll be on the lookout for a rescue."

"They're... torturing him," Fario said, desperation thick in his voice.

"Meerthan is still giving you information through the link?" Arun asked. The half-elf nodded, his suffering clear in his expression.

"You people are being loud enough to wake the dead, let alone the Watch," Mole hissed, materializing in the mouth of the alley.

"What did you find?" Arun asked.

“The place is like a fortress,” she said. “Volcanic rock for walls, solid all the way around. They’ve bricked up all the first floor windows, and the ones on the second story are all sealed with reinforced shutters... and not the kind you buy at the hardware store, either.”

“We don’t have time to waste...” Fario began.

“We’ll find a way in,” Dannel said.

“Well, it would be easier if we had Shensen, she could create an opening right in the wall...” Mole suggested.

“Meerthan sent another messenger to find her, but she wasn’t at the grove,” Fario said.

“We’ll have to make do, then,” Beorna said. “What’s the best approach, Mole? The least likely to be watched.”

“There weren’t any windows on the back side. There’s not much back there, just an old stableyard, sheltered from the street. If there was a back entrance, they’ve sealed it. No other exits at all, save for the front doors.”

“All right,” Arun said. “Take us there.”

Mole led them on a wide loop around their destination, an abandoned inn that had been transformed into a safe house for the Last Laugh. The Last Laugh was the city’s largest thieves’ guild, and while the companions had long suspected their involvement with the city’s troubles, they hadn’t had any solid evidence of an organized link. Until now, it seemed. Mole and Zenna had had a run-in with the guild shortly after they’d arrived in Cauldron, where they’d saved the cleric Ruphos Laro from a beating at the hands of several Last Laugh thugs. They’d first met Fario Ellegoth and Fellian Shard a short time after that encounter. The two half-elves had joined them in investigating the disappearance of several orphans from the Lantern Street Orphanage. What they’d found in a complex deep under the city was a slaving operation run by a half-troll warrior named Kazmojen. They’d managed to defeat Kazmojen and his allies, but Ruphos was slain by the slaver.

That wasn’t all they’d found on that trip, and the memory was something that still haunted them. During the confrontation with Kazmojen, a monstrous aberration had appeared: a terrible beholder. Fortunately the creature had not lingered, taking one of the children before vanishing back from wherever it had come. The child, a wisp of a boy named Terrem, had been returned to the orphanage a few days later, without any memory of what had happened.

After that, the companions had lost track of Fario and Fellian. The two half-elves were members of a loose organization called the Striders of Shaundakul, followers of the deity of wanderings and adventure. Shensen, too, was associated with them, and the companions knew that the Striders had been working behind the scenes to try to uncover the source of the troubles confronting Cauldron. Fario had explained that he and Fellian were linked by a magical telepathic link to a wizard named Meerthan Eliothlorn, the leader of their operation here in Cauldron. Fellian had been staking out the house of a noblewoman that they’d suspected of participation in the conspiracy behind the troubles infecting the city, when he’d been captured by agents of the Last Laugh. Through the mental link, Meerthan had known immediately of the capture, and he'd quickly alerted Fario to seek out aid.

And so, here they were.

"Okay, careful, don't make any loud noises," Mole said, as she led them down a narrow alley that opened onto the back of the courtyard behind the Last Laugh safehouse. "If you can help it," she added, with a glance back at Hodge.

"Fellian saw ten beds in the common room on the second floor," Fario reported. "There were at least that many rogues in the place, plus a halfling that had the look of a wizard, and..." he faltered for a moment, "and a woman... she's the one leading the... interrogation."

"Hold it together, man," Hodge grumbled. "We'll get yer boy outta there."

"So, what's the plan?" Dannel said.

Beorna's answer came as she slid one of her swords from its sheath; the black adamantine blade shone dully in the faint moonlight.

Chapter 296

"I wish Zenna was here," Mole said, softly.

"Yeah, but I'm sure she'd just say we were being crazy again, 'Yet another insane plan,' or something of the like," Dannel replied.

The elf and the gnome were perched on the roof of the safehouse, mere shadows against the blocky outline of the building. Dannel wore his magical slippers, but even with them Mole had still beaten him up, darting up the uneven wall of the old inn as though she'd been out on a paved boulevard on a Tenthday stroll.

"Here comes Beorna," Dannel said. "Get ready."

The two crouched low against the tiles as the templar, enlarged to a height of eight feet, strode forward. As they watched, she lifted her massive sword in both hands, calling upon the divine power of her patron god.

"That wall's at least a foot of volcanic rock," Dannel said.

"My money's on Beorna," Mole commented. "Come on, let's go."

The two started quietly across the roof, and therefore did not see Beorna as the templar drew her blade back, and then with a grunt slammed it into the wall. Mole and Dannel felt the building tremble slightly beneath them as the force of the impact was driven through the wall and through the supports of the structure. It was a mighty blow, one that should have resulted in a broken sword. But Beorna's weapon was forged of adamantine, that nearly mythical substance forged by dwarves in the deepest places under the earth, and it was the wall that gave way.

The first blow had shattered stone, but she did not pause, sweeping the blade out in one massive swing after another. When she finally stepped back, mere seconds since her first attack had shattered the stillness of the night, the wall was a ruin, with a gaping five-foot hole in the building yawning open before them. Behind the gap they could hear confused shouts as the inhabitants of the building reacted to the surprise assault.

Fario was the first through the opening, launching himself through like a shot fired from a catapult. By the time that Arun appeared he'd already run the first rogue through, and was exchanging blows with two others, his two swords darting back and forth as he parried the sweeps of their falchions. Another Last Laugh rogue came at him from behind, his weapon raised to backstab the half-elf, but Arun's blade carved through him, and he barely had time to scream before he crumpled, blood erupting in a flood from the gash that had cloven his torso to his spine.

Seeing that help had arrived, Fario disengaged from his foes, ignoring a cut that opened a gash in his left leg as he darted toward the staircase up against the right wall. "Hold up, man!" Arun warned, but the half-elf, possessed with fear for his friend, ignored him. Behind him Hodge entered the fray, stepping through the gap before firing his heavy crossbow at point-blank range into the chest of one of the remaining thugs. The man staggered back, injured, while Hodge tossed aside the empty bow and lifted his axe, its head bursting into magical flame.

"Go ahead," he said to Arun. "I'll mop up these rakes."

The two rogues' eyes widened as they saw Beorna appear in the entry, the enlarged dwarf filling the opening before she released the spell and stepped through.

Mole and Dannel, meanwhile, had reached the front side of the inn. Mole fearlessly bent precipitously over the front eave to look down at the shutter a few feet below, one of two windows that overlooked the front door. She'd already secured a rope to one of the chimneys behind her, and now leapt out into the dark void, falling lightly back against the wall beside the shutter as it grew taut and drew her back in. Above, she could hear Dannel moving into position, climbing under the eaves with the help of his magical slippers to hold him in place against the vertical wall. He lifted Alakast as she drew out some small tools and went to work on the shutter, bracing the rope around her by holding it taut between her legs.

Fario ran up the stairs and emerged into a large common room, where he quickly found himself in a world of trouble. Two rows of beds ran across the room in parallel columns, several of which had been tossed over hastily to serve as makeshift barricades for the half-dressed rogues who now aimed shortbows in his direction.

As if that wasn't bad enough, a pair of lean humans, clad only in light silk leggings, turned from drinking vials of unidentified potions to face him as they entered. Their naked torsos were corded with muscle and covered with tattoos, and their faces were painted in the white-and-black harlequin mask of the Last Laugh. By the way they snapped into ready martial stances, it was clear that they did not need to reach for weapons.

Don't... throw... your life... away, Fario! came a faint, familiar voice in his mind, over the telepathic bond.

But the half-elf's rational thoughts were driven away by the pain he could feel through that link, and there was no hesitation as he let out a loud cry and leapt at the nearest monk to attack.

Hold on... I'm coming, Fellian! he screamed, silently.

Chapter 297

The light was bad, she was hanging from the side of a building, and the desperate sounds of battle added a particular urgency, but Mole's concentration did not break until she heard a faint but satisfying snick as the lock on the shutters gave way to her efforts.

"Good work, Mole," Dannel whispered.

To be honest, she was rather pleased at her good fortune, since she'd let her lock-picking skills atrophy somewhat of late. But then she heard a loud bustle of activity from beyond the window, accompanied by multiple shouts—lots of shouts. Apparently the room they were about to enter was already a fairly busy place.

The darkness hid the wide grin that split her face.

Pulling open the shutters, she revealed a window with panes covered on the inside with dark fabric. Likely that was locked as well, but Dannel was already coming forward, Alakast at the ready. Even in the faint light she could see that he'd done something to himself, and his fists that clutched the pale wood were knobby and scaled.

Cool, she thought.

The elf struck, and the window exploded inward as the magical quarterstaff slammed into it. With a flick of her wrist, Mole tossed the little ball from her bag of tricks into the room, and instantly followed it by kicking off against the wall beneath her, using the rope to drive her back through the open window to land in an easy roll on the floor beyond.

The space she was in seemed unnaturally small, with thick red curtains dangling from long bars attached to the ceiling above. But she could hear shouts and activity all around, and knew that there were Bad Guys all around, close.

To her great pleasure the little rust-colored ball beside her expanded into a new creature, a black bear.

“Come on, let’s go kick some evil butt!” she said to the bear. She didn’t have to go far, as one of the curtains flew aside to reveal a pair of armed men clutching sweeping falchions, their faces painted half-white and half-black in the Last Laugh style.

Fario knew from the first exchange that the twin monks were expert melee combatants. Despite being unarmored, they moved with lightning quickness, and the potions they’d drunk apparently had given them some sort of magical protection, as he learned when a seemingly true thrust had glanced off of a tattooed torso. He wasn’t surprised when they moved smoothly to flank him, and he only hoped he could hold out long enough for help to arrive.

Pain blossomed through his body as an arrow stabbed through his armor into his side, followed a moment later by a crushing one-handed blow that snapped into his left arm just above the elbow. His entire arm went numb, and his shortsword went flying. But the half-elf just switched to a two-handed grip on his longsword, and fought on.

“You will regret coming here, elf!” one of the pair hissed, in thickly accented Chondanthan.

“You will join your friend, yes?” the other echoed, as he spun to avoid another thrust from the half-elf, snapping his foot around to drive painfully into Fario’s gut. Bright flashes of light exploded through his vision as he fought to recover the breath that had been driven from his body by the hit.

“It will not be long now,” the first monk said, but even as the words left his mouth, the loud rumble of someone heavy charging up the stairs drew their attention toward the corner of the room.

Mole dodged a sweeping falchion that clanged hard against the floor where she’d been standing a few heartbeats before, tumbling to the side so that the rogue was between her and the bear. As she came out of her roll she stabbed up with her rapier, and the rogue fell back, blood fountaining from the deep puncture that had penetrated his heart. The bear rose on its hind legs and clawed at the second rogue, knocking him back into the curtain, the weight of both of them pulling it down off its moorings. As the rogue fell, he and the bear half-tangled in the fabric, a larger portion of the room was revealed beyond.

Along with another five of the Last Laugh rogues.

“Dannel, I could use a little help here!” she shouted over her shoulder.

A crunch of feet upon shattered glass announced the arrival of the elf. In the light of the room he looked far more imposing than he had out in the dark outside, the lean features of the elf replaced by the thick hide and ferocious mein of a lizardman. Even the hardened rogues took pause at his appearance, but Dannel did not hesitate, leaping into their midst with Alakast already slashing out at the nearest. The end of the staff slammed into the man’s shoulder, driving him back, but the others were quick to recover, spreading out to take him from all directions at once.

Back on the opposite side of the inn, Arun exploded into the common room. Several arrows from the rogue archers glanced off of his shield or the mithral plates of his armor, doing no damage. The dwarf peered through the narrow slit of his helm, taking in the scene in a single glance, then rushed at the nearest warrior monk. The nimble figure sensed him coming and shifted into a stance designed to offer defense without opening himself up to Fario. It might have worked against most foes, but not Arun Goldenshield. Blood sprayed into the air as the paladin's blade bit deep into his body, piercing his magical protections. Through some intent focus of will the man remained standing, but then Fario reared up behind him, his sword clutched in both hands above his head. The injured monk's twin shouted a warning, and drove a potent kick into the elf's back, but Fario was beyond feeling anything except a drive for revenge. The tattooed warrior might have been able to dodge the blow, save for the torrent of blood he'd already lost, and the weakness that flowed into him as his life poured out of him. The second monk let out a shriek as Fario buried his blade to the hilt in the man's chest, and he went down in a gory pool of his own insides.

"Moskaius!" the second monk shrieked. He added, "You die!" and leapt at Fario, all pretext of defense abandoned as he lashed out at his enemy. The injured half-elf tried to defend himself, but could not react in time to avoid a punishing razor-punch that slammed into the side of his head, staggering him. The monk raised his fist to deliver a finishing blow to the half-elf's neck, but before he could strike the bright glow of a holy blade fell across his eyes.

"No," Arun said simply. The monk hissed and lashed out.

But bare skin and fast moves were no match for mithral plate and a holy sword. The second monk died quickly and messily.

Mole's summoned bear let out a roar of pain as a falchion dug deep into its body. The rogue did not have time to press its advantage, however, as Mole backflipped away from the man she'd been fighting, twisting in mid-air to bring her facing the rogue. Confused by the maneuver, the man swung at her, but the blade passed harmlessly over her, just a second too late. No sooner had the curved steel sliced by then she crouched and sprung up again, her rapier darting out like a wasp's sting, finding a tiny crease in the man's armor and sliding deep into his body.

The rogue just stood there as she kicked off him and landed easily a few feet away. He knew something was terribly wrong, but it wasn't until his mouth began to fill with his own blood that he knew that he was dead.

Dannel was holding his own against his foes; he'd already taken one rogue down and had injured a second. They'd managed to flank him, but the thickened skin gained via his alter self spell, combined with his magical armor, was making him a tough target. Still, they had him outnumbered; Mole moved to help him, but suddenly her muscles stopped obeying her orders. A cold chill fell over her as she stiffened and fell, unable to move. She felt rather than saw a shadow move over her, and saw out of the corner of her eye the injured bear moving to protect her. Attaboy, she thought, but her heart froze a moment later as the artificial creature let out a painful cry and slumped to the ground before her, already dissolving into nothingness as the magic holding it here evaporated. She heard a faint scuff over the sounds of the fray and knew that the man who'd killed her bear was standing over her, just out of her line of sight.

Uh oh, she thought, unable to do anything but wait for the blow to land.

Chapter 298

Beorna reached the top of the stairs, Hodge just a few steps behind, to see Arun charging a quartet of poorly dressed archers who seemed extremely reluctant to face him. A mangled heap of what looked like it had been two men remained in his wake, along with the slumped form of Fario.

“Tend to the elf!” the paladin shouted, as he batted aside a thrust from a hastily-grabbed falchion and sank his sword to the hilt in the man’s chest. That was enough for the other three, who threw down their weapons in unison. “Quarter, we beg quarter!” they cried.

“Get over there in the corner, and do not move,” Arun ordered. Amazingly, the paladin had yet to be injured, though he’d killed four men in the seconds since Beorna had hacked the opening in the wall of the inn. “Hodge, watch them,” he said, starting toward the back corner of the room.

“Where’s the secret door?” he asked the prisoners. For a moment they feigned ignorance, but when Arun raised his bloody sword one of them pointed to a panel that appeared to be just part of the surrounding wall. The dwarf gave it a quick look, then gave up and slammed at it with his sword, the wood splintering before his strength and steel.

“Don’t go off getting into more trouble without me,” Beorna said, moving to join him. Behind her, Fario stood weakly but determined, healed but still looking like a man who’d lost a dozen fistfights in quick succession.

Despite being pressed from all sides, Dannel clearly heard the last sounds of the bear, and he spared a glance to see Mole down, threatened by another rogue. With a spinning feint to drive back his attackers he turned and leapt at the man. His thrust with Alakast failed to connect, but it drove the man back two steps to the nearest curtain, allowing Dannel to take up a protective position over the fallen rogue. She wasn’t moving, but he didn’t see any obvious wounds; the mystery was resolved a moment later as a cold feeling descended over him. Knowing that they were both dead if he faltered, he fought off the spell, looking around in an attempt to find the caster. He deflected a pair of strokes with Alakast as the rogues pressed him, barely keeping them at bay with counters from the long staff.

There. A flicker of movement in the corner of the room, near the ceiling. Looking up, he saw a small figure, a halfling, clinging to the wall, the outline of his body shifting with magical displacement, a shield up before him.

Unfortunately Dannel wasn’t in a position to do anything about the enemy wizard at the moment, as a painful cut made its way through his defenses, ripping his mail links and scoring his back. The rogue laughed and darted back out of the reach of his counter, while two others prepared for another coordinated attack from ahead.

“You won’t last much longer, lizard!” one of them snarled, as Dannel missed a parry. Luckily his armor held, and he was able to turn out of the full force of the blow into a second that he did deflect, snapping the staff up into that attacker's face. The man staggered back, blood draining from his broken nose.

"I don't have to last much longer," the elf said, even as the sound of breaking wood sounded faintly through the far wall of the room.

A beam of ruddy light shot down from the wizard, and Dannel's strength faded as the familiar effects of a ray of enfeeblement settled upon him. The rogues took this as a signal to rush in at him, and for a moment the elf was surrounded by a swarm of blades. Alakast flashed and blurred in his grasp, and another rogue fell back, choking for breath through his crushed throat. But Dannel was also bleeding from another wound, a painful gash that ran across his left hip down his leg.

"Could use some help now!" he yelled, as the three remaining rogues gathered themselves for another rush.

A panel in the wall exploded outward, falling from its mountings in a ruin of scraps and splinters. Beorna strode into the chamber, her adamantite sword once again proving to be an effective remover of barriers. Arun was just a step behind her.

Dannel parried a swing from a rogue who'd thought to take advantage of the distraction. "Wizard!" he said, pointing with his staff in the general direction of the halfling before sweeping it around to block another cut. The rogues, to their credit, held their ground, although two of those facing Dannel fell back to face the dwarves.

Unfortunately, they didn't know quite what they were getting into.

Beorna lifted her hand and unleashed a blast of searing light that slammed into the corner where the wizard crouched. She got lucky and hit him through the misleading shield of his displacement, and his cry of pain was quite satisfying. Apparently the sudden change in odds was not to his liking, as he swept his faded red cloak around his body, vanishing in a small flash of smoke.

Dannel put his remaining foe down with a pair of strokes that snapped ribs and cracked his skull, then bent to examine Mole as Arun loudly dismantled the remaining rogues. One, clutching an arm ruined by the paladin's backswing, tried to dart toward the broken window and escape, but Fario was on him before he'd made five steps, bringing him down with a thrust to the back.

"How is she?" Beorna said, quickly crossing to Mole.

"I'm... I'm all right," the gnome said, grimacing as she flexed muscles painfully tautened by the halfling's hold person spell. Dannel offered a hand to help her up, but she snapped her back and popped onto her feet in a single motion. "I'm fine," she said. "Though you look like you've taken a fall in a razor factory."

"Yeah, well, you did leave me four of them," he said lightly, leaning slightly on Alakast while Beorna laid a potent healing spell upon him.

Fario had already turned back to the wall opposite the windows, drawing back another of the red curtains. “There’s another secret door here, somewhere,” he said, sheathing his sword and running his hands along the wood paneling. He quickly found something and leaned in closer, but then his expression tightened into a pained grimace.

“What is it?” Dannel said, stringing his bow.

“She’s waiting in there with her blade to his throat,” he said. “She intends to kill him as soon as we enter.”

Chapter 299

“What do we do?” Mole said, her blood-slicked rapier in her hand, hopping slightly on the balls of her feet with barely-constrained anticipation.

Arun and Beorna exchanged a look; they could remove the door in seconds, but both dwarves knew that the Last Laugh leader on the far side would only need an instant to do her deed.

“Can we parlay with her?” Dannel asked.

“No...” Fario says. “No, they won’t... they won’t let him live... he knows too much... they’re sadistic... evil...”

“Then we go in, and take the bitch out,” Beorna said, lifting her sword.

“No!” Fario said, tears of rage and frustration choking his eyes.

“Hold on,” Dannel said. As their eyes all turned to him, he drew a long arrow out of his magical quiver, and set it to his bowstring. “I believe I can give us a split-second’s distraction, but it’ll be just that, a split-second. You’ll all have to move fast.”

* * * * *

“They’ll be in here any second,” Finch said, rubbing his blistered cheeks where the dwarf’s searing light had blasted him. “They went through our rogues like a hot knife through butter...”

“Calm yourself,” Jil replied. “And take up your position, now.”

The slender but muscular woman ran the length of her blade up the naked back of the imprisoned half-elf, letting the edge linger on each of the dozens of cuts she’d personally opened with precise blows from her whip. This half-elf had been... durable. She had no doubt that he would have folded, eventually—no one had resisted her skills for long—but now, with his friends outside, she would have to expedite the situation. She smiled darkly as she thought of the look on Velior’s face when she told him what had happened here; that alone was almost worth the slaughter suffered by the Last Laugh this day. It was a pity about Makaius and Xendro though; the twins had been quite... innovative.

"I'm afraid our affair will have to come to a premature end," she said, leaning in close to the half-elf to whisper into his ear. She settled her blade against his throat, but he did not flinch. A pity; he'd lost consciousness.

She was alert to any movement from the secret door, but she was not expecting an arrow to come through the solid wooden panel, knifing through the air directly toward her. She twisted back, but the missile still grazed her arm, drawing a painful gash across her bicep.

Even as the pain of the wound—admittedly superficial—reached her brain, the door simply disintegrated, exploding inward in a storm of wooden shards. That she'd been expecting, along with the half-elf who hurtled into the room, twin blades seeking her flesh. But even though the door had been destroyed, her blade trap was intact, and the scything blades snapped on their lines in a collapsing arc around the doorway, cutting deep into the intruder's body.

Fario screamed, and fell to the floor.

"Nice try," Jil said, drawing her sword across her prisoner's throat, opening it in a bloody mess. A gnome darted through the doorway, landing in a cautious crouch, with what looked like a number of warriors directly behind her. The Last Laugh assassin stepped smoothly behind the rack that held her erstwhile captive, vanishing into the shadows that seemed to enfold her like a lover's embrace.

Chapter 300

"Where is she?" Arun said, the light of his holy sword driving back the shadows, but failing to reveal the assassin. The room wasn't that big, and there didn't appear to be many places to hide, with only a few assorted shelves and cabinets along the walls, and a bloody mess of a rack the dominant feature in the center.

Lashed to the rack lay the savaged corpse of Fellian Shard, his blood collecting in a red puddle on the floor beneath his slit throat.

"No... no!" Fario said, his body heaving with grief and weakness as the poison from the trap blades coursed through his system. Despite the serious wounds, and the fact that he barely had the strength to stand, he drew himself up to his feet through sheer force of will, and staggered toward the rack.

"Careful," Dannel said as he entered the room behind Arun and Beorna, an arrow nocked and ready at his bow.

"Damn you," Fario said, as he tenderly touched the once golden, blood-matted hair of his friend. "Damn you, why did you let Meerthan send you alone? I should have been there!"

Beorna moved quickly to the half-elf's side, but only a second's examination was needed to tell her that they were too late; even the divine magic she commanded would be of no help here.

“It wasn’t your fault,” Arun said, turning in a slow arc, shining the light of his sword into every corner. “And that assassin may still be here.”

“Invisible, maybe,” Dannel said, moving deeper into the room. Mole, meanwhile, had faded back into the shadows herself, her keen gnomish ears listening intently for the faintest sound of movement. It wasn’t easy, with the clanking made by her friends.

“Let us see,” Beorna said, her face tight with anger. She spoke a command, demanding the power of her god. And Helm heard her, and granted her that which she sought. There was no dramatic flash of light, no obvious manifestation of the god’s power, but the effects were instantly clear as the halfling wizard abruptly appeared, high along the wall of the room above a pair of wide wooden cabinets.

Dannel instantly drew and loosed, but the arrow sliced through an illusory image to shatter against the wall, a figment cast by the wizard’s displacement spell.

“Nice try, fool!” the halfling laughed, pointing his wand at the elf archer. Dannel had resisted its effects once before, but this time the compulsion overcame his will, and his body froze into position.

Arun lunged at the halfling, but he stepped back out of reach, the paladin’s holy sword smashing one of the cabinets but not harming the wizard. “Too slow, dwarf!” Finch cackled.

Beorna stepped around the rack, calling once more upon the power of Helm. A dispel knifed into him, removing both his displacement and his magical shield, but the power holding him against the wall must have come from an item, for the wizard still clung to his perch, out of range of their melee weapons.

But not out of the reach of their acrobatic gnome. Mole appeared out of the shadows, leaping onto a nearby shelf, catapulting herself up into the air with smooth grace, kicking off of the fragments of the cabinet Arun had smashed, using the magical power of her boots to leap up directly at the surprised halfling. Mole slammed into him and locked her arm around his body, the two of them suspended there as the wizard tried to fight off the gnome’s darting dagger.

Fario, overcome with weakness and grief, had staggered back, unable to bear looking at the ruined body of his friend. With the distraction of the battle against the halfling, he had no chance of detecting the shadow that disentangled itself from the wall behind the rack, stepping behind him.

“Time to join your friend,” she whispered into his ear.

The half-elf cried out in agony as the assassin’s blade plunged deep into his body, stabbing through his heart. Darkness engulfed him like a flood, and the last thing he heard was Jil’s laugh as she released him to fall upon the cold, bloody floor.

Chapter 301

The companions turned in time to see the evil assassin murder Fario. With the doorway directly behind her, she danced lightly back to stand half-in the portal.

“Time to go, heroes...”

The woman staggered roughly forward, back into the chamber. The source of her sudden shift became evident as Hodge appeared in the doorway, his burning axe flaring as the flames charred the assassin’s blood clinging to the blade.

“Goin’ somewhere?” he asked.

The injured assassin spun around, snarling at the dwarf. “You cannot hold me!” she said. She opened her mouth to speak the words of a magical spell...

And screamed, as Arun smote her. The strike was perfect, backed by a combination of divine force and physical power, and the evil woman crumpled, driven to the ground, her sword clattering from her hand as she lost consciousness.

Beorna lifted her sword to finish it.

Mole had been too... preoccupied... to deal with the situation between Jil and the others. Entangled with the halfling, she wasn’t able to land a critical blow, busy as she was in trying to keep him from casting some unpleasant spell upon her. He spat at her—ooh, yeah, that’ll hurt me, she thought—but was a bit more concerned as he worked a hand free and pointed his wand at her.

Not wanting to see if she would have more luck resisting his magic this time, she snuck her leg through his, and twisted against the back of his knee. She had leverage, and while the force wasn’t great, it was enough to break the tenuous grip on the wall that his magical slippers gave him.

The halfling tried to break free as they fell, but Mole rode him down, and made damned sure that his head was the first to hit.

The two fell apart with the impact, and to her surprise, the halfling got up. At least his face was bloody, though, his nose smashed in from the collision with the floor.

“Die!” he screeched, hurling a scorching ray at her. The flames washed over her, and hurt. Hurt a lot—but if the halfling thought that one spell was going to take her out... well, one spell this time...

“Um... I’d say your time is up, wizard,” she said, with a glance behind him.

To his credit, he didn’t fall for the ruse, but then again, it really wouldn’t have mattered. Dannel’s arrows slammed into his body, one after another, and when he slumped to the ground, he looked like nothing more to Mole than his mother’s old red pincushion.

Dannel spun around just in time to see Beorna raising her sword over the stricken assassin. “Hold!” he shouted. As the templar turned to him, a look of incredulity on her face, he added, “Maybe just this once, we can keep someone alive for questioning, eh?”

As Arun bound and gagged her (after stabilizing her with a trickle of divine power), Beorna covered Fario’s body with a cloak. After looking back to make sure Mole was okay—she was already looting the halfling—Dannel turned to Hodge, still standing in the doorway.

“I thought you were guarding the prisoners?”

The dwarf spat. “Yer didn’t say yer wanted ‘em awake.”

Chapter 302

Awareness came in a flash of light, painful in its intensity. His mouth opened, his chest swelling with a sweet flush of air even as his heart began to pound again, spreading life through his body.

Fario Ellegoth opened his eyes, blinking against the intensity of the light. The first thing he saw was a familiar face.

“Fellian,” he said, his voice weak as his body adjusted to the sudden transition back to life.

“I am here,” the golden-haired half-elf said. Like Fario, he was clad in a simple robe of soft white cloth, his body cleansed from the taint of blood and death that had clung to him when they’d taken him from the Last Laugh safehouse. Fario extended an arm toward his friend, the gesture costing him some clear effort; Fellian took it in his and held it to him. At that touch, the grief that had clenched Fario’s heart in its grasp shattered, and he finally felt truly alive once more.

“We... we were dead,” Fario said.

“Yes. But our friends brought us back, together.”

It was then that Fario realized that they were not alone. Turning, he saw Jenya Urikas, a tired look etched on her fair features, a now-empty scroll held in her slender fingers. Nearby stood Beorna and Mole. The gnome’s expression was cheerful, but the dwarf templar wore a serious frown.

“Welcome back, Fario!” Mole said.

“Thank you, all of you,” Fario said. His body was weak, incredibly weak, but he made the effort to rise up onto his arm on the padded couch where he lay. “We are in your debt.”

“I’d say so,” Beorna said. “Those scrolls cost upward of six thousand each, you know. Not to mention the drain upon the creator.”

