Jenya shot a cautionary look at the templar, but Fario nodded in acknowledgement. “Yes, I know. As I said, we are in your debt... and the Striders pay their debts.”

“You are allies in our common struggle against the dark,” Jenya said. “What aid we can provide is ours to give.”

“What... what happened... after?” Fario said. Fellian brought him a cup of water, and the warrior-rogue drank gratefully, the liquid washing away the dryness that had made a desert out of his mouth and throat. He managed to pull himself up to a seated position on the edge of the couch.

“Not much to tell,” Mole said. “We had another run-in with the Watch; seems our activities at the inn stirred up a bit of a ruckus.” She grinned, recalling the event. “Dannel and Beorna handled them, well enough.”

“Bloody useless,” Beorna grumbled.

“They took our extra prisoners, the common rogues, into custody,” Mole continued. “But we brought the lead assassin back here for questioning. The guards didn’t like it, but with Beorna looking right about to chew nails, what were they going to do?”

Fario’s face darkened at the mention of the Last Laugh leader. He tried to get up, but his tired body finally rebelled, and Fellian had to help him to keep him from toppling forward onto his face.

“Your body and soul alike have been through a great ordeal,” Jenya said. “You need rest, both of you.”

“We may not have time for rest,” Fellian said. “Something big is happening, and we may not have time for hesitation.”

A clank of metal on metal announced the arrival of Arun and Hodge. The paladin nodded to see the half-elf alive again, and Fario in turn inclined his head in respect and gratitude.

“Any luck?” Mole asked.

“She’s not talking,” Arun said.

“I cannot say that I am surprised,” Beorna said. “She will likely have to be compelled.”

“If you mean what I think you mean, I’ll have no part of it,” Dannel said. “I think we’ve had enough torture for one night, don’t you think?”

Beorna’s face tightened. “That is not what I said. But there are other means of coercion besides physical force.”

“She has already resisted my charm spell,” Dannel said. “Unless you have something else...”

“Well, we still have the halfling,” Mole said. They’d brought the wizard—or more accurately, his corpse—back with them, so that Jenya could speak with the dead in an effort to find out what he knew. But the high priestess would have to wait until the morrow, to pray for that particular spell. For the moment, Finch was in storage, his body temporarily preserved with a gentle repose spell.

“We cannot afford to wait...” Beorna began.

“Please,” Jenya interrupted, her open hands extended in a calming gesture. “Let us find out what we do know, first. Fellian, if you would share your account?”

The half-elf nodded, his own exhaustion showing as he sat down on the couch beside Fario. When he looked up at them, however, his expression was one of grim determination.

“We’ve been monitoring the activities of some of the leading figures in Cauldron,” he began. “We... we had reason to believe, through our investigations, that some of them were involved in the troubles facing the city. With the mayor disappearing...”

“What? The mayor’s gone? I hadn’t heard that,” Beorna interjected.

“There have been rumors, but nothing specific,” Jenya said. “But it’s true that Navalant has fallen into the background of late. His circle of close advisors have all but taken over the administration of the city, in particular Lord Orbius Vhalantru.”

“That is a name we know well,” Fellian said. “We haven’t been able to find out much about him—he’s fairly secretive—but we had uncovered some suspicious behavior about one of Vhalantru’s associates... a noblewoman by the name of Thifirane Rhiavadi.”

“I know of her as well, although we haven’t met,” Jenya said. “She has a considerable estate in the southeastern quadrant of the city.”

“That’s where I was captured,” Fellian said. “I’d been watching the Rhiavadi estate for several days...”

“I should have never let Meerthan send you alone,” Fario said.

Fellian looked at his friend, and shook his head. “We all had to do what we must,” he said. “Your mission was no less important than mine...”

“Yeah, what were you doing, Fario?” Mole asked.

The half-elf’s expression suggested that he wouldn’t answer, but Fellian said, “We are fighting the same fight. We need keep no secrets from them.” Turning back to the companions, he said, “Fario was trying to break into the mayor’s residence, to find out if Navalant was truly dead, as we suspect.”

“The place was all but deserted,” Fario said. “A few guards, that’s it. Somebody cleaned it out, that much was obvious.”

“So what of Rhiavadi?” Arun asked.

“She’s a wizard, and apparently one of great skill,” Fellian began.

“Wonderful,” Hodge said.

“She’s something of a gadfly, and spends a lot of time at various events through the city, always close to the avenues of power. From what I could gather from watching, and from a few careful questions around the neighborhood, Rhiavadi’s been having some odd guests at her estate, at some very unusual hours. Something was clearly building, there... and earlier this evening, I saw several very curious individuals arriving there. A trio of very unfriendly-looking dwarves... a very corpulent tiefling... and an armored cleric, whom I believe was a follower of Loviatar.”

“The maiden of pain,” Beorna said grimly. “This just gets better and better.”

“There may be others,” Fellian said. “While I was watching, I heard a faint noise near my position, and as I was sneaking out the Last Laugh ambushed me. I have several spells to get me out of tricky positions, but clearly they knew exactly where I was, for they didn’t even give me a chance to utter a syllable of magic.”

“So this meeting may still be going on,” Arun said.

Fellian nodded. “In any event, it’s something, and all my instincts scream something big.”

“So again we have more questions and guesses than hard information,” Dannel said.

“And there’s someone just a few paces away who has some answers,” Beorna returned.

“Then let us see if we can get them,” came a voice from behind them. Seven faces turned in that direction, where a shadowy figure draped in an enveloping body-length cloak stood framed in the outer doorway. As she stepped forward into the light, her identity was revealed, but those gathered here had known who she was from the first word spoken.

“Zenna!” Mole exclaimed.

Chapter 303

“That was a foolish risk you took,” Dannel growled, as the companions made their way through the shadows of a dark alley through the Cauldron night.

“As I said earlier, I felt that the risk was a necessary one,” Zenna replied. The night held no secrets for her, the crowded alley as clear as day to her darkvision, but Dannel had a tougher time of it, even his elvish eyes of little help on this cloudy, moonless night. Mole was taking them to their destination by a roundabout route, avoiding the four broad avenues that formed concentric rings around Cauldron in favor of less-traveled back ways where the light did not often penetrate to the cobbles below even nights when the moon was full.

“For what? A few spells?”

“I’d limit your comments to things that you actually understand,” she shot back.

Stung, he still rallied with another dig. “At least you could acknowledge that taking those jewels—which all of us fought together to win—was wrong.”

“If you’d bothered to talk to Mole, you’d know I only took my share,” she said. But after a moment’s pause, she amended, “And a bit extra for a new healing wand... an item we all benefit from.”

“You lovebirds can continue this reunion later,” Beorna said, breaking into their conversation. “Helm’s blade, the two of you are making more noise than Hodge with all this yapping.” She pointed down the alley, where the dwarf’s progress was obvious by the nearly continuous clank and clatter of metal as his weapons and armor shifted with every step he took.

“Hsst!” came Fario’s voice, back to them. “We’re getting close!”

“I hope we’re not making a mistake, bringing them with us,” Dannel said softly.

“They have as much right as any of us to be here,” Zenna replied.

The two Striders had insisted on going with them to House Rhiavati, despite their condition upon being just-raised back to life. The two had lost their permanent telepathic connection to Meerthan Eliothorn with their deaths, but Fario had left a message for him with Jenya along with instructions on how to deliver it. Jenya was also able to restore them somewhat with her healing powers, but even so, it was clear that the experiences they’d suffered had taken a lot out of both of them.

Not that the others were all that fresh themselves; invading a hostile, fortified building occupied by sinister rogues took something out a person as well.

The alley rose sharply ahead, with well-worn steps offering a narrow but passable ascent to one side. They made their way up to where the alley opened onto Obsidian Avenue, one of the major thoroughfares of the city. At this time of night, near the stroke of midnight, the street was deserted, but Mole did not hesitate, leading them quickly across the street to another dark passageway between looming buildings. This neighborhood was fairly gentrified, so the buildings were tall, solid, and in good repair. They passed a number of walled courtyards that were no doubt guarded by silent watchers inside, but nothing emerged to challenge them as Mole directed them unerringly to a large garden swath surrounded by a fence of close-spaced iron bars topped with slender points.

House Rhiavati was a hulking shadow on the far side of the grounds, looming up a good forty feet above ground level. The stately manor was set a good distance back from the street, with several tall, finely manicured hedges offering some degree of privacy from prying eyes.

“Here we are,” Dannel said, scanning the building intently. All of the windows were shuttered, and no lights were visible.

The companions stared at the house for a long minute in silence. In the dark depths of the night, the place seemed... spooky. Even without what they knew...

For once, they were going into a situation with at least some knowledge of what they might face. In addition to Fellian’s report, they had intelligence provided by Jil. The assassin had proven uncooperative until Zenna’s powerful charm monster spell had bent her will to theirs. Made compliant by the power of the spell, Jil revealed that she’d been present, unknown to them, since the very beginning; she’d been there, perched on a nearby rooftop, that night when Zenna had saved Ruphos Laro from several Last Laugh thugs.

Jil’s tale was a somber one that confirmed in the minds of the companions the seriousness of their cause. The Last Laugh had been working closely with the Cagewrights for over a year, she told them. She wasn’t able to reveal many details about that nebulous organization, except for the fact that at its pinnacle were thirteen individuals, figures of great and varied powers. She did not know the details of their plans, except that they hoped to engineer some sort of disaster for the city of Cauldron. Jil’s superior, a man named Velior Thero, worked more closely with the Cagewrights, and was at the meeting planned for this very night at Thifirane Rhiavadi’s estate. That meeting was supposed to include some of the most notorious villains of the entire region, and Thero had let slip that Rhiavadi had something special planned that would set a definitive course for Cauldron’s future.

At Zenna’s prodding, Jil had happily recounted a bloody series of assassinations, torture, betrayal, and other grim events that she’d been a party to over the last few years. Still young, she’d eagerly descended into a cauldron of filth and moral decay, turning her talents to the pursuit of personal power and advantage over others.

Beorna had been prepared to cut her head off right then and there, but Jenya and Zenna both agreed that she should be kept alive for now; she would answer for her crimes later, when the passage of time was less critical to their cause.

Leaving Jil held safely in a sealed room within the Temple of Helm (well within the dimensional anchor that protected the entire hallowed temple grounds), the companions had immediately made their preparations for an interruption of Rhiavati’s little “party.” Jenya lent what healing she could to Fario and Fellian, who refused to remain behind, and then she secured the Star of Justice, the holy mace entrusted to the High Priest of Helm in Cauldron. Using the power of that artifact, Jenya evoked a potent divination, seeking illumination to guide their steps.

As always, the granted vision was clouded in a riddle of metaphorical language.

*At the depth of darkness the parasites gather
To take their places at the grim table laid by the thirteen*

*Within the fire a fuse is burning bright
And the key draws near to the lock of disaster*

“We don’t have long,” Fellian reminded them, breaking the silence.

“Let’s go, then,” Dannel said. He led them to a heavy iron gate in the fence nearby. The fence showed signs of age, but the complex iron lock seemed very new, without a stain of rust marring its surface.

“Boost me up,” Mole said. Arun lifted her, and she gave the lock an expert examination, mostly by touch using a slender metal probe. “No way,” she said, finally.

“I can open it,” Beorna said, reaching for her sword.

“Subtlety might be more advantageous in this case,” Fellian said, stepping forward. He drew out a small metal tube from his pouch, and held it close to the lock. “Keep an eye out; this’ll make a small noise.” With that he rapped the tube against the metal bars, keeping the end of it pointed at the lock. A clear note filled the night, followed by a click as the lock audibly popped open.

“Handy,” Dannel said.

“I gotta get me one of those,” Mole added.

They made their way silently—well, as silently as was possible with three armored dwarves in their company—through the darkened garden toward the house. This time, however, instead of a covert approach, or the through-the-wall assault they’d used at the Last Laugh safehouse, they moved around to the front of the house, and walked up the front steps to the covered porch and the wide front door.

Mole couldn’t quite reach the antique brass door knocker, but she managed a decent rap on the door with her knuckles.

They heard heavy footsteps on the far side of the door.

“I got a bad feelin’ ‘bout this,” Hodge grumbled.

Chapter 304

The sound of a heavy latch being draw was followed by the door opening. The foyer beyond was dimly lit, but that radiance seemed bright in contrast to the deep night outside. The doorway was filled with a familiar sight: a muscled, armored half-orc warrior, armed with a massive double-bladed axe and a handful of other assorted sharp weapons.

“There must not be a half-orc left anywhere else in the Southlands,” Beorna muttered under her breath.

“What you want?” the guard said, suspiciously.

His wariness eased somewhat when Zenna hit him with her prepared charm monster spell. Stepping forward confidently, she announced, "We're here for the meeting with Lady Rhiavati. I hope we're not too late."

The half-orc's expression became a look of amiable confusion. "No, you not late... not expecting more... come on in."

He opened the door fully and stepped back. Zenna was the first to enter, nodding at the second guard who was standing back from the door. He looked even more confused than the first guard, but without the mental lubrication of Zenna's charm he was still suspicious. Zenna moved quickly to forestall him.

"You haven't seen any spies about the ground tonight, have you, guard? This meeting is of utmost importance, and Lady Rhiavati will reward you well for your vigilance."

"No... no, lady," the guard grunted, observing the finery that Zenna wore under her cloak, courtesy of her hat of disguise.

"Very well, guard. Keep up the good work." Turning back to the first guard, who grinned stupidly at her attention, she said, "You. Show us up to the meeting hall. There's no need to announce us; we're running a bit late and don't want to disrupt the meeting unduly."

"Wait," the second guard said. "You not supposed to go into house without escort by Lady Rhiavati."

Zenna looked up at the first guard, who returned the look with an expectant expression. "That is not necessary. We are expected."

The charmed guard nodded in agreement. "Lady not need escort. I go with her, show her way to ballroom."

The second guard's suspicion lingered for a moment, then he shrugged. "All right. But if Lady Rhiavati upset, it your problem."

They took their leave of the guard, and moved from the foyer into the grand entry hall of the mansion. The floor was comprised of exquisite white marble tiles, and numerous paintings and fine tapestries decorated the walls. Several doors exited the chamber, but the guard led them to one of several spiral stairs that provided access to the upper level of the place. As they climbed, Zenna plied the compliant guard with questions about the estate. There were four guards in total, with two off-shift at the moment, and about a half-dozen halfling servants. She also got descriptions of the other "guests": in addition to Lady Rhiavati, there were three armored dwarves, an armored cleric, a half-elf who had the look of a wizard, a white-skinned half-elf woman with black clothes who gave the guard "the creeps", a fat tiefling accompanied by a pair of emaciated black demons, the Last Laugh guildmaster, and a hulking blue-skinned ogre.

"Quite the rogues' gallery," Dannel commented.

“This won’t be easy,” Fario added, softly so that the words wouldn’t carry to the guard.

The stairs deposited them in a plushly apportioned anteroom with a curving back wall. There were two side doors, but the large double doors in the opposite wall, with a faint line of light visible under them, drew their attention even before the guard gestured toward them.

“They in there,” the half-orc said. “You need any more help, Lady?”

“No, you’ve done quite well,” Zenna said. “I will be certain to mention your assistance and fine work to Lady Rhiavati. Return to your post, and tell your companion that you will be rewarded for your efforts.”

With a dumb grin, the guard departed.

“I’m not sure it’s a good idea, leaving them behind us,” Beorna said. Mole had gone over to the doors, giving them a quick but intense examination. She then fell to the ground, pressing her ear toward the tiny crack at the bottom of the doors.

“We could take them out, but we’d risk alerting the whole house to our presence,” Dannel said. “We follow the plan... strike hard and fast.”

“Yeah, fer once we should be the ones doin’ the ambushin’,” Hodge said.

“Shhh...” Mole said quietly, gesturing them to quiet.

“Let’s make our preparations,” Zenna said softly, retreating to the far side of the room before settling down into her spellcasting. Beorna and Fellian joined her, while Hodge took up a position near the stairs to watch for any intrusions.

Mole, meanwhile, focused her keen hearing upon the tiny crack; the distractions around her faded as the thread of sound from beyond the doors grew distinct, a woman’s voice, speaking in a large room...

Chapter 305

Lady Thifirane Rhavati was not a beautiful woman by contemporary measure, but on this troubled night in Cauldron, a tangible aura of power hung about her, drawing the attention of everyone in the room to her like a magnet. She wore an elegant black gown decorated with glyphs stitched in silver thread, forming a pattern that managed to draw the eye and seem strangely disturbing at the same time. Her golden-brown hair was trapped in an intricate construction of thin wire, rising in a pyramid above her head, and a tiny silver cage glimmered across her chest, a pendant that dangled right above her breasts. But most disturbing was the third eye set in the center of her forehead; it seemed to track the gathered men and women in the room independently of her normal eyes, as if possessed of its own distinct thoughts.

The noblewoman let the wine goblet she held drift from her hand, suspended in mid air by some invisible magic. A golden weasel slunk across the floor to her leg, and in a smooth motion she drew it up into her hands, stroking its furry hide. She held the moment for a second longer, reveling in the attention fixed on her by those that had gathered here tonight for a revelation.

"More than five centuries ago," she began, "the demodands sent a few of their kind to our reality. Disguised as humans, they mated with humans and other denizens of this plane. Most of their spawn were stillborn, but a few survived. They mated and produced the next generation, with demodand blood. As the generations passed, all obvious traces of their demodand ancestry faded away. Today, we recognize this sacred lineage by an invisible birthmark: the sign of Carceri!"

She turned and lifted her hand to highlight the symbol on the tapestry behind her, a slanted arrow with an empty circle in the center. At her gesture, the sigil began to writhe, as if seeking release from the cloth. "We call these honored descendents 'the Shackleborn,' and their sacrifice is the key to unlocking a portal to Othyrs, the first layer of Carceri. Here, demodands and countless other fiends have languished for near-eternity. In Cauldron, we have found more Shackleborn than anywhere else in the realm, and in Cauldron, we have the perfect conditions for the Ritual of Planar Junction."

The rune upon the tapestry suddenly grew and shifted, taking on the form of a twisted black tree adorned with metal cages suspended from its iron branches. "For the past five years, the Cagewrights have labored in secret to build thirteen soulcages to drain the life energy from the Shackleborn. These soulcages hang from an artifact called the Tree of Shackled Souls—the device that gathered the life energy needed to unlock the prison doors of Carceri. Our preparations are nearly complete. We have assembled the Shackleborn and have prepared them to give their lives to change the world forever. All that remains is the final key, and once it is in our hands, the ritual will commence."

The image of the black tree burst into silken flames, melting away into nothingness, leaving only the unadorned golden cloth. "Once the ritual is complete, Cauldron won't be the same quiet little burg it is today. It will be the unholy font from which darkness gushes forth, a roiling pit filled with doom and despair for our enemies. Almost immediately, fiendish armies will sweep across the land and lay waste to surrounding territories, enslaving the weak and carving out new dominions. Naturally, we expect resistance on all sides, and that's where you come in."

A grotesque tiefling with boarlike tusks chuckled. "All eyes will be on Cauldron. We'll have their worst fears to toy with."

"Precisely," Rhiavati returned. "As kings raise armies to confront the legions of Carceri, your slavers, merchants, mercenaries, spies, and assassins will methodically search for weaknesses from within, soften their resolve, and convince them that their only true choices are to yield or die."

Rhiavati held them all captivated with the vivid picture, but the moment was interrupted as the double doors behind them burst open suddenly, revealing a muscled, eight foot tall dwarf woman clutching a brilliant holy sword.

“Party’s over!” Beorna cried, followed an instant later by an exploding fireball that filled the center of the room.

Chapter 306

Zenna’s fireball erupted in a blazing maelstrom of flames, enveloping the tapestry behind Thifirane Rhiavati, exploding the slender crystal goblets atop the table, and searing the gathered assortment of villains. Even as the blast cleared, Beorna stepped aside, allowing the others to launch their own readied attacks. Dannel took aim and let fly an arrow that sliced across the room, between the white-skinned woman in black and the robed magus beside him, finally slamming into Thifirane’s shoulder. The noblewoman hissed in pain, but before she could conjure a spell of defense, a small dart glanced painfully off her temple, its razored point cutting a deep swath to the skull beneath.

The combination of the fireball, along with Dannel’s arrow and the sneak attack from Mole’s crossbow, should have killed her. But Thifirane was rarely caught completely unprepared, and as her shield guardian started moving in response to the threat to her, cracks were evident on its shoulder and head where its mistress had taken hits. Through the eldritch magic that linked the wizard and the construct, the guardian had absorbed some of the damage threatening her.

Still, Thifirane had not survived as long as she had through hesitation. Even as the dwarven warriors charged into the room, and her “allies” leapt out of their chairs to defend themselves, she spoke a word of magic and teleported away.

As Beorna stepped forward and to the side to give her friends access to the room, a babau demon, thrown backward by the sudden opening of the doors, screeched and threw itself at her, its claws tearing at her armored body. Grimacing as the foul thing tried in vain to find a gap in her adamantine armor, the templar lifted her sword, and with both hands drove it through the demon. The babau shrieked as the holy blade transfixing it, and as Beorna placed a huge boot upon its chest, pushing it off her sword, it collapsed in a noisome, disgusting heap.

Arun and Hodge had already entered the room, seeking out other foes. A pair of dwarves flanking another nearby set of double doors to the immediate left rushed forward to meet Arun, holding dwarven urgoshes, odd mergings of axe and spear that they handled with easy familiarity. Arun did not hesitate, driving his sword deep into the first guard’s shoulder with the momentum of his charge behind the stroke. The warrior grunted, but they were dwarven veterans, and no single attack was likely to fell these combatants.

Hodge’s axe blazed into flames as he entered the room, looking for a ripe target to smite. Before he could start toward the table, however, a second babau to the right of the doors leapt at him, swiping a claw across his face. The dwarf’s instincts saved him from anything more than a few slight gashes across his forehead, and he countered with a powerful two-handed sweep that dug deep into the creature’s side. Forewarned of the presence of fiends, Zenna had aligned his axe, and the blow clearly had a telling effect upon the monster. But Hodge saw with alarm that when he drew his weapon back, some of the reddish, caustic ooze that covered the creature had splattered on the blade and its supporting shaft, persisting even through the nimbus of fire that surrounded the head of the weapon. But the axe was the only weapon he had that could harm it, and unfortunately the babau didn't give him much of a chance to consider alternatives as it leapt at him in an all-out attack, clawing and biting with a violent fury.

Meanwhile, the mephits that Zenna had summoned hovered above the melee, causing trouble with their spell-like abilities, or diving down to unleash their breath weapons onto particular defenders. One called into being a small rainstorm of boiling-hot water that filled the area around the table. But all of those gathered here were tough, experienced combatants, and at best those attacks were mere distractions.

The companions had dealt considerable damage in the first seconds of the fray, but now the evil veterans attending the unholy gathering began to recover and take action. Khyron Bloodsworn, the grim priest of Loviatar, kicked away his chair as he stood, drawing out a black steel mace and calling upon his patron. Beside him the gaunt necromancer Melagorn Thireq began to cast a spell, but even as the first arcane syllable passed his lips an arrow from the anteroom stabbed into his thigh. The evil half-elf cursed—or rather tried to, for no sound escaped his silent lips. The area around him was draped in magical silence.

Fario and Fellian, still in the antechamber, had made their presence known.

The vampiress Mhad needed no words to draw upon her dark powers. But despite her considerable power, born of centuries of violence and blood, she had no passion for a sudden battle against unknown foes in an unfamiliar setting. While her “allies” fought around her, she lifted up into the air above the table. Her cloak, a black thing of utter night, fluttered around her, although there was no breeze in this place to explain its movements. The fireball hadn't hurt her, not severely at least, and her natural healing ability would soon ease those wounds. But she recognized the servants of good gods among their foes, and the presence of at least two holy blades, and those did give her pause.

She flitted up to the rafters, high above the chamber floor, almost casually smiting a mephit who had the misfortune of getting too close. Once near the ceiling, she dissolved into a gaseous mist, and vanished through a crack into the night outside.

The tiefling Vervil Ashmantle was likewise not a brazen hero, but nor was he above killing a foe from the shadows. He retreated from the table until outside of the radius of the silence spell—at the very edge of the chamber—and then cloaked himself within a protective bubble of greater invisibility.

The dwarf slaver Adrick Garthwin darted nimbly from the table, joining his two guards in their attacks upon Arun. The paladin, surrounded, held his ground, fighting through a sudden stabbing pain as Adrick's waraxe crushed into his hip, denting the mithral plates from the force of their impact. Before he could counter, Thifirane's shield guardian stepped forward, the floor shaking with the ponderous force of its coming. As it approached, a halo of blue flames appeared around its body, enveloping it with a chill that could be felt ten paces away. Arun was the closest enemy, and it reached over the dwarves that surrounded him, delivering a punishing blow that the paladin simply absorbed, refusing to give ground.

Velior Thero of the Last Laugh was no mere sneak thief; around his neck hung the blood-red sigil of the violent god Talos. Unable to cast spells through the silence, he lifted his magical morningstar, stepping forward to face Beorna alongside Bonesworn. The templar met the two fell clerics in a silent exchange of blows, the enlarged templar looming a head over the smaller men. Bonesworn's unholy mace crushed Beorna's leg painfully, a bone crunching under the impact, while Thero's morningstar was turned by the holy aura of her shield of faith. But Beorna was heavily reinforced with magical augmentations, and two evil clerics could not likewise call upon their gods under the effects of the silence spell.

The last seat at the table was occupied by the hulking form of the ogre mage Zarn Kyass. As the huge, blue-skinned brute rose it hurled the table away in a silent cascade of broken glass and smoldering wood, unlimbering a massive two-handed sword. Stepping forward, it brought the blade down in a powerful arc that tore into Hodge's torso. The dwarf's magical armor held, but the ogre's sword nevertheless came away slick with Hodge's blood. The babau tried to take advantage of the distraction as it tore mercilessly at Hodge, but the dwarf had chosen his ground, and he simply ignored the tearing claws, the bite that snagged on his arm and bit down painfully before he could tear the limb free. He knew all too well that the ogre had the strength to bring him down; armor or no, he couldn't take many more hits from that massive sword. His mouth moved in a string of silent curses as he drove the babau back with the haft of his axe, driving the blade down into its body before it could surge back to the attack. The demon staggered, a foot-long gash oozing ichor from its chest, and collapsed.

Unfortunately, as he turned to face the ogre, the babau's last act of vengeance came to fruition as its acidic ooze ate through the haft of the axe, and its heavy steel head snapped off and fell to the floor.

Arun judged the shield guardian the greater threat, and unleashed a full series of attacks upon it. The construct, forged of steel and stone, was a durable creation, but Arun smashed into it with crushing force, his strength and speed augmented by magic, his sword knocking huge chunks of its frame off its body. It had already been weakened by the damage it had absorbed on Thifirane's behalf, and as Arun's sword slammed into it for a third time, it collapsed backward into a pile of debris. The paladin's blows had not been without a cost; the biting chill of its fire shield had penetrated his body with each attack, and he'd left himself open to the three dwarves facing him. They rained blows down upon him, and even his tough armor could not absorb all of them. Finally Adrick clipped him with another swing that glanced off of his helmet, mere inches away from caving in his skull, and he staggered back, half-blinded by blood flowing from a nasty cut on his forehead.

But Arun was not alone. A wave of energy swept through the room, slowing the various adversaries that still stood. The more disciplined among them resisted Zenna's potent spell, but the dwarves, even with their innate resistance to magic, were experts at fighting, not battles of will. Their sudden slowing gave Arun an opening, and he opened the throat of one fighter with a powerful stroke, immediately twisting and driving his sword deep into the slaver Gorthwin's body with the same momentum. The evil dwarf grimaced, and fear shone in his eyes as he realized the true nature of the foe he battled.

The necromancer Thureq spat blood as he yanked Fario's arrow from his shoulder, looking for a place to toss the silenced weapon so that he could escape its radius and regain the power of his magic. Despite the intervening combatants, and the chaos of battle that filled the room, an arrow found its way unerringly through the chamber, guided by the instinctive power that fueled Dannel's craft as an arcane archer. The half-elf's eyes widened in disbelief moments before the missile buried itself to the feathers in his chest, and the evil spellcaster fell, still not entirely sure of what had happened.

The center of the chamber was dominated by the raging struggle between good and evil, as Beorna of Helm battled the evil clerics of Loviatar and Talos. The holy templar, infused with the divine power of Helm, and bolstered with various other magics, shrugged off powerful blows and in turn unleashed a storm of death upon her adversaries. Her initial target was Bloodsworn, and with two powerful swings clove through his plate armor, decorated with grim fetishes honoring his warped deity. Realizing he was outmatched, the priest snarled and raised his unholy mace for a final blow... only to lose it, along with most of his arm, as Beorna swept her sword across in a final bloody arc.

She turned toward Velior Thero, but the Last Laugh guildmaster was already running.

The mighty ogre slammed his sword into Hodge, driving the dwarf to his knees. Once more, expecting combat in close quarters, the dwarf had not brought his spear, so he could only draw his dagger, a pathetic weapon against the seven-foot blade wielded by his adversary. But Hodge was not alone, and his companions were quick to come to his aid. A twirl of black cloth darting across the floor announced Mole's arrival, tumbling between the ogre's legs into a ready stance behind it. Fario and Fellian were close behind, Fario moving ahead to face the giant while Fellian tended to Hodge's grievous wounds.

Zarn Kyass was a canny adversary, though, and rather than waiting for his enemies to tear him to pieces with sneak attacks, he lifted straight up into the air, rising some fifteen feet to brush the ceiling before unleashing a cone of cold directly on top of them.

Mole and Fario were both fast enough to dodge out of the full force of the blast, but Fellian and Hodge were enveloped by the cone. Fellian staggered back against the wall, his body rimed with frost, while Hodge went down, unmoving, his skin drained of all color by the icy touch of the potent spell.

As if that wasn't bad enough, Fario abruptly staggered, clutching his chest, and as his expression deepened into a look of horror his body shifted and collapsed into a tiny pile of red fur. Where the half-elf had been standing, now only a little red rat remained, squeaking in alarm.

But the fight had gone out of the defenders, whose main goal was now escape. Gorthin abandoned his remaining henchman and ran for the nearest exit, letting the dwarf fighter's sacrifice buy him a few seconds. Unfortunately for him his flight drew the attention of the remaining mephits; the fire mephit cackled as it fired a scorching ray that sprayed across his back. That wasn't enough to bring him down, but Dannel was also tracking his progress, and even as the dwarf's fingertips touched the door an arrow sank into his hip. He managed to get the portal open before a second shaft buried itself in his back, and when he fell forward into the next room, he didn't get up. They found him there later, dead.

Velior Thero likewise disengaged, although Beorna's long reach let her clip him on the shoulder as he fled. Despite his wounds, he was still more agile than she, and with the hovering ogre mage remaining a serious threat, he was able to make it to one of the exits and slip away. Vervil Ashmantle departed in his wake, still cloaked in invisibility, and he didn't drop that protective shield until he was well out of Cauldron.

Zarn Kyass, the ogre mage, was not a coward, but nor was he one to remain to the last in a losing battle. If he had any lingering doubts, they were dispelled as Zenna appeared in the doorway to fire a pair of searing rays into him. Only one of the rays got through his spell resistance, but it was enough to convince him of the prudence of retreat. One of Zenna's mephits drew near enough to unleash a cone of hot magma onto him, but the ogre mage ignored the feeble attack. Kyass drove his huge sword through the ceiling, opening a jagged gash that revealed the black night sky beyond. The gap was far too small for him, but as the companions watched the mighty ogre's body dissolved into a cloud of mist, vanishing through the crack into the darkness.

Arun felled his last remaining foe and ran over to Hodge. Fellian stood over him, pouring the contents of a healing potion down his throat. The dwarf stirred, faintly, and the paladin let out a sigh of relief—audible, now, as Fellian's spell of silence lapsed.

"That was... intense," Mole said, petting the rat that squirmed in her grasp.

Chapter 307

"We got lucky," Dannel said, later, in the relative security of the Temple of Helm. "We should not underestimate the foes we faced, simply because we overcame them so easily. Without the advantage of surprise and magical preparation, events would have gone quite differently."

"Easily?" Hodge said. He held a cup of steaming hot tea—liberally "seasoned" with alcohol—in hands that still shook, hours after he'd been hit with the ogre's cone of cold.

"Several got away," Fario said. The restored half-elf shot a look at Mole, who'd seemed a bit disappointed earlier when they'd dispelled the polymorph spell that had transformed him into what she'd referred to as, "a cute furry rat." Mole was now seated on the floor on a small carpet, examining the various magical items they'd taken off of the villains they'd slain at House Rhiavati.

"I think that white-skinned woman was some sort of undead," Zenna said, looking up from the spellbook she was reading. Since their return, she'd been buried in the book they'd found in the personal possessions of the necromancer Melagorn Thureq. "And Thero got away as well, along with that tiefling sorcerer who made a mouse of our friend here."

Fario grimaced, but Fellian clasped him on the shoulder as the others laughed. It was healing, in a way, to be able to laugh in the aftermath of such carnage. And in the face of what they now knew.

“Velior Thero won’t find easy sanctuary,” Dannel said. “As long as Jil is in our custody, and under your sway, she’ll reveal the whole network maintained by the Last Laugh to us.”

“A good point, elf,” Beorna said. “Her knowledge should allow us to crush that nest of thieves once and for all.”

“I am more concerned with the wizard’s speech,” Arun said. Mole had shared all of the details she’d remembered from Rhiavati’s address to the gathered villains, and the grim outline of the Cagewright’s plans had left all of them shaken.

“Damn it, we’re in the same position we’ve always been,” Zenna said, slamming her fist down on the arm of her chair. “Always a step behind, always in the dark. We know what they want to do, but not how... or where, or when, except that it will be ‘soon’. Who are the Shackleborn? Where is this ‘Tree of Shackled Souls’? And what is this ‘key’ that they need to complete the ritual? How in the hells can we stop them, if we don’t even know where to find them?”

“We will find a way,” Arun said. “We’re clearly facing long odds, but we’ve won a victory tonight, and though our adversaries are powerful, we are not without resources of our own.”

“Well said,” Beorna said, coming to stand beside him. “We will finish this.”

“Face it, Zenna,” Dannel said, a hint of his old spark shining in his eyes as he looked at her. “You just can’t argue with a dwarf.”

“Let alone two of them!” Mole added.

“It’s been a long night,” Beorna said, looking at Fellian, who was already half-asleep, leaning back on the couch beside Fario. “Morning will be here in just a few hours, and maybe the situation will be clearer in the light of the day. This place is safe, if anyplace in Cauldron can truly be considered such.”

They filtered out toward their rooms. Even Fario and Fellian were too exhausted to do anything but accept the guest quarters offered by the acolyte of Helm. The rectory was nearly full now, with some of the new “recruits” even sleeping in the lofts above the stables, but there wasn’t one among them who wouldn’t have been willing to sleep out under the open sky, if one of the Heroes of Cauldron needed a soft bed in a private room.

Zenna didn’t feel like a hero; she just felt tired. Belatedly she realized that she and Dannel were the only ones left in the room. The elf was watching her, something unfathomable in his eyes.

“You should get some rest,” he finally said, after a long and awkward silence.

“I will,” she said. Her eyes were on the book in her lap, but she did not see the glyphs inscribed therein as she slowly turned the page.

“Zenna...”

Her hand froze in the middle of a page. "Please," she said, her voice thick with emotion. "Not now; I can't handle it, not now, on top of everything that's happening."

He stood there a moment longer, but she did not look up from the book. It was as if she was frozen there, a statue enfolded in soft dark cloth. Finally, he turned and left the room.

Zenna's body shook, and there, on the page, a single tear fell onto a magical glyph, blurring its outline.

That night, the companions slept the sleep of utter physical and emotional exhaustion. Morning came all too swiftly, however, and the adventurers were still bleary-eyed as they gathered for a late breakfast. The rectory was quiet, with most of the temple staff already out and engaged in the activities of the day. But the needs of the companions was not unanticipated; even as they continued to straggle from their beds into the common room several of the new recruits brought in trays laden with sweet breads, sausages, various fresh fruits, and pitchers of fresh-squeezed juices. Hodge immediately intercepted one of the trays, directing it to the table in front of him, not even bothering with an individual plate as he started stuffing foodstuffs into his mouth. Zenna, rubbing her temples at the headache that had resided there since awakening that morning, skipped the food entirely and poured herself a large mug of the black, strong-brewed coffee that was the common morning beverage here in the south. Even after almost a year, she was more used to the teas that were drunk in the north, but there was something to be said for the bitter black liquid when one was trying to wake up from an insufficient sleep.

"I don't know how you can drink that stuff straight," Mole said, adding a fairly considerable dollop of honey to her own, smaller cup.

Once they'd served the meal, the young recruits left them to their privacy. For several minutes they just ate in relative quiet, restoring the strength that had been burned in a long night of battles and tense confrontations. Finally, Fario stood.

"We must go; Meerthan will be greatly concerned, and we'd better update him on what's happened."

"I thought you guys had that mind-link thing," Mole said, gesturing with a cinnamon twist, her mouth full of berries.

"The link did not survive our deaths," Fellian explained, likewise pulling himself away from the table with an obvious effort. "The note Jenya sent last night will let him know we live, but we have to discuss what happened at House Rhiavati."

There it was; with the spoken reminder of last night's events, the illusion of peace that they'd let linger over their repast evaporated. Arun let the pastry he'd been about to bite into fall back to his plate; only Hodge kept eating, continuing his decimation of the platter of sausages.

"I suppose we'd better..." Dannel began, but he was interrupted as the door opened, and Jenya Urikas stepped into the room.

The look on the cleric's face was immediate evidence of trouble. "What's wrong?" Beorna asked, her hand stealing to the hilts of the swords propped up against the bench beside her.

The High Priestess of Helm took a deep breath to steady herself, before shattering their day with another dire pronouncement.

"Lord Orbius Vhalantru is a beholder."

Chapter 308

Orbius Vhalantru is a beholder...

The words echoed in Zenna's mind, as the six heroes—bolstered by Fario and Fellian—once more made their way through the streets of Cauldron. She knew that they all had to be thinking the same as she, had to be recounting the grim stories and legends that surrounded that most terrible of aberrations, the dreaded Eye Tyrant.

All of them except for Beorna and Hodge had been there, when they first encountered the creature. It had been in the dark subterranean chambers of the Malachite Fortress, when they'd confronted the evil slaver Kazmojen in his lair. The beholder had appeared out of nowhere in the midst of that meeting, taking the child Terrem and departing with him without any clue as to its intentions. They'd already confirmed earlier that day that Terrem had again vanished quietly from the Last Laugh orphanage over a month ago. The companions had been absent then, making their way back to Cauldron via their circuitous road leading through Occipitus, and they'd been so preoccupied with the almost constant threat of danger and progression of deadly events since their return that none of them had thought to follow up on the child's fate. Not that we could have done anything to help him, even if we'd known, Zenna thought, but it didn't ease the sense of guilt that she felt hovering at the edges of her mind.

Was that child one of the Shackleborn? she thought, grim at the possibilities of the child's fate. Like everything else they knew about the Cagewrights and their plans, the boy's fate was nebulous and murky, leaving their imaginations tempted to fill in the gaps.

Now, as the afternoon deepened toward evening, and the sun made its way back down toward the western horizon, they were headed toward yet another confrontation, one that—they hoped—would add that piece to the puzzle that would finally allow them to discern the solution to the mysterious danger that faced the citizens of the volcano city. The plots of the Cagewrights... to plunge the entire region into an interplanar nightmare.

They had not spent the day idly, resting their tired bodies, making what preparations they could, seeking knowledge that could possibly aid them. They knew that their adversaries would be ready for them. After last night's events, there could be little doubt that the companions were a dire threat to the plans of the Cagewrights. Oddly enough, the city seemed mostly oblivious to the most recent developments; unlike the dramatic events at the Temple of Kelemvor, the assault on the Last Laugh safehouse and House Rhiavati failed to create much of a stir in the city. Whether that was due to the simple incompetence of the Watch, or a deeper cover-up, none of them knew for sure. With the revelations they'd gained from Rhiavati's speech, Jil's charmed disclosures, and finally the secret of the nobleman Vhalantru, taken from the slain halfling Finch via Jenya's speak with the dead spell, they now knew that the Cagewrights had insinuated their tendrils into almost every aspect of the city's operations. It had been Vhalantru who had taken on more responsibilities as the Lord Mayor increasingly withdrew from public life, Vhalantru who had organized the hiring of the half-orc mercenaries who now dominated the Watch, Vhalantru who had been largely behind the increased taxes that had stirred such unrest in the city. Taxes that probably had financed much of the Cagewrights' operations, Zenna thought.

Vhalantru, who held the ends of the chains that held the city shackled.

There was little they could do, few that they could confide in. Fario and Fellian reported what they'd learned to Meerthan Eliothlorn, who immediately began sending out word through his own network of contents in the city and elsewhere. The half-elves had returned to the Temple of Helm earlier that afternoon, ready to continue despite the trauma both had suffered, each dedicated to walking this road to its very end.

Jenya had approached the leaders of the other churches in the city; Kristof Jurgenson of Lathander, and Asfelkir Hranleurt of Tempus, and transmitted a message via sending to the superiors of her church in Almraiven. Arun had spoken to those who'd gathered under his banner at the Temple of Helm, to add their weight to those fighting for the survival of the city.

"I haven't had the chance to get to know all of you well," he told them. "The last few days have been a tumult, and the storm facing this city... our city, will likely grow darker before it eases. I believe that a decisive moment is approaching. If you would be true to the oaths you swore, you must ready yourselves. I do not know if I will be here when the test arrives, but you may be certain, my companions and I will be on the front lines of the struggle against the evil threatening Cauldron. Gather your equipment; steel yourselves against what may come. Listen to Jenya Urikas... if it comes to it, and I am not here, she will organize your efforts. Good luck, and may the light of Helm, Moradin, and all the other gods of good shine over all of you."

Zenna remembered the cheers that had followed the dwarf's words, remembered being surprised at how many men and women Arun had managed to attract to him, not by his oratory and promises, but through the simple clarity of his deeds. So much was happening, she felt as though the details were sliding away from her, out of her control. It was a terrifying sensation, especially for her, and not eased by the complex emotions tugging at her in a dozen conflicting directions at once. She'd become powerful; almost as powerful as her parents, she thought... but it had all come so quickly, in a way she found shelter in the constant rush of activity, the pressure of events that drew her from one frenzied confrontation to another. It saved her from having too much time to ponder the implications of everything that had happened to her.

And from the fact that despite all of her newfound power, all the crushing responsibilities laid upon her shoulders, she was still barely nineteen years old.

“Are you all right?” Mole asked quietly. Zenna hadn’t seen or heard her approach, but she was used to that, and had learned to avoid being startled at her friend’s sudden appearances.

“Yes... I mean, as well as can be expected, anyway,” she said, with a wry smile that was only a bit forced. “We’ve come a long way, haven’t we?”

Mole nodded solemnly. “A very long way.”

Zenna cast her gaze down the long street, and the thin tide of people who went about their business, unaware of the destiny being shaped around them. “Well, you wanted an adventure...” she said. Turning her eyes back to the gnome, she said, quietly, “Are you sorry you came with me?”

“Are you kidding? I mean, come on... sure, we’ve had some tough times, vicious monsters, terrible evil, yadda yadda yadda... But we’re right on the front lines, Zenna! We’re involved in events that can literally can shape the very course of history, change the lives of thousands of people. Growing up, I kept hearing the stories told by my uncle, about what he and the others did, their travels, and I kept thinking, ‘What must it be like, to be like that? To be... important?’”

“We wouldn’t have gotten here without you.”

“Well, those bad guys just never think that a gnome can be a threat, so when they turn to face Arun or Beorna... ‘whap!’”

Zenna smiled; even though all the battles they’d been through had been full of blood and agony and fear, her dear friend had a way of evoking the triumph, the shared courage, and somehow, even the humor, in violent situations.

“Are we ready for this?” she said softly, not really seeking an answer. Mole, of course, heard her, and offered one.

“Don’t get me wrong, I’m scared down to my toes. But we’re not alone... we’re with friends, people who we can trust with our lives. Right?”

Zenna looked down at her friend, and nodded.

“Besides,” the gnome continued, “Beholders aren’t that tough. I mean, sure, they got those nasty eyes, can turn you to dust, fog your mind, blast your flesh from your bones, loosen your bowels with terror...” She was talking a bit louder now, and Zenna looked around in concern, lest any passersby hear too much and grow curious. But the street near here was nearly deserted, with many of the homes and business shuttered and abandoned by folk who’d had enough of the troubles that cursed the city. Zenna finally realized the true target of Mole’s litany: Hodge, trudging a few paces ahead of them. The dwarf was muttering curses, too low to make out clearly, although the words, “crazy” and “gnomes” could just be distinguished.

Although she hadn't seen it before, somehow she knew Vhalantru's estate when she saw it. The structure was smaller than House Rhiavati and looked older, reminiscent of the architecture of some of the noble houses in the old Chondanthan style she'd seen in some of the cities of eastern Tethyr. The building was apparently of three stories, with a squat tower to one side and numerous narrow windows visible in the front. It was clearly kept up in good repair, but to Zenna's eyes, knowing what she did about its inhabitant, the place seemed ominous.

They'd already decided on a strategy, and did not hesitate, creep about, cast spells, or do anything else suspicious that might have drawn attention to themselves. They'd already made what preparations they could, and none of them expected their arrival here to come as a surprise.

There were no obvious guards. The grounds around the manor house were quiet. The street behind them had grown strangely quiet, as if the city itself sensed that something was wrong, and wanted to avoid getting involved in the confrontation here.

"Let's get this over with," Beorna growled, striding up to the front door of the manor. The only barrier at the entrance of the grounds was a low iron fence with an unlocked gate that opened easily at the templar's touch, creaking slightly. She tested the door, but it was locked. Beorna glanced back, but Mole was already coming forward. She gave the lock a quick look, probed it with a small wire for a few seconds, then shook her head.

"Fellian, you're up," Arun said. The half-elf came forward, Beorna stepping aside to make room for him on the already crowded porch. Fellian glanced around to make sure that there was no one nearby, then he struck his chime of opening. There was an audible click from the door, which Beorna swung open, one hand on the hilt of her sword.

The foyer beyond the door was empty, a long hall beyond running back through what looked like a good part of the house's interior. They entered, wary of a trap, but the house seemed as quiescent as the street outside. As they entered, each drew weapons or readied spells. Zenna took the opportunity to shroud them all in a protective magic circle against evil, dribbling a tight circle of silver dust around herself as she cast the spell.

"You sure we got the right place," Mole asked.

"I'm sure," Arun said. "There's evil here..."

They moved slowly into the house.

The interior of the manor was richly decorated. The walls were polished wood panel with decorative moldings, their simple grace punctuated by the occasional tapestry or oil painting featuring a bucolic natural scene. There were several exits to side rooms that appeared to be quiet and empty, but they were drawn to a wider space at the end of the hall, where a slender staircase ascended halfway up to the second level before splitting into two, flanking a wide balcony above. A subdued red carpet of plush fibers ran down the length of the hall.

Several statues were situated in niches along the length of the hall. The carvings were of exceptional quality, depicting adventuring types captured in a variety of poses. They included a dwarf warrior, holding a greatsword as if to strike, a woman spellcaster with a staff and sword, a lean, robed, muscular man shown in a fighting stance, and an armored gnome with a small morningstar, a look of surprise on his face. Mole was drawn to the last one, giving it an appraising look.

“Those are good... too good,” Dannel said.

“You don’t think...” Mole began.

“Petrification,” Zenna said. “Turned to stone, by the beholder’s magic.”

“Our boy’s got an interesting sense of humor,” Fellian said, but his expression was grim as they left the statues behind and continued down the hall.

Suddenly, Mole, a few paces in the lead, hissed a warning, gesturing back with a wave of her hand. Even as the companions shrank against the walls of the hall, taking cover behind the statues or in nearby doorways, a door near the stairs opened, unleashing a noise of raucous laughter from the area beyond. A half-orc mercenary stepped into view, clad in unkempt but functional chainmail armor. His attention was on the room behind him, rather than out into the hall.

“Shut yer yap, Mrak, I’ll get me money back later, an’ mebbe a slab o’ yer hide as well!”

The guard stepped into the hall, carrying his heavy but awkward double axe with him; a second stepped into the doorway just behind him. Mole, Dannel and the half-elves were just shadows, even in the sparse cover available in the hall, but there was no way that the dwarves could be missed by even an inattentive viewer. As the first guard looked down the wide corridor toward the entry, his eyes widened as he saw Beorna step out from behind a statue, her holy sword sliding from its sheath.

“Intruders!”

Chapter 309

“Intruders!”

The half-orc’s warning was interrupted by a cry of pain as two arrows slammed into its chest, punching through its heavy armor and staggering it. The missiles from Fario and Dannel hurt him, but he managed to get his cumbersome weapon up in a defensive posture to meet the charge of the three dwarves, rushing down the remaining length of the wide hall in a clattering wedge. Behind him, the second half-orc charged through the doorway to the aid of his companion, only to stumble to the side as Mole, appearing out of nowhere, stabbed her rapier through a chink in his armor deep into his thigh. Beyond the doorway, they could hear shouts of alarm as the remaining guards readied themselves for battle.

The injured mercenary roared out a challenge as he slammed his heavy weapon down at Arun, but the paladin took the stroke on his shield, deflecting it harmlessly to the side. Arun's return stroke clove through the armor links protecting his side, opening a huge gash in the muscled torso beneath. The blow offered an easy opening to Beorna, who smashed her blade down into the mercenary's head, splitting his helm and laying his face open to the bone. The half-orc crumpled, a bloody mess well on its way to death.

Hodge met the second guard as he kicked out at Mole, nearly falling as his injured leg gave way under his weight. His situation deteriorated further as Hodge brought his magical waraxe around in a broad arc that crushed the greave covering the warrior's left leg, leaving him with two seriously mangled limbs. But the mercenary was of a durable stock, and despite the obvious pain he suffered he managed to drive his axe into Hodge's shoulder with enough force to drive him back a step.

Reinforcements arrived as another guard burst through the doorway; however, the half-orc had barely lifted his double axe when he froze, captured by a hold spell from Fellian. The paralyzed mercenary partially blocked the entry into the hall, and the next guard finally just thrust him aside, knocking him prone against the base of the nearest staircase. But the delay cost him, for even as he turned to face the battle a pair of scorching rays from Zenna slammed into his chest with blazing force. Screaming as the flames turned the chain mesh protecting his torso a fierce, cherry red, the half-orc swung his weapon blindly at the nearest foe. He managed to connect with Beorna as she stepped over the body of the warrior she'd just dispatched, but the templar shrugged off the hit. The guard snarled at the dwarf woman as both combatants lifted their weapons to strike, but the mercenary never got to finish his attack. An arrow slammed into his face, sliding neatly through one of the black openings in his helm, driving through his eye into what sufficed as a brain. Deprived of an adversary by Dannel's masterful shot, Beorna turned and finished off Hodge's opponent with a powerful two-handed overhand strike.

The battle had lasted all of ten seconds thus far, and already four of the mercenary guards were down or dead. Two more appeared in the doorway, launching immediate attacks that failed to do more than irritate the fierce dwarves. In a clatter of swords and axes, the two were driven back, and it looked as though they would shortly join their companions.

Zenna had moved cautiously into the open space at the foot of the stairs, staying clear of the battle. She knew that the dwarves had matters well in hand; she was more worried about what the din of violence might bring.

Her fears were borne out as a sinister hiss drew her attention up toward the balcony above. There, twined around the slender pillars that flanked the summit of the stairs, was a reptilian horror. It looked like a huge viper, only the face at the end of its twisting body belonged to no snake. That face was humanoid, a visage of malevolence. Its eyes blazed with a dark energy that seemed to bore into Zenna as she met its stare, and she reflexively threw her will against it, knowing that she was under attack. For a moment she felt the danger of that gaze, but then her innate mental discipline asserted itself, and she felt the evil power recede, and the surge of noise and activity around her returned to full intense focus.

None of the others had seen it, she realized, still focused as they were upon the battle with the half-orc guards. She opened her mouth to shout a warning, but before she could utter a word, she felt a familiar surge of spellpower behind her, and she altered what she'd been about to say.

“FIREBALL!”

Chapter 310

The explosive fireball filled the grand hall, blasting the decorative woodwork, engulfing tapestries, consuming the carpet to reveal scorched hardwood beneath. The dark woods had apparently been treated to resist fire, for the structure itself did not immediately catch flame, but the fragments of carpet and nearby tapestries continued to burn, threatening the house and shedding a lurid light upon the ongoing battle.

The naga's spell had been dramatic, but the companions had faced dragon's breath and potent wizards, and while they had been scorched by the blast, all of them weathered it more or less intact.

“Naga... nagas, up above!” Zenna cried in warning, drawing the attention of her friends to the more serious threat. As she looked up, she saw another pair of the creatures appear around the perimeter of the second-story balcony, moving to block the stairs, shifting under the effects of the all-too-familiar magical displacement.

Well, that I can deal with, she thought, grimly calling up the trigger words of a spell. For the moment, she held off on her dispel, instead conjuring necromantic powers to unleash a series of waves of fatigue that enveloped the nagas. The three creatures unleashed angry shrieks as the spell sapped at their vitality, dulling their reflexes.

Mole, who'd taken the opportunity to finish the held guard, and who'd completely avoided the fireball, looked up at Zenna's warning. And met the gaze of one of the nagas. Mole lacked Zenna's strength of mind, and as the creature snared her in its powerful charm, her face cracked into a fascinated grin, and she sat down on the chest of the man she'd just killed, looking up at the creature in bemused admiration.

The gnome was not the only one caught up in the fell power of the nagas. Hodge, turning from a falling half-orc, was likewise snared, and both Dannel and Fario, each drawing their bow to fire, suddenly lowered their weapons, their arrows falling out of suddenly limp hands to clatter harmlessly to the floor.

All in all, it was a devastating and effective attack against her weak-minded friends, Zenna thought. “Don't look directly at them!” she shouted, wondering if the warning would avail them.

“I'll deal with them,” Fellian said to her, indicating their charmed friends. “Take those fiends out!”

Beorna and Arun, their wills fortified by their commitment to their respective gods, continued to press the attack. One half-orc still stood, but with a gushing wound in his shoulder, his face blackened from the fireball, he'd clearly had enough of this fight. He turned and ran toward the exit, rushing past the charmed archers unhindered. The dwarves let him go, instead turning to rush up the stairs toward the waiting nagas. One slid down the steps to meet Beorna, while the second blasted Zenna with a quartet of magic missiles. The third creature, the one that had cast the original fireball, took the opportunity to protect itself with its own shifting aura of displacement.

The dwarves clambered noisily up the stairs, their heavy boots sending splinters of flame-scored timber flying with their progress. They reached the division in the staircase and split, with Beorna charging left toward the descending naga, and Arun moving to the right. The naga hissed a challenge at the templar, who responded with a powerful swing that passed harmlessly through its displaced body. A few paces opposite, Arun rushed up at the naga that had blasted Zenna. The gold dwarf attempted to keep his gaze averted, looking at the creature's sinuous body rather than its face, but as he lifted his sword into readiness his eyes happened to meet those of the naga. The paladin was a steeled veteran, but even his hardened will was not immune to the dark whispers that filled his mind, the treacherous grip of the creature's evil power.

The naga let out a triumphant keening as it drifted down to meet the paladin, twisting its coils around Arun's motionless body.

Chapter 311

With Fario, Dannel, Mole, Hodge, and now Arun ensared by the charming gaze of the nagas, and none of the creatures as yet even slightly injured, the situation looked pretty grim for the companions.

But as tides in the sea both rise and ebb, so to do the tides of battle often turn on the smallest point of fate.

In this case, that point was Fellian's dispel magic. The half-elf's spell, centered on the base of the stairs, filled the entire hall with an invisible surge of magical disruption that sundered the spells holding the companions. Or at least most of them; the clashing eddies of power were unpredictable, and both Hodge and Mole remained trapped in the grip of the nagas' power. But the others were freed from the cloying enchantment, and the auras of displacement protecting the ugly monstrosities likewise shimmered once and faded, revealing their true locations.

Arun roared in anger as he realized what had happened to him. His sword had been knocked from his hand by the enfolding wrap of the creature, but he shook his arms free of its grasp with a violent surge of strength, loosening his grip on his shield to free both hands. The naga turned its head toward him, fat gobs of poison dripping from its jaws as it snarled at its prey. Arun wrapped one arm around its long neck, and as its head snapped inward he cocked his gauntleted fist back and smote it with a powerful blow to the face.

That got its attention.

On the far flank, Beorna's foe lashed out at her, snapping at the templar's face with its envenomed bite. But it still suffered from the lingering effects of Zenna's waves of fatigue spell, and the templar was easily able to avoid its attack.

The same could not be said for the naga, as Beorna unleashed a full attack upon it that left it flapping in three bloody segments upon the stairs.

Arun's foe drew back in pain, hissing as blood dripped from its shattered face. But the naga still held the dwarf in its grasp, and it lunged at him, sinking its long fangs into the arm he raised to block. Unfortunately for the naga, the chance of a dwarven paladin suffering the full effects of its venom was next to nil, and Arun was quick to tear his arm free, ignoring the pain of the vicious wound. An arrow slammed into the naga's neck a foot below its head, and even as the creature turned toward this new threat, a second followed, and then even as the first still quivered in the wound, a third. The naga's head gyrated in pain as blood oozed from the three deep punctures, even as Fario and Dannel kept up their barrage. Finally, its agonized motions drew the head within Arun's reach, and the paladin reached up, snared its head in his muscled hands, and twisted.

With a snap, the naga's neck broke, and its body fell limp.

The last naga had not been idle while its companions were being destroyed. Uttering dark syllables in the language of power, it conjured a swarm of angry, fluttering bats at the foot of the stairs, enveloping Zenna and obstructing the aim of Fario and Dannel. It then drew back, intending perhaps to slink away, or shroud itself in a protective cloak of invisibility.

What it got was a pair of scorching rays from Zenna, who stepped forward from the shrieking swarm, her hair in disarray, blood dribbling down the sides of her face from shallow gashes. But her concentration was absolute, and the two blasts struck the naga's body squarely, the flames flaring out around it in a painful embrace.

Now completely sold on the idea of flight, the naga did finally cast its invisibility spell. But it was too late, for Fellian was ready with his invisibility purge, and when the naga reappeared Beorna was close by, her face an implacable promise that was soon fulfilled by her bloody sword.

With the deaths of the last of the creatures, the lingering charm holding Hodge and Mole snapped, and the two looked around in confusion that quickly changed to abashed embarrassment as they realized what had happened. Hodge's face twisted into a look of disgust as he stared up at the head of the nearest naga, dangling over the edge of the stairs, as he tried to reconcile the thing's horrid features with the blind adulation he'd felt for it only moments ago.

"Don't feel bad," Dannel told him. "Their magic got most of us."

"Bah," Hodge replied, but he gave the thing a wide berth as he cleaned his axe and slid it back into the loops of leather that held it in place across his back.

“So where’s Vhalantru?” Fario asked. “After that battle, I’m sure everything in the house know’s we’re here.”

“Maybe he’s not home,” Mole said, hopefully.

A cloud of steam rose from one of the burning tapestries as Zenna cast a create water cantrip, dousing the flames from the earlier fireball that still burned along the walls. Dannel helped her, stamping out the burning remnants of a tapestry that had fallen beside the door to the guardroom where the half-orcs had been quartered.

“Should just let the place burn,” Hodge suggested. “Better to come back and sift through the rubble later.”

Once she was satisfied that her spell had had the desired effect, Zenna turned toward Hodge. “How many reasons do you want for that being a bad idea? First, it’s unlikely that even if Vhalantru is here, that a fire would kill or even injure him. Second, there may be leads here that we need to find. Third, there’s no guarantee that a fire wouldn’t spread to half the city—that’s all we need, right now. Fourth, those statues—she pointed back down the hall—were once living people, and we may be able to restore them. Fifth—“

“We get it,” Dannel said. “Let’s continue our search.”

“Stay alert,” Arun said, unnecessarily, as they pressed on from the ruin of the once-fine hall.

They elected to remain on the first floor for now, rather than head upstairs. They explored several rooms, including the guardroom where the half-orcs had congregated. Even that room was fairly uncluttered, with just a few trinkets, copper and silver coins, and a couple decks of cards and dice on the long table surrounded by simple wooden benches against the far wall. The whole house seemed static and lifeless, like a museum rather than a place where people lived. Even House Rhiavati had been more vital than this place, with servants and furnishings suitable for use, not just viewing.

They found a wine cellar just off the guardroom, with walls of unadorned stone rather than paneled wood. It was a testament to the authority of Vhalantru that the place was dusty and rather neglected even with the presence of a half-dozen half-orc mercenaries just one room over. Mole took a look at a few bottles as she gave the room a quick once-over. Finally, she returned to the middle of the room, staring at the blank wall to the right of the entry.

“What is it?” Arun asked.

“You don’t see it?” Mole said. When the others shook their heads, she licked a finger and lifted it up. “There’s a slight current of air here. And that wall,” she said, pointing at the blank face of plain stone. “No dust.”

Dannel and Zenna both nodded, but Hodge only shook his head. “So?”

With an exasperated sigh, the gnome walked over to the wall and stuck her hand through it. “So, it’s an illusion, silly.” She stuck her head through the barrier, creating the unnerving appearance of her headless body sticking out from the wall.

“Anything?” Fario asked.

“Just a small room,” she said, stepping entirely through the illusion. Sound was not blocked by the figment, so they could hear her voice as she continued to speak. “Nothing but...”

She was cut off with a startled yell.

Chapter 312

“Mole!” Zenna cried, starting toward the wall. Dannel was faster, darting toward the illusory wall, the others only a step behind.

They passed through the illusion to see what Mole had found, an unremarkable, roughly circular room maybe fifteen feet across. There was no obvious sign of the gnome, but her voice came up from below even as they entered the room.

“Don’t come in!” she shrieked. “The floor’s an illusion too!”

Dannel instantly stopped, slashing his hands out to arrest the movement of the others. Hodge quite nearly went over anyway, his foot vanishing through the illusory floor up to his knee before Dannel and Fario were able to grab him and drag him back into the wine cellar.

Fellian was the first to spot the tiny fingers sticking out from the floor, at the edge where illusion and reality met. He reached down and grabbed onto Mole, pulling the gnome back up to where the rest of them waited.

“Well, that was almost an unpleasant journey,” the half-elven cleric commented.

“Where does it lead?” Fario asked, as Hodge shook himself free and regained his footing, muttering something unpleasant about dwarves being rescued by “damned fey elves.”

“It’s dark, so I couldn’t see anything,” Mole said. “But it sounds and feels like it goes quite a ways down. Listen.”

They quieted, and could hear the faint whisper of air moving through the shaft, the tiniest hint of a breeze that Mole had detected earlier. There were some unpleasant smells on that current of air, as well.

“Probably some sort of tunnel complex, below the city,” Beorna suggested.

“We’ve found more than a few of those,” Arun agreed.

“Perfect for a beholder,” Zenna said. At the confused looks of the others, she explained, “They have the ability to levitate their bodies, and can travel straight up, down, or horizontally about.”

“So what you’re saying, is that Vhalantru could appear at any moment, while we’re climbing down there,” Fellian said.

“That’s right.”

“What’s a matter, elf? Scared?” Hodge asked, but his taunt was undermined by the way his eyes kept drifting toward the shaft, and the nervous way he kept worrying the snaps on his belt pouches with the fingers of his free hand.

But the half-elf refused to rise to the bait. “No, just making sure we know what we’re getting into.”

“Trouble,” Hodge muttered under his breath. “Up to our bleedin’ necks in it, as always.”

Mole had taken a lengthy coil of rope out of her bag of holding, and now affixed it to one of the sturdier units of shelving in the adjacent wine cellar. Giving it a few trial tugs to confirm that it was secure, she looped the rest of the coil around her body. “I’ll go first, check it out,” she offered. “Of course, I can’t see in the dark like the dwarves can. Lend me that flaming stick you have, eh Dannel?”

The elf took the brand, enchanted with a continual flame, out from his belt pouch. He handed it to Mole, who stuck it through one of the straps she wore over her armor to keep her pouches close at hand. “Be careful,” Dannel said. “If you hear or see anything, anything at all, give a holler and we’ll draw you back up.”

With a grin and a mock salute, the gnome unraveled about fifteen feet of slack from her rope, then leapt out into the room and vanished through the illusory floor.

“We cannot cover her effectively, with this illusion in the way,” Fario said, an arrow nocked to his bow. “Can we dispel it?”

“Permanent illusions are no simple magic,” Fellian explained, and Zenna nodded in confirmation. “And I think our remaining dispels might be needed,” Zenna added. She didn’t have to elaborate.

“I’ll keep an eye on her,” Dannel said. Carefully he descended into the shaft, using his slippers of spider climbing to walk along the sheer surface of the cylindrical bore. To the others, it looked as though the floor swallowed him up.

Mole felt a familiar thrill of excitement as she dropped lower into the shaft. The flickering flames of Dannel’s torch showed the shaft descending in a straight line down as far as she could see, at first; but as she descended she could make out an opening below, and a floor maybe fifty feet below the chamber above.

That would have been a nasty fall indeed, she thought.

She rappelled down easily, letting out slack in the rope as she kicked off and descended in bursts of ten to fifteen feet at a time. She drew the rope taut right at the edge of the shaft's bottom, right where it opened onto a large room, ten feet above the floor below. She expertly slipped the remaining length of rope through one of her belt loops before wrapping it around her left leg and tucking the rest into the strap that she used to hold her crossbow close at hand. Once secure, she inverted herself and leaned down over the rim of the shaft to dangle upside-down over the room, drawing out the torch and shining it about.

The room was dank and unkempt, a bubble of stone blasted from the volcanic stone by the power of Vhalantru's magic. The chamber was circular and of considerable size, maybe forty feet across. And as she scanned the place, she spotted a shadowy alcove on one side, but her eye was drawn to movement on the opposite side of the room. A humanoid figure shifted in the shadows, lumbering slowly and awkwardly forward into the light. As it drew close enough to clearly distinguish, Mole's face wrinkled in disgust. A zombie; she could smell the stench of rot rising from its body from here. There was more movement along the wall behind it; two more of the foul creatures.

She must have said something aloud, for she could hear Dannel's voice from above, drifting down to her as he descended the shaft. "What is it?"

"Just some trash," she called up, already digging in her magical bag. It was a bit tougher, dangling upside down, but nothing that she couldn't manage, with her incredible agility.

She found what she'd wanted, a clay flask sealed with beeswax that would have drawn a very disapproving stare from Zenna. Mole didn't see the big deal; alchemist's fire was... well, fun wasn't really the right word, but it was certainly useful, especially in the dangerous situations that they often found themselves in.

The first zombie was drawing nearer, although there was no way it would be able to reach her up in the shaft, unless it suddenly sprouted wings, or its arms grew five feet longer. Mole took careful aim, and hurled the flask in a straight arc that connected solidly with the zombie in the center of its forehead. The flask exploded, showering the creature in a satisfying eruption of orange flame.

"What was that?" Dannel yelled down, and Mole smiled as she heard the voices of her friends from up above echo his concern.

"Just a little fire," she offered up, "Don't worry, I got it under control." She waved her hand as some rancid smoke drifted up from the creature; a minor glitch in her otherwise perfect plan.

A roar from above drew her attention back down to the zombie. The undead creature staggered forward, the flames eagerly eating away at the remains of its flesh. But even as the flames consumed it, its body shuddered and snapped, bones cracking loudly as its torso seemed to come apart from within. As Mole watched in terrible fascination, the zombie's body split in two, and... something came out from inside its body. Massive claws appeared, followed by arms and a body that were clearly too big to have fit inside the frame of the man-sized undead.

But the presence of the creature offered irrefutable evidence to its apparent contradiction of the laws of nature. It was nearly seven feet tall, lean almost to the point of being skeletal, its head an oblong orb dominated by bulbous eyes and a gaping jaw full of jagged teeth. Its body was covered with a thick, clinging black slime, and it gave off an odor that made the zombie's stench seem pleasant by comparison. The creature looked up at her, and snarled something in a language that she didn't understand, but which didn't sound like a friendly greeting.

"Uh oh..."

Chapter 313

Confronted with the sudden and most unexpected appearance of a faratsu demodand from the ruin of the burning zombie, Mole decided that it would be a very good idea if she returned back up the shaft.

But as she tried to pull herself back up, her leg got tangled momentarily in the rope stretching up into the shaft behind her. It only took her a second to shake free, but that second was all the demodand needed. The creature leapt at her, its long arms extending to snag her body with its claws, the sticky black goo that clung to it adhering to her as she tried in vain to slip free. For a moment the rope held, taut, but the combined weight of the two of them proved too much for her mooring in the wine cellar at the summit of the shaft.

"Mole!" Dannel cried, as the gnome, still clutched tightly in the demodand's embrace, fell hard to the floor of the room. The fiend tore at her with her claws, and Mole screamed in pain as its sharp nails penetrated her armor and dug painful punctures into her body. It lifted her up to its waiting mouth, trying to jam her feet-first into that jagged orifice, but she managed to spread her legs enough to land her feet on its forehead and chin, narrowly holding her out of reach of the gnashing teeth.

For the moment. But the demodand was both bigger and stronger than she was, and the sticky coating that covered it made getting out of its grasp a tricky business.

The two remaining zombies shambled forward, mindlessly seeking to add their strength to the fray. They did not assault the faratsu, but moved slowly and awkwardly around it, their withered hands already reaching for the fiend's captive. An arrow slammed into the faratsu's shoulder, a message from Dannel's bow, but the hit appeared to do little damage, its otherworldly defenses insulating it from even Dannel's potent magical arrows.

"Damn it, we have to get down there!" Beorna said, looking at the illusory floor as if considering leaping down into the fifty-foot shaft.

"The gnome was carrying all of the extra rope," Fario exclaimed.

"Great," Hodge said. "Who's plan was this, again?"

"I can get us down there, but you'll have to trust me," Zenna said.

The half-elves nodded, and after a moment's hesitation, Arun did as well. The dwarf was averse to heights, Zenna knew, but no one could doubt his courage, especially when a friend was in danger.

Another scream drifted up from below. "If you're going to do something, do it now," Beorna said, her blade shining in her fists.

"Everyone, stand at the edge of the shaft, and take hold of the person next to you," Zenna said. "On my word, step forward, and let yourselves fall."

"I dunna like this plan," Hodge said. But he joined the others as they readied their weapons and moved beside the shaft.

"Now!" Zenna said. As one, the companions stepped forward, and started falling. Hodge let out a roar as they disappeared through the illusory floor into the shaft, the ground below rushing rapidly up to reach them. For a moment it looked as though they would collide with Dannel, who was descending more slowly using his magical slippers, but then Zenna spoke a word of magic, triggering her feather fall spell. A heartbeat later their precipitous descent had slowed to a gentle drift. Dannel easily dodged their falling bodies, and a moment later the companions appeared at the base of the shaft, landing softly on the stone floor of the chamber below.

Fario and Fellian were quick to react, leaping to Mole's aid. Fario darted around the slower zombies and lunged at the faratsu from behind, slashing at its bony torso. He seemed to connect, but again its resistance to mundane weapons protected it, and the half-elf's blow barely pierced its thick hide. But Fellian quickly came at it from the other side, flanking the creature, forcing it to divide its attention between them.

Arun opted for a more direct approach, stepping straight at the fiend, and the zombie that blocked his path to it. Even as he swung, the still-struggling Mole warned, "Don't kill the zombies!" But she was too late, for the undead monster was already falling, knocked on its back with its torso rent near in twain by a stroke from Arun's sword. But before Arun could move to help the gnome, a terrible figure exploded out from the body of the zombie, and a second faratsu appeared to face them.

Hodge held his stroke as he was about to attack the last zombie, dodging back as the creature hit his shield with a powerful slam. "What are we s'posed to do wit' it then?" he yelled.

"Just keep it busy!" Beorna said, rushing to attack the second faratsu. The creature quickly got its bearings after appearing from the gory remnants of the zombie, but it had no time to mount an attack before the templar slammed her holy blade into its body. Unlike the other attacks thus far, this one clearly was telling, and a great gout of putrid black ichor erupted from the deep gash in its body. But Beorna's sword was fouled on the adhesive slime that covered its body, and she had to fight just to keep her grip on the weapon as the demodand staggered back from the force of the impact.

“Use the holy weapons and magic!” Zenna said, calling upon a current of divine power to turn the last zombie facing Hodge. The zombie retreated before her, and Hodge turned to help the others, but Zenna forestalled him. “Let me align your axe, so you can better hurt them.”

“Well, get to it, then!” the dwarf replied, holding up his weapon.

Fario and Fellian’s attacks had thus far done little to actually hurt the demodand, but their feints distracted it enough for Mole to finally tear herself free of its grasp. The injured gnome darted back but didn’t go too far, pausing only to rip her rapier from its sheath before rushing back to join the attack.

The fiends, outnumbered now, unleashed waves of icy fear that swept through the room. Both Hodge and Fario were overcome, dropping their weapons and drawing back in shivering terror. But the rest of the companions, bolstered in part by the aura of courage that surrounded Arun, fought on, bringing the attack to the creatures.

Fellian missed with a swing of his sword that glanced off of the first faratsu’s oily hide. But his attack created an opening for Mole, who darted into position behind the demodand and sank the entire length of her rapier into its back. The weapon clung to the creature and was yanked out of her hand by the fiend’s sticky hide, but it was nonetheless hurt, and hurt bad. More arrows from Dannel, who was now perched on the ceiling near the lip of the shaft, slammed down into it, and even though its resistances protected it from most of the damage, the electrical jolts that shot through its body with each hit were clearly having an effect.

Beorna, rather than fighting to recover her sword, simply unleashed a blast of searing light into the chest of the fiend. The creature screamed and fell back, but not far enough to avoid Arun, who swung his holy blade in a glittering arc that intersected its body where its torso met its hips. The sword sang a brilliant note of triumph as it hit, and the faratsu collapsed into two pieces, its ichor steaming as it poured out from both halves onto the stone floor. Beorna reached down and recovered her weapon, her mouth twisting in disgust as she shook off the clinging corpse of the slain demodand from the holy sword.

The second creature tried to escape, calling upon magical invisibility to hide it from the blessed blades of its foes. But Fellian quickly countered with an invisibility purge, and the faratsu found no escape as the holy warriors surrounded it and hacked it to pieces.

“Are you all right?” Zenna asked Mole, while Fellian and Arun tended to their terror-infused friends. Fortunately the fear effect was temporary, and Fario and Hodge were quickly able to recover their weapons and rejoin the group.

“Yeah,” Mole said, a slight sheepish tone to her voice. “Thanks to you guys dropping in.”

“Next time something looks harmless, don’t just assume that it is,” Dannel chided her, as he moved to the wall to join them on the floor of the chamber.

“What about that last zombie?” Fellian asked. The creature, still under the effect of Zenna’s turning, cowered at the far side of the room, near the dark alcove that might be an exit.

“Destroy it,” Beorna said. “If there’s another fiend coming... well, then bring it on.”

“No sense in inviting more unnecessary trouble,” Zenna said. “We can incapacitate it, and leave it here securely bound.”

“If you like leaving a potentially dangerous foe behind us,” Beorna returned. “We can destroy it; let us do so.”

“Yeah, I’d like a chance for a little revenge,” Fario said, still smarting at his failure to resist the mental assault of the faratsu.

Overruled, Zenna frowned in disapproval as the companions gathered in a semicircle around the zombie. Dannel slew it by firing a volley of arrows into its chest and head, and as the faratsu predictably began to burst out of its body, the companions rushed in and destroyed it.

“Now, that wasn’t so bad,” Fario offered, as he cleaned the remnants of slimy gunk off of his blades. The faratsu hadn’t even been given a chance to call upon any of its infernal powers, this time.

“And if a pit fiend had stepped out of that zombie’s corpse...” Zenna mumbled to herself.

The circular chamber had nothing else of note evident to cursory examination, so they made their way to the dark alcove. Mole’s light revealed it to in fact be another shaft, descending into the darkness yet deeper beneath the city.

“Great. Here we go again,” Hodge muttered.

Chapter 314

After a brief discussion, the companions proceeded carefully down this new shaft. This time Fario and Mole were the first down, with Mole using her own slippers of spider climbing, and Fario rappelling down using rope that Hodge and Arun had securely fastened via several spikes hammered into the chamber walls above. Dannel remained at the top of the shaft this time, with his own feather fall spell ready to bring the rest of the group down, if necessary. This time there was no illusory floor to block the view from above, so the companions could watch the gnome and half-elf as they descended.

The shaft was dark and quiet, with Mole’s burning brand forming a bubble of light as they descended, pushing back the menacing black below. They gone down almost a hundred feet before they encountered their first break in the smooth walls of the shaft: an odd door set into a shallow recess. The shaft continued down into more darkness, well beyond the radius of their flickering light to penetrate.

“Strange,” Mole said, examining the door. The portal was round, and oddly crafted to resemble the visage of a beholder. Carved eyestalks set with gems were positioned around the perimeter of the door, and a clear stone the size of a fist was situated in its center. "It looks like it's designed to break apart into several segments, which draw back into the threshold."

"I don't see a keyhole or other locking mechanism," Fario said.

"It's probably operated by some sort of magic, or something to do with these gemstones," Mole said.

"Trapped?"

"Oh, no doubt."

A voice drifted down from above, faint. Fario gave the rope a few quick tugs; a symbol they'd agreed upon to indicate that all was well.

"Well? Should we go further down?" Fario asked.

"Hmm... I don't like the idea of leaving this door behind us. But on the other hand, the coolest stuff is probably deepest down."

The half-elf grinned. "I'm sure the others would hate to miss that. How much rope is left?"

"I brought four coils, about fifty feet each."

"There's not much room here," Fario said, indicating the slight indentation into which the door was set. The ledge there was tiny, maybe two feet deep, wide enough for maybe three or four people to stand tentatively there.

"If we could get the door open, we could take a quick look at what's behind, and if it's danger, we could hurry back up the shaft, with the others covering."

"Unless something is waiting for us to open it."

"Well, yes, there's always that. But look at it this way; there could be something waiting for us below, and with our light, it'll see us coming a long way off."

"There is that."

"Wait here," Mole said. "I'll go up and borrow Fellian's magic chime."

"I'll just hang around here then, until you get back."

The transaction went smoothly, with Mole hurrying to get maximum use out of her slippers. Their magic was not unlimited, and she was very conscious of the down side of their potency suddenly failing while she was hurrying up or down the shaft. But soon she had rejoined Fario with Fellian's chime of opening in hand, having appraised the others waiting above of what she'd found.

“Okay, ready?” she asked. She was perched above the door, ready to flee if the portal opened to reveal something nasty. Fario hung across from the door, ready to be pulled up quickly by the others at a sudden tug on the rope.

The chime’s clear note echoed through the shaft. The door split into three segments, each sliding back into the threshold, leaving a round opening into a chamber beyond. Nothing immediately jumped out to attack them, so Mole shone her light through the opening.

“Better tell the others to get down here,” Mole said, peering into the darkness.

Chapter 315

Ten minutes later found the adventurers reunited in the long hall beyond the beholder door. The portal had started to close automatically shortly after it was opened, but Mole and Fario were quick to jam it open with iron spikes from Mole’s bag of holding jammed into the threshold. The opening left in the partially-closed door was small, but enough for all of them to fit through with a bit of effort.

They left their rope dangling in the shaft behind them, a tenuous avenue of retreat. “Not goin’ get back up as easy as we came down,” Hodge said, the last of them to make the descent. He only spoke what most of them were thinking; if they ran into trouble down here that they couldn’t handle, there were no easy escapes.

The hall broadened as it penetrated deeper into the volcanic rock, forming a wide area maybe twenty feet across halfway down its length. That open space had been used to form a gallery of sorts. Another of the beholder doors was set in the wall to their right, and facing it was a curving wall where a half-dozen stone statues of exquisite detail were carefully arranged. Unlike the statues they’d encountered in Vhalantru’s mansion above, these figures were cut in the shape of terrible monstrosities, fell creatures that had fallen prey to the beholder’s flesh to stone power. They recognized several of them, including a small black dragon, a kuo-toa, and a minotaur, but several others were of creatures none of them had ever seen before.

“These, I don’t think we should restore to life,” Dannel suggested.

Mole shone her light down the far end of the hall, revealing another terminus at a sealed beholder door. But the others were already turning to the portal in the middle of the corridor, the object toward which all of the monster statues were oriented.

“I get a real bad feeling here,” Arun said.

“Everyone, be ready for anything,” Beorna said, taking the opportunity to summon the power of Helm to bolster herself.

“Let me cast my clairvoyance spell,” Zenna suggested. “We’ll know what we’re getting into.”

The templar nodded. They all knew that the spell took time to prepare, so they settled down to wait as Zenna came forward and knelt before the portal, gathering her thoughts to focus upon her casting.

But she'd barely begun her incantation when she slumped back, her expression twisting in pain. They all felt it, a tangible wave of pure evil, hatred and pain sweeping out in an invisible but tangible tide from somewhere beyond the portal.

"What was that?" Fario said, rubbing his head. Fellian looked worse off, clutching his temples.

"Something's happened," Beorna said, her sword held before her in a ready position, as if expecting an enemy to materialize from thin air before them. "Open the door."

"That might not be a good idea..." Zenna began.

"Whatever it was, it wasn't good, and it can only strengthen our enemies' position," the templar said. "We have to strike, and quickly."

Zenna looked at her friends, but Arun had already turned back to the door, and Dannel shook his head, fitting an arrow to his bow, filling the air with the nearly-silent melody of power that surrounded him in his archery, infusing the missile with potency. Mole shrugged, but Zenna knew her well enough to know that she was far too excited to be worried about whatever it was that was waiting for them behind that door.

So be it, she thought, a grim fatalism drifting over her. As Mole moved toward the door, the magical chime in hand, Zenna took the opportunity to summon her own wards, adding to the magic circle that she'd called upon before. Fellian, likewise, placed shields of faith upon himself and Fario.

Mole reached the door, and glanced back at her companions. They were ready, but Zenna couldn't shake the black feeling that had settled over her, a certainty that only disaster awaited them behind the beholder portal.

"Do it," Beorna said.

The chime sounded, and as its clear note reverberated through the hall, the slabs of the door parted and slid back.

Beyond the door was another great chamber, a smooth hemisphere blasted from the surrounding rock by the beholder's magic, the ceiling rising in a perfect dome above. The chamber was lit, with flickering blue flames in sconces around the perimeter filling the place with a surreal aquamarine glow. There were no furnishings or other mundane details; the only other unique feature of the room was a magical diagram, easily ten paces across, carved with glowing blue runes, set into the center of the floor. The diagram formed a triangle inscribed inside a circle; at each point of the triangle was a dark object, roughly the size of a man.

And hovering above the diagram was the creature they had come to find.

The beholder was turned away from them, quivering within a glowing nimbus of soft gray wisps that surrounded it like a haze of fog. The companions readied weapons and spells, but before they could strike, another surge of power slammed through the room with the force of a physical blow, stunning them. Black tendrils of energy exploded up from the three figures imprisoned on the perimeter of the magic circle, each disintegrating into ash as the power was released from them. Those flares rose up and tore into the beholder, whose form swelled and distended. The gray haze vanished, and even as the companions felt control over their minds and bodies slowly returning, the dark orb slowly began to rotate.

A grim laugh that was too jarringly human came from the beholder. "You're too late, heroes."

As it turned to face them, they saw that the beholder had... changed. Its already thick and mottled hide had darkened, cracked and broken with sores that oozed a toxic black putrescence like tar seeping from the earth. As Vhalantru's huge jaws opened, its mad laughter continuing to roil from within, a great gout of putrid green ooze erupted from its body, landing in a noxious splat on the floor below. And as its large central eye opened, unleashing its potent cone of antimagic upon them, the companions could see the glistening organ ripple and move. For within that eye, quivering as if trying to break free, they could see the face of a trapped fiend...

"By the gods," Dannel said, his face as white as a burial shroud.

Chapter 316

"Attack!" Beorna croaked, lifting her sword with difficulty as she fought through the lingering aftereffects of the grim ritual that had transformed the already monstrous beholder into something... more.

The companions readied weapons and spells, and Arun and Beorna half-charged, half-staggered forward to meet the monstrous aberration before it could unleash its deadly attacks. Their wards were gone, and their magical weapons made temporarily useless, by the cone of antimagic that was emitted from its central eye. The dwarves still had their strength, and their swords were still sharp, but Vhalantru was ready for them, and before the pair of holy warriors could close to strike, it rose up into the air, hovering twenty feet above them. Its jaws opened and it spat a globule of green goop at Beorna, the noxious substance splashing across her chest. The templar shuddered as the paralytic effects of the spittle coursed through her body. The dwarven woman was possessed of an incredible fortitude, but this time it just wasn't enough. She managed an agonized cry of frustration as the unholy toxin took hold of her, her muscles freezing in a fierce but futile martial stance.

Missiles sliced through the air around the beholder, as the rest of the companions added their support to their companions. While Dannel's song was magical in nature, and thus unable to add to his arrows' effectiveness, his skill was unaffected by the beholder's power. His first shot sank with a solid thunk into its obese body, but he belatedly realized, as he reached for another arrow, that his efficient quiver likewise could not work in the anti-magic field.

He had no more ammunition.

“Here, Dannel!” Fario said, indicating his own quiver as he fired a shot that scored a direct hit on the beholder. Fellian and Mole’s shots missed, however, glancing off its hide, its leathery skin augmented further by the transformation it had undergone. Hodge ducked behind the threshold of the open door, fumbling with his winch as he tried to wind his crossbow with shaking fingers.

“Right... now... take... a dragon...” he muttered.

Zenna held her ground, studying the creature, knowing that she had to find a way to regain her magical powers. She knew that the antimagic field came from the central eye, and suspected that it was emitted in a cone. She could retreat back into the hall, but any help she summoned would be neutralized the moment it entered the field. So there was only one option.

Tightening her jaw, and trying to ignore the flutter of panic in her gut, she ran forward into the room.

The beholder continued to rise slowly higher into the air, and was now a good forty feet above them, nearing the apex of the dome above. It rotated as it climbed, keeping its central eye fixed on them, its smaller eyes twisting on their narrow stalks.

It cannot use its other powers in the antimagic field, Zenna realized, looking up now almost directly at the creature. She started toward the far wall; according to her calculation it should not be able to cover the entire room unless it rose all the way to the ceiling, and even then if it covered her, her friends in the entryway should be out of the radius of the effect.

But then, to her surprise, it closed its heavy lid over the central eye. Zenna could feel the familiar tingle of her wards returning, and wondered what it was doing.

Why would it... But even as she began the thought, she knew the answer.

“Watch out for its eye-stalks!” she warned.

Even as her shout echoed through the dome, a pale gray beam sliced down from the beholder, splashing across her body. She felt the cold touch of negative power penetrate to her soul, a power with the ability to suck the life right out of her body.

Fortunately, when Vhalantru had closed its central eye, her death ward had taken hold once more.

But her friends did not share her protections. Even as the beholder targeted her, its other eyestalks were seeking out the foes that had hurt it. Zenna saw them twist and the focus on the far side of the room, where Dannel had stepped up beside Fario, and was loading his bow with an arrow from the Strider's quiver. Both lifted their longbows in unison, but as the tracking eyes fixed on their targets, Zenna knew that they were too late.

"No!"

A green ray sliced down from above, stabbing into Fario's chest. The half-elf didn't even have a chance to scream as the ray surrounded him with a bright emerald glow, disintegrating him.

Even as Fario's gear clattered to the ground, a second ray blasted into Dannel. The elven archer stiffened, and Zenna could do nothing but watch as the elf was turned to stone.

Chapter 317

"You monster!" Fellian shrieked, tears flowing down his face as he fired arrow after arrow at the beholder. The missiles failed to harm it, sticking harmlessly in its outer hide or glancing off to clatter to the ground below.

"Now, too late, you understand," the beholder cackled. Its great jaws opened again, and a gob of green muck the size of a man's skull fell to splatter on the ground below. The projectile did not hit any of them, but as it struck it exploded out into a noxious cloud of greenish vapors that quickly started to spread throughout the room.

Cloudkill! Zenna's mind screamed, as she drew back from the cloud that had already engulfed Arun and Beorna, and would soon incorporate the rest of them as well. She'd readied a spell to blast the beholder, but hastily shifted to a dispel aimed at disrupting the conjuration. For a moment she felt a surge of terror as her spell impacted the potency of the beholder's magic, augmented by the bizarre ritual that had infused it with fiendish power. But then she saw Dannel in her mind's eye, killed by Vhalantru, and with a surge of rage her dispel knifed through the energies sustaining the spell, dissipating the evil cloud.

But their situation was not far improved. Three of them were already out of the fight, and with those deadly eyes able to pick them out at will...

Forcing herself to turn her gaze away from the beholder, she turned and ran toward Beorna.

A small object rose from the periphery of the chamber, where Mole had taken cover in the shadows. The awkward missile arced up and impacted the beholder near the top of its body, hitting and sticking with a soft 'plop'. There was no explosion of alchemist's fire, no dramatic sizzle of acid, but as the beholder turned violently several of its eyestalks appeared to be stuck within a spread of brown goo that had spilled from the bag on impact.

"Take that!" the gnome chimed from below. But she quickly had to evade as a green line shot down from below, narrowly missing her. The ray disintegrated a swath of the floor behind her, opening a pit that she leapt out of even as it formed, tumbling forward into a desperate arc.

Spinning in an attempt to bring its other eyestalks to bear, fighting against the clinging mess of Mole's tanglefoot bag, the beholder fired a soft rose ray at Zenna. The ray struck her, but the tiefling easily fought off the somnolent effects of the sleep attack.

Another wave of fiendish power filled the room. Zenna felt a sharp attack upon her mind that she fought off with an effort of will. She saw that Arun was likewise unaffected; the paladin had unlimbered his bow, and unleashed a barrage of powerful but thus far ineffective shots at the beholder. Archery had never been the dwarf's strong point, she knew. But a quick glance was enough to show that Mole had been neutralized, the gnome standing there staring up at the beholder with a vapid look on her face, and the fire from Fellian over in the entryway had ceased as well.

She turned to Beorna, readying her remove paralysis spell, but the dwarf, her face straining from the effort, managed to spit out a few words. "Attack... attack!"

Zenna saw the fierce conviction in the other woman's eyes, and nodded. She looked up to see Vhalantru already tracking its eyestalks toward her. She didn't hesitate, unleashing an empowered fireball that rose up to meet the beholder, filling the entire upper half of the dome with flame.

A wave of heat rushed down over her, but as the flames cleared, she saw that she hadn't done as much damage as she'd hoped. The beholder's ugly hide was scorched, true, but it was still hale, and all of its deadly eyes were still active. Resistant to fire, she thought, knowing that now she would face the full fury of the creature, knowing also that her own significant defenses would not be enough to overcome all of its varied and deadly attacks.

"Have faith," a voice said to her.

She looked down to see Arun, standing beside her. There seemed to be a glow around the paladin; as she looked upon him, Zenna felt as though she was looking upon a different man, filled with the shining light of divine wrath.

The paladin dropped his bow, and drew his sword. Even as Vhalantru raged above them, the paladin drew back his holy blade, and with a single mighty snap of his arm forward he hurled the sword straight up. The blessed steel shot through the air like a spear from a ballista, entering the beholder's body from below, stabbing deep until the crossguard of the weapon caught on its body.

Vhalantru screamed, a twin sound of agony as both the beholder and the fiendish symbiant were sundered by that sacred weapon, and by the power of the man who had driven it through them. Then the beholder was falling, plummeting to the ground. Arun drew Zenna and the paralyzed Beorna back with him, a moment before the beholder impacted the floor with a sick squish of bloated flesh.

A brisk wind tore down Obsidian Avenue, tugging at the long cloak that Zenna pulled tighter around herself. The chill in the air didn't bother her, not really, but it was an indicator that winter was on its way back to Cauldron.

A man passed her on the street, a sandy-haired elf clad in unassuming but well-crafted garments of dark cloth. For some reason, seeing him reminded her not of Dannel, but of Fellian. She felt a twinge as she thought of the young—for his people—Strider of Shaundakul, and his slain friend. Fario... somehow, though it had only been a tenday, she had difficulty conjuring up the image of his face in her mind, as though Vhalantru's disintegration had not only destroyed the physical embodiment of the brave half-elf, but all memory of him as well. She shuddered, and it was not due to the chill in the wind.

Jenya Urikas had possessed the power to bring Fario Ellegoth back to life, even with only the dust of the man trapped in the folds of his clothes all that remained following his destruction. But Jenya's recent raisings had depleted the temple's stock of precious diamonds that were needed as a focus for the spell, and while some of the rare stones could be found in the city, they were nowhere near enough to conduct the powerful ritual.

Fellian had not hesitated; he took the urn containing the remains of his friend and departed for Almraiven, walking away from Cauldron and its troubles. Zenna could not blame him; even lacking such a noble motivation, she wanted to flee the city as well.

Her thoughts drifted back from Fellian Shard to Dannel, as they often did, no matter what the original course they had started down. She hadn't seen Dannel much over the last tenday. Getting his petrified body out of Vhalantru's subterranean fortress had been a monumental undertaking, even with three muscular dwarves to do the heavy lifting, but after doing battle with the transformed beholder none of them had wanted to linger there, not even for the half-day needed for them to rest and recover their spells. It had taken Zenna two days of attempts for her to finally break the enchantment holding Dannel, and to return him to living flesh. The restoration had not been without cost; the elf's magical bow, its slender shaft and string made much more fragile by its transformation into stone, had not survived the strain of Dannel being hauled out of the dungeon.

Somehow, even as she'd broken the spell, bringing Dannel back to life, her own heart had hardened within her. She felt as though her emotional world was under constant siege, and she fell back on her usual defense, putting up walls in a vain effort to protect her from the pain. The arcane archer had not taken the time to batter down those walls, instead disappearing for days at a time on his own private business. Arun spent a good deal of time training his new recruits at the Temple of Helm, with Beorna at his side. Hodge spent much of the tenday comatose from drink. Mole... well, Mole seemed to be the only one immune to the dark cloud that had crept up over their company, from the strain that had driven them apart. They were all conscious of being in great danger, still; despite Vhalantru's defeat the Cagewrights were still a dire foe, working on their plots to destroy the city and cast the region into the chaotic shadow of Carceri.

They'd gone back to Oblivion—they now knew the name of Vhalantru's hidden stronghold—once... after. The deepest level of the dungeon, beneath the tier where they'd battled the beholder, was vacant, with empty rooms behind the sealed beholder doors. They found signs of recent occupancy, however, and an empty treasure vault that drew more than a few creative curses from Mole. But the most disturbing sign they found was a small room furnished as a comfortable bedchamber, with a wood floor and paneling installed over the bare stone burrowed by the beholder's disintegrating ray. The place had been recently used, and a clear sign had been left for them: a wire latticework, the sort used by noblewomen to dress up their hair in elaborate fashion for social events.

The kind they'd last seen worn by Thifirane Rhiavati.

Zenna nearly stumbled as the clatter of a wagon rumbling up one of the steep alley streets that linked Cauldron's four major avenues shook her out of her reverie. She jumped back, flattening herself against the wall of the nearby building on the side of the side street until the four horses and the trailing wagon had negotiated the transition onto Obsidian Avenue and continued on its way.

After everything... to be crushed by a wagon in the street, she thought. Her musings were morbid today, she thought to herself as she caught sight of her destination ahead.

The two-story building was intimately familiar to her, with its lower story of mortared volcanic rock, and the upper of weathered timbers so dark as to seem nearly as black as the stone. There was a shop or manufactory of some sort on the first floor; oddly she'd never bothered to discern exactly what, as its entrance was on the far side of the structure. She hesitated for a moment on the covered walk that fronted the building, then opened the door that led to the private stairs that rose up to the second story of the structure.

She hadn't been here for quite some time. The last time she'd walked these steps she'd been consumed with anger and shame, after she'd learned that Dannel was a Harper, sent by her parents to monitor her activities. What had made the revelation so humiliating was that she'd just slept with the elf for the first time... had thought that he loved her, and had convinced herself that she loved him as well. The sting of the betrayal came back to her, and she had to crush the simmering wave of emotion that threatened to undo her. She needed to be in control, now. While Esbar Tolerathkas had done a great deal for her, had in fact guided her onto the path of the mystic theurge that she now followed, she had more than a few pointed questions for him regarding Dannel, her parents, and just how much he knew about her.

Esbar's rented flat occupied the entirety of the second floor; there were only two doors on the upper landing, and one, she knew, led only to a supply closet. The other opened easily to her touch, revealing the living room more or less exactly as she'd remembered leaving it. The furnishings hadn't changed, with the antique desk, the soft couch before the fireplace, the bay window with a nice view of the city. It was all so familiar, but somehow now it felt sterile, empty, even though Esbar's note indicated that he'd returned to the city two days ago. A hall led back to the laboratory where she'd spent hours engaged in magical research, and also to the bedroom, where she'd engaged in some other activities...

Her skin turned crimson at the memory, followed by a niggling thread of sharp red anger. She squashed both emotions as she heard a faint clatter from beyond the swinging door to the combination pantry/kitchen to her left.

She pushed the door open. Esbar was there, sitting at the compact round table, drinking a cup of tea from a small porcelain cup. It was part of a set he'd been gifted with upon graduating from the academy of magic at Alaghôn, he'd told her.

As she stepped into the room, she felt a sudden sense of unease, a tingling sensation that started at her skin but seemed to culminate in a tight knot of vertigo deep within her gut. She stumbled slightly, and as one of her boots scuffed slightly on the polished wood floor Esbar turned from the small window that fronted the wide boulevard outside and looked at her.

His appearance caught her off guard. Her mentor looked gaunt, almost emaciated, and while there was a burning fire in his eyes, it looked as though whatever passion that consumed him had fueled itself by stealing his vigor. It had been less than a year since they'd last seen each other, but he seemed to have aged ten in that interval. He was clad in a simple robe of soft blue cloth, and there was a small gemstone apparently embedded in his forehead, a multifaceted sliver that sparkled slightly in the diffuse sunlight shining through the window.

All her questions and recriminations fled, replaced by new ones about the changes that Esbar Tolerathkas had clearly experienced since he'd departed, leaving his home here in Zenna's care.

"Zenna," he said. "It is good to see you again."

For a moment, she was too surprised to mount an effective response.

"Please, sit down," he said, as he gestured toward the vacant chair. "Tea?"

As he poured her a cup of the hot brew, wisps of steam rising like sinuous tentacles from her cup, she finally rallied enough to speak. "What... happened to you, Esbar?"

"Ah, Zenna. Long have been the roads I have traveled, since we last met. Much has happened, and much yet remains to be done... But more to the point, you have changed, that I can see plain."

She shifted uncomfortably in her chair, and did not touch the cup that Esbar slid across the table toward her. "These have been difficult times, since you left. Cauldron has been under siege, and a great evil works to destroy the city."

"Yes, I know," he said calmly, taking a sip of tea.

"Is that why you've come back?" she asked.

"In a matter of speaking," he said. "But in truth, I have never really left Cauldron, even when my roads diverted temporarily from this place. I have been monitoring your progress, and I must say, you've far exceeded the expectations that I had set for you. Truly, your accomplishments in so short a time have been incredible. The power you command... indeed, were these different times than they are, you could have been among the greatest workers of magic to walk the forgotten realms."

Her eyes shot up. “Could have been? What do you mean by that?”

He did not flinch from her gaze; rather he held her pinioned with his stare. “I truly am sorry, my dear. But you are the key, the last of the thirteen, and the most important; a Shackleborn possessing the twin gifts of arcane and divine magic. I molded you, encouraged you, but deep down it was always your potential, and the unalterable reality of who you truly are...”

Realization struck her like a fist slammed into her gut. Her blood pounded in her veins; she suddenly could not breathe.

“You...” she gasped, the single syllable deep with meaning, beyond recrimination.

“You struggled so, against your destiny,” he went on, outwardly unruffled, as though they were having just another one of their philosophical chats over tea. “It is in your nature, to question what life gave you, to take nothing at face value. But—and I share this with you as your final lesson, Zenna—such a trait does not make you stronger. For your refusal to trust was easy to turn against you, easy to redirect your natural suspicions outward, while the true threat was the closest of all.”

Her gaze shot desperately back and forth: the window, the door. The former was out; the iron crossbar that held the four panes in place was thick, too damned thick, she saw now. She edged back in her seat. But one thing kept her from flight, one burning question that she had to have answered.

“Dannel?” The word was barely audible, a prayer.

Esbar—if that was his name—leaned forward, a sympathetic look on his face. “He knew nothing. He believed me to be what you believed me to be... a soldier in the eternal war against the Dark. Given what I already knew about you, it was easy to co-opt him into helping me, especially since we shared the same objective at that point, keeping you safe and alive.” He shrugged. “Like you, he had no inkling of my true vocation.”

“A Cagewright.”

“You say the word with so much venom, yet you have no understanding... no true understanding, of what that word means. I am sorry that I will not be able to show you, but maybe you will gain some insight, before...” he trailed off.

“I’ll not go easily,” she spat. But in truth, she knew that he had her; too late she’d identified the strange feeling she’d felt upon entering the room, too late she recognized that the disorientation she’d felt was the magical effects of her protective items fading, leaving her as she’d been when she first came to Cauldron. When she’d believed that she was the one controlling her own destiny.

But whatever the source of the anti-magic field that filled the room, it couldn’t be that extensive. Without turning, she gauged the distance to the door...

"I know," he replied. "I would expect nothing less."

He didn't move to block her as she slid back her chair, and rose toward the door. He lifted his cup to his lips, unconcerned, as she paused before the swinging portal. She pressed her hand against the polished wood...

Before she could apply pressure, the door pushed inexorably toward her, backed by a force of strength far beyond anything she could have countered, without her magic at her call. As the door opened, a charnel reek drifted into the room, and a... monstrosity filled the room, the bulging, muscular form of a shator demodand.

Zenna dove for the narrow gap between the shator's legs, but it easily buffeted her back into the room to land in a heap at its feet.

She drew her dagger, turning toward Esbar, but before she could rise to attack, or do anything else with the weapon, those huge hands came down over her, overshadowing her thin form.

The blackness came quickly.

Chapter 319

Pain.

At first, it was just a sea of pain that poured into the black nothingness, but then, as consciousness slowly poured back with it, other things emerged that coalesced into a hazy reality. Light, bright and red, stabbing through closed lids like needles. Noise, a deep rumble that seemed to shake her very bones, a sick mewling that sounded like a tormented animal. A creak, close, metal protesting.

The pain washed her about, threatened to drag her back down into the black, a journey that she would have welcomed, if only for the release. What was it that kept her here? Voices... something, something she should know, recognize... voices at the edge of her awareness.

Slowly, fighting the pain as the brilliant red stabbed through her mind, she opened her eyes. As the world slowly swam into focus, she looked out onto a nightmare.

Her first thought was that somehow, she'd been cast back into Occipitus. The red glow, the heat, it was all evocative of the Abyss. But then reality returned enough for her to see that she was in an extensive cavern, a massive bubble of jagged, uneven stone. The red glow came from a great rent in the cavern wall, a cleft that disgorged a stream of lava that ran across the floor in a slow but constant current.

Black bars ran across her vision. As she pulled herself up, the pain still fighting her with every movement, the outside world swayed slightly. Confused, that pathetic mewling noise still distracting her from somewhere nearby, she looked around, trying to gain her bearings.

She was in a cage, one of many, she saw, all affixed to the branches of a great tree. Tree... no, that was the proper word for it, but the metallic monstrosity that dominated the center of the cavern resembled no living thing that she had ever seen before. She could feel the power rolling off it in waves, and even more trapped within, buried within the twisted depths of its massive bole, waiting to be tapped.

She was naked, with even the dignity of her robe stripped from her. A sharper pain twisted through the general haze. She reached up to her face. It was numb; she could not feel her fingers probing, but flakes of dried blood came away at her touch.

It was then that she realized that the tormented sound she'd heard was coming from her throat.

"I see you've awoken," came a familiar voice.

She looked down and saw Esbar Tolerathkas—or whatever his name truly was—walking toward her, along the cavern floor fifteen feet below the bottom of her cage. He was now clad in a robe of dark cloth, and he wore a sigil as an amulet at his throat; a metallic arrow with a circle—an eye, perhaps?—set in the center. The blue gem in his forehead seemed to pulse oddly, as if trying to echo the pounding of her heart.

She tried to speak, but only crude noises fluttered from her throat.

"I am sorry that we had to remove your tongue," he said, as calmly as if he was commenting on the weather. "But we could not rely on anti-magic in this place to keep your gift in check. Your suffering will be brief; at least that much I can promise you. We are nearly prepared to begin the final ritual, and soon it will all be over."

She tried to scream; the sound was so horrible that she stopped after a few moments. She looked around, desperate. All of the other cages were occupied. With a sickening realization she recognized the orphan boy, Terrem, looking at her with an expression that was... dead. And in another, Zenith Splintershield, his head bent beneath the weight of an impossible depression.

"You will be a participant in something truly great," Esbar went on. "Again, I wish that things could be otherwise, but in the end, we all have to confront our destinies."

She tried to shake her cage, but managed only to knock herself prone, the pain eagerly rushing back up into her damaged body. Looking at the bars, she saw that some of her flesh clung to them where she'd grabbed them; her hands were slick with bright red blood.

"You cannot destroy yourself," Esbar said. "I'm afraid we've thought of everything."

A heavy, measured tread drew her attention up, toward the far side of the room. Someone was coming.

"Ah, now you can meet one of the leaders of our little band," Esbar said. Turning from her to the newcomer, he said, "Drd'rydd, you may gather the others, we are ready."

The hulking figure stepped from the shadows into the ruddy red glow of the lava plume. As she saw him, and as his gaze met hers, Zenna screamed.

She screamed until the blackness drew her back, back into the merciful embrace of oblivion.

THE END OF “LORDS OF OBLIVION”

Book VIII: “Foundation of Flame”

Begun 10-14-04

Chapter 320

The Vault was one of the more obscure hidey-holes in the city of Cauldron—or more precisely, under it. In an odd correlation of ironies, the underground chambers were situated approximately sixty feet directly underneath the office of the Teerson Skellerang, the Captain of the Watch. Crafted two centuries ago by a particularly paranoid member of the city’s ruling elite, only a handful of people today knew of its existence. Four of those were gathered in the central chamber of the Vault, immersed in a vigorous argument. The room they were in looked smaller than its actual size, in part because of the partial walls that subdivided the back of the room into smaller cubicles used for storage and other miscellaneous purposes.

“Your recklessness in your choice of allies has threatened the very existence of the guild!” The speaker was a middle-aged human male, who looked as though he’d never been young and handsome. His name was Pratcher Olann, and he was a veteran criminal, peddler of obscenities, and dealer in illicit substances. He was also one of the highest ranked thieves, called Jesters, in Cauldron’s premier guild of iniquity, the Last Laugh. Unlike the others, he did not bother with painting his face in the harlequin decoration that was the primary identifier of members of that organization.

Velior Thazo seethed. Not so much because Olann’s charge was accurate; it ran counter to his nature to admit his own error. No, the half-fiend was angry because his grand ambitions, which had soared so high before that damned meeting at Rhiavati’s manor, now were crashing down around him in a blazing ruin. Thazo’s hands itched; he wanted to kill something.

“Those damned clerics have Jil, and it won’t be long before they ferret out this place,” another of the Jesters, a rail-thin elf named Karakates, added. “Adrick’s mint has already been uncovered and destroyed, and nearly two-thirds of our membership has been incarcerated... or killed.”

“Damned heroes,” the last Jester, a pudgy human woman named Wayrel Talinn, broke in. Thazo’s scowl deepened, though inwardly he agreed with the curse; if Talinn felt bold enough to actually speak up in a meeting of the Last Laugh leadership, then his once-lofty position had descended far indeed. She was a master poisoner, there was no doubt about that; but Thazo always thought of her as the two-bit whore she'd been when he'd first met her, a little over a decade ago.

"You will have to get out of town," Olann went on. "You are the only one they saw, and you were the one Jil answered to." And the one she hated most, Olann didn't have to add.

Punks, he thought, glaring at his peers within the guild. His anger pounded in his veins like the blood of his fiendish ancestor, and all three of the others fidgeted slightly as his rage became obvious. None of the three other leaders of the guild were his equal; all were at best petty crooks, veterans of the softer side of organized crime. They all bore weapons—like most guilds of thieves, the Last Laugh did not tolerate weakness of any sort—but Thazo knew that he could take all three of them together in a fight, if it came to that.

Almost reflexively, his hand had stolen to the haft of his morningstar. But even as his fingers touched the familiar steel shaft, a shadow shifted beside him, and a familiar chill of danger settled over Velior Thazo.

Forcing himself to relax, letting his hand fall as he chuckled grimly, Thazo deliberately did not turn to look at the hulking figure that remained cloaked in shadow beside him.

"You are all panicking, acting more like marks than master rogues. The... defeat... we suffered was significant, but we are far from undone. Jil is dead, executed at the hand of that dwarven bitch in the name of "justice", now unable to harm us further. And our adversaries have bigger fish to fry than the Last Laugh. We may have to lay low for a while, but we will continue to thrive, in the shadows."

"They took out a whole safehouse, and went through some of our best talent like forged steel through beaten copper," Olann said, his confidence obviously bolstered by the arrival of the shadowy newcomer. "We all agree, that you've made too many mistakes, Thazo. It's time to cut our losses."

Thazo managed a sinister, confident grin in return. With his inhumanly large jaws and protruding fangs, the effect was garish, and the half-fiend was completely cognizant of its effect. "You never complained about me when you needed someone removed for the improvement of your various little schemes, Olann," he said. "I've been a Jester for seven years, and now you think you can just run me out, drive me from the guild that I painstakingly built into what it is today? Talos is still with me, always with me, never forget that!" He turned to the shadowy figure now, stared into the darkness of its hooded face with penetrating eyes. The massive figure stood there impassively. "You stand with these mice now, Thusk?" he asked. "You agree that the guild will survive without my strength?"

The only response was a glimmer of white within the black cowl as the bugbear shadowdancer showed his teeth, a deep rumble of a growl originating from deep within his body.

"We cannot afford this petty squabbling, not now," Thazo went on, turning back to the other Jesters. "You think it would just be that simple, send me on my way, hope that your problems are solved? You could force me out, perhaps, but I'd take half of the remaining members of the guild with me. And if you think that pushing me out will stop the 'Heroes of Cauldron' from tracking the lot of you down, you're as naïve as you are foolish." Thazo knew that he was taking a risk; with his threat laid down, the best option for the Jesters was to simply kill him. And if Thusk sided with them, they might even be able to succeed in that aspiration.

"A moment ago, you said they weren't interested in us," Talinn pointed out, but the little conviction she'd been able to muster earlier had faded, and she quickly retreated into the shadows of the other two men beside her.

"We will not be the ones to sunder the guild," Pratcher Olann said. "But if you wish to remain a force within the Last Laugh, it will not be as a Jester."

Thazo kept his smile from his face; he had won. Titles were unimportant, he knew; the end of it all was in the simple reality of power. And none of these fools—save for the enigmatic and deadly Thusk—had enough of it to seriously threaten his agenda. And Thusk, while a canny and vicious adversary, was not equipped for the subtle battles of politics, alliances, and backstabbing where Velior Thazo shone.

"Very well, I will serve the guild as a warrior in the trenches," Thazo said. "But we will have to..."

"Aw, you mean you're not going to fight?" came a small voice from the far side of the room. "Man, I was hoping for a little show—my money was on the big shadowy guy."

They turned as one, sinking into ready crouches, weapons hissing from their sheaths. Thusk faded back into the shadows, disappearing from view. The other Jesters contributed useless exclamations—"Who are you?" "How did you get past the wards?" Thazo focused on more practical concerns; he stepped back to the wall, pressing a subtle protrusion there. Immediately a heavy door of reinforced steel slid down from above within the dark archway of the chamber's exit, falling into place with a loud clang of metal on stone. The half-fiend also called upon the power of Talos, invoking the Storm God to fill the chamber with an invisibility purge. No hidden foes appeared, and it was only then that the evil rogue-priest allowed himself to relax—only slightly—as he looked up on the stranger who had intruded upon their conclave.

That intruder was an unassuming gnome woman, only a bit over three feet in height. She wore dark garments and carried weapons, but did not appear threatening; in fact, she seemed to have an amused look to her as she regarded the deadly leaders of the Last Laugh.

"Mole Calloran," Thazo said.

"Velior Thazo," the gnome returned. "Gosh, you're uglier than I remembered."

The half-fiend stepped forward, the bat-wings that were one of the gifts of his demonic heritage spreading behind him. His eyes were points of orange flame, and his morningstar seemed to pulse in his hand, as if eager to participate in violence.

"If they've found this place, we must flee," Talinn urged. But Thazo did not move, fixing the intruder with a dark stare that the gnome returned with equanimity.

"You made a mistake coming here alone," Thazo said. "You will pay, for that, and for the rest..."

The gnome shrugged. Ignoring Thazo, she turned to the other Jesters. "I've come here to give you one last chance. You've done a lot of ill to Cauldron and its people, but right now there's a bigger danger, one that threatens the entire city and all within it. I have nothing against thieves' guilds per se, but we cannot tolerate distractions. Get out of town, today, right now, and don't come back... or face justice."

"Your threats seem... small." Thazo chuckled.

She turned a scathing look upon the half-fiend. "Oh, I wasn't talking to you, Thazo. No, you don't get this offer... your life is already forfeit, and you're coming with me."

A shadow shifted behind the gnome, slowly taking on substance as it loomed between her and the blocked exit.

"Your brazenness is almost... refreshing. Were these different times, I would almost welcome you among the Jesters," Thazo said.

"You guys are a bit too sociopathic for my tastes." She glanced at Olann and the others, who'd faded into the background behind Thazo. "Did demon-breath here even tell you what he was in on? That he and his friends were planning on making Cauldron over into 'Fiend Central'? Can't think that would be good for business..."

"Prattle on, little one," Thazo said. "I know you have some little plot in play, for your friends to pop in here and rescue you from the lion's mouth. But there's something you should know. This place... this Vault, is more than just a chamber under the city. No, there's a reason why we use this place. Its entire structure is surrounded by magically-treated lead plating; no scrying magic will penetrate it, nor does any magical teleportation function in or out of this place. In fact, when that door closed, all contact with the outside world was severed."

"So you see, my little one, you are very, very much alone. And I am quite afraid that you are about to find our company to be most... unpleasant."

And with that, he took a step toward her, his eyes burning like molten pools.

Chapter 321

"So you see, my little one, you are very, very much alone. And I am quite afraid that you are about to find our company to be most... unpleasant."

Without shifting her gaze from the approaching Thazo, Mole pointed toward the other Jesters. "Last chance," she said. "Join me now, or pay the price for your crimes."

None of them moved.

“Never the easy way...” the gnome grumbled.

The shadowy form behind her darted at her back, as silent as a soft breath of wind. Somehow Mole sensed the danger, for she twisted nimbly to the side as a morningstar swept powerfully toward her head. Even though she avoided the full force of the attack by her dodge, she was still clipped on the shoulder by Thusk’s weapon, snapping forward into a smooth roll that absorbed the force of the impact.

Unfortunately, the motion took her closer to Thazo, who had already lifted his weapon to strike. But the evil priest took a moment to call upon his patron for aid, which gave her the split-second she needed to act.

“Gotta go,” she said, folding her cloak about her, and vanishing in a puff of gray smoke.

Thazo looked around, peering into the shadows around the circumference of the room.

“She’s gone?” Olann asked.

“Invisible, perhaps,” Karakates suggested.

“No,” Thazo replied. “She’s using the cloak of that blasted incompetent Finch. She cannot have left the room through the shielding... search every corner!”

The rogues spread out, their animosity temporarily forgotten in the face of an external threat. Thusk had disappeared again, lost in the shadows, and Thazo took the opportunity to reinforce his magical wards, enhancing both his strength and endurance with the divine power of Talos.

Despite the partitions in the room, there weren’t many places to hide. It was the elf who found her behind the cover of a half-dozen stacked barrels in a shrouded alcove. He revealed his find by staggering back into the center area of the room, a small crossbow bolt buried to the feathers in his shoulder.

“Nice work,” Thazo snarled at the injured elf, his voice thick with sarcasm. Roughly pushing the elf aside, he started toward the gnome’s hiding place. He didn’t have to go far; the gnome came to them, running across the ceiling, clinging to the smooth stone through some form of magic.

The ceiling was just high enough to take her out of easy range of their melee weapons, but the Jesters had other resources. Thalinn hurled a small dart, no doubt envenomed with some nasty toxin, but the gnome narrowly dodged the missile. Thazo had a more direct response: a blast of searing light that drew a cry of pain from the annoying gnome girl. However, Thazo’s spell failed to dislodge her from the ceiling.

Olann added to her difficulties a moment later, lifting a hand that bore a bronze ring fashioned into the head of a ram. He spoke a word of command, and a bolt of force smacked solidly into the gnome's back, knocking her free of her perch to fall to the hard ground below. She landed smoothly in a roll that absorbed the energy of her fall, but as she looked up, she saw that the bugbear shadowdancer had reappeared before her, his weapon lifted to crush the life from her body. The other Jesters closed in around her, closing off all avenues of escape.

"Time to die, little rogue," Thazo said.

Chapter 322

A huge metallic CLANG sundered the quiet of the Vault, and as the rogues turned toward the sound, they saw the solid steel door bulge inward into the room. A moment later a line of light shone through the door as a rent opened in the metal of the portal, followed a moment later by yet another tremendous blow.

"Time's up," Mole said. She darted for the edge of the surrounding circle, taking another painful hit from Thusk as she did so. But she avoided the attacks of the other rogues, finally tumbling between Olann's legs before the startled Jester could react.

"Fool! Now our doom is upon us!" Karakates hissed. Thazo turned upon the injured elf, and with a single sudden strike crushed his skull.

"Fight them off, all of you, or I'll do the same to you!" he snarled at the others. Thusk had already disappeared from view again, but whether to get into position to strike, or to flee, was impossible to discern. Talinn drew out a potion vial and downed the contents, but by the look on her face it did not have the desired effect. She didn't know that Thazo's invisibility purge was still in effect, hindering her attempt at escape.

The ravaged metal of the door protested under the continuing assault. Now multiple gashes revealed hints of motion beyond, and with a final groan of twisted metal the remnants of the door came crashing forward to slam hard onto the stone floor of the room.

Beorna stepped forward into the room, her adamantine sword resting against her shoulder as she surveyed the chamber. "Looks like we found another rat's nest!" she said, lifting the heavy sword easily into a fighting position. Behind her, Arun and Hodge moved into the now-open doorway, and behind them Dannel, his bow at the ready.

"Kill them!" Thazo roared, conjuring an unholy blight that raged in the confines of the doorway and the passage beyond. For a moment the dark energies of the spell obscured the heroes, but then Beorna stepped forward through the dissolving storm, apparently unharmed, dropping her adamantine sword and replacing it with the holy blade that seemed to sing as she drew it from its scabbard.

"You and I have unfinished business, fiend!" she said, rushing forward to meet Thazo.

The rest of the heroes emerged from the blight injured, but with more than enough fight left in them to engage the remaining rogues. Blood already covered Arun and Hodge's armor, but it clearly belonged more to others than the two dwarves, who seemed little hindered as they charged the other Jesters. Olann lifted his hand and fired another blast from his ring of the ram at Arun, but while the force-bolt hit the paladin with the force of a giant's punch, Arun stood his ground and even managed a counter that drove the guildmaster back, bleeding from a deep gash in his side.

On the other flank of the battle, Hodge saw Talinn trying to sneak around toward the door, and moved to block her. The Jester took out a small tube from a hidden pocket and lifted it to her mouth, blasting the dwarf with a spray of toxic dust.

That was enough for Hodge; he unleashed a full assault upon the poor woman, tearing into her with powerful strokes that knocked her back against the shelving lining the wall. Old pots and jars clattered around her as she fell to the ground, bleeding out her life through the multiple wounds.

"Tryin' to poison a dwarf... yer got nerve!" Hodge grunted, although his eyes were watering somewhat as he wiped his gore-splattered axe on his pant leg. He let out a loud sneeze and spit up a fat glob of phlegm before turning back to the melee.

Dannel entered the room last, taking aim at Thazo before he spotted a shadow descending upon Arun from behind.

"Arun... watch out!"

But his warning came too late as Thusk smote Arun from behind. A cackling surge of chaotic energy tore into the dwarf as the shadowdancer's anarchic morningstar unleashed its fell power upon the lawful knight. Olann took advantage of the assault to attack as well, but even flanked by two rogues Arun's magical armor was more than enough to turn the narrow blade. There was no denying that the paladin was hard-pressed, however, and he favored the side where Thusk's morningstar had delivered its painful blow.

But Thusk had left the concealing shadows behind, and now he in turn confronted the deadly assault unleashed by the companions. Working in unplanned coordination, Dannel's arrows slammed into the bugbear's back, punching through his cloak and the chain shirt beneath it. Arun, meanwhile, unleashed a full attack with his holy sword, the shining blade driving back the shadows that surrounded the monstrous rogue, each swing biting deep. Thusk staggered back, grievously wounded, but before Arun could lunge in to finish him, the shadows shifted and the shadowdancer disappeared.

Thazo, bolstered this time by the full power of his patron, met Beorna in a violent clash of steel upon steel. Initially confident as his first stroke slammed hard into the dwarf woman's chest, hurting her even through the heavy adamantite mail she wore, he was quickly reminded of the templar's ferocity in battle as her assault tore into him. Her sword, likewise infused with holy power, tore through the magically enhanced steel of his breastplate as though the armor plate were made of soft leather, biting deep into the flesh beneath. Staggering back, blood gushing down his torso from the wound, he looked around.

Talinn was down in a bloody heap. Olann had thrown down his sword and now knelt for mercy before the paladin, begging for his life like the craven that he was. Thusk had disappeared, and if he wasn't already a hundred paces away, leaving them and this mess far behind, Thazo would have been greatly surprised.

The doorway beckoned him, taunting him, with too many enemies blocking his escape. The templar lifted her weapon, looking down the shimmering length of the steel at him, with eyes as cold as ice.

"Yield."

"So you can drag me off to a formal execution? Not likely."

"Then taste the justice that you have earned." The sword came up, and behind her Thazo could see the other dwarf, the axe-wielding warrior, coming at him from the side, while the elf took aim at him with his bow.

But the templar's parley had given him a vital instant in which to prepare, and he took it, calling upon the potency of a second unholy blight. Even as the spell exploded through the room, he was running for the exit. Something hard caught him in the side, crunching ribs, and as the elf materialized from within the crowd an arrow punched into his gut, stabbing a deep tendril of pain through him. But then the doorway was before him, with the dark tunnel offering escape beyond.

Agony erupted through his foot, and with his next step the limb gave out under his weight. Thazo fell hard, his monstrous face caroming off the stone threshold before he splayed out atop the ruin of the steel door. He tried to get up, but his body refused to obey his commands. Barely clinging to consciousness, he managed to look up and see the gnome standing before him, a small, bloody knife in her hand.

"You were saying?"

Thazo tried to reach out to Talos, but the power of his connection to the god was already fading from him. All he saw was a bright light as the templar... or was it the paladin? stepped forward, a shining sword blinding him with painful light. The last thing he heard was a single word.

"Justice."

Chapter 323

With a final heave of effort, Mole laid the last suit of armor—sized to a human, and therefore cumbersome—onto the low counter. The breastplate still bore a nasty cleft in it, and bloodstains still decorated the armor where the hasty cleaning hadn't quite reached, but it still bore a potent enchantment.

One that hadn't saved its former owner, but made it valuable nonetheless, even damaged.

"Okay, that's the last of it," Mole said with a grin, refastening her bag of holding and tucking it back into the pouch at her hip.

“Quite a haul,” Skie Aldersun said, giving the objects scattered along the long counter a preliminary survey. In addition to Velior Thazo’s breastplate, the display included the half-fiend’s morningstar and magical gauntlets, Pratcher Olann’s magical rapier, a dozen assorted masterwork weapons they’d taken off of slain Last Laugh rogues, and a few suits of magical chainmail worn by the mercenaries in Vhalantru’s manor that Mole hadn’t gotten around to unloading yet. She’d had to dump out the usual contents of her magical bag to make room for it all, and there were still a few things in her quarters at the Temple of Helm that had been too bulky for this particular trip.

“Don’t forget the adventurer’s discount for the Heroes of Cauldron,” Mole replied with an even wider smile.

The other gnome lifted one of the weapons and examined it with a critical eye. “You’ve done well, Mole; almost too well. I’m afraid that my coffers are nearly empty, thanks in no small part to the activities of you and your companions, and I won’t get more coin until the payment for the last shipment of merchandise that I sent to Almraiven arrives at the end of the month. I will certainly credit your account until then, if you wish.”

Mole frowned, but then, as she often did, she quickly spotted the positive side of a setback. “Maybe a trade?”

Skie gestured toward the various displays throughout the main room of her shop. “You know my inventory better than I, nearly,” the older gnome said. But there was a canny look in her eyes as she added, “Although... there was something new that I just recently acquired, that you might be interested in...”

Mole’s smile returned; she knew that Skie had been leading her to this since she’d walked in the door. It was refreshing, dealing with another gnome; human merchants were just so damned serious about everything.

Feigning disinterest, as she looked over an amulet that she’d sold to Skie only a tenday back, Mole said, “Oh?”

The ring was very impressive, even before Mole picked it up. Lying on the white cloth that Skie had brought it out in, it was nearly invisible. The band was crafted of a transparent material much like glass, except that it was as heavy as metal and solid, too; Skie demonstrated that by bouncing it off the nearest wall and catching it as it flew past.

“What’s it do?” Mole asked.

“Try it out.”

Mole put on the ring. “I don’t feel any diff... oh!” Looking down, she gleefully realized that she couldn’t see herself; she was invisible.

She reappeared a moment later, her grin as wide as it had ever been. “Interested?” Skie asked.

“Oh, I think we can do business.”

* * * * *

The counter was made of thick, very solid wood planks, but it squeaked in protest as Arun laid the last of the heavy sacks upon the polished surface. Metal clinked slightly as an indication of the contents of the bag, which joined its fellows to make an impressive treasure.

Vortimax Weer’s eyes were wide as he took in the fortune in hard cash sitting on his counter. “I trust you and your elvish companion will be content with the enhancements,” the mage said. “I don’t normally do armor, mind you, but for the Heroes of Cauldron...”

“Thank you, master Weer,” Arun said, gesturing to Hodge who was folding Dannel’s mithral shirt into a compact bundle for travel, awkwardly juggling that with the wooden box that he carried under his other arm. Arun carried his own armor, and he looked somewhat uncomfortable clad in a simple tunic and leather breeches, not dissimilar from any of the hundreds of laborers who made their living in Cauldron.

Of course, not many laborers carried a holy longsword slung across their backs.

“I’m sure that your elixirs will be as useful as always,” Arun added, as the wizard started transferring the heavy sacks to the cart on which he’d wheeled out the upgraded suits of armor. Weer waved at them absently as the two dwarves exited the shop.

“I’ll feel better once I have this back on,” Arun said, fastening a leather strap around the compact bundle of armor and slinging it across his back.

“Damned but yer could buy yerself an inn for what yer paid that wizzerd,” Hodge said.

“Knowing what we are up against, we will likely need the protection,” Arun said. “In fact, I wish you would reconsider, and allow Weer to upgrade your items as well.”

“I heard ‘ow much he wanted to magick up this stuff,” the other dwarf retorted, rapping his own breastplate with his gnarled knuckles. “I got better uses fer me money, thank yer.”

“I would have been happy to pay for the upgrade out of my own share...”

“Nah, yer spent that extra coin on folk who needed it more, I reckon.” The dwarf frowned, as though the comment had snuck up on him unawares. Hodge stuffed the mithral shirt into the strap that held his huge axe in place across his shoulders. “Come on, let’s get this junk back to that elf.”

“That elf” was at that moment testing his new bow in the long but narrow yard behind the rectory of the Temple of Helm. The target he’d hung up on the back exterior wall of the temple stables was small, only about a foot across, but it may as well have been half that size based on the holes he’d already punched in the thick cork.

He had a small audience; a few of the newcomers that everyone was referring to as “Arun’s recruits” had taken breaks from their chores to watch his archery. But Dannel ignored them as he took another practice arrow from his magical quiver, drew, aimed, and released in a single smooth movement that took less time than the space between two heartbeats. The arrow struck only an inch from the center of the target, but Dannel frowned, checking the string of the bow. The weapon was still new to him, in no way the match of the magical bow he’d lost in Vhalantru’s secret dungeon, but still an exceptional construction. But Dannel’s attention was only partially upon his practice, and the song that filled him when he drew his bow in anger was discordant. He was distracted.

Mole materialized right in front of him, a bit disappointed that Dannel didn’t jump. Mole had been trying out her new ring all afternoon, and already Hodge had threatened her with dire consequences if she came within so much as twenty paces of him. Without turning his attention from his examination of the bow, Dannel said, “You stepped in something, and left tracks.”

“Eew,” Mole said, looking down at her boots. Dannel ignored her, looking at the target as though he could transfix it with just his stare, then he shrugged slightly and unstrung his bow.

“Arun and Hodge aren’t back yet?”

“No,” the elf replied.

“Zenna?”

“She has not returned.”

“Well... she didn’t leave a note this time, but it’s too soon to worry, I think. She probably just went to Saradush again for some more scrolls. I mean, she’s been distant and all, ever since... well, for a while. She’ll be back, she knows what’s at stake...”

“With everything arrayed against us, I am not willing to wait. This morning I asked Jenya to scry her, and to try and reach her with a sending, Dannel said. We’ll have an answer tonight, after the meeting.”

Mole made a face. “We still gotta go to that? Bunch of nobles... booo-ring!”

Dannel’s features were tight, betraying the depths of his worry of Zenna, but he forced a smile. It had only been a day since Zenna had vanished, and Mole was probably right, but Dannel could not shake the sick feeling in his gut that something ill had befallen her. They’d already had one group of assassins seek them out...

When she did come back, he was going to kill her.

“Those nobles will have a lot to say about Cauldron’s future,” Dannel pointed out. “Besides, you had fun at the Cusp of Sunrise that last time.”

“That’s true. That Vanderboren... man, you remember the look on his face when I rolled the twenty?” But Mole’s grin faded too, after a moment, as her thoughts too drifted back to her friend.

Where was Zenna?

Chapter 324

The Grand Library at the Cusp of Sunrise was a popular outpost among the wealthy scions of Cauldron’s leading families. Now the long windows in the dome above let in only a muted light from the overcast skies, while a slight patter of drizzle against the leaded panes served as a reminder of the dreary day outside. Normally the ill cheer of a rainy day did not penetrate to the floor of the great chamber, with its roaring fireplaces, soft leather chairs, open bar, and various nobles at play at cards or rounds of gemsnatcher. But today, the feeling in the Library was tense. The soft chairs and game tables had been removed, and the bar was closed. The broad chamber was full of people, some of Cauldron’s leading lights, clad in garments of expensive cloth cut with a nod to the latest fashions.

Cauldron’s leading churches—with the notable exception of the fallen church of Kelemvor—were represented. Jenya Urikas was there, clad in a soft white robe that framed her warm face and the dark curls that cascaded down to her shoulders. She looked tense but calm, a noticeable contrast to Kristof Jurgenson of the small church of the Morninglord. The cleric of Lathander was clearly ill at ease in this gathering, and he stood off to the side, fidgeting with his cloak. More stoic was Omar Tiskinson, the Second of the Church of Tempus. The martial priest’s hard expression seemed etched in stone, and whenever he moved the heavy greatsword slung across his back clattered slightly against the breastplate that he wore under the surcoat bearing the fiery sigil of the God of War.

Several of the city’s leading merchants and other important factors were also present. Unlike the priests, they seemed inclined to group together, as if drawn by the common bounds of profession that set them apart from the other groups present. All had interacted before with the companions before, each playing a minor role in the developing saga of Cauldron’s fate. The halfling Tygos Mispas and the gnomes Keygan Ghelve and Skie Aldersun formed a small circle, chatting amiably. The shorter folk were overshadowed by two men who appeared to be prosperous merchants. They were far more than that, however; the half-elf Meerthan Eliothlorn was the leader of the influential Striders of Shaundakul, while Maavu Arlental was a prominent figure in the Chisel, a semi-secret group that operated out of the nearby community of Redgorge. Both men were also skilled wizards, and both surveyed the gathering with intent looks that saw much that wasn’t immediately evident.

In addition to the clerics and the merchants, two other groups were represented at the meeting. The small cluster of nobles included several whose names were already well-known to the adventurers, who’d had dealings with their children before. Ankhin Taskerhill was particularly dominating, a somber, ebon-skinned gentleman with a prominent jaw and hard eyes that could flay a competitor with the intensity of his gaze. By contrast, Premiach and Aeberrin Vanderboren seemed less at ease in these surroundings, almost huddling together near one of the bookcases instead of offering idle chatter with any of the other guests. The two had made a fortune in real estate speculation, but there was a trace of the rogue still about them despite their finery, especially the wiry Premiach. Ophellha Knowlern was one of only two elves present. She looked cold and distant in a soft blue robe that framed her pale features and delicate, graceful figure. She was also the owner of The Drunken Morkoth, one of Cauldron's most prosperous inns.

The final group consisted of the adventurers, the band known throughout the city now as "The Heroes of Cauldron." But at the moment, none of them looked particularly pleased to be present at this gathering.

"This is a waste of time," Dannel said, fidgeting. He wore a new doublet that flattered his lean figure, but which still bulged slightly where his shirt of mithral links settled beneath the rich fabric. He bore no obvious weapons, but his magical quiver—with Alakast and his new bow inside—was slung across his right shoulder.

"Politics is just another battlefield," Beorna said. She and the other dwarves wore their armor and carried their weapons, and their sheer physical presence dominated the gathering. Her adamantite armor had been polished to a reflective sheen, and the sigil of Helm across her breastplate glimmered with the reflected light of the many lamps that were mounted around the circumference of the room.

"Jenya will need our support," Arun said. "We are popular amongst the general population of the city, but these nobles will not be so quick to lend their allegiance, regardless of what fawning words they may speak."

Hodge only frowned; he looked very much like he wanted to spit, but Beorna had taken him in hand before the meeting and spoken to him for a full five minutes. Since then, the dwarf had been utterly silent. He even looked halfway presentable, although there were tangles in his beard that even an adamantite comb might have had difficulty penetrating.

"When are they going to start?" Mole asked.

"They are waiting... ah, I believe that's him now," Beorna said, drawing their attention to the entry where a tall gentleman entered. Clad in meticulous white trousers and coat with red trim, Zachary Aslaxin's face was dominated by a copious moustache and penetrating blue eyes that swept the room as he nodded to the gathering.

"With all your wealth, you could not afford a timepiece?" Taskerhill said. "The hour of this meeting was plainly set, Aslaxin."

The other nobleman turned toward his rival, and for a moment the air between them was electric as their stares matched. Finally, the newcomer pulled off his gloves and swished them through the air dismissively before tucking them in his belt. "I offer apologies to all present for any inconvenience caused by my delay. Please understand that I fully appreciate the seriousness of the situation faced by our fair city." Turning to Jenya, he added, "Lady Urikas, I believe you are playing hostess to this gathering?"

Jenya nodded, and came forward to stand in the middle of the room. "Ladies and gentlemen of Cauldron. Thank you all for coming today. Lord Aslaxin speaks truly to the gravity of our circumstance. I tell you this; I will speak with candor to you today, and I will not equivocate: Cauldron is on the brink of utter disaster.”

“Isn’t that just a bit overly-theatric, priestess?” Taskerhill interjected.

“I think, my lord, that we would do well to hear what the High Priestess has to tell us,” the elf woman Knowlern replied.

Jenya nodded. “Thank you, Ophellha. No doubt you have all heard of the recent events at the Temple of Kelemvor, and of the demise of the false Orbius Vhalantru.”

“Yes, a fearsome creature indeed,” Aslaxin said, with a nod to the adventurers.

“These events are linked to an even greater threat,” Jenya went on. “The efforts of these brave souls,” she said, also indicating the companions, “fighting on our behalf, has uncovered a dire plot that seeks to accomplish nothing short of the destruction of our city, of opening a permanent gateway between Cauldron and the fiendish plane of Carceri.”

Chapter 325

There was a pregnant silence, but while most of those present were shocked by the news, the companions could see that almost all of them appeared to expect it, or something equally serious. The nobles, particularly Taskerhill and Aslaxin, wore faces that might have been chiseled in stone, but a fiery passion burned in their eyes. Whether it was concern for Cauldron and its people, or for their own private interests, was impossible to determine.

“The rumblings under the volcano,” Premiach Vanderboren said. “They are linked to these efforts, I presume?”

“Who is behind this plot? And what can we do to stop them?” Omar Tiskinson exclaimed.

Jenya nodded in answer to both questions. “From what we have learned, these enemies are part of a cabal who call themselves the Cagewrights. Their plans have been dealt a setback by the revelation and destruction of Vhalantru, but we have not been able yet to track their leaders, or uncover the location of their secret headquarters.”

“The population... they must be notified of this,” Tygot Mispas said.

“Don’t be a fool,” Taskerhill said, cutting the merchant off. “What do you want to do, start a panic? The city’s already a tinderbox, and you want to splash oil upon the smoldering flame? Imagine your shop looted, people stampeding each other in the streets...”

“Yet we cannot stick our heads in the sand and hope the threat goes away,” Aslaxin added. “I think we should prepare a contingency plan for the evacuation of the city.”

Jenya nodded. “That was one of the suggestions that I brought to this gathering. The Temple of Helm will lend whatever aid it can to the planning and execution of that plan, should it become necessary.”

“Evacuation?” Aeberrin Vanderboren said. “Shouldn’t we first seek help? I mean, if what you say is true—no offense, priestess—then this danger threatens the entire region. What of the good churches, the guildlords of Almraiven, the magnates of the city-states on the Lake of Steam... or even the pasha, in Calimport?”

“I believe you will find that most of the powers of the ‘Shining South’ would consider troubles in distant Cauldron beneath their notice, lady,” Meerthan Eliothorn said. “Those who might be able to help have already been contacted, but aid may be slow in coming. We must be prepared to act on our own.”

Maavu Arlintal stepped forward. “It would seem that, if belatedly, Cauldron is awakening to the depths of the danger that I have been warning of for months. What course do you propose we take now, High Priestess? Can your divinations reveal how this threat is to be overcome?”

Jenya met the merchant’s eyes with an unflinching gaze. “The people of Cauldron will need strong leadership, to face the inevitably darker days that will follow. I have called this meeting, to propose the election of a new leader to replace the former mayor.”

“Election?” Taskerhill said. “An odd concept if you want a strong leader. Do you intend for us to vote, then? Cast secret ballots into an urn and draw out the man—or woman—with the strength to save us?”

Jenya’s mouth tightened. “I’d hoped we could come to a consensus, actually. We represent different elements of the city—church, trades, nobility—and it is vital that we present a united front to the people of the city.”

Taskerhill did not hesitate. “Then that leader should come from the ranks of those already recognized as leaders by the people of the city: the nobility.”

Aslaxin laughed, a deep, rich sound that echoed in the domed chamber. “Subtle, as always, Taskerhill.”

“If you have something constructive to add to the discussion...”

“Oh, just shut up, the lot of you,” Arun said, stepping forward between the two men. “This is pointless. I don’t know you men, but I’ve been here in Cauldron for nigh on a year now, and I’ve never heard of either of you. But I have seen first-hand someone who has given everything of herself for the sake of this city and its inhabitants. She has already shown initiative, bringing you all together, acting while others talked and dithered. If it’s a proven leader you want, you could do a lot worse than Jenya Urikas.”

Everyone turned to the priestess, who’d suddenly grown pale. But Beorna had moved up behind her while Arun spoke, and now she stood at Jenya’s side, whispering something lost in the general noise of activity that followed Arun’s declaration.

"I'll not support a theocracy in Cauldron, and nor will the people," Taskerhill said bluntly. But many of the other comments were positive, with the other two priests offering guarded support, and the merchants generally favorable.

"High Priestess Urikas has been my friend since she came to Cauldron, ten years ago," Ophellha Knowlern said. "She is up to this task."

"Your recommendation comes highly valued in its own right," Meerthan Eliothorn said to Arun. "You and your friends have fought hard for Cauldron, and the people respect your judgment."

"I do not doubt the worthiness of the High Priestess; she has proven her mettle," Aslaxin said. "But she is young... not yet thirty? Perhaps we should consider tempering the vitality of youth with the value of experience."

Taskerhill responded with another cutting barb, and several others joined in the exchange. As the debate continued, Mole leaned over and said to Dannel, "Do you think any of them would notice if I turned invisible and snuck out of here?"

Dannel shook his head. "Don't do it unless you can take me with you," he muttered. But he frowned, turning toward the abandoned bar on the far side of the room. There was something, unusual...

"What is it?" Mole whispered.

"Something..."

Mole looked in that direction, and while there was nothing unusual to be seen there, her attention did come just in time to detect a faint, "WHUMP" of air, a sucking sound that was accompanied by a hazy shimmer that hung in the air for just a heartbeat before dissolving.

The disturbance hadn't gone entirely unnoticed by the others in the room. "What in the blazes?" Taskerhill said, annoyance etched on his features at being interrupted from a point he'd been making.

But Dannel and Mole were already surging to action. The two had shared an instant's glance, confirming what each had sensed, the subtle clues that revealed the truth of what had just happened. Then the gnome was flipping her rapier out of its scabbard as she leapt forward into a twirling somersault. In mid-leap, she abruptly vanished. At the same time Dannel's longbow slid out of his enchanted quiver at his command, along with an arrow that jutted from the magical container, ready to draw as soon as the archer strung the bow.

"Someone's here, invisible!" Dannel shouted in warning, but before the rest of the occupants of the room could overcome their initial confusion, a cackling voice barked out a phrase in the language of magic, and a pinpoint of bright flame appeared out of thin air before erupting into the familiar and deadly conflagration of a fireball.

Chapter 326

The fireball lasted only an instant, but in that explosion of fire the Grand Library of the Cusp of Sunrise was transformed. Fine furnishings were blackened as the flames overturned small tables and turned expensively trimmed chairs into ash. Tapestries and paintings were likewise charred, along with thousands of gold pieces worth of books, décor, and statuary.

The focal point of the spell had been the head of the steps that led into the foyer, at the feet of Zachary Aslaxin. The nobleman had been blasted roughly back into the adjoining entry, while those around had likewise been killed or seriously wounded. Keygan Ghelve lay crumpled against the base of a bookcase, his skull showing white where his flesh had been blasted away by the blast, while Tygot Mispas was just a blackened lump a few feet away. Kristof Jurgensen and Skie Aldersun were both down, either dead or well on their way, and everyone else within the radius of the blast had been seriously injured. Jeyna Urikas, her fine robe an utter ruin, her hair burned half away from the charred flesh of her skull, looked around bewildered at the destruction that had been a gathering of vital people just a few seconds before. But her indecision lasted only a moment. Invoking the full power of Helm that she commanded, she unleashed a mass cure critical wounds spell that poured life back into the battered survivors of the fiery blast.

But even that potent spell could not help Ghelve, Mispas, and Jurgensen.

Even as Jenya countered the destructive power of the fireball with her magic, it became clear that the magical attack was just the opening round in an all-out assault upon the gathering. Arun had drawn his holy sword at Dannel's first warning, and even as the explosion of flame erupted throughout the room he was charging toward the origin point of the spell—oddly, it looked as though it had begun a good eight or nine feet above the tiled marble floor. But before he could reach the invisible spellcaster, he grunted as something hard slammed into his side. He turned as a foe materialized there, his invisibility disrupted by his attack. The enemy was a grim, feral-looking dwarf, coming barely to Arun's shoulder. The dwarf was clad in light armor, chain links over black leathers, and the skin visible under the black half-helm he wore was bluish in color, clashing with wide eyes that were an opaque milky-white. He carried a battle-axe in both hands, and even as Arun shifted to face him he lifted the weapon to strike again.

"Derro!" Arun hissed, recognizing the race of their adversaries. The derro were well-known to the gold dwarves, members of an insane, degenerate subrace of dwarvenkind that subsisted deep within the bowels of the Underdark. This one was clearly a veteran warrior, hurling himself at the paladin in a furious rage. Hodge moved to assist his friend, but quickly came under attack from a second derro, who appeared in the wake of a crippling assault that dug deep into the miner-turned-defender's armored thigh.

Beorna had likewise drawn her holy sword, its brilliance fighting through the haze of smoke that lingered in the aftermath of the fireball. But she did not immediately rush to the attack; instead, she drew upon the power of Helm, casting an invisibility purge to reveal their enemies to them.

Two more derro warriors appeared, one in the midst of raising his axe to strike down Aeberrin Vanderboren. The couple had been on the edges of the gathering and had avoided the worst of the fireball, but even though the noblewoman was nearly double the derro's height, she had no defense against his deadly axe. But even as the creature gibbered an eager cry for blood, her husband Permiach darted between them, knocking her backward out of the deadly path of the axe. He paid for his sacrifice, however, as the blade cut deeply into his side, knocking him prone in a mess of blood that poured from his side in a deadly cascade.

Aeberrin screamed, but before the derro could press his advantage the flame-blackened form of Omar Tiskensen appeared through the haze. The priest of Tempus held his greatsword high above his head, screaming an invocation to his patron as he smote the skittering dwarfkin. The blow would have cloven a cow in twain, but the derro was far tougher than he looked, rolling with the force of the stroke and coming around into a ready stance, prepared to counter.

The last warrior had rushed toward Ankhin Taskerhill, whose eyes widened in terror at the rapid approach of the diminutive warrior. But before the derro could reach its prey, Meerthan Eliothorn stepped to the nobleman's side. The half-elf was accompanied by Maavu Arlinal, who held the stricken form of Skie Aldersun in his arms. Maavu held onto Meerthan's shoulder as the half-elf touched the noble lord, speaking a word of magic. Reality shifted around them, and all four of them vanished from the chamber.

The derro warrior snarled, and looked around for other prey.

Beorna's spell had revealed one other enemy, the one that each of the heroes had looked for since Dannel had shouted his warning. That last was the derro sorcerer who had hurled the fireball, and whose spells had both transported the warriors here and bolstered their fighting ability. He was flying above the chamber floor, continuing to ascend in a slow spiral, and as he became visible he cackled madly. His white hair and beard jutting out from his blue-tinged skin in a disordered riot, and he held a long ivory rod in one hand, sweeping it over the battleground below as if willing his enemies to cease annoying him by dropping dead on the instant.

The sorcerer's eyes fixed on Tiskensen as the cleric and his derro adversary hacked at each other. "Priest of War God!" the sorcerer screeched, his voice as painful as fingernails being drawn across a slate. "Your master calls you to him!" Lifting the rod above his head in benediction with his left hand, he extended a stubby finger from his right at the cleric, and blasted him with a thin green ray of bright energy.

Omar Tiskensen had just enough time to look up before the ray disintegrated him.

The sound of his empty armor striking the hard floor sounded unnaturally loud in the cavernous interior of the chamber.

Chapter 327

With several of the gathered notables already dead, and a powerful spellcaster flying above them unleashing more spells, the surprise assault perpetuated by the mad derro had already achieved some degree of success.

But the companions, though bloodied, were quick to reply. Dannel had strung his bow with a practiced motion, and now drew the first long shaft back to his cheek as he sighted in upon the derro savant. His first shot missed, turned by the layered magical defenses protecting the sorcerer, but the elf did not hesitate, keeping up a rapid-fire barrage of shots as quickly as he could fit the arrows to his string and draw. Within six seconds the derro bore two wounds, although his shields had kept the impacts from being anything more than grazing hits.

But the sorcerer only laughed, plucking the arrows from his body to drop to the ground below. He waved his hand at the elf, calling upon his magic once more in a dread invocation of power. Dannel staggered as the spell took hold of him, his next arrow falling from his hands as his eyes widened in horror.

“Annoying archer... you remind me of a tunnel slug... in fact, I think I prefer you as one!”

Dannel cried out as his body began to shrink and distend, and within a few heartbeats, the nimble elven archer had been replaced by a foot-long gray slug, splayed out over the burned carpet in a slick of greasy slime.

The rest of the companions could not come to his aid, as they had their hands full with the derro warriors. The diminutive demi-dwarves proved quite tenacious, ignoring wounds that should have crippled them, shouting gibberish as they redoubled their berserk, all-out attacks. Arun kept hitting his foe, but the derro barbarian just simply refused to go down, even with torrents of blood pouring down his body from the rents that the paladin’s holy blade had torn in his chain armor and the flesh beneath. Hodge held his ground on the holy knight’s flank, but he too was hard pressed, favoring his left side where the derro’s axe had crunched through his armor. Hodge had opened the battle with violent power attacks, but as they proved ineffective against his dexterous foe he’d switched to a more deliberative approach, standing his ground and exploiting the openings left by his adversary’s raging assault.

With Omar Tiskensen’s disintegration, the derro that had faced him cackled maniacally and turned back to finish Premiach Vanderboren. The nobleman was unconscious, blood still oozing from the deep gash in his side onto the ruined carpet. His wife Aeberrin held him in her arms, and when the derro turned to face her, lifting his axe, she held herself over his body, offering him protection in what could only be a futile gesture.

But before the derro could strike, a fleet form tumbled up on the warrior from behind, leaping into a high flip that culminated with a rapier stabbing deep into the barbarian’s shoulder.

“Why don’t you pick on someone your own size, creep!” Mole said, kicking off from the derro’s shoulder and landing easily on her feet a pace back from him.

The derro turned, more enraged than hurt by the attack.

“Uh oh,” Mole said, as the dwarfkin rushed at her, his axe sweeping out in a blur.

Beorna had been temporarily forgotten, in the midst of the battle, and she drew upon the fullness of Helm’s might, infusing herself with the divine power of her patron. She looked up at the sorcerer, and as he polymorphed Dannel she prepared a dispel that would hopefully negate some of his defenses. But before she could act, a familiar cry drew her around. The last derro warrior, frustrated by the escape of Meerthan and the others, had turned to the nearest vulnerable enemies: Jenya and Ophellha. The High Priestess was strong in the power of Helm, but on this day she was not clad in heavy armor, nor did she carry any weapon. Most of her spells were designed to heal and protect, rather than to destroy enemies. But her expression remained calm as the derro screamed and ran at her, and she did not turn to flee, protecting the elven noblewoman with her slender body. She hurled a powerful enchantment at the derro, intending to immobilize him, but the creature’s insanity protected it like a shield, and the spell dissipated harmlessly. She staggered as the derro’s axe clove through her layered robes, opening a cruel gash in her side that grazed the ribs beneath.

Beorna’s roar of rage overshadowed the high-pitched screech of the derro, and she slammed into him from the side with the force of a battering ram. Her holy blade glanced hard off his partial helm, but even though the blow should have stunned him, the derro hardly hesitated before turning and laying into the templar with his axe.

The derro savant exulted in the chaos that swirled through the chamber below him. The smell of roasted flesh and fresh blood filled the once-pristine interior of the Great Library. Even in his insanity he knew that his potent rays would have little chance of affected the tough dwarves, but he aided his warriors by firing an empowered ray of enfeeblement that stabbed into Arun’s chest, draining his strength. His critically injured adversary took advantage of the paladin’s sudden weakness, leaping at him with a series of crushing blows, two of which penetrated his armor and cut painfully into his flesh.

Arun took the hits, and then, grunting against the pain that stabbed through his body, he lifted his sword and drove it through the chest of the derro warrior.

Beorna’s intervention had given Jenya a chance to shepherd Ophellha to the chamber exit. The high priestess looked down at Zachary Aslaxin, lying in the foyer, but one look at the roasted corpse was enough to tell her that there was nothing that could be done for him, at least not right now. “Go!” she said to the elf woman, all but pushing her forward toward the front exit before she turned back toward the raging battle. She looked frightful, pale with her white robes soaked with her own blood, but a solemn calm seemed to descend about her as she filled herself with the divine power of Helm once again.

The companions had taken a beating, but once more healing energy suffused them as Jenya filled the room with a mass cure serious wounds spell. The derro, without any such benefit, were being quickly worn down. Arun’s foe had been downed, and as he turned to help Hodge the two dwarves quickly finished the second warrior was well. Beorna’s adversary could not match her in sheer determination, and even Mole had managed to hold her own, although blood marked her dark clothes in several places as she darted and tumbled around the derro, thus far avoiding the critical blow that would have finished her nimble evasions for good. She wasn't even bothering to attack, instead buying time as she harried the frustrated warrior. Her stratagem worked; as Jenya's healing filled the room Premiach was able to rise, and the two Vanderborens rushed for the exit.

The savant shrieked as his victims sought escape. He focused on the high priestess, standing there defying him in the entry to the foyer. A wise assassin might have chosen to retreat at that moment, as his fighters went down around him.

But Kravichak was, of course, insane.

The savant laughed as he blasted Jenya with the coruscating green ray of his disintegrate spell. But Jenya, protected by Helm, simply absorbed the hit, defying destruction even as her body shook with the grim power of the spell. And she was quick to counter, calling upon a greater dispel that slammed through the savant's magic with the force of a sledgehammer. Kravichak's shield collapsed, and as his fly spell faltered he plummeted twenty feet straight down to a hard landing on the marble floor.

The sorcerer drew himself up to his knees to see Arun and Hodge looking down at him. "Help Mole," the paladin said to his friend. "I'll deal with this one."

The derro laughed, although his white eyes blinked back moisture as the light of Arun's holy sword stabbed into them. "The Cagewrights will destroy you!" he hissed. "They are as gods, and will not be denied their prize!"

"Perhaps, perhaps not," Arun said, lifting his blade. "But you, at least, are at an end."

With a maniacal scream, Kravichak conjured a final fireball, centered on himself.

Chapter 328

They had washed and been healed, and replaced their singed garments with fresh clothes, but an odor of char still hung about the companions as they gathered that evening in the sanctuary of the High Priestess in the Temple of Helm.

"It could have been much worse," Arun said.

"Five dead," Jenya said, looking tired as she sat in the simple hardwood chair decorated with the gauntlet of Helm etched into its high back just above her head. "Aslaxin, Jurgensen, Tiskensen, Ghelve, and Mispas."

"There was nothing that we could have done differently," Beorna said. "And the dead can be returned to life with Helm's intervention, if they choose to return."

"I will have to contact the church in Almraiven," Jenya said, not even bothering to look up as she responded. "We have an insufficient supply of the diamonds needed to focus the spell, and I doubt that enough will be found in all of Cauldron, not after all of the deaths in recent months...”

“We must concern ourselves with the living,” Dannel said. Jenya had broken the derro savant’s polymorph spell, but he still seemed agitated. He hadn’t sat down, and in fact his pacing seemed to grow more animated the longer that they remained there. “Damn it... they’ve got her, and we aren’t doing anything!”

“Dannel, I’m as worried as you are,” Mole said. “But without knowing where the Cagewrights are, we cannot help her, not yet.”

“What she’s sayin’, lad, is yer can’t be stupid,” Hodge said. Despite having “bathed” earlier, Hodge looked gruesome, with great swaths of his beard and brows missing where the fireballs had burned them away, and an ugly scar across his balding scalp where a wound hadn’t quite fully healed cleanly.

“There are several reasons why my divination may have failed to detect her, or why she may not have been able to respond to my sending,” Jenya said. She hadn’t mentioned the most obvious one; none of them wanted to countenance the possibility that Zenna was dead, however probable that likelihood came to be with each passing hour. “As I said earlier, I will pray for a more potent divination magic on the morrow, one that can pinpoint the location of something regardless of where it may be, here or on any other plane of reality.”

“But if they do have her, she’ll probably be warded against even that,” Dannel returned.

“It is very difficult to hide from a discern location spell,” Jenya said. “But yes, it is possible.”

“Blast it,” Dannel said, clenching his fists in frustration. He opened his mouth to say something else, but he was cut off by a faint rumbling that was nonetheless clearly audible through the solid foundations of the chapel. The sound was followed by a momentary trembling of the structure, just barely significant enough for them to feel it, which faded before they could do anything more than shift in their chairs.

“That’s the second tremor today,” Beorna said.

“Do you think the volcano’s stirring?” Mole asked.

“There have been no signs of a buildup of pressure beneath the caldera,” Arun said, but he frowned deeply as he said it.

“Oh, come on!” Dannel said. “This is obviously connected. The Cagewrights are moving their plans forward, mark me.”

“I’m not disagreeing,” Arun replied. “But again, without information, there’s not a lot we can do right now.”

“I just need to do something,” the elf said.

“Right now, you need to rest,” Beorna said. “We all do. We’re like as to do more ill than good, exhausted and clouded in mind.”

“Tomorrow, you can come with me, Dannel,” Mole said. “There’s a few leads in town you can help me track down.”

“We’d better go with you,” Arun said. “Clearly our enemies know much about our movements, and we cannot afford to let our guard down, not even for a moment.”

“I will continue my divinations,” Jenya said. “There must be an answer here somewhere, awaiting our discovery. Our enemies are very, very skilled... but they are mortals like us, and therefore not infallible.”

“I’ll bring you Zenna’s notes,” Mole said. “They might help you find the right questions to ask.”

Arun stood, his armor clanking slightly about his body at his movements. “I will check on the guards. It will be a long night, I fear.”

The others rose after him, gathering their gear before returning to their quarters in the rectory. Dannel was the last to leave, staring through the narrow slit windows at the starlit sky above the city, asking questions for which there were no easy answers, no answers at all.

Chapter 329

The next two days passed swiftly, for despite their uncertainties and their lack of hard information there was a great deal to do. Mole led them back and forth across the city seeking information, but even though gold coins and sometimes the threat of violence changed hands frequently, they were not able to turn any of their faint leads into something tangible. Jenya’s discern location likewise failed, a grim portent indeed, given the power of the spell.

The tremors within the volcano continued, and the panic within the population grew with each passing hour. Some left the city, piling their belongings onto overladen carts pulled by tired animals, scattering onto the four roads that wound down from the volcano town. But most hunkered in their homes, too fearful of any action that might tip the delicate balance that kept the city poised on the edge of the precipice. The day after the assault at the Cusp of Sunrise a mob formed at the Town Hall, demanding action, and blood was again spilled as the Watch clashed with desperate people afraid for their lives. Only the presence of Arun, along with a company of his followers, kept the situation from devolving into a mad riot. Bereft of strong leadership, the city seemed to be adrift. Ankhin Taskerhill had apparently given up his aspirations to serve as Mayor; the merchant was seen leaving the city on the road toward Almraiven along with most of the members of his household, all mounted and moving with the speed and determination that bespoke long planning. Jenya appeared at the Town Hall in the company of Meerthan Eliothorn, Maavu Arlental, and Arun Goldenshield toward the end of the day, and met with Teerson Skellerang and his officers, along with the leading municipal officials. While they shared a consensus on the need to maintain order, the visitors pointed out the importance of provoking confrontations and breeding further chaos. A new schedule of patrols by the Watch was instituted, with most of the mercenaries that Vhalantru had hired to be kept in their camps outside of the city for the immediate future. Arun's force of volunteers had handled themselves well during the clash at the Town Hall, and they were deputized into service in the Watch, along with others who had past experience in the militia or other military bodies and were known for being level-headed and reliable under pressure. One of Arun's recruits was a grizzled oldster named Alowyn Tristane, who as it turned out had spent six years of his youth as a campaigner in the armed forces of Tethyr. Arun installed Tristane as liaison between the Watch and the temple forces, and while Skellerang clearly didn't like it, he knew the way of the wind (and the tenuousness of his own position, for he had been a vocal support of Lord Vhalantru before his true nature was revealed) well enough not to stand in the way of the changes. It was well after midnight by the time that the last of the meetings had adjourned, but there was a slightly greater sense of reassurance among Cauldron's government now that someone had stepped forward to provide direction.

The next day was even busier. Despite their commitment to continue seeking information that might lead them to the Cagewrights and Zenna, all of the companions found themselves drawn into the vacuum of power, taking to the streets in an effort to keep order and reassure the populace. Dannel used his music and oratory to defuse a potential riot in front of a merchant's stall. Accusations of price gouging had circulated, and the crowd didn't need much incentive to start breaking things. Firing an arrow between the fingers of an angry man who'd reached forward to grab a hanging gourd of lamp oil on the side of the stall might have also helped to quell the brewing anger of the dozen or so townsfolk, and encourage them to be a bit less rash. There was a tense moment as one of the men, standing beside the elf, angrily reached for the dagger at his belt—only to find that it had vanished, along with most of the other weapons that had been carried by the gathered townsfolk.

At least Mole had agreed to put the weapons into storage at the Temple of Helm, rather than selling them.

Arun and Hodge spent the morning at the temple. More volunteers had showed up there, wishing to assuage their own fears by being useful. Arun put them to work or directed them to the Town Hall or to other quarters of the city, depending upon their skills and experience. Some of the recruits had developed a uniform of sorts, a thin surcoat of blue cloth marked with the sigil of a hammer done up in hasty black stitching. It wasn't as impressive or as professional as the garb worn by the Watch, but there was a certain reassurance in seeing the small teams of men and women in blue rushing throughout the city, moving with purpose and determination. Often the Hammers (as they quickly became known) would arrive at a destination to find a good dozen or so people hot on their heels, eager to help.

Beorna remained at Jenya's side, and her dominating presence, clad in her adamantine plate with her two huge swords slung across her back, certainly helped the High Priestess push her points when dealing with Skellerang or the other town officials. She met again with Maavu and some of the other leading merchants again that morning, and when she returned to the temple shortly after noon, she already looked like she'd had a full day. Dark circles were visible under her eyes, but she held her head high, and didn't flinch away when several of her acolytes greeted her return with a press of important details that required her attention.

As the morning turned into afternoon, the sky grew darker, with heavy clouds gathering over the city. Flickers of ochre light that might have been lightning stirred within that dense morass of gray, although there were no sounds of thunder. The quakes continued to build, with two or three tremors coming each hour now, although none as yet had been severe enough to cause any more than slight damage.

Dannel and Mole returned shortly thereafter, their faces grim at what they'd seen in the city. Despite the odd lack of wind and rain, it felt like a storm, with the iridescent haloes of yellow energy flaring within the thunderheads floating low above the city serving as an omnipresent reminder that something bad was brewing for Cauldron. The five companions—six, as Beorna rejoined them from inside the temple—gathered for a hasty meal in the stableyard, in the lee of the old wooden structure.

“I will likely have to return to the Town Hall shortly,” Beorna said as soon as she'd taken a seat on one of the bales of hay stacked up against the stable wall. “The High Priestess is due for another several meetings this afternoon, but she has taken seclusion in her chapel, and damned if I'm going to let anyone pull her out before she's ready.”

“She has risen to the challenge of providing leadership in some tough times,” Dannel said. “I've known many who presented themselves as harder, tougher, to the world, but who folded under less pressure than she's faced.”

Another flicker of eerie yellow light flared within the gray depths of the cloudbank, directly above the city. “I so do not like the looks of that,” Mole said.

Hodge paused in the process of stuffing sausages into his mouth so snort and offer his view on the subject. “If ye weren't all fools, ye'd be leavin' this accursed place well and far behind. Anyone with sense could see that somethin' be brewin', an' it ain' nothin' good. An' we just sit 'ere, waitin'.”

“I don't think we'll have long to wait,” Arun said. “Whatever is gathering here, it is seeped in taint. The Cagewrights are making their gambit, and we will have to stand against them.”

Hodge grumbled, but didn't respond. The conversation died out then, and they ate in silence, quickly, as if guilty for even a brief respite in the day's activity. Or maybe they were just eager to be back in action, even if without knowledge of what they were fighting against, in order to keep difficult questions and niggling doubts in check.

As they were finishing, a hint of motion drew their attention around. Jenya stood there in the doorway to the rectory, limned in a halo of light from within the building, giving her a saintly, otherworldly look. The companions could instantly see from her face that something was very, very wrong.

“What is it?” Arun asked, even as Beorna strode purposefully across the courtyard toward her patron.

Jenya sagged slightly against the threshold of the outer door. Tears shone in her eyes as she looked up and fixed them with an intent stare.

“Cauldron is lost,” she said. “We must evacuate the city!”

Chapter 330

They did not waste much time in idle conversation, but Jenya did her best to answer their questions. She had reached out to Helm once more for guidance, and had been nearly overcome by the intensity of her god’s response. “Look to the heart of the matter,” spoke the words—divine or divinely-inspired, at the very least—in her mind. It was not much of a revelation, but it cut through the fog of weariness and confusion that had belabored her these last days, and replaced that with a calm certainty. The meaning of the tremors, the gathering storm, the strange happenings of the last few days, had become clear.

The Cagewrights were making their move.

In the midst of the High Priestess’s revelations, it came without warning. One moment they were talking, and the next the entire world around them seemed to be shaking violently. A dull roar overwhelmed their shouts, and Beorna only barely caught Jenya before she fell. The quake—actually just a single, massive pulse from within the volcano—barely lasted long enough for terror to replace surprise, but in its wake they could hear the screams from beyond the walls of the temple grounds that indicated that it had not come and gone without wreaking destruction.

“We’re out of time,” Dannel said.

“Orthos!” Arun yelled, pointing to one of his younger recruits, just rising from where he’d been roughly knocked onto the cobbles in the entry of the stable. At Arun’s cry he jumped up and ran over to them.

“Sir?”

“Gather all of the Hammers currently here at the Temple compound,” the paladin commanded. Even as the young man dashed off to obey, Beorna shouted after him, “And if you see any clerics, tell them to get their butts over here as well!”

“I must go to the Town Hall, and coordinate the evacuation with the Watch,” Jenya said. “Just give me a few seconds—there are a few sacred relics that cannot be left, and the Star of Justice.”

“I will accompany you, High Priestess,” Beorna said. “You will need protection, and the streets will not be safe, especially as panic begins to set in among the population.”

“No, that is where you will be needed,” Jenya said, holding up a hand to forestall the templar’s protest. “Fear not, I will be adequately guarded; I have prepared a potent call to Helm for an ally in the fear of this moment coming. But you... all of you... will have to take the lead in the evacuation. It will take an hour, if not more, to mobilize and organize the Watch, and I fear that in that time, people will die.”

“Where should we start?” Dannel asked.

“There, I think,” Mole said. They turned to follow her gaze, down toward the pit of the caldera. The buildings across Obsidian Avenue from the temple obscured their view of the lake, but they could all see the vast plume of steam rising from the center of the town.

“The lake,” Arun said. “As the volcano awakens, it will superheat and overflow its banks, killing everyone it touches.”

Beorna had not shifted her gaze from Jenya, the two holy warriors testing each other in a silent battle of resolve. Finally, the templar nodded, and to Jenya’s surprise knelt before her, taking her superior’s hand and pressing it to her forehead.

“Go with the blessing of Helm,” Jenya said. She took the templar’s head in both of her hands and bent low, laying a soft kiss upon her brow, then turned and darted across the courtyard toward the temple structure, looking like a slyph as her long white robe—faintly gray from dust—trailed behind her.

Men and women had gathered in the stableyard. There was only about a dozen, but more than half wore the distinctive tunics bearing the hammer sigil that they had taken as the symbol of their service. Most of Arun’s followers were out in the city with Jenya’s few remaining priests, helping to keep order or to otherwise lend their support to the troubled townsfolk remaining in Cauldron.

Arun didn’t waste time, pointing to a half-elven woman of middle years wearing the blue tunic. “Ambelin, you’re in charge of this group. We are evacuating the city. Travel light, but take your weapons and tools. The High Priestess will be coming out in a few minutes, and will be going to the Town Hall to coordinate the evacuation. I want you to go with her, and tell Tristane that he and the Hammers are to fully support her in whatever she commands. Help whomever you can, but don’t dally long; we need to get as many people out of the city as we can. I fear that we may not have much time.”

“Yes sir!” the woman replied. She turned and immediately started giving orders to those gathered, who quickly started running for their gear or otherwise preparing to depart. The young man, Orthos, hesitated a moment. “What about you, sir? Where are you going?”

The adventurers had already started toward the gate that led out from the relative sanctuary of the temple into the growing chaos of the city. At the question, the paladin glanced back over his shoulder. “Into the fire, lad. Into the fire.”

Chapter 331

On a normal day, it was a pleasant walk of ten to fifteen minutes from Obsidian Avenue, the outermost of Cauldron’s ring-streets, to the shores of the crater lake.

On this day, it took over an hour, and the journey was far less than pleasant.

The city was in a tumult. Everywhere confused and frightened citizens ran about. Some were hastily gathering their belongings, obviously intent on flight, while others were hurrying on errands of vital importance, checking on a loved one or rushing back to a home or place of business to see if the latest quake had ruined them. And there were even more people who went to the streets for no reason, just a vague panic that grew and built off of every additional soul seeking answers.

The companions could not stop to give those answers, even if they had known them. But they directed people toward the gates, to leave the city as quickly as possible. The city leaders would have more information for them, would escort them to safety. Their words only spawned more questions, fear, even anger; but the Heroes of Cauldron did not allow themselves to be diverted for long.

Despite their intent, however, they did find themselves facing distractions that they could not avoid. While making their way down one of the sloping alleys that connected Ash and Magma Avenues (the city streets had taken on a grimmer allusion now, Mole commented as they traveled), they passed a three-story tenement that was leaning slightly out over the cobbled pavement below. One look was enough for the dwarves to spot the cracks in the stone foundation of the structure, undermined by the quake. A man stood in the street in front of the building, surrounded by a few bystanders, all focused upon another figure visible in the narrow window visible under the gables of the top floor above. The man in the street was entreating the man in the window to come down, but even from several stories below the companions could see that he appeared to be mad, his eyes wide and darting wildly about. He carried a burden against his body, and as they closed they could see the small arms and legs jutting from it that identified its nature.

“Tomash!” the man in the street shouted. “Come down... it is not safe, we must leave!” Some of the other bystanders offered similar urgings, caught up in the drama of the moment.

“He’s going to drop that child,” Mole said. “I’d better hop up there and grab him.”

“Hold a moment,” Dannel said, stepping forward, toward the concerned man in the street.

“Who is he?” the elf asked, his tone reassuring yet infused with a gentle air of command.

“Tomash,” the man said. “My brother. The big tremor, it shook everything... I rushed out of the house, but he would not come... The last tendays... So much pressure... I fear that his mind, it has been sundered!”

The elf put a hand on the man’s arm, and looked up at the panicked man. “Tomash,” he said, his voice cutting clearly through the din, the building background noise of fear and confusion, that now resounded through the entire city. “Tomash, you must come down. Your child depends on you. Go into the house, and come down to the street, to your brother.”

The words seemed to flow together in an almost melodic cadence. The gathered townsfolk could not see the power of his charm person spell take hold, but even in the tumult—or perhaps, because of it—a visceral part of them could sense the presence of power in the air, and they watched with fascination as the man Tomash grew calm, and after a moment turned and disappeared back into the building.

A minute later, he appeared in the doorway, with the child safe in his arms, and a second—a young girl, maybe six or seven—clinging onto the drooping tail of his disheveled tunic.

“Get these people away from the structure, and don’t let anyone back in,” Arun ordered Tomash’s brother. The paladin and Hodge had given the sagging foundation a quick look, and it confirmed their earlier suspicions. “One more tremor, and this building is going to be here in the street.”

“The people are leaving the city,” Beorna added. “Go to the nearest gate and wait for directions.”

“But...” the man hesitated, turning back toward the building. “Everything we have...”

“You have your lives,” the templar said, harshly. “Now, all of you... go!”

Her tone was not one that would brook challenge, and the people went, fearfully looking back over their shoulders. A few, they saw, ran into nearby buildings, no doubt intent on rescuing what they could of their possessions regardless of the danger.

“Fools,” Beorna said, as they pressed on.

Magma Avenue was in even more of a tumult. The panicked neigh of horses contrasted with the cries of people dashing about; a half-dozen teamsters were trying to keep two trains of horses under control while people loaded the wagons behind them in a frenzy of activity. A few people tried to push their way into the queue, carrying their own possessions, but steel-eyed guards were quick to intervene and prod them on their way. It looked like a pair of shops fronting the street were coordinating the evacuation. Arun grimaced as a trio of grimacing men, merchants by their dress, emerged from one of the shops maneuvering an obviously expensive but quite heavy and impractical oak desk toward one of the wagons.

“What do these people think they are doing?” Beorna said.

“They’re afraid!” Dannel said.

“There’s goin’ to be a riot brewin’ here, any minute!” Hodge said. As if to punctuate his words, the ground shook beneath his feet, and a new surge of fear sliced through the crowd as people stumbled and fell to the hard cobbles. This quake lasted only a few seconds, but it added to the ferocity of the scene, like water added to an already overflowing pot.

“Over here!” Mole shouted, darting off to the right, down the street.

“Where’s she going?” Beorna asked, at the same moment that Arun yelled, “Stay together!” But they could now hear the screams that had no doubt alerted their keen-eared friend, and they hurried after her. The crowd, despite its panic, got out of their way; three heavily armored dwarf warriors had that kind of effect.

It didn’t take long to reach the scene of the disturbance. A chasm, some fifty feet long and at least ten feet across, had opened like a great gash in the center of the avenue. Wisps of volcanic gas rose from the fissure, and as they rushed forward to join Mole at its rim, careful to remain back from the crumbling edge, they could hear the desperate cries coming from below.

“There are people trapped down there!” Mole yelled.

As if the moment wasn’t intense enough, the ground shuddered beneath their feet, and the sides of the chasm shifted. Drawing gradually—but inexorably—closer as the rumblings of the volcano began to push the fissure shut.

Slowly crushing the helpless people below.

Chapter 332

With the fissure beginning to close, Mole did not hesitate. She’d already dipped into her bag of holding, and as the dwarves closed she withdrew two bundles of rope from the magical container and threw them at them.

“Toss ‘em down!” she said, not even waiting for a response as she turned and leapt into the fissure.

Dannel sat on the cracked paving stones a few feet back from the lip of the opening, quickly removing his boots and slipping on his slippers of spider climbing. By the time that Arun and Hodge had gotten the ropes unwound, Dannel too had descended into the uneven opening, darting precariously down the sharply slanting and uneven sides of the fissure. Streamers of steam and sulfurous ash filled the space, making visibility beyond a few feet almost impossible. From below, they could hear the screams of pain and panic of the people trapped below.

“Mole!” Beorna yelled into the expanse. “Ropes coming down!” At her gesture Arun and Hodge stepped forward, hurling the loosened coils down, keeping hold of the far ends.

“Spread out, one to each side,” Arun directed, already moving from the narrow end of the fissure toward one of the crumbling sides.

“Watch those edges!” Beorna warned, needlessly; all of the dwarves knew enough about stone and earth to know the danger.

It only took a few seconds for the first line to grow taut. Arun, his legs braced solidly against the pavement a spare pace back from the edge, pulled until a pale human man in the clothes of a day laborer appeared through the smoke. Beorna grabbed him as soon as he drew close enough to the edge, taking his hand in a crushing grip and hurling him bodily to safety. Even as the man stumbled back, coughing, Hodge drew a second person up on his line, a woman who cried in pain, favoring her left arm.

The ground shook again as the sides of the chasm drew another foot closer. Hodge and Arun were now a bare five paces distant on the opposite sides of the fissure, but both ignored the closing walls, focusing only on drawing up more people from below. Another woman, the line secured around her body, her broken arm dangling uselessly behind her, was helped up by Arun and Beorna, while Hodge pulled up a man holding an elvish child who seemed utterly frail and delicate in his soot-stained arms. Another man followed the woman with the broken arm on Arun's side, unconscious, the rope lashed around his chest. Arun and Hodge were nearly close enough now for them to reach out and touch across the closing gap of the fissure.

"Mole, Dannel, get out of there!" Arun yelled down into the fissure. Both dwarves heaved on their ropes, each drawing another person out of the jaws of death. Both of the victims were unconscious this time, and Beorna had to lean precariously over the opening to draw them in.

Dannel appeared then, moving awkwardly up the closing gap, his magical slippers the only thing keeping him from sliding back into the ashen darkness below. His cloak was wrapped around a considerable burden held close against his body, and his face was tight with tension and effort as he leapt up to a jutting stone that shifted beneath his weight. He started to fall, arrested only by Beorna's sudden grab, her arm shooting out to take a fistful of his cloak, focusing on the bulge of his quiver underneath. For a heart-shattering second he hung from her grip solely by the strap of the quiver secured under his arm, unable to help her lest he lose his grip on his burdens. Then Arun was there, and the two dwarves pulled him up to safety.

"Thanks," he gasped. Beorna drew back the cloak, revealing two pale human children, each maybe six or seven years old. They were conscious, very scared—and alive.

"Meeka!" one of them, a little girl, cried, reaching for the chasm.

The dwarves turned toward the opening just as the ground lurched again, and with a crash that propelled a last jet of ash and smoke up into the sky, the fissure slammed shut.

"Mole!"

Chapter 333

Arun helped Dannel to his feet, as one of the injured women came forward, taking the children into her arms, sobbing in relief. The girl was crying, now, pointing toward the fissure, repeating the name she'd called out earlier. Beorna was tending to some of the unconscious victims they'd pulled out of the chasm before it had slammed shut, and her face was grim as she glanced back at the ridge formed where the sides of the fissure had buckled together. Hodge clambered forward, pulling at loose debris, but while steam continued to vent up from narrow cracks, the fissure had been well and truly shut by the inexorable movement of the earth beneath them.

“Fool girl,” Hodge cursed, but his voice was thick as he looked for what he knew would not be found.

Then there was a flash of smoke, just a few steps to his left. The dwarf started in surprise as the smoke dissipated to reveal Mole, kneeling bent over, coughing as she fought for a clean breath of air.

Hodge offered Mole his ubiquitous jug, but she shook her head. “I’m not that desperate,” she said, pulling herself, up, cradling her arms close against her chest.

“You just have to make it dramatic, don’t you,” Dannel said, moving around the ridge of the close fissure to join them. His tone was acerbic, but the relief was obvious on his face.

“Did we get everyone?” Arun asked.

“Yeah, I think so,” Mole said, opening her cloak to reveal what she’d been protecting. The little girl let out a shriek as a small form twisted in the gnome’s grasp, yapping; it was a blackened but otherwise hale puppy.

“Meeka!” the girl cried. Mole walked over to her, a wide smile on her face, and offered the child her pet.

“Thank you,” the woman, the child’s mother, said. “Thank you, all of you.”

“The city is being evacuated,” Arun said, his voice pitched to carry through the small crowd that had gathered around the drama of the rescue. “Stay together, move to the closest city gate as quickly as you can. Don’t stop, and don’t go into buildings.”

Beorna helped the last of the injured survivors to his feet. Her healing powers hadn’t fully restored all of them, but they were all ambulatory, and would have a better chance than some of escaping the increasingly deadly city. That fact was made clear a moment later as a sudden plume of white steam rose up from the Lava Avenue, just one street below them now, on the edges of the lake.

“The lake is overflowing its boundaries!” Dannel said.

“Let’s go,” Arun said. The companions gathered their gear, Mole quickly wrapping up the ropes in case they were needed again. The first connecting street was blocked by a collapsed building that had fallen inward across the sloping avenue. No one was evident, although fifty people might have been buried under that rubble as far as they could have known. Rather than essay the unstable barrier, they rushed down to the next block, and turned into a pedestrian walkway that led down a wide stone staircase that ran down between several buildings to the lowest of Cauldron’s four main boulevards.

Lava Avenue was relatively quiet, compared to the rest of the city. There were few residences here, on the edges of the lake; with the danger of flooding most people who could lived higher up along the rim of the caldera. There were a number of businesses and warehouses here, and several docks that had already been inundated by the rising waters. The lake was clearly in turmoil, steam rising from the waters brought to a boil by the release of superheated gasses from deep within the volcano. Angry waves five or more feet high rushed outward from the advancing rim of the lake, splashing out onto the avenue.

“Leave it, get to higher ground, out of the city!” Dannel yelled, yanking a man from where he’d been trying to load a wagon in front of a warehouse nearby. The elf drew his sword and cut the panicked horse at the lead of the wagon free, calming it enough for the man to take its lead reins.

“Greedy fools,” Beorna observed, as the man ran off, horse in tow. “They’d risk their lives for a few gold pieces in swag.”

“The livery stables!” Mole yelled, pointing down the street toward one of the long structures that abutted the lake, home to dozens of domesticated animals. Apparently some people had elected to depart without taking their property, and they could hear the panicked bray of trapped creatures from within the structure even from a hundred paces distant. The back of the stables were normally a good fifteen feet above the waters of the lake, but now the steaming waves were slamming hard against the wooden planks.

“Great, now I’m playin’ hero to a bunch o’ cattle,” Hodge grumbled, but he followed the others as they ran toward the stables. They passed a group of men staggering from the ruin of what had been an inn, several of them bloody and unconscious, helped by the others. Beorna and Arun paused to help them, while Dannel and Mole continued toward the stables.

But before either group could reach their destination, a roar from the lake drew their attention around. The already roiling waters had suddenly erupted in a surge focused maybe fifty yards out, not far from where the lake’s edge was normally situated. A fresh wave pulsed out onto Lava Avenue, forcing Dannel and Mole back to avoid being scaled. Even as they darted out of the way of the boiling water, the source of the disturbance became evident, as a... thing rose up out of the lake, borne up out of the water on a thrashing tangle of limbs. It had a vaguely humanoid look to it, not much larger than an adult human, although its alien features were more those of a fish than those of a man. Even from this distance they could see the markings of an unholy bloodline about it, and from the waist down its body terminated not in legs and feet, but in a number of thick tentacles that now slapped the water as it lifted its body up out above the waves, transforming the surface of the lake around it into a sea of steaming froth.

“Now what in the blasted blooming hells is THAT?” Hodge yelled, already fumbling with his heavy bow.

The creature let out a terrible roar from its inhuman jaws, a sound of blind rage and searing pain. It was clearly discomfited by the boiling water, and as its thrashings lifted it above the waves wings unfolded from its back, pounding the water as they furiously lifted the infernal monstrosity into the sky. Despite its terrible appearance, it looked to be intelligent, for as it ascended they could see that it wore gleaming bracers at its wrists, and it carried a slender wand in one hand.

“It has already been injured,” Arun said. “Perhaps it will just fly off, and leave this place.”

“Takin’ bets?” Hodge muttered, sliding a fat bolt into place and hefting his weapon.

And indeed, the creature, once it was clear from the lake and more or less stable in the air, rose above them over the flooded avenue. It looked down at them with a gaze that seethed with malevolence, and it sundered the air with a cry of pure hate.

“Begone from here, fiend!” Arun said, drawing his holy sword, letting its light shine out like a beacon as he lifted it above his head.

In response, the creature spoke a word of pure corruption, and in response the air around it rippled and seethed. For a moment the boundaries between realities were sundered, and through that opening a pair of filthy, scarabous vulture-things entered the world.

“Vrock demons,” Beorna said. She lifted her palm, and calling upon the power of Helm, extended a ray of searing light from her to the fish-man fiend.

The beam struck the creature, but instead of burning it, there was a flash and the energy blast returned back on its course, slamming into its caster’s chest. “Ah!” Beorna cried, as the holy power of her own patron stabbed a fist of pain through her body.

“Let’s see if it can reflect one o’ these!” Hodge said, lifting his bow to his shoulder. But even as he drew the trigger of his weapon, the fiend pointed at the trio of dwarves, and a wave of pain swept through each of them. The potent energies of a horrid wilting spell tore through their bodies mercilessly.

Chapter 334

The horrid wilting spell was a terrible magic, capable of ripping the moisture that facilitated the basic processes of life right out of a living being. The fiendish morkoth’s spell, a gift of its dark ancestry, hit them with its fullest potential of power.

The injured men in the shadow of the ruined inn behind them screamed and collapsed, reduced in a heartbeat to desiccated husks that only barely resembled men. The dwarves were made of sterner stuff, but even they could not fully resist the dark energies of the spell.

Or at least two could not; Arun and Hodge gritted their teeth as their bodies screamed in protest against the moisture torn from them by the potency of the spell. Arun’s skin sank close against his skull, and blood flowed from his fingers as the suddenly-dry flesh burst within his gauntlets. Hodge stumbled, tears of blood trailing from his eyes as he blinked, trying to clear his vision.

But Beorna, her mettle bolstered by the power of her faith, and the sheltering hand of Helm, fought off the dire effect of the wilting. Her face twisted into a snarl as she jammed her sword point-down into the ground at her feet, and reached around to the small bow still slung across her back. In part, her ire was directed at herself, for while she possessed the power to send such an infernal monstrosity back to its plane of origin, she also knew that her chances of affecting it with her magic were almost nil. That was the price of her chosen path, sacrificing the power to wield spells for the toughness and dedication of the templar. It was a choice she'd made freely, but at this particular moment it grated.

The morkoth let out a shriek as a missile stabbed into its body. The shot had not been Hodge's, as the bolt from his crossbow had missed cleanly. Rather, Dannel and Mole were running back down the road toward them, forced now almost onto the far shoulder by the advancing waters of the lake. The buildings on the lakeward side of the avenue were now surrounded by boiling water, and the crash of breaking glass and splintering wood sounded now almost constantly from all around the edges of the lake. Dannel paused long enough to loose another shaft, which the creature was able to dodge. It had erected a dark field of energy around it, a familiar unholy aura that the companions had faced before. It beat its wings to gain more altitude, but none of the adventurers would have wagered that it was retreating from the fray.

The vrocks let out their terrible shrieks and dove toward the dwarves. Cautious, the avian fiends did not immediately dive into range of their blades, but instead drew upon dark currents of power to bolster themselves prior to engaging their foes. Beorna fired an arrow at one, but the missile barely stuck in its thick hide, not harming it. The vrocks, now maybe twenty feet above them now, circling them in a wide sweep, responded with a mocking cackle as they surrounded themselves with shifting cloaks of mirror images. Arun, who had not gone for his bow, only held his sword ready, waiting for the inevitable attack.

Dannel drew out a handful of arrows from his magical quiver as the morkoth angled back toward him, spreading them onto the bed of a nearby ruined wagon that had been left beside the road. Mole had been beside him a moment ago, but she'd disappeared somewhere, naturally. Dannel only hoped she'd gotten clear; he'd seen what effect the morkoth's initial attack had had, and he fully expected to draw something similar down upon himself.

Drawing his first arrow to his cheek, he set about stimulating that response. His first shot missed, to his frustration, but he did not spend any time berating himself. The arrows were close at hand; each was fit to string, drawn, and fired in a heartbeat. The morkoth's thick, oily hide and the evil aura of power surrounding it were potent defenses, but Dannel was one with his bow, the song filling him, infusing his arrows with magical power. The creature flinched noticeably in its flight as the elf's second arrow vanished into its torso, and even as it recovered the third clipped its wing, punching through the membrane as it passed through. The creature howled in rage and drew its wings close around its body, plummeting toward Dannel like a stone. Still Dannel fired, and his fourth shot stuck in the creature's leg, trailing fat drops of black blood that splattered on the stones at his feet.

He reached for another arrow, but before he could ready another shot, the morkoth spread its wings and let loose another spell upon its tormentor.

The vrock, content with the potency of their defensive preparations, finally unleashed their assault. They opened with a paired screech, a sonic assault intended to stun their enemies, and leave them completely vulnerable to attack. Unfortunately for them, their enemies were dwarven veterans, who were easily able to resist the terrible sound. Hodge had reloaded his bow and shot one of the vrock, a square-on impact to the chest that unfortunately connected with a mirror image. Beorna's arrows likewise struck only empty air, although she did manage to remove several of the images from one of the creatures before they both wheeled and dove to the attack.

Arun waited in a ready position until he actually felt the impact of claws tearing at his shield, trying to find an opening in his defenses. In that instant he released the attack he'd been holding, driving his sword through the body of the demon, smiting it with a critical strike that tore through its ribcage, drove through a lung, and then erupted out from its back. The demon seemed shocked, opening its beak soundlessly as the holy power of the sword seared its corrupted essence from within. It managed to get one of its hind legs up between itself and the dwarf impaling it with his sword, and pushed off of the blade, flopping awkwardly to the ground made slick with its own blood. Hodge rushed up, ready to finish it, but the vrock still had a bevy of mirror images protecting it, and the dwarf's axe clove through one of those instead of the real creature.

"Blast ye!" Hodge cursed, almost losing his balance as his foot landed on a cobblestone slick with demonic ichor.

Beorna, meanwhile, was closely engaged with the second vrock. As it drew within reach she dropped her bow and drew forth her own holy blade, hefting the weapon with both of her muscled hands wrapped around its hilt. She was cautious, wary of overextending herself with a strike against a false image, and that caution allowed the vrock to get in the first strike. As it dove at her it lashed out with one of its hind legs, clipping her solidly across the right side of her face. Her helm prevented her from losing an eye, but the sharp talons still dug painfully across her brow, opening gashes that trailed blood down the side of her face.

The templar merely shook her head and countered with a series of expert cuts that formed a weaving pattern of light between her and the demon. Several more of the mirror images vanished as she tore through them with the holy blade, but they served their purpose, keeping the demon safe from harm, for the moment.

Dannel screamed in agony as the morkoth, now a mere fifty feet above him, spread its wings and extended a webbed hand down toward him. Black flames erupted around him, slashing into his slender body, threatening to tear the very fabric of his soul asunder. But even as the destruction spell took hold, a clear thought sounded in his mind, a picture of the woman he loved, her fate dependent on them, on him, surviving to find her...

He screamed again, but this time there was more frustration and rage than pain in the sound. He realized that he'd fallen to the ground, and that while wisps of black smoke rose from his body, he was alive. His bow was still in his hand, his fingers white around the smooth shaft.

Then an echoing scream drew his attention up, and he saw the morkoth, its wings spread wide like some avenging angel, descending upon him, his death shining in its eyes.

Chapter 335

There was no time for thought, only for instinct. Dannel raised his right hand, the one bearing the magical ring he'd recently acquired, and with a thought called upon its power. The ring, its bronze face shaped into the head of a ram, hummed as a plane of translucent force formed around the elf's fist, then blasted into the descending form of the morkoth.

The creature was caught off-guard, and any mundane foe would have been diverted by the potency of the ring's attack. But Dannel, reacting out of a self-preserving reflex, had not factored in the half-fiend's considerable spell resistance. The force-blast dissipated as it struck the morkoth, which snapped its head forward as it landed, opening its huge jaws to seize the unfortunate elf. Dannel didn't even have time to cry out as the creature smote him, and he was unconscious even before it sent him hurtling back behind the wagon to fall in a gangly heap in the muddy ditch behind it.

The morkoth lifted its head and bellowed in triumph, a hollow, gasping sound made more terrible by the red smears of Dannel's blood that surrounded its gaping mouth. But despite its success thus far, the creature was clearly in some discomfort. Its body had been designed for dwelling under the water, not for breathing the air above, and blood continued to seep from the various puncture wounds Dannel had inflicted upon it already with his arrows. Turning to see its summoned vrock doing poorly against the dwarves, it started beating its wings to lift it once more into the air.

But before it could alight, something struck it across the back with a sucking plop. There was no pain, but within a few seconds it became harder for the morkoth to beat its wings. It could not see, of course, the sticky strands of alchemical goop that spread out from the tanglefoot bag that had just hit it between the shoulder blades, fouling its wings more with each beat. Nor did it see the rope that had been wrapped around the bag, and which now was tangled in the mixture, trailing out behind it to a terminus that Mole was quickly wrapping around one of the axles of the ruined wagon nearby.

The morkoth, its wings pounding furiously, leapt into the air, and was finally able to start gaining altitude despite the hindrance caused by the adhesive strands cluttering its back. But it quickly reached the limit of the rope, which jerked it roughly back down. Hissing in fury as it landed, it turned and grabbed hold of the rope. Looking back, it spotted Mole, who darted behind the wagon as the morkoth lifted its wand and fired a lightning bolt that slammed into the damaged conveyance, sending wood splinters flying. And more importantly, from its perspective, severing the rope that bound it to the ground.

In the meantime, as the morkoth struggled with Mole's entangling line, Arun and Hodge had finally whittled away the last of the shifting images protecting the critically injured vrock. The hapless demon, compelled by the summoning that had drawn it here, could not retreat, and so it perished in a bloody mess, dissolving into noxious black smoke as the bond holding it on the Prime Material Plane ebbed with the ending of its life. The two dwarves turned to aid Beorna. The templar's foe had tried everything it could in an effort to stop her; telekinesis had failed against her indomitable resistances, and even blasting her with a cloud of invasive spores had done little to ease the ferocity of her attack, although the burrowing growths fostered by the spores had to be causing her intense pain. Only its mirror images was keeping it in the fray at all, and as Beorna drove it back, the demon flapping its wings madly as it hovered a few paces above the ground, it paused to refresh the blurring shroud of images surrounding it. Like its kin, however, the demon did not, could not, withdraw, and with a shriek it met the templar's charge, slashing at her body with all four of its taloned limbs.

"Damn it, slay the master fiend!" Beorna shouted at the other two dwarves. When Arun hesitated, only for an instant, she added, "I can handle this one! MOVE!"

The two men complied, charging toward the morkoth, some fifty paces distant, even as it blasted the wagon with its lightning bolt, freeing itself. Beorna, fighting through the pain of the spores burrowing into her flesh, cursed as her sword again passed through empty air, popping another image, suffering in turn a painful impact as a talon bruised her shoulder. She wasn't badly hurt, not yet, but each small wound inflicted by the demon was adding to her tally of injuries. And the others had been hurt, hurt bad by the horrid wilting, and she knew that they would need her help against the powerful fiend that had unleashed such destructive magical powers.

To the hells with it, she thought, and she lowered her head, closing her eyes as she listened for the flapping of wings that announced another sweeping assault from the demon. When the sound filled the interior of her helmet, and its shriek echoed within that adamantine cavern, she thrust her blade forward with all her might.

The morkoth lifted once again into the air, laboring against the clinging strands of tanglefoot mixture splayed across its back. The fragment of rope, still anchored solidly to that adhesive, trailed behind it. The remnants of the rope formed a twenty foot tail behind the ascending creature, and as its end lifted up off the ground Arun, charging hard, lunged forward and seized it in a mailed fist. For a moment the dwarf was jerked roughly into the air, dangling several feet above the ground before his weight dragged him—and the morkoth—back with him. The fiend let out a fierce roar of protest as the paladin tossed his shield aside, taking ahold of the rope in both hands, yanking the morkoth down while Hodge lifted his burning axe, ready to deliver a telling blow.

But before he could strike, the morkoth opened its jaws wide, and spoke a single word. A word of utter anathema that shook the reality of the world in a forty-foot radius around it.

Hodge clutched his head and crumpled. Likewise, Arun fell, paralyzed by the fell power of the blasphemy. Behind the blasted wagon, Dannel, brought to the brink of consciousness by a healing potion from Mole, slumped back into the muck of the ditch, while Mole, her body quivering, fell across his ravaged frame. With a single stroke, the fiendish monstrosity had incapacitated almost all of its foes.

The morkoth, exulting in its evil power, landed and stood over the helpless form of the paladin, ready to deliver a final, killing blow.

Chapter 336

Beorna felt the tremor of impact as her sword slid through the body of the vrock. She opened her eyes to see the demon thrashing, impaled on the holy blade, and followed it as it collapsed to the ground, twisting the sword in the vicious wound. For the demon, already injured by her earlier attacks, it was enough, and in moments it had dissolved into greasy black smoke.

She turned just in time to hear the blasphemy uttered by the morkoth. She was outside of the radius of the effect, and so she felt it as a vague dissonance, like a scream in the distance that one isn't quite able to sort out from background noise. But seeing the effect upon her comrades, she realized instantly what had happened.

Even as the morkoth flapped down to the soaked cobbles of the street, she was charging. Her boots splashed in puddles that steamed hot wisps of noxious volcanic gasses. Her head was starting to swim, the toxic fumes from the lake searing her lungs. The vrock spores had sprouted tendrils of ugly fibrous growth that showed through the gaps of her armor like long hairs, their pain persisting as they continued to burrow deeper into her flesh. She had healing at her call, but there was no time for that now as she saw the demon stand over the prone form of Arun, prepared to end his life.

“AAAAAAAAAARRRRRRHHHHHH!” she screamed, channeling her pain into an inchoate cry of rage and battle as she ran at the fiend. The morkoth turned and lifted the claw still clutching the wand, firing a lightning bolt that knifed into her chest. She made no effort to dodge the blast, just took it, letting the pain purge her, fueling her with a wave of righteous fury as she slammed into the morkoth, smiting it with the holy power of Helm. The backlash from its unholy aura slammed into her, and she felt her strength draining from her body, but the blow had nonetheless been telling, and the morkoth staggered backward, black blood oozing from a great cleft in its torso.

The energy of her charge spent, Beorna was open to a counterattack from the morkoth. But the fiend, now seriously injured, was feeling the growing surge of need. Its lungs could not breathe air, and although the boiling lake promised pain, it was currently the only alternative to slow asphyxiation.

Beorna quickly recovered and rushed at it again, but a few strong beats of its wings were enough to carry it out over the surging waters, out of her reach. With a final ugly sound it dove into the lake, which swallowed it with a huge splash.

Beorna did not waste time watching it. She knelt by Arun, and felt a surge of relief when she saw that he was merely stunned, and that he still drew breath. His eyes were vacant, but she knew that to be an aftereffect of the spell, and that he would soon recover. His skin was tight and cracked, and runnels of blood ran down his face from where his lips had split, results of the horrid wilting. Beorna channeled a powerful stream of healing energy into him, carefully positioning him so that he would not be washed over by the nearby waters, before turning to where Hodge lay a few feet away.

Even though she'd half expected it, it still pained her when she knelt to examine the dwarf.

Hodge was dead.

A loud noise drew her attention up, and she saw the morkoth erupt once more from the lake, rising swiftly into the air on powerful beats of its wings.

Chapter 337

Beorna's lips twisted into a snarl as she reached for her holy sword. But the morkoth did not fly immediately toward her, instead working for more altitude, rising until its unnatural form was obscured behind the rising tendrils of steam and volcanic gasses rising off of the lake.

"What... happening..." Arun's voice came from behind her, thick with effort as the paladin tried to fight off the paralysis.

Beorna didn't respond, alert to another assault, or some kind of trick, on the part of the fiend. It looked like the creature was in genuine retreat, however, and when she could no longer see it, she moved to help Arun back to his feet. Her own pain, largely forgotten in the rush of battle, had returned, and she paused to infuse herself with a cure critical wounds.

"We've got to find Dannel and Mole," Beorna said. Arun's eyes showed the obvious question, glancing at Hodge, and Beorna shook her head.

"The living, first," Beorna said, and Arun nodded. Another tremor, relatively faint this time, shook the volcano, and steaming water surged out over the avenue, almost to where they stood. "First, we've got to get out of this place, to higher ground. And then, we still have work to do."

* * * * *

The morkoth seethed with pain and anger as it rose high above the city. From above, the place truly looked like a chaotic hellscape, with dozens of fires burning across the city, and ruined buildings toppled over into the once-clear avenues. Tiny dots of motion were everywhere amidst the destruction below, as the panicked inhabitants of the doomed city ran for their lives, seeking escape.

A familiar need presented itself; there was no time to dally and enjoy the scenery. The morkoth had spent decades living in the sunless depths far beneath the surface of the crater lake, exploring tunnels and delving passages that no Cauldronite even suspected existed. It knew, in a vague sense, that rivers emerged from the mountains, and that there had to be other bodies of water not far from the volcano, where it could take shelter, recover its strength, and bide its time.

A brilliant light from above interrupted its musings, and it raised a clawed limb to shield its eyes from the painful radiance. It was not the golden orb of the sun, safely obscured behind the infernal clouds that hung over the city, but a moving object, drawing closer. As it drew nearer, the morkoth could see that it was a winged human—or at least appeared to be, for as it approached the half-fiend could sense the otherworldly nature of the thing, like it a creature that was not native to this prime material plane.

The morkoth shrieked a challenge, although at the moment it would have preferred nothing more than a quick retreat from this confrontation.

“You called me, by the unholy utterance that violated this place,” the winged creature—a female—said. Her voice itself was painful, a clarion and pure sigil that contrasted strongly with the roiling chaos that surrounded them.

The morkoth’s response was an unholy blight that, unsurprisingly, did little to hinder the celestial, who erupted from the chaos storm with a blazing sword held high above her in both slender hands.

“Return to the abyss from which you were spawned, fiend!” the deva cried. The morkoth dove, trying to avoid the charge, but the celestial was too swift. The last thing it felt was a sharp pain between its shoulder blades, and then it was falling, plummeting down into the waiting embrace of the shattered city below.

* * * * *

“Did you see that?” Mole asked, pointing behind them, back toward the lake. “Something falling...”

“Just find us a way up to the next street!” Arun said, coughing. He and Beorna were carrying Hodge’s body between them, using a crude stretcher fashioned from the remains of the wagon below. There had not been time to remove his armor, with the lake splashing at their heels as they retreated, and Arun had insisted on bringing the slain dwarf’s magical axe, despite the added weight. Dannel, even without such a burden, was barely able to keep up with them, the elf pale and wan despite the healing potions that had been poured into him. All of them were suffering from the smoke and the fumes from the lake, and every few steps were an effort.

The lower parts of the city seemed almost deserted, now. The wreckage of ruined buildings, overcome by the continuing tremors, were evident everywhere, spilling out to block alleyways and even some of the main avenues. Plumes of smoke rose across the city, ascending to join with the roiling tumult of the unnatural clouds hanging overhead.

Mole found them a steeply sloping route up to Ash Avenue that was nearly clear of debris, only an overturned wagon offering some difficulty before the dwarves were able to push it aside enough for them all to pass by. As they emerged onto the boulevard, the sounds of the city’s chaos hit them again in full force, although the immediate area around them was free of pedestrians. A black horse bolted down the street past them, trailing its leads, lost in panic as it galloped aimlessly down the street.

“Rest... a moment...” Arun said, all but dropping the stretcher to the hard cobbles, Hodge’s armored body clattering loudly against the stones of the street. Beorna was little better off, although her face was a mask of stoicism, and Dannel simply fell where he stood, sucking in breaths in between bouts of coughing. Only Mole seemed mostly intact, her innate toughness belied by her lithe form.

“It looks like most got out, at least at this level of the city,” Beorna said. None of them commented on the bodies they’d seen on Lava Avenue, or the many ruined buildings that might have held living beings when the tremors had claimed them.

“I wish we’d been able to save those animals,” Mole said.

“If we can get the people out, it’ll be a worthy accomplishment,” Arun said.

“So... what will we...” Dannel began.

He was cut off as Mole pointed upward, and shouted a warning. “Look!” she cried, before she vanished, shrouded in invisibility.

They could all see it this time, a bright point of light descending from the skies above, clearly visible through all of the smoke and haze. It was coming right toward them, getting brighter the closer it got.

“Looks like we’re not done yet,” Beorna said, exhausted, pulling herself to her feet, her holy sword sliding from its scabbard.

Chapter 338

The companions rose wearily, preparing themselves for yet another confrontation. But this time, for once, their wariness proved unnecessary, as became evident once the light drew close enough for them to clearly discern its source. Arun recognized her immediately, for the newcomer had made a powerful impact upon him at their first meetings, in the jungles near the Demonskar.

“Nidrama!” he exclaimed.

The deva drifted down on wings spread to catch the air, but even as she reached the ground her bare feet drifted a few inches above the stones of the street. Despite the ash and soot choking the air, her white gown was pristine, and ruffled slightly as if trammelled by a soft breeze.

“I bid you greeting, heroes,” she said. “It is good to see you once more. And you, templar.”

“Celestial,” Beorna said simply, with a nod. “We are quite busy, as you’ve no doubt noticed. What is the purpose of your visitation?”

Ignoring the dwarf’s brusque manner, Nidrama said, “The hour of travail has come upon Cauldron... but this you know, that I can see plainly in your eyes. Your foes seek to open a permanent gateway...”

“Yes, we know, Carceri, Shackleborn, Cagewrights, all that,” the templar interjected. “We were in the midst of helping to evacuate the city, when that... thing appeared.”

“You have done well, for despite the destruction wrought here by the agents of Evil, there are many who yet live through your direct actions.”

“There is still much to be done. Divine agent, what we truly lack is knowledge. Can you tell us where the stronghold of the Cagewrights is located?”

The celestial frowned, and with that change in her expression it seemed as though the light shining from around her dimmed somewhat. “They cloak their activities through dark magics and the blessing of foul gods,” she said. “I am limited in what I can do...”

“I understand the nature of the Compact,” Beorna said. “That comes as no surprise.”

Nidrama seemed to bristle at Beorna’s tone. “Matters are not so simple as you would imagine, templar of Helm,” she said. “Cauldron has become a focal point, and there is a danger of a cascade opening here, a rift that would transform the city into a nodus of the eternal struggle between Dark and Light. Would you have your world so riven?”

“It looks like they’re going to do it regardless,” Dannel said, adding his first words to the conversation. “Unless we stop them.”

“Yes,” the deva said, and there was an odd inflection to her voice. “Unless we stop them.”

“Holy One,” Arun said, wiping his brow of layered soot as he came forward. “I would ask one boon...” He gestured to where Hodge lay motionless in the street. “He gave his life, again, fighting against evil. Is there something that can be done?”

Nidrama turned away from Beorna and Dannel, and as her eyes fixed on the slain warrior, her expression deepened into a look of sadness and sympathy. “Brave warrior,” she said, stepping forward upon what seemed to be an invisible cushion of air. “Once again you have answered the call, ignoring the cost.” She bent low, reaching down to touch the dwarf on the forehead. The touch was ephemeral; even as her fingers appeared to contact the greasy, soot-stained brow of the dwarf she was drawing back, making the connection seem an illusion. But where the fingers had appeared to brush his grayed skin there was now a patch of brightness, a point of light that dimmed slowly, spreading inward through his body. As the companions watched in amazement, the dwarf’s body stirred, and then a loud cough racked Hodge’s supine frame.

“Blast,” the dwarf said, pulling himself up. “Bloody blazing bastards...”

Looking up, he saw the deva hovering over him, a faint smile on her face. “Um... beggin’ yer pardon, lady,” he said, his eyes wide.

“Welcome back, Hodge,” Mole said, her own eyes glimmering slightly.

Beorna knelt beside the warrior, who was still grievously injured, and channeled positive healing energy into him until he could stand, if with assistance.

“We are in your debt, Holy One,” Arun said.

“My act is but one small weight on the balance,” Nidrama replied. “I fear that it will be upon your shoulders that the final burden falls.”

“Well, we’d better get to saving the rest of the city,” Beorna said, allowing Hodge to stand on his own, once it became clear that he could do so.

“Jenya Urikas waits for you by the western gate of the city,” Nidrama said, rising slowly into the air, until she hovered a good two paces above the street. “It may be that she may find the answers that you seek.”

“Nidrama, wait,” Dannel said, stepping forward to face the celestial. “Zenna...”

The deva’s white eyes shone with a deep expression of pity. “I fear that she is lost to the light, Dannel. For in the opening of this lock, the keys are consumed.”

“No, it cannot be...”

“Do not give up hope, for in the end, nothing is truly impossible. Remember that, and may the Light shine upon your steps.”

She brandished her sword, the flames along its length forming a brilliant arc in the air before her as she rose up into the air, her wings beating back the polluted air, the light shining around her forming an envelope of purity within a scene of darkness. It looked as though that light would pierce the shroud forever, but in reality it was just a few moments before she was gone from view.

“I wonder where it is that they go, when they make those dramatic exits,” Mole said.

“Are you all right, friend?” Arun asked, clasping Hodge’s shoulder.

“A bit weak,” the dwarf admitted. He’d drawn out his jug and uncorked it, but when he looked inside his expression darkened. He held it upside down, but not even a drop emerged from the empty container. “Damn and double damn,” he said.

“We should make for the west gate, then,” Dannel said.

“I don’t think we’re done yet,” Beorna said again, sliding her sword back into its sheath. The brief encounter seemed to have reenergized her, and her usual determination shone in her face as she turned to face the others.

“Let’s get going.”

Chapter 339

The giant eagle knifed through the skies over Cauldron, darting effortlessly across the thermals that rose from the ravaged city, but giving the swirling amber clouds a wide berth as it descended toward the core of the volcano. For a moment the eagle saw something flash in the sky above it, then had to bank hastily to avoid a large, ungainly form that plummeted from the sky into the chaos below.

*What in the hells was that, Shensen thought, not sure that she believed what her eyes had just showed her. Of course, given what was happening in the city, odd sightings were to be expected. At least whatever it was had been falling, and its wings hadn't been flapping, so gravity would likely handle the matter.

The druid had been spending the last few days at the Lucky Monkey, present to reconsecrate the small shrine to Shaundakul located within the roadhouse. The place had been restored to full operation for some time now, but she'd postponed that duty for several months. The Monkey still held some unpleasant memories for her, ones that were not easily banished.

She'd been there when the tremors had started in earnest. Movements of the earth were not uncommon in the Alamirs, especially with the number of semi-active volcanoes in the region, but Shensen had quickly sensed that these disturbances were not natural. She'd left Bristle in the jungle near the roadhouse (with careful instructions not to molest its patrons), and began the journey back to the city. The tremors had quickly grown in intensity, and the odd clouds gathering above the volcanic peak where the city was perched were clearly not natural, so she'd taken the form she now wore, and hastened her return.

She'd stopped first at the Temple of Helm, seeking information, and the adventurers with whom she'd battled the evil forces threatening the region before. The compound was strangely deserted, but even a casual glance at the street outside was enough to tell her that the city was in its death throes, its citizens fleeing toward the gates that offered escape.

The druid's eyes narrowed, and she took to the air once more, heading for the lake.

Her vision, enhanced in her borrowed form, was of little avail given the amount of smoke, steam, and haze that blanketed the city. After dodging the falling morkoth, she swept down to the lake. Her druidic resistances helped her against the noxious effects of the volcanic gases rising from the boiling lake, but being here was still far from pleasant. She saw that her grove was completely immersed, and as she detected the cries of desperate animals she let out a screech and dove toward the livery stables, completely surrounded by the raging waters that had by now completely claimed Lava Avenue. Hot geysers erupted from numerous points across the roiling surface of the once-calm waters as volcanic gases burst up to the surface from below, and Shensen knew that a full eruption, if not imminent, was at least a strong possibility.

She landed smoothly on the edge of the roof of the stables. She'd mastered the ability of casting spells in her animal form, so it was a mere matter of an avian screech to draw upon the natural power to pull back the waters before the building, forming a channel that stretched from the front doors to the mouth of the alley opposite the stables on the far side of the street, a steep rise that offered a difficult but passable access to Ash Avenue above.

She offered another cry, this time focusing her power on the doors of the stables. The wood had been warped by the superheated waters, but at her command they buckled and tore free of their hinges, falling forward out into the street with a loud crash. The cries of injured animals greeted her, and she dropped off the roof, spreading her wings to drift down to the soaked floor below. When she landed, her body already shifting back to its natural form, she was already calling upon her magical powers once more, empowering herself to speak with animals, and then sending out a wave of soothing energy to calm the panicked creatures, left trapped in their stalls and pens, several already seriously burned by the waters that had penetrated the structure.

A minute later, a column of animals charged out of the stables, led by a white stallion bearing the druid Shensen Tesseril upon its back. Later, a number of the numbed survivors of the city would comment upon the strange procession that they saw rushing through the city streets, led by the black-skinned woman with the long white hair billowing out behind her, riding bareback upon a great white horse.

But there were other wonders, amidst the tales of suffering and destruction from that day, that would become part of the lore of the people of Cauldron. One tale that was often repeated was a report of a tall, winged man, clad in robes of shining silver and bearing a huge silver trumpet. Most of the stories regarding this uncanny apparition involved it swooping down from the skies to rescue someone in dire need, from a trio of citizens that had gotten stranded on a thin crust of hardened lava, to an elderly man and his wife trapped within a burning home. His touch closed wounds and mended broken bones, according to multiple reports. According to all of the stories, the winged man did not bother to speak nor did he linger, leaping back into the tumultuous skies over the city once the endangered townsfolk had been placed in a more secure location.

One other group caught at least a quick glimpse of this mysterious figure. The adventurers known as the Heroes of Cauldron made their way slowly toward the northern gates of the city, lending their aid where it was still needed, drawing upon reserves of strength to keep going. Most of those who could get to the gates easily had done so, and those remaining tended to fall into the categories of either the infirm or injured, or the foolishly stubborn. The former the companions aided, when they could, and the latter they tried to convince, but more often were forced to leave to their own devices.

The tremors shaking the city had redoubled in intensity, and now a pall hung over the city as great plumes of smoke and volcanic ash rose up to join the dark nexus of clouds that continued to swell overhead. Great rifts, billowing forth gouts of flame and noxious gasses, were now frequently visible in the pavement of the avenues, some so wide that they forced the party to make wide detours to get safely around them.

As they were making their way down Magma Avenue, drawing near to the mercantile district that surrounded the Town Hall and its broad public square, a streak of light and a vicious cry drew their attention skyward. Two forms flew overhead, only visible for a few heartbeats, appearing above the rooftops and streaking across the street to vanish above the buildings on the far side. The lead figure, a bloated demodand similar to the one they'd battled in Karran-Kural, was being chased by the second, a winged man in silver robes carrying a massive silver greatsword shining with brilliant light. They were there and gone before Dannel could even lift his bow.

"What was that?" Hodge asked.

"A trumpet archon," Beorna said. "That's Jenya's work, no doubt. She was supposed to summon protection for herself," the dwarf added in an undertone.

"That other was a demodand," Dannel added. "The barrier between worlds must be growing weaker."

"Come on," Arun said. "We cannot join that battle, but there's no shortage of threats in this place."

"How much longer until the volcano erupts?" Mole asked.

"It could be hours, or days, or tendays," Arun said. "If this were a normal geologic happening, I would think that the venting that we're seeing now would ease the pressure beneath the earth, but this..." He didn't have to finish; they all knew that the Cagewrights' dark plots were behind the waking volcano, and the energies being released here could unleash an uncontrollable surge of destruction at any time.

"Careful," Dannel said, gesturing up ahead.

They slowed as they came upon an ugly form splayed out across the street. The familiar stench of a farastu demodand identified it even before they got a good look at its remains. The cause of its death was instantly evident from the cracks in the pavement around its body, and the obvious impact damage wrought upon its body.

"The gate must be opening above," Dannel said, looking up at the vortex in the sky above them.

"At least these ones don't have wings," Arun said, moving to skirt it.

"Um... guys?" Mole said, drawing their attention to the near side of the street, where a damaged storefront stood. At first glance it looked as though the place had been devastated by one of the tremors, but as they studied it they could see that most of the building was still intact, with most of the damage centered around a caved-in section of the roof facing the street. The windows of the building had all shattered, and the interior was dark, but there was enough light to reveal shifting movement. Sounds drifted out into the street, the crunch of glass, accompanied by a clatter of falling pottery and other, even less pleasant sounds that clearly weren't natural in origin.

"Looks like we got a live one," Beorna said, drawing her holy sword. "This won't take but a moment." Her stance betrayed her eagerness to be on the giving side of things for a change.

"We've got bigger problems," Dannel said, his eyes still on the skies above. As they looked up, they could see ochre flashes from within the streaked morass of gray and yellow clouds above. From those flashes, dark things plummeted downward; more demodands. A few, their bloated bodies identifying them as kelubars even from this distance, drifted down on their stubby wings, while the hapless farastus simply fell, crashing into various parts of the city.

"It's beginning," Arun said, his voice grim.

Chapter 340

The sounds from within the ruined shop grew louder, drawing their attention back to earth. But a few moments later one of the plummeting demodands impacted the roof of a three-story structure less than a block up the avenue, sliding off to land painfully on a smaller shed attached to the side of the building. Its landing crushed the small structure, but the fall clearly hadn't killed it, from the way that the wreckage started shifting violently a few moments later.

"Go ahead," Beorna said to Arun. "I'll finish this one off," she said, indicating the building in front of them, "and catch up to you."

But even as they spoke, fresh screams became audible just behind them, their source revealed as several panicked townsfolk appeared at the mouth of one of the side-streets that connected Ash and Magma Avenues. One of them caught sight of the adventurers, and screamed, "Fiends! Fiends! They're everywhere!"

"On second thought, perhaps we'd better stay together," Dannel said.

"Over here!" Arun said, already moving to help the frightened townsfolk. More were still coming onto the broader avenue from the side-street, but as the last appeared, an older woman of maybe sixty years, hobbling painfully with obvious difficulty, a pair of farastus exploded into view behind her, reaching for her with their sludge-covered claws. Arun yelled a battle cry and rushed at them in a full charge, but he could not reach the woman in time. Dannel sent an arrow flying into the first, but its infernal resistances protected it from injury. The old woman screamed as the demodand bore her down, tearing her torso open with tearing gashes of its claws, splaying her lifeblood across the street in a miasma of gore.

The sight drove Arun into a fury, and he rushed into the farastu with sword raised, smiting it with a powerful downward stroke. The demodand was already injured from its fall into Cauldron from the vortex above, and Arun's holy blade bit deep, driving it to its knees. But its companion was quick to leap upon Arun from the flank, tearing at him with its claws and bite. One claw dug through his armor, inflicting a painful but largely superficial wound upon the paladin. Arun found himself in difficulty, his sword stuck to his dying foe by the tenacious grip of the farastu's slimy coating. But Hodge rushed to his friend's aid, distracting the second farastu with a sweep of his burning axe.

Even as the demodands had appeared, assaulting the helpless woman, the damaged front doors of the adjacent storefront had erupted outward, disgorging the farastu that had fallen within. The creature was a mess, covered with glass, pottery, and other debris that had clung to its adhesive slime, but that did not hinder its fury as it staggered toward Beorna. The templar lifted her sword and shouted an invocation to Helm, but before she could strike the farastu gestured and blasted a ray of enfeeblement into her chest. Grimacing as her already-depleted strength was further drained, she nonetheless rushed at the demodand, sweeping at its body in a broad cut intended to separate the upper half of its body from the lower. Weakened as she was, the blow merely knocked it sideways and did some miscellaneous damage to its innards; not enough to stop it.

The remaining townsfolk, driven to panic by the fear power of the demodands, rushed blindly past the companions, seeking safety. Mole dodged out of the way of an overweight teamster, and turned to glance up the block where the last demodand—of this batch, anyway—had fallen into the shed. The wreckage of the shed was clearly visible, but there was no sign of the fiend. Her face deepened into a frown—what remained of the shed didn't look like enough to conceal the bulk of a farastu.

“Dannel, I think there's one invisible behind us,” she said, moving to the side of the street to get a better view as the fleeing citizens obscured her line of sight to the shed.

The elf turned even as screams erupted at the leading edge of the fleeing mass of townsfolk, confirming Mole's suspicions. The gnome had already disappeared, so Dannel grimaced and slid his bow back into the magical space within his quiver, drawing out Alakast as he ran at the backs of the terrified citizens of the stricken city.

Arun braced his boot against the face of the crippled demodand he'd struck down, yanking his sword free of its sludge-encrusted body through simple strength and will. The second demodand had turned on Hodge, and laid into him with violent bashes of its slender, clawed hands. The dwarf replied with a powerful stroke of his axe, but the weapon, lacking the holy empowerment of Arun and Beorna's swords, merely grazed its leathery hide.

Arun's attack, however, encountered no such difficulty, and his sword clove through the fiend with alacrity, finally coming to a halt as it lodged in its spine. The demodand staggered back, drawing Arun and his sword with it. Too late it attempted escape, turning itself invisible even as Arun, still grasping his sword, yanked the weapon loose and ripped it out from the farastu's body, laying open half of its torso as he did so. A spray of blood and guts revealing its position clearly, the demodand collapsed to the paving stones, gasping out the last of its pathetic existence.

It took Beorna's opponent a moment to recover from the glancing but painful blow she'd landed in its side, and she used that respite to call upon the divine strength of Helm, offsetting to some degree the losses she'd suffered earlier. Thus reinforced, she was able to withstand a furious assault as the demodand leapt at her, clawing and biting. One claw clipped her painfully on the side of the head, although her helmet protected her from serious damage. She tried to run it through but fumbled her weapon, the sword dislodged from her grasp as the demodand seized at her arms, trying to pin her. In her currently weakened state, she found it difficult to break the attempted hold, and had to spend all of her effort to avoid being firmly grappled, placed at the fiend's mercy. This close, its breath was a noxious plume, and its sticky layers of exuded slime clung to her armor, impeding her movements. Fortunately, her own innate toughness and the excellent protection offered by her armor made it difficult for the demodand to really hurt her, and it too seemed to grow frustrated as its victim continued to defy its efforts. Beorna's legs were like tree trunks rooted in the street as the farastu clung to her body, trying to find a vulnerability in this determined enemy. Meanwhile, Beorna struggled in its grasp, bending as her hand stretched slowly but inexorably toward the hilt of the brightly glowing sword at her feet.

A woman screamed as a demodand materialized from thin air in front of her in the middle of the street. It seemed to cackle in glee as it lashed out with its claws, knocking the woman off her feet with a terrible gash to the face, and sending a gnome merchant flying with an impact that left him dazed and bleeding. The panicked townsfolk drew back in horror, just trying to get away from the terrible creature, which reached out for a teenaged girl whose scream shook the very stones with its intensity. But before the fiend could grasp its latest foe, a slender elf leapt between it and its victim. This adversary was clearly no easy prey, although the farastu laughed at the stick that the elf waved at him threateningly.

It wasn't laughing a moment later, as Alakast slammed into its chest.

Roaring in pain, the demodand leapt at the elf, trying to tear that fearsome weapon from its enemy's grasp. But the elf was fast, pulling the staff out of its reach before it could close its claws around the polished shaft. With a sneer the farastu shifted its efforts to the elf's face, but before it could strike a fierce and terrible pain exploded through its lower body from behind. It never even saw the source of the attack, for the elf shifted his stance and drove the staff into it once more, and the fiend's world exploded in a white web of agony as the outsider-bane weapon sent a hot lance of power through its skull into its brain.

The farastu loosened its grim incrementally as Beorna drove a mailed fist into its face. The creature snapped at her with its huge maw, intending to take her entire head, helm at all, into that fetid gap. The templar did not try to avoid the attack, for even as its jaws clamped down across her helmet, her probing fingers tightened around the hilt of her sword.

But before she could strike, she felt a shuddering impact through the body of the fiend, which screamed as it was torn from her. Her helmet, still locked in its jaws, was ripped from her head, and she could see Arun and Hodge hacking at it as though it were a stubborn tree under assault by a pair of fanatical lumberjacks. The farastu had no chance, choking on its adamantite prize even as the dwarves drove it to the paving stones in a gory mess of rent flesh and steaming ichor.

Ignoring the stinging pains that her enemy had left at various points across her body, Beorna walked over to the slain demodand. Arun had already turned toward the last of the four fiends, but it seemed that Dannel and Mole had handled it and were now assisting the terrified survivors.

Hodge bent to help her recover her helmet from the slain demodand's jaws, but she shrugged him off, a bit too roughly, perhaps. The defender shrugged and drew back, hefting his axe as he looked about for more adversaries.

"Are you all right?" Arun asked.

"I had it handled," Beorna said, shamed as a wave of weakness overcame her. Her limbs felt leaden under her heavy armor, and she could not work her helmet free from the locked jaws of the dead fiend.

"I know you did," the paladin replied, "But we were there, and the fiend was focused upon you, and did not see us approach. Would you have had us simply watch, while you defeated it?"

"You could have helped the others against the last creature," she replied, finally drawing back and giving the farastu's head a frustrated kick.

"I'd cut its jaws open," Hodge suggested. "Once a giant lizard took one o' me pack mules, was the same thing. Hadda just 'bout carve the thing open to get me best sifting pan back from that beast."

Beorna shot the other dwarf a venomous look, but Arun continued, "Look, we're all tired, and worn out." He placed a hand on her shoulder. "You're the one who told me that even people like us need someone else every now and again, right? We're part of a team, here; we've got to stay together if we're going to get out of this city alive."

Beorna took a deep breath and nodded. "I apologize, Hodge," she said. "I am not accustomed to... needing... help."

"No problem," the dwarf said. To be helpful, he knelt and went at the farastu's head with his dagger, finally producing Beorna's slime- and blood-encrusted helmet, which he offered with a grin.

She took a moment to clean off the worst of the encrusted filth before settling the helmet back on her head. As she did so, Mole and Dannel came over to the three dwarves. Behind them the survivors of the latest attack huddled in a mass in the center of the street.

"We're getting close to the square in front of the town hall," the elf said. "From there it's pretty much a straight shot down Obsidian to the west gate. We've calmed down the remaining townsfolk, and I've treated those with serious wounds. But we'd better get going."

Beorna adjusted the helmet to its proper place, then nodded. From within the cavernous interior of the adamantine shroud, her voice was hollow and deep.

"I am ready."

Chapter 341

The streets of the city were nearly deserted as the company made its way steadily higher toward the massive black walls encircling the city. Still, they managed to locate several other desperate souls as they made their way closer to the west gate, until they had nearly two score ragged survivors trailing behind them as they turned onto the final rising avenue that ascended from Obsidian Avenue toward the walls and the compact square where one of four exits from the city was situated. The companions were quite familiar with this gate, for it was the one through which Zenna and Mole had entered the city, just over a year ago, and which they had used in their journey to the Lucky Monkey, in a time when their problems seemed easy and straightforward in comparison to now.

Then, they'd only had evil cults, floods, and a were-baboon barbarian to deal with.

As they made their way closer to the gate, they could see that the square ahead was occupied, and in fact cluttered with people. A humble, almost pathetic statue decorated the square; the likeness of an armored man cast in bronze, his specific identity worn away by centuries of the elements, the plaque that had once marked his plinth stolen before most of the current residents of Cauldron had been born. But the statue still served as a gathering point, and as the companions drew nearer they could make out the familiar form of Jenya Urikas standing on the edge of the platform, the bronze warrior looming protectively behind her. She was surrounded by a number of people in the uniform of the Watch, and a smattering of Arun's Hammers, their blue tunics stained by blood and soot. Around the authorities mingled a much larger crowd of uncertain residents of the city, surrounded by barely-controlled mules and horses, carts, wagons, and containers of every sort, holding what possessions the city's residents had been able to preserve from the cataclysm gripping Cauldron.

As they reached the square, they directed their charges to join the crowd, and started making their way toward Jenya. The High Priestess looked wan and tired, as if the hours since the first quake had stolen decades from her, leaving her old and frail. But the spark of determination that shone in her persisted still, and they could hear her voice over the din of the crowd, issuing orders that the people, if confused and reluctant, nevertheless appeared to be following. The gates were open, and slowly the living contents of the square were drifting through them, to the long road that led down from the mountain to the lowland forests and safety.

Jenya saw them before they drew near enough to hail her, and some of the tension gripping her seemed to lift as she waved them over. That gesture seemed enough to help part the crowd, or perhaps it was the looks on the faces of the adventurers. As they reached the stone plinth, the High Priestess issued a few more orders to the nearby Watch officers, who saluted and headed out into the crowd. Then she bent and reached down, letting a pair of acolytes help her to the ground at the foot of the pedestal.

"I'm glad you're all well," Jenya said. "With all that's happened..." She trailed off, and it was clear that she'd seen her own share of pain and suffering, since they'd parted at the Temple of Helm.

"We saw the archon," Arun said. "You Called it?"

Jenya nodded. "I gave him the Star of Justice, in exchange for his aid." At Beorna's surprised look, she added, "The Compact requires an exchange, and while I intended to merely summon a protector, as you required, templar... the portal had begun to open, and I could not just let fiends wander the city at will, slaying its citizens. We needed time, and the loss of the artifact is a small price to pay for the lives saved."

“Speaking of fiends, we ran into a few,” Mole pointed out.

“The portal is not yet fully open, but within hours, Cauldron may become a gate-town, a permanent link between Carceri and Faerûn.”

“What can we do to stop it?” Arun asked.

Jenya looked at him with eyes that shone dully. “I do not know that it can be stopped, at this point.”

For a moment, no one spoke, and despite the tumult around them, it was as if a sudden quiet had fallen over the world.

“The evacuation,” Beorna finally said. “What happens to the survivors?”

Jenya shook her head, as if the templar’s words had shaken her from a reverie. “We are focusing the evacuation to the west and south; it would be foolish to try to bring columns of refugees across the Alamirs at this time of year.”

“Especially with demons crawlin’ all o’er the place,” Hodge grumbled softly.

“Skellerang and Tristane are leading a column south to Redgorge,” Jenya went on. “This group we’ll take to the Lucky Monkey; I’ve already sent riders ahead to begin preparing clearings for a temporary camp. Other smaller groups have set out on the lesser trails, but we’re going to try to get everyone gathered at one of those two points. Messages have also been sent to Almraiven, and to the Temple of Eternal Vigilance in Tethyr. Our enemies may be ascendant, but we will not meekly surrender our realm to their foul scheme!”

“No, we will not,” Arun said, his words like cold iron. “And I, for one, have a few matters to resolve with the Cagewrights.”

Suddenly, loud screams sounded from the crowd outside, from beyond the gates. The companions instantly grasped their weapons, alert for signs of danger. Arun actually started toward the gate, but a wall of confused and panicked people and animals stood in his way.

“What now?” Dannel asked.

In answer, a dark shadow passed over the square. A terrible and familiar wave of sensation rushed over them. Throughout the open space, already scared people cowered in abject terror as the ancient power of the shadow’s owner spread its fell influence, borne above them on spread wings.

It was a dragon, its scarlet hide shining bright in the dull red glow that issued from the stricken city. It swept low over the wall, barely clearing the empty battlements above, a rush of smoke and ash blasting in its wake, creating an artificial wind that tugged the garments of the terrified people below. Gliding on wings that might have enfolded an entire house in their membranous sweep, it slid north over the city, toward the town hall. There, its wings spread to catch the air, and it slowed to grasp the slender spire that rose from the dome of the great structure in its huge claws.

The people of Cauldron had seen terrors this day, but nothing compared to the sight of the great dragon Hookface, a monstrosity out of legend, perched on the summit of the town hall, a great plume of fire erupted from its draconic jaws to scorch the sky, laying claim to the wreckage of the city.

Chapter 342

The dragon launched itself from the cupola, sweeping out over the city in a slow, lazy arc, barely over the level of the rooftops. It drifted in and out of view as it cut through the haze of smoke rising over the city, and it almost appeared to be...

“Looking for something,” Dannel said, his keen eyes fixed on the massive creature.

“Us, likely,” Hodge grunted.

“What makes you say that?” Mole asked.

“Ha’ ye forgotten our record with drakes?” the dwarf railed. “By Clangeddin’s puckered buttocks, this one’s prolly the sire... or gran’sire, o’ the baby red we killed at that crazy bastard’s hut up in the mountains!”

Mole looked thoughtful. “Oh, yeah, that one.”

Jenya turned from where she’d been issuing curt commands to those members of the Watch and the Hammers that were still present. The square had been transformed into a sea of chaos, with people now dropping all of the possessions they’d hoarded earlier, rushing for the gate in a press. A few leaders were trying to maintain order, but even at this distance, all of the companions could feel the familiar tinge of dragonfear.

“This will get worse,” Jenya said. “If that dragon decides to attack the refugees, there will be a slaughter. We cannot stand against a red of that size...”

“We’ll take care of it,” Beorna said. Amazingly, she appeared calm, her face hard like chiseled stone.

“Templar...”

“Go, the people need you. Without your presence, the flight will become a rout, and more will die in the panic.”

A loud roar and a crash sounded out over the city. The companions readied their weapons, but the sounds seemed a good distance off, and after a few seconds they turned back to Jenya.

“Probably looting the city,” Mole observed, with the air of a lecturer speaking to students. “Reds are greedy bastards.”

“Well, unless any of you can sprout wings, we’ll need to draw its attention,” Beorna said, unlimbering her rarely-used bow.

“I believe I can handle that,” Dannel said, drawing out his own longbow from his magical quiver.

“Yer all insane,” Hodge said. “That ain’t no piddlin’ wyrmling yer wantin’ to pick a fight with! That there drake’s a fully-grown adult wyrm! Why, them things snack on giants fer breakfast! Yer all stark, blasted, raving...”

“Hodge,” Arun interrupted, without turning; he was preparing his own bow. His string had been broken during their encounters in the city, so Dannel gave him one of his spares. “Go with Jenya; she’ll need your help with the refugees.”

“Go stuff yerself.”

The paladin looked up. “Excuse me?”

“Ah, sorry. I mean, go stuff yerself, most holy champion o’ Moradin.” With an angry shake of his head, Hodge unlimbered his heavy crossbow and winch, and began loading the weapon, a more or less constant stream of muted curses accompanying every stage in the process.

Arun glanced over at Beorna, whose face cracked into a hint of a smile.

“He’s right, though,” Dannel said softly. “This one won’t be easy.”

Arun sighed. “They never are, not with us.”

Jenya had taken a scroll from one of her acolytes, and was reading from it in a steady cadence of magical syllables. Each of the companions in turn felt a tingle as a protective ward settled around them, and the High Priestess did not stop until all of the magical writings on the scroll had faded. She then laid a blessing upon them, followed by a healing spell that sent a surge of positive energy through them.

“I’m sorry, that is the best that I can offer,” she said, as the effects of the mass cure moderate wounds spell faded. “Almost all of my divine spells are depleted, and I doubt that there will be many chances to pray in the next few days.”

“Thank you, High Priestess,” Beorna said, bowing deeply in respect, her armor clanking noisily about her at the awkward movement. It was an odd moment, the six of them standing there in the midst of a sea of chaos, taking a few precious seconds for another leavetaking.

“We’ll join you at the Monkey, if we’re able,” Arun said, testing the new string on his bow. Jenya nodded, but did not respond. The companions shared a look, and then started back down the now-deserted street behind them. Jenya only lingered for just a few seconds as the five heroes rushed down the street, then turned to join the last remnants of the flood of survivors pouring out of the city, hoping to find some sanctuary in the wilds beyond.

Chapter 343

The companions made their way swiftly down the connecting street that spilled out onto Obsidian Avenue. The city was strangely quiet, now, with most of its inhabitants having escaped to join the floods of refugees now streaming down the mountainside roads.

“How are we set for healing?” Arun asked, as they made their way to the end of the street, joining the main boulevard and heading toward the square in front of the town hall.

Despite her shorter stride, Mole’s magical boots allowed her to easily keep pace with the others, especially the heavily armored dwarves. “I have a few healing potions left,” she said. “The moderate-strength ones, I think.”

“Anyone else?” There was a grim silence punctuated by the tread of their boots upon the flat stones of the street. All of them knew what they were getting into. Arun shared out the last of the potions he’d bought from Weer the alchemist with Hodge and Beorna, downing the contents of the small vials as they ran to enhance their strength, endurance, and agility. Beorna in turn laid her hand upon the paladin’s shoulder, covertly placing a protective ward upon him that would hopefully spare him from the next assault he suffered.

That delay meant it was Dannel who first arrived in the great square that opened in front of the town hall. The place was a ruin now, with more than half of the buildings surrounding the square either collapsed or seriously damaged.

The elf turned as a loud noise echoed across the city, punctuated by a loud roar. Its source was visible an instant later as the dragon rose into view again, its massive wings beating the air as it lifted above the uneven line of rooftops, silhouetted against the plume still rising from the lake behind it. It had barely gained a hundred feet of clearance above the city skyline when it spread its wings and swept out over the city in what looked to be a resumption of its search, its dagger-shaped head scanning the streets below as it slid across Cauldron in a wide arc. At one point, it adjusted its course fractionally to avoid a farastu plummeting down into the volcano, but otherwise it seemed uninterested in the cataclysm gripping the town.

Dannel did not wait for the dragon to spot him. The song had filled him from the moment he’d first heard the dragon, and he as he tracked it with his eyes, a long arrow fitted to his longbow, he abruptly drew and aimed at an empty expanse of sky high above the city.

The elf had always been good with a bow, but in the last months his skills had advanced until he could rightly claim to be one of the foremost archers in the South. But with the song playing through him, binding him to the bow, he exceeded even his exceptional skills, and became one with the weapon.

The arrow... changed, as the song entered it, taking a part of the arcane archer and infusing his essence into the wood and feathers and steel. Every distraction faded into the background, and when Dannel finally released, it was as if the arrow sprung eagerly from the bow, ascending into the sky like a caged bird finally embracing its freedom.

Mole and the dwarves rushed into the square in time to see Dannel's arrow rise high into the air, and as it reached its apogee and began to arc downward, eight hundred feet from the bow that had released it, it intersected with the dragon.

The arrow had lost much of its force, with such an insanely long shot, and against a flying target it lacked the ability to recapture some of its momentum as it descended back to earth. Against the dragon's armored scales, the shot should have had no chance. But Dannel's song still resonated in the missile, and as it struck the dragon just below the left shoulder the phase arrow knifed into its body, sending a clear message in the form of a lancing spear of pain.

Hookface got the message, and the dragon banked toward the square, hatred burning in its eyes as it instantly spotted the archer standing in the open in the middle of the square.

Chapter 344

"Spread out, take cover!" Beorna yelled, rushing forward to a ruined storefront whose edge had collapsed into the square, offering at least a modicum of protection to an archer. As she ran, she called upon Helm, drawing her patron's divine power into her, letting it fill her with the bright glow of divine energy. Arun and Hodge went the other way, slipping out toward a line of overturned wagons that had been abandoned in front of the barracks compound of the Watch adjoining the town hall. Mole, of course, was nowhere to be seen.

Dannel did not move toward cover, remaining fully exposed as the dragon dove toward him, releasing arrow after arrow in a staccato rhythm. The dragon was clearly magically protected, wreathed in a pale nimbus of soft red light that it wore like a suit of clothes. Dannel had used up his phase arrow, but as the dragon closed his shots grew more telling, and could punch through even the thick scales of the drake. But the hits that made it through were like mere pinpricks to the mature dragon, and it did not alter from its focus as it knifed through the air over the square, clearing the rooftops at its edge by mere feet.

As it flew past at high speed, it unleashed a great gout of explosive red fire into the square. The dragon pounded the air as it rose up out of the square, lifting into a broad turn, ignoring the projectiles fired by the dwarves that bounced harmless off its armored hide or stuck in the thick scales, doing no damage. Without the imparted magical energy of Dannel's song, the missile weapons of the rest of the group had little chance of affecting the dragon.

The flames cleared to reveal a vast stretch of the square scorched black from the impact of the dragon's breath. Dannel was still standing; he'd dodged aside at the last moment from the full force of the streaming flames, and Jenya's protection from fire spell had held against the force of the dragon's breath—this time.

But the dragon was already coming back for more. Winging out in a broad arc that took it out over the city walls, inducing yet another wave of panic in the fleeing townsfolk, it took its time scanning the threat, making a full circle around the town hall before turning into another descent approaching the square from the south, from the direction of the lake.

A great, fat bulbous mass descended from the sky, a kelubar demodand freed by the swirling interplanar vortex. The fiend, too foolish for its own good, dropped close enough to Hookface's intended path to draw its attention, and the dragon paused to unleash its breath upon it, blasting through its resistances easily and charring its oily, sick hide. It tried to conjure up a cloud of acid to cover a hasty retreat, but the dragon simply ignored the obstacle, knifing through and seizing the demodand on the wing. Crushing it in its jaws, the dragon snapped its head and sent the hapless fiend flying down into the city, where it crashed nosily through an intact roof and disappeared from view.

The distraction gave Dannel time for a few more shots at long range, enough to draw a roar of anger from the dragon as it flapped its wings back into a swooping descent toward its foe.

"Take cover, ye daft elf!" Hodge blurted, lifting his crossbow for another shot. His last shot had struck the dragon to no effect, but there was nothing else he could do except keep shooting and hope for a miraculous impact that penetrated its thick hide. Arun, aided by divine favor and the considerable strength of his mighty bow, did manage a hit that punched through one of the dragon's wings, but the hole was a handspan across in an expanse the size of a frigate's mainsail, and hindered Hookface like a pin stuck in the flesh of an ogre.

But Dannel's bow was another matter, and the elf's fourth hit was a telling one, half the length of his arrow vanishing into the dragon's thick neck. But he did not have time for another shot as the dragon bore down on him, ignoring the other foes whose attacks thus far had been trivial at best.

For a moment it looked like the dragon was going to drop to the ground and attack, but at the last moment it swept upward, unleashing another blast of flame at an almost horizontal angle ahead of it. There was no place for Dannel to dodge this time, and he took the full force of the dragon's breath, flying backward to land charred and unmoving on the cobblestones. The flames penetrated to the wagons where Arun and Hodge had taken cover, although the barriers protected the dwarves from feeling little more than a brief rush of heat. The dragon soared upward, looking almost for a moment as though it would slam into the town hall, but once more it narrowly cleared the edge of the roof to sweep out over the structure's central dome. But instead of banking to the left or right to avoid the spire that ascended from the cupola of the dome, the dragon reached out with both of its hind claws and took hold of that pinnacle, using it as a fulcrum to spin its massive body about and reverse its direction without sacrificing the full force of its momentum. The maneuver was too much for the building, and as the dragon leapt forward, diving once more back toward the square, the dome crumbled, and with a loud clatter of cracking stone and falling debris the whole structure collapsed in upon itself.

Beorna had leapt from cover as soon as she'd seen Dannel go down, and was kneeling at his side as the dragon rose up over the town hall. Like the others she'd assumed that it would gain altitude and come around for another pass, but her eyes widened in horror as Hookface completed its maneuver and bored down on them like a boulder hurled by a giant catapult.

Beorna healed Dannel and stood, drawing her holy sword and stepping forward to challenge the descending dragon. She opened her mind and soul to Helm once more, calling upon the power of the god to infuse her sword with the holy power to destroy the dragon. Helm answered her prayer, but before she could do anything further the dragon knifed down with incredible speed, lashing out its head like a whip to snatch her up in its maw with the crushing force of a vice. An instant later the dragon kicked off of the ground with both of its hind legs, narrowly avoiding crushing the semi-conscious Dannel, and then lifted back up into the air with the struggling templar trapped in its jaws.

Arun ran forward, loosing another useless arrow, too late to intervene as the dragon's powerful wings carried it up over the city with its captive.

Chapter 345

Beorna felt the rush of air past her as she tried to fight through the stabbing pain where the dragon's teeth had driven through her armor and into her body. She still held her sword in one hand, but the other was pinned against her body in the drake's mouth.

This wasn't good. Even if she could get free, which was a dubious proposition considering the dragon's incredible strength—the dragon's grip felt like a house had fallen onto her—they were already a good hundred feet or more above the rooftops below. And from what she'd seen of the farastus that had fallen into the city, that wasn't a path she felt much like taking.

But as the dragon gained more altitude, turning as it ascended, she realized that there weren't any other options.

With a heave, she managed to free her other hand, but her location, with most of her body pinned inside the dragon's mouth, made it almost impossible to position herself for an attack. And the dragon clearly wasn't interested in keeping her alive; as she struggled she felt a sudden surge of heat wash over her, moments before a great gout of flame erupted from the dragon's mouth, pouring over her like a skewered hunk of meat thrust into a bonfire. There was no place to go, no way to avoid the full force of the dragon's breath, and only the protection spell laid upon her by Jenya earlier saved her from instantly being incinerated.

But she survived, and when she could actually draw a breath again, she gritted her teeth and ordered her arms to lift the sword dangling beneath her. Her helmet had fallen off at some point after the dragon had grabbed her, and the wind blew wildly through her hair. Her faith gave her the ability to call upon divine intervention to greatly increase her strength for a few flickering heartbeats, and she called upon that aid now as she lifted the sword and raised the tip of the blade against the base of the dragon's jaw, the only vulnerable spot she could reach.

“For you, my lord Helm!” she cried, as she drove the blade home.

Chapter 346

Arun watched in helpless horror as the dragon rose higher over the city, the struggling form of Beorna only just visible in its jaws. Behind him, Hodge was helping Dannel back to his feet.

“We’ve got to find a way to stop it!” Arun growled, furious at his own inability to come to grips with the enemy.

“Too... far...” Dannel gasped, staggering despite the healing that Beorna had poured into him. His garments were charred and his skin blackened from the effects of the dragon’s breath, although he still held his bow tightly in one hand.

But as they watched, the dragon started to turn, forming a wide arc over the city.

“It’s comin’ back!” Hodge said.

“No... look!” the sharp-eyed elf cried. They saw the dragon’s flame jetting in a forked stream from the sides of its mouth, each felt a pang as they realized that Beorna, trapped in its jaws, had been squarely in the path of that blast. They were too far away to see Beorna’s heroic action, lifting her sword into place and calling upon Helm’s strength as she slammed it into the base of the dragon’s skull. But they did see the dragon suddenly snap its head back, a terrible sound erupting from within, and they could see the templar flying free, a black figure that plummeted quickly toward the ground several hundred feet below.

Arun looked beseechingly at Dannel, who possessed the power of feather fall, but the elf grimly shook his head. “Too far,” he said, but they started running anyway, toward the point where Beorna had fallen behind the line of rooftops on the eastern edge of the square.

Above, the dragon circled the city, unleashing a roar of fury and pain that echoed through the volcano.

* * * * *

It only took them a few minutes to reach their destination, even with the scattered debris and the wide cracks that marked the once-smooth course of the boulevard. Arun, fueled by a growing sense of dread, was almost able to pace Dannel down the broad length of Obsidian Avenue, the two leaving Hodge slightly behind. When they saw where the templar had fallen to earth, each felt a strange sense of significance, as if the odd ironies of the world had come together to confirm an inevitable outcome.

The Temple of Helm was largely intact, although the empty stables had collapsed in upon themselves, and one side of the rectory showed a gaping hole above a long crack in the foundation facing the courtyard. But their eyes were drawn to the stairs leading up to the foyer, where the double doors stood open into the vacant sanctuary of the temple.

Beorna lay near the head of the steps, surrounded by bits of rubble. She'd impacted the stone arch overhanging the foyer solidly, an adamantite-encased missile that had plunged through the two-foot-thick canopy and fallen hard onto the carpeted marble below. Her helmet had been lost, along with her sword, and one glance was enough to reveal that life had fled the battered form of Beorna, templar of Helm.

Arun's cry filled the sanctuary, as he fell to his knees before the broken body of the woman he'd loved.

Behind him, Dannel entered the foyer, his eyes lowered. But a moment later another cry echoed the paladin's, a familiar sound that was followed by the rush of wind and the flap of powerful wings.

"It's back," Dannel said.

Arun looked up, and his eyes were cold like anvils as he threw his shield aside, and took up his holy sword in both hands as he stood, turning back toward the street.

Chapter 347

Once again, everyone had forgotten about the gnome.

Mole felt a rush of exhilaration as she swept through the air, the glorious sensation of flight tempered only slightly by the fact that she this adventure was being conducted by means of her clinging to a tenuous perch on the hind claw of a huge red dragon. Still, a random voice whispered in her mind that technically, she was riding the dragon, and that was about a hundred times cooler than just flying.

She didn't know what had possessed her to leap onto the dragon's claw when it had landed for that briefest instant, long enough only to grab Beorna and then lift off again into the sky. She'd been invisible, moving along with Beorna to help Dannel, knowing (with a bit of rueful disappointment) that she had absolutely no chance of harming the dragon with her tiny crossbow. Its leap had been so powerful that she'd almost lost her grip, and the first thing she'd done was to loop a length of rope around one of its dagger-like—okay, broadsword-like—claws, helping her to hold on.

The city was rushing along below her awfully fast, and she quickly realized that her brain, which had come up with the brilliant idea of leaping onto the dragon, had no answers for what to do next. She wanted to help Beorna, but had no idea how she could do that. She also knew—she'd learned a lot about dragons from her uncle Cal, who knew an awful lot about everything—that the dragon would have no trouble detecting her even through her invisibility, if it cared to pay attention or even glance down at its legs. She prayed she was small and light enough to evade its notice, as she tried to figure out what she could do.

But Hookface was distracted by its dealings with Beorna, and despite its phenomenal senses, the tiny, invisible gnome clinging desperately to one of its claws temporarily escaped its notice. Mole's heart froze in her chest as the dragon unleashed its fiery breath upon Beorna, and she nearly lost her grip as it suddenly lurched in mid-air, finally recovering and hurling the templar out into the void. She felt sick, unable to do anything but hold on with trembling hands as the dragon banked into a wide turn, swinging out over the steep mountainside outside Cauldron—way, way, far down!—before completing its arc and turning back toward the city.

The dragon was making a lot of noise, and it sounded really, really mad. Mole willed herself to be lighter as the dragon knifed through the chaotic skies, and found that the thrill of flying didn't seem quite so entertaining as it had a few moments ago.

The dragon seemed to know where it wanted to go. Mole saw that it appeared to be heading for the Temple of Helm, and as they drew near enough to clearly discern the structure and the adjoining courtyard, she saw what looked like Arun and Dannel entering the front doors of the main building.

The dragon had seen it too, apparently. It let out a roar that was an obvious challenge even though Mole did not speak Draconic, and spread its wings to land in the street in front of the temple.

The motion sparked something in the gnome, who realized that if she was going to do something, she had to do it now.

Summoning a desperate reserve of courage, she loosed her hold, and took the end of the rope that she'd used to secure herself to the dragon's claw. The dragon had slowed and was descending toward the middle of the street facing the temple, hind legs extended to catch it as it landed. Mole's eyes darted around, looking for something to anchor the rope onto, but the nearest building was thirty or forty feet away, too far for even a magically augmented leap.

And then she saw something else, and got a crazy, desperate idea.

Chapter 348

Arun and Dannel turned to see the ponderous but majestic bulk of the dragon descending toward them, its wings casting a dark shadow over the temple entry as they spread to slow its flight.

"Take cover!" Arun said to Dannel. "You cannot survive another blast, and I'll need your bow!"

The elf nodded, darting back into the shadowy depths of the temple sanctuary. Arun, in turn, stepped boldly forward to meet the dragon, raising his sword so that its brilliance would leave no question as to his intent. The dwarf could see that the dragon had suffered some injuries; several arrows that had penetrated its scales jutted from various points on its body, and it bled from a deep puncture wound where its head met its long neck. But the beast looked to be more enraged than hindered by the damage wrought upon it thus far.

Hookface spotted the dwarf, and as it extended its legs to land it opened its jaws to immolate its enemy in scorching flame.

Arun was brave, but not a fool; as he saw the dragon's jaws open wide he ducked back behind a pillar, hoping to at least avoid some of the force of the breath attack. But to his surprise, the dragon suddenly shifted awkwardly in mid-flight, lurching to the side and landing off-balance so that its right leg twisted under its weight and its body slammed hard onto the pavement. The dragon roared in obvious pain, and instead of blasting Arun its head shot back toward its hindquarters, where a diminutive form tumbled free of the thrashing dragon. Mole's tiny dagger was in her hand, and bright red blood stained not only the weapon, but also coated her fist and a good part of her sleeve. The gnome's expression was one of pure and utter disgust, but she'd managed to find at least one part of the dragon's anatomy that was not invulnerable to attack.

Hookface breathed, expelling a violent cone of red fire that swathed its...tender... backside. Its own fire did not harm it in the least, but it caught up Mole with the force of a tornado, lifting her and driving her into the wall of buildings on the far side of the street. The breath weapon transformed the block of worn storefronts into an inferno, but Mole had fortuitously spotted a window, and covering her face with her arms she shot through it, landing in a long hallway that she somersaulted down until she had lost enough momentum to regain her footing. Behind her, the entire front of the building was aflame, the window lined in the bright glow of the dragon's fire. On the other hand, she was mostly intact, although she falsely credited luck and skill, when Jenya's protection from fire had had a larger share in protecting her from the full force of the dragon's breath. Maybe it was better that she forgot about that ward, for the blast had entirely used up that protection.

In any case, as she ran back toward the entrance, eager not to miss the rest of the battle, a smile was back on her face.

Arun did not fail to take advantage of Mole's distraction. Even as the dragon blasted her with its flame, the paladin was charging down the steps of the temple. Hookface was a canny, experienced fighter, and it was quick to regain its footing, moving its massive bulk with surprising speed. As Arun moved within the long reach of its head the sinuous member shot out, clipping the dwarf hard on the shoulder, but failing to get a hold with its sharp teeth. But Arun would not be denied, and as the dragon turned its body back toward him he smote it, his holy sword opening a five-foot gash in its breast near its left shoulder. Hot blood cascaded from the vicious wound, drenching the paladin. The dragon drew back, hurt, but now it brought the full force of its various weapons to bear, a barrage of claw, tooth, wing, and tail that laid into the paladin with the deadly force that only a fully-grown dragon can manage.

Arun withstood hit after hit, only his magical armor and incredible fortitude keeping him from being torn into shreds instantly. His magical augmentations were of little use against this foe, and even he could not stand up to the dragon's full force alone.

Fortunately for Arun, he was not alone.

Hodge, his chest heaving from the effort of running full-out in plate armor all the way from the town hall to here, nevertheless managed a roaring dwarvish battle cry as he lifted his axe and stormed into the dragon's flank. The dragon saw him coming and lashed him with a blow from his tail that knocked him sprawling, but the dwarf merely got up and kept coming, bringing his axe down into the dragon's side. The attack lacked the sheer power of Arun's smite, but the wound was still another tally against the dragon's life, and it shifted so that it could address both of its enemies at once.

Unfortunately for Hookface, this again meant that its back was turned to Mole, who leapt through the shattered window into the street into a full run toward the dragon. Intent on Hodge, the dragon did not react with an attack of opportunity, so she reached her target and sprang into a leap that easily cleared twice her height, coming down on the joint where the dragon's hind right leg met its body. Once again precision made up for what she lacked in size and strength, and her dagger vanished into a gap between two scales, rewarding her with a spurt of bright red as she leapt free.

Meanwhile, from the balcony atop the temple, where Jenya Urikas used to enjoy looking out over the city, Dannel emerged with an arrow already fitted to his bow. The elf took aim and fired, and while his first shot narrowly missed the dragon's head, undulating wildly on its long neck, he definitely got its attention.

Hookface was a red dragon, known for their vanity, pride, and utter ruthlessness. But the great drake had not survived the centuries that it had by being reckless. The unleashing of the power of the Tree of Shackled Souls had wakened it from a sleep of years in its mountain hold far to the northern spur of the Alamirs, and it had come to Cauldron more irate than angry. It had no concern about the destruction of the city or the opening of the planar gate, but it had immediately seen the potential for a bit of looting, especially for the magical items of power that it craved. It didn't need its detect magic spell to recognize the powerful items borne by these two-legged adversaries, but nor did it need any more urging to recognize that its situation here was precarious. It had killed one enemy already, and had inflicted a lot of damage upon the others, but every movement was now causing stabbing pains to shoot through its body, and the quiet of its cave seemed like a very pleasant place to be right now.

Its decision was made when the dragon's sharp senses drew its attention to a series of shouts and cries that originated down the ruin of the boulevard. Glancing in that direction, it saw a small company of perhaps a dozen people running up the street toward the battle between the drake and the hard-fighting defenders of the city. The knot of newcomers looked ragged, with tunics frayed and scorched and faces marked with black soot, but they came on with grim determination toward the fray. They were a mixed group, with both genders and at least six races represented in their company, but all wore blackened tunics that had once been light blue cloth, emblazoned with the still-distinct sigil of the hammer. At their head came the half-elven merchant-turned-warrior Ambelin, whose longspear was caked with the blood of a demodand that had not died easily. Others carried bows, which they held at the ready even as the first tendrils of dragonfear washed over them as they closed.

The appearance of reinforcements, even tired and ragged ones, made this confrontation enough for the veteran dragon. Hookface spread its copious wings and gathered the air beneath them, augmenting the mechanical potential of its physical form with the innate magical source that gave all dragons the power of flight. The dwarves rushed in to attack, but the dragon leapt into the air, driving itself higher, out of their reach. It left one more gift for them as it hovered fifty feet above the ground, bending its neck to unleash a final gout of hot red flame. Then an arrow stabbed into its side, reminding it of the elf archer who'd already hurt it. Hookface released a last roar that echoed over the city, promising a later accounting, and then ascended into the smoky skies over the city on powerful beats of its wings. Within less than a minute it had vanished from sight.

The companions gave it little more thought; they were far more intent upon surviving the hell that Cauldron had become. The dragon's last blast had seriously burned Arun and Hodge, overcoming the last vestiges of Jenya's magical warding. Arun, already seriously injured in the brief melee with the drake, collapsed and had to be revived with a potion. When Hodge tugged off his helmet to administer the draught, they could all see the blackened flesh and fresh blood where the dwarf's battered body had given way before all of the punishment Arun had withstood.

But as the paladin stirred, the magical elixir working its potent energies through his frame, his dark eyes shone still with hard resolve. "Dragon... gone?"

"Fer now," Hodge grunted.

Arun nodded, and allowed Hodge to assist him as he pulled himself to his feet. His followers had gathered, their faces writ with awe as the legend of their champion grew just that much more in that moment. Arun looked at them, then fixed his gaze on Ambelin, the half-elven woman he'd placed in command when they'd left the Temple of Helm what seemed like a tenday past.

"You were supposed to be helping Jenya get the people out of the city," he said, but his face betrayed the harshness of his tone.

"The city has been evacuated," Ambelin reported. "Columns are already making their way to Redgorge and to the Lucky Monkey. From there..."

"The High Priestess said you'd gone back in, to confront the dragon, young Orthos said. "We couldn't just..." he trailed off.

Arun nodded, and looked up. The swirling vortex within the storm had grown wider and more agitated, and while no demodands were currently falling from the sky, they could all hear the continued sounds of destruction from all over the city.

"I think it might be a good time to get out of here," Mole said.

Arun's gaze shifted back toward the temple, where Dannel was just exiting the foyer. The paladin's eyes betrayed his grief in that moment, where his companions could not see it. But they didn't need to see it; they understood his feelings.

"There is one we need to bring with us," he said, softly, and Ambelin gestured for several of the Hammers to recover Beorna's body from the wreckage of the church entry.

With the slain templar carried on a crude stretcher between them, the Heroes of Cauldron left the stricken city.

Chapter 349

They caught up with Jenya at an outcropping at one of the numerous places where the steep road from Cauldron switchbacked down the mountain. Below them, a line of refugees stretched down the blackened slope like ants, continuing for at least a mile before vanishing into the hills below. Behind them was only the outline of the city walls, wreathed in thick plumes of smoke that continued to rise out of the shattered city. Those columns rose into the gathered clouds that seemed now to hang low over the city like a blanket, almost low enough to touch the few spires still visible over the black line of the city walls.

Jenya stood atop the projecting stone like a statue as they descended toward her. A handful of guards and priests remained with her, serving as rear-guard for the detritus of overwhelmed humanity that fled the destruction of Cauldron for what might have been a fleeting hope of safety in the lands beyond.

The High Priestess's face hardened as she noticed the burden that they were carrying between them. A stranger might have thought Jenya Urikas cold for the way that she regarded her former ally, but those who knew her understood that the cleric's veneer of control was thin indeed, reinforced as a bulwark against the storm of chaos that all of them had battled this terrible day of days.

"How did she fall?" the cleric said, her lips compressed as though they could keep the depths of her emotion from pouring out in an uncontrollable flood.

"She fell in the triumph of battle, smiting her enemy," Arun intoned, his own voice thick with the exhaustion of grief and suffering. The weary Hammers laid her down gently on the stone as they came to the outcropping. They had not found her holy sword, lost somewhere over the city when the dragon had dropped her, but her second blade, forged of adamantite, lay across her body, its sheathed tip protruding beyond her boots, its pommel nearly touching her bloody chin.

"So it's over... and we lost," Mole said. "Cauldron is gone, the gate is opening, and we never found..." She glanced over at Dannel, but didn't need to finish; the fate of their missing companion, even in the face of the greater destruction wrought upon the city, was still at the forefront of all of their minds.

"Evil is triumphant," Dannel said, his body slack with the weight of exhaustion and worry.

For a heartbeat there was silence. Arun's hand tightened on the hilt of his holy sword, but confronted with the hard reality of the dead woman at his feet, he did not speak.

"Evil wins only if Good surrenders the fight," came a voice from nearby. Everyone there turned to see Nidrama step out from behind the sheer stone bulk of the outcropping onto the trail. Her familiar white robe had been replaced by a breastplate of shining steel over a white tunic, and her greatsword hung bare from one slender hand, golden flames flaring up the length of the weapon.

A collective gasp came up from the gathered Hammers, who were not so inured to the wonders that surrounded the Heroes of Cauldron that they were not amazed at the appearance of a celestial in their midst. Several fell to their knees or bowed deeply, overcome with emotion and piety.

Nidrama smiled warmly at those, but her expression quickly steeled as it turned upon the companions, and at the corpse in their midst.

“We have done all that we can, celestial,” Jenya said. “And we would give yet our lives, if we knew the source of the threat, and had a target for our remaining strength.”

The deva nodded, and for a moment something intangible hung in the air, a quiet exchange between the celestial and something... else. But then, before any of them could put words to the questions in their thoughts, Nidrama nodded and stepped forward. Something changed in that instant; it was as if the glow about her faded somehow with that single step, although outwardly nothing had changed in her appearance.

“I will help you,” she said.

The companions gathered close.

“It is not too late to stop the plans of the Cagewrights,” she told them. “The ritual to tap the power of the Shackleborn, and through the corrupted conduit of the Tree of Shackled Souls open the gate to Carceri, has begun. The lives of those unlucky souls are being used to shatter the barriers between worlds. By the time that the sun rises anew over this region, it will be complete... and at that point, there will be no undoing what has been done.”

“Zenna?” Dannel asked.

“She is one of the Shackleborn,” Nidrama said. “She will share their fate.”

“And Cauldron?” Jenya asked.

“Once the full power of the Shackleborn is channeled through the Tree, Cauldron will become a Gate Town, host to the gathered hordes of Carceri,” the deva replied. “Armies of fiends will descend upon the city, to begin the transformation of the town into the first of many infernal prisons. From there they will begin their conquest of this world.”

“How do we stop this from happening?” Arun asked.

“That answer I do not have, knight of Moradin. But the Tree is situated within a dark bubble underneath the mountain, where the Cagewrights make their lair. The place is shielded from both divination and magical transportation, but a mundane route to their citadel has been opened through the stirrings of the volcano, through the lava tunnels. There, we will find the remainder of the Cagewrights, and perhaps the means to stop what is being wrought.”

“We?” Mole asked.

The deva nodded. “I have made my decision, and will pay the price demanded. This Evil would overturn the balance between worlds, and lay waste to the lives of millions. This cannot be allowed to stand.” She raised her sword before her, so that its burning steel stood between them, surrounding her features with wisps of cleansing flame.

The companions shared a look. Inwardly, each agreed with the words of the celestial, but they had spent nearly a full day engaged in a constant life-or-death struggle within the stricken city. They had fought fiends, a dragon, and the mountain itself. Their enemies would expect an assault, and would have mustered the full force of their strength against them.

Arun’s head came up, and with a sudden surge he slammed his sword point-first into the stones of the path at his feet. The blade sunk half a foot into the rough ground, quivering there as he released the hilt.

“I swear by the blood in my veins, the stones of this mountain, and by the forge of Moradin, that I will not rest until these fiends are destroyed, and their evil plans sundered, or until I draw breath no more,” the dwarf said, and there was no weariness in his voice, no hesitation or doubt that he spoke nothing but unvarnished truth.

Hodge said nothing, but he stood behind Arun with his axe propped up against the ground before him, as if daring anyone to challenge him.

Dannel came forward. “I will find Zenna,” he said, to no one in particular.

Finally, Mole stepped into the circle. “Well, we’re beat up and wiped out, and there’s a whole lot of bad guys who want us dead just waiting for us to get to them so they can kill us.”

Her face cracked into a grin. “This’ll be fun.”

THE END OF “FOUNDATION OF FLAME”

Book IX: “Thirteen Cages”
Begun 1-25-05

Chapter 350

A dark, slender figure walked in a cyst deep beneath the earth. He strode with a deliberate, purposeful gait, a man who held the fate of worlds in his hands. Behind him came a shadow, a second figure who walked hunched over slightly and off-balance, as though struggling with a heavy and awkward burden.

The man in the lead was Shebeleth Regidin. That name was known to few who lived; to some in the world of light above he'd been known as Esbar Tolerathkas, mystic theurge of Azuth, a name layered with several lies.

It required effort to come to this place; more, now that the Tree was exerting its power, sending tendrils of energies through the mountain and across the boundaries between worlds. Coming here was a risk, as this distant bubble in the mountain was technically outside of the perimeter of the dark lair of the Thirteen, outside of the layered protections that sheltered the fell citadel from detection and assault. But Shebeleth Regidin was not one to leave even the smallest matter to chance, and for this rendezvous it was necessary to pass beyond the borders of the place where the sinister designs of he and his cabal of villains had matured into fruition.

Behind him, Baiul giggled inappropriately at some secret thought. Regidin paid him no heed; his acolyte's descent into insanity had been gradual but inexorable, and in any case the wizened mastermind of the Thirteen had long wondered if any of them were truly sane, now.

The two passed through a broad opening shaped eerily like a huge maw, framed by ancient stalactites and stalagmites that had formed into the resemblance of uneven teeth. But neither traveler concerned themselves with imagined threats. There were dangers enough in the real world.

The opening passed them from one cavern into another; the second contained several layers of broad terraces that made the floor a maze of tiers and levels ranging from a few feet across to as wide as twenty paces. The place seemed vast and hollow, an empty womb deep beneath the earth. There was the faintest light, more a promise of illumination than a real brightness, provided by phosphorescent lichens that clung high along the walls, in the crannies where moisture gathered in the cold air.

Regidin took three paces into the room and stopped, waiting. Those he had come to meet were already here, he knew. Behind him, Baiul fidgeted with his burden.

Two dark shadows materialized from different levels of the chamber, coming forward to where the men waited. One was approximately man-sized and shaped, although a dark robe shrouded any details of his features. The second, however, was clearly a monstrosity, looming over all of them, its demonic visage obvious even in the near-darkness, its eyes bright red orbs that fixed upon Regidin and his follower with a fierce intensity.

"Speak your words, manling," the glabrezu said impatiently. "I do not have time for idle chatter."

The other, the cloaked figure, did not comment.

Regidin raised an eyebrow; a slight gesture that would not go unnoticed by the others. Behind him Baiul giggled again.

“Do not worry, my lord Nabthatoron. Or you, Kaurophon. When I contacted you, I promised information that you would consider quite valuable, and I will not waste your time with mere gossip.”

The glabrezu drew its inner arms together to fold them across its chest in an unsettling human-like gesture. No doubt its intent was to unnerve them, but the motion also drew emphasis to the fact that its huge upper arm on the left terminated just below the elbow, in a jagged stump. “Get to it then,” the demon said. “I quite nearly slew this other wretch when I arrived; you should have been more specific that others would be invited to this... gathering.”

“I have bound greater fiends than you, glabrezu!” Kaurophon hissed in challenge. Nabthatoron snarled, the demon’s natural proclivity to aggression filling it with rage, and it appeared even more imposing as it drew itself up to its full height, its remaining pincer snapping angrily at the air a few paces back from the sorcerer’s throat in a menacing gesture.

“A few drops of demonic blood in your veins does not make you my equal, little man.”

Baiul had tensed, the links of his potent spiked chain clinking slightly as he grasped the weapon, but Regidin had not moved, his expression still schooled to careful neutrality, betraying nothing. “Gentlemen,” he said, the single soft word inserting itself into the tension like a knife. “We all have reason to be... upset... but let us direct our ire at its deserving target, not at each other.”

“There is a group of adventurers, who have taken on the sobriquet of ‘heroes’, at least so far as the hapless folk of the ruined city above us were concerned. Ah, I see you remember them, then,” he went on, observing the subtle reactions of both listeners. “Likewise they have caused myself and my companions some... inconvenience. I have called you here to suggest a temporary alliance of convenience, to wreak the final destruction of these meddlers.”

“I need no aid from you to gain my vengeance,” the glabrezu rumbled, but Regidin, accustomed to the mannerisms of fiends, could tell that the demon’s bluster betrayed a significant interest. Kaurophon’s silence offered no similar confirmation, but the cleric had studied both with great intensity before he’d first established contact, and his instinct told him that the sorcerer, too, was more than casually interested in gaining revenge over those who had confounded his own plans of glory and power.

Regidin waved a hand dismissively. “Naturally I would not wish to preempt your privilege. But I may be able to give you an opportunity to exercise your right of revenge, in a situation that is favorably inclined toward success.”

The half-man and demon did not immediately reply, and in that momentary lull Regidin pressed his advantage. “And, of course, the body that I represent would be pleased to offer you a gratuity in exchange for your assistance in this matter.”

He stepped aside, revealing his associate. Baiul, came forward, pulling pack the tarp that concealed the bulky object that he carried.

It had the look of a weapon about it, big and amorphous in the darkness of the chamber. But none of those present needed augmentation to penetrate the shadow, and thus when Baiul came forward, they could clearly see it for what it was. The object was a massive pincer-claw forged in metal blacker than the surrounding darkness. Its significance was immediately clear in the context of Nabthatoron's presence, with the demon's missing member highlighted by the presence of the construct.

"Bah," the demon said, but it was clearly a forced comment that fooled none of them. The metal claw was made of adamantite, one of the strongest substances forged upon—or under—the surface of Faerûn.

"A small token," Regidin offered, waving his hand dismissively as if the gift he offered was not equal in value to a good-sized town.

The demon's hesitation lasted only a moment. "I accept your proposal," it said, coming forward with a sudden rush and taking up the artificial claw in its remaining pincer and snapping it into place against its stump. The prosthesis, infused of course with magic, attached itself seamlessly to the injured member, and the demon's fiendish jaws barked a cruel laughter as it lifted the limb, testing its newly whole arm.

Regidin watched silently, although the cleric was more alert in that long moment than at any point in the interview. There was nothing stopping the demon from just teleporting away right now, taking its prize... nothing that it knew of, anyway. Regidin had naturally prepared a contingency for that possibility, but after all of the effort he'd put into gaining the glabrezu's aid, he preferred not to have to resort to such measures.

Fortunately—for Nabthatoron—the demon's desire for revenge outweighed its selfishness, and it remained.

"What boon for me, then?" Kaurophon asked.

Regidin drew a small book from his tunic, about the size of a small ledger, thin enough so that it could not have held more than a dozen pages. He inclined the book toward the sorcerer, so that he could clearly identify the markings on the stretched-leather cover, now cracked with age.

Kaurophon finally betrayed his emotions, as he sucked in a startled breath. "That is..." he breathed, trailing off.

Regidin nodded. "K'rastin's Codex," he said. "The last copy extant, as far as I am aware. A grimoire of more than passing historical significance. I think you will find the True Names of the five devils mentioned specifically within to be... useful, in your researches."

Kaurophon dry-washed his hands within the sleeves of his robes, unconscious of the gesture or anything else except for the book. "Indeed. Might I peruse it?"

The book vanished back into the cleric's tunic so quickly that he might have been a rogue. "Later," Regidin said. "If you come with me, both of you, we can discuss the upcoming fate of our mutual foes."

Kaurophon's face tightened, but he was clever enough to recognize that the apparent insult—the glabrezu granted his reward before the service, his being kept for after—was actually a backhanded compliment. The two outsiders followed the lord of the Thirteen and his adjunct as they retraced their steps, leaving the cavern empty again behind them.

Chapter 351

"How much farther?" Mole asked plaintively.

"We are growing near," Nidrama said.

The gnome grumbled and hopped up onto a small stone shelf on the side of the tunnel, hastily tugging off a boot and shaking out the pebble that had worked its way inside. The delay allowed Arun and Hodge to pass her, but she quickly recovered her position, her magical boots allowing her to easily outdistance the plodding dwarves.

A deep, thrumming vibration that seemed to come from everywhere around them followed the companions as they delved deeper into the volcano beneath the ruined city of Cauldron. They'd spent the better part of an hour in the maze of lava tubes that burrowed through the depths of the mountain. A thick, sulphurous stench hung in the air, and the temperature had risen until all of them were covered in a sheen of sweat. A few aftershocks had shaken them at first, but as they penetrated further the force of the quakes seemed to fall off, until the omnipresent vibration was broken by only an occasional shudder of the ground beneath their feet.

They were a small company again, five against many, with the deva taking Beorna's place at the head of their column. Jenya Urikas and Arun's followers had been quick to suggest their aid, but the companions had rejected both. While Jenya's powers would have been a great boon, the priestess had depleted her reservoir of clerical spells in the evacuation of Cauldron, and for all her determination and resolve, she was not a warrior. Arun was even more blunt with Ambelin and his other Hammers; knowing that bravery alone would not help his followers survive against the Cagewrights, he'd simply cut them off, ordering them to accompany Jenya down the mountain.

So it fell to Dannel, Arun, Hodge, and Mole to continue their fight against the darkness threatening Cauldron. Already exhausted and battered in the fight to evacuate the city, there was nothing to do but press on; Nidrama had been clear that the Cagewrights were hours, not days, from successfully completing the transformation of Cauldron into a permanent gateway to Carceri. Nidrama had brought with her a magical wand that she used to treat the worst of their injuries, but despite the welcome potency of the device, it could do little to address the deeper haze of fatigue and emotional exhaustion that suffused them all. As Jenya and her escorts had taken their leave, following the long string of refugees down the mountain, Mole had provided foodstuffs and waterskins from her bag of holding. Their meal had been a silent and hasty one, and they paused barely a quarter-hour before setting out under the direction of the celestial.

Nidrama had seemed to know exactly where she was going. She'd led them on a circuit of the volcano's rim, outside the perimeter of the city's walls. Those massive malachite bastions still stood, but they could hear the chaos continuing within as the vacant city burned, and the cries of demodands filled the empty streets. Above, the vortex-cloud continued its ochre spiral, with flashes of yellow light flickering within like streaks of lightning. They encountered nothing, neither friend nor foe, and finally the celestial led them down a twisting trail that descended about a half-mile down the volcano's face. There they finally encountered a dark shaft that speared into the mountain's depths, a lava tube that spewed out a constant emission of ugly yellow smoke.

"The Cagewrights accessed their citadel by magical means," she'd explained. "The shifting of the earth has opened a direct route, now. We must make haste."

That had been over an hour ago. Since then the shaft had undulated through the mountain, meeting and merging with other tunnels driven through the rock by the pressures of lava and water. At times the way was clear and easy; at others it narrowed to only a few paces across, or grew so steep that they had to use ropes to avoid what could have been a deadly fall. Driven beyond complaint at such mundane obstacles, the companions merely faced each obstruction and negotiated it before pressing on.

After Nidrama's evasive reply to Mole's question, Dannel hastened his pace until he was walking alongside the deva. The celestial seemed as distant as ever, her expression hardened as she pondered matters beyond mere mortal ken. Her once-pristine tunic and armor had surrendered now to the inevitability of the dirt and smoke of the volcanic tunnels, and even her perfect features showed more than a hint of strain. Likewise the aura of power that had surrounded her before had seemed to dim somehow, although her otherworldly origin was still obvious in the way she carried herself, and in the depths that shone in her eyes when she turned her gaze briefly to the elf. Her sword, naked in her hand, cast flickering echoes of light upon the smooth stone walls around them as they walked.

"You seem suddenly well-informed," Dannel said, ignoring the warning in that look. "I cannot help but wonder what we might have been able to accomplish, had we been given this intelligence earlier, before all this started."

The celestial stopped abruptly and turned, but Dannel was ready, and he did not flinch as he faced her.

"I have not deceived you, mortal elf... I was clear on the limitations we face, and the Compact that binds our intervention in your reality."

"Odd... I haven't seen our enemies bound by that pact; it seems that they've had all kinds of otherworldly help since we've started this whole mess."

"You barely know enough to demonstrate your own ignorance. The actions of the Cagewrights have been governed by a complex set of rules... and if they succeed in what they do now, they will change the very nature of this realm with those governing strictures. That will bring a reaction, and they know it; but it will be too late for the millions caught in between as this realm is reshaped by the legions of Carceri.”

Dannel did not look satisfied. “And you say that your... friends, they couldn’t do anything to stop this? Why do we pray to these gods of ‘good’, anyway?”

“Dannel,” Arun said, the warning clear in his tone.

“They do what they can,” Nidrama said, her voice underlaid with a tinge of deep sadness.

“Yes, they cannot interfere directly, you said earlier. And yet it would seem that you’re interfering now, just a bit.”

The deva met his gaze squarely. “I made my choice, Dannel Ardan, much as you have. And I have paid the price for my action. I am no longer what I was... I have been expelled from the Host, and am now diminished... ‘fallen’, I believe, would be your term for it.”

The elf did seem somewhat taken aback by that revelation, and did not have an immediate reply. Finally Mole said, “Does that mean... does it mean that you’re mortal now, one like us?”

Nidrama shook her head. “It means that I am what I am. Come, we do not have time to waste in this idle chatter. The first test is not far, I think.”

They moved down the corridor in silence once more, and indeed, within a few minutes the light of Nidrama’s sword glinted off of metal in the side of the tunnel ahead. As they neared the source of the reflection, alert to any wards or organized defenses, their illumination revealed a large metal portal, so dark as to be almost black, recessed deep into the surrounding volcanic stone. The door was surmounted by a crudely shaped figure that resembled a gargoyle or demon, a grim decoration that seemed to follow them with black eyes as they cautiously approached.

“Adamantine, or I’m a gnome,” Hodge said, indicating the door. The dwarven miner-turned-fighter had grown uncharacteristically quiet of late, and his hands tightened heavily upon the shaft of his axe as he regarded the black barrier.

“Let me see what I can see,” Mole said, starting forward, but Nidrama forestalled her by lowering her sword to block her progress.

“Wait,” the deva said. “There is still power left to me, and our chances may be improved if we are protected.”

She came to each of them in turn, briefly touching them and laying defensive magics upon them. When she came to Dannel, she paused briefly. “You accept my aid?”

“I’m not a fool,” he said. Taking up his bow, he added, “Let’s be done with this.”

“Some of the wards are but temporary, and will need to be renewed before each encounter,” she said, as she finished her ministrations.

“Assuming that our enemies give us the chance,” Arun said.

“Well, as the official Party Scout, I will do my best to see that you guys are forewarned,” Mole said, offering a mock-salute.

Hodge mumbled something dark about being in the hands of crazy gnomes.

Nidrama, meanwhile, had already started toward the portal, the others following close behind.

They were ready for anything, but it was still something of a surprise when the stone figure atop the door suddenly glowed and blasted a pair of shimmering black rays into the chest of the approaching deva.

Chapter 352

The black streams of liquid energy coruscated into a flare of gray as they impacted the deva’s chest, intersecting her defensive wards in a chaotic storm of energy. The rays only lasted a second, but even as they faded, and the celestial staggered back, she cried, “The door! Quickly!”

Mole was already moving, leaping into a twisting cartwheel that wove a sinuous line up to the portal, an evading course just in case the guardian had any more tricks up its sleeve. It took her just another two seconds to complete the journey, and as she snapped back up into a ready crouch, she lifted her hands to reveal a small object that she pointed at the implacable adamantine barrier.

The clear note of her chime of opening sounded loud in the confines of the subterranean chamber. The waves of magical energy released from the item sank into the door, and the portal opened, swinging ponderously wide on recessed hinges to reveal a dark passageway beyond.

“Come on,” she urged, standing in the doorway, gesturing for the others to follow. Shooting a cursory glance down the passage—it seemed empty—she returned her efforts to urging her companions forward.

The adventurers quickly passed through the door and out of the line of sight of the warding statue above the portal exterior. In all, maybe six seconds had passed since Nidrama had been hit, and no further blasts had been forthcoming in that quick interval. The light of Nidrama’s sword revealed that the corridor, a rough-hewn shaft maybe twelve feet across, continued straight ahead for as far as they could see. There was just enough irregularity to the passageway to suggest that it had its origins in volcanic action, although it had obviously been crafted by intelligent hands to accommodate the door.

The door started to swing shut, but Arun grasped hold of it, and Hodge was quick to secure the jam with a pair of hastily driven spikes. Despite their commitment to braving the defenses of the Cagewrights, none of them wanted their escape route blocked if it came to a retreat.

“Oh, damn,” Mole said.

The others turned. “What is it?” Dannel asked.

Mole held up the magical chime, clearly revealing the crack that ran through its length. “Fellian said its power was limited, but I was really hoping that it had a few more charges left.”

“Well, if we come to another door like this one, we’ll have to improvise,” the elf said.

“Come. Remain alert,” Nidrama said, leading them down the passage.

“Who put ‘er in charge?” Hodge growled to Arun, but the paladin only shrugged and followed the celestial deeper into the complex.

They hadn’t gone far when the tunnel began to curve slightly to the right. Shortly thereafter, they came to a fork, with a side tunnel jutting off at a right angle to their right. Ahead, they could see that the main corridor began to veer right once again, perhaps following parallel to the side passage.

“Which way?” Dannel asked, glancing down both passages.

“This seems like the main tunnel,” Nidrama said, pointing forward, but she glanced down the side passage, adding, “Though I like not the possibility of leaving a foe behind to catch us unawares.”

“What’s that smell?” Mole asked.

“What?” Hodge said. “I don’t smell anythin’.”

“Based on past experience, I’d be shocked if your olfactory senses were functioning normally,” Dannel said dryly.

“Which way, Mole?” Arun asked.

“Side passage, I think,” the gnome reported. She sniffed at the tunnel, and wrinkled her nose. “Yuck. Smells kinda oily, I think.”

The elf archer and dwarf paladin shared a look. “Demodands?” Dannel suggested.

“Like as not,” the paladin replied. “Nidrama’s right; we don’t want them coming up on us from behind. We’d better check it out, but carefully.”

"I'll go on ahead," Mole said. She disappeared into the shadows, vanishing within five paces. The others followed slowly, wary of any danger.

The tunnel continued for perhaps fifty feet, before appearing to end in a blank stone wall.

"Mole?" Dannel asked.

"I'm here," came the gnome's voice, softly, from somewhere nearby.

"There's somethin' not right 'bout that there wall," Hodge said, clanking as he moved forward. The dwarf had never mastered the art of being quiet in armor, and every movement he made seemed to resound down the length of the passage.

"It's a curtain, designed to look like a stone wall," Mole said. "Be quiet, there's..."

But they never got to hear what she was going to say, for the dark curtain was roughly drawn aside by an oily claw, revealing the unpleasant visage of a farastu demodand beyond.

Chapter 353

Uncommonly, Arun was the first to act; through the gifts provided via his spiritual link to Moradin he'd detected the taint of the fiends even as Mole had begun her warning, and as the curtain came back his holy blade hissed from its sheath, filling the corridor with its pure gleaming radiance. The paladin did not hesitate, leaping at the creature even as he noted the two others hovering behind it. He felt the surge of battle pounding in his veins, but he resisted the urge to unleash his final smite evil; there were others for whom he intended that final retribution. Even without that added holy power, however, the sword struck true, opening a terrific gash in the creature's chest that spewed forth an ugly spout of black ichor.

But unfortunately for Arun, his sword stuck in the wound, the adhesive black slime that covered it folding around the blade and wrenching it from his grip as the demodand flailed back. It drew the curtain back with it, showing a dank chamber beyond, as well as clearly revealing the other two fiends.

Dannel's first arrow knifed through the air, slamming into the chest of one of the demodands, but his arrows, despite their magical potency, were not aligned to Good, and the steel-tipped shaft did little damage. While the elf considered Alakast, Hodge and Nidrama were already coming forward, their weapons raised to strike.

But before they could close to melee, the demodands unleashed their own fell powers.

A wave of fear swept through the tunnel. This tactic had proven effective in the past, but this time, fortified by Arun's protective aura of courage, all of the companions resisted the driving wave of incipient panic. Another blasted Nidrama with a ray of enfeeblement, but the beam of energy dissipated against the deva's spell resistance. The last demodand, the one that Arun had grievously wounded, recovered enough to add a final defensive effort, conjuring a billowing fog cloud of sickly gray vapors into the corridor that had quickly engulfed the entire melee in a concealing murk.

The cloud turned all of the combatants into vague dark outlines within the gray, with even Nidrama's flaming sword and Arun's holy weapon doing little to drive back the clinging mists. But the warriors at the fore did not pause, driving into the ranks of the demodands. Nidrama's voice sang out a clarion cry to battle in the Celestial tongue, a note that sent a tremor of fear through the demodands even as she materialized from the fog and laid into one of the creatures with a powerful two-handed strike. The great blade, infused with her holy power, tore through its defenses easily, cleaving deep into its shoulder and nearly taking off its left arm. The demodand tried to counter with a claw and bite combination, but its assault merely flailed harmlessly against the shining lines of her breastplate, and the agility of her defense.

Hodge met the next demodand, the one that Dannel had lightly injured with his arrow. The dwarf's weapon had no holy properties, but he more than made up for that with a critical strike that dug deep into its side, staggering it. But like his fellow dwarf he had difficulties keeping ahold of the weapon, as it adhered to the farastu's slimy hide. The two creatures twisted about in an odd tug-of-war, the dwarf holding onto the haft of his weapon, the farastu trying to pull away, all the while hacking at the dwarf with its vicious long-fingered claws.

Dannel's first instinct was to move forward through the fog to join his companions, but he hesitated; there was a faint buzz of warning in the back of his mind that caused him to draw back, toward the mouth of the corridor. As the fog thinned, he peered back down the passageway. The darkness was nearly absolute; the fog effectively blocked the faint light from the warriors' weapons.

But there was nothing wrong with his ears, and the sick sticking plop of a farastu demodand's tread upon stone was all too familiar.

"More of them, from behind!" he yelled, summoning his song as he withdrew Alakast from his Efficient Quiver, focusing the power of a light spell upon the quarterstaff. The weapon seemed to thrum in his hand as he faced a trio of farastus that appeared in the mouth of the side tunnel from the corridor beyond. The quarterstaff had been created to destroy evil outsiders, and maybe somehow it could sense that it had been brought forth to further that purpose.

But there was no time for further musings on that, for even as the light exploded from the staff, the farastus spotted him and charged eagerly forward, claws extended. Dannel was no coward, but he also knew that he alone would last mere seconds in a close melee with three demodands. Hoping that his friends would be able to come quickly to his aid, he withdrew back into the relative shelter of the fog cloud.

The demodands followed him inside.

Just a few paces away, the elf's companions continued their struggle against the first cohort of demodands. With an angry cry, Arun ripped his sword from his injured foe's body, fighting off its flailing claws before thrusting half the length of the blade through its throat.

The demodand fell, ichor bubbling up from its jaws, nearly ripping the sword from the paladin's grasp once again. He turned to help Hodge, but then Dannel's warning carried, muted, through the fog.

"Go on, we'll finish off this lot!" Hodge said, although at the moment it was taking his full effort just to keep his grip on his axe. The demodand took advantage of his distraction to blast the dwarf with a ray of enfeeblement, and as Hodge weakened it finally yanked itself free, the dwarf's primary weapon firmly attached to its body.

"Gimme that back, ye bloomin' bloody bastard!" Hodge cried, hurling himself against the demodand. This might not have been the best strategy, for the creature's sticky hide caught on the dwarf's armor and stuck the two combatants together. Fiend and dwarf crashed together to the ground in a tangled heap, limbs jutting awkwardly out in every direction.

Arun, however, had already vanished back into the fog.

Nidrama had taken her first hit, a solid blow that drew a bright line of red across her shoulder from one of her opponent's claws. But the farastu was far worse off, and its situation continued to deteriorate as the deva brought her heavy greatsword around and crashed it into the demodand's other side, giving it now two serious wounds that continued to drip trails of hot ichor down its body.

The three reinforcement demodands snarled and slowed as the fog cloud engulfed them. Spreading out, lashing the tendrils of mist as they sought out the elf, one sensed a hint of movement along the wall to its right. Turning, it caught the long shaft of Alakast in the side of its head as Dannel whipped it up in a quick snapping gesture that knocked it roughly off-balance. But the demodand was quick to recover, leaping at the elf, trying to wrest the deadly staff out of his grasp. It got another solid hit for its trouble, but still managed to lay its sticky claws upon the wooden shaft, wrestling with Dannel for control of the weapon.

Its two fellows took advantage of Dannel's plight to spread out and take him from the flanks. Dannel saw them coming and released Alakast suddenly, darting along the wall back down the corridor before he could be fully surrounded. The nearest farastu ran him down, tearing with its claws, but the nimble elf avoided its grasp with only a few minor scratches for his trouble. As he retreated the fog faded with surprising suddenness, and he turned to see all three demodands following him, the first snarling as it tossed Dannel's brightly-glowing quarterstaff over its shoulder.

"Great," he said, to no one in particular. His hand had dropped reflexively to the hilt of his sword, the one he hadn't drawn in anger for... how many months now? But even as his fingers tightened on the hilt, he knew that he'd have no chance to even hinder the farastus with that weapon, not with the kind of damage resistance that the fiends possessed.

His other hand had already reached back, to his magical quiver, and he spoke the command that caused his longbow, strung and ready, to slide out of the extradimensional space within. But before he could draw out an arrow, the farastus were upon him. It was all he could do to keep from being surrounded in the initial rush. One of the farastus took a moment to shoot him with a ray of enfeeblement, but Dannel had been expecting something like that, and he was able to narrowly dodge the thin stream of negative energy.

The other two farastus reached for him with their claws, but before they could strike the faint clink of metal from within the fog alerted Dannel a moment before Arun appeared suddenly, charging full-speed toward the melee. Ignoring the one standing to the side, that had fired the ray, the paladin caromed into the one that Dannel had struck earlier with Alakast. Arun's shield hit the farastu in the back, sticking with a sick sucking sound, shifting his momentum to lift the demodand up off its feet. For a split second the paladin was actually holding the monstrous creature up above him, the fiend struggling in surprise, and then Arun's holy blade clove through its neck, flaring with bright white light as it tore into the tainted fabric of the farastu. Its cries were cut off abruptly, and as its head fell limply to the ground a few feet away, Arun tossed its body—his shield still stuck to it—to the side.

The two remaining fiends turned to face the paladin, the elf temporarily forgotten in the face of this obviously more dangerous foe. Arun's charge had put him in a disadvantageous position, with the fiends able to flank him easily, tearing at him with their claws.

Dannel lifted his bow to fire, but a huge sound from behind suddenly filled the corridor. Back behind them, at the intersection of the two passages, something new had arrived. The north wall there, seemingly solid when they'd passed it before, had exploded outward, revealing a hulking form that was almost lost in shadow at the edges of the light cast by Arun's dancing sword.

It was... big. Muscles the size of tree trunks knotted in its arms and legs as it stepped out into the corridor from the secret passage that had concealed it. Silvery links of flowing mail covered its torso, stretched across a chest broad enough to use as a banquet table. The echoes of light danced upon the length of a long, curving falchion, six feet of flawless gray steel within which a miasma of wavering lines seemed to flow and intersect, trapped within the metal. And its face...

The face of the newcomer was that of no normal creature. It was a bestial face, with bovine features that terminated in powerful jaws and a pair of jutting ivory horns. The face of a minotaur, but this monstrosity resembled an ordinary minotaur in the way that Arun resembled an elderly dwarven merchant. Its eyes were twin points of rage that seemed to glow as they drank in the scene before them.

Gau had arrived, and she was not pleased.

Chapter 354

Dannel spun at the noise of the minotaur's arrival, and even as he took in the fierce appearance of the creature, he was fitting an arrow to his bowstring.

Time seemed to slow around him, as the song filled him and the minotaur lowered its flat head, its steps shaking the ground as it charged.

First arrow...

Damn, that thing's huge...

The arrow struck the creature in the meat of its left arm, but even though it dug deep into the muscle, the jutting shaft looked painfully tiny against the thickness of the limb. The minotaur took its first step forward, its eyes locking onto Dannel with an almost audible click.

It's raging... make it tough to stop...

Even as the thought came and went, his second arrow was fitted and fired. He's aimed lower, hitting it solidly in the thigh, and again the shot appeared to have no effect. If anything, its charge continued to pick up momentum... a second step, a third, a fourth, the corridor seeming to tremble now at its passage.

Fool! You aren't going to be able to slow it down... Your only chance is to hit a vital organ!

His third arrow punched through the armor covering its chest, sinking deep into the minotaur's body. Its stare never wavered, and Dannel wondered if it was even feeling the hits. He'd seen barbarian warriors lost in battlerage before, men who'd taken a dozen arrows, men who'd killed several enemies before their bodies realized that they were dead.

The minotaur was only a few paces away, now. The falchion came up, its cutting edge gleaming as it caught the light.

Dannel lifted his bow, his fourth—and last, he knew—arrow in place. He drew the string back, drawing the bow taut. The song screamed in his ears, filling him with power, passing through him into the bow, into the arrow.

The bowstring snapped.

Time unfroze.

All he saw was a blur. He was vaguely aware of the impact as his body caromed off of the wall... it had been several paces behind him... pain, as a slivered rib stabbed through his lung...

Then nothing.

* * * * *

Even as the minotaur barbarian appeared to change the dynamic of the melee on the far side of the fog cloud, the rest of the group was still having difficulties against the first cohort of demodands. Nidrama had crippled her adversary, scoring a third hit against her hapless foe, but the injured creature, confronted with one of its most hated enemies, refused to withdraw. Instead the monster hurled itself at the celestial, taking another hit that nearly finished it in the process, but managing to lock the sticky fingers of one oozing claw around the crossguard of the deva's flaming sword. With its other hand it swatted her breastplate, doing no damage but snagging handfuls of her garment that clung to its foul limb.

Nidrama's mouth tightened in disgust as the weight of the creature—now clinging to life only through stubbornness—threatened to drag her down off her feet.

Hodge, meanwhile, was already enjoying that fate, as he and the demodand wrestled upon the floor a few feet away. The constant stream of profanities in dwarvish and common seemed to match the ugly sounds coming from the demodand's jaws. The demodand had the advantage of having natural weapons that could hurt the dwarf, while the dwarf's axe was securely pinned to its body, but it was in turn hindered by the fact that its own adhesive slime was sticking its limbs to Hodge's armor, clothes, flesh... and even more than a bit of his wiry beard.

The demodand addressed this problem by snapping its jaws around Hodge's shoulder, opening a considerable rip in his hide at the base of his neck. This only amplified the dwarf's litany, and with a sudden surge he tore his arm free, using that opportunity to jam his fist into the creature's gaping maw. Even though the punches weren't doing a lot of damage, they seemed to make the dwarf feel better.

"You want a fistful o' dwarf! Here, 'ow's that? You want more? 'ere, 'AVE SOME MORE, YOU SACK O..."

He paused as he noticed something odd; the creature wasn't thrashing around so much any more. Drawing up (a considerable effort, as his body was still stuck to demodand all over the place), he saw that the fiend's eyes had become gaping, bloody sockets. The thing looked to be dead.

Hodge looked at his fist in surprise. He didn't think he'd hit it that hard.

"Aug, teach ye to mess with a dwarf," he said, turning himself to the tricky (and painful) process of extracting himself from the fiend's sticky clutches.

A few paces away, Mole grinned, but the sounds of battle behind through the fog were growing more intense, so she lowered her magical dagger—careful not to foul the sticky thing on her trousers—and darted back off into the cloying mists.

Chapter 355

Even before he saw the minotaur take down Dannel with a single swing of her massive falchion, Arun knew that his situation had suddenly grown real, real grim. He'd hurt one of the remaining demodands with a thrust that had torn open half its side, but he'd nearly lost his sword again, finally yanking it free in a spray of blood and rent flesh. Dannel was still intact, his armor holding against the minotaur's swing, but by the way he'd hit the wall... Arun hoped he was just unconscious, and not dead.

But there was nothing the paladin could do for his friend at the moment, for the minotaur immediately turned her ire upon the next adversary.

Even aside from her hulking size and incredible speed, Arun could tell from the way she moved that the beast was a skilled combatant. He also knew that if he went toe-to-toe with her, even leaving aside the two demodands flailing at him with their claws, he'd be opening himself up to a ton of punishment. He hadn't taken anything more than a few minor scratches thus far from the demodands, but the minotaur was another story entirely. But even if he'd wanted to retreat—the persistent fog offered concealment only a few feet away—the demodands would be all over him before he made two steps, and the minotaur had speed, and reach to boot. If they caught him in the fog, it would be over quickly.

So instead he grimaced and stepped forward, within the minotaur's reach, and laid into her with everything he had. There was no holding back now; his first attack was a smite that cut deep into the minotaur's flank, driving through her armor. That one she felt, as well as the follow-up backswing that Arun had intended to splay open the wound further, but which hit a foot higher, only adding a fairly minor tear along her ribs. He tried to keep it going, spinning into a third powerful attacks upon her, but his effort had been spent out and his sword only glanced harmlessly off her armor.

The huge falchion came up.

Arun had been expecting pain, but even so the terrific impact startled him. His armor held, although he could feel the sharpness stab into his torso as the hit buckled the mithral plate, a sound echoed by the crunch of bone underneath. It felt as though someone had reached into his lungs and stolen all of his breath out of him. He could do nothing as the curving blade came around again, and only a last-instant dodge kept him from losing his head. As it was, the falchion glanced off of his helm, again denting the metal, and the world spun around him as he staggered back. He was only distantly aware of the demodands clawing at him eagerly as he fought to recover from that devastating assault. Only pure idiot chance kept him from taking a third stroke, as a demodand in its attack moved into the descending path of the falchion, and the minotaur adjusted—slightly—to avoid decapitating her ally.

But though he yet stood, Arun knew that he would never survive another attack like that one. One more hit would do him in.

Neither he nor the minotaur saw the subtle variation in the air, the slightest disruption as a shadow detached itself from the wall and slipped around behind Gau in a soft tumble. Through her rage, the barbarian was dimly aware of the slightest pressure, little more than that of a stiff breeze, that touched first her hip, then her back. Even as she shifted in response, growing aware of the danger, Mole made her presence known by stabbing her rapier—all twelve inches of it—into the small gap in Gau's armor at the point where her right arm entered her torso.

Gau roared, again more in rage than pain, although the thrust had grazed her lung, and blood began to slowly seep into the injured organ. But the minotaur seemed barely hindered as she lifted her sword, and with expert precision sliced it over her shoulders and down her back to dislodge the gnome hanging there.

Mole swung narrowly out of the path of the blade, its edge sliding mere inches from her face as she hung on by two fingers, her body dangling out in open air. Kicking out, she passed under the minotaur's arm before snapping her body out and clambering up its shoulder, using her horn as a pivot to settle her back behind the minotaur's neck. Gau shifted her sword to her right hand and tried to grab her with her left, but again she only clasped empty air.

The minotaur snapped her head forward in an attempt to dislodge the gnome, but Mole held on, stabbing Gau again with a cut that was only a nuisance, this time. Arun could not help her, tangled in the grasp of the two demodands, and although Mole had thus far kept her huge foe in check thus far, her luck could not hold out against Gau's sheer strength and speed for long. This was confirmed a second later as the falchion shot out suddenly in a sharp upward thrust. Again Mole dodged, but this time the blade drew across her torso before she could get out of its way, leaving a nasty bleeding gash across her body.

Still, the gnome held on.

"Athaladras!" came a clear cry from the fog, a moment before Nidrama appeared, her wings driving her forward in great pulsing beats, her sword held out before her like a pike. Gau snarled but took the hit, a driving thrust that sank a full foot into the meat of her left shoulder before the deva's onrushing momentum was spent.

For a moment, the two combatants just remained there, facing each other; the minotaur spitted on the edge of the celestial's sword, the deva hovering in the air, dwarfed by an enemy almost twice her size. A rank burning smell filled the air as the sword's flames seared Gau's flesh.

And then the falchion came around, and clove into the celestial's breast. Nidrama's armor crumpled and she fell back, too-bright blood issuing from the deep gash in her body.

She fell hard and did not stir.

Gau roared in triumph as she turned back to Arun. The paladin, teeth gritted against the surges of pain that threatened yet to overcome him, had fought free of one farastu, and ignored the other still clinging to his side as he drove his sword through the first fiend's face. The demodand fell back, and Arun yanked his weapon free, trying to turn to confront the minotaur. Every breath he took drove a knife of pain through him, and the world around him was starting to grow dim, only his sword clearly defined against the shadows.

An awkward clanking sound behind him gave him hope, however. Hodge appeared from the fog, looking a sight with his armor and clothes covered in farastu slime and blood, his beard a fouled ruin that had been splayed across the lower half of his face in a gooey mess.

"Right then," he said, regarding the minotaur, lifting his axe. "Yer be wantin' some o' this, now?"

Gau laughed and charged. Or rather, started to charge, for as she launched into her first stride, Mole leaned around and cut open her jugular with a long stroke of her dagger.

Chapter 356

A few minutes later, the companions gathered at the original intersection of the two corridors, only a short distance from the charnel heap of blood and slime and gore and corruption where the desperate battle had taken place.

Nidrama, looking more mortal than at any time previous, was still pouring charges from her wand of cure serious wounds into Dannel. The elf was pale. They all were, realizing how close they'd come to being defeated in their first confrontation with the Cagewrights' forces.

Well, most of them were pale with such thoughts, anyway; Mole seemed more interested in the boots she'd taken off the minotaur barbarian. At first they had seemed ludicrously big for her, but after handling them for a minute or two they had miraculously shrunk to a size that seemed perfect for her.

"Well, that was fun," Hodge said, spitting out a fat gob of blood that might have contained a tooth. He'd been the only one of them not critically wounded in the brief battle, and in fact it had been his hasty "first aid" that had stabilized Nidrama. Of course, it might have been the farastu slime covering the cloth he'd used that had helped bind the deva's wound, rather than any particular medical skill the dwarf possessed, but it had held long enough for Arun to free himself from the grasp of the last dying farastu, and use Nidrama's healing wand to bring her back to consciousness. Dannel, mercifully, had stabilized on his own, although his breathing had been rasping and shallow when they'd gotten to him, and even repeated healing spells had left him wan and shaken.

"That... that creature, that was one of the most devastating warriors I've ever faced," Arun said. "No, let me correct myself. That was the most devastating warrior I've ever faced. She would have gone through even Zarik Dhor like a hot knife through butter."

"She was a Cagewright, one of the Thirteen," Nidrama said, finally rising as she completed the healing of Dannel's wounds—the physical ones, anyway. From the heavy use they'd put it to in the aftermath of the battle, the wand was likely well on its way to being depleted of its store of magic.

"Faugh!" Hodge snorted. "Just one o' them nearly took us all for sausages! Yer sure yer want to be doin' this, now?"

The last was directed to Arun, who merely fixed his stare into the darkness of the corridor ahead. "We have no choice. We will just have to be more cautious."

Mole suddenly looked up from her prize. "Hey... I wonder if she had any treasure?" Without waiting for confirmation from the others—or permission—she hopped up and darted through the gaping secret door in the north wall.

"Mole!" Dannel exclaimed. He started to say something else, but caught himself and shook his head.

"You'd only draw attention to her," Arun said. "If she does stick her feet into something, you can wager she'll let us know."

“And like as not we’ll get sucked into it up to our necks,” Hodge said. He was trying to scrape the clinging farastu slime from the blade of his axe, and not having much success. Nidrama saw him and reached out to touch the axe. As her slender fingers closed around the haft, the ooze seemed to grow viscous, sliding off the weapon to plop in lumps upon the ground.

“Hey!” Hodge said. “Why didn’t yer do that before? I mean, when that thing was hoppin’ all over me?”

“The secretions of the demodands are one with their essence of corruption,” the celestial said. “It is of them; anathema. When they live, only the purification of utter destruction—” she held up her sword, letting its flames glimmer brightly between them—“can cleanse it of its foulness. When they die, the corruption weakens, and eventually fades.”

“Yeah, well,” Hodge said, scratching his head.

Dannel had strung his bow anew with a spare string, and now tested its draw. “We should not linger here,” he said. “Likely this was just an initial test; the others no doubt have prepared a welcome deeper within the complex.”

“Why didn’t they just all meet us at the door?” Hodge asked.

“Distracted, no doubt,” Arun said, scraping what he could of the farastu slime from his shield before taking it up again. He’d beaten out the dents in his armor and helm as best he could with one of his hammers, but he still looked a sight, even with Nidrama’s healing.

“The Tree will take time to build its dark power to full fruition,” Nidrama said. “Once that happens, Cauldron will be no more, and your world will be refashioned in the image of the Dark.”

“That is what we must stop,” Arun said, drawing his sword.

Their attention was drawn to the door by a faint exclamation of glee, followed a moment later by the appearance of Mole. She was carrying something long and slender wrapped in a cloak, and wore the look of someone quite satisfied with herself.

“Glad you came back... it’s time to move out,” Dannel said. “Were there any other exits that way?”

“Ha!” Mole returned. “And to think, you guys would have passed it up!”

“What didje find, girl?” Hodge said, trying to maintain an aloof air but failing at it. In his case, the avarice of his nature wasn’t far from the surface, regardless of his long apprenticeship to Arun.

“Well,” Mole began, “She had a pretty grim set-up in there—the minotaur, that is. Whole room full of martial junk... man, the weapons...”

The men looked at her piercingly, and Nidrama, she saw, had turned to her with eyes suddenly wide. The deva came forward quickly and looked to be intent on spoiling her surprise, so Mole drew back the cloak with a dramatic flourish...

“Ta da! It’s a sword! Kinda like yours, eh Arun?”

The sword—a smooth, perfect longsword—looked a bit dingy and ill-cared for at first glance. It had the look of a weapon forged of cold iron, rather than finely processed steel, and its hilt was a simple straight shaft with a leather grip. Its crossguard bore its only decoration, shaped into a half-circle in the form of a rising sun, the sigil of the god Lathander, the Morninglord.

Nidrama reached out and touched the blade, her fingers drawing lightly down the length of the steel. “A holy avenger,” she said, reverently.

“By the gods,” Arun echoed.

Nidrama turned to him. “This is a gift, paladin. Take up this weapon... it is meant for your hands.”

Arun looked uncharacteristically indecisive.

“Do not fear that your patron would frown upon such; in our quest the will of the Soul Forger and the Morninglord are linked as one. Take it... do not reject the boon that has been handed us.”

Arun reached out and took hold of the sword. Mole, feeling quite pleased with herself, smiled as the sword seemed to flash in his hand, an almost electric tingle passing through all of them as the power in the sword found its match in that wielded by the man. For a moment, the gnome considered the adamantine morningstar and the silver flail she’d also found in the minotaur’s chamber, both currently residing in her bag of holding. Might not those have some wondrous powers as well? She allowed herself to resist the urge to reveal them to the others; none of them used either sort of weapon, after all.

Arun handed his own holy sword to Hodge, who accepted it with only a bit of grumbling; even though it was not his favored axe, the latter dwarf had seen firsthand, many times, how effective the weapon was against evil foes. For a moment, the paladin simply admired his new blade, then finally, almost grudgingly, he turned to the gnome.

“Take us forward, Mole.”

Chapter 357

Arun’s ability to detect evil revealed the second ambush, giving them a few precious seconds to prepare.

They’d followed the corridor to another room that showed clear indications of being a demodand lair—the tarry gunk the farastus secreted covered everything, and even Mole did not advocate lingering long for a detailed search. There was little more than smooth walls and a few rounded boulders in any case, so they crossed to the doors in the far wall, and passed into another passage that wound deeper into the complex to the east.

They all felt the pressure of time's rapid passage, but they'd learned caution. Thus it was that when they entered the passage, which appeared to stretch on unbroken for as far as they could see, suspicions arose and they paused a moment for Arun to draw upon his gifts.

"Evil. Just ahead, to either side of the tunnel."

At that warning, Nidrama drew upon her innate powers, summoning a bright eruption of daylight that filled the passage with its warm glow. In the bright light, they could see that a length of the tunnel bore another irregularity; more of the dark curtains that were designed to blend in with the surrounding stone walls.

As it was clear that the companions were not going to be surprised, the curtains were drawn back to reveal a pair of vrock demons, their vulture-like heads bobbing in eager anticipation of the fray as they regarded the intruders. Each was prepared, surrounded by a swirling nexus of mirror images, and they immediately rushed down the corridor, their compact wings beating powerfully to augment the hops from their powerful hind legs.

Dannel immediately lifted his bow to fire, but Nidrama, her attention focused upon Arun, forestalled him. "Hold your missile, archer," she said. Dannel looked at her in surprise, but obeyed. The demons would be on them in seconds, quickly closing the distance between them.

Arun lifted his sword, holding it straight out, the point directed at the demons. As the others watched in surprise, a gleam of light erupted from between the paladin's fingers, tight around the hilt of the weapon, traveling down the straight steel before flashing out in a momentary pulse of golden radiance. Arun looked as surprised as the others at the unexpected display, but the effect was immediately obvious as the mirror images suddenly vanished, revealing the true locations of the vocks.

The demons hesitated in surprise, faltering just for a single heartbeat before leaping once more to the attack. But that second cost them. Dannel's arrow knifed into the first demon's shoulder, doing little damage through its resistances, but throwing off its momentum and forcing it to wildly adjust to bring itself back into stride.

The second demon abruptly stopped five paces from the ready ranks of the companions, leapt into the air, and released a terrible, piercing screech. Dannel staggered back, stunned, but the dwarves easily resisted the effects, and Nidrama's only response was to lift her blade and meet the second vrock as it hurtled itself forward, tearing with all four talons at the celestial. The assault might have been effective, if it had been given time enough to complete its full attack; as it was the creature's first claw tore a minor gouge into the celestial's exposed forearm, but then it came under immediate counterattack from the deva and from Hodge, who'd come forward swinging Arun's holy sword. Both scored hits upon the vrock, Nidrama driving it back with a serious blow to the body, and then Hodge finishing with a violent swing that took the demon's left leg off just above the knee. The vrock, screeching in agony, fell to the ground, flapping out the last of its life in a spray of demonic ichor and mottled feathers.

The second vrock, driven to a fury of bloodlust, leapt at Hodge. It managed to clip him on his temple with a lashing claw, driving the dwarf back. Flapping its wings madly, it lifted itself three feet in the air, preparing to shred the dwarf with a full assault of claws and bite.

And then Arun stepped forward.

The demon seemed to recoil from the piercing glimmer of the holy avenger, but it was too late for it to escape. The paladin seemed possessed as he swept the blade twice through the air, each time cleaving deep through demonic flesh, and finally lunged, driving half the length of the blade through its body, transfixing its heart. The demon seemed to deflate, sinking to the ground and trembling once, then falling still.

Mole materialized behind the demons, where she'd been waiting for a good moment to backstab one of them. The entire battle, from the time that the vrocks had first revealed themselves, had taken less than fifteen seconds.

"Wow," she said. "Cool sword."

Chapter 358

"The invaders have broken through the outer defenses. Gather our guests, and take them to join the giant and his creatures," Shebelith Regidin said.

"As you command," Decrihni Baiul replied, giggling as he bowed. He shot the woman standing beside Regidin a suggestive leer that caused her lips to compress into a tight line, then darted off, moving surprisingly quickly for a man clad in full plate armor.

"How you tolerate that little troll, I have no idea," the woman said upon Baiul's departure. She was clad in a fashionable outfit of spotless red silk, and she looked rather out of place in the dark tunnels of the Cagewright stronghold. A wand was tucked into a case at her waist, and a detect magic spell would have revealed her to be a veritable beacon of magical auras.

"He is useful, for all his idiosyncrasies, my dear Freija," Regidin said. He turned his considerable gaze upon her; the woman did not flinch and if anything her disapproving frown deepened. "And do not underestimate his competence."

"I do not agree with this plan," Freija returned. "We should meet the enemy with the combined force of the Thirteen."

"Twelve, now," Regidin noted. "And a number of our colleagues are elsewhere, as you know."

Freija lifted an eyebrow slightly. "All the more reason to gather our forces and strike a decisive blow."

“Your ideas are incisive, as always, my dear. But the Tree cannot be left alone at this stage; matters approach a decisive fulcrum upon which the entire fate of our plans is balanced.”

“I know not if you are brilliant or merely a coward,” Freija answered.

“Perhaps both. In any case, you will have Ti’irok and his little band, Baiul and his demodands, and our new allies at your command. Not to mention those beings that you will no doubt summon to our cause.”

“Bah. Foot soldiers are all and well, but if you and Dyr’ryd cannot be stirred from your precious Tree, at least release Ardeth and Nulin to my command. Grehlia and Thearynn can go hide in their holes; both are as mad as Baiul, if not more, and I would as soon not turn my back upon either when my life is on the line.”

“Ardeth and Nulin are completing a special project upon my behalf, but I will send them to you as soon as they are available.”

“That level of commitment is unacceptable.”

“You have the full intelligence as to the capability of our foes. Their numbers are depleted, and their magical power is surely at its nadir.”

“Indeed, and that is more reason to not underestimate them. It would appear that Gau did so.”

“I have full confidence in your abilities. And consider; these invaders are potent, and are likely to have a comprehensive arsenal of magical items.”

“I am not some pathetic underling to be bribed with trinkets, cleric. And if you think to leave me out on a limb, perhaps to fall against these intruders...”

“If that were my intent, would I have bothered to reinforce you with the sorcerer and the glabrezu? Your vaunted intellect has you jousting at shadows, Freija. I believe that these invaders will be easily handled by what forces we have assembled, but should they prove more resourceful than I have anticipated, I have complete confidence that you will be the first to withdraw, and the last to fall.”

“Self-preservation is an instinct we all possess in abundance. Perhaps fanatics like yourself and Grehlia feel differently, but I will not throw my life away needlessly.”

“Nor would I expect it of you.”

“You are in a position of leadership in our cabal... but I am not yours nor any other being’s pawn.”

“Allow me to clarify my position: the Tree must be protected, at all cost. If that cost includes the giant and his mercenaries, or Baiul, or you, or every other one of the Thirteen, or even my own life, then I will pay it. Once the ritual is complete, and the portal between worlds secure, then and only then will I shift my attention to other matters.”

Freija’s eyes narrowed. “As will I.” She inclined her head in a tight gesture that might have been intended as a bow, then spun and strode stiffly away.

Chapter 359

Once they had bound the minor wounds suffered in the brief battle with the vrock, the companions continued deeper into the complex. Shortly thereafter they came to a split in the tunnel. Both options appeared identical, so they turned to the right. Their chosen way seemed to curve ever so slightly around to the left as they progressed further, until they’d left the intersection well behind them.

“It’s getting hotter,” Dannel commented.

“Well, we be in an active volcano,” Hodge grumbled.

“We could be nearing an active lava tube,” Arun said. “Be alert.”

“There’s a door up ahead,” Mole noted. The corridor came to an end there, with a pair of massive stone portals, each easily ten feet in height, offering the only obvious way to continue their explorations.

“Not a casual entry,” Nidrama said, stepping forward.

“Too bad Zenna’s not here; she could use her magic to see what lies beyond,” Mole said. As she finished speaking, she could sense the sudden tension that had come over the rest of them, in particular the stricken look that had crossed Dannel’s features before he was able to school his expression back to one of hard neutrality. “Ah, yeah, right, way to put your foot in it,” she mumbled to herself, before busying herself with the door. “I don’t see any traps,” she reported, after a few moments.

Arun gestured to Hodge, and the two dwarves sheathed their weapons, stepping up to the nearer of the double doors. Even with their combined strength, the door edged open only fractionally, as if resisting their efforts. A wave of heat greeted them as the doors slid open enough to reveal the area beyond, and a line of orange light glowed through the narrow slit. Mole leapt up onto Hodge’s shoulder, eliciting a protest from the dwarf, and peered through.

“Looks like a big cavern, full of lava,” she said.

“Any bridge or ledge that runs across?” Arun asked.

“I don’t see one. Open the door a bit more.”

The dwarves complied, with Nidrama reaching over them to add her strength to the effort. Finally Mole slid her head through the opening, and looked around, including a scan of the ceiling above.

“No way,” she said. “The whole floor is lava, with maybe a few islands here or there. I could hop across, but there’s no way you dwarves are going to make it without sprouting wings.”

“Is there another exit on the far side?” Dannel asked.

“I didn’t see one,” Mole said. “But it’s a big cavern; there may be something on the far side that I cannot see from here.”

Nidrama drew back. “I sense evil... old, deep.”

Arun nodded. “We may have to come back here... but for now, let’s try the other passage.”

They closed the door as best they could, and then retraced their steps back to the intersection. The other passage continued for only a relatively short distance, a few dozen paces, before splitting again into another passage that ran perpendicular to each side. To the left, they could see that the passage quickly opened into a larger chamber; to the right the corridor ran on for some distance straight ahead.

“Let’s check out that room,” Dannel said, but he hesitated as Mole suddenly appeared ahead of them. The gnome was pale.

“Torture chamber,” she said. “Recently used, I’d say. Stinks of demodands, but there aren’t any there now.”

“Any exits?” Arun asked.

“No, not that I could see.”

“It’s quiet,” Dannel said.

The others shared a quick look. They were all thinking the same thing; the Cagewrights were likely waiting for them somewhere ahead, at a point where they could attack from a position of best advantage.

“Well, let’s get to it, then,” Arun finally said, leading them back in the other direction. Mole, once again, had disappeared.

The remaining passage continued for maybe forty feet before ending in a small recessed door to the right. Mole—or rather, her voice, for she was still invisible—pronounced it free of traps, and after waiting a moment for them to check their weapons, Arun shouldered it open. A spacious room with a spartan décor lay beyond, obviously personal quarters for someone of at least medium rank. They took in the weapons racks, the narrow bed, the heavy carpets laid out upon the floor and hung upon the walls as cheap insulation. A plain iron brazier, currently unlit, likely served as a source of both heat and illumination. But the oddest thing about the place was set into the far wall; a bulky pipe organ, large enough to have served adequately in a cathedral to one of the more favored gods of the Realms. The thing appeared to have been built into the back wall of the room itself; apparently its owner had not been planning on relocating anytime soon.

“This place... there’s somethin’ not quite right about it...” Hodge said.

Arun nodded. There were little signs, subtleties in the arrangements of the modest furnishings, the choice of coverings for the walls and floor. Nidrama said, “The resident of this chamber is possessed of a damaged mind.”

“Guys,” Dannel said from behind them, directing their attention back out into the corridor. “There’s a secret door here.”

They retreated, giving the room a final cautionary look, and joined the elf. “Here,” Dannel said. “Either someone was careless, or we were meant to find it.” The portal was of excellent design, and looked indistinguishable from the surrounding wall, but Dannel indicated a narrow crack where the door hadn’t been returned fully into its setting.

“Trap?” Arun asked.

“Yer ain’t been payin’ attention,” Hodge said. “O’ course it’s a trap. Everythin’s a trap!”

“We might have missed something, another secret door,” Dannel noted. “And there’s the lava room.”

“Nidrama?” Arun asked.

“We knew when we came here that the road would be fraught with suffering.”

“Oy, that’s inspirin’,” Hodge said sarcastically, wiping his hand across his mouth.

“We should be prepared,” the celestial said, ignoring the dwarf as she refreshed their wards.

“Well, here we...” Arun began, turning to the portal.

He never got a chance to finish, for at that moment the entire door, along with a good section of the surrounding wall, just vanished, leaving behind only a few motes of dust that slowly drifted to the floor. Beyond lay a considerable chamber, a council room of some sort, dominated by a long, thin, oddly shaped table that ran most of the length of the room. The room was filled with a ruddy light that emitted from pools of lava at the corners. A single exit was visible at the far side of the chamber.

But they did not have the luxury of examining the chamber further, for it was here that the Cagewrights had prepared their ambush. Behind the table was arrayed a line of over a half-dozen humanoid warriors, muscular, dark-skinned creatures with ferocious, vaguely canine visages and thick layers of jet black fur covering their heads and the backs of their arms. They had longbows, with arrows at the ready. At the end of the table stood a massive fire giant, armed with a huge greatsword that burned with a bright, eager flame. Standing in the doorway opposite, behind the warriors, a figure stood in the shadows, its form obscured by the familiar shifting of magical displacement. Beside that figure stood a vrock demon, its wings twitching in anticipation.

And there was one other present, one already familiar to the companions. As the doorway was disintegrated, the glabrezu Nabthatoron lifted its adamantine claw, barking a sinister greeting as it fixed the Heroes of Cauldron with a terrible, eager stare.

Chapter 360

The companions, caught flat-footed by the suddenness of Freija's disintegration of the barrier between them, found themselves caught in an unenviable tactical position.

Arrows knifed through the air, powered by the mighty bows of the haraknin warriors. Their aim was expert, but the companions, warded by Nidrama's protection from arrows magic, avoided serious injury in that initial barrage. Unfortunately the protection was not sufficient to fully absorb the oblong iron missile the size of a man's skull hurled by Ti'irok Coalfire. The giant had laid his ammunition into the lava pool in anticipation of the battle, and the superheated lump, half-melted by the brief immersion, caromed off of Arun's shield, driving the paladin back a step as hot droplets of molten metal splashed onto his helmet.

Arun's situation grew more dire a moment later. Nabthatoron had not forgotten the foe that had taken its claw, and the glabrezu was not in a mood to mess around. Even as Ti'irok's missile struck hard and bounced off its target, the demon hurled a power word, stun that send the paladin reeling, staggering back against the wall of the passage.

Seeing Arun blasted by the demon's power, and noting in a quick glance the enemies arrayed against them, Dannel exclaimed, "Fall back!" But even as he reached for Arun, hoping to be able to drag the stunned dwarf free of this exposed position, he heard the sounds of creatures approaching from behind. He looked up to see a pair of kelubar demodands approaching, filling the tunnel with their bulk. Behind them, he could just see the outlines of an armored man, easily twirling a long length of spiked chain in his hands.

"Damn," the elf said.

And that's when the horrid wilting hit.

Freija Doorgan chuckled as she observed the effects of her magic upon the intruders. Thus far the ambush was going perfectly; while the adventurers seemed protected against the arrows of the haraknin—not that she'd expected much from the mercenaries in the first place—the glabrezu's magic had taken out their toughest fighter, and the screams as her horrid wilting ravaged them were quite... stimulating. The presence of a celestial had been a surprise; Shebelith's briefing had not indicated that any of them had the power to summon such an ally. But the deva looked hard-hit by the wilting, and the next spell would likely finish off the lot of them.

The half-fiend sorcerer made a desultory comment that she couldn't quite identify. Kaurophon had not seemed pleased when she'd ordered him to remain back, at her side. His cone of cold might have helped hasten the inevitable outcome here, but she didn't want to have to worry about allies getting in the way of her spells. The sorcerer was shrouded by greater invisibility, which was a problem for her, given her inability to cast divination spells, but thus far the sorcerer's mutterings had allowed her to keep track of his presence. She hadn't seen the gnome rogue yet, but was ready for Mole Calloran, if and when she made her appearance.

The elf, moving quickly despite the agony of the wilting, lifted his bow, an arrow already fitted to the string. For a split second, Freija thought she heard something odd—a few melodic notes?—but then the elf released his shot. She's known that the elf was an arcane archer, but even she was surprised when the arrow shifted as it left the bow, and suddenly multiple missiles were knifing across the room. Several haraknin took hits, and one arrow even knifed narrowly past her, fortunately piercing the false image projected by her displacement spell.

The conjurer mentally placed the elf on the next-to-destroy list.

The haraknin, following their orders, had already taken up their greataxes and started forward. She turned and barked a single-word command to her summoned vrock, but even as the creature eagerly leapt forward, flapping its wings to attack, a cloud of green vapors erupted around their enemies.

"That fool Baiul!" she exclaimed. "I told him, no obscuring spells!" The acid fog might further injure their foes, but it also gave them concealment, and would injure their own forces as they closed to melee. And Freija's tactical acumen extended to a simple principle: hit first, hit hard, and hit often, until your foe is no longer a threat. She did not want to give these enemies a chance to retreat, or to recover the initiative.

"It would appear that your friend is not as effective at controlling fiends as you are," Kaurophon said.

Freija's response was like ice. "Dispel the fog," she commanded, already focusing her mind on her next spell. What to bring next? Fiendish vermin were always enjoyable, but the space here was limited, and with the haraknin charging the melee would already be crowded. Perhaps a pack of yeth hounds? With their resistance to any but silver weapons, those were always a pain in the ass to deal with. Folding her hands in an intricate gesture, the conjurer began the familiar incantation that would draw minions across the barrier between worlds.

Intent upon her summoning, she did not even see the celestial erupt from the cloud, a fierce cry erupting from her lips, her sword lifted high as she flew in a line toward the glabrezu. The demon dominated the room, towering over the deva by an easy eight feet, its head nearly touching the ceiling above. But Nidrama did not hesitate in the face of this deadly adversary. Consumed by the urge to destroy the classic enemy of all celestials, the demon representing the polar opposite of all that she was, the deva flew directly at the glabrezu. Her sword seemed to sing as she drove it down in a glimmering arc that tore viciously into Nabthatoron's shoulder, releasing a spray of hot ichor that sizzled as it hit the air.

The wound was considerable, but it would take far more than that to destroy this adversary.

The mists of the acid fog faded, the magic holding it together disrupted by Kaurophon's dispel magic. The spell also had the salutary effect of stripping away a few of the wards that Nidrama had laid upon the companions, but it likewise removed some of the magical benefits enjoyed by the nearest of the Cagewright forces, already closing upon the companions. This included the two kelubar demodands, who eagerly lumbered forward to destroy the trapped intruders. With Arun stunned and defenseless, Hodge, despite feeling terrible from the wilting, stepped forward to meet them. The corridor was too narrow for both demodands to easily assault the dwarf together, but they did quite effectively block any route of escape. The nearer of the two lunged at Hodge with its long arms, but the dwarf merely stepped into its reach, shrugging off a painful blow to the shoulder, and laid into it with Arun's holy sword. Hodge used the weapon much as he would his axe, cleaving into the fiend's flabby torso, opening a terrible gash nearly five feet across, spilling its organs out in a mess of slime and gore upon the bare stone of the corridor floor. The kelubar gibbered in obvious distress, but it continued its attack, slashing and tearing eagerly at this foe a fraction of its size.

Dannel hurled himself to the side, narrowly avoiding the first diving assault of the summoned vrock. Behind it, he was all too aware of the line of mercenary warriors who were rapidly closing in. With Arun temporarily—he hoped it was only temporary—out of the fight, he had to hold the line. But his attention remained drawn to the enemy wizard, the source of the horrid wilting. Dannel knew enough about magic to know how dangerous this made the enemy spellcaster, and through the chaos of battle, the shouts and rapidly shifting figures, his sharp eyes caught a glimpse of the woman moving her hands in an intricate pattern. Another spell, on the way, and if it was taking this long, it would have to be a nasty one.

He did not hesitate. Even though it exposed him to the vrock hovering a few feet above, and even though it meant that he would be open to the charging haraknin, he drew back his bow, letting the song fill him once more, and released.

Freija, lost in her summoning, did not see the elf's shot; with all of the intervening foes and the added benefit of her displacement, she considered herself secure. Their enemies contained no spellcasters to threaten her, and while their swords were said to be quite effective, there was no way for them to reach her...

Pain exploded in her shoulder, as Dannel's seeker arrow, navigating the shifting openings through the melee, found its target. Her concentration, normally an unbreakable steel sphere of self-control, was broken as the missile pierced muscle and grated painfully off her clavicle before jutting out of her back. The wound was not life-threatening, but the pain was certainly no less intense for that.

For an incredulous moment Freija looked down at the arrow jutting from her shoulder. Then her gaze shifted down to the blossoming field of darker red that was spreading across her pristine velvet dress, transforming the expensive white lace trim into an ugly red mess.

At that sight the pain disappeared into the background, and Freija let out a terrible shriek.

“You... you... GOT ME DIRTY!” she screamed.

For all her pathological fixation on cleanliness, the next words that came from the conjurer’s mouth were decidedly... filthy.

While Freija Doorgan dealt with her personal demons, the Cagewright ambush, for all its initial clockwork timing and execution, had quickly devolved into a desperate and chaotic melee as the Heroes of Cauldron fought for their lives.

Dannel dropped his bow, drawing out Alakast as he tried to dodge the shrieking assault of the vrock. Unfortunately, this distraction meant that the elf could do nothing to protect Arun from a pair of haraknin warriors, who rushed in to finish the stunned paladin, their huge axes raised to strike.

But even as the first lunged in to deliver a critical blow, it stumbled on something. As it fell, the second mercenary was caught off-guard as a small but ferocious boar—coming out of nowhere, it seemed—appeared and attacked. The animal’s tusks failed to penetrate the haraknin’s thick hide, but they did get its attention.

The diminutive figure of Mole appeared across the fallen warrior’s back, slamming her rapier deep into the gap where its arm met its torso. The haraknin were durable combatants, however, and almost immediately the injured creature started to rise. Its companion, ignoring Mole’s conjured boar, spun and brought its axe around in a controlled sweep designed to remove the pest from its perch. But the gnome saw the attack coming, and at the last instant she sprang up above the sweep of the crescent blade, thrusting her little weapon out at the haraknin’s face. The creature was forced to dodge back, but even so it took a nasty gash across its brow. The boar continued its persistent attack, although its tusks barely scratched the haraknin’s leathery skin.

Mole’s efforts had won a few critical moments, but there were another seven haraknin behind the first pair, including a massive figure that muscled its way to the fore. This huge specimen, half a foot taller than its kin, wielded a two-handed sword that bore an obvious and seemingly contradictory enchantment; one edge was covered with hot licks of flame, while the other was surrounded by a rime of white frost.

“Uh oh,” Mole said, as Aszithef, Ti’irok Coalfire’s second in command, stepped forward with her magical sword Coldburn, ready to do some serious damage.

The glabrezu reeled from the initial ferocity of Nidrama’s assault, and for a few seconds the two seemed insulated from the rest of the melee merely by virtue of the demon’s height. The two, fiend and celestial, were acting out a rivalry that existed back to the beginning of time, and the deva’s ferocity seemed unmatched as she swept her blade deep into Nabthatoron’s body.

But her brave charge could not obviate the fact that Nidrama was greatly outmatched by this foe. The glabrezu’s thin inner claws reached out and took hold of the deva’s arms, seizing her long enough for it to bring up its huge pincer arm, equipped with the deadly adamantine claw that had been its prize for joining this struggle.

Nidrama saw her destruction coming and tried to draw away. But she'd been already seriously battered by the wilting, and she'd foresworn the full powers of her celestial ancestry by her decision to intervene in this mortal conflict. Wincing in pain she tore free from the glabrezu's claws, but too late to avoid the descending metal limb. The pincer caught her solidly in the chest, crushing her body, driving her down into the ground ten feet below with enough force to shake the volcanic stone. Her sword flew from her grasp, twisting end over end before it clattered noisily to the ground a few paces away.

The celestial, still somehow conscious despite the sundering of her body, looked up in defiance as Nabthatoron loomed over her. "This is not the end, demon," she spat, the words all but lost in the gurgling of her blood from her shattered torso into her lungs and throat.

The glabrezu's response was its heavy foot upon her chest, crushing what was left of her against the stone.

Chapter 361

The companions could do nothing to aid Nidrama, as their situation rapidly devolved from bad to worse.

Hodge had taken down the first kelubar with several strokes of his holy sword, the blessed steel opening huge gashes in the demodand's torso and legs. But even as the first foe fell, the second clambered forward over its ally to lay powerful blows upon Hodge's armored body. The dwarf was tough, but there was a limit to how much damage even he could absorb. Even as the titanic struggle continued, Baiul's insane laughter from behind continued, punctuated by sharp scratches as the mad cleric slapped his magical spiked chain against the nearby passage walls. With the kelubar in the way, there was no way for the priest to join the melee, but Baiul seemed content to observe, taking delight in the predicament of the intruders whose interference in the plans of the Cagewrights seemed to be coming to an end.

Dannel was likewise hard pressed. Already seriously hurt by Doorgan's wilting, the vrock was getting the better of him. He'd managed a solid blow with Alakast, which had hurt it, but in turn he'd taken several hits from its claws. It had also released a cloud of spores, which were starting to burrow painfully into his flesh. Unfortunately, there was little he could do; while he might have been able to reach the nearby door into the chamber with the pipe organ, he had little doubt that the vrock would pursue him until it had torn him to pieces.

Mole let out a sudden screech and threw herself backward off of her awkward perch on the back of the injured haraknin as Aszithet thrust Coldburn at her with controlled precision. The other haraknin gave way to their subcommander, letting her take the lead as she had in so many battles across the planes. Mole managed to avoid being run through, but the searing blade with its doubly-deadly enhancements cut along her body, sending twin lances of pain through her side.

Mole's efforts had bought a few vital instants, however, long enough for Arun to shake off the effects of Nabthatoron's power word. The paladin roared an invocation to Moradin as he lifted himself up off the wall and stepped up to the two haraknin Mole had engaged. One swept its axe at the dwarf, only to have its stroke diverted by Arun's shield. The paladin, in turn, unleashed a devastating series of attacks, the holy avenger tearing through its armor as though the magical chain links were merely decorative. The haraknin crumpled, blood fountaining from its wounds, and Arun continued his last stroke into the second foe, crunching his sword into its ribs, driving the shattered bones like arrowheads into its lung.

The preliminaries completed, the paladin stepped forward to meet Aszithef. But even as the two veterans engaged, Freija Doorgan unleashed another devastating gambit.

A bolt of lightning shot through the chamber, striking Dannel in the chest. The elf tried to dodge out of the way of the blast, but the stream of energy nevertheless stabbed through his body. Dannel's scream was cut off as his chest exploded in a spray of blood and gore. The chain lightning continued to explode in secondary blasts that tore mercilessly outward. Hodge was struck in the back even as the dwarf stabbed the second kelubar, and the dwarf went down. Mole dodged the bolt, but her boar was instantly incinerated. Arun took the blast full on, but the stream of liquid energy flared on the length of his sword, draining off through the power of the weapon. But as the flickering afterimage of the bolt faded, the paladin and the gnome were left nearly alone, still surrounded by deadly foes.

"Mole! Get out of here!" Arun said, blocking the first swing of Coldburn on his holy weapon, the two swords meeting in a flare of multicolored sparks.

Mole refused to give up, tumbling between Aszithef's legs, ready to set up a sneak attack in conjunction with Arun's assault. But even as the Mole sprang to her feet, a long limb stabbed into the melee, snapping her up. She screamed as Nabthatoron lifted her into the air, crushing her in its pincer. Around the demon's feet, six haraknin stood at the ready, and behind them the huge giant, Ti'irok Coalfire, stood confident in the victory of his minions, his own terrible sword apparently unnecessary. To the rear the injured kelubar lumbered forward over Hodge's inert and blackened form, its oozing flesh rippling as it reached out for Arun from behind. Baiul, in no hurry, laughed.

"It's over!" Freija Doorgan screamed. "You are done!"

Chapter 362

Dannel was dead. Hodge was down; if he wasn't dead now, he surely would be in a few moments. Nidrama was gone, the life crushed out of her by the glabrezu Nabthatoron. Mole was currently held firmly in the grasp of said demon.

Arun stood alone against an overwhelming force. In addition to the haraknin mercenaries and their giant commander, there was still Kaurophon, who hadn't contributed much thus far, and whose considerable spellpower remained in reserve. Freija Doorgan had unleashed terrible magic upon the intruders, but still maintained numerous spells in her arsenal. And both a kelubar and Decrihni Baiul blocked the only means of escape.

Arun lashed out, taking the kelubar's lunging arm off at the elbow, and driving even the fierce Aszithef back with a powerful backswing. As the demodand gave way, Arun shifted his position, taking up a defensive stance over Hodge's unmoving form. A few paces away lay Dannel's corpse, his face left intact with a look of incredulity frozen on his fair features, his torso open in a gory mess below. A momentary lull fell over the battle, with the haraknin facing off against the paladin on one side, and the crippled kelubar and the accompanying cleric on the other. Mole struggled in the glabrezu's grasp, but could not escape the pincer that crushed her body like a steel vise.

"You fought... bravely, noble warrior," Freija said, stepping forward. Her words were given the lie by the thick sarcasm that dripped from every syllable. "You were bold indeed, to think that you could undo the plans of the Cagewrights."

"You will fail," Arun said, wiping blood from his mouth with the back of his gauntleted fist. He stood in a heap of sundered flesh and gore, surrounded by the mangled forms of a kelubar and the two haraknin he'd slain. They could not all rush him at once, but several of the haraknin had already recovered their bows, and loaded steel-tipped sheaf arrows to the strings.

Freija Doorgan laughed. "Your inability to accept the reality of your defeat is amusing, but I have little time to spare for idle parley. The hour of our victory is upon us, you know. Were we less pressed for time, I might enjoy watching you break, paladin. They all break, in the end."

"I will enjoy seeing your broken corpse, dwarf," Nabthatoron intoned.

"And my vengeance is fulfilled, as well," came a voice, which materialized into the familiar figure of Kaurophon, as the sorcerer shed his invisibility. "It is a shame; you could have been truly great, if you had chosen instead to serve me as Lord of Occipitus."

Baiul spat something incoherent, but quickly subsided.

Arun stood defiant. The bright glow of his holy sword seemed to intensify in his grip, and the paladin's bearing, for all the odds against him, and the friends he'd lost, there was a noble glory that infused him that these foes could not shatter. He'd drawn upon his link to his patron, filling him with Order's Wrath as he prepared for the final stand that had to end in only one way. He looked up at Mole, met the gnome's eyes briefly. He would do his best to give her a chance to escape, at the last.

"So be it," Doorgan said. With a desultory wave of her hand to her troops, she stepped back to watch the end, her eyes casting a feral glow in the echoed brightness of the lava pools.

Time slowed as many things happened at once.

Baiul, hearing a noise behind him through the mad gibbering that sounded more or less constantly in the prison of his insane mind, turned around. His eyes widened in disbelief as he witnessed something unusual, if not unprecedented. A small group of fiends had approached them from behind. The sleek, sensual figure of a succubus was in the lead, her eyes pinpoints of burning fire. With her was a fat imp, walking along the ground, and the ebon figure of a jovoc demon, clad in a coat of black plates, clanking slightly with every movement.

For a heartbeat, Baiul was too surprised to react, his jaw hanging open as he regarded the newcomers. Just as his mind was starting to register that something wasn't quite right, the succubus stepped forward, and spoke a single word of power.

Reality trembled as a surge of clarion energy swept outward in a wave from the demoness. Baiul screamed and clutched at his ears, deafened by the purity of the sound, but he was not the worst off. The vrock demon instantly vanished, banished back to its home plane, as did the crippled kelubar. The haraknin likewise staggered back, and more than half of them disappeared as they were driven from the Prime. Of the three that remained, two were struck down, paralyzed and helpless, while Aszithef, while keeping her feet, was blinded. The giant was not affected, nor was the glabrezu, whose spell resistance held against the potency of the magic. Nor was Freija Doorgan harmed by the holy word, although she shrieked in anger as the tide of battle suddenly shifted against her.

Baiul, gibbering madly, lifted his spiked chain to bring down this false succubus who'd spoken a word that should have been anathema to her. But before he could strike, the jovoc lifted a heavy axe and tore into him with an unbridled ferocity. He could not hear the mighty impact of the weapon as it slammed into him repeatedly, but he certainly felt it as the strokes crushed armor plates and the bones underneath. It was the last thing he felt, as a final stroke drove through his gorget and separated his head from his shoulders.

Invisibility fell from another figure like a shed cloak, revealing a tall, bearded man clad in a dark tunic over which he wore a shirt of shimmering black chain links. He had a longbow at the ready, and as he became visible he released an arrow at the glabrezu. Even as the first shaft was fired, he was reaching back to his quiver for a second, firing and aiming in a rapid sequence that bespoke great training. The arrows looked tiny against the hulking figure of the huge demon, but each of them seemed to strike with the force of a battering ram, staggering the glabrezu. The first two shots sank deep into its body, while the third penetrated its arm just above the claw. The force of that shot slightly loosened its grip upon Mole, who instantly seized the opportunity to slip free and drop lightly to the ground.

"Benzan, wizard!" the imp warned, pointing across the room. The archer looked furious as he scanned the battlefield, his gaze finally settling upon Freija Doorgan. The conjurer, no stranger to the fury of men, nevertheless felt a cold chill at the intensity of that stare.

"Where's my daughter?" Benzan shouted, as he fitted another shaft to his deadly bow.

Chapter 363

Confronted by a new set of—apparently very dangerous—adversaries, Freija Doorgan did not hesitate. Speaking the words of another spell, she conjured up a shimmering forcecage that engulfed the newcomers, surrounding them with solid walls of force that offered no escape. The demon woman with her damned holy word was outside of the cage, behind it, but no matter; the prison was large enough to block the passage, and that was what Freija had sought to accomplish. The dwarf paladin and the gnome were on her side of the wall, but both were far enough way to be discounted as threats of the immediate moment. She looked around for Kaurophon, but the sorcerer had disappeared again. No big surprise there, she thought; she'd had him pegged as a coward from the moment they'd met.

“Finish the paladin!” she urged, although she suspected that the half-fiend had already fled. In any case, there was no obvious response to her command.

The force-prison's walls were transparent, so she could see as the imp gestured in an obvious spellcasting motion, a suspicion confirmed a moment later as he disintegrated the walls of the forcecage.

Freija was already backing toward the exit, holding a prismatic spray at the ready.

The succubus stepped forward. “Destroy the fiend,” she said.

Another being became visible beside her—a perfectly formed, winged youth, clad in a golden breastplate, carrying a heavy mace in both hands. The astral deva eagerly leapt at Nabthatoron, his body shining with the bright glow of a holy aura. The demon growled and swept its augmented claw in a violent arc designed to crush its second celestial victim of the day, but this time the glabrezu's attack was deflected as the angel parried the massive limb with his weapon.

This time, Nabthatoron had met a foe that could give it a real fight.

Ti'irok Coalfire stepped into the fray, defending his stricken haraknin by unleashing a terrible onslaught upon Arun with his massive sword Blackfire. The unholy sword drove through the paladin's defenses with ease, and within moments the holy warrior was on the brink of sharing the destruction already suffered by his companions.

“Lok!” the imp cried in warning, but the jovoc was already rushing forward. It was big for its kind, close to five feet tall, but it still looked puny against the hulking, muscular figure of the giant. But that impression was broken a moment later as the small demonoid leapt forward through the giant's guard, ignoring a late attack of opportunity that crushed hard into the armored plates covering its back. The giant lifted the weapon to strike again, but could not complete its attack before its foe charged ahead and slammed his axe deep into the giant's meaty thigh. Coalfire roared in pain, and drove Blackfire down to sunder this annoying gnat.

But somehow, the gnat refused to be smoten, taking the hit with a mere grunt before unleashing another series of deadly counterattacks.

Everything seemed confused to Arun as he staggered and nearly fell, hovering on the brink of consciousness. His friends, dead or dying... Fiends attacking fiends, another celestial appearing out of nowhere... whom were the enemies, and whom allies? The hits from the giant had been incredible, and added to the impact of the horrid wilting had reduced him to the limits of even his incredible stamina.

Then he felt a presence next to him, and looked up to see the face of the succubus. She wore a visage of evil, her body lean and seductive, clad in tight leather that accentuated the curves of her form. Reflexively, Arun reached for his holy sword, but he was halted by her eyes, as their gazes locked. Those eyes... those eyes were kind, sympathetic.

And then a cold surge of positive energy rushed through him, healing his wounds. With a shock he realized that he had been completely restored, the beneficiary of the most potent of healing spells.

"Who... who are you?" he managed to ask.

"A friend, Arun Goldenshield... a friend." She smiled, but the look became one of concern as she looked to her right. "I fear that Lok may need your help with this one," she said, indicating the giant.

Arun nodded, but he hesitated for one instant more, looking down to where Hodge lay face-down a few paces away. Arun had tried to stabilize him with a trickle of healing energy, but the paladin's powers had been drained over the course of this very long day, and he'd only managed the faintest hint of curative power. He did not know if his cohort yet lived. "My friend..."

"I will do what I can," the woman promised. Arun nodded, and taking up his sword, rushed back into the fray.

The archer Benzan tracked the retreating conjurer, waiting for the slightest move that would indicate a spell being cast, ready to disrupt it with a well-placed arrow. It looked like she was intent on retreat, though, so he decided to just go ahead and unleash a full barrage.

But before he could release his shot, he was distracted by the intensity of the fray in the middle of the room. The astral deva had laid into Nabthatoron solidly with his heavy mace, landing punishing blows that had caved in segments of the demon's torso. But the demon responded with an equally vigorous counterattack, tearing with its smaller claws, and finally catching the celestial hard with a sweep of its adamantine claw. The impact knocked the angel off-balance, sending him fluttering awkwardly to the ground to land in a half-crouch, shaking his head to clear it.

Unfortunately, he was still within the glabrezu's reach, and the adamantine claw came up to deliver a crushing blow before the demon's adversary could recover.

Benzan shifted his aim, releasing his arrow and immediately drawing another, directing his rapid-fire stream of arrows at the glabrezu. Again the shafts slammed into it with the force of shots from a ballista. Each missile released a bright glow like that of a miniature sun as it vanished into the demon's body. The demon, transfixed, could not respond, and finally a last arrow slammed into its chest, piercing its heart before it exploded out from its back in a spray of white light and ichor.

Nabtharon regarded its enemies with an incredulous look, and then expired, falling backward across the Cagewright's meeting table with enough force to crack the heavy stone object. The room shook with the impact, momentarily drawing the attention of everyone in the room to the fallen creature.

Benzan looked at his handiwork, glanced at the quiver at his hip, and shook his head.

"Damn, those holy arrows are expensive, too."

Ti'irok Coalfire was slowing, bleeding from several serious wounds. It limped now, the Achilles tendon on its left ankle deeply scored by Mole's knife. It faced two implacable foes that inflicted devastating wounds upon it, for all that neither could reach higher than the giant's waist. Lok had taken several mighty hits that should have killed him, but clad in adamantine plate, tougher than any mortal creature had a right to be, he simply absorbed the impacts and fought on. Arun, meanwhile, restored to health, smote his holy sword through the giant's leg, hewing at it as though he were a mad lumberjack hewing at the bole of an ancient oak.

A few feet away, Aszithef stood powerlessly in a defensive stance, blind and deaf, trying to fight off the aftereffects of the holy word. At her feet lay the two other haraknin not banished by the spell, utterly helpless as their bodies refused to obey their commands.

In the face of that assault, there was only one possible outcome. The giant finally surrendered, dropping its sword as it fell to its knees, unable to stand on its battered legs. "I yield! Spare my servants, and we will surrender to you!"

Lok, suspicious, kept his axe at the ready. Arun, tired of the slaughter, lowered his sword, but did not relax his vigilance. "Command your 'servant', then, to drop her weapon," he directed.

The giant said something in a language they did not comprehend. Aszithef, apparently at least partially recovered, heard and responded in kind, and then dropped Coldburn to the ground. Even in defeat, unarmed and still unable to clearly see, the haraknin bore a noble air, standing defiant.

"The mage got away," Benzan said, as the warriors took the defeated mercenaries into custody, divesting them of weapons and other valuable gear. "And there was another guy with her... he went invisible, I think."

"Keep watch," the succubus said to the deva, who nodded and took up a warding position at the far exit. She knelt beside Hodge, and turned her attention to him, healing the dwarf. The battered warrior stirred, and as he caught a glimpse of his savior his eyes widened, and he exclaimed a startled curse.

The woman sighed. "Cal, I think we can drop the veil now."

“Very well,” the imp said, waving his hand. Instantly the “demons” changed form. The imp was replaced by a stout gnome clad in a rich blue robe, with numerous pouches dangling from various belts, and an array of wands jutting from a bandolier at his waist. The jovoc warrior became a dwarf clad in plate armor of dark adamantine... or at least he looked like a dwarf, for when he removed his full helm his features were revealed to be of a consistency and color similar to granite. The archer did not change form, but the succubus was revealed to be an attractive human woman of middle age, clad in comfortable garments in brown and green, with a silvery cloak and the sigil of a crescent moon at her throat.

“Who are you people?” Arun asked, even as Mole exclaimed, “Uncle Call!”

Chapter 364

Freija Doorgan battled a combination of seething rage and ongoing stabbings of terrible pain as she half-ran, half-scuttled down the corridor. Tears born in both emotions streamed down her face, and she struggled with the last shards of her dignity as she glanced back over her shoulder every few steps, alert to any sign of pursuit.

She should have heard something, if they were coming after her; the fiendish tiger she’d summoned to delay pursuit would certify that. It should, anyway.

And according to Regidin, she should have had no difficulties dealing with the intruders, either.

Her shoulder felt like it was on fire. Damn her for not bringing a healing potion. Damn Regidin for not granting her more reinforcements. And most of all, damn those adventurers.

She’d had matters well in hand. Where had those others come from? Disguised as fiends, they could have been anyone... Did they have additional rivals to contend with? The Cagewrights had lots of enemies...

Could it have been? No. He could not know of their plans... Could he? Freija felt a cold thrust of pure fear stab through her, cutting through the pain of her wound as if it wasn’t even there. If he had found out about their ultimate plans...

“Well, hello there, my dear.”

Freija started in surprise. She’d been so intent on the passage behind her, she’d almost run into the group coming up the tunnel toward her. She tried to recover her gravitas, but with an arrow jutting from her shoulder and blood staining her dress, that was a fairly difficult procedure.

The two individuals before her were as odd a matched pair as one could possibly expect to find. Ardeth Webb was a lean, muscled figure of a woman, her otherworldly heritage instantly obvious in the nubs of ivory horn that jugged from her forehead. She was clad only in a tight, form-fitting suit of white silk that left bare her upper arms, belly, and ample chest. Much of her exposed flesh bore intricate multicolored tattoos. Like Freija, most of her accoutrements were practical rather than fashionable, infused with potent magic that augmented her physical talents. In Webb's case, this involved the ability to pound just about anything living into a shapeless mass of bloody ooze within a matter of seconds.

The monk's companion was a middle-aged human man whose sardonic expression seemed etched onto his face. He looked like a soft merchant at first glance, but that was an erroneous first impression that had proved deadly for more than one person in the past. Nulin "Fish" Wiejeron was a master assassin, and the rapier dangling at his belt with a gem-studded decorative hilt was a potent magical weapon, rather than some noble's fob. He too bore numerous magical adjuncts upon his person. Freija had spent some effort cataloguing the various magical items owned by each of the Cagewrights, and collectively they would create an inventory that would rival the best guild storehouses and shops in the great metropolises of the Heartlands.

Behind the pair two dark shadows stood, identifiable instantly by their stench. Farastu demodands, which Freija quickly dismissed with a haughty sniff.

"Why, my dear, I do believe I've never before seen you this... mussed," Wiejeron offered.

She'd intended to keep her cool, but Freija could not stifle a retort that came out like a feline hiss. "Fool! The intruders have broken through the outer defenses, and slain Coalfire and his minions. Regidin's 'allies' were worse than useless; that half-fiend sorcerer of his turned invisible and fled, and is probably already looting our stockpiles as we speak."

"Nothing came this way, invisible or no," Webb said. Her voice was like silk sliding over glass, soft and sibilant.

Freija mastered herself with an effort, despite the agony of her shoulder. "The point is, they will be coming, if they are not already. Regidin was wrong about their strength; the adventurers from Cauldron have been reinforced by a small group of powerful spellcasters disguised as fiends."

The two other Cagewrights did not betray anything at that statement, but Freija knew that they would quickly make the same connections that she had.

Webb finally shrugged. "They will fail. Already the ritual is nearly complete."

'Nearly' is not 'finished'! Freija thought. She knew more than any of them just how true that was, and she thought of the failsafe she'd been tasked with integrating into the Tree. Regidin knew what she did, and her lips tightened as she recollected their earlier conversation.

"So now we have two groups of foes arrayed against us, eh?" Wiejeron said. Freija wondered if the man's idle façade concealed an inner worry, of if the man was truly feeble-minded.

“Now that you have finally deigned to join the defense, you can go see for yourselves,” Freija said. “I must return to my quarters, and restore myself before the next confrontation.” She started to walk past them, but Wiejeron forestalled her. It was uncanny the way the man moved, sometimes; one moment he was standing to the side, and then suddenly he was there, in front of her.

“An ancillary defense is being established close to the Tree,” the assassin said. “Webb will escort you, and see that your wound is tended, my dear. I suspect that we shall have need of your spells, if these intruders are as dire a threat as you say. Regidin no doubt will wish to query you regarding their abilities, as well.”

Freija did not respond, but Webb grinned, cracking her knuckles noisily as she settled her petite hands into the fists that the conjurer knew could shatter stone. For a moment, the conjurer had to fight for self-control as the words to her prismatic spray spell came unbidden to the surface of her mind, so close that her tongue began to shape itself into the first syllable of the spell.

But she was still in control. Gritting her teeth, she nodded. “Let us go, then,” she said.

Wiejeron waved his hand idly. “I think I will go on ahead, and take a quick look at these intruders.” He shot a quick look at Webb, then turned down the passage.

“I summoned a guardian,” Freija interjected, regretting the words as soon as she’d said them. Wiejeron’s smile was tinged with contempt, and then he was gone. No spell, no trick of the Art that she might have followed, just... gone.

The man was very, very, good at what he did.

“Come then,” Webb said, her words dripping with false sympathy. “Let’s see to your injury.”

The two women returned down the passage, the two farastus following a short distance behind them.

Chapter 365

“I am sorry that we could not get here sooner,” Cal said, as they gathered around the body of Dannel.

Dana knelt beside the gruesome corpse. The white shafts of his ribs shone too-bright in the ruddy light, stabbing into the air. Between them, there was little left but blackened shreds of flesh and broken links of mithral armor.

“How is he?” Cal asked.

“e’s dead, ye daft gnome,” Hodge growled.

Cal raised an eyebrow, but did not reply as he watched Dana, her brow furrowed in concentration as she slowly passed her hands over the dead elf’s body.

In the aftermath of the battle, there had not been time for more than perfunctory introductions between the two groups. Mole had mentioned her uncle, Balander Calloran, to them before, and there was in fact a slight familial resemblance evident in the features of the two gnomes. The others were Lok, a mixed-breed dwarf/earth genasi whose fighting skill had already been revealed to them; Lady Dana Ilgarten, a priestess of Selûne and mystic wanderer; and her husband Benzan, an arcane trickster with a diverse mastery of stealth, steel, and spell. Arun greeted them cautiously, although inwardly he was grateful for their timely appearance. The paladin currently was keeping a close eye on their captives along with Benzan, although the giant and his three remaining haraknin seemed content to remain where they were, unarmed and nursing their wounds.

“How did you know to find us here at all?” Mole asked, as Dana drew out a scroll from her pouch.

“Dannel contacted us,” Cal explained. “We’ve been keeping an eye on the situation here in Cauldron for some time now, ever since we found out that you two had settled down here. Events clearly outpaced us here; even so we would have been here sooner, but the cult of Cyric was making a bid to seize control of the Western Heartlands, and we were the ones in the right place to put a stop to it. Turns out we were virtually neighbors to their base of operations; they’d suborned the government and military of the city-state of Iriaebor, through the brilliant machinations of a Spur Lord who’d made himself the virtual king of that city.”

“We found this out about a month ago, and since then we’ve been fighting almost non-stop as we’ve unraveled the complex skeins of the Cyricist plot. In fact, we were right in the midst of laying low the Twin Towers of the Eternal Eclipse, in northeastern Amn, when we got the message from Dannel.” He looked at Benzan, who wore a look of fierce determination that betrayed also more than a hint of frustration. Lowering his voice, the gnome continued, “More than a few times he wanted to come here, to find Izandra, to bring her back home. Dana told him that she would have resented and resisted any efforts to control her, and I supported her. But now... he blames himself, for what happened.”

“We’ll find her, don’t worry,” Mole said. “We’ve gotten out of lots tougher scrapes than this one.”

“Yes... I’ve heard a great deal about your accomplishments, and checked in on you a few times as well; covertly, of course. I’m very proud of you... of both of you, Clarese. We all are.”

“Well,” the gnome said, blushing slightly. “We just kinda all got caught up in the flow of events.”

“Don’t be modest. You’ve done a great number of things in a very short time, and overcome some incredible challenges. Ah, good, Dana’s doing the resurrection. This may take some time.”

“What about Nidrama?” Mole asked. “Our celestial... the glabrezu stomped her.” After the battle, they’d found nothing of the celestial but her magical wand of healing, her two-handed flaming sword, and a faintly golden outline etched onto the stone where she’d died.

“I don’t know... we can ask Dana’s planar ally, perhaps.” He smiled wistfully. “I remember when it was badgers we summoned to our cause... and we were glad to have them.”

“Nothing ever stays simple,” Mole said.

“True, Clarese.”

“It’s Mole, now.”

“Ah.” The older gnome smiled. “So it is. If fits you. You know, your mother still has hopes for you to settle down and take over the family business.”

Mole’s lips tightened in a gesture of dismay. “Calloran Imports. Yuck, booring...”

“Yes, well, she blames me, you know, and my stories, for diverting you from a ‘proper’ life-calling.”

“I wouldn’t give it up for the world. Adventuring, I mean.”

“The cold, the mud, the long treks, the sleeping outdoors, short rations, and constant fights?”

“No...” She shrugged. “The other stuff.”

He touched her shoulder. “Yes, I understand exactly what you mean.”

On the other side of the room, near their prisoners, the genasi warrior, Lok, turned to Arun. “You serve the Soul Forger?”

Arun nodded. “I have been called to serve.”

“I have traveled far, but never have I encountered one of the golden dwarves.”

“Well, I haven’t seen a dwarf genasi before, though I have heard of such combinations.”

“My story is a long one,” Lok said. “For another time, perhaps.”

“I would welcome such an opportunity.”

The genasi nodded. “You fight well.”

“Thank you. You, as well.”

Hodge came over to join the two warriors. “So, what we doin’ with this lot, then?” the dwarf asked.

“The giant claims that he is a mercenary, with no particular loyalty to the Cagewrights or their plans.” Arun said.

“Oy, but ‘e’ll take their gold fair ‘nuff, is that it? And if a city gets blasted to bits, ‘at’s not ‘is problem, eh?”

Arun did not equivocate. “We have accepted their surrender. To kill them in cold blood is not acceptable.”

“Yer not goin’ to let them go? Mark me, that giant’ll turn on ye as soon as ye blink.”

“If they are that foolish, then he will earn his fate,” Lok said simply, hefting his axe in a gesture that was simple, and no less menacing for it.

Dana continued the ritual of resurrection, while the rest of the group kept watch. Cal treated Mole’s injuries with one of his wands, and the gnome rogue busied herself by collecting loot from both their slain foes and the prisoners. The haraknin and the giant made no move to interfere; perhaps it was the steely stares of Arun and Lok that promised dire consequences if they so much as moved; maybe it was the barely-contained rage in Benzan’s cold eyes.

Within about a minute, Mole had collected a small pile of loot which she laid out at the end of the stone table. Benzan came over to join her.

“I thought I was a veteran looter, but it looks like I must defer to a true master,” he said to her.

“We get lots of practice,” Mole said, “What with all the high-powered bad guys who keep trying to kill us.”

“Yes, I know what you mean.” The tiefling indicated the pile. “Anything good?”

Mole held up a golden ring she’d taken from one of the slain haraknin. “They were well equipped, for mercenaries, but I expect that the wizard probably had the best stuff.”

“We’ll get another shot at her, don’t worry,” Benzan said, his hands tightening on the shaft of his bow.

“My uncle says that the most important rule of tactics is to always take out the wizard first.”

“You know, I think I may have heard that before.” He indicated the massive corpse of the glabrezu, astride the broken table. “You know, I did take out that demon.”

Mole looked up at him, a mischievous grin on her face, and shrugged. “Not bad, I suppose... of course, I once goosed an adult red dragon...”

Another minute passed into two, three. A blue glow had settled around Dannel’s body, and as they watched his broken form began to slowly knit back together, into wholeness.

Dana's voice grew stronger even as her incantation drew on, and finally she shuddered, unleashing the final words that drew a momentary surge of divine power through her, into the slain elf.

"Go on, we'll keep an eye on them," Lok said to Arun and Hodge. While the genasi and tiefling covered the prisoners, the surviving Heroes of Cauldron walked over to their fallen friend. Dannel looked at peace, now, his body reformed, his bare flesh pink in the reddish glow of the lava pools.

"He'll need new armor," Arun said.

"If ye can bring him back, from that..." Hodge breathed, "There ain't nothin' that can't be done..."

"If only that were so," Cal said, looking to Dana. The two shared a sad look, an old pain briefly revisited. But then Dannel stirred, his eyes fluttering before opening fully, groaning as he shifted his newly-whole body.

"Welcome back, Dannel," Mole said warmly.

The elf gradually became aware of his surroundings. "I was dead..."

"Were ye ever," Hodge said. "Yer guts were strewn—" he cut off, silenced by a hard look from Arun. "What?"

Dannel's mind cleared enough to recognize the presence of others here with them. He finally settled on the tall woman who rose slowly, her expression tired but pleased.

"Lady Ilgarten," he said, with amazement.

"Yes, Dannel Ardan. We've come... a bit late, but we've come."

"If you're up to it, lad, we have some unfinished business with these folks," Cal said.

Dannel rose, gratefully accepting help from Arun. He found his bow where he'd dropped it, what felt like an eternity ago.

"Let's do it, then."

Chapter 366

With their companion restored to them, the adventurers—both groups—turned to the far doorway where the enemy conjurer had escaped. Dannel's armor was ruined, but he appropriated one of the magical chain shirts formerly worn by the haraknin, gingerly sliding it over his still-tender torso.

"They've had a good ten minutes, and I don't think they'll have wasted it," Benzan said. "What exactly are we dealing with, here?"

“Fiends. Lots of ‘em. Big ones,” Hodge said.

“The Cagewrights include thirteen individuals of great power, and varied talents,” Arun said. “We’ve killed one, already... the giant minotaur.”

“Yes, we saw her as we came in,” Cal said. “That must have been quite a fight.”

“Great, that just leaves twelve,” Benzan said. “And I’m already running low on holy arrows.”

Arun nodded. “Nidrama knew more... she was a celestial who aided us; the glabrezu killed her.”

“I hope for her sake that she was not called here,” Dana said.

“I do not know. She did sacrifice something to join us.”

The deva turned to them as they approached the far door. “I must remind you, Lady Ilgarten, that my time of service is limited by the terms of the Compact, which governs our agreement.”

“As are our buffs,” Cal added. “Some of the short-duration ones have already lapsed, I’m afraid. If we’re going to do this, we should be about it while our abilities are at their strongest.”

“Ah, we’ve kinda been going nonstop for about a tenday already,” Mole said. “You know, volcano erupting, fiends falling from the sky, that kind of thing.”

Cal looked at her. “Well, if you like, you can go up and wait for us above. We won’t be too long, I don’t think.”

“I believe our dwarvish friend over there has a standard response to those sorts of comments, but I won’t repeat it, as we’re in mixed company. No way I’m going to miss the finale, Uncle Cal.”

“What about the giant and his minions?” Lok asked.

“I can deal with them quickly enough,” Benzan said. Arun frowned, and Cal shook his head. “We’ve been down that path before, my friend,” the gnome said.

Dana turned to the deva. “Transport them someplace where they will do no harm.”

The creature nodded, and walked over to the giant and the three haraknin. The mercenaries did not resist as the deva gathered them, then collectively plane shifted them away to some other reality.

“Yet another enemy who survives to bear us a grudge,” Benzan said. “Yet another decision that may come back to bite us at a later date.”

“We’ve faced such before, Benzan. Better that than to compromise what we are,” Dana said.

“What exactly is that? Fools?”

“You took the same oaths that I did, Benzan. We both serve the same ends, and I think you believe the same things, even if you’re too stubborn to admit it.”

“I wear the pin, Dana, but that doesn’t mean that I’m just a Harper lackey...”

The two faced off for a moment, something intense passing silently between them.

“They were like this even before they were married,” Cal whispered aside to Mole.

Finally, Benzan turned and strode toward the door. “Enough useless banter, let’s be about this,” Benzan said. Drawing out a wand, he made himself invisible.

“With you guys here with us, they won’t know what hit them,” Mole said, also disappearing.

Unfortunately, the gnome was very, very wrong.

Chapter 367

Shebeleth Regidin could not help but feel a sudden twist in his gut as he stepped into the huge underground chamber. In the last twenty years he’d passed through trials that had forever changed him, such that emotion, at least as normal mortals experienced it, had been all but burned out of him. But this place still had the power to affect him. How could it not, he thought, staring up at the culmination of the Cagewrights’ efforts. The Tree of Shackled Souls was a dark shadow of black lines and ugly angles, despite the surrounding illumination. Strands of coruscating energy formed and unformed around the boughs of the tree, a flickering halo of violent surges of black and gray that were utterly and coldly silent.

“It is beautiful, is it not,” came a voice from the left.

Regidin turned as the hulking bulk of Dyr’ryd materialized from the shadows. In the pulsating light from the lava flows that crisscrossed the floor of the chamber, the shator’s bloated and layered flesh appeared lurid and sickly. But the monstrous demodand also shone with the glow of power, a power attenuated to its fullest expression in this place, at this time. One massive hand was encased in a steel gauntlet, and it carried an equally huge guisarme with a blue-tinged steel blade that eagerly flashed in the ruddy light of the chamber. There was a growth that bulged from the side of its head like a cancer, a horror in its own right, for that misshapen form was the residence of the second of the two personalities that dwelled within the hulking form of the fiend. An aberration twice over, the foul leader of the Cagewrights likewise shared the peculiar madness that had driven each of the Thirteen to this conclusion.

Regidin, familiar with the mannerisms of the demodand, waited until the two entities had acknowledged him and settled out the inner hierarchy through which they would deal with him. It was the mouth of the shator that spoke next, although the tiny symbiant—parasite?—seemed to be watching him intently.

“The intruders draw near.”

“Yes. They have battered through our outer defenses, including Gau and Coalfire’s mercenaries.”

“And your two recruited allies.”

Regidin shrugged. “They gave their best for the cause. The Heroes of Cauldron have been reinforced by a new cohort of powerful interlopers, with potent allies at their call.”

The tiny Ryd symbiant chortled. “We knew that she had powerful friends, yes, yes. Gave them a nice invitation, we did.”

The slight twist to Regidin’s lips might have been a frown. “She was the key. What was done, was what had to be done.”

The huge demodand’s jaws smacked noisily. “The ritual of planar binding is not yet complete. The Tree must be defended, at all costs.”

Regidin nodded. “I am already gathering our remaining forces to destroy the intruders. Thearynn is not allowing himself to be found, but I have collected the rest of the Thirteen, and the few demodands left to us. Unfortunately, the ritual is interfering with our ability to draw more allies from Carceri.”

“Defend the Tree,” the shator repeated. “Soon, soon the gate will be secure, and then this place will become one with the prison plane. Then, the Master will be free, and our rewards will be great...” Ryd chuckled, a terrible sound as the shator finished speaking.

Regidin did not comment.

“Go,” Dyr’ryd said, both mouths speaking in unison. “We will remain with the artifact, and guide the ritual to its conclusion. Go.”

Regidin offered no farewell, merely turned and departed.

* * * * *

“You will listen and mark my words, fiends,” Freija Doorgan said, her words like knives in the relatively narrow confines of the passageway. Her fury was fueled not only by her still-fresh humiliation at the hands of the enemy adventurers, but by the terrible stench given off by the demodands crammed with her into the cramped space. Her wounds had been healed by Grehlia Cairnis, who stood now a few paces away, watching her with bright eyes that shone like twin orbs of cut ice. No doubt that tiefling bitch Webb was somewhere nearby; the monk hadn’t let Freija out of her sight since they’d parted with Wiejeron not more than fifteen minutes ago.

The conjurer poured her fury out against the demodands, who wisely knew better than to rise to the challenge. Even Regidin's pet shator, a miserable beast named Keeriv, said nothing as she laid down her commands. Regidin had ordered all of the remaining demodands to obey her before he'd left to meet with Dyr'ryd, true, but all of the fiends had considerable egos and only seemed to follow the orders of the Thirteen when it suited them.

Or when a furious wizardess with a prismatic spray at the ready was raging at them.

"There will be no fogs, no acid clouds, this time. You will remain invisible until our signal, and then assault the enemy with acid arrows and rays of enfeeblement. You kelubars will target the spellcasters. Farastus will weaken the warriors. Now, is that simple enough for your feeble brains to grasp?"

Keeriv rumbled, a sound like an avalanche erupting from deep within its huge body. "And how do I fit into your plans, conjurer?"

Freija's eyes narrowed, as she sifted through the comment for insult. "You, my dear shator, you will destroy their celestial ally." Her lips tightened into a dark smile. "And once he is gone, then you may have your way with whichever of the enemy remains."

The shator nodded, its own monstrous mouth twisting into a smile at the anticipation of unleashing destruction.

Of course, if it had known the entirety of what Freija Doorgan had planned, it might have been less amused.

Chapter 368

The Heroes of Cauldron, now bolstered by the Travelers, set out once again deeper into the Cagewright stronghold. Despite having just met, both groups contained veterans of untold combats and deadly situations, and they combined their skills to best advantage. Benzan and Mole, cloaked in invisibility, took the lead. Behind them came the three warriors, Arun, Lok, and Hodge, forming an iron wall of defense. Just behind them came Dannel, able to shoot over the shorter fighters with his longbow, Dana's planar ally at his side. The deva's superior senses would help ensure that they were not caught off guard, and his presence in the middle of their order ensured that everyone but the scouts could benefit from the protective aura that it radiated against all things evil. Cal and Dana brought up the rear. At Dana's direction the deva had blessed them all with divine aid, a temporary but useful warding that improved their durability significantly.

The tunnel beyond the double doors on the far side of the Cagewright meeting room started curving almost immediately to the right, the bend in the passage obscuring anything more than maybe forty or fifty feet ahead of them. They pressed on, their light sources indicating a side tunnel opening off to the left. As they neared the split, Mole appeared suddenly ahead of them. "Torture chamber, empty, no exits," she said, fading back into invisibility even as she finished speaking.

“Could be a trap or a secret door,” Dannel suggested.

Arun nodded and halted. “Let’s check it out, quick but thorough.” But the room proved to be as empty as Mole had said, and after a minute’s delay they continued down the main corridor.

“So much pain here,” Lok commented.

“The demodands are the masters of Careri,” Cal explained. “The entire plane is basically a giant prison. Creatures from throughout the multiverse are trapped there... and there is no parole, or time off for good behavior. The demodands are the warders, and from what I read, they take great joy in their duties.”

“Just gets better an’ better,” Hodge grumbled.

“And these Cagewrights seek to transform the Realms into an extension of that place?” Dana said. “Madness...”

“They delude themselves into thinking that they would hold power, when the portal opened,” Arun said. “Ultimately, though, any revolution ends up consuming those who first ignite it.”

“Your military exterior betrays the heart of a scholar, paladin,” Cal noted.

Mole’s voice hissed in interruption out of thin air. “Sheesh, you guys are as loud as a gnomish circus! Keep it down... there’s a chamber up ahead, looks empty, but Benzan is checking it out.”

Thus chastened, the group continued—with the clank of the heavy armor worn by the dwarves, only moderately more quietly—forward.

The place was a fairly large bedchamber, dominated by a comfortable four-poster bed. Mostly-empty shelf and workbench space carved into the stone decorated the walls, and an elaborate summoning diagram covered almost half of the floor space. For being in a dungeon, the place was fastidiously clean, without a single speck of dust in evidence upon the floor or any of the other surfaces. There were no obvious exits, making this an apparent dead end.

“Either there’s a secret door somewhere, or that woman is still here,” Dannel said.

“As always, yer grasp o’ the obvious be amazin’, elf,” Hodge offered.

“Invisible?” Lok asked.

“There is nothing invisible within this chamber,” the deva said.

“I don’t sense any live auras,” Arun agreed. “But dark things were done in this place.” The warriors moved slowly into the room, avoiding treading upon the summoning circle in the floor.

The deva turned, his heavy mace coming up into a ready position. "Something comes," he said. A heartbeat later, they could all hear it, a rumbling noise that seemed to sound through the very walls near where the corridor met this room.

"What in the hells..." Hodge began.

He did not get a chance to finish his thought, for the wall abruptly erupted outward, and a huge figure strode into the chamber in an explosion of shattered stone and dust.

Chapter 369

Cal and Dana, who'd remained near the entry of the chamber, found themselves directly in the path of the exploding wall and the huge intruder who materialized through the cloud of debris. Shards of shattered stone struck Cal in the face and upper body, but bounced off of his skin, which had been magically treated with a stoneskin spell. Dana, lacking such protection, staggered as a piece of volcanic rock the size of a sling bullet caromed off of her temple. She spun away from the force of the blast and darted back as a massive stone limb swept through the open space where she'd been standing. Cal threw aside dignity and hurled himself back down the corridor, narrowly avoiding being crushed by the tread of a giant stone foot as the creature moved forward through the breach in the tunnel wall.

The companions responded swiftly to the sudden appearance of the greater earth elemental. Dana's planar ally spun and hurled itself at the foe, his mace lifted to strike, but the elemental's considerable reach allowed it to pummel the deva before it could close to deliver the attack. The elemental's punch landed with devastating force, and the deva's forward momentum was instantly reversed as he flew roughly back to land hard on the floor several paces behind where he had started.

That display offered a powerful caution, but did not stop the rest of the companions from pressing the attack. Dannel and Benzan drew back from the deadly circle of the elemental's reach, already drawing their bows taut to fire, while Lok and Arun rushed in to engage the stone monstrosity in melee. Great chunks of pulverized rock were shorn from the huge creature's frame as axe and sword clove into it, while cracks were driven into its upper torso as steel-tipped arrows infused with magical power struck hard and drove deep into its body. Against foes such as these, its advantages of size, strength, and the durability of its physical form were of little avail, proven again as Dana struck a considerable blow with her longspear at the joint of its left arm and torso, widening a crack already opened by Benzan's arrow.

But despite the injuries it had taken, the elemental did not falter, or pause, or retreat. Instead it surged forward another step, shaking the floor with its movements. Its shin connected with Lok, who brought his shield up and caught the blow. Unfortunately the elemental's mass overwhelmed Lok's by several orders of magnitude, even with his adamantine armor and heavy kit. The impact lifted the genasi from his feet, and he too clattered heavily to the ground several feet away, battered but not seriously hurt.

Arun shifted his position and lifted his holy sword to strike. But the elemental's movement had brought its right arm around, and before the paladin could unleash his attack its fist drove into his shoulder with the force of a siege ram. Arun's battered armor held against the onslaught, but he nevertheless was knocked to the side like a sporting pin struck by a lead ball. Dana only narrowly avoiding being struck by the paladin, who crashed into the wall and sank down in a dazed heap.

The elemental had gotten a few good licks in against its foes, but it was clearly showing the effects of the damage that had already been wrought against it. Hodge rushed forward to take Arun's place in melee; the elemental took a powerful swing at him as he drew close to melee range but the dwarf judged the distance well and darted underneath the blow with uncharacteristic agility. He'd left his holy sword in his scabbard, choosing instead his old favored axe. Even as arrows continued to slam into the elemental's upper body, the sturdy dwarf hewed at the elemental's legs like a berserk lumberjack. Great shards of stone and packed earth went flying under the onslaught, and the elemental staggered back. A sizzling sound became audible from the back side of its body; Cal had retreated to a safe distance and hit it with an acid arrow from one of his wands.

The elemental reared, now barely cohesive, and lifted its arms for a final strike against the enemies it had been summoned to destroy. But it was spent. The final blow was struck by the deva, which had recovered and flew straight at the creature's head like a missile shot from a catapult. Its blessed mace struck one final blow, and the creature collapsed into a heap of inanimate rubble.

Lok and Arun got up, accepting healing from Cal and Dana. Dannel quickly surveyed the passage from which the creature had emerged, verifying that there were no more immediate threats in that direction. Mole, whose tiny weapons had been of no use against the creature, continued her search of the chamber, while Benzan gave the elemental a quick examination to verify that it concealed no further surprises.

"That wasn't so hard," the tiefling commented.

"You didn't feel its punch," Arun observed, twisting his arm to make sure that his shoulder was still properly in its socket.

"I think what he means is that they had the jump on us; I'm surprised that they only sent the one elemental to attack us," Dannel observed. The elf had taken up a position at the edge of the tunnel behind the secret door that the elemental had blasted through.

"Maybe they're running out of resources," Lok noted. "The giant admitted that he and his haraknin comprised a significant portion of the Cagewrights' military forces."

"I hope you haven't forgotten that there are thirteen of them," Dannel replied. "We've only faced two, maybe three, thus far."

"Kaurophon is here as well," Arun reminded them.

"Another old friend?" Dana asked.

“Let’s just say that we have a score to settle,” the paladin replied.

Cal had been musing over the situation. “I think the elemental’s purpose was to reveal this secret tunnel to us, without making it look overtly obvious,” he said.

“So you’re saying this is another trap,” Benzan said.

“I could’a told ye that, and I ain’ no wizzerd,” Hodge said.

“There may be another way to get to the Tree,” Dana said.

“You may be right,” Arun said. “But time is against us.”

“How long until the ritual is completed?” Dana asked, turning to the deva.

“The paladin speaks truth,” the deva acknowledged. “The evil power within this place grows exponentially, but I cannot be more specific.”

“Well, let’s be about it, then,” Benzan said, turning to the passage. “If we’re going to make a grab for the bait, we may as well have both feet within the jaws of the trap.”

“Wait a moment,” the gnome said. “Dana, what about your find the path spell? It may reveal an alternative route to the Tree of Shackled Souls.”

The mystic wanderer nodded, summoning the power of her connection to Selûne. The casting took about twenty seconds, during which time Dana kept her eyes closed, her mouth moving as soft syllables filtered out, fading as soon as they hit the ears of the gathered listeners.

Finally, however, she opened her eyes, her frustration clear on her face. “Something is not right. I am not getting a clear reading.”

“Maybe the Cagewrights are interfering with your spell?” Dannel suggested.

“No, I don’t think so,” Dana said. “The spell may fail, however, if there is no clear physical route to the stated objective.”

“They may have collapsed the tunnels leading to it,” Arun said.

“If that is the case, I may be able to help,” Cal said. “But I’d prefer not to start burrowing blindly, given our current locale.”

“Here’s an idea,” Benzan said. “Let’s find us a Cagewright, and direct a few... pointed questions at him. They must have a way to get to their precious tree.”

“I will go ahead to spring the ambush, if you wish,” the deva said. “I do not fear evil.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Hodge chimed.

"I do not like the idea of splitting up," Cal said, even as Dana added, "I do not consider you expendable, Alyx."

At that moment, Mole appeared again, shedding her invisibility to appear in their midst.

"Gah, girl, ye goin' to take a year or ten off me life, if ye keep doin' that!" Hodge exclaimed.

"Your niece has light feet," Benzan said to Cal. "I have to admit, I didn't hear her at all, although the deva's eyes shifted when she came out of the tunnel, which did serve as a giveaway."

"You scouted ahead while we were talking?" Dana asked. "Don't you know how incredibly foolish that was?"

"Yer wastin' yer breath, lady," Hodge said. "Gnomes don' grasp common sense stuff like that. Somepin' broken in their heads, me thinks."

"Tell us what you found, Mole," Cal said.

"Well," she replied, with a slight huff at Dana, "The tunnel heads east for maybe forty feet or so, then bends sharply to the right. There was some lava-light in that direction, and a pretty nasty smell of demodands. Both kinds, I think. I didn't see any of them, but I'd bet they were down there, invisible or hiding."

"Demodands can see invisible creatures," Dana said. "I think it's pretty safe to assume that they know we're coming, now."

"Hey, I'm pretty hard to see even without my ring," Mole said defensively.

"I believe it is moot—I would be stunned if the remaining Cagewrights did not know exactly where we are," Cal said. "The result of Dana's spell suggests that they have already shaped the battlefield to their choosing. We either go forward or back, or blindly strike out in another direction. The deva and I can manage the last, if it comes to that, but that approach also has its risks."

"Yes, burrowing into passage flooded with lava would be most inconvenient," Dannel noted.

"So our choice is made. There is no going back," Arun said. "Mole, if you would... Mole?"

There was no sign of the diminutive rogue.

"Gnomes," Hodge muttered under his breath.

Chapter 370

They didn't have to go very far to find their enemy.

The tunnel was fairly broad, its smoothed walls indicative of its origins as a lava tube. After making some elementary preparations, including the casting of several wards, the companions proceeded cautiously to the bend that Mole had scouted. The dim light of exposed lava became evident ahead even before they reached the sharp kink in the passage. They could also smell the distinctive stench of demodands that Mole had identified earlier, the odor growing stronger with each step.

“This wall is new,” Arun said, noting the unnaturally smooth surface to their left.

“Conjured, likely, to block another passage and direct us right,” Cal suggested.

“Well, maybe we should take it down and...” Dannel began.

He didn't get a chance to finish his statement, for the deva abruptly lifted his mace and shifted into a ready stance, pointing with the weapon to the south. “Invisible fiends!” he said, following his statement with a holy smite that filled the corridor maybe twenty paces to the south beyond the bend. The angry screams of demodands revealed the truth of the celestial's report.

The demodands were quick to counterattack. Coruscating beams lanced down the length of the tunnel, rays of enfeeblement that stabbed into the warriors at the front of the group. Lok was hit and seemed to sag as the thieving energies sapped his strength, but a second evaporated as the ray splashed against the aura cast by Arun's holy avenger. Acid arrows also sought out their targets, with one catching Benzan with a glancing impact across the arm that seared a hole in his cloak, sizzling through the links of his mithral chain shirt to burn the flesh covering his bicep. Another targeted Dana, but the mystic wanderer moved in a sudden blur, and it missed her to splash harmlessly against the tunnel passage behind her.

As the fiends attacked, they became visible; massive, bloated kelubars, flanked by the lean and grotesque farastus. But the worst was last to appear, the massive figure of a shator demodand that regarded them with hateful eyes sunk deep into a distended face. Keeriv laughed as it ambled forward to meet the deva, which did not hesitate in lifting his own weapon and surging into battle.

The shator's reach allowed it to draw first blood, pounding the deva with a heavy two-fisted slam to the chest that staggered the angel. But the celestial did not fight alone, and Lok, Arun, and Hodge swiftly charged into the fray. Lok struck the fiend a solid blow with his thundering battleaxe, and Hodge, having selected again his holy sword, echoed his attack with a deep thrust that slid into the shator's thick leg. A farastu lunged around the larger demodand, ignoring Hodge as it reached out to grapple the celestial and divest it of its deadly mace. But before it could complete its attack Arun drove into it, his holy blade shearing a two-foot gash in its body, driving it back in pain.

Arrows knifed through the air, stabbing into demodand flesh. Dannel's missiles, even enchanted with the potency his song, did little against the fiends' fell resistances, but Benzan was using a bow specifically designed to bring an end to creatures such as they. The shator cried out as an arrow pierced its arm, jutting from the meat of its tricep, trailing black lines of ichor that splattered in fat drops to the stone floor.

“Unleash a holy word!” Dana cried to the celestial. But even as the deva summoned its power, the Cagewrights unleashed the second half of their ambush.

The wall at the bend of the corridor shuddered with a solid impact, a five-foot vertical crack appearing in the volcanic rock. Before the significance of that could even be registered, a second blow burst open a six-foot square segment of the wall. Thin plates of shattered stone fell forward to reveal the tiefling monk Ardeth Webb, snapping a set of adamantine nunchaku under her arm as she smoothly stepped aside.

Freija Doorgan’s eyes glowed with intensity as the conjurer released her prepared spell. The prismatic spray flared out into the corridor, engulfing almost the entire company of intruders. Only Cal, who’d remained back at the bend in the passage, was outside the path of the deadly beams. The deva, the target for the center of the spray, was struck by two of the twisting beams that pierced his spell resistance, electrical energy stabbing through him as the yellow beam knifed through his torso, while a sickly dark aura surged outward from his leg as the limb was intersected by a green ray.

The rest of the companions were hit by other colored shafts, dealing various quantities of fire, acid, or electrical damage, or other ill effects. Fortunately the deva’s protective aura, combined with the wards they’d cast earlier, enabled them to overcome the most devastating effects. Hodge, struck by a blue ray, resisted being turned to stone, while Dannel fought off the mind-rending power of the indigo beam. But Dana and Lok both suffered damage from the rays, and even with his sword Arun could not fully resist being drained of vitality by the green ray that intersected his wrist after passing through the deva’s leg.

The power of the spell was not selective, and the rays continued into the ranks of the demodands. A farastu was struck by a violet ray and vanished, screaming, while a kelubar recoiled as flames erupted from the red ray that splashed across its chest. The fiends were tough and resistant to many forms of magic, however, and the beams winked out altogether as they intersected the shator, which snarled as the true nature of Freija’s plan became apparent to it.

Even as the prismatic spray wrought its colorful swath of destruction down the length of the corridor, a roaring pillar of flame conjured by Grehlia Cairnis marked a grim sequel. The flame strike struck the ground and spread outward in a merciless swath, searing at the flesh of the companions gathered in the tunnel. The spell looked devastating, but as the wisps of flame cleared it was obvious that the companions had not suffered as much damage as was first evident. Several of the companions had been warded against fire, and even in the confined space their agility allowed others to escape the full force of the blast. Arun, surrounded by the nimbus of his holy avenger, was unaffected, and his presence shielded Hodge, just a step away. Likewise the deva resisted the spell.

The ambush had been clever and well-timed, the attacks telling, but through luck, preparation, and sheer fortitude the companions had held up well against the initial volley. But that changed a moment later as Shebeleth Regidin, standing behind his allies in the secret side-tunnel, unleashed a word of blasphemy.

Chapter 371

Regidin's blasphemy had a devastating effect. The spell rippled outward from the dread loremaster like ink poured into a pool of clean water, searing through the consciousness of the heroes. Everyone, even Arun, was dazed by the spell, and greatly weakened by the wave of disruption unleashed by the magic. Hodge collapsed, paralyzed, and likewise the deva, although he resisted being banished back to his plane of origin, fell helpless to the ground, his mace clattering from limp fingers.

Emboldened by the effectiveness of their leader's tactic, the Cagewrights and their remaining allies pressed the attack upon their suddenly discomfited foes. The shator Keeriv laughed terribly as it reached out with its long, gangly arms and took up the deva in its claws, its muscles tightening as it crushed the helpless celestial's body.

The remaining farastu likewise took pleasure in attacking Arun. With Arun able to offer little resistance, it tore the dwarf's holy sword from his grip, hissing at the blessed steel burned at its flesh. It hurled the weapon away over its shoulder, far out of his reach. The kelubars could not easily move their bulky bodies into melee, but they continued their barrage of acid arrows, striking Dana and Dannel with fat gobs of corrosive goo.

Ardeth Webb leapt forward through the opening she'd created. She let her nunchaku fall to the floor, instead leaping into a fully-extended snap-kick that connected solidly across Dana's chest, knocking her roughly to the floor. The monk sneered as she effortlessly twisted back to land on her feet, her hands tightening into deadly fists as she loomed over the fallen priestess.

Behind her, Grehlia stepped forward, her own fists covered by spiked gauntlets that glowed faintly with an ember aura of dark power. Seeing that her ally had the enemy priestess well in hand, she cast about for a target, settling finally upon Bengan with a dark smile.

Freija remained in the side tunnel, content to strike from a distance with her spells. She had not forgotten the archer who had wounded her earlier, and upon seeing him restored to life even felt a bit of grim pleasure at the ability to torment him further. Even though she'd spent her most powerful spells already, she was still more than equipped to inflict that torment, which she proved as she unleashed a trio of scorching rays that blasted into the elf, each knocking him a step backward until he was driven against the far wall of the tunnel. Already seriously wounded by the flame strike, only the benefits of the deva's earlier aid spell kept him standing at all.

Freija smiled. He was tough, that elf, but she'd already destroyed him once, and it wouldn't take much more to finish him a second time. And this time, there wouldn't be anyone left to raise him.

Regidin likewise held his position, calmly summoning a blade barrier into place in the corridor leading back to Freija's quarters. The whirling barrier appeared a few paces behind Cal, effectively blocking the only way out.

The companions began to recover from the initial effect of Regidin's blasphemy, although they remained gravely weakened by the spell. Cal reinforced his allies with a mass bear's endurance spell, eschewing a defensive ward for the moment. He paid for that a moment later when a shadow materialized behind him, unleashing an unexpected full attack upon him. The gnome staggered as Wiejeron's rapier tore into him mercilessly. Even though the assassin had not taken enough time to set up a death attack, the blows were nevertheless telling. Only Cal's stoneskin kept him from being taken out immediately, although as the slender blade of the man called the "Fish" punched a hole into his lung, he could feel the chill hand of death creeping closer.

"I don't know what Freija was so worked up about," the assassin said, his eyes cold as he regarded the crippled gnome. "You don't strike me as particularly challenging."

"Yeah, we get that a lot," Cal said, spitting a gob of blood. Wiejeron lifted his rapier to finish him, but Cal was ready with the words of a spell, hurling the magic at his attacker. Wiejeron's eyes widened as the transmutation took hold, and his body shimmered and shifted until the deadly assassin had been replaced by a bloated sea slug, maybe two feet long, making an ugly sucking sound as it quivered against the stone floor.

"New taunts, same idiots," Cal said, lifting himself up to his feet despite the hot knife of pain that stabbed anew through his body at his movement.

Dana, meanwhile found herself hard-pressed against her own dangerous foe. She nimbly snapped her back and sprang to her feet, although the maneuver left her open to a driving punch from Ardeth, which slammed into her chest with enough force to crack ribs. Dana staggered back, fighting for breath, while the tiefling regarded her with a bemused expression.

Benzan had started toward Dana to help her, but the tiefling was quickly forced to defend himself by Grehlia's approach. The evil cleric's spiked gauntlets looked nasty, and were marked with the tell-tale smear of poison. And there was that red glow surrounding the steel gloves—Benzan didn't know what spell she had placed on her weapon, but he had no doubt that whatever it was, it was bad.

Grehlia noted his interest. "Yeth, hath-breed, your death ith here," she lisped, springing forward. Under her ochre robe she wore a chain shirt, he saw.

He narrowly avoided her first violent lunge, twisting his body back to avoid the sweep of those deadly gloves. She tried a backswing that would have caught him across his face, if he hadn't sprung back five feet, out of her reach. He's always been fast and nimble, and the magical gloves he wore enhanced those attributes to almost superhuman levels.

Even as he opened the small gap between them, he was drawing out another of the white-fletched arrows from the magical quiver at his hip. Grehlia spun in time to take an arrow that punched through the side of her torso. She shrieked as the energy of the holy arrow drove through her. The impact delayed her enough for Benzan's second shot to hit her, this time a low impact that stabbed deep into her body just above her left hip. She staggered toward him, snarling like a feral beast. Benzan loaded another arrow, and held his ground as she lifted her gauntleted right fist like a hammer.

"Die!"

“You first, bitch.”

He released the shot, which drove into her chest with apparent finality. Benzan knew he'd hit something important by the look on the evil cleric's face. But even though she was clearly dying, Grehlia was driven by a force beyond herself. To Benzan's surprise she suddenly extended her body toward him, thrusting the gauntlet with its embedded harm spell at his throat. The tiefling started to dodge back, knew that he was too late.

Uh oh, he thought.

Chapter 372

The battle between the Cagewrights and the Heroes of Cauldron, augmented by the Travelers, raged on in a desperate, no-holds-barred struggle. Each side had released their initial volleys in the ambush, and now fought in an all-out melee in the confined space of a tunnel within the Cagewright stronghold.

With both the deva and Hodge taken out by Regidin's blasphemy, and Arun disarmed of his potent holy weapon, the battle against the demodands at the far end of the tunnel was turning against Lok and Arun. The shator Keeriv had grappled the helpless astral deva, and chortled with glee as it crushed the life out of the celestial's body. Behind it a pair of kelubar continued their directive from Freija Doorgan, hurling acid arrows and the occasional ray of enfeeblement into the melee.

Arun found himself hard-pressed by a wounded but still-potent farastu. Standing over Hodge, disarmed, seriously weakened by the blasphemy, there was nothing he could do but fight on. The farastu tore at him with its claws to little effect; despite the drains to his strength and vitality that he'd suffered he was still incredibly durable. But Arun knew that his friends were in dire need, and that he was certainly not invincible. That was confirmed a moment later as an acid arrow splashed across his chest, filling his helmet with noxious vapors that made his head spin.

With a roar, holding the farastu back with his shield, he reached down and picked up Hodge's sword, his own former weapon. The demodand gibbered something—worried, perhaps?—and tried to intercept the sword by grappling with the holy warrior. But Arun, despite his temporary weakness, was still a veteran fighter. The sword clove into the farastu's upper arm, driving to the bone. Had he been at full strength, he might have taken off the limb, but even as it was the farastu screamed and drew back, critically wounded now.

Lok tried to aid the captured angel, sweeping his axe at the shator's flabby body. Even with the ray of enfeeblement he'd taken, and the lingering effects of the blasphemy, the genasi was still stronger than the average man. But the shator's resistances protected it from weapons not consecrated to good, and they'd not had the opportunity for Dana to align the weapon at the start of the battle. For all that, he still managed to hurt it with his strokes... but not enough. The shator looked down at its foe, tiny in comparison to its own considerable bulk, and laughed as it tensed the fat muscles in its arms. There was a loud snap, and the shator hurled the broken body of the astral deva down in contempt of its foe.

Something very cold appeared in the genasi warrior's eyes. Even as the shator reached for him, intending perhaps to duplicate its feat, the genasi lifted his axe, driving it into the center of the shator's torso. A deep reverberation erupted from the blade as it shattered Keeriv's breastbone, sending a devastating sonic pulse through its body, converting its foul organs into splattered messes of quivering gelatin. The shator looked down at the warrior in surprise before the inevitable took hold, and it fell backward to smack heavily upon the floor.

The two kelubars took a look at each other, then at the warrior, and promptly turned invisible.

Dannel, clinging to consciousness through sheer determination—and magical augmentation—felt an uncanny calm fall over him. The song still filled his mind, sharpening his senses, binding him to the bow. Despite the battle raging all around, some of the exchanges a mere three or four paces away from his current position, his own attention was fixed like a knife's point upon the conjurer standing in the ruins of the shattered wall on the far side of the tunnel. Freija's eyes met his, and the conjurer smiled in anticipation of his destruction.

Well, if she'd forgotten what his arrows felt like, he'd be happy to provide a reminder.

Even diminished by the ordeal of his resurrection, and critically burned, Dannel remained a peerless archer. The song filled his limbs as he drew and fired, reloaded and fired again, all at a speed almost too fast for the eye to follow. Freija had refreshed her defenses, but even so a pair of arrows struck her, one driving deep into almost exactly the same spot where Dannel had hit her in their earlier confrontation. Her thoughts of revenge temporarily overcome by the instinct for survival, she ducked back behind the still-intact portion of the wall, giving her full cover. She glanced back at Regidin, perhaps slightly nervous, but the cleric was lost in the depths of a summoning—a potent one, she realized with a faint tinge of envy.

Dana was not an untrained novice when it came to hand-to-hand combat, but she was also experienced enough to realize when she was outmatched. The monk was blindingly fast, and Dana knew that she would have no time for a summoning spell, or any other complicated stratagems. The tiefling was covered with tattoos that seemed to move of their own volition as their owner's body shifted, a mesmerizing effect that almost cost Dana dearly as a driving punch sliced the air less than an inch from where her face had been a split-second before. Dana spun and gave ground, falling back toward the north, the monk following her every move. Unfortunately there was nowhere to go in retreat, unless she was willing to endure the blade barrier. One glance was enough for her to know that the barrier was empowered, a spinning wall of death as effective as a ten foot thick stone wall in blocking their escape.

There was only one more place that she could go. Darting back, calling upon her goddess, she drew power into her. The monk leapt in to stop her, but even as Ardeth's fists knifed in at her she leapt backward into the air, flying upward to almost the level of the ceiling fifteen feet above.

She'd thought that she'd gain at least a momentary reprieve, but to her amazement the monk leapt forward, springing lightly into the air. It didn't look like she would come even close to reaching Dana, but her plan became evident a moment later as she struck the wall behind them, ran three steps up the smooth surface, and then kicked off directly toward the flying priestess.

Dana's own reactions felt sluggish compared to the speed and grace of the woman monk, and she could not avoid her in time as the tiefling grappled her, snapping her legs around Dana's lithe torso.

"Time for pain," the woman hissed.

Benzan knew he was going to take the hit, and whatever vicious spell the evil cleric had loaded into those nasty gauntlets. But an instant before the blow landed, Grehlia shifted, the razor-sharp spikes slicing empty air an inch beside the tiefling's head. Benzan fell back in surprise as the woman collapsed at his feet, but the mystery was resolved a moment later as he saw the small rapier jutting from the back of the cleric's neck, its owner materializing an instant later beside her.

"Help your wife," Mole said, recovering her weapon. "I've got to do something about those wizards in the tunnel." Before Benzan could respond, she'd tumbled off like an acrobat fired from a ballista, using her hands, feet, and even head interchangeably as she passed effortlessly through the close and crowded battlefield.

A flare of black smoke and a potent stench of brimstone announced the arrival of another combatant, back in the tunnel at Regidin's side. Although he would have preferred to bring another demodand to service, the disruptions caused by the Tree forestalled that option. So instead, he'd reached across the planes into the depths of the Abyss to bring a hezrou demon. The disgusting frog-like creature looked down at its summoner and then at the outer tunnel where the sounds of battle raged, its eyes already betraying its eagerness for battle. But Regidin forestalled it with a raised hand.

"Do not waste your time trying to blaspheme," he said in Abyssal. "These foes are potent and would resist your magic. Likewise, teleportation magic will not function in this place... and do not utilize a chaos hammer. Use a blight, if you wish to weaken a number of enemies at once."

"Is there anything else, human?" the hezrou grouched impatiently.

Regidin did not rise to the bait, his tone remaining perfectly neutral. "Do not strike any demodand, or any creature wearing this sigil," he said, indicating the ring he wore that bore the mark of the Cagewrights. "Go."

But even as the hezrou leapt eagerly for the gap in the wall, the entire tunnel became filled with webs. The hezrou was ensnared, as was Freija Doorgan, but the webs refused to touch Regidin, who clucked with slight annoyance. The hezrou likewise quickly adapted; after a few tentative tugs upon the strands holding it, it simply shifted into gaseous form and slipped out through the opening into the far tunnel where the battle continued. Freija, however, reacted rather more dramatically to being caught up in the web. Despite the fact that the spell was a relatively common phenomenon to an advanced spellcaster such as she, her cold logic and self-control evaporated as she stared down at the sight of the hundreds of sticky strands enveloping her body, touching her fine red robe, tugging at her hair, dangling from her skin...

“Get them off!” Freija shrieked, tugging at the clinging webs. Her actions only served to draw the webbing tighter around her, and pulled a thick tangle of webs across her face. “Get them off!” she screamed again, louder.

“Calm yourself, my dear,” Regidin said coolly. From his perspective, the web was not entirely unwelcome; for one thing it offered a useful barrier between him and the intruders. The enemy archers were not in a good position to target him, not yet; from his position further down the side tunnel from the sundered wall he was virtually invisible to anyone not directly in front of that opening. Of course, that also meant he had a more difficult time seeing what was happening... but that did not hinder him from contributing to the destruction of the intruders.

If anything, it made him more deadly.

Without sparing the slightest thought for his allies, he conjured an empowered flame strike that filled the space just beyond the opening with a roaring storm of liquid fire. The rush of heat that surged through the tunnel blasted back Regidin’s robes, although the flames did not reach him. The same could not be said for Freija; eager tongues of fire spread outward through the web. The backblast of the strike lasted only a moment, and they freed her from the web, leaving her robe, her slender fingers, and her pristine face marred with black char. The woman fell to her knees, coughing, looking down at her ruined hands in horror.

The conjurer screamed, and for once, in a rare event, Shebelith Regidin’s lips twisted in a slight approximation of a smile.

Chapter 373

Dana cried out as the merciless tiefling monk slammed a punishing blow into her gut. The priestess felt pain twist her insides as the blow pulverized tissue and ripped muscles hard from training. The monk was locked to her in a deadly embrace, and all of her attempts to escape were proving futile thus far. The legs locked around her torso may as well have been steel bars for all her struggles did to loosen their hold.

“I would make it last longer, my sweet,” hissed a voice close to her ear... close enough for her to feel the monk’s hot breath. Her voice was soft, a deadly whisper. “But your friends, they need my tender ministrations.”

“They’ll kill you... bitch...” Dana hissed before a sharp, snapping pain in her body cut off her breath. There was nothing she could do; she could not even draw breath to cast a spell.

No. There was one thing she could do, realization that stabbed through the pain. It took only a thought to become action, as she dove straight toward the ground below, Ardeth Webb still locked to her.

It took less than a second for them to descend, but that was enough time for the monk to react. Just before they would have impacted the hard stone below, Dana felt herself flung wildly aside as the tiefling snapped their link, driving her back to land heavily and awkwardly on the ground a few paces away. Benzan, caught off guard by the sudden movement, drew his sword; but before he could strike Webb had already regained her footing, and swiveled gracefully into a defensive stance.

“Let us dance then, brother,” she hissed.

Her senses detected the danger an instant before it struck. She could feel rather than see the looming form behind her, for when she darted aside, turning to view the corridor behind, she saw nothing there but Regidin’s still-spinning blade barrier blocking the passage. But she felt the massive claw that grabbed her by the arm, crushing the limb with incredible strength.

“Good timing, Cal,” Benzan said, moving behind the still-struggling monk into a position to deliver a critical blow. He felt a welcome surge of positive energy as Dana unleashed a mass cure serious wounds spell, easing some of the pain from the still-burning kelubar acid searing his arm.

But that’s when Regidin’s flame strike hit.

Benzan was standing right where the blast of divine fire hit. There was nowhere for him to escape, no clever dodge he could undertake to avoid the force of the blast. His innate resistance to fire was of little help against the screaming rage of the evil spell, and even with Dana’s healing he found himself fighting through a wave of dizziness and nausea as the smell of his own burned flesh filled his nostrils.

But he was better off than most. Dannel and Dana both lay prone, dead or unconscious, wisps of smoke rising from their flame-ravaged forms. Benzan could make out the outlines of Cal, polymorphed into the shape of a gray render, by the wisps of gray smoke that framed his nine-foot body in silhouette. Clearly the monk could too, for she twisted in the render’s grasp to deliver a powerful kick to Cal’s torso. The blow was enough to loosen his grip, and the monk dropped free to the ground, landing in a wide spider-like stance. For all that she’d been held stationary a few feet from the impact zone of the flame strike, she somehow did not seem to be seriously burned.

Benzan tore his eyes from Dana’s immobile form. Suddenly he didn’t feel quite so secure about his ability to handle this deadly adversary.

“You are not alone,” a voice came from behind him. Arun Goldenshield stepped forward, holding his old holy sword, his armor splattered with farastu slime and the greasy stains of kelubar acid. The dwarf looked like he could barely hold his weapon up, but his eyes were pinpoints of iron determination. Benzan spared a look down the corridor, where the sounds of battle continued as Lok engaged the two kelubars in a violent melee forty feet away.

As he turned back toward the monk, he saw a cloud of ugly yellow smoke issue out from the gap leading to the side tunnel. Even before it drifted to the ground and began to take on a solid form, he knew that this was Not Good.

Just a few feet away from where Ardeth Webb stood outnumbered but undaunted against three seriously hurt foes, another drama played out. Freija Doorgan looked up at Regidin, who regarded her with an icy, calm expression.

“The enemy has been dealt a serious blow, but fights on,” he said. “Inflict a cloudkill upon them; I will conjure another barrier to block their escape and channel them toward us.”

He started forward toward the opening, but Freija’s expression had not changed; a intense stare of fury, agony, and madness that was fixed upon Regidin like an aimed crossbow. Regidin saw it and paused.

“Do not be a fool. We draw near to what we have worked for, the hour of Rebirth, when worlds will be transformed.”

What little remaining threads of sanity that Freija Doorgan possessed abruptly snapped. She spat the words of a spell, hurling a wedge of magic upon the mind of Shebelith Regidin.

Regidin’s mind was a complex maze of potencies. He was not the warped genius that Freija was, but his will was like a stone castle built to withstand any siege. His spell resistance was not enough to stop Freija’s spell, but the force of who and what he was shielded him against almost any mental assault upon him. He had once slain a mind flayer with his own hands, and had traveled to planes where most mortals would have been reduced to gibbering idiocy in the space of seconds. He was insane, true, in the sense that all of the Cagewrights were, but that did not detract from the gifts that he possessed. Even with her vaunted intellect and spellpower, Freija’s sudden attack could have been hurled at him twenty times, and nineteen of those times he would have laughed at the futility of her betrayal before he crushed her beneath the power of his divinely-granted might.

Nineteen times out of twenty, that would have happened.

Unfortunately for Shebelith Regidin, fate took a hand, as Freija’s spell knifed through a split-second’s window of surprise, and she feble-minded him.

Chapter 374

Benzan’s initial attack didn’t fare so well, as the tiefling monk twisted her body back to avoid the sweep of his sword, snapping back to drive her fist solidly into his face. Benzan staggered back, stunned, blood fountaining down his face from his shattered nose.

But the monk was quickly forced back onto the defensive. Her attack upon Benzan gave Cal a free moment to hit her with a targeted dispel magic, which stripped away some of her layered wards and the enhancements granted her by her magical tattoos. Then she was forced to dodge back from a series of cautious attacks by Arun. The strength drains that the paladin had suffered were immediately evident, and none of his attacks connected, but he likewise left few openings for the tiefling to exploit.

Freija cackled madly as she saw the hard look in Regidin's eyes replaced by the vacuous stare of a moron. Wincing against the pain that seemed to infuse every muscle in her body, she started to pull herself up to her feet. Suddenly, however, that pain seemed tiny in comparison to the spike of agony that blossomed in her belly. Her eyes widened and she slumped back down to her knees, looking down to see the slender blade jutting from her stomach. She looked back up to see Mole Calloran standing there, shaking her head.

"Whatever you did to him, thanks," she said.

Freija opened her mouth to speak, but no sounds came out.

"I hope you get the fate you've earned, on the Other Side," Mole said, drawing out a small knife. Freija's eyes fixed on it in horror; everything else was fading, the world around her growing dim. "This is for killing Dannel," the gnome said.

They were the last words that Freija Doorgan would ever hear.

"Oh, crap," Benzan said, as he shook his head to clear it of the aftereffects of Ardeth Webb's nasty punch. His comment was directed at the combination of the monk, still standing against Arun, and the hezrou demon that leapt right toward him, claws outstretched toward his throat. Benzan thought he heard laughing as he brought up his sword in defense, too slowly. A foul stench filled his nostrils as the creature grabbed his arms with its claws, its oblong head snapping down to seize his shoulder and upper arm in its jaws with a crushing grip. Benzan felt like a rag doll as the demon lifted him off the ground, crunching the bones of his upper torso as it stuffed more and more of him into its gaping mouth.

Arun missed with another swing that Webb leapt over, spinning her body in mid air to drive a snap kick into the side of his helmet. The blow should have broken her bare foot, but it was the paladin who staggered back, his head ringing. Only determination and the lingering effects of Cal's endurance spell was keeping him on his feet, after all of the damage he'd taken in the battle thus far. Webb seemed to sense it too, but she did not have the luxury of taunting him as she turned to face a rush from Cal. The gnome-turned-render lowered his head as the monk dodged aside, but despite her efforts to tumble out of his reach his jaws closed around her hip, getting a solid hold on her. Webb shrieked terribly as the gnome shredded her body with his claws, inflicting serious damage before she finally managed to tear free.

Arun had started to go to Cal's aid, but a clang of metal on stone drew his attention around to the left. The noise was Benzan's sword falling to the ground; the tiefling's struggles were growing weaker as the hezrou stuffed more of the tiefling's body into its gaping maw. Now his head, shoulders, and his left arm were inside it, and it looked like the rest would soon follow. Arun leapt at it, and despite his fading strength managed to slide half of the length of his sword into its body. Being impaled by a holy weapon got the demon's attention real fast. It spat out Benzan, who collapsed in a limp heap atop the ravaged body of Dannel, and turned to face the paladin. The demon's body was ravaged by holy fire—apparently Regidin's flame strike had not spared it, even in gaseous form—but it still assaulted the paladin with gusto, tearing with its claws and biting with its huge jaws. Arun nearly had his arm torn off as the hezrou grabbed hold of his shield in those jaws and yanked it upward. The paladin slipped his arm from the grips even as the hezrou tried to find a vulnerable place to grab on with its claws. Falling heavily at the demon's feet, he yelled and drove the holy sword up into its body.

Cal felt a slight breeze as Webb delivered a lunging strike that mercifully hit only empty air; his still-active greater invisibility had fooled the monk, this time. The polymorphed gnome was quick and—thanks to the spell—stronger than his foe, but despite his borrowed form he was still no warrior. And Ardeth Webb was a master at close-quarters combat, as she'd already proven. She'd taken serious punishment already, but that did not appear to hinder her as Cal tried to snag her with a grab of his left claw. As soon as the claw closed upon her torso she struck, delivering a powerful blow that snapped the bones in Cal's upper arm. The limb fell uselessly to his side, but before she could follow up the attack he roared an inchoate cry and dove his head forward, snapping the monk's head up in his mouth. He lifted her off her feet, the monk kicking and punching violently at his torso, but even through the pain of those hits he summoned all of his remaining strength to keep his jaws locked.

All of his senses became numb to what was around him, to everything except for the struggles of his prisoner. Finally, even as he felt his consciousness slipping, a faint but audible snap penetrated his awareness, and the monk's struggles abruptly ceased.

After Freija had fallen dead at her feet, Mole regarded the enemy cleric cautiously. The priest had clearly been seriously affected by whatever the wizardess had done to him; even she could see that. He'd taken out a morningstar, which he held awkwardly, holding his place as the remnants of Cal's webs burned around him. Wary of a trap, she drew out a ball from her bag of tricks and snapped it down the passage toward him. The little furry oblong rolled between the cleric's legs and grew into the form of a wolverine. The summoned creature's demeanor was quite similar to the real animal that it resembled, and it immediately attacked Regidin's legs with its claws and bite. The cleric, startled, turned around and exclaimed something incomprehensible as he started bashing on the animal with his weapon.

It was a trivial matter to come up behind him and stab him in the back.

The cleric gibbered in pain, but amazingly did not turn around, instead intensifying his efforts against the wolverine, which had seized hold of his ankle. Mole was not one to refuse a gift, using the remnants of the man's robe to draw herself up across his back, stabbing as she went. The cleric seemed to realize something was wrong just as she reached the summit of her ascent, and when he turned his head it gave her the perfect opportunity to slide her knife across his exposed throat.

The tunnel and the adjacent passage had grown quiet. After a quick look around to make sure that there weren't any more enemies here, the gnome cleaned her blade on the dead man's cloak before retracing her steps back to the entry. She saw Cal materialize, his hulking figure shrinking back down to its natural form, his arm hanging badly broken at his side, blood trailing from his broken jaw. The gnome managed to drag himself over to Dana's side, touching her with a wand before he himself slumped over, unconscious.

A few feet away, Benzan and Dannel lay in a heap. Arun lay against the wall next to them, atop a greasy smear that had been the hezrou. The paladin managed to nod to her, but did not have the strength for anything else, not even to lift his battered body up.

A loud thundering noise drew her head around to the south. A figure approached... Lok, his dark armor covered with ooze. The genasi pulled off his helmet and let it drop to the floor, revealing a face that was marred by garish black streaks where acid had burned his flesh almost to the bone.

Behind him were the gashed corpses of two kelubar demodands.

The genasi made it around the hacked corpses of the shator and farastu, to where Hodge lay motionless, still paralyzed from Regidin's blasphemy. Lok reached down and checked the dwarf; he then made it all of one step toward the others before he collapsed.

Mole, of course, was unhurt, although the flame strikes had singed her a bit and made a mess of her outfit. The gnome looked around at the bloody mess of the battlefield, and let out a low whistle.

"Wow."

Chapter 375

It had been a close call. Dana, brought back to the edge of consciousness by Cal's intervention, burned one of her remaining high-power spells on a mass cure moderate wounds that drew them back from the brink. Dannel and Benzan were both alive, although it had been a very narrow thing for the unfortunate elf. Cal and Dana drew out healing wands and immediately set about doing what they could, completely burning out two of the precious devices in the process. Dana restored Arun's health, damaged by the green ray of Freija's prismatic spray, and soon the effects of the blasphemy and the demodands' rays of enfeeblement likewise began to fade.

"Haven't had a fight that intense in a while," Benzan said, wiping his face with a damp cloth as he lay against a nearby wall. They'd retreated to the chamber at the end of the passageway, a small shrine by the looks of it with a glowing pool of red-hot lava and a stone altar in the center of the floor. It was hot, and the stench of blood and fiends was strong, but at least it was relatively secure. A thorough search had turned up no hollow walls or secret doors, or at least none detectable through normal means.

"I don' know 'ow much more beatin' I kin take," Hodge said, sucking in deep breaths as he lay sprawled out on his back near the rear wall of the chamber. "Gods damned, how many 'ours we been fightin' now? I forget what it be like to sleep..."

“We cannot sleep now,” Arun said, and as if to punctuate his words, a slight tremble passed through the stone of the chamber.

“This place seems to be shielded from most of the effects of the earth tremors,” Cal said. “I can only imagine what’s going on in the city above, or on the rest of the mountain.”

“Go on then,” Hodge groaned. “I can nay go no more.”

Mole sidled up to Cal and whispered something to her uncle. The illusionist nodded and dug into his magical backpack for something, finally producing a clouded flask which Mole took over to Hodge, dropping it in his lap.

“What’s this?” the dwarf said. “Another healin’ potion? Thanks fer the thought, girl, but me body’s fine, it’s me...”

His words trailed off as he recognized the label on the flask.

A few (dozen) swallows later, Hodge was back on his feet, if a bit less steadily than before. “If it weren’t agin me religion, I could kiss ye, gnome.”

Benzan had spoken briefly to Dannel, finally handing him a number of his few remaining white-fletched arrows. “The Thirteen did their worst, and we’re still here,” the tiefling said. “Let’s finish this thing.”

“We did not get our captive... we still don’t know what we’re facing, or how to defuse the threat of the Tree.”

“We find it, we destroy it,” Arun said simply.

“Perhaps we have another option, after all,” Cal said. He stood, hefting a small canvas sack, and crossed to the center of the room, dumping its contents upon the altar. The others gathered around it, Mole stuffing a few looted treasures she’d been examining into her bag of holding before joining them.

“Eww,” she said.

The gnome’s prize was a two foot long slug, which looked up at them as if aware of the misery of its fate.

Chapter 376

The interrogation of Nulin “Fish” Wiejeron was quick and to the point.

When Cal dispelled his baleful polymorph, the others instantly ready for any attack or attempt at escape, the lean-figured assassin merely shrugged and sat down upon the altar. Even as they divested of his weapons and other accessories, he began to speak. “I realize that you can kill me at any moment,” he said. “And that you are on a... tight timeline. So I will be concise. I offer you any information about the Cagewrights and their plans that you require, without reservation, in exchange for my life and freedom.”

“You think we would let one of the Thirteen just walk out of here, free as a bird?” Dannel asked roughly.

Wiejeron nodded at the comment. “From what I understand of you heroic types, the ‘greater good’ is the driving principle in this instance. I make no apologies for what I am, but is giving me the justice I no doubt deserve worth the destruction of your world?”

There was a heavy pause.

“You would just sell out your allies, not to mention your ‘grand scheme’, just like that?” Cal asked.

Wiejeron shrugged. “In my case, the principle of ‘self-preservation’ trumps that of the greater good, in this instance that of my confederates. From what I’ve seen, you’ve killed most of them anyway, and I do not doubt that you will prove capable of handling Dyr’ryd as well. As for the Tree... well, that is a tale of a different sort entirely, and one which I will expound upon, should you grant me the assurance I seek. Sworn to by that one,” he added, nodding to Arun.

Wiejeron just sat there, looking as relaxed as if he were at a casual gathering rather than a trial for his life, while the companions shared a number of meaningful looks in the space around him.

“If we sink to dealing with them, then how are we better than they are?” Arun finally said. The dwarf looked troubled.

Benzan had drawn his sword, and now stood back a short distance, with an expression like a thunderhead. “Leave me alone with him for a few minutes, and we will see what can be learned.”

“Torture won’t work on this one,” Cal said plainly. While the others had been talking, he’d watched Dana, standing behind their prisoner. She’d quietly used her powers in an attempt to charm the assassin, but he wasn’t surprised when she looked at him and shook her head. Wiejeron’s expression had merely flickered for a moment, and he did not turn around.

“Perhaps I can convince him,” Dannel said, stepping forward. Cal realized that the elf was going to try the same thing Dana just had. Wiejeron, he saw, had looked up and even smiled at the elf disarmingly... great, just broadcast what you are planning, so he can focus his mental defenses, the gnome thought. Dannel drew upon his bardic powers, filling the air with the haunting notes of a melodic song designed to catch up the will of the target and bend it to his own. But once again, the spell failed.

“Let’s just ‘ave ‘is ‘ead and be on with it,” Hodge said.

“No,” Arun said. He’d drawn his holy avenger and now stepped forward. Wiejeron did not flinch, but something flashed in his eyes as the dwarf lifted the weapon to a point about an inch away from the assassin’s throat. “You know us well, rogue, and I do not doubt that to your mind, those traits you catalogued are tallied among our weaknesses. But we are here, victorious, while your companions lie dead in the tunnel out there. So hear my words, and pay heed. You will reveal your secrets, and by my honor, this blade, and the name of my god Moradin the Soul Forger, you will be permitted to depart, upon pain of death should you ever return to this part of the Realms henceforth, or take any action whatsoever against those people under my protection. I do not doubt that you are a master at the art of falsehoods and deceit. I warn you, however, that should I detect a lie, this blade will separate the head that speaks it from your miserable carcass.”

Cal quietly cast detect thoughts.

Wiejeron nodded. “Fair enough.”

The interview proceeded quickly, with the assassin’s testimony broken only sporadically by questions, mostly from Cal. Wiejeron gave his revelations without spurious comments or unnecessary elaboration, and they learned much, some of which they had already known something about, but which now took shape in ugly detail.

He spoke of Dyr’ryd, the shator abomination who nominally led the organization. It was Shebeleth Regidin, however, who had been the motivating force behind the creation of the Soulcages and the fell artifact that would open the portal between worlds, the Tree of Shackled Souls. The companions had already learned about the fell Ritual of Planar Joining, the dark rite that would open the permanent gateway to Carceri using the souls of those unfortunate individuals known as the Shackleborn, descendants of a cohort of demodands who’d come to Faerûn in humanoid guise a millennium past. But Wiejeron’s simple, casual explanation of the process that had led up to the current situation filled them all with a sense of horror and dread. Hundreds of people had already given their lives to the project, without any apparent concern on the part of the Cagewrights of what atrocities had to be wrought in the path to their destination.

Arun interrupted to turn the conversation to the termination of the ritual. With the holy sword hovering a few inches from his face, Wiejeron revealed that the destruction of the tree in the midst of the ritual would create a backlash of energy that would create a full-force eruption of the volcano, and the destruction of not only Cauldron, but a good part of the entire region. He spoke of the process without any apparent feeling for the thousands of refugees from Cauldron who would likely die in the cataclysm, or the tens of thousands that would be affected by the quakes, falling ash, and environmental devastation wrought by such an outcome as far away as Almraiven to the west, and the city-states along the Lake of Steam to the east. Intent upon the need for control over their own creation, Regidin had tasked Freija Doorgan with the creation of a fail-safe, a shutdown mechanism for the artifact, but Wiejeron had not been party to the details of that arrangement.

“Freija and I weren’t on the best of terms,” he admitted.

“Hard to believe she could resist your charms,” Dana returned dryly. Wiejeron shrugged and offered a slight smile.

“An intricate plan,” Cal said. “Brilliant, if twisted.”

“It fits with what we’ve learned,” Dannel added. “But there is one more bit of information that is lacking.”

“I cannot believe that this plot reflects solely the initiative of a cabal of mad plotters, no matter how talented all of you are. Your tale speaks of a figure in the shadows, pulling the strings that tie all of this together. Nidrama implied as much, though she would not come out and admit it. What I wish to know is, who or what do the Cagewrights serve?”

Wiejeron lowered his head for a moment, and let out a deep sigh.

“Answer,” Arun said.

The assassin’s head came up, and there was a bleak look in his eyes. “Adimarchus,” he said. “We serve Adimarchus.”

Cal and the other Travelers betrayed no knowledge of the name, but Arun, Dannel, and Mole reacted quite differently. “Adimarchus!” Dannel exclaimed. “We’d thought him long-dead!”

“It would appear not,” Cal said. “This individual is a Power of some sort, I assume?”

Wiejeron nodded. “A rebellious angel, fallen into the Abyss, long before the Age of Man became a dream in the minds of the gods. He is not gone, but held prisoner in the depths of Carceri.”

“So your plans involved the release of your patron,” Cal said.

“It was on our long-term list of things to do,” the assassin admitted.

“We will deal with Adimarchus when the time comes,” Arun said. “The ritual advances to conclusion as we speak, and the opening of the portal may be nigh. We cannot dally here further.”

“I hold you to your word, then,” the assassin said.

“We don’t know yet if you were telling the truth,” Dana said.

“Ask your paladin if he detected any falsehoods. In any case, I have fulfilled my obligation, betrayed my cohorts and my master, and feel the need to relocate far, far from this locale.”

“I have one more question,” Benzan interrupted, the first words he’d contributed since the opening of the interrogation.

“I will answer as best I can.”

“When you put my daughter, my Izandra, in one of those cages, and shackled her to your fucking artifact,” he said, his voice rising to a shout, “did you spare any thought for her soul or the others that you were going to trample in your mad dreams of power?”

Without warning, the tiefling lunged past Lok and Hodge, thrusting with his magical longsword at the assassin’s face.

Chapter 377

“Benzan!” Cal yelled, even as the tiefling unleashed a deadly thrust with his keen sword at their prisoner. Wiejeron had clearly been expecting an attack, however, for even as the point darted toward his eye he threw himself backward across the slab. He could not avoid a long cut across his jaw as Benzan lunged after him, but then he flipped backward, rolling into a smooth crouch. He spoke words of magic, and even as Arun tried to grab him, he vanished from view.

“Stop him!” Dana said, even as Cal added, “Damn it, Benzan!”

The companions fanned out around the altar, with the spellcasters inside a ring formed by the warriors. But the assassin seemed bent more on escape than combat, at least until Cal gestured and conjured from webs of shadow a black-tinged wall of ice that blocked the corridor about twenty feet down the tunnel. Benzan followed with a glitterdust that filled the passage and a portion of the room with a blinding fog of flickering motes, but the spell did not reveal the outline of the invisible assassin.

“Is he still here?” Lok asked, scanning alertly for any sign of the Cagewright.

“Give me a moment to sort out the auras in this place,” Cal said, focusing upon his detect magic spell.

“You broke your word,” came a deep voice, pitched to echo off the smooth volcanic walls of the chamber, making it hard to determine their source. Cal, however, was a gnome, with ears specifically adapted to discerning fine gradations in sound, and he quietly focused his concentration in a far corner of the room, near the open lava pits. “So much for the honor of a paladin.”

“Show yourself, and I’ll give you the gift of a quick death,” Benzan snarled, sweeping his sword in wide, blind arcs that had little chance of revealing the canny assassin’s position.

Arun’s expression betrayed a barely-contained fury, but he did nothing to intervene as his companions swept the room. Hodge, intent on detecting a telltale sound that would reveal their foe’s location, did not notice when his dagger slid from its scabbard at his belt and vanished into thin air behind him.

Dana, however, suddenly turned, firing a ray of searing light that knifed through the air maybe a foot in front of the dwarf’s face. Hodge cursed in surprise and staggered back, and so he didn’t see the beam suddenly flare out as it struck something solid. Wiejeron’s only response was a muffled curse, quickly controlled as he tried to shift away to another location.

But Mole had been waiting for one of her companions to reveal Wiejeron's location, and even as Dana fired her spell she threw a small cloth parcel to the ground at Hodge's feet. The bag broke open with the impact, dislodging a small cloud of brown dust—finely ground coffee from the gnome's extensive stores in her bag of holding. Most of the grounds quickly settled to the ground, or stuck in Hodge's leggings, but a thin film of dust hung in the air about a foot off the ground, quickly moving away toward the far side of the room. Lok moved to intercept the assassin, but as he lifted his axe to strike Wierjeron suddenly shifted and darted smoothly past him, driving his stolen dagger deep into the crease where Lok's heavily armored leg met his torso. The blade slid with precision under a plate and through the chain links beneath, opening a serious wound. The blow was designed to cripple him, and Wiejeron was quick to dart away, leaving little opportunity to counter.

But Lok was a master fighter, and little opportunity was enough. Even as Wiejeron slipped around the genasi, Lok spun around, shifting his weight to his uninjured side as he spun around, his axe humming as it sliced the air. Droplets of blood exploded out of the air as the thundering blade cut leather—they'd divested him of his shadowed silent chain shirt and flesh. Even then the Cagewright quickly adjusted, accepting the momentum of the blow and tumbling forward to regain his footing. The maneuver left an ugly red splotch on the ground where his injured back had pressed against the ground momentarily, and that was enough for Dannel to deliver a nearly-blind arrow that stabbed through his arm, the bloody head and feathered end hovering in mid-air about six inches apart.

"Damn you all to the hells!" Wiejeron exclaimed, leaping toward Dana. The mystic wanderer darted back, but not fast enough to avoid the knife that grazed her ribs. She wasn't hurt too badly, and the attack opened Wiejeron to a final counter, as Benzan ran him through with his sword. As he died his greater invisibility faded, revealing a bloody corpse with a frozen look of rage lingering on his features.

"That was stupid," Cal said.

Benzan shot a final dark look at the body and turned around to see Arun standing before him, his sword held up a few inches from his chest.

"I'm not the sort of man who appreciates threats," the tiefling growled. "I'm not bound by your narrow moralism, paladin, so spare me your sermon about honor."

Arun did not waver. "I'll not defend the likes of that," he said, with barely a nod to the dead man. "And I understand that you are distraught about your daughter."

"But mark me, for I will only say this once. You are not the only one who has lost here; I considered Zenna to be one of my closest friends, and I felt the pain caused by this man's words. But we will not prevail here as eight individuals. The Cagewrights, for all their selfish evil and stupid infighting, still functioned together well enough as a unit to unleash this storm of destruction upon our world. I will not stand beside a man whom I cannot trust to be there when I need his strength, nor would I offer my aid to one to whom I could not offer all of the fight that I possess. His fate—" Arun again indicated the corps—"was ours to decide... but your action threatened us all, and through that the thousands who yet depend upon our victory over the Cagewrights.”

Without waiting for a reply, he turned, and sheathing his sword, crossed over to the exit where the glitterdust was already fading into nothingness. Hodge followed him, and after a moment, Lok and Dannel followed.

“Well, for once I didn’t have to say it,” Cal said, sheathing one of his wands and moving to join the others.

Benzan turned to Dana. “I was wrong,” he said quietly, so that only she could hear. “But I’m not sad that bastard’s dead.”

“I know, honey,” she said, taking his arm, leaning her head against his shoulder as they followed after the others.

Chapter 378

The wall of ice, already melting with the heat of the nearby lava pools, disintegrated completely in a few minutes, leaving the passage clear. The corridor remained empty save for the wreckage of the earlier battle. They quickly returned to the bend in the tunnel where the ambush had begun. The sides of the passageway were scorched black from the multiple flame strikes that had been unleashed here, and the corpses of the slain Cagewrights, hastily looted and covered with loose cloaks, formed dark mounds that they gave a wide berth. The stench of death hung heavily over the tunnel, even in the relatively short time since the battle.

“Well, do we retrace our steps, take down this wall, or press on?” Dannel asked.

“I suggest we go forward,” Cal said, indicating the secret passage where the Cagewrights had waited to ambush them. “We should find the Tree of Shackled Souls first, and remove any lingering defenses that the Cagewrights have established.”

“Including this Dyr’ryd fellow,” Dana added. “From what Wiejeron said, I do not like the sound of him.”

“I think they’re all mad, to some degree,” the gnome replied. “It’s likely a byproduct of their interactions with Carceri, and their bond to this Adimarchus.”

“Yeah, his digs were nuts,” Hodge said, with a shudder.

“Occipitus,” Dannel clarified. “An abyssal demiplane, the former home of the fallen angel-turned-demon. We left one of our companions there, a cleric of Helm, who believed that he could rehabilitate the place.”

“Well, if this Adimarchus gets out, he might try to return there,” Cal said. “You might want to warn your friend.”

“Enough chatter, we have something to do here,” Benzan said, slipping through the ruined doorway into the far passage. The others followed behind, stepping around the covered bodies of Freija Doorgan and Shebeleth Regidin.

“We should dispose of these corpses more permanently,” Mole suggested as they passed. “Keep them from being raised.”

“A good suggestion,” Cal said. “Before we depart, we’ll drop them all into the lava.”

The tunnel, which had the look of a natural lava shaft worked to make it more passable, continued straight for about thirty feet before it gradually began to bend to the right. Right around the start of the bend, however, they encountered a set of stone double doors on the left side of the corridor.

“Tunnel ends at another set of doors up ahead, maybe forty feet further down,” Benzan said, emerging from the shadows ahead of them.

“They’re warm to the touch,” Mole—or rather, Mole’s voice; the gnome was invisible again—said from in front of the doors.

“Careful,” Cal said, nodding to Arun and Lok, who took up positions opposite each other at the doors. While the others prepared weapons and spells, the two warriors pushed the heavy portals open.

They were greeted with a wave of heat and orange light from a broad pool of lava, maybe thirty feet across, directly beyond the doors. A path of evenly spaced stones led across the obstacle, beyond which they could see a large chamber. The larger room was adorned in an unusual décor, with woven mats covering much of the floor space, and brightly colored paper screens laid out around the perimeter along the walls. There were a few pieces of furniture in their line of view, including a cot and an armoire, but overall the effect was very Spartan.

“Bodies, hanging from the ceiling,” Dannel said, pointing across the room toward the shadowy far edge.

“I detect no evil, other than the Taint which infuses all of this place,” Arun reported.

“I don’t like the looks of this,” Cal said, indicating the conveniently-placed stepping stones.

“Ah, it’s not so hard,” Mole said, and before the others could intervene she was darting across the steps, popping into visibility briefly at the far side of the lava pool to take a bow before sliding the ring back onto her finger.

“Gnomes,” Hodge muttered meaningfully.

“Come on, let’s not get split up,” Arun said, starting across the stone bridge. The flat slabs were close enough so that moving across the gap wasn’t that great a hazard, and soon they were reunited on the far side.

The cavern looked to be part living space, part training hall. The “bodies” that Dannel had spotted turned out to be training dummies suspended by long chains from the ceiling forty feet above. In addition to the paper screens they found several weapon racks, which held a diverse collection of exotic weapons of the sort used by monks. Lok pronounced the weapons to be of masterwork quality, and soon produced a kama that possessed an odd, almost translucent blade. Dannel investigated the armoire and reported that it contained a selection of expensive men’s clothing. There were no apparent threats or exits, however.

“Looks like quarters for our monk, and perhaps for the assassin as well,” Cal said.

“Well, they won’t be needing it any more,” Benzan said. “Let’s get going.”

“Hold a moment,” Cal said, humming a melody to summon his bardic magic.

“Like the paladin said, we don’t have a lot of time,” the tiefling impatiently said.

“If we have to come back and search this room again because we missed something, we’ll waste more of it,” Cal said, as slowly turned, scanning each segment of the room in turn. “This will only take a minute.”

But it was only a few seconds before he pointed at the cot. “There. Strong magical auras.”

Almost immediately the blankets covering the cot were thrown back, as Mole quickly examined the cot. “There’s a secret compartment in here,” the gnome reported. “Good catch, Uncle Cal.”

“Watch out for traps,” Benzan suggested.

Because Mole was still invisible, the others couldn’t see her roll her eyes at the tiefling. But a moment later the gnome appeared holding a number of objects, the most obvious of which was a six-foot staff of wood so pale that it looked almost like ivory.

“Got a scroll, this vestment-thing, and the staff,” she said. “You want to take a look at it, Uncle Cal?”

“Yes, but later, when we have more time. Benzan, if you would store the staff in your magical quiver?”

“Fine. But let’s get moving.”

They retraced their steps and made their way back down the tunnel to the doors at the end. Again after a cursory examination for traps Arun and Lok shouldered them open to reveal another large chamber beyond. This one was dark save for the light shed by their magical weapons and Cal’s light spell. That light revealed ugly red walls, either painted or some natural property of the stone here. The place was dominated by a huge mound of cushions, a veritable mountain nearly thirty feet across and six feet high at the center. The cushions and the floor alike were covered with a layer of gooey gray slime, hinting at the resident of this chamber.

“Demodand gunk,” Mole said, looking around. To their right a deep alcove almost twenty feet deep held a stone desk sized for an individual ten feet tall, and to their left the gnome quickly identified another of the heavy curtains colored and textured to look like another wall to the casual glance.

“Couple of urns, back here,” Mole reported, pulling back the curtain.

“If there aren’t any bad guys, we’ll worry about them later,” Cal said.

“Apparently you don’t know your niece very well,” Dannel said dryly. “I’d wager that one of those urns is being opened as we speak.”

A moment later, a voice from the curtained nook reported, “Gold and platinum... a few thousand. Looks like there was a lot more here, not too long ago.”

Dannel looked at Cal, who shrugged. “Curiosity’s a family trait,” he admitted.

“Probably used most of their wealth to finance their operation,” Lok said. “Mercenaries like those haraknin don’t come cheap.”

“Nor does the creation of an artifact,” Dana said, her face shrinking in disgust as she pulled her boots from a thick patch of clinging slime.

“This could be another dead end, but spread out, take a quick look,” Cal suggested. “There may be another secret door, or we may have missed something in one of the earlier rooms.”

“There’s still that conjured wall back at the ambush site,” Dannel reminded them. “I am sure it was created to hide something.”

But they didn’t get a chance to go back to Freija’s barrier, not yet, in any case. Benzan found a secret door in the back wall of the chamber near the edge of the heap of slime-encrusted cushions. Lok was able to discern its function, and pushed open the relatively large slab, roughly seven feet square, that sank back on a recessed stone pivot into another short tunnel. This one only ran for about fifteen feet before ending in another secret door, its function more obvious from the inside. Again Lok applied his strength, and the cumbersome portal dragged slowly open.

Beyond lay a vast chamber, dwarfing anything they’d encountered in the Cagewright complex thus far. The place was a great bubble in the mountain, a hemisphere maybe a hundred feet across. Rivulets of molten lava flowed slowly across the floor, shedding enough light to see, but leaving much of the room deep in shadow.

And in the center of the room stood the objective of their quest.

The Tree of Shackled Souls was a warped, twisted metal monstrosity, rising on a trunk fully six feet across before spreading into a dense network of branches dominated by thirteen thick primary boles that each culminated in a dangling black metal cage... the soulcages described by Dannel and the others. The Tree was wreathed in a furious nimbus of unnatural violet light interwoven with tendrils of semi-substantial black energy. Strands of that weave twisted outward from the tree to vanish into the cavern walls above. The artifact was at the center of a web of power unleashed by the Ritual of Planar Junction, and none of the adventurers needed much insight to sense that something Very Bad was happening in this place.

Benzan had moved forward quickly, ignoring the cautions offered by the others, trying to get a good look at the motionless lumps that lay at the base of each of the cages.

“So much evil,” Arun said, staring up at the Tree in grim horror. His fingers tightened on the grip of his holy sword until they were white within the shell of his gauntlet.

“So you have come to the end at last,” came a deep, throaty voice from across the chamber. “The end!” echoed a higher-pitched, demented voice that broke off into a sinister cackle.

Shedding his invisibility, Dyr’ryd appeared on an island formed by several lava streams about forty feet ahead of them to the left. The massive, bloated shator looked down at the intruders into its realm with eyes that burned with unreadable emotion. The symbiant creature, Ryd, twisted its tiny limbs that jutted from the side of the demodand’s oblong skull. It was obvious that the fiend had not neglected his defenses, from the obvious shimmer of magical displacement that surrounded its massive form. It wore a metal gauntlet on one hand, which held a large polearm with a blue-steel blade that almost seemed to scream “powerful magic!”

“It is fitting that you should be witnesses, after all that has transpired,” the leader of the Cagewrights said. “The Ritual draws to a close... and with it, the melding of our worlds will be complete.”

“Complete,” Ryd echoed, with an evil grin.

Chapter 379

At the Tree of Shackled Souls, the demodand aberration Dyr’ryd confronted the Heroes of Cauldron. Divested of its most powerful allies, without even the ability to summon additional demodand minions due to the interference wrought by the Tree, the shator was nevertheless an imposing foe.

“You face an interesting dilemma,” the creature said. “You cannot stop the ritual now, the backlash would cause an eruption of the volcano, and...”

“Yes, we know,” Cal interrupted. “WASTE IT!” he shouted, punctuating his command by hurling a targeted dispel magic at the shator that dissolved its displacement and revealed it standing a few feet away.

Its plan to delay and deceive the intruders ruined, Dyr’ryd snarled and lifted its deadly guisarme Mindbite, calling upon its innate powers to unleash some nasty effect upon the adventurers. A canny and experienced adversary, mentally and physically ready for battle, the shator was flat footed for barely a second after the gnome's shouted command.

But a lot happened in that second.

Dannel and Benzan were both ready, and drew and fired in the same instant even as the echoes of Cal's words died in the cavern. They shifted their aim as Dyr'ryd's displacement was broken, and both holy arrows slammed into the demodand's baggy torso, vanishing into its corrupt flesh with small white flashes of light. The shator stumbled back a step, its body wrought with agonies as pure divine energy lanced through it. The parasitic Ryd screamed as a tiny bolt punctured its malformed body, a gift from Mole's crossbow. The shator was a product of the dank pits of Carceri, and no stranger to pain, but Dannel and Benzan both maintained their barrage with an almost insane speed and accuracy, the elf filled with his magical song, the tiefling filled with rage at what had been done to his daughter.

Dana, meanwhile, reached over and touched Lok on the shoulder, filling him with the divine power of Selûne. The genasi, well-acquainted with the magic she empowered him with, instantly rose off the ground and flew like an arrow toward the demodand.

Both of Dyr'ryd's mouths now exploded with cries and curses, as arrow after arrow slammed into it with the force of a trebuchet stone. The demodand could not focus its magic quickly enough to respond, but it saw the genasi coming, and with fury it lifted Mindbite to return some of the pain it had thus far withstood.

But even as it started its swing a last pair of white-fledged holy missiles buried themselves, a few inches apart, deep into its throat. The impacts threw off its aim, and the potent magical weapon sliced harmlessly above Lok as the genasi dove straight in, and at the last instant drove his magical axe with grim fatality into the shator's ugly throat. A thunderous retort shook the cavern, and as Lok flew past, his momentum carrying him inexorably forward past his foe, the rest of the companions watched as the monstrous double-head that had carried two unique minds tumbled end over end, and landed with a sizzling splash in the bubbling rivulet of lava.

The body stood there upright a moment longer, as if unrecognizing the absence of its driving essence. But then, inevitably, the fat corpse of the fearsome demodand crumpled into a noxious heap on the uneven stone floor.

Chapter 380

Benzan knelt on the hard stone floor, his body shaking. The eerie illumination cast by the surrounding lava flows framed his features with a diabolical glow that seemed to highlight the faint hints of his mixed ancestry. He'd always been able to pass for human, unlike his daughter, but at this moment, in the depths of his grief, he seemed more alien than ever before.

Directly above him was the soulcage containing the dead body of his daughter. Her friends and family stood arrayed behind the tiefling, offering quiet support and witness. A short distance away lay the sagging corpse of Dyr'ryd, a hissing sound occasionally rising from it as runnels of demodand blood trailing from the decapitated body found their way into the surrounding lava streams.

For several minutes they were silent, respecting the man's grief and each sharing it. Dana stood closest, but she knew the man better than anyone ever had, knew that he needed to be alone, at least for the moment. After a time, Cal spoke. "We have to go. We must find the failsafe device that Wiejeron spoke of."

"Go," Benzan said. "I will wait until you are clear, and then destroy the Tree."

"Benzan, we can't..." Lok began.

"I know what you are going to say. But Cauldron is already destroyed; everyone who can get away has already done so. Isn't it more important to be certain? What if Wiejeron was lying, and while you're looking for something that doesn't exist, the ritual is completed? There's only one way to be certain that this is done, now."

"I share your conviction, and if it comes to that, I will help you destroy the Tree," Arun said. "But a cataclysmic eruption would mean certain death for the refugees from Cauldron, and suffering for many thousands more. We must seek out what options remain, swiftly, before taking the ultimate action."

"He's right," Dana said. "And if the Tree must be destroyed, we'll all do it together. Its destruction may disrupt the interference that prevents teleportation magic to function, which would give us a chance to escape."

"I was thinking, that room with the summoning diagram looked like it might have belonged to the wizardess, the one that Wiejeron mentioned," Mole said. "Maybe we can find some clues there."

"I was thinking the same thing," Cal said. "I would suggest we start the search there."

"Benzan?" Dana asked.

The tiefling rose, and slide his sword into the sheath at his waist. Deliberately, he turned to them, an iron look in his eyes.

"Let's go."

The adventurers hastened back through the complex to the chamber of Freija Doorgan, where they proceeded to tear the place apart in a hurried but intense search. Mole found a secret door near the summoning diagram that opened onto a small hidden workshop cluttered with stone tables and shelves along the perimeter of the room, along with a weathered desk in one corner. Everything was laid out with precision, and there was not a speck of dust to be found anywhere within the room. A small fountain full of bubbling lava provided heat and light. After a quick examination Cal reported that the materials here were used in the creation of various magical items, possibly including the evil rings that each of the members of the Thirteen wore. They had six of those rings now, stored in a velvet bag tucked deep inside Cal's handy haversack.

Mole found a hidden drawer in the desk and produced a folio of papers that she quickly shared with Cal.

"Abyssal," he said, examining the ugly script that covered the parchment sheets. The gnome had permanently empowered himself with the ability to comprehend languages, so he had no difficulty understanding the text. He read quickly while the others finished their examination of the room.

"No other exits," Benzan reported. "What do you have there?"

Cal held up a hand to forestall him, while he continued reading. His augmented intelligence allowed him to grasp the content of the documents faster than most scholars, but it was still nearly a full minute more before he responded.

"We're looking for something called a 'dispersal collar,'" he reported. "Doorgan constructed it at Regidin's direction to be able to abort the ritual, if necessary."

"And where is this collar now?" Arun asked.

Cal frowned. "The only reference to its location is here. The entry reads that it has been given for safekeeping, to "that fiery beast from Gehenna."

"That doesn't sound promising," Lok said.

Arun and Dannel exchanged a look. "The lava cavern," the elf said.

"I think I be needin' a drink," Hodge said.

Chapter 381

For the second time the heavy stone portals swung open, but this time the Heroes of Cauldron, along with their new allies, stepped forward into Moltenwing's lair.

The cavern was much as they'd left it, a vast open space maybe sixty feet wide and more than twice that in depth; it was difficult to make out the far edge with all of the smoke and haze from the roiling sea of lava that filled the room in between. There were a number of stone "islands" situated across the chamber, but they were surrounded by stretches of lava too wide for most of them to hazard leaps across. The ledge they were on was only about fifteen feet deep and maybe twice that across, gently sloping down to a crumbling edge that was only a few feet above the surface of the bubbling lava.

For a long moment they simply regarded the chamber in watchful silence, looking for any sign of danger.

"This is so obviously a bad idea that I'm not going to say anything," Benzan said.

“Clearly the Cagewrights picked a good place to hide their object,” Cal noted.

“Where’s the ‘fiery beast,’ do you think?” Mole asked.

“Gold piece gets you five it’s under the lava,” Dannel said. “Probably knows we’re here, and probably is just waiting for us to make our move.”

“From the description in the notes, I doubt that the collar would survive long-term immersion under the lava,” Cal said. “It’s likely hidden somewhere else in the chamber.”

“Detect magic scan?” Benzan suggested.

Cal nodded. “That was my first thought, and I’ve already given the room a quick scan. Unfortunately it’s either shielded—perhaps in a deep crevice that we cannot see from here—or situated on the far side of the chamber, beyond the range of the spell.”

“So what you’re saying is, we’re going to have to go out there,” Arun said.

“You kin fly, right?” Hodge said to Lok. “Why not just scoot out there an’ take a look, eh?”

The genasi shook his head. “That was Dana’s magic, and the spell is only useable once per day.”

“I can go,” Mole said. “The islands are close enough for me to make the jumps.” Somehow the gnome managed to look frightened and excited at the same time. She’d actually taken a few steps toward the edge of the lava lake before Cal stopped her.

“Wait. Dana?”

The mystic wanderer regarded the lava field with an intent expression. The way that the ember glow from the superheated magma shone over her pale features, she looked eerily like the succubus she’d imitated earlier through the power of Cal’s veil spell. Finally, she spoke.

“I will try.”

* * * * *

Their names were Ik-tr’k, Noxtes, and Calimansyes, and they were not that enthusiastic about Dana’s commands.

Nevertheless, it was obvious that the mephits conjured by Dana’s spell were in their element. They were a varied lot, each with a unique form and features, but all united in their affinity to heat and flame. The other companions gave them a wide berth as Dana quickly related her instructions. The mephits were not especially intelligent, and the summoning spell of limited duration, so she was brief and clear in expressing what she wanted. Despite whatever misgivings they might have had about being used as proxies in an obviously dangerous situation, the creatures were bound by the power of her spell, so once she finished issuing her commands, and pointed out across the room, they hastened to obey. The magma mephit dove into the lava pool, instructed to seek out any threats lurking within, while the other two, a fire mephit and a steam mephit, flapped their tiny wings and flew out across the room, with orders to look for hiding places that might conceal the dispersal collar that they sought.

“It looks like there’s a big ledge there, on the far side of the room,” Dannel said, advancing almost to the edge of the bubbling sea of hot lava, peering through the thick haze of smoke and noxious gases that filled the room.

“Careful, Dannel,” Dana cautioned. “A bath in that would not be pleasant.”

The elf nodded, and turned back to his viewing. The mephits, advancing cautiously, were about halfway across the room, now. “Odd... I can just make out the back wall of the ledge... it looks strange, almost like golden striations in the surface.”

“Maybe it’s a vein of ore,” Cal suggested.

Arun abruptly looked around. “Where’s Mole?”

“Invisible again,” Hodge suggested. “Probably hidin’ somewheres ‘round ‘ere.”

“No...” Cal said, alarmed, looking out across the lava maze.

“Mole, no!” Dannel said, realizing what all of them had. “Get back here!”

But before any of them could do anything further, there was a tinny screech as the magma mephit burst from the lava toward the far end of the chamber. Its wings flapped madly as it tried to climb into the air, but it had gained barely ten feet of clearance before the lava below it erupted.

A huge form emerged from the lava, sending a spray of molten droplets across the far side of the room. As it unfolded they companions could see that it was an enormous dragon, its dense brown hide glowing with heat, its wingspan easily thirty feet across as it spread them out upon the surface of the molten rock, allowing it to lift its upper body and long neck high up into the air after its hopeless prey. Its jaws spread wide, wide enough to simply absorb the desperate mephit, which disappeared into that cavernous maw before the jaws snapped shut, crushing it with obvious finality.

Moltenwing had appeared, at last, to greet its visitors.

Chapter 382

Charmed by the summoning of the mephits—Zenna had called them before, she recalled—Mole quickly decided that she wasn’t going to wait on the sidelines while events developed. She had no doubt in the ability of her friends to deal with the “fiery beast” described in Freija’s journal, but she also knew that their success might depend upon them getting that collar-thing and getting out of here, fast.

That was true, but there was also something else that drew her forward. The uneven sea of lava, with the jagged stone islands stretching out across the cavern, presented her with a challenge. A difficult, dangerous challenge; the sort that she wasn't very good at resisting.

Mole Calloran wasn't a fool. She knew that a dire threat lurked in this place, probably even now moving to strike at them from beneath the shelter of the magma expanse. But she was confident in her abilities, had survived virtually unscratched dangers that had nearly destroyed her companions. She'd ridden a dragon, had taken down three of the Cagewrights herself. She was a shadow, a zephyr, one of the best-damned rogues in the Realms.

Invisible, silent, she ran across the platform and leapt out across the lava. Augmented by her magical boots, she flew across superheated molten death. The gap between the starting ledge and her goal—a long, slender finger of uneven rock about eight feet wide, and twenty feet long—was just under twenty feet, and she cleared it easily. Landing smoothly, conserving her forward momentum, she kept running to the end of the first island. The next one was nearly thirty-five feet away, but there was a small outcropping of stone jutting from the lava field near the halfway point of the gap. The outcropping was only about two feet across, but it was her target, and she did not hesitate, leaping across the gap. Her aim was flawless, and as she hit the outcropping she sprang forward into another leap, somersaulting in mid-air as she arced toward the larger island. Below her, the lava grew closer as her inertia faded, hot bubbles of air popping through the surface of the molten rock as they rose from below, as if to welcome her lethal immersion within.

But then, there was solid rock beneath her feet, and she landed smoothly into a crouch, her forward momentum spent. Glancing behind her, she saw that there were six inches of exposed stone behind her feet, and then only lava a foot below the upper edge of the rock island where she stood.

Breathing heavily, exhilarated, she looked back at her friends. The only bad part was that none of them had seen the deed, but as Dannel called out after her, she knew they'd recognized her absence.

Looking up, she saw the mephits flying above her, just a short distance ahead. She'd covered just over half the distance across the room in her leaps. She looked ahead, at the far ledge now almost within reach, and started forward, looking for the best route to reach that destination.

But she never got there. Even as she took her first step, the magma mephit appeared from the lava ahead, followed by the impressive figure of the pyroclastic dragon, Moltenwing.

Mole just stood there for a moment in stunned amazement as the dragon effortlessly destroyed the magma mephit. The other two mephits had drawn back in sudden alarm, but not quickly enough; the dragon had driven itself forward to the nearest outcropping of rock—thankfully, not the same one that Mole was perched on!—and pulled itself out of the clinging magma with a speed and agility that surprised the gnome. As she watched, Mole became aware of buzzing shafts lancing the air around the dragon, missiles fired from the weapons of her companions. The part of her brain that was registering cohesive thoughts studied the impacts, most of which glanced harmlessly off the dragon's body. Armor, then; a hide stronger than steel plate, or a castle bulwark. It likely had some sort of magical protections inherent as well, she thought.

Her brain and body were starting to work together again, and she crouched low, her body pressed into the rock beneath her, willing herself to be silent, unseen. The dragon launched itself into the air, ignoring the continuing barrage of fire. A black ray glanced off its torso, but it seemed to dissolve as it impacted the dragon's body. Spell resistance, she thought, not really surprised.

Her hand dropped to her small crossbow, but her mind dismissed that thought as ludicrous. Getting back to the others was the logical course, but she would have to get a running start to have a reasonable chance of clearing that long gap at her back.

Above her, the dragon lashed out and took out the steam mephit much as it had the first. The fire mephit was backpedaling as fast as it could fly in the opposite direction, but the dragon almost casually flicked its long tail out behind it, and smote it a devastating blow that knocked it down into the lava, its little body broken. The drake seemed capable of easily coordinating its actions against multiple opponents, and it had a purely ungodly reach.

Hovering, the dragon turned toward the entry to its cavern, and the companions gathered on the ledge at the edge of the flowing lava. More missiles impacted it, and Mole saw that several arrows drove deep into its hide. Dannel and Benzan were starting to have an impact... but the missiles looked damned tiny in the hide of the massive beast.

The dragon flew over her, and Mole froze. Even to one able to penetrate her invisibility, she was but the tiniest bump upon the stone island.

But the dragon suddenly stopped in mid-air, the beating of its wings casting a driving wind across her shelter.

Mole looked up, and met the dragon's eyes. In that instant she knew what it saw her to be, knew what she was. A tiny, insignificant thief, trying to steal its treasure.

The dragon's jaws opened.

Mole heard a yell from across the cavern. Her name. She tensed, ready to dodge. She'd avoided explosions, spells, even dragonbreath...

She was quicksilver, uncatchable.

But the dragon did not disgorge a cone of fire, nor any other attack she could evade. Instead it breathed an ultrafocused stream of pure sonic energy, a devastating pulse that stabbed unerringly at its target.

The gnome did not even have a chance to scream as the blast slammed into her body, and disintegrated her.

Chapter 383

“Mole!” Dannel screamed, knowing that there was nothing he could do, even as he drew and fired another arrow. The missile flew true, but the dragon ignored it as it hovered above a random island in the lava cavern, what had to be the invisible gnome’s perch.

“We have to get out there!” Arun shouted. The paladin had drawn out and put his own powerful bow into play, but his shots thus far may as well have been stings from gnats against the incredible damage resistance possessed by the dragon. He stood at the very brink of the ledge overlooking the lava, frustrated by his inability to aid his friend.

Dana started forward, although without the ability to fly or teleport herself, it was unclear what she intended to do. But Benzan quickly stopped her, grabbing her by the arm.

“No, Dana! You cannot go out there! It’s suicide!”

The woman shook herself free, fixing her husband with a hard look, but held her ground.

The elf offered a silent prayer that Mole would find a way to escape. But the dragon unleashed its devastating breath weapon, and for an instant, Dannel saw the gnome’s tiny form outlined as the sonic beam slammed into it.

And then she was gone.

“Damn you!” the elf cried, drawing another arrow from his quiver even as the dragon turned toward them. The song was a raging martial crescendo that filled him as he drew, aimed, and released in one motion. The arrow hit the dragon in the shoulder, but he had no time to gauge the effects of his shot, for the dragon abruptly dove for an open patch of lava, and with a massive impact that sprayed lava almost to the edge of their position, vanished beneath the surface.

“What happened?” Arun said. “Mole!”

“It vaporized her,” Cal said, his voice thick. With a great effort, he added, “It’ll come up from below the lava, and continue the attack. We haven’t hurt it badly, not yet. Be ready.”

“I have to go, find if there’s anything left,” Dana said. “If there’s anything, we can resurrect her...”

Benzan started to block her, but surprisingly it was Arun who stopped her with a hand on her arm. “No. We must remain together, first defeat the dragon. If it destroys us all, then Cauldron... and our world... are doomed.”

The companions drew back, alert for the slightest hint of Moltenwing’s return.

They did not have long to wait.

The only warning they got was a faint vibration through the stone, and then the dragon was there, rearing up out of the lava at the very brink of the ledge, drawing itself up with its forelimbs and powerful hind claws, spreading its wings to balance it. The companions were showered with molten rock that clung to their clothes and armor and burned, but they ignored the pain, launching their prepared attacks upon the dragon. Dannel and Benzan fired arrows, both of which stuck in its hide, hopefully penetrating enough to cause damage. The tiefling's store of holy arrows was gone, but his bow added a degree of magical potency to the normal missiles that he fired. Even that was not the equal of Dannel's song, which infused his arrows with a potent magic, enabling his shots to drive through the dragon's incredible defenses.

But as Mole had observed earlier, they were still small, against an enemy that was far too big to stop with even a few well-placed arrows.

Lok and Arun rushed forward, weapons ready to strike. Their spellcasters had not put the few seconds they'd had while Moltenwing had maneuvered under the lava to waste, and both shimmered with the tell-tale aura of magical displacement. Hodge held back at Arun's order, although his crossbow seemed useless against the dragon's thick hide. Cursing, the dwarf tossed the weapon aside and drew out his holy sword.

If anything counted as evil, it was this monstrosity.

Cal and Dana, further back in the entry, bolstered the attack with spells. Cal's acid arrow splashed against its neck, searing even the dragon's armored flesh, while Dana summoned a shimmering morningstar of silver light, a spiritual weapon that she directed against the dragon's flank. The weapon struck its haunches solidly, overcoming its spell resistance, but it appeared to do little if any damage.

The dragon shrugged off the hits, and reared up, opening its jaws once more to breathe.

"Watch out!" Dannel cried, although there wasn't anywhere for them to go.

But this time, instead of breathing its disintegrating sonic blast, the dragon unleashed a cone of sonic force, ash, and flame that blasted out over the entire ledge, and into the corridor beyond. Benzan, Dana, and Dannel, who were farthest back, were able to avoid the worst of the blast, but the warriors in the front ranks took the full force of the dragon's breath attack. The exit corridor seemed to focus the energies of the blast, and Cal was picked up and tossed bodily ten feet down the passage, seared and battered. It was a devastating attack, but all of them survived through sheer toughness and determination.

The dragon pulled itself up fully onto the ledge, no doubt to exploit the damage wrought by its breath weapon. But it instead found itself facing a deadly counterattack, as Lok and Arun opened a full assault upon the dragon with their heavily enchanted weapons. Realizing how durable their foe was, both veterans eschewed powerful but inaccurate all-out attacks for targets strokes designed to penetrate its tough hide. Lok's thundering axe clove into its torso, opening a foot-long gash in its left side, while Arun drove in from the right with his holy avenger, hitting it at the spot with its neck met its body, with enough force to unleash a torrent of searing bright red blood that smoked as it sprayed across his armor. Even as the two warriors pressed their attack, their companions kept up their own attacks, with Cal firing another acid arrow into it, and the archers scoring additional hits now that the range had been reduced to point-blank.

Now it was the dragon that was in a difficult position, and the ancient and crafty creature was quick to shift its tactics. Dropping its body forward so that all four claws rested on the stone ledge, it abruptly spun around, using its size to drive both warriors back. Lok was struck hard by the dragon's left wing, driving him back. But despite the dragon's size and strength, Lok was very difficult to move when he didn't want to be moved, and its gambit only bought it a few feet of distance. Knocked off balance, Lok fell to one knee, but quickly drew himself back up, lifting his axe as he reset his stance.

But Arun was not so fortunate. Its rotation turned it toward the paladin, and as Arun raised his potent sword to strike again, it swept its head into the holy knight's armored gut. Arun grunted as the dragon snapped its head up, lifting him off his feet, and it hurled him outward like a stone fired from a trebuchet. Arun too was heavy and laden with armor and gear, so he didn't fly far, but it was far enough. He landed on his back fifteen feet out, smacking hard into the crusty red-hot surface of the lava pool. His weight made escape impossible, and he quickly started to sink below the surface of the molten lake.

That was obviously the dragon's plan, for as it completed its turn, snapping out its tail behind it to hit the charging Hodge solidly in the chest, it surged forward and dove off the edge of the ledge back into the lava. Its bulk created a ripple wave in the lava that drove Arun even further away from them, but far too far from the nearest rock island to offer him a chance at escape.

Chapter 384

"If that thing drags him under, he's finished!" Benzan shouted, an arrow fitted but nothing to shoot at as the dragon sank beneath the lava just a few paces from where Arun was slowly sinking to his destruction. The paladin did not struggle, knowing it would only hasten his descent, and he held onto his sword yet, silent despite what had to be an agonizing pain as the lava cooked him alive within his armor.

"Dana!" the tiefling cried, as he turned to see his wife running toward the edge of the ledge. A pale silver glow spread out from her cloak around her body as she leapt out over the lava, but while wisps of flame surrounded her boots as she landed running upon the surface, she did not sink. Within moments she'd reached Arun, and reached down to grab his outstretched hand. He'd loosed his grip on his shield, which had sunk beneath the lava, but would not relinquish his sword.

But even as she grasped him, the dwarf was abruptly and suddenly dragged roughly back. Somehow Dana held on, the magic of her mooncloak holding her above the surface even as she was pulled down and dragged with him, flames started to flare about her clothes.

"Let go!" Arun cried, only his head and the hand holding her left visible above the surface of the magma. But Dana only focused her attention upon him, holding his eyes with hers as she drew upon the other power of her magical garment, a gift of the goddess, channeling its power into him.

Their companions could only watch as the two were drawn further from the entry ledge, across the lake of burning magma. Benzan turned to Cal, urging action, but the gnome could only shake his head; he had no spells that could help in this circumstance.

With Moltenwing's jaws locked onto his legs, Arun was unable to break free. Suddenly the paladin was yanked beneath the surface of the lava. Benzan shouted Dana's name, but even as she was drawn beneath the surface of the lava, the dragon's weight overpowering the magic of her cloak, the priestess of Selûne maintained her grip on the gold dwarf. She could feel Arun struggling now to free himself from her grasp, but she held on just long enough to channel one more spell into him, sending pure healing magic through the tenuous link, feeling that glorious surge pass through her into him, even as the lava scorched and burned her skin, tearing through her clothes mercilessly.

Only when the spell was complete did she let go, bouncing quickly back to the surface, screaming as her cloak drew her back above the surface of the lava. She was on fire, now, her hair burning, her clothes in tatters, only the still-functioning magic of her mooncloak keeping her from sinking back into the enfolding grip of superheated death. But lying atop the lava was little better; within a few seconds the heat and flame would consume her.

Fortunately the dragon's tugging had drawn her close to a rocky promontory. Dragging herself to her feet, she staggered to the relative shelter of the stone. Her legs gave out as she reached it, and she had to claw herself up onto the exposed rock, collapsing on her back as soon as she was clear.

I'm getting to old for this, she thought, fighting the pain that wanted to drag her down into the nice, pleasant realm of unconsciousness. Drawing painful breaths into her scorched lungs, she managed to croak out the syllables of a prayer, burning one of her few remaining higher-order spells into a cure critical wounds spell. Blackened, dead flesh sloughed off of her as the healing power flowed through her, revealing tender but healthy pink skin beneath. She could hear her friends shouting her name, and managed to wave her hand. Even with the healing, getting up just yet felt like a feat beyond her abilities.

But she struggled up nonetheless. Her limbs felt stiff and unsteady, and she didn't need to look down to know that her magical boots were ruined. She scanned the lava field, feeling a sick twist as she failed to find what she'd hoped to see. There was no sign of the paladin; it looked as though her gambit had failed.

A brave man, she thought. Even in the short time she'd known the paladin, she'd been impressed by his determination and skill.

But the practical side of her knew that there was no time now for grief or reflection. The dragon would not stop until all of them were dead, and it was likely already repositioning itself for another vicious assault. She'd dropped her longspike when she'd rushed to Arun's aid, but even with it she knew she was no match for the pyroclastic drake. The magic of her cloak that allowed her to water walk was still in force, but she was leery of returning across the lava. Another healing spell would return her nearly to full health, but she suspected that the dragon might be waiting for her to make the attempt. If only this place didn't interfere with her ability to dimension door, it would have been a trivial matter to escape.

Isolated, surrounded by a sea of burning rock, Dana's expression tightened into a look of hard determination, and she opened her mind to her goddess.

Unfortunately, even as she began her spell, a noise from the lava field behind her drew her attention around.

Chapter 385

Dana spun around, the words of a spell ready on her lips, poised to flee or fight for her life.

Her eyes widened as she saw Arun Goldenshield rising out of the lava, the molten rock clinging to his armored body as he lifted into the air, reluctant to release him.

Somehow, the gold dwarf yet lived, although it was clear that he had to be in agony. His mithral armor glowed with heat, and his sword was a white bar of bright steel, as though it had just come from the depths of an active forge. The cold iron should have melted, but like the paladin it was made of stern stuff, infused with power and purpose to survive in the face of evil.

The paladin rose higher into the air, buoyed by the power that Dana had infused into him earlier, the levitation magic possessed by her cloak. She'd never before directed the power of her mooncloak into another, and she inwardly thanked Selûne for sharing her blessing with one dedicated, like her, to the eradication of darkness and blight from the world.

Dana concentrated momentarily, and the paladin stopped rising, hovering now about twenty feet above the lava. "Hold on!" she shouted, wishing that there was a way that she could reach him, to ease his obvious suffering. But the paladin had emerged from the lava a good fifteen feet away from the edge of her island, and levitation only empowered vertical movement. She glanced over at the far ledge near the entrance, and could see that her companions were doing something together; hopefully enacting a plan to extract the two of them from this mess.

She drew back in alarm as the lava below the dwarf bulged suddenly upward, exploding a heartbeat later as the injured dragon reappeared. Dana fell back, shouting a warning, screaming in pain as hot gobs of liquid rock splashed onto her arms and thighs. Moltenwing surged up again, its jaws opening wider than before, a dull roar coming from deep within its body. That roar became a cacophony that shook the cavern as another stream of focused sonic energy exploded in a narrow line from its throat, driving into the paladin with enough force to drive him several paces higher into the air.

It was the same potent attack that had destroyed Mole. But Arun, full of the blessing of his patron, fought off the disintegrating power of the blast, crying out in defiance as the dragon's breath washed over him and faded.

Moltenwing roared in anger and splayed its wings out over the surface of the lava. Ignoring the missiles that stabbed into it from the bows of the companions on the entrance ledge, it pushed its upper body up out of the lava, its long neck stretching toward its enemy. Cheated once of its prey, this time it would not be denied.

Arun saw it, too. Looking down at Dana, he shouted, "Release the spell!"

Dana saw only death for the paladin, but caught up by the fire in those words, she complied.

The dwarf suddenly plummeted, directly toward the waiting jaws. Moltenwing was caught slightly off guard, but no matter; it quickly snapped its mouth shut to crush the life out of this annoying foe.

But even as the dragon's powerful jaws closed around Arun, the paladin drove his holy sword, still glowing like a lance of pure sunlight, through the roof of the dragon's mouth, through the cavernous interior of its skull, into its brain.

Chapter 386

The terrible pyroclastic dragon was slain, its monstrous body reclaimed by the lava. But it still took the companions a good deal of time and trouble to escape the cavern with their prize.

Arun had almost been claimed by the lava once more. Within seconds of his killing blow, the dragon had collapsed, sagging back into the lava that quickly embraced it. Fortunately the grip of its jaws relaxed rather than locked upon its death, and the paladin was able to struggle free. Dana empowered the levitation again to lift him free of the sinking dragon, and she'd then hazarded a quick run out onto the lava to grasp him and drag him back to the island of rock.

Getting them back to the exit proved more problematic. Dannel and Benzan, using spider climb magic, ultimately crawled across the ceiling of the room, establishing a network of silk ropes secured to pitons to allow Dana and Arun to safely return without having to contact the expanse of molten rock again. Dana first returned to the island where Mole had met her end. She collected the slain gnome's possessions, careful to gather all of the fine dust that had been trapped within those items of clothing that had survived disintegration. It wasn't much, but hopefully it would be enough for a resurrection, later.

While Benzan assisted her, Dannel crossed to the far ledge. The odd golden striations he had detected earlier turned out to be markings on another gray curtain, a huge, heavy barrier designed to casually resemble a plain rock face. The elf warily drew aside the curtain to reveal a deep alcove littered with assorted treasures. Dannel quickly sorted through the largess, unable to take any pleasure from it, knowing that the one who would have most appreciated the find was not here to enjoy it. He quickly found the dispersal collar, easily identified from Cal's thorough description derived from the notes of Freija Doorgan. The other loot was hastily stored within their bags of holding for later examination, and then, mindful of the limited duration of the power of his magical slippers, he returned across the room to the others. Arun had already been carried over, and Dana was making her way across, so he paused to recover their ropes before making his way back down to the entry where his friends waited.

The seven adventurers were eager to leave this hellish place behind them. Dannel was the last to leave, casting a long glance across the cavern, a single tear glistening unshed at the corner of his eye. But the waves of heat quickly stole it, and the elf's face was grim as he hurried after the others.

* * * * *

The actual use of the dispersal collar was anticlimactic.

The companions returned swiftly but attentively to the cavern where they'd left the dread Cagewright artifact. Now that they had the means to undo the evil Ritual of Planar Junction they felt a particular drive motivating them forward, but none of them wanted to walk into another ambush. In their pouches they carried six of the distinctive rings worn by the Cagewrights they'd defeated, but that meant that there were still seven others at large. Wiejeron had suggested that Dyr'ryd was the last line of defense warding the Tree of Shackled Souls, but none of them were quite willing to place their faith in the dead assassin's final words.

But the complex was eerily silent as they retraced their steps. Within ten minutes of departing Moltenwing's fiery cavern they had regathered at the base of the fell tree. The currents of power still flowed through the place, dimly perceived like the faintest hint of a breeze on the back of the neck. They did not waste any time. With Cal directing from Freija's notes, Arun and Lok secured the conjurer's heavy collar around the thick lower bole of the metal tree. Like the construct, the collar was an ugly thing, a combination of greasy gray hide and black metal, with nasty spikes jutting from it at unexpected angles that had to be carefully watched lest they pierce the flesh of the one carrying it.

The two veteran warriors secured the collar, cinched it tightly into place, and quickly withdrew. The impact was immediate if subtle; the weaving tendrils of power immediately vanished around the twisting branches of the Tree, and a deep, unnatural stillness filled the vast interior of the cavern. In that void, even the heartbeats of the companions seemed loud, intrusive.

"We did it," Cal said, verifying with a cantrip that the ripping of the gateway between worlds caused by the Tree had been interrupted.

"There may still be work to do in the city—" Arun began, but he was interrupted by an unexpected tremor that shook the cavern faintly for a few seconds before fading.

"What was that?" Dana asked.

"The ritual was unleashing havoc on the volcano," Cal said. "The abrupt ending may have unexpected side effects. It may be some time before it is safe for the people of Cauldron to return."

“What about the Tree?” Lok asked.

“It must be destroyed,” Arun said.

Cal nodded. “Yes,” he said. “But we must first be certain that doing so will not cause further destruction.”

The paladin frowned. “If we give the remaining Cagewrights the opportunity...”

He was cut off by a loud crash. The companions turned to see that Benzan had climbed up into the branches of the Tree during their conversation, and had released one of the soulcages from its tenuous perch. The adventurers gathered slowly behind him as the tiefling sprang down, ignoring what had to be a painful jolt as he landed hard on the bare volcanic stone, and walked over to the cage. A pitifully compact form lay in a lump at its bottom, barely visible through the thick bars.

With a sudden fury, the tiefling drew his sword and hacked at the latch on the door of the cage. Bright sparks flew as his magical sword clanged into the dark metal. For a full minute he unleashed his attacks, his face a rictus of fury, the others watching silently. Lok or Arun might have been able to open it more efficiently, but they seemed to realize that the tiefling needed this catharsis of action.

Finally, the lock gave way. Benzan tossed his sword aside, and wrenched the heavy door open, the cage resisting as if fighting his efforts. Immediately his manner changed, and it was with gentle tenderness that he reached inside, and drew out the crumpled form from within.

The companions came forward, surrounding the man who held his daughter’s dead body cradled in his lap. She was barely recognizable. She’d only been in the cage for a few days, but whatever the ritual had done had obviously ravaged both her body and soul. Dried blood was crusted on her hands and face, and body seemed gaunt, fragile.

Benzan knelt with her in his grasp, his head bent to touch hers, his body shaking with grief.

“Can she be raised?” Arun asked, in a whisper.

Cal shook his head sadly. “She was, like Benzan, an outsider, her soul not native to this plane. Conventional resurrection magic cannot help her.” He did not elaborate on what he feared to be true, that the ritual had consumed her soul as its power source for the opening of the gateway between Carceri and Faerûn. But when he looked up, his eyes met Dana’s, and he saw the same conviction mirrored there.

They would search for her soul, and use magic to confirm the finality of what they saw here, but both spellcasters had seen too much to doubt what they both suspected to be true.

Dannel had briefly examined some of the other soulcages, and the shattered hulks lying within each one. “The orphan, Terrem,” he said, quietly. “Zenith Splintershield.”

Hodge looked up, surprised at that last revelation, but did not speak.

“Others I do not recognize,” the elf went on. “All dead.”

“We have seen much in the way of evil and depravity,” Cal said. “This was... this is something beyond that.”

Benzan’s head came up, slowly, and there was something truly frightening in his eyes. He stared at the Tree of Shackled Souls, but he was seeing something beyond that, something yet hidden within shadow.

“There will be a reckoning,” he whispered, his voice as cold as ice.

THE END OF “THIRTEEN CAGES”

Book X: “Strike on Shatterhorn”
Begun 4-12-05

Chapter 387

Journal Entry of Balander Calloran
1 Nightal, 1392 Dalereckoning
The “Lucky Monkey,” in eastern Calimshan

Last night was the Feast of the Moon. Always a somber occasion, to memorialize those lost to us, and to recall those who have come before, this gathering was made especially meaningful by what we’ve all come through to get here. I did not feel like speaking, but I did so, mostly for the sake of those poor souls who have gathered here, who in many cases have nothing left. My words did little for my friends, especially Benzan, who has spent the last several days in seclusion, isolated from us within a wall of grief and guilt.

It is too soon to say whether Cauldron will be rebuilt, but even if it is, the city has been forever changed by its ordeal. That final tremor that we’d felt only distantly in the Cagewright stronghold created an opening in the rim of the caldera. A wedge of the city encompassing several city blocks is just gone, and the lake is no more, drained into the bed of a new river that descends from the summit down the southeastern face of the volcano into the lowlands. Arun noted that the Temple of Kelemvor was situated almost exactly within the center of that ruined zone; coincidence, perhaps, or an expression of anger by the Lord of the Dead at the sins committed by his former servants.

It has rained almost constantly since we departed the city. Dannel tells me that this downpour is nothing compared to what the region experiences a few months later, in what the locals call “Flood Season.” And despite the rain the winter here is mild indeed compared to what we’re used to in the Western Heartlands. Still, it is enough to make the situation of the refugees here truly miserable. The roadhouse, even jammed as it is, can only accommodate a fraction of those gathered here. Yesterday Jenya Urikas and Dana cooperated to summon a pair of massive earth elementals that cleared a section of forest and raised walls for crude barracks to house these people. Lok, Arun, and Hodge have worked almost non-stop on their behalf, and the magical foodstuffs created by Jenya and Dana will likely stave off starvation for more than a few, at least until supplies can be delivered from Almraiven. Each day Jenya conjures multiple heroes' feasts in different parts of the camp, and each day she walks among the people, curing sickness and injuries, helping them prepare their shelters, or just sitting with them, listening. The Cauldronites have come to see her as a saint, and even this jaded old bard is impressed by the dedication that fires this woman through adversity. The templar, Beorna, rarely leaves her side. Arun was quite grateful when I returned from my trip to the gem markets of Calimport, bringing the diamonds needed for Jenya and Dana to raise our fallen. The treasures of the pyroclastic dragon were put to good use, and even after restoring Clarese and Beorna to life, we still have a considerable cache of the precious stones if further such intervention is necessary. It is my fervent hope that they remain unused.

Clarese has been restored through the grace of Selûne, but I can sense that she has been deeply troubled by her experience. Having returned from Beyond myself, I can understand what she feels, to a degree. And on top of that, she must come to grips with the death of her closest friend. Her confidence has been shaken, and I fear that some of the verve with which she seizes life may be harmed. I will speak to her, but ultimately it will have to be she that decides how she will choose to embrace her life.

Both my niece and my friend will need time to grieve, and time to heal. Unfortunately, that is the one thing that we may not have in abundance. From what we learned from that wretch Wiejeron, and the other evidence recovered from the stronghold of the Cagewrights, our foes remain dangerous despite the crushing blow we have inflicted upon them. Six rings we have collected, but seven of the Thirteen remain at large, and beyond them, their unholy master, the imprisoned divine, Adimarchus. We do not know who or what holds the former angel hostage, but it is clear that he is able to exert a considerable influence yet from within his prison. Dana and Jenya have dedicated themselves to tracking down the Cagewright remnants; from what we have learned they likely have another hidden base that must be uncovered and destroyed.

It might be better if Benzan were distracted somehow from this mission; his single-minded focus on revenge may cloud his judgment and put all of us in jeopardy. There is little chance of that, however.

There are times when I miss the less complicated way things were, back when we were all simple travelers on the wild roads of the west. Even now, with my talents expanding to levels I had only dreamed about in my youth, there are times when I would discard my spellbook and magical accompaniments, take up my lute, and find a small but pleasant tavern in some backwoods settlement.

But as I have so often told others, life is usually about what is, not what may be. The struggle for Cauldron was not initially our fight, but when Izandra and Clarese chose to make this place their home, it became our home as well. Our foe is a dire one, perhaps the deadliest we have yet faced. But we have been literally to the Abyss and back, and we have new allies, friends whose skills and dedication will be a vital bastion against the suffering yet to come.

It is late, and when I start to get this poetic in my private journals, it is time to go to bed. Perhaps treating with that polearm earlier has drained me more than I thought. It is “watching” me even now, I suspect. The shator’s weapon is sentient and surprisingly intelligent; in fact I believe it is the most powerful weapon of its kind that I have ever encountered. I had expected it to be suffused with taint, given its former owner, but it seems aligned to neutrality, and truly indifferent to the crimes of Dyr’ryd and its associates. I have established dominance over it for now. In our exchange it mostly seemed curious, although it suggested repeatedly that I relinquish it to the custody of Lok. Perhaps it merely is drawn to the warrior that bested its former master. Oddly enough I felt some jealousy at its comments, which suggests that I should dispense with it as soon as possible. I suspect that if I kept Mindbite in my custody for any length of time it would live up to its name, and I would not be willing to part with it.

Tomorrow will be a busy day; I intend to put my newly-mastered spell of greater teleportation to the test. If the gods smile upon us we may have a new mission by the next sunset.

Chapter 388

The next morning the rains abated briefly, but that only led to an intensification of activity in the forest clearing as the refugees from Cauldron hurried to complete their shelters before the inevitable return of the deluge. About a dozen carpenters had been included in the nearly eleven hundred people who’d made it to this site; they were put to work supervising a work crew that was quickly cutting the trees they’d felled earlier into crude boards to serve as the basis of roof frames for the shelters outlined by the summoned earth elementals the day before. Other crews were already at work constructing shingles to deflect the rain, while yet more Cauldronites worked on preparing vats of tarry sealant, making iron nails from simple molds, braiding coils of rope, digging latrines, hunting or gathering food from the adjacent jungle, or any of a hundred other tasks that needed to be done before the rains started up again. Jenya and her helpers had realized that the citizens of the shattered city needed to be kept busy in order to keep their minds off of the disasters they’d experienced, and there was no shortage of things to be done. Whenever conflicts broke out—inevitably, given the frustration and tension that lingered in the camp—a white-robed acolyte of Helm or a blue-garbed Hammer was usually quick to arrive, defusing the situation before it could escalate into violence. A few people grumbled at the authority placed over them so hastily, but they found themselves in the minority. Most of the people of Cauldron found reassurance in being told what to do, and while factions and dissent would predictably arrive once things settled down and the immediate threats of hunger and disease were avoided, for now the camp proceeded in its busy buzz of activity without undo problems.

Most of the rooms of the Lucky Monkey were packed with people; most of the sleeping rooms were filled to double or even triple their usual occupancy, often with the beds being used two or even three times per day, with occupants sleeping in shifts. Despite the crowds the rooms were kept fairly clean; one of the assignments Jenya had given to those without specific craft-related skills was to maintain the general cleanliness of the roadhouse and larger camp to avoid the spread of sickness and disease. Even with several high-powered clerics present in the camp, no one wanted to add an epidemic to their problems.

Even the Heroes of Cauldron had to deal a bit with the overcrowding, although their status granted them a trio of small, private rooms jammed in under the eaves on the eastern side of the roadhouse's second story. In one of those rooms, clearly sized for small folk with its low ceiling and sized-down furnishings, Ballander Calloran was packing carefully sorted parcels laid out across his bedspread into his handy haversack. He didn't turn when the door opened and Mole silently entered. He continued what he was doing while she stood there behind him, fidgeting somewhat, but did not start when she finally spoke.

"I heard you were going to Waterdeep today."

Cal finished his loading, and cinched the draws on the top of the pack. Even fully loaded, it weighed only about five pounds, although a number of the packages he'd put inside weighted at least that much independently. His eyes lifted to the weapon laid across the small desk, carefully wrapped in brown linen. Mindbite had adjusted itself to his size, but it would still be an awkward burden for one unused to dealing with large weapons.

"Yes," he finally replied. "There are things we'll need, and we have a lot of excess loot to unload. In addition to the haversack, Lok's loaning me his bag of holding, so I should be able to bring back a good quantity of supplies for the refugees as well on the return trip."

Mole twisted the toe of her boot on the floor, her hands stuffed awkwardly in her pockets.

"You know you can tell me what's on your mind, my dear," Cal said.

"I thought... I thought I'd go with you."

"I was planning on asking. You've got a good eye for bargains, and with the amount of magical loot I'll be carrying, I could use an eye on my back as well."

"Sure. But... I thought I'd... well, I thought maybe I'd stay there. Home. You know."

Cal stepped over to her, took her chin and raised her head so that their eyes could meet.

"If that's what you want, Clarese. But you'd told me before, just a few days ago, that you couldn't think of giving up this life."

"That was before!" she said, some of her shell fracturing under the weight of the emotions she'd kept inside. She broke away and walked around him to the bed, sitting there, miserable. "Zenna's gone, gone forever, and me too, almost..."

Cal joined her on the bed, but didn't say anything. After a long minute, Mole continued.

"I thought I was soooo good. I thought nothing could touch me. That dragon... just another bad-ass monster that couldn't catch me, no, not the master thief..."

"Part of what we do is face risks that sane people probably wouldn't touch," Cal said. "I mean, when you really think about it... look at the enemies we've faced in just the last few days. Do you want me to tell you that rushing out into that lava field wasn't stupid? It was, and I won't. But you've heard all my stories; how many have started with, 'And so Benzan did something stupid...?'" And while we all enjoy mocking Benzan, we've all made mistakes. Back when it was just the five of us... Lok, Dana, Benzan, Delem, and myself... gods, we got into so many troubles of our own making. And yet we survived, and..."

"Delem didn't," she interrupted.

"No, he didn't. And what happened to him was bad for all of us. We all felt a little like you and Benzan are feeling now, losing Zenna. And yet, somehow, we kept going. Why?"

"I suppose you're going to say something about the greater good, and helping people who can't help themselves..."

"No, I'm not. What, why should you be surprised? Of course, that's part of it... and I in no way want to denigrate the motivation that drives your friend Arun, or Lok, or the Harpers, or any of us who are driven by what you describe. But that's not all of it, and you know it isn't."

"I know what you felt, when you charged out there into that blind rush across the lava chamber. I wasn't much older than you when I set out down that long road. I had no idea where it led, then, and I still don't. But it's the journey that matters."

"We live in a reality where we know that there's something more beyond what we have here, now. We know more than most, because we've been to that beyond, and been brought back here. But that doesn't take one iota away from the significance of this life. If anything, it adds to it."

"People like us... we seek adventure, not because we're crazy thrill seekers, or blind fools who court death. But we seek it because it is a drive that is core to our being, it is part of what we are. How many people are there that can do what we do, Mole? How many people see a red dragon unleash its deadly maelstrom of fire, and instead of fleeing in terror, jump onto its claw? How many people will stand up to a horde of enemies intent only on their death and destruction, and instead of running away, leap into the fray against hopeless odds to aid a friend?"

"You can go home to our family, take over the trading business, live a settled, peaceful life; heck, maybe get married to a good, hardworking craftsgnome and raise a houseful of children. That's a good life, and I won't say different. I won't think any less of you, my dear, none of us would, because we've all had to confront that decision, and not just once. But don't think that this would be the easier choice. It would be harder, because you'd be running against the core of who you are, that part of you that originally made the decision to walk down that road, not knowing where it led."

Cal rose, and shouldered his backpack. He took the wrapped polearm, and walked to the door, not looking back.

Mole remained, sitting there on the bed for a long time.

Chapter 389

“All right, HEAVE!” Arun enjoined, punctuating his words as he put his own back into the effort of lifting a thirty-foot segment of roughly shaped wood, easily about two feet thick, into place along the central axis of one of the new barracks buildings. This segment was going to serve as the basis for most of the structure’s slanted roof, which would be a simple but functional affair that would hopefully keep the people sleeping beneath it dry and warm. Two pulleys attached to nearby trees provided the leverage that lifted the heavy log into the air, with another pair of ropes attached directly to the log guiding it gradually into its proper place. Two young humans assisted Arun on one lifting rope, while another pair worked with Hodge on the other. Two more men were on the guide ropes, while two others waited on narrow platforms near where the log would rest, ready to fix it into place.

“A little more, a little more... okay, that’s it!”

The men on the pulleys released their thick ropes, letting out groans from the concerted effort. On the far side of the building, Hodge walked stiffly over to a nearby barrel, taking a dipperful of water that ended up more in his beard than his throat. Arun paused to verify that the log had settled properly in its place, nodding to the carpenters before moving to join his friend.

“They should ‘ave somethin’ real to drink,” the dwarf grouched, splashing another dipperful of water into his face. “A man drinkin’ water while buildin’... ain’t natural.”

Arun smiled. The two dwarves saw Lok walking by carrying a log not all that much smaller than the one they’d just spent work and sweat lifting into place. Arun was strong, but the genasi’s strength, augmented by the powerful magical belt he wore, was something phenomenal.

Hodge winced. “Now that ain’t right,” he said. “Bloomin’ showoff.” He straightened, cracking his back, muttering something unpleasant about age and hard labor.

“You all right?” Arun asked.

The other dwarf straightened, and bristled. “Course I’m all right! Take off all those damned magical doo-dads yer wearin’, and I’ll still thrash yer from ‘ere to tenthday! Bah! They may not ‘ave a drop o’ anythin’ worth drinkin’ in this godsforsaken hole, but damned if a workin’ man ain’ goin’ to get a bite o’ somepin’ hot to put in his gullet.”

“We were going to help putting up the base logs for the new watchtower.”

“I won’ be long,” Hodge grumbled, not turning as he trudged through the muddy mess that was the open clearing that now stretched for about a hundred yards between the front of the Lucky Monkey and the edge of the forest, newly retreated.

“Your friend is quite... interesting.”

Arun turned to see Dana Ilgarten, walking through the mud toward him. The paladin bowed his head in respect, a gesture that was warmly reciprocated.

“Hodge is a loyal friend,” Arun said. “Too loyal, perhaps.”

“How many times has he been raised since he took service with you?”

Arun raised an eyebrow. “Twice in the last year,” he said. “Been a lot of close calls, besides.”

The priestess nodded. “His soul is tired. Being brought back from beyond the veil is a... difficult experience.” She passed her hand through the air, and a blue glow briefly outlined her fingers. “We clerics can restore the body, heal the mind. You can rush into battle, get beaten down to within an instant of death, then get healed back to full health in a heartbeat, ready to rush into the fray once more.” She snapped her fingers. “The gods grant us great power, but that does not remove the fact that we are mortal. We can only be stretched so far before we break... that is true for the strongest among us, as well as the weakest.”

Arun nodded, watching as Hodge walked up the steps into the front door of the Monkey, not bothering to wipe his feet on the mat laid out before the door to catch the mud.

“I’ve asked him to remain behind several times now, but he’s stubborn. A common trait among our kind, I’m told,” he added with a smile.

“The people here will need defenders, when we go,” Dana said.

Arun shook his head. “I’ve tried that tack. Like I said, stubborn.”

“I could try to convince him, if you wish.”

Arun looked at her, confirming for himself just what she was offering. She met his gaze squarely, hiding nothing.

“I don’t know if he’d forgive me, for that.”

Dana put her hand on his shoulder. “I suppose it comes down to what you believe, paladin. Do you feel that every adult should have the ability to choose for themselves, knowing the risks of what course they would undertake, or is it necessary sometimes to protect them from the consequences of those choices?”

The priestess nodded in respect and walked on, leaving Arun behind with a troubled look on his face.

Chapter 390

The headquarters of the Guild of Mages in Waterdeep was situated in a tower, but that description was wholly inadequate to describe the majesty and sheer impact of the place. Leaving aside the architectural impressiveness of the great vaulted Guildhall, with its vaulted arches and doomed ceilings towering some fifty feet above the marble tiles below, the place was frequented by some of the foremost masters of the arcane in all of Faerûn, who added their own considerable mystique to the drama of the location. Various subtle magical effects were visible to the common visitor, but to one capable of sensing the subtle currents in the Weave wrought by the practice of magic, the entire structure seemed a blazing font of all forms of magical energy.

Most visitors never saw more than the main hall, to the private quarters used by visiting Guild mages situated in the higher reaches of the tower, the most skilled gifted with views that spanned the entire breadth of the sprawling metropolis. Or the workshops layered with protective wards, designed both to keep prying eyes out, as well as to keep certain things in. Even those wards were minor castings compared to those surrounding the ancient vaults in sublevels as far beneath the guildhall as the topmost tower chambers were above it. Those deep chambers were rarely even mentioned in casual conversations where someone might hear, and they spawned all sorts of rumors in nearby taprooms, and worried glances followed by a hasty sign to any of a hundred deities as passersby hurried on their business past the mighty home of the Guild.

The Guildhall was typically busy on this chill day of early winter. A cold gust and a colder rain off the Sea of Storms presaged another nasty storm in the days ahead, but inside the hall it was warm and comfortable. Conversations in half a dozen languages filled the cavernous interior of the space, as Guild mages talked and did business with merchants, apprentices, and petitioners of two score nations and regions scattered across Faerûn. Maybe sixty or seventy people were here altogether, men and women representing all of the major races of the Realms, and every time a handful left by either of the ornate gilded double doors at the ends of the hall, another handful would trickle in to maintain continuity of the ongoing buzz of activity.

Hardly anyone paid heed to the pair of gnomes who entered the Guildhall shortly after the service of the midmorning tea. They had the look of veteran travelers, and the fact that they were not soaked with rain suggested that they had arrived via magical means, rather than by more conventional modes of travel. The younger of the pair, a curious-eyed girl, was clearly impressed by the diverse wonders of the setting, but the other, a man well into middle age, awkwardly bearing a standard or weapon wrapped in cloth, seemed to know exactly where he was going, and he directed them across the hall toward a marble counter at the far end.

The guards, both the obvious ones and those more dire, noted the two and continued their vigilance. Unlike at most guildhalls throughout the city, weapons were not expressly forbidden here, for the simple reason that the members of the Guild had plentiful means at their disposal for dealing with such conventional threats as blades and arrows.

The mage attending at the counter, a stout human clad in long purple robes, nodded in greeting as he caught sight of the elder gnome. "Master Calloran," he said, directing the gnome to his left, where the counter was situated about a foot lower, suited to one of his stature. "A pleasure to see you this day. Does this visit perhaps presage your agreement—finally—to accept a position within the Guild?"

"If and when I make that commitment, Kerates, you'll be the first to know, on my word," Cal replied. "No, I am afraid my business this day is more... prosaic."

“Well, as always, the Guild is happy to entertain your business,” Kerates said with a smile. “You always do find such interesting artifacts in your travels.”

Cal unslung his magical backpack, and drew out his borrowed bag of holding beside it, placing the carefully wrapped form of Mindbite beside it. The weapon seemed to quiver in his hand as he placed it down, and the gnome felt a brief pang of uncertainty that he quickly quashed. Kerates, who sensed at least part of the exchange, raised an eyebrow in interest.

Five minutes later, that subtle expression had been replaced by a look of open amazement. The mage hurriedly called a clerk from the storeroom behind him, whose eyes widened in turn as he caught sight of the materials that were laid out in a crowded but orderly display across the entire spread of the counter, in some cases stacked several feet high. They included an array of weapons, suits of armor, gloves, bracers, glittering jewels, a whole slew of rings and amulets on a leather throng, and other assorted marvels.

“We’ve had a busy tenday,” Cal explained, as he and Mole lifted a heavy breastplate—mithral—onto a pile of similar items. Mole dug around in the bag of holding to see if they’d missed anything, half her body disappearing into it for a few moments before she reappeared. A number of other mages had gathered around, curious as the pile of gear had grown.

“I do not appreciate being mixed in with all of this... debris,” came a muffled voice from atop the pile. Kerates looked in surprise at Mindbite, still secure in its linen wrappings, and then at Cal, who merely shrugged.

“We’re going to need a few things,” the gnome said casually. “I brought a list. A few are divine in orientation, but I assume that the Guild script is still valid on the Temple Mount.”

Kerates grabbed the clerk, by the arm, drawing his attention away from the heaped items. “Um... you’d better get Master Umbright down here, and tell him he’d better clear his afternoon calendar.”

It was rather late in the day, with the overcast sky already deepening to twilight, when Cal and Mole reappeared in the back part of their room at the Lucky Monkey, where a small open space had been roped off with a sign requesting that it not be disturbed.

“That was fun,” Mole said, with a grin.

“Let’s find Jenya, she’ll know what do with these supplies,” Cal replied, lifting Lok’s bag of holding onto the bed with a grunt.

“The look on all those mages’ faces... and the expression on that cleric when you gave her a Guild script for one hundred thousand gold pieces...”

Cal smiled. “Yes, I have to admit... I’ve never in my life carried around this much wealth. Good thing we weren’t jumped, eh?”

“Pffbbbt. Like any rogues were going to go after us...”

“It’s good to see you smile again, Mole.”

Mole flushed slightly. “Well... I’m not saying I’m through all that stuff I talked about this morning. But I do feel better... and there’s no way I’m going to let the guys jump back into trouble without me. Maybe I’ll just be a little more careful, that’s all.”

“Sounds like a plan. Now come on, we’ve had a long day, let’s find the others and get something hot to eat.”

“Ugh, more of Dana’s gray stuff, I bet,” Mole said, with a face.

“Now, now, niece, is that the trust you show in your dear uncle? We spent the day in Waterdeep, after all. Rest assured, some choice viands made their way into my magical backpack; after all, heroes require quality fare to prepare themselves for struggles of life and death.”

“Just don’t let Hodge know,” Mole said with a giggle. “He’ll eat the backpack and all!”

They opened the door and almost ran into Dana, who was coming down the hallway in a hurry.

“Dana!”

“Good, you’re back. We have a name and location for the Cagewright redoubt: a place called Shatterhorn.”

Chapter 391

Dawn was just breaking over the mountains when the adventurers convened in a small room on the upper storey of the roadhouse. The Lucky Monkey and the camp surrounding it were already beginning to stir into activity, but stern-faced Hammers ensured that no one approached this room. The place had once been a small meeting room, but the table and chairs had already been removed for use in the camp, and the few remaining pieces of furniture—a sideboard, a small cabinet, and a weathered chest—had been pushed into a corner to leave most of the floor space open. Even so, with ten heavily armed and armored people in the room it was getting a bit crowded. Two stood apart from the others near the door; Jenya Urikas, clad in white, with Beorna a hulking warder in her shadow.

Cal stepped onto the chest, drawing the attention of the others to him.

“Today we are going to face powerful enemies. We’ve already tussled with a number of the Thirteen, and we know what they are capable of. They’ve been dealt a serious blow, but don’t think that you can let your guard down; it’s almost certain that the remaining Cagewrights have a few surprises left up their collective sleeves, and that they’ll be ready for our visit.”

“We’ve all faced foes of this strength before, so you know what I’m going to say, but I’ll say it anyway. Enemies this strong will have attacks that can kill in an instant. Your fortitude, reflexes, and strength of will may all be challenged.”

“We have a plan, and you know what you need to do. But you also need to be ready to adapt, to change up your tactics based on what they throw at us. We will need to combine our diverse abilities to best effect. Those of you who have fought together for a while know best what your companions can do, but we’ll need to bring both groups together to work as a single unit. We did well in the Cagewright stronghold under Cauldron, but to be honest, there were a few instances where we were sloppy, and it almost cost us dearly.”

“Yer not plannin’ on talkin’ them to death, eh gnome?” Hodge interjected.

“You’d be surprised how much talk is in that little body,” Benzan replied, to general laughter.

Cal smiled. His eyes met those of his niece briefly. “It takes a certain kind of craziness to do what we’re about to do,” he said. “The kind that leads someone to prod a hornet’s nest with a stick,” he added, glancing over at Benzan, “to see what will happen. But do not forget that what we’re doing here is vitally important, and if we don’t succeed, people are going to suffer, and die. Good people, people like the ones you’ve all had a chance to meet over the last few days. People who no longer have homes thanks to the mad dreams of an imprisoned godling.”

“Those dreams will come to an end,” Lok said, his fist tightening against the haft of his axe.

“You all know the plan, and the contingencies we came up with last night,” Cal continued. “Timing is important; the preparatory spells we will cast are of limited duration. But rushing into an ambush will give the Cagewrights an easy victory. So we go in, swiftly but methodically, and we hit hard with everything we’ve got.”

“Sounds like a plan!” Arun said, lifting his blessed holy avenger. “To victory, for Moradin, for Cauldron, and for Zenna!”

“For Zenna!” the others replied, lifting their weapons in an echo of the dwarf’s cheer. Benzan did not join in the shout, but his eyes burned with a cold fire, and his fingers were tensed white around the thick shaft of his magical longbow.

“I will ward you with Helm’s power,” Jenya said, coming forward. Behind her Beorna scowled, her eyes hard as she looked at Arun. Restored to life by a resurrection spell from the high priestess, she’d resumed her role as Jenya’s guardian. In their gathering of the previous night they’d agreed that Beorna would remain behind to help protect the Jenya and the refugees from a retaliatory attack from the remaining Cagewrights. There had been another reason beneath the surface, one that none of them had spoken of openly. If their assault failed, and they were all destroyed, someone had to be left behind to carry on the fight, and ensure that the Cagewrights were not allowed to restart their vile plans. They’d contacted the Harpers and the hierarchs of the church of Helm, seeking aid, but by the time that any assistance arrived, it was likely that the issue would already be decided, for good or for ill.

Arun had been among those pressing the argument most forcefully on this issue, although Jenya had added her support for Beorna remaining behind. In truth Arun had been relieved when Beorna had reluctantly agreed; the templar had been drained by her return from death, and while she was still a formidable warrior, the paladin did not want to see her thrust back into a deadly situation. He had to fight the warring feelings inside him, and felt a moment of shame as he glanced over at Hodge. Dana's words had ultimately led him to accept the choice made by his friend and cohort to remain with him; what right did he have to press Beorna to make a different one?

Beorna's expression did not soften as she came over to him; she was still angry. "Watch your back," she said, touching him to infuse a protective ward upon him. She took up the heavy shield that Cal had brought back from Waterdeep, and all but jammed it onto his arm. "You've made promises to me, and I will hold you to your oaths." She checked his weapons and armor with an experienced eye, frowning as she twisted his scabbard back into its proper position.

"Beorna..."

She lifted her eyes to fix his. "Just come back." She turned around without saying more, and returned to Jenya's side. It was not the dwarvish way to show intimate feelings in public, but much was said in those simple words.

"Okay, time to fiend up," Cal said, as he finished casting his own wards. He, Dana, and Jenya had prepared a virtual battery of protective spells earlier that morning, and the companions were now protected to varying degrees against fire and acid. Arun summoned a magic circle against evil, and Cal protected himself with stoneskin. Jenya had prepared several greater magic weapon spells, which she used to augment those arms of lesser power possessed by the group. Augmenting the benefits of those spells, their breakfast that morning had been a heroes' feast conjured by Jenya, and thus fortified they were ready for the enemy.

Or so they earnestly hoped, at least.

"Are you sure that it's necessary to go as demodands?" Benzan asked. "Damn if those things don't stink."

"Part of the effectiveness of the disguise," Cal said. "One whiff, and few will want to take a closer look at us. And if anyone has the right to complain, it's Mole and myself; your noses aren't nearly as sensitive as ours."

"Anything for the cause," Mole said with a mock salute, holding her nose with her other hand.

"I still think it might be better to disguise ourselves as the dead Cagewrights," Benzan persisted.

“We went over this,” Dana said. “It’s almost inevitable that those left know all about what happened to their peers. Better to be anonymous; it’ll give us a better chance to slip in undetected.”

“Not likely,” Benzan said, but he dropped the argument as Cal cast his veil spell, transforming them into the outward semblance of farastu demodands. The spell was thorough; even though all of them knew that the glamour was illusionary, the thick stench of the fiends still hung in the air, an echo that stained the senses.

There was more preparation to be made, but not here. The companions gathered in two close circles around Cal and Dana. All knew their place, and there was no more conversation as the companions tested their weapons and gear one last time. Finally, Benzan drew out his wand, and using its power made all of them invisible.

The air was filled with the soft sound of chanting, and then the eight companions teleported away.

Chapter 392

The companions rematerialized on the edge of a bluff that rose out of the center of a broad jungle. The air was moist and heavy, but noticeably warmer than where they’d just departed, promising a sultry day once the sun had finished ascending into the bracingly blue sky above.

“The Mhair Jungles,” Cal reported, as the companions briefly scanned the unbroken sea of green that surrounded them. In the distance they could vaguely make out the approximate forms of mountains, many miles distant. But their attention was quickly drawn to their immediate destination, which dominated the bluff. Sprawled upon the outcropping was an extensive ruin, ancient stone grown over with crawling vines and other vegetation. The place looked to spread over several acres, but in turn was overshadowed by the massive spire that rose from the center of the ruin. That pinnacle, a rough formation of shiny black stone, had been sundered at some point in the ancient past, now rising in three spread fingers of rock that reached easily two hundred feet above them.

“Looks pretty run-down,” Mole’s voice came.

“There’s likely an entrance to an underground complex within the ruins,” Cal said. “Probably near the spire; our scrying was blocked anytime we came close to it.”

“Come on... the invisibility will only last for a few minutes,” Benzan said. “Let’s at least get into the cover of the ruin.”

They made their way cautiously—for they could not see each other through the tiefling’s magic—toward the ruin. Up close, the stone walls, rising some twenty feet into the air, looked even more imposing, the relics of some ancient but now lost civilization. But the place was clearly in an advanced state of decay, with huge slabs of rock littering the site where parts of the walls had given way, and numerous complete breaches evident. They headed toward one of those openings.

“Baboons,” Dannel said, drawing their attention to the side, where a half-dozen of the creatures sat in a row atop a fallen slab. The animals watched them silently, tracking their movements despite the invisibility.

“Probably don’t know what to make of us, with the glamour,” Benzan suggested.

“If they perceive us as fiends, they should be fleeing in terror,” Cal said. “This is definitely not natural... be watchful.”

“More inside,” Mole said. “They aren’t doing anything but watching, however.”

“I should put an arrow through one, see if that stirs them,” Benzan said.

“At least they’re being quiet,” Cal said. “Leave them be, for now.”

They made their way into the deep shadow of the walls, where the temperature dropped noticeably. Thin wisps of morning fog still clung to the ground close to the ruin, although it wasn’t really enough to hinder visibility that much. Thick interior walls partitioned the inside of the ruin into huge chambers, which looked as though they’d been roofed in at some point. Now, however, it was all open to the sky above, and weeds that were in some places taller than they were rose up out of massive cracks in the ancient stone beneath their feet.

“This stonework is very, very old,” Lok said. “There are many voices in the stone here... and much sadness.”

“Ancient civilizations rose and fell in these southern jungles, long before the rise of Netheril and the other old kingdoms of Faerûn,” Cal said. “Now degenerate creatures dwell within these primordial jungles; yuan-ti and other aberrations.”

“Them Cagewrights should fit right in,” Hodge said.

They probed deeper into the ruin, leaving behind the bright sunshine and green expanse of the jungle. In a few moments they found themselves in an empty chamber, maybe thirty feet across, with empty doorways on either side. “I think it’s time for stage two, Dana,” Cal said.

“We’ll keep watch,” Dannel said, accompanied by the clink of metal as the armored warriors moved to cover the two exits. Dannel, clad in his magical slippers, simply ascended the nearest wall, taking up a position high above them, his bow at the ready.

Dana began casting a spell, an intricate summoning ritual that went on for several minutes. The invisibility spells faded, leaving them each feeling exposed as they waited for the priestess to complete her spell.

But before she could finish, Dannel hissed a warning. “Aerial patrol, incoming!”

Chapter 393

“Take cover!” Cal urged, as the companions hid in the deep shadows along the chamber walls. Dana, still lost in her summoning, was heedless to the danger, but Benzan paused to make her once more invisible with his wand, before refreshing the magic upon himself as well.

Dannel ran vertically down the wall before leaping into a shadowed nest between two uneven slabs of stone. Even as he landed lightly in his chosen position, the companions became aware of a dim buzzing noise that rapidly grew louder. Something flashed above them quickly and then was gone, fading as quickly as it had come.

“What was that?” Hodge said.

“Half-orc mercenaries, mounted on spider eaters,” Dannel said. “There were only two, but I caught sight of others on the far side of the ruin. Apparently they conduct regular patrols over the area.”

“They’re going to make it harder to get further in,” Lok commented.

“Once Dana is done, we’ll go straight for the spire,” Cal said. “I’ll handle any conversation; remember that I can understand any spoken language.”

“With all due respect, bluffing isn’t exactly your strong point,” Benzan noted.

“While I will concede that your tongue can be silver, my friend, your foot is so often in your mouth that it interferes with your ability to...”

“Um, maybe Dana should do the talking,” Lok said diplomatically. “She always seems to get what she wants.”

“You know,” Benzan replied, “After all these years, I still can’t tell when you’re needling me...”

Hodge sidled up to Arun, while the others were quietly debating. “I thought they ‘ad everythin’ planned out in advance?” the dwarf whispered.

Arun shrugged. “As always, when the enemy appears, the plan usually explodes. Just pick a bad guy and start hacking.”

Hodge nodded. “Aye, that be some advice I can follow.”

A flare of silver light interrupted their quiet conversations and drew their attention back around to Dana. The priestess was visible once again, kneeling on a bare patch of stone, her lips still moving in nearly silent prayer as she invoked the power of her patron to open a conduit between their plane and the higher realms of Good. The light opened into a vertical slash that broadened until a tall figure stepped through, at which point it quickly dimmed and vanished.

The newcomer was a perfectly-proportioned, hairless woman with pale green skin, and shimmering white wings folded across her back. She overshadowed all of them at nearly nine feet tall, and wore glistening, form-fitting attire formed of silvery scales that seemed more like a second skin than a suit of armor. The hilt of a greatsword protruded over her left shoulder, and as she looked down at them, each of the companions felt a sense of awe and wonder.

“I have come, priestess,” the planetar said, her voice melodic and soothing, but with a hint of steel to it. Naturally she could easily see through Cal’s veil; no mere glamour or figment would suffice to betray one such as this.

“You honor me with your service,” Dana said, rising to her feet, smiling at the celestial. “We are engaged in a deadly struggle against a potent force for evil...”

“I know of your enemies,” the planetar responded. “You may address me as Tzadkiel, the Bringer of Justice.”

Dana drew out a dazzling blue sapphire that seemed to glow with a faint inner light. “Per the terms of the Compact, I offer for your service this stone, infused with my own...”

“The Compact requires that I accept payment for my service on this plane,” the celestial interrupted, cutting her off again. “I set my price at one piece of copper, of any of the currency forms of this world.”

Dana looked confused for a moment.

“My price is one copper piece,” the planetar repeated, and something powerful shone in her eyes; had she been a mortal creature, a viewer would have called it a barely-contained rage. In the planetar, it was something stronger, and even the veterans in the group quailed somewhat at its intensity. “Do you accept the bargain?”

“Here, I’ve got one,” Mole said, materializing beside Dana, offering her a copper coin. “It’s my good luck piece.”

Dana took the coin and handed it to the planetar. “The bargain is struck,” the celestial intoned, drawing out the massive sword slung across her back.

“Yer know, I be startin’ to see the advantage o’ bringin’ a cleric along on these outin’s,” Hodge whispered to Arun.

The paladin did not reply; his thoughts were on what might have been, had a certain young woman been allowed to grow into her full potential.

The planetar took the lead, heading immediately toward the far exit. “We are going for a more stealthy approach,” Cal suggested, hurrying to keep up with her long strides.

The planetar looked down at the gnome, who looked insignificant in the lee of the angelic entity. “I will defer to you, then, but do not linger long; the Cagewrights have not been idle, and once more events build to a head.” Without additional preamble, she vanished, accompanied by a rush of air as she lifted into air on her powerful wings.

“It would be so much easier if they would just tell us what they know, damn it,” Benzan said.

“Part of it is the Compact, and believe me, you should be grateful they take it so seriously,” Dana replied. “It is one of the things keeping Faerûn from being turned into another Oinos, or Acheron, wasteland battlefields for outsider factions. But more than that, often times they seem mysterious and cryptic because they just don’t know the answers. Celestials may seem powerful, and they are, but they are not omniscient.”

“But they serve the gods directly,” Arun said.

“Yes. And do the soldiers of a king know all that their liege does?”

The paladin frowned at the analogy, but didn’t say anything further as they gathered their gear and pressed deeper into the ruin.

The exit led through another ruined chamber, then opened onto a broad avenue that gave them a renewed view of the great shattered stone, even more impressive now that they were closer. The fog had grown thicker here, cloying around the walls, masking the farther outlines of the ruin behind a murky haze.

“Stay close,” Cal suggested.

No sooner than they had all emerged from the chamber into the courtyard, they heard a loud baying that seemed to echo from everywhere at once. Two forms materialized out of the fog, massive dire wolves that slavered as they growled at the intruders. Behind it they could see an even larger form take on distinctive shape as it stepped out of the shadow of the spire, resolving into a massive hill giant. Above them came the blare of a horn, followed quickly by the familiar buzz that heralded the return of the mercenaries upon their spider eater mounts.

“Looks like we’ve found the welcoming committee,” Benzan said.

Chapter 394

Cal quickly stepped forward, ignoring the growls from the dire wolves. Probably the smell was the only thing keeping them back, he thought. No animal wanted to sink its jaws into the gooey mess of a demodand’s hide. The giant regarded him warily, but it kept its huge greatsword—adamantine, he noted, the Cagewrights equipped their minions well—rested easily upon its shoulder. “Master cleric send us,” Cal said, doing a fairly good imitation of a demodand’s rasping voice. “He said we join others below. He said show you this mark.”

The Cal-demodand held out the wax seal he’d made the night before, impressed with an enlarged version of the Cagewright icon that appeared on the rings they’d collected thus far. The rings themselves were stored safely in a secure box, warded against scrying, in Jenya’s possession back at the Lucky Monkey.

“Think they’ll buy it?” Hodge whispered.

Dannel shrugged. “If we don’t kill them now, we might have to do it on the way out.”

“As always, yer a load o’ sunshine, elf.”

But the giant merely grunted and pointed a meaty thumb over its shoulder toward the spire.

The “demodands” made their way to the narrow opening in the near face of the spire. The split in the stone extended all the way to ground level, so technically there were three massive stone pillars, rising up hundreds of feet above them. Darkness swallowed them up as they progressed single-file into the crevasse. They wound their way deeper into the shadows, until they came across a fork, with both side passages appearing to extend back to the exterior of the spire.

“I don’t see anything,” Benzan said.

“There is a tunnel that slopes down into the rock, immediately to your left,” came the voice of the planetar. None of them had heard the creature return.

“An illusory wall,” Cal quickly said, confirming that there was an opening in the black stone.

“Truth cannot be hidden from the eyes of justice,” the celestial intoned.

“Yeah, whatever,” Benzan said, disappearing through the wall into the blackness beyond.

The tiefling led them into a tunnel that sloped decisively down into a tight spiral that took them quickly beneath the surface, into the granite foundations of the bluff. They’d circled back around to their initial route—and descended a good forty or fifty feet in the bargain—before the tunnel straightened and deposited them into a chamber.

The air was stale and musty, and thick square pillars five feet across crowded the room, making the place seem smaller than it was. Even though the ceiling was a comfortable fifteen feet above them, the chamber still felt tight and oppressive. Wary, they passed a pair of flanking pillars before the room opened onto a broad central area maybe thirty feet square. The light of the warriors’ enchanted weapons glinted off of bright gold, a massive altar set atop a low stone dais in the center of the room, carved with obscene depictions in cold metal, and surmounted by a twisting representation of a serpent that covered the lid and rose from each end to a pair of heads that faced each other with open jaws equipped with sharp fangs. The weathered floorstones on each side of the altar bore the mark of the Cagewrights, the Carcerian Eye.

“Evil dwells in this place,” the invisible celestial said.

“Well, duh,” Benzan said.

Most of them were still crowded in the entry, back behind the pillars, when a hiss drew their attention to the altar. A slender figure clad in a clinging black cowl and trailing cloak rose up into view behind the golden object, terrible syllables flowing from its lips. He shifted with the familiar telltale of magical displacement, and a warding translucent shield hung in the air before him.

“Spellcaster!” Benzan warned, even as the companions felt a surge of energy pass through them. But that wasn’t the end of it, for the magic-user’s appearance triggered movement from the floor to either side of the altar. The room was filled with a rumbling sound as the two Carcerian Eyes rose up out of the ground... set into the chest of a pair of stone golems, their bodies flat across the front, and shaped to perfectly fit the man-shaped depressions that had been carved into the floor to hide them until an enemy appeared to threaten the evil masters of this place.

Chapter 395

The cowed spellcaster’s slow spell did not have its full intended effect upon the companions. Bolstered by the protective aura emitted by Dana’s planetar ally, and their own considerable collection of magical augmentations, nearly all of them were able to resist the spell, with only Mole and Hodge succumbing to the lethargic grip of the magic upon their bodies.

But the golems were another matter, and the warriors quickly spread out to confront the hulking constructs before they could fully rise and assault the companions. The golems were considerably resistant to even their magical weapons, however, and while Lok delivered a powerful blow to the side of one that sent chips of stone flying, it clearly didn’t do more than inflict minor damage upon it.

Dannel lifted his bow, a white-fledged arrow fitted to the string. “Wizard first?” he said as an aside to Benzan.

The tiefling had likewise drawn and aimed, but held his shot for a moment. “Cal!” he shouted.

“On it!” the gnome said, defensively casting a dispel magic that sliced through the magical defenses of the enemy caster, disrupting both his shield and the displacement.

That was the cue for both archers, who released upon the same instant, both missiles knifing scant inches above the altar to sink heavily into the shoulders of the enemy. The caster let out a scathing hiss as he staggered back, the holy arrows driving pure goodness through his torso like a purging flame. His situation grew rather more desperate a moment later as the planetar invoked a holy smite that ripped mercilessly through him. Falling back to the cover of the dark exit on the far side of the chamber, he tried to teleport away.

He barely got his mouth open before another pair of arrows sank to the feathers in his back, and he crumpled in a heap in the doorway.

But the golems were up now, and inflicting considerable damage with pounding blows from their massive fists. Those impacts battered the warriors like sledgehammers, and both Lok and Arun were driven back under the force of their attacks. Hodge went to Arun’s aid, but the slowed dwarf was ineffective due to the cloying magic that reduced his usually impressive charge to a lumbering stagger.

But the golems quickly came under heavy attack from the companions. The planetar lifted herself into the air with powerful beats of her wings, driving her sword down into the head of one of the golems with a fierce power attack that smashed its granite cranium into fist-sized fragments. Unfortunately the absence of its head did not seem to hinder it, and it caught the angel with a potent punch that knocked her back roughly across the chamber. But the celestial's assault provided Lok with an opening; loosing his shield, taking his axe into both hands, he unleashed his own series of power attacks against the golem's legs. Stone chips flew, and although the golem outweighed the genasi many times over it was the construct that staggered back, unsteady on its seriously damaged lower limbs.

On the opposite flank, Arun recovered and launched his own renewed assault upon his foe. He took another blow on his shield, deflecting the golem's attack upward while he brought his own holy blade up into its elbow from below. The golem was immune to the blessings infused in the blade, but the paladin's strength was enough to crush the rock joint, and as the construct drew back it gave way, the lower half of its arm falling free to the ground with a loud crash.

In the rear of the company, Dana found her way to the melee blocked by the others before her in the narrow space between the flanking entry pillars. Upon seeing the golem's she'd drawn out her new weapon, the adamantine nunchaku taken from the corpse of Ardeth Webb. She moved around the pillars, intending to flank the constructs, but as she passed a dark alcove something stirred and leapt out at her. It was a foul skeletal creature, some sort of undead, its ribs occupied by tendrils of ugly, bloated flesh, one of which ascended along its spine, through its empty skull, and out of its mouth like some horrific serpentine tongue. Her reflexes were adept but the thing moved with surprising speed, slamming her with a powerful blow that nearly knocked her off her feet.

"Undead!" she shouted, to warn her companions of this new threat. The creature did not pause to give her time to recover, coming at her again with its bony fists raised again to strike. She snapped her weapon around, slamming it into the skeleton's side, but the blow hardly seemed to faze it as it punched her solidly again. For lacking muscles, the thing was incredibly strong. As if that wasn't bad enough, its "tongue" lashed out, extending to almost five feet in length, and stabbed into her shoulder before snapping back. The injury was not serious, but Dana could feel her body stiffening as a numb coldness spread throughout her.

No! she thought, but could not do more before the mohrg's paralysis took her, and she fell helpless to the ground at its feet.

Dannel drew the feathers of his latest arrow back to his ear, releasing the shaft to fly point-blank into Arun's golem adversary. The missiles he and Benzan had been firing appeared to do little damage, but the veteran adventurers knew that each little tally brought them closer to overcoming the foe. They heard Dana's cry, and the elf spared his companion an instant's attention. "Go!" he said, before drawing another long shaft from his magical quiver.

Benzan was off instantly, darting back around the pillar toward the source of his wife's voice. Cal, who'd been holding back, conjuring minor enchantments to aid his companions, likewise heard and was already moving to assist. The two rounded the corner a mere second apart, to see the mohrg standing over Dana's motionless form.

Cal drew out a wand in a flash and spoke the word of command that caused a fat gob of green acid to shoot out at the undead monstrosity. The acid struck the mohrg on the side of its skull, burning away the bone, revealing only empty space inside. And then Benzan was rushing past the gnome, discarding his bow as he drew his sword and charged.

The mohrg leapt eagerly forward to meet him.

The golems were continuing to dish out damage to the warriors, but it was clear that the paladin and genasi could simply absorb more punishment than the constructs. Aided by Dannel's continuing barrage, and Hodge's support, Arun had created great cracks in the golem's torso through powerful ringing blows from his holy sword. The golem had released a spell power upon them, but the paladin resisted the slowing magic once more, and Hodge, already affected by the sorcerer's earlier magic, could not be further hindered by another application of the effect. The hesitation cost it, as the two dwarves laid into its legs from opposite directions, finally toppling as its knees were sundered, crumbling into inanimate debris as it hit the floor.

Less than five seconds passed before the other golem likewise fell to the combined assault of Lok and the planetar. The golem mindlessly split its attacks between its two foes, and while it landed several more devastating blows it likewise absorbed damage that it simply could not withstand. Lok finally put it down with a two-handed overhead stroke of his axe that cracked the sigil plate installed in its chest. The crack widened with the golem's struggles to continue its assault, and finally it split down the middle, disintegrating like the first into component rubble that offered no further threat.

Meanwhile, off to the side, in one of the galleries formed by the flanking row of pillars, the battle raged on. Benzan and the mohrg met in a violent exchange, with the mohrg's potent blow glancing off of the tiefling's shoulder. Its long tongue snapped out and nipped the tiefling's neck, but Benzan fought off the cold clinging touch of its paralysis. He in turn delivered a powerful blow with his sword that knocked it roughly back, crushing several of its ribs and scoring the bloated knot of purple flesh that filled its chest cavity.

He should have pressed it, ensured that it was destroyed, but he bent quickly to check on Dana. The gesture took only a second, but it was a costly one, for as he touched his wife's skin the icy chill that held her paralyzed spread into his fingers and through his arm.

And this time, he was unable to resist succumbing to the paralysis.

The mohrg, quickly recovering, stepped forward to deliver a coup de grace against its helpless foe.

Chapter 396

Unable to defend himself, Benzan was helpless before the mohrg. The undead creature lifted a hand to deliver a crushing blow to the back of his neck...

But before the blow could land, a pale green beam lanced into it. The mohrg let out a subvocalized shriek, a thin tinny quiver in the air that was its only protest before it was disintegrated by Cal's spell.

The gnome came forward, alert for any other threats, until he stood next to the paralyzed couple. "Well, I'd hoped not to have to use that spell up so soon."

Benzan could barely move his eyes, yet somehow he managed to express a lot in the look he shot the gnome.

Cal failed to see Mole, standing in the shadows a few feet away. Slowed by the sorcerer's spell, she hadn't been able to effectively contribute to the battle; both the golems and the mohrg were all but immune to any damage she could unleash with her weapons.

Or that, at least, was what she told herself, as she stood there, covered by the darkness, trembling slightly.

"That was too easy," Cal said, directing Lok and Arun to move their two paralyzed companions into a sheltered alcove far from the chamber's two visible exits. Having seen Benzan affected by touching Dana's skin, he warned them not to contact their friends' bare flesh with their own. None of them had magic to dispel the paralysis, however, so they had no choice but to wait for the effect to fade. At least the slow effect was quicker to vanish, and soon Hodge and Mole were unencumbered by that magical hindrance.

"Easy?" Hodge said, incredulous.

"I would have expected a stronger initial defense," Lok agreed, although he favored his jaw, rubbing the bruised skin where a glancing blow had almost taken his head despite the protection of his adamantine helm. Cal drew out one of his healing wands, offering its benefit to the battered warriors.

"The taint in this place is unacceptable," the planetar said, hefting her huge sword as she turned to the ugly golden altar. But she hesitated, and Cal too suddenly looked up, as though he'd heard something disagreeable whispered nearby.

"We are being watched," he said quietly.

The planetar dispelled the invisible magical sensor, but none of them felt all that reassured by the knowledge that their enemies knew they were here.

"Mole?" Cal asked.

"I'm here," the younger gnome replied, stepping from the shadows.

“Keep an eye on the exit tunnel,” Cal said, “In case the guards above heard the ruckus down here, and come down to investigate.”

The rogue nodded, although she looked distracted as she walked over to the far entry.

“I do not think that be a good idea,” Hodge said, as the planetar stepped up to the altar, lifting her sword with clear intent. The celestial positioned herself so that her body would shield the companions from any debris, then she smote the unholy object with the full force of her divinely-granted strength.

There was a flash of light, bright enough to dazzle them for an instant. When they could see clearly again, the celestial was gone.

“Wha? Where’d it go?” Hodge said.

“Some sort of trap,” Dannel said, scanning every corner of the room with an arrow nocked and ready to fire at an instant’s warning.

Arun had moved to the altar, but Cal cautioned him. “No one touch it,” he warned. “If Dana’s ally was transported somewhere, she can more than handle herself, but we cannot afford to be separated, not here.”

The companions watched nervously as the seconds passed, feeling as if time had suddenly slowed down, waiting for the attack that they knew could come without any warning. But nothing stirred in either passage, and after a few minutes Dana started to shift, groaning as her body reestablished control over itself.

“Tzadkiel,” was the first word she said, when she could speak.

“We do not know,” Cal replied. “The spell upon the altar is potent, and reeks with abjuration and transmutation—that much I could discern, anyway. It may have transported her away.”

“I... perhaps I have erred in bringing these warriors of light to our cause...”

“They serve willingly, against the forces of darkness,” Arun reassured her. “Do not second-guess yourself, priestess.”

“Let’s get out of this damned place,” Benzan said, accepting Lok’s help as the paralysis began to fade from him as well, and he leaned against the pillar behind him. Dannel returned the tiefling’s bow, which he accepted with a nod of thanks.

“We must assume that our enemies know we are here, and are preparing a more vigorous defense deeper in the complex,” Cal said.

“So it’s business as usual,” Benzan said, moving gingerly as feeling came back to his limbs, before taking his position at the lead of their company, facing the far exit. The tiefling reached down to the wand in his belt, grasping it and muttering the word of command that wreathed himself in magical invisibility.

“Let’s go,” he said. The companions started out with Benzan ahead, and Mole bringing up the rear.

The corridor proceeded only a short distance, perhaps a few dozen paces, before opening again into another larger room. The stale scent of musty air and ancient decay hung thicker in this place, which had the aura of some long-undisturbed crypt. More thick pillars supported the ceiling, and like the first room gave the place a crowded feel to it. The chamber seemed to merge into a long hall that continued ahead as far as their light sources penetrated.

They spread out as they entered the room, wary of any signs of an ambush. The only thing of note was a stone object on the center of the floor before them. Arun shone the light from his sword upon it as he stepped forward into the chamber, showing it to be a stone arm, perhaps the remains of some ancient statue that had once stood here.

“This goes on quite a ways,” Benzan’s voice came from the direction of the hall. “It looks like it might bend to the right some distance down, but I don’t see or hear anything else from that direction.”

“Spread out, keep a close eye for hidden doors, traps, or anything else unusual,” Cal suggested. “Arun, with Tzadkiel gone, can you occasionally sense for the presence of evil auras?”

Arun nodded. Meanwhile Mole, the last to enter the room, walked over to the stone arm. “Hey, there’s an iron ring on its finger,” she said, bending down.

“No, don’t!” Cal warned, but he was too late as his niece’s fingers brushed the metal band. At that instant the four nearest pillars, at the corners of the room, exploded outward, showering them with pulverized fragments of plaster from the false pillars. Even before they could clearly see, they sensed movement where the pillars had stood.

“Enemies!” Lok warned, falling into a ready stance.

The cloud of plaster dust cleared, giving them a clear view of what faced them. The locations vacated by the pillars was now occupied by four humanoid enemies, clad in chain shirts, and armed with small swords and bows. Somehow the four had been preserved, encased in the false pillars, waiting to do battle against those who would intrude upon the sanctity of this place.

But that wasn’t the worst of it. For as the eyes of the companions rose to the faces of their enemies, they saw fierce, terrible visages, topped with a writhing mess of tangled hair.

No, not hair. Snakes.

Even as realization dawned upon them, several of the companions met the gaze of the medusae, and Cal, Mole, Benzan, and Dannel were all turned to stone.

Chapter 397

“Don’t look at them!” Dana warned, too late, as fully half of them succumbed to the dreaded gaze attacks of the medusae. Lok and Arun, resisting the fell power of that stare, lowered their eyes to the floor, spreading out to attack the creatures before they could fully recover from the interruption of their stasis.

“How we s’posed to fight ‘em, if we can’t see ‘em?” Hodge exclaimed, lowering his head behind his raised shield, awkwardly hefting his axe in the other. His frustration was reinforced a moment later when the medusae lifted their swords and flowed into a smooth, coordinated attack, easily avoiding the blind swings of the warriors as they moved into position.

Dana unleashed one of her greatest powers, a holy word that sanctified the dark confines of the crypt. She’d hoped to at least blind the medusae, to equalize the battle between them and the warriors, but their enemies were just strong enough for the potency of the word to wash over them without serious hindrance.

She paid for her action as two of the creatures leapt at her, flanking her and thrusting their slender shortswords at her. She twisted away from the first attack, but the second plunged a half-foot of steel into her side, piercing her liver and staggering her with a devastating sneak attack.

Rogues, too! she thought through the agony that pierced her. She felt a separate pain as a tiny puncture caught her arm momentarily as she fell back. The bite from one of the medusa’s snakes was minor, and fortunately Dana’s fortitude, hardened by the many trials she’d faced, was sufficient to resist the effects of the poison injected into her bloodstream by the bite.

But the medusae had far deadlier stings, and they quickly shifted to continue their attack. Knowing that she would never survive another coordinated attack, she spoke another word of magic, and opened a dimension door that took her away even as the two rogues stabbed through the empty space where she’d been standing an instant before.

The remaining two creatures had likewise elected to coordinate their attack, moving to flank Arun while attempting to protect their own flanks from a counterattack from Lok. One fainted at the paladin, distracting him, while the other stabbed her sword deep into a gap in the mithral plates protecting his side. Arun grunted in pain, but held his ground. The other one turned into an attack designed to drive Lok back, but the medusa clearly far underestimated the genasi’s fighting prowess. Her sword clattered harmlessly against the warrior’s shield, and in turn it was her that was driven back, bleeding profusely from a wide gash across her scaled torso.

Even blind, the warriors were far superior in stamina and skill to the medusa rogues, and they were virtually immune to the poison injected by the nest of writhing serpents upon their heads. But as Dana disappeared, the other two medusae quickly moved to aid their comrades, surrounding the embattled warriors.

“Back to back!” Lok said, and Arun quickly moved to comply, making it more difficult—but not impossible—for the medusae to flank them.

Hodge, momentarily forgotten on the side of the room, still holding his shield up to protect his eyes, tried to intervene. He ran at the nearest medusa as it crossed the room from where it had stabbed Dana, but as he lifted his axe to strike, he momentarily drew the shield aside to get a bead on his target.

Unfortunately for him, the creature happened to be looking his way. It just wasn't the dwarf's day; despite his considerable fortitude the power of the medusa's gaze filled him as he locked gazes with it. He joined the others in stony immobility, frozen in mid-charge, balanced precariously on one booted foot.

That left Arun and Lok. The dwarves did not take chances with their ability to resist the gaze attacks of their enemies, and they simply closed their eyes, trusting their other senses to guide their attacks. At least they didn't have to worry about hitting their companions; the nearest statue was safely out of their immediate reach. But the medusae were under no limitations, and it quickly became clear that they were augmented by various magical enhancements. Upon realizing this Arun paused to unleash a dispel magic effect from his holy sword. He could not immediately tell if the spell was successful, and was quickly forced to focus upon defending himself as another stroke pierced his defenses, this time jabbing painfully into his shoulder before he could get his shield around in time.

A few feet away, Lok was having an easier time of it. He'd established a defensive stance, and even without the ability to see his enemies, he seemed to be able to anticipate their attacks. Numerous strikes glanced off of his adamantine armor or his heavily enchanted shield, doing no damage. In turn, his own counters were devastating, with only the enhanced quickness of the medusae enabling them to dodge back and avoid being cut in twain by the genasi's mighty axe. Even so, after the first few exchanges Lok remained unhurt, and both medusae bore serious wounds. He focused more on one, hoping to bring it down quickly, but the injured creature shifted to a more defensive posture, letting its companion direct the assault.

A rush of air and a flapping of wings announced the arrival of a new combatant to the melee, as an avian humanoid entered from the altar-chamber to the east, hovering above the melee in the center of the chamber. Several of the medusae glanced up at it, but the avoral, immune to petrification, was unfazed. It in turn unleashed a barrage of magic missiles that seared into the back of one of the creatures attacking Lok, drawing angry hisses from the serpents dancing in a mad gyration atop its angular skull.

Arun took quick advantage of the distraction, slamming his sword deep into the shoulder of one of the medusae. The creature staggered back, the holy blade crushing bone and tearing muscle as it ripped through its body, but the paladin paid a heavy price as the one behind him stabbed him again, sliding its sword up over an overlapping plate and deep into his back. The paladin spun and tried to hit it with his backswing, but the medusa had already drawn safely back, hissing gleefully as blood fountained down over his greaves to puddle at his feet.

The avoral came to his aid, diving low enough to seize the medusa he'd injured with its powerful hind claws. The creature shrieked and tried to break free, its snakes biting at the outsider's legs, but it was not enough for it to break free as the powerful talons pierced its scaled flesh and bit deep into its body.

Its struggles ended for good as Arun turned back and drove the full length of his holy avenger through its body.

Lok, meanwhile, continued to maintain his impenetrable defense. He finally took a hit, a blow that found a crease in his defenses to score a cut on his weapon arm, but it was barely a scratch, even with the ability of the medusa rogues to exploit with sneak attacks. The medusa in turn received more than a scratch in payback, and when its head finally rolled to a stop about ten feet away, a look of frozen disbelief was forever locked on its face.

A roar from the east announced yet more reinforcements; a trio of celestial lions that bounded into the fray, leaping at the remaining two adversaries. One ran afoul of a deadly stare and was turned to stone, but the other two leapt upon the medusae, unleashing devastating attacks with their powerful claws and teeth. The avoral lifted back into the air and resumed its bombardment with magic missiles, which unerringly darted around allies to blast into the flesh of the medusa rogues.

It ended quickly.

Dana reappeared cautiously from the chamber to the east. Her caution was more than simple prudence; she represented the only hope for the recovery of those who had been petrified.

"Are they all slain?"

"Dead as dead can be," Lok said, cleaning his axe calmly. Nearby, Arun nodded in thanks to the avoral. The outsider landed next to him, regarding him intently with its alien stare, before extending a wing out over the paladin's smaller frame. Arun felt its feathers brush over his face, followed by a surge of healing energy as it purged him of pain and healed his wounds. The paladin bowed deeply, and the creature let out an acknowledging screech before returning to its plane of origin. Dana ordered the lions to scout out the area for other foes, but their time too was limited, and within about a minute they had likewise returned to whence they came.

The three companions gathered in the center of the room, surrounded by the petrified forms of their friends. Suddenly the crypt felt a whole lot smaller, and menacing.

"Now what?" Lok asked.

But Dana had already removed a small ceramic jar from her belt pouch, and as the dwarves watched she knelt beside the diminutive petrified form of Cal. The jar contained about an ounce of gray ointment, which she deftly applied onto the stone surface of the gnome's body. The salve quickly seeped into the gnome's skin, clothes, and even his weapons and other gear, which began to shimmer faintly. By the time she'd finished, the gnome's rigid outline had begun to soften, and within a few more moments he'd been restored to living flesh.

"That was a decidedly unpleasant experience," he said, stretching his muscles to shake out the last lingering effects of his petrification.

"Do you have enough salve for the others?" Arun asked.

"No, I only had the one dose," the priestess admitted, "Which is why I used it on Cal."

"I can break the enchantment, but I do not have the required spell in memory," Cal said. "I will have to rest and study my spellbook."

"Then we must retreat," Lok said.

"Cal and I can teleport us all back to the Monkey," Dana said.

"Our enemies may not wait quietly for our return," Arun said.

"It cannot be helped," Cal said. "Lok, Arun, please move our petrified friends into two close circles."

The warriors complied, and within a few moments they had completed the necessary preparations. Cal glanced over at Dana. "Be certain that you take a good look around, and fix this place in your memory."

Dana nodded, understanding. "I have."

"Then let us be quit of this foul locale... for now."

The gnome and priestess of Selûne uttered words of magic, and with their companions disappeared from Shatterhorn.

Chapter 398

Embril Aloustinai turned over a piece of rock with her foot, a frown as deep as a canyon etched on her otherwise fair and even alluring features.

"You are not listening, Embril!" came a shrill, almost panicked voice. "A planetar... do you know what that means! And on top of that, the destruction of the Egg... disaster! Our enemies close upon us!"

Embril looked up, fixing the speaker with a desultory look that momentarily quieted her. Thifirane Rhiavati had fallen far, to be certain. The once unflappable noblewoman—and powerful mage—was clad in a hastily-donned dressing robe that failed to conceal the gaunt flesh that clung tightly to her bones beneath. Her hair, which she'd always taken a considerable vain pride in, hung in a confused tangle around her face. Blood trailed from a gash in her forehead just below the hairline, a cut from a fragment of the Egg when it had exploded outward, most likely—but the woman seemed to not even feel it.

“Panic will not solve our problems, my dear,” Embril said, calmly. “And we will yet obtain our objective... I have seen it.”

The conviction in the woman’s voice did not arrest the doubts of the wizard. “The Egg...”

Embril waved her hand dismissively. “The Egg of Merrshaulk was a potent boon,” she said. “But it is one we inherited, not one that we crafted for ourselves. And if it could not even contain the celestial, then its viability was limited in any case. To be honest, we were not going to remain much longer in this place.”

“Embril,” came the voice of another speaker, across the room. “Viirdran requires more healing.”

Embril turned from the still-fuming wizard and walked across the room. It wasn’t easy—fragments of stone ranging from sharp slivers a few inches long to blocks the size of a child’s head littered the floor. She also had to step over the mangled corpse of a farastu demodand, split open almost from head to crotch to reveal a disgusting, sticky mess inside. Small puddles of acid that had until recently been inside the Egg of Merrshaulk filled subtle indentations in the floor, complemented by gobs of demodand slime that formed glistening slicks here and there. These obstacles required further adjustments. Embril appeared to pay no heed to such inconveniences, reaching the one who had requested her aid.

Kyan Winterstrike rose as she approached, nodding to the man resting against the wall beside her. The elf and her companion were an odd pair, for she was clearly a moon elf, while Viirdran was a drow, his fine robes marred by the vicious rents that had opened gaping holes in fabric and flesh alike. He’d already been stabilized by Embril, but still breathed laboriously, pain evident on his face.

Embril bent and channeled healing power into the injured man.

“They will be back,” Thifirane continued, still on the far side of the Egg—now just an uneven base upon its pedestal. “That planetar will be eager to treat with us again, I suspect.”

“I am quite certain you are correct,” Embril said, rising again, drawing out a small white cloth to clean one of her fingers of a smear of blood gathered from her brief contact with the drow blademaster.

“What are we to do, Embril?” Kyan asked.

“Gather Sorizan, and Xokek as well. And bring me Nahazir’s corpse as well... that useless fool may yet offer some benefit to our cause.”

“Xokek will not come willingly,” Viirdran said, the drow’s voice deep and thick, as though echoing from within a vast empty cavern inside his body.

“He will come,” Embril said.

“Where are you going?” Thifirane asked, as Embril walked toward one of the chamber’s less obvious exits. She had to know the answer already, and Embril smiled before turning at what it revealed of the woman’s fears.

“I must consult with my companion,” she said. “And I have too long neglected our other guest.”

“You are taking a very big risk, Embril,” Thifirane said.

Embril Aloustinai laughed at the comment. She did not share the reason for her mirth, but as she turned and walked away, she felt a grim thrill of sensation that was both pleasure and gut-clenching terror, in the same instant. Thifirane had once been among the highest in their cabal, but the destruction of her little pretend world in Cauldron had clearly had a deleterious effect upon her.

For having forfeited their very mortal souls to their cause, what did it matter what they risked now?

Chapter 399

Embril entered a black chamber, a cyst many strides beneath the surface of the sunlit world above.

At first, it appeared that the place was empty, the center cleared, the perimeter marked by regular pillars and vague shadows that might have been furnishings or other random objects. But that was an illusion; this place was very much occupied.

Embril stepped forward, enjoying the chaotic surge of emotion that filled her upon entering this place. Thifirane was right, this was madness; yet she did not care, enjoying the sensations, reveling in her power and the insane dreams that had brought her to this conclusion.

She came forward almost to the edge of the glyphs drawn in powdered black metal upon the floor. For a split-second she had a mad impulse to break one of the thin lines that made up the diagram, but she was able to repress that feeling. Now that would have been true insanity, she thought with a quiet chuckle.

It appeared from the shadows, looking at her with its usual inscrutable expression. Its skin was a chalky white, its face alien, its six arms bent in poses that would have been painful for her to duplicate with her two.

agitation

“I know, my dearest,” Embril cooed, walking over to it. “This is not comfortable for you, I understand. I would not enjoy it either, I suspect. But it is necessary... for our plans, yours and mine.”

The spellweaver said nothing, retreating a step until it was all but lost in the shadows once more.

"It holds you in contempt," came a voice from within the diagram.

"Our interests coincide," Embril replied without turning.

"Your mind is too small to conceive of its thoughts," the voice continued. "Your 'ally' will betray you, it is only a matter of time."

Embril turned to face the speaker, and smiled. "I do not pretend to understand it completely, but it knows the meaning of gratitude, at least." She came forward, once again. "But enough meaningless chatter. I would treat with you, demon. Show yourself, if you would."

The air within the summoning circle roiled and solidified into currents of black smoke that took on material form. Embril had to crane her head upward to meet the blazing red eyes that took shape within a massive visage, a terror beyond mere human imagining. Power was in those eyes, ancient power matched by a fury that threatened to bring down the walls and swallow up this place, deep below the surface of Faerûn.

That stare should have stripped the sanity from a human woman, but Embril merely laughed. "I hope that your stay with us has been... comfortable, my lord Ndulu."

Ndulu's anger, if anything, intensified. "Your madness has truly consumed you, Embril Aloustinai, for you to call me here. You know who I serve!"

"Indeed, balor." She looked around the chamber. "Your master has come down quite a bit in the overall scheme of things, has he not? It would seem that his fall from power has affected you as well. To think, the mighty Ndulu, caught up in the binding of a mere mortal creature." Indeed, the spell cast by her ally should not have been able to hold a creature of Ndulu's power, but it could not know that the spellweaver had burned a wish spell to augment the potency of the calling enough to snare the balor, and to reinforce the summoning circle to hold it.

Ndulu exploded in a paroxysm of fury, fire and black power roiling off him in waves, but confined within the potency of the summoning diagram. Embril waited for it to spend its anger, which happened rather quickly... too quickly, perhaps.

"I do not know what you hope to gain from me, but you will never extract any benefit from this plan," the demon said, once it had subsided. "You cannot keep me imprisoned forever, and my master will be quite pleased to hear of the failure of your aspirations when I return to his side."

For a moment Embril's weave of self-control cracked, if only slightly, and she shot an annoyed glance at the spellweaver. What had it revealed to the demon? It could not know what had transpired at Cauldron, for it had been confined here since the day before the commencement of the Ritual of Planar Joining. Could it have somehow gained access to information through the barrier of its prison?

No. It had to be playing her, reading whatever subtle clues she herself was projecting through her own defenses. Demons were uncanny at finding weaknesses in their foes, and this one was one of the greatest of its race, a mere step below the mighty Princes that ruled the diverse layers of the Abyss. She quickly regained control—the demon was regarding her intently, almost eagerly—and looked up again to meet its gaze squarely.

“You can tell Graz’zt anything you wish,” she said. “I am prepared to release you... but first you must agree to a service, to which you are bound to obey by the terms of the Compact.”

The demon’s laughter was a terrible thing. “Foolish little wench, you think to barter with me? I will have your flesh as a throw rug, but the rest of your body will continue to feel agonies long, long after...”

“Yes, yes, eternal torment, suffering of my soul, etcetera, etcetera,” she said. “But first, the service.”

“I will never deign to serve a weak mortal bitch who thinks her modest powers give her the right to treat with me,” the balor replied. “You can take your pet abomination and...”

Embril just stood there as the demon offered a series of vile threats and promises of destruction. It spoke for a full minute before it realized that she wasn’t listening; in fact she stood there, looking off to the side, tapping her foot with a bit of impatience.

“Go then, frail little mortal, go to your dreams of power, and the mad whispers of your dying god,” it finally said, its voice a deep hiss like metal dragged over stone. “Know that your patron will never be released, and that your little cabal will join him soon enough, your screams adding to the neverending dirge of the insane in the halls of Skullrot...”

“That remains to be seen,” Embril said. “But I have not yet made my offer.”

“Speak then! So that at least I may be spared your foolish prattle. You waste my time and yours.”

“Your master may disagree,” Embril said, with an enigmatic smile upon her face. She made a motion with her fingertips and spoke words of eldritch power. It was a minor spell she called upon, but it had an immediate effect as an image took form in the circle formed by her hand movements, an illusion that nonetheless took on clear resolution, suspended in the air between her and the demon. It wasn’t a very big picture, just large enough to clearly show the faces of the individuals depicted therein.

The demon was silent. Embril had not lied; its master would be very, very interested in what it had seen.

Embril let the illusion dissolve, and merely waited.

The two faced off for a long minute that crept into two, three... the mortal woman—powerful, but mad—and the ageless demon, lord of its kind.

Finally, it was the demon that spoke first.

“Speak your terms.”

Chapter 400

Night descended upon The Lucky Monkey, and the refugee camp that had been extracted from the jungle surrounding it. The place looked almost unreal in the filtered moonlight that made it though the scattered cloud cover above; more an illusion than a real outpost, the jungle crowded close around the structures as if eager to reclaim this clearing for itself. It was quiet, even the animals of the forest apparently content to go about their business in silence on this dark eve. The night was not entirely empty; vigilant watchers stared into the night from concealed positions in the summits of trees, or in shelters installed in the crevices upon the roof of the roadhouse. And high above, another kept watch as well.

Behind the roadhouse the jungle encroached hard upon the structure, despite the obvious efforts over the years to trim back the growth. There was a low mound where a waste trench had been dug earlier and covered over, and a faint smell of ordure still hung over the place, discouraging visitors.

There was absolutely no warning. One moment the small clearing behind the roadhouse was empty, the next it was full of sound and light. A massive figure rose up over the mound, twelve feet tall, a miniature sun immolated in a nimbus of living flame.

Ndulu had arrived.

The guards atop the roadhouse had barely time to register their doom before the balor lifted his hand and transformed the night into a sea of flame. The firestorm descended in sheets upon the building, engulfing huge swaths of it in flame, transforming the sturdy structure into a pyre. Even as those inside became dimly aware through the haze of sleep that something was wrong, the demon lord strode into the flames, lifting its huge sword and sweeping away a twenty-foot face of the structure with a single mighty sweep of the burning weapon. Several people were killed instantly as the outer wall exploded into their room, and others looked up from their beds, frozen in terror as they were suddenly exposed to a face out of their worst nightmares.

An avian cry shattered the night sky, as an avoral—this one called by Dana’s planar ally spell to guard the night—dove toward the demon. It fired magic missiles at the demon’s back as it dove, but the little violet streaks vanished as they entered the fell aura of power surrounding it. Still crying out its alarm, it pulled out of its dive and winged over the forest before turning for another pass. Its course took it briefly over the road that ascended into the mountains, toward Cauldron.

Suddenly it staggered in mid-flight, spinning awkwardly aside to reveal a black-fledged arrow embedded deep in its breast. Its wings pounding fiercely in an effort to regain control, it flew away from the road, where the arrow had originated. A moment later a lightning bolt rose up from the same area to slam into it, but the avoral was not injured by the energy that flared briefly around it.

“Fool, it’s a celestial, immune to electricity!” Thifirane Rhiavati said to the man standing beside her, a resurrected Ssythar Nahazir. The yuan-ti pureblood hissed something in return, but did not offer further comment.

“Let me show you how to do it, sorcerer,” Thifirane said, lifting her hand, focusing upon the avoral as it tried to get away. It had nearly disappeared back over the forest canopy before a thin green ray erupted from the wizard’s finger, flashing instantly through the night, hitting the outsider and disintegrating it.

The remaining Cagewrights turned toward the sounds of destruction that continued to rise from the location of the nearby roadhouse. Screams now added to the sound of breaking wood and shattering glass, a cacophony that sounded out over the jungle night. The trees blocked a direct view of the site, but they could see the bright glow that rose from the flames, and they knew that the balor was already well into its work. There were eight of them there on the road. In addition to Rhiavati and Ssythar, they included Kyan and Viirdran, the two oddly juxtaposed elves. There was a heavily armored man clad in full plate and shield, a bare bastard sword easily balanced in his right hand, his bare face marked with a web of red tattoos. The warrior was shadowed by a huge four-legged beast the size of a man, a mere mound of fur in the night shadows. Embril and her spellweaver cohort were present. Finally there were three others who were felt rather than seen, individuals so at one with the night that even the sharpest-eyed would have failed to see them standing there on the road. These three simply hovered at the edge of the gathering, as if bored with the proceedings.

“Go, kill everything,” Embril said, the tall, lean form of the spellweaver looming behind her, its pale flesh like scoured bone in the diffuse moonlight. “With one exception. The priestess—Jenya Urikas. She is to be taken, and brought to me at Shatterhorn.”

“What?” Thifirane exclaimed. “You abandon us now?”

“Do not forget, we have a greater goal,” Embril said, her voice like a silken purr. “I must attend to the completion of our plan. Do not fear, dearest Thifirane, you shall not lack for your reward when the Master is restored to us. Go! Instruct these fools what it means to interfere with the Cagewrights. Destroy the pathetic remnants that they seek to protect. Slay every man, every woman, every child, every animal that breathes its life at the sufferance of a civilized soul. I suspect that you will not have much to do, once the balor finishes its work, but I am finished with equivocation! They must be ended.”

“They shall rue their decision to interfere in the whims of Adimarchus!” the tattooed warrior exclaimed. “They shall be made to suffer for their crimes!”

“What of the demon?” Viirdran asked, flexing his muscles, his hands drifting close to the hilts of his twin rapiers.

“He has his own interest tonight. The balor is compelled by the Compact to obey its obligation, but you would be wise not to trust its forbearance,” Embril said with a chuckle. “Of course, it has been called, not summoned, so its fate on this plane is binding upon it. If it were not to return to Graz’zt’s side, to report what it knows...”

The Cagewrights each nodded, understanding the theurge's implication clearly.

"Let it wreak destruction... and pick up the pieces. But Urikas! She must be recovered, alive, that is my mandate to you!"

"Well, if we hope to find her alive, we'd best hasten," Viirdran said, turning toward the refugee camp. The others joined it, but Thifirane paused, glancing back over her shoulder, meeting Embril's gaze momentarily before the woman called upon her power, and along with her unnatural companion teleported away.

But even as the Cagewrights made their way toward the burning roadhouse, the Heroes of Cauldron were already finding themselves in a world of hurt.

Chapter 401

The Lucky Money burned, a bonfire that lit up the surrounding jungle.

The balor used its power of telekinesis to snap a load-bearing support, bringing down an expanse of burning roof onto a room full of screaming, helpless civilians. The demon took delight in the sudden halt to their screams—though their panic had been quite satisfying too. It knew that its assault would provoke a response, and it found itself looking forward to that as well.

Even so, the ferocity of that counterattack took it somewhat off-guard.

* * * * *

"What's happening?"

"Man can't even get a bloomin' night's sleep 'round 'ere..."

"An all-out attack..."

"It's destroying the inn..."

"Cagewrights..."

"I told you that they would not sit around and wait for us to return..."

"It's evil, overwhelming... a greater demon..."

"A balor, I'd expect; I only got a glimpse of it..."

"A balor? You've got to be kidding!"

"The refugees will be slaughtered..."

“Hells, we’ll be slaughtered!”

“Arun, wait! We must prepare before we face it...”

“Jenya, get the people out, we’ll do our best to hold it off...”

* * * * *

A compact figure appeared in the ruin of the second story hallway, now open to the outside, and the widening swath of ruin and destruction wrought by the demon. Already about a quarter of the structure had been destroyed, and the screams of those trapped in the rubble echoed those of the people trying desperately to escape the crumbling structure. A man appeared in the ruin of the common room below, clad in a blue tunic, thrusting a longspear at the demon in an act of futile defiance. The head of the weapon melted as it entered the nimbus of flame that surrounded the demon’s body, the steel bending uselessly off its armored hide. His sacrifice was in vain as the demon barked a laugh, separating the man’s head from his shoulders with a casual swipe of his massive sword.

“Pathetic. I was led to believe that there would be some resistance, at least...”

Even through the chaos it had created, the demon’s sharp senses detected the charge of another man who’d appeared in the upstairs hall, this one a brown-skinned dwarf, pushing through the dangling wreckage of ruined beams and shattered masonry. It also recognized the power in the sword that the man carried; power that could hurt it. The demon recognized this foe as one of those that had been shown to it, one the enemies who had caused so much difficulty for the Cagewrights. Not one of those that its master bore such a fierce hatred for, but that wouldn’t save him against the balor’s power. The demon enjoyed destruction, but it was eager to join in combat against real foes that could give it something of a challenge before they fell to its terrible might.

It was clear that this enemy was not prepared for battle. Though clearly a warrior, he wore only a hastily donned chain shirt, not the heavy armor that might have given him a chance against the balor’s assault.

As the man reached the end of the hall, the demon snapped out its flaming whip, intending to divest this foe of his dangerous weapon. The eager tongue of the whip snapped the warrior’s wrist exactly as intended, but somehow he yanked away, ignoring the tongues of flame that bit at him, avoiding being entangled in the sinuous strands, carefully crafted from the flayed hides of a hundred victims.

There was nowhere for the warrior to go as the hallway suddenly ended, but to the demon’s minor surprise he simply leapt out over the gaping ruin, landing heavily in a jumble of roofing tiles and wooden beams a few feet from where the balor stood. Ndulu felt an explosion of pain that lanced up his left leg into his body as the dwarf gashed the limb with his holy sword, a cold iron blade that burned with the pure divinity that was anathema to its kind, even to the mightiest of their race.

Furious, the demon unleashed a power word that gratifyingly impacted the warrior, knocking him roughly prone, stunned. Inwardly the demon was gratified; a more powerful foe would have been able to shrug off the effects of the magic, and likely would have been some trouble with that damned holy blade.

“A valiant effort, knight, but doomed to fail...” the demon droned, its words mocking.

Light flared from within the building, resolving into a quintet of brilliant white globes that rose out of the gaps in the structure. The five globes of light rose up into the air, firing beams of golden light that seared into the demon. They caused obvious damage, even through its many defenses, but the marks they made in its hide were barely scratches to one such as it.

“Lantern archons, how droll,” the balor said, rising up to its full height, chuckling. “Is this the best you fools can manage?”

But others were joining the fray now, the response that Ndulu had been expecting to provoke. Two more warriors appeared at the edge of the ruined common room. They charged toward the demon, but the debris impeded their rush. One, a dwarf with a large waraxe, stepped on a solid-looking piece of roofing and broke through, entangling himself momentarily. The other, clearly possessed of outsider blood, actually made it close enough to attack with his own axe, but the weapon glanced off of the malignant radiance of the balor’s unholy aura.

The balor turned to deal with this new threat, but even as it shifted a missile streaked from above, striking it solidly in the shoulder. The demon instantly spotted the source, an elf archer lurking in the ruins of the hallway above. Ordinarily a mere bowman would have not given it pause, but the arrow was also blessed with holy power, from the way that it burned in its hide. These were enemies that clearly had experience in battling fiends, although Ndulu doubted that they had ever faced the likes of it, one of the lords of the Abyss.

They had managed to hurt it, although the injuries thus far were mostly pinpricks, scratches. But still, enough was enough.

Ndulu called upon the full power of the Abyss, speaking a word of blasphemy. It watched with gratification as its foes collapsed, one after another, paralyzed. The lantern archons popped out of existence; what was left of them might be found as a bright-colored smear on a rock somewhere in Celestia. None of them could resist it, and now they were as good as dead, helpless to do anything to stop it.

Chapter 402

At the moment, it looked as though the Cagewrights rapidly approaching the burning roadhouse would find only their corpses of their enemies in the ruins.

Pleased with the sudden cessation of resistance following its blasphemy, the balor turned back to the dwarf knight with the holy sword. He was double incapacitated now, both stunned and paralyzed, but having felt the bite of the holy avenger, Ndulu wasn’t going to take any chances.

“Your skull will make a fine vessel for my blood wine,” the balor said, as it reached for him.

Another bite of stabbing pain interrupted him. Annoyed now, the demon turned to see that another archer had appeared around the far side of the building, a corner that still stood, toward the front of the structure. The man was invisible, or at least he thought he was; the shroud of greater invisibility he wore was nothing to the supernatural senses of the demon lord. Its annoyance was instantly replaced by eager anticipation as it recognized the attacker.

Ah, there you are...

The balor ignored a second stab of pain as another missile lodged in its arm. The tiefling was using holy arrows too, and fired from a bow designed to destroy creatures such as the balor to boot, but Ndulu was focused more on how he could use this enemy as a lever to win favor—and power—from his master. Spreading its wings, the balor leapt at its target, moving with a speed and ferocity far beyond that of any mortal creature.

The look on the tiefling’s face at its onrushing doom was quite satisfying.

The archer ducked back behind the corner of the building, which a moment later exploded outward as the balor swept his sword through it, sending shards of shattered masonry and wood flying out in a wide arc. The archer was falling back but really had nowhere to go. There were others in the clearing in front of the roadhouse, mostly civilians who screamed at the demon’s sudden appearance, rushing to get out of the way. But one did not flee; a woman who lifted her hand at the balor, calling forth a blast of searing light that unfortunately faded as it struck the demon’s unholy aura.

“Dana!” the tiefling called out, warning the woman, as if it wasn’t obvious that she was flirting with her own destruction. Ndulu had recognized her even before the tiefling’s words, however, and the demon leapt, covering half the distance that separated them even as its whip lashed out, wrapping around her torso. She screamed—gratifyingly—as the balor drew her in, immersing her in the aura of fire that surrounded it.

Its pleasure at her suffering was cut short, however, as she dimension doored out of its grasp. Angry, it turned to the tiefling, but before it could act he too transported himself away.

“Cowards... you cannot run from me,” the demon snarled. It had a good idea where the two had gone, however, and it summoned its own power to teleport back to where it had left its other helpless foes.

* * * * *

“I... I can’t, uncle Cal,” Mole said, a miserable ball of fear, huddling in the ruins of The Lucky Monkey, what was still left intact of the interior wreathed in thick smoke, watching helplessly as the demon engaged her friends. “Nothing we do hurts it, and none of them could resist it!” Her own heart had felt like it would freeze when the demon had spoken its blasphemy, although she’d been just far enough away that the sensation had passed, and she’d been able to react a few moments later.

Inwardly, Cal could not disagree with her niece's pessimistic assessment. The balor was a deadly foe, and it possessed magic that could not be dodged or resisted. And even if he hadn't already burned many of his most powerful spells in their earlier engagements at Shatterhorn, he did not have much in his arsenal that would even inconvenience the demon lord. Thus far the buffs he'd placed upon his allies had done little to protect them against the demon's power. And if that wasn't bad enough, a loud crash nearby was a reminder that the entire building was on fire, and was going to collapse down upon them before too long.

But he masked those feelings, knowing that his niece tottered on a precipice of self-doubt that could cost all of them. "We'll do what we can," he told her. "Our friends deserve no less."

He began a complex spell, but before he could complete it the demon turned and charged out of the rubble toward the front of the building.

"Where's it going?" Mole whispered, curious despite her fear.

Cal completed his spell, giving shape to shadowstuff that he drew across the ether, forming it into the outline of a bralani eladrin that he gave substance through his magic. As it took solid form, awaiting commands, Cal caught sight of a wisp of white moving through the building nearby, accompanied by a familiar clank of heavy metal.

Jenya, and Beorna! The pair were moving toward the ruined quarter of the building where their friends lay helpless, perhaps unaware that the battle had already shifted to the front of the building where Dana and Benzan had circled around to flank the demon.

"It's got Dana!" came Mole's voice, confirming his suspicions a moment later.

If it comes to this, so be it... we've given it a good run, the gnome thought. He turned to his shadow conjured eladrin. The creature had been good enough to drive away the smoke in their immediate vicinity, and Cal nodded gratefully as he took a clean breath before speaking.

"Go out the back of this structure, and gain altitude. There is a balor in front; I want you to distract it using your holy arrows. Do not engage it in melee unless you have no other option."

The shadow-creature nodded, and in a rush of wind darted out toward the ruined rear entry.

Cal moved to the front entry to join Mole, when a loud crash from behind suggested that the battle had again shifted to their rear.

* * * * *

"Well, do we engage?" Viirdran asked, his rapiers balanced easily in his slender hands. The Cagewrights were still in the wood, having come off the road to approach the roadhouse from behind, though they were now close enough now to clearly see the rear of the building. Even from here they could feel the roar of the flames and taste the acrid smell of smoke thick on the air.

Even though they were not the targets of the creature, the veterans started as the balor suddenly reappeared in the midst of the ruins it had created, announcing its return with a loud roar.

“Mayhap we let the beast finish its assault,” Thifirane suggested, a feral grin on her features. “Then we go in and pick up the pieces. All of the pieces.”

“Their hearts will make interesting additions to my collection,” the armored warrior, Alurad Sorizan, said with a chuckle. The furry mound at his side, a massive dire badger, let out an accompanying growl.

“Await my signal to start the attack,” Thifirane continued. “Destroy the balor quickly... and then any others that remain.”

Cautiously, spreading out, they slowly approached the battlefield.

* * * * *

Ndulu materialized to find its two foes, the priestess and the tiefling, indeed where it had thought to find them, trying to aid their helpless companions. There were others here as well, another armored dwarf and a woman clad in the raiment of a high cleric of the god Helm. That last one Ndulu did not know, but it could instantly sense the power within her, as well as the fear that shone in her eyes as she looked up from where she knelt over that useless paladin.

But the Helmite’s companions did not hesitate, immediately launching a violent all-out assault upon the balor. The tiefling archer fired another one of those damnable holy arrows into the demon’s shoulder, but he’d already been luckier than he’d had a right to be, and his follow-up shot was more properly deflected by the still-coruscating potency of the unholy aura. The other woman, the servant of Selûne, tried to dismiss it in a gesture that was almost amusing in its futility.

The dwarf woman likewise gave her best effort, trying to smite him with an adamantite sword that the balor recognized (with some alarm, though it would never consciously admit such) had been infused with holy power. But her assault was equally useless, even the legendary hardness of the rare metal insufficient against its hide, infused with the essence of the darkest pits in the Abyss.

As she continued hacking at it in a foolish display of mulish persistence, the demon’s eyes focused on the high priestess. Something plinked against its shoulder, and the demon distantly noticed and dismissed the pathetic shadow-creation that hovered above, out of easy range.

Smiling, the demon uttered another blasphemy.

Chapter 403

Again a terrible word sundered the gap between realms, unleashing another wave of foul energy that struck the minds of the companions like a hammer. Dana, Benzan, and Beorna were struck down, as helpless as their friends lying around them.

The balor looked at the cleric, who had not succumbed to its fell power. Spell resistance, it thought, recognizing the magic she'd summoned to protect her.

So be it. It would not protect her against having her head separated from her shoulders.

The cleric rose, determination clearly warring with terror in her eyes, the former barely holding out as she held the paladin's holy sword up—not as a weapon, but as a talisman against an evil she could not resist.

"You cannot use that against me," the demon hissed, lifting its own terrible sword.

"It is enough that you fear it," the woman said, presenting her holy symbol with her other hand, and speaking her own word of power.

Ndulu roared, recognizing too late what she meant, unable to resist the power of the banishment spell that sent it screaming back to the depths of the Abyss.

Jenya sagged back, worn by the brief but terrible struggle of wills against the demon lord, looking around at the destruction that surrounded her, feeling the heat of the flames that continued to burn around the exterior—and gradually into the interior—of the roadhouse. The place was doomed; a single look was enough to prove that.

She turned to her friends and their allies; they had to get out of here.

She staggered back, pain exploding through her shoulder as an arrow slammed into her. She looked up to see a group of figures emerging from the forest: a heavily armored man accompanied by a huge dire badger; a dark elf bearing two swords; three rail-thin elves who seemed to drift in and out of her view, as if her brain refused to recognize their presence. Behind them, she could just make out the archer who'd shot her, and another figure, wreathed in dark robes, a shadowy figure impossible to clearly discern. She felt some sort of magical attack impact her defenses, dissipating as it struck her spell resistance.

"Surrender, Jenya Urikas!" the armored man said. "The judgment of Adimarchus is upon thee!"

She glanced down at the helpless adventurers lying all around her, paralyzed, unable to intervene.

She was alone.

Chapter 404

“Give it up, priestess,” the drow said, hefting his rapier. Even though he was approaching, like the others, at a wary and even pace, his arms were twitching, moving quickly, too quickly, and the part of Jenya’s mind that was still allowing rational thought noted the presence of a haste effect.

The struggle against the balor had almost unnerved her, but a sudden calm filled her at that moment, standing alone against the Cagewrights and their minions. When she spoke, there was no hint of a tremor in her voice.

“We will never yield.”

Another arrow struck her, but she barely felt the pain as she uttered a holy word.

The spell had an immediate and significant effect, the echo to the devastating blasphemies spoken by the balor. Two of the three shadow-elves shrieked and dissolved, their forms for a split-second revealed for what they really were, hulking and fearsome death slaad that vanished as they were banished back to the chaos of Limbo. The third elf staggered back, blinded and deafened by the holy word, but a moment later he was gone, obscured by some dark art.

Viirdran was likewise stricken, losing sight and hearing. He could not hear Kyan calling his name, or see her angrily reach for another of the long, deadly arrows that stuffed her quiver.

Alurad Sorizan was a bit stronger than his peers, and merely lost his hearing briefly, the echo of the holy word sounding inside his skull. That sound merely took up residence among the other voices he heard in there, and he rushed forward, eager to confront this champion of Good who defied Adimarchus.

Of course, in his insane mind, it was he who was Adimarchus, but that was a minor detail in the face of the reality of a charging warrior in full plate waving a big bastard sword about menacingly. His dire badger did not join him, dead or paralyzed from hearing the holy word.

But before he could reach his foe, a golden light flared brightly before the blackguard. It cleared to reveal a massive, perfect figure of a man, its skin a shining gold, white wings spread behind it, a huge sword of white light in its hands. Blocking Alurad’s advance, it extended a hand in warning. “Begone, Cagewright, for these are under My protection.”

Alurad screamed and blindly assaulted the solar, swinging his sword in a violent arc. The celestial surprisingly—and adroitly—jumped back, giving way as “Adimarchus” followed, laughing as he swung at it, just narrowly missing each time.

“A solar!” Kyan Winterstrike breathed, in stunned awe. The arcane archer had faced many odd foes since joining the Cagewrights, but she was beginning to feel a bit overwhelmed. First a balor, and now this!

“It’s an illusion,” Thifirane said, her voice thick with disgust as she watched Alurad taken in by the ruse. “No doubt the gnome wizard is in there somewhere, directing it, trying to buy some time.” With a wave of her hand and a few words of magic, she dispelled the image. Alurad looked around in confusion, before turning back to his original quarry. Meanwhile, Thifirane screamed as an arrow glanced off of her forehead. Her stoneskin protected her from serious damage, but the holy power of the missile nevertheless had hurt.

“Blast it!” she said, looking up at Cal’s bralani, still flying high above the battlefield, fitting another arrow to its holy bow.

The priestess of Helm knelt over the immobile form of Arun Goldenshield, calling forth the power of her god to purge the lingering effects of the demon’s blasphemy. As Arun stirred, his body gradually returning to his control, she pressed his weapon into his hand.

“We yet face dire enemies!” she said, as the paladin struggled to his feet.

“Do what you can for the others!” Arun said, lifting his sword in time to meet Alurad’s charge. The paladin took the blackguard’s powerful swing on his holy avenger, the two weapons meeting in a flash of energies as the holy power of the paladin’s sword clashed with the corrupt power infused in the blackguard’s blade. For all his variegated forms of madness, the Cagewright was still a master swordsman, and it quickly became clear that his heavy armor—not to mention Arun’s exhaustion—gave him a significant advantage. Arun managed a solid blow that dented the black plates covering Alurad’s right torso, but in turn he took a devastating critical strike that forced him back, blood oozing from a great rent in his stomach.

“Taste the justice of Adimarchus!” the blackguard gleefully intoned.

The shadow-bralani let out a high-pitched cry as a salvo of empowered magic missiles slammed into it, the first contribution to the battle from Ssythar Nahazir. The yuan-ti pureblood was concealed deep within the sheltering foliage of the jungle, perhaps a bit skittish from his recent demise. Thifirane had recognized the true nature of Cal’s creation, and the things seemed to lose some of its substance as the bolts crashed into it. A moment later it dissolved into wisps of shadowstuff as Kyan impaled it with a perfectly-placed arrow that would have pierced its heart, had it been a true living creature.

Arun felt a chill as something intangible touched the edges of his awareness. Even with Alurad in his face, unleashing powerful if inaccurate swings at him, he sensed that there was another danger here, something nasty moving through the mélange of smoke and shadows that pressed in upon the halo of light that surrounded his sword.

Alurad lifted his sword to strike again, but a black ray stabbed out from the smoke of the common room, striking the blackguard in the breast. The enervation sapped his life energy, diminishing him, although he proved how dangerous he remained as his blow drove under Arun’s shield and cut a fresh, bleeding gash in his left shoulder.

But then Arun’s wounds suddenly knit together, the dwarf feeling reinvigorated as healing power poured into him. Jenya Urikas, lacking another remove paralysis spell, had instead added her efforts to the fray by casting a mass cure critical wounds. She then attempted to hold Alurad, but the spell had no effect upon the blackguard.

Thifirane Rhiavati, however, had noted the contribution of the high priestess. Ssythar had attempted to balance the scales in the melee between the two champions of light and dark by hitting Arun with his own enervation, but as the beam lanced out at him his holy avenger, seemingly of its own volition, cut into the path of the black ray and absorbed its dark energies.

“The priestess!” Thifirane hissed. “Destroy her!”

“Embril said she was to be taken alive,” Kyan said calmly, as she fired an arrow that knifed into the melee, hitting the paladin in the bicep of his weapon arm.

In the darkness, and with the elf turned away, she could not see the terrible look that crossed Thifirane Rhiavati’s face in that instant. Calling upon the full power of her magic, she brought her own power to the balance, defying her “superior” in the haphazard hierarchy of the Cagewrights.

Her second disintegrate found its target, highlighting Jenya Urikas in a green halo for a moment before the cleric was blasted into oblivion.

Chapter 405

Mole watched, wide-eyed, at the titanic struggle developing before her eyes. It was as if she was outside of her own body, a disembodied participant in a drama far beyond her, a legend being written down for bards to share around warm firesides in crowded common rooms on cold winter nights.

Only she was here, now, on a cold night, in a common room that was being destroyed around her. Her friends were still held by the balor’s power, helpless to do anything to affect their fate as they struggled for their lives. She felt her heart pound in her chest as Jenya had faced the balor, releasing along with the breath she’d been holding when she successfully banished it back to whence it had come.

But then another ambush had followed immediately upon the heels of the first, and Mole saw more enemies emerging from the forest, confident in their victory. She could hear the soft sounds of Cal’s chanting nearby, knew that her uncle was calling on his magic again, adding what he could to the fight. Yet she could only stand there, a mouse hiding in the shadows, surrounded by cats and dogs engaged in a bloody struggle for survival.

Still, a part of her marked each of the enemies, balanced the strengths and weaknesses that she could see, identified the spells they cast, the way they moved. Jenya’s holy word did not affect her, but she reveled in what it did to their enemies. But then the bad guys were coming again, delayed only momentarily by Cal’s illusion. Cal’s shadow-ally distracted the spellcasters in the jungle for a few moments, but then they destroyed it, too, and turned their attention back to the melee. Jenya got Arun on his feet, and then healed him when the enemy warrior had gotten a few good licks in against the virtually unarmored paladin.

All during that, she just stood there, watching. Her crossbow hung neglected at her side, her rapier dangled uselessly from the opposite hip. It was as if she'd forgotten how to move, how to do anything but suck in breaths made painful by the gathered smoke.

And then the enemy wizard disintegrated Jenya Urikas. Jenya, who'd been so welcoming to her and Zenna, when they'd just been strangers in a harsh, foreign city. Jenya, who had healed their wounds so many times, had protected them against the powers of their enemies. Jenya, who had given the people of Cauldron help when so much had been falling apart around them...

It was as if someone had thrown cold water in her face. Shaking, but able to move, the gnome darted out from her shelter, leaping out from the ruined frame of a window. Invisible, silent, she was swallowed up in the nearby undergrowth at the jungle fringe in a matter of seconds.

Arun, healed by Jenya, was holding out against Alurad Sorizan, but his situation was rapidly growing more dire. First, the effects of the high priestess's holy word were beginning to fade; out of the corner of his eye he could see the drow fighter coming forward again, moving faster as he shook of the lingering blindness effect of the spell, coming to his right around the melee, likely to establish a flanking position. That was bad enough, but they also had allies still concealed in the jungle fringe; he'd already taken one arrow to the shoulder and narrowly avoided several others, and one spell that he'd somehow blocked with his sword. He knew without looking that his friends were still helpless; he'd been hit with a blasphemy before and knew that it took several minutes to fight off the paralysis.

Several minutes may as well have been ten years.

Arun gritted his teeth. Jenya clearly did not have another remove paralysis spell at hand; for whatever reason she'd chosen to use it on him, so it was up to him to hold of the Cagewrights for as long as it took. So he gave ground before Alurad's assault, forcing the blackguard to follow, not allowing him to get set for a full attack. He did not see Jenya disintegrated, did not know just how alone he was. Another attack from the forest—a blast of ochre magic missiles that he absorbed once more with his sword. There were probably others that he didn't see—more than once, he felt a sudden icy touch upon his soul, which quickly faded as he fought off whatever it was that tried to affect him. More arrows, which found their way past Alurad as if they'd been launched in anticipation of the blackguard's movements, darting through Arun's defenses to score his flesh. Thus far he'd avoided a hit that would have crippled him, but it was only a matter of time before he was too slow, and one pierced something vital. But he also felt his reflexes suddenly increase, his limbs feeling light and agile, and he knew that Cal, at least, was still with him, aiding him from cover.

He'd just darted back from another powerful rush, calling upon Moradin's power to heal him, when the shadows around him came alive.

At first the paladin thought he was seeing things. But then a wisp of shadow wrapped around him, and he felt pain explode across his back, real pain. He lashed out at another shadow with his sword, but his sword passed through it; it had no substance, was no conjured monster or undead thing.

Arun was too veteran a fighter to let his guard down, but even so he nearly had his head taken off when Alurad leapt in, swinging his sword in a decapitating arc. Luckily he'd donned his helm when he'd hastily left his quarters, but even so he felt a ringing echo in his skull as he staggered back, briefly stunned.

But that pain was nothing compared to the agony that exploded through his side as a shadowy form appeared out of the darkness behind him, sinking a wedge of what felt like frozen death deep into his body.

Chapter 406

Arun felt death brush against his soul as the Cagewright shadar-kai Xokek backstabbed the paladin with his shadow dagger. The semi-substantial blade caressed the paladin's heart, urging it to cease its unflagging efforts, but the paladin marshaled his will, tearing himself away with a desperate cry. He yet drew breath, but the wound was nevertheless a serious one.

Now, surrounded by two foes who knew how to take advantage, Arun's situation had grown significantly more grim.

Cal experienced a similar sensation as a considerable section of ceiling collapsed onto the curving bar of The Lucky Monkey's common room, showering him with sparks and a rolling cloud of smoke that burned at his lungs as he struggled to draw breath. Thus far he'd remained in a fairly secure position, crouched beneath a heavy table close to the gaping opening created by the balor's rampage of destruction through the inn. Although the drifting smoke occasionally blocked his view, and he could not discern the enemies that he knew lurked in the nearby forest, he otherwise had a good view of the battlefield. Shrouded by greater invisibility, and protected by various other defensive magics, he was in a perfect position to provide covert magical support with his remaining spells and his considerable arsenal of magical wands.

But Arun was taking a pounding, the others remained helpless to intervene, and the collapse indicated that the security of his redoubt was rapidly becoming untenable.

When he saw the shadowy rogue appear behind the paladin and strike, he thought for a moment that it was all over; the thrust looked deadly. But Arun pulled away, clearly hurt, trying to reset his defenses against two nasty foes.

Cal had been holding a gambit in reserve, a spell that he'd doubted would have worked against the enemy warrior threatening Arun. But against a shifty wizard-rogue...

The gnome's stratagem proved effective a moment later, as the deadly shadar-kai darted behind Arun with incredible speed, his shadow dagger poised for another sneak attack.

Xokek suddenly staggered, his eyes widening as his body collapsed in upon itself, leaving behind another fat, bloated slug.

The drow Viirdran had been about to join the fray when he saw what had happened to his comrade. He bore little concern for the misanthropic Xokek, but he was worried about an enemy magic-user throwing around powerful spells. Scanning the interior of the ruined roadhouse, his keen eyes caught a hint of movement. Viirdran was much more than just a mere warrior, and a brief incantation brought a fireball that blossomed in the wreckage of the building, adding a new intensity to the already spreading fire. The blast also engulfed a few of the helpless enemy still scattered about from the balor's earlier antics, and caught up both the paladin and Alurad.

Viirdran grinned. A bit of friendly fire couldn't always be helped.

Just a few dozen feet away, the jungle remained relatively quiet in contrast to the violent battle raging in the ruined roadhouse. Ssythar let out a hiss of frustration as his latest enchantment—another slow spell—again failed to take hold upon the dwarven knight. He considered simply unleashing one of his favorite enchantments, the black tentacles, but he'd faced Alurad's ire before, and thus he was not quite so casual about engulfing his allies in area-effect spells. He glanced over at Thifirane and Kyan, but there didn't seem to be much in the way of effective destruction coming from that direction either. The yuan-ti clucked, considering other options...

He never had any warning. Pain exploded through his lower body, and as his legs buckled he fell forward, hands flailing at the surrounding brush in a futile effort to arrest his fall. A thought shouted in his mind... must escape! But his teleport spell was gone, permanently wiped from his mind by the trauma of being raised once from death to life.

This time, he wouldn't get a second chance. He still hadn't seen his attacker when something sharp tore into his throat, and the last thing he felt was his own hot blood spraying out from his severed jugular, and then... darkness.

Mole didn't even bother to clean her blade, vanishing back into the jungle.

Arun staggered back, not seeing the shadowy rogue that had stabbed him, unaware of Cal's intervention on his behalf. The fireball had washed over him, but even though it had overcome the resistance offered by his holy avenger, he hadn't been seriously injured by the flames.

After all, once you'd been dragged down into molten lava by a massive pyroclastic dragon, regular fire just didn't seem quite as imposing.

But the fact remained that despite the healing that Jenya had provided before her demise, and his own laying on hands, he was in bad shape. He'd taken hits from numerous sources: Alurad's sword, the backstab, arrows from the forest. Only the protection against magic provided from his sword had kept him from being blasted by several spells from the hidden casters in the jungle. And he couldn't keep running from Alurad; he'd seen the drow caster and knew that another enemy was on the way.

But as Arun gave way once again, luring the blackguard after him, Alurad suddenly stopped. Instead of chasing after Arun again, the Cagewright instead shifted a few steps to the side, broken masonry crunching under his heavy boots. Arun recognized his tactic even before he reached his destination: standing over the immobilized form of Lok. The genasi had been on guard duty, and so was clad in his adamantine armor, but that would be no protection against a coup de grace delivered from the blackguard.

Arun knew that the Cagewright was luring him into a full attack, but he had no choice. If he hesitated, Lok was dead. Lifting his holy sword, he roared out a challenge, and rushed at the deadly enemy warrior.

Meanwhile, behind the paladin, someone stirred in the rubble. Beorna, lying face-down in a pile of debris, extended a trembling hand, shaking with effort as she reached for the hilt of her sword.

Alurad smiled as the paladin fell for his ruse, rushing into the fray to save his crippled friend. As the dwarf drew near he smoothly reversed his blade from the killing stroke he'd intended for the fallen warrior, sliding into a ready stance to meet his enemy's charge. Arun saw it but kept on coming, his own weapon raised to strike.

A roar from the ruined common room drew Alurad's attention briefly to the side, nearly breaking his concentration. Something appeared from within the smoky interior, highlighted by the surrounding flames as it clawed its way to the edge of the field of rubble, leaping onto a fallen beam that gave it a clear view of the battlefield.

A silver dragon—not a big one, but a dangerous adversary nonetheless.

"The wizard's made his appearance," Kyan said, drawing another arrow from her quiver. Thus far she was not happy; she'd scored a number of hits on the paladin, even with the added challenge of having to shoot around that lumbering brute Alurad, but the heavy smoke swirling around the melee had caused her to miss twice.

She did not like missing.

"I see him," Thifirane said. The transmuter was equally unhappy with the progress of the battle thus far. Embril had not given her adequate time to refresh her spell selection after the battle with the planetar, and the paladin's spell resistance and innate durability had already thwarted her several times. But she had a little surprise in store for the wizard, and now that he'd finally shown himself, he would learn what it meant to earn the ire of Thifirane Rhiavati.

But even as she called to mind the trigger words for her resilient sphere spell, a growl from behind distracted her. She started to turn, only to stagger as something darted out from the brush, tangling itself in her legs. The once-noblewoman let out an undignified scream as she toppled to the ground in a heap. Something stabbed into her side as she fell, but her stoneskin still protected her, and she avoided serious injury.

"Shoot her!" Thifirane shrieked, finally identifying her attacker as the gnome rogue, Mole Calloran. She'd revealed herself prematurely to interrupt Thifirane's magical attack on her friends, and she would pay for that mistake, the wizard thought as she tried to kick free of the diminutive little wretch.

But in the next instant her attention became fully absorbed by the wolverine that leapt onto her head, tearing and scratching. With her stoneskin it could do little real harm, but it certainly made it difficult for her to focus her concentration.

Kyan snickered, taking pleasure in the ridiculous plight of the wizard, but the arcane archer nevertheless quickly backed off and started firing deadly arrows from her frost longbow. Mole moved like greased lightning, somehow dodging out of the way of the arrows, but still two shots grazed her, cutting gashes in her right arm and left leg, wounds that froze shut instantly as the arrows released their magic into her. She suffered more damage as Thifirane lifted a crystal wand and fired a salvo of four magic missiles into her, attacks that she could not avoid as they blasted painfully into her torso.

But Mole Calloran was not only sneaky and fast; she was also incredibly tough.

Arun charged forward, taking the hit from Alurad, and it hurt as much as he'd expected. His chain shirt was now little more than bloody tatters, and it barely hindered the sword that crunched into his side. The paladin dropped to one knee as fire exploded through his gut. Something vital had been hit, he knew, and he felt blood on his tongue as he coughed, sagging from the force of the blackguard's readied attack.

"Now it is time for you to die!" Alurad screeched, bringing his sword up to finish it.

Chapter 407

Arun knew he only had one more attack left in him, and as he unleashed it, he felt a power surge within him. In that heartbeat, a thousand miles away, the sacristans in the holy sanctuary of Moradin, deep within the Rift, uttered the blessing that marked the start of a new day. Arun had stood within that place when he'd uttered his vows of lifetime service to the Soul Forger, and ever since that day, that ritual, unseen and unheard by the exiled dwarf, had signaled the restoration of the powers granted to him by his patron.

He called upon that power now, and drawing in every last bit of it he smote Alurad Sorizan with the divine power of his god. The holy blade crushed armor plate and kept going, completing its circuit in a bloody path that bisected the blackguard's torso, emerging in a spray of hot blood that covered the surrounding debris.

For a moment the Cagewright looked down in surprise, then he was falling, his upper half clattering to the rubble a full second ahead of his lower.

Arun stood there, gasping in agonized breaths, his body slick with his own blood, barely clinging to consciousness. He awaited the last blow that would kill him—a common iron dagger would do it, now—and was vaguely surprised when it did not come.

He heard the drow yelling, and looked up to see a silver dragon—Cal, it had to be—swarming over it, biting and scratching. For all that Cal was no fighter, he seemed to be getting the better of his foe, at least for the moment. Then he heard a familiar voice, and turned to see a welcome sight.

Beorna looked as battered as he was; lying in the rubble, she'd been caught in a fireball and scorched by the flames that still ravaged the roadhouse. Her armor was blackened, and she still moved swiftly, fighting off the linger effects of the demon's earlier blasphemy. But she was no less beautiful to him for all that.

"By Helm, you look a sight," she said, coming over to him, channeling healing energy into him. She looked down at Alurad's two halves, and nodded in simple approval before turning back to him. "Well? What are you doing standing around here, when the battle rages on! You're not going to let a gnome finish off the foe?"

Arun grinned, and lifted his weapon.

Thifirane tried to get up, pulling away from the storm of fur and claws that was the wolverine, but she collapsed again as Mole tumbled through her legs and kicked the backs of her knees. The gnome was looking battered now, with an arrow stabbing through her shoulder in addition to the multiple impacts she'd already taken, but she fought on with an almost insane determination. As Thifirane fell the gnome stabbed her again with her magical dagger. Her stoneskin was holding, but Mole seemed to be able to find vulnerabilities even through the spell's protection, and the wizard felt another sharp pain twist her insides as something in her side gave way.

"Get her off of me!" Thifirane shouted, blasting the gnome with another volley of magic missiles that only seemed to drive her to a greater fury in her assault.

Even before he saw Alurad's demise, Viirdran was starting to think that the time was fast approaching for a quick withdrawal. He quickly recovered from the surprise of a small dragon leaping onto him, tearing and slashing with claws, wings, and bite. Small in a relative sense anyway; it was still bigger and heavier than he was. But he was fast, and still augmented with magic, and within a few moments he'd inflicted several wounds upon it with his adamantine rapier.

When he saw the two dwarves coming, he did not panic, spinning away from the dragon's continued assault while snapping a small globe at the two warriors. The bead of force exploded as it struck the ground at their feet, knocking them roughly back. The paladin was able to fall free, escaping the globe of force that resulted, but the woman was trapped inside, furiously but uselessly hacking at the sphere with her black sword.

The drow saw that the paladin got up only with difficulty, and for a moment he reconsidered; maybe this battle wasn't hopeless after all? No further help appeared to be forthcoming from the wreckage of the inn, and he thought he could take the dragon, which hadn't been as impressive as he'd first thought. But he glanced over his shoulder back at the forest fringe. No more arrows had been coming from there, and with his darksight he detected violent movements within the brush.

"Kyan!"

His decision made, the drow turned and dashed toward the wood.

“Die already, you little bitch!” Thifirane shouted, hurling a lightning bolt at the gnome as she crawled backwards, trying to get free. The gnome dodged the blast easily, but it slammed into the wolverine, vaporizing the little creature conjured from her bag of tricks.

Mole turned invisible—not a problem for Thifirane, who’d enchanted herself to see through that obscuration earlier—but then as another arrow from Kyan’s bow stabbed into her thigh she tumbled around the bole of a nearby tree, disappearing from view.

“That’s right, run away, you little pest! It won’t save you, or your friends!” Thifirane said, favoring her side as she pulled herself up against another tree.

“Time’s up for you, Thifirane,” came the return, from somewhere nearby.

“Thifirane, we’d better get out of here,” Kyan said. The elf looked back toward the roadhouse, where the polymorphed wizard was just dispelling the sphere holding Beorna. Viirdran was running toward them, with the paladin not far behind him.

“Behind you, my love!” Kyan cried, drawing her bow to fire. But the elf screamed as a tiny crossbow bolt slammed into her neck from behind, causing her show to go awry, bouncing harmlessly off the paladin’s shield.

“Taste the kiss of shadow, dwarf!” Viirdran said, spinning and releasing an enervation that blasted into Arun. But the elf had apparently not heeded the lesson learned earlier by Ssythar, for the paladin’s blazing sword intercepted the beam, dissolving it into nothingness.

Putting on a sudden and surprising burst of speed, Arun leapt forward, and unleashed his second smite of the day.

Viirdran screamed as the sword clove his torso, opening a great rent in his chest to reveal heart, lungs, and intestines, now a ruined mess. The drow screamed and collapsed, falling back onto the turf in a bloody heap.

Kyan screamed.

Standing over the remains of the drow, Arun started forward again. The paladin, covered in blood, looked more like some vengeful fiend than a holy knight, but the effect was the same. “You’re next, archer,” he said, blood spraying from his lips as he spoke.

Tears streaming down her eyes, not even feeling the pain from her injury, the elf just stood there, staring at the corpse of her beloved. But as Arun approached, she reached up and grasped an amulet dangling around her neck. “I will avenge you, my love! Our salvation awaits... in Carceri!”

And with that, she vanished in a cascade of streaming violet light.

Thifirane, too, had decided she'd had enough. She had another teleport ready to whisk her out of this charnel mess, but as she spoke the word of power to activate the spell, a small crossbow bolt shot out from high above, catching her in the left eye. Her stoneskin wasn't enough to save her from an agonizing wave of pain as the missile struck true, and she screamed, her spell lost, as she fell back against the trunk of the tree at her back.

Clawing at the bolt, mewling piteously, she never even saw the thrust that ended her life.

Arun withdrew his sword, his face twisted in a grimace of disgust as the limp form of the wizard collapsed in a heap. He and his companions had been victorious, but he only felt exhaustion, and it took a supreme effort of will not to lie down next to the body of the dead woman and slip into the depths of sleep.

Mole reappeared, dropping down easily from the branches twenty feet above, at the same time that Beorna stepped forward through the brush. "I think that's the last of them," the gnome said.

Arun looked down at her. "You did well, Mole," he said. "Thank you."

She met his gaze, and nodded, somberly.

"We must attend to the living," Beorna said. "Our friends are in danger, and some may yet live inside..."

They turned to the roadhouse, which was now a raging inferno. They could see Cal, still in dragon form, dragging their still-immobilized companions out of the wreckage, and they quickly moved to join him.

They had won, but the Cagewright assault had exacted a heavy cost. Thirty-seven people lost their lives in The Lucky Monkey, including several of the clerics of Helm, and the most senior of Arun's Hammers, Alowyn Tristane, who'd dared to stand before the balor with his spear. The ceiling of the roadhouse had collapsed upon him, and they only recovered charred remains.

Hodge too was dead, struck down by the balor's blasphemy.

And finally, Jenya Urikas, high priestess of Helm, was gone. Disintegrated by Thifirane Rhiavati, caught in the destruction of the roadhouse, they found only a few fragments of burned cloth, and her silver holy symbol, the only thing to survive the flames undamaged. Of the cleric herself, there was nothing, not even the bits of debris needed for a resurrection.

Morning came to the camp at the edge of the Forest of Mir, and with it the flames that consumed the roadhouse died, leaving only a charred reminder of the power of the enemy.

Chapter 408

It was late in the morning, not far off from noon, when the companions gathered around a makeshift table in one of the shelters. The mood was grim. Spread across the table was a map of the region, and some of the items they'd taken off of the Cagewrights they'd killed the night before. Prominent was the cluster of four magical rings, marked with the sigil of the Thirteen.

"We don't even know that they're still there," Benzan said. "Like as not, Shatterhorn is an empty shell—except for deadly traps."

"We need to make certain," Cal said. "And Dana's divination seems to indicate that we must return there."

"As always, the gods were vague in their directions," Benzan countered. Several of the others nodded; the spell had been rather more ambiguous than usual, offering only the following information:

*Madness caged, the Cagewrights rage
While pieces on a chessboard shift
The theurge plots, lest all be naught
Waiting for a worthwhile gift
In shattered spire, yet still aspire
Her caged lord to yet uplift*

"I heard one of them say something about Carceri," Mole said. Arun nodded; he'd heard Kyan Winterstrike's last words as well.

"We have to consider anything they tell us—intentional or no—as a possible trap," Dannel said.

"Dana?" Cal asked.

The priestess looked haggard as she started, looking up from the far side of the table. "Shatterhorn is still secure from divination, at least inside the complex. The guards are still there, on the outside."

"Too bad we couldn't extract any information from the shadar-kai," Dannel said. At Dana's look, he hastily added, "I do not mean any criticism, priestess. The man was clearly insane." They'd hoped to repeat their success with Nulin Wiejeron, and gain more information from their prisoner. This time Lok and Arun had been poised to seize their captive's arms and legs, while Benzan was kept at a discreet distance. Dana had stood ready to counterspell any magic he might attempt. But when Cal had dispelled his polymorph the fey had spoken a simple word, "Shadak", and simply vanished before Dana could even react. Cal had believed that the shadar-kai rogue had possessed an item that had allowed him to plane shift to a predetermined location; they'd found something similar on the corpse of the drow eldrich knight. The whole episode had only added to the strain each of them already felt.

"We should have just dropped him into a bucket of salt and been done with it," Benzan had noted afterward.

"What of your other query, Dana?" Cal prodded.

The priestess again lifted her head, pulling back her tangled hair with a hand that still bore some flecks of dried blood. "Nothing useful," she said. "The man is as insane in death as he was in life." She was referring to her attempt to speak with dead on Alurad Sorizan, which had not been successful. "I think he believed that he was Adimarchus."

"How these people can be so mad and yet so effective is a puzzle," Dannel said.

"Someone else pulls their strings," Beorna growled.

"Yes," Cal admitted. "We will not be truly done with them, I fear, until Adimarchus is dealt with."

"Someone who can summon a balor will not be easy to deal with," Benzan said.

"We have our own allies," Dannel pointed out.

"No," Dana said, gripping the table. "No, I will not summon another celestial this day. Already I am responsible for the destruction of several..."

"Dana, our cause..." Cal began.

"No, Cal, I am resolute. Summonings is one matter; the essence of the being is preserved. But I will not call another entity to this plane, merely to serve as fodder. No, Benzan, do not say it. I've made up my mind."

"I understand your decision," Benzan said. He looked at the others. "And you others may not know that those callings drain the caster as well. I know that Dana will not use that as her reason, but you should know."

"We will fight with what we have," Arun said, simply.

"And this time, I will be at your side," Beorna said, as if defying him to deny her words.

"What of Hodge?" Mole asked.

"He will remain," Arun said. Dana had raised the fallen dwarf earlier, but although healthy, it was clear that the doughty warrior was greatly diminished by his recent and repeated paths across the boundaries between realities. Arun met Dana's gaze; the two had agreed that Dana would use her charm abilities, if necessary, to ensure that Arun's cohort remained behind with the refugees this time.

"I need but a little more time to finish replenishing my spells," Cal said. "Are there any other questions?"

There were none, only a shared look of fierce determination. They were committed, only more so after the disaster of last night, and would see this to its conclusion, for better or for ill.

Chapter 409

On their second visit, Shatterhorn did not put up much resistance, not at first.

They teleported into the same chamber that they had left, just a little more than twenty-four hours previous. They were alert for any ambush, trap, or even an all-out assault by the remaining forces of the Cagewrights. But the chamber was empty, dark, silent. Someone or something had cleared away the bodies of the medusae, leaving only ugly red splotches on the stone floor that stank of corruption.

They continued onward down the pillared hall, deeper into the old yuan-ti stronghold. Mole, back with Benzan in the van, detected a trap through virtue of her gnomish nose. While nearing the bend in the tunnel that Benzan had reported on their last visit, she recognized the familiar stench of demodands. She alerted Cal, who sensed for magic, detecting that a portion of the north wall was shrouded by an illusion. The image covered a slot barely the size of an arrow slit, and behind it lay a farastu that was quite displeased at being detected. It operated a pit that blocked the entire width of the tunnel, but Mole's warning had given them sufficient alarm, and only Benzan was over the ten-foot gap when the trap doors fell open. The trap was a nasty one, with the pit lined with ugly iron blades attached to revolving stone cylinders, but Benzan was able to leap away before gravity took its inevitable course.

Dealing with the demodand was problematic, with it relatively secure behind the arrow slit, but Dannel found a secret door nearby that offered access to its sanctuary, and the fiend was swiftly dispatched.

Bypassing the pit, the companions pressed on, watchful for another trap. They entered a large chamber that was currently empty, and after a brief search continued further onward. The long hall split at its end, opening onto a grim chamber with a décor that suggested it had served as the lair of one of the Cagewrights. They did not linger long, scanning the chair covered in human hide, the jaws containing humanoid hearts soaked in brine, an iron chest with claws for feet, and other unpleasantries. The chest revealed its secrets to Mole's new chime of opening, and they discovered a considerable cache of magical weapons that were promptly wrapped and carefully stored in their assorted extradimensional containers.

They were not here to loot, however, so it was not long before they were continuing on, deeper into the stronghold. The fact that the Cagewrights had left a considerable cache of magical items essentially unguarded suggested that perhaps they had indeed abandoned the complex. But they would not stop until they had completed their search, so they returned to the hall and took the other passage into another pillared chamber.

"There is evil in this place," Arun intoned, before they had covered five steps.

The companions readied weapons and spells, just as a creak of metal proved the paladin right, and a pair of heavily armored warriors stepped out of illusory pillars in the center of the chamber.

It took only one good look to confirm that these weren't ordinary adversaries. They looked like half-orcs, but the iron plates that covered their bodies appeared to have been grated directly onto their frames, rather than attached to a suit of armor. Their eyes, deep within the cavernous interior of full helms, were cold and empty, and they carried massive shields with one hand, and axes of familiar black adamantine in the other.

They immediately lifted their weapons and charged into battle.

Chapter 410

"Let them have it!" Benzan urged, putting his own words into action as he lifted his bow and fired at the half-golem warriors. His shot was accurate but glanced harmlessly off a steel plate; given the amount of metal grafted to their bodies, it was almost impossible to tell where the golem ended and the living creature began.

Lok and Arun both tried to overcome that difficulty by the simple expedient of inflicting massive damage upon the enemy warriors. Both scored powerful hits, although the armor of the golem men diminished the effects of their assault. Beorna, however, had no such difficulty, her adamantine sword delivering a crushing blow to the solar plexus of one of the armored warriors.

Dana blasted one with a beam of searing light, but the ray had no effect.

"Immune to magic!" Cal warned. Realizing that his own spells would not harm the things, he instead bolstered his allies with a haste spell. Mole got around the creatures easily and attacked one from behind, although they proved as immune to her sneak attacks as they were to the spellcasters' magic.

The golems clanked and quivered before releasing gouts of sick yellow vapors in a spread directly before them. The toxin engulfed the warriors, although their fortitude was such that they were able to shrug off the worst effects. Benzan, unfortunately, had been standing too close when he'd fired his last arrow, and he sucked in a mouthful of the stuff. He staggered back, coughing.

Dannel fired his own bow into the nearest half-golem, not expecting much in the way of results. To his surprise, the missile shot off a spray of sparks as it hit, and the creature stiffened, noticeably affected by the shot.

"Your bow, Dannel!" Cal exclaimed. "They're like iron golems... electricity slows them!"

The elf nodded, and promptly shifted his aim to the second creature, affecting it as well. But even without that impact, the outcome of the melee was a foreordained conclusion. One of the half-golems managed to deliver a punishing blow that injured Beorna, but that was all they could do before the warriors hacked them to pieces. When it was over, there was very little blood, only heaps of bent metal and crumpled limbs.

“Let’s move on,” Arun said.

They passed several apparently empty rooms, and found themselves in a passage that opened onto a broad chamber. The passage deposited them onto a ledge ten feet above the level of the chamber floor, with curving stairs to either side that linked the room and passage. The place was a jumbled mess of debris, and a strong odor that combined blood, farastu slime, and some other acrid stench filled the place. In the center of the room was a large pedestal upon which the remains of some sort of statue or stone object stood, and fragments of rock littered the floor, possibly all that was left of whatever it had been. Pillars lined the wall, forming small galleries to the sides and rear of the chamber.

“Looks like a battle happened here,” Benzan said, as they carefully descended the stairs into the room.

“Arun?” Cal asked.

“Nothing active. But there’s a strong lingering aura of Taint here.”

“I’m sensing the same thing, with regards to magic. Okay, spread out, everyone, and search, but stay alert.”

Benzan was the one to find it, this time; a hidden door concealed within one of the pillars near the back of the room. The door opened easily on recessed hinges, revealing a ladder leading up.

“Don’t like the looks of that,” Dannel said. “Too narrow; if there’s something waiting up there, you’re screwed.”

“If one of you can scout it out and tell me how far it goes up, I can dimension door the fighters up with me,” Dana said.

“I’ll go,” Mole said.

“Are you sure, Clarese?” Cal asked.

The younger gnome smiled. “Sure. And don’t forget, I can always ‘poof’ out if it’s a trap.” She flourished her magical cloak, and turned toward the shaft.

“Shout down how far you’ve gone, and we’ll be ready to join you in a flash if needed,” Dana said. She gestured to Arun, Beorna, and Lok, who joined her at her side.

But nothing terrible happened to the gnome as she quickly ascended the shaft. Dannel stood beside the opening, watching her progress. “She says that there’s another door about twenty feet up,” the elf reported to the others. “I’ll go up after her.”

“Cal, Benzan... I can take all of you,” Dana said.

“Twenty feet, directly above you,” the elf’s voice came down from the shaft opening.
“There’s a room... come now!”

Dana spoke the word of her spell, and she and the others were instantly transported twenty feet directly upward.

They found themselves in another chamber, smaller than the one they’d just left. The door to the shaft was open behind them, although there was no sign of Mole. A summoning diagram was etched onto the floor, empty, although the companions could guess as to its most recent occupant.

On the far side of the diagram, a stone bier stood before a row of pillars. Laying on the bier was a supine woman, clad in a flowing red robe draped suggestively over her voluptuous frame, apparently unconscious. Standing over her was a strange creature, a lean humanoid with utterly alien features, huge black eyes that revealed no emotion, and six long arms that ended in slender, multijointed fingers. It did not react as they entered, although its hands moved in soft, languorous motions, interweaving in an almost hypnotic movement.

“What in the hells is that?” Benzan exclaimed. He and the others held their weapons ready, but as the strange creature did not immediately threaten them, they held their attack.

“The creatures we found at Karran-Kurral, in the crystal blocks,” Dannel observed.

“I... I do not sense...” Arun said, swaying slightly, clutching his head.

“What is it?” Dana said, turning to the paladin in alarm.

Beorna lifted her adamantite sword. “Whatever you are, creature, we want answers, and right now! Who is that woman, and what have you done to her? Where are the Cagewrights?”

The entity did not reply, but suddenly Benzan lowered his bow, and walked forward.

“Ware the diagram, Benzan!” Cal shouted, but the tiefling merely walked through the circle, his boots smearing the silver lines that demarked its influence.

“Benzan?” Lok asked, perhaps sensing that something was wrong.

“What are you doing?” Dannel added, as the tiefling approached the bier, but Benzan did not respond. The six-armed creature still did nothing threatening, covered by their readied spells and missile weapons. It held something in two of its arms, close against its lower torso; a disk of metal perhaps a foot across that looked to be a different color from one moment to the next, depending upon the angle by which one viewed it.

Dana immediately turned away from Arun and rushed after her husband, but she was caught up short as a wall of force sprang into being between the bier and the companions, bisecting the room.

“Benzan!” Dana yelled, slamming the barrier with her fists.

The tiefling did not respond, coming to stand directly in front of the bier and its unmoving occupant, the six-armed creature looming over it with an unreadable look in its dark eyes.

“Cal! The wall!” Dana cried. But the gnome had already started casting his spell, summoning magic to disintegrate the barrier.

The six-armed creature handed something to Benzan. A green ray sprang from Cal’s hands, striking the wall of force, and the shimmering plane vanished. Benzan reached down, picking up the unconscious woman, holding her in his arms.

Dana charged forward, the warriors only a step behind. But before they could reach their friend, Benzan turned to face them, uttered the words of a spell, and disappeared.

“Benzan!”

Chapter 411

“What have you done with him!” Dana exclaimed, shouting at the still-inscrutable creature standing over the empty bier.

The creature’s response was to start waving all six of its arms, two still holding the odd metal sphere, in a complex weave of gestures. That was enough for the rest of the companions, who unleashed an all-out attack upon it. Dannel’s first shot caught it solidly on the shoulder, but it showed no pain, or in fact any reaction at all, continuing its arcane perambulations. The warriors charged at it, but even as they rushed across the chamber floor, further smearing the ruined summoning circle with the heavy tread of their boots, the spellweaver took a step back and conjured another wall of force that partitioned itself and the back fraction of the chamber apart from the rest, where the companions stood.

The two dwarves and the genasi came to an abrupt halt before the translucent barrier. On the far side, they could see the creature already moving its many hands in more spellcasting gestures. Beorna smashed her adamantite sword against the barrier, but no one was surprised when the blade merely rebounded without effect.

“We’ve got to get through!” Arun exclaimed. The warriors turned to Cal, but they already knew that the gnome generally only carried a single disintegrate spell.

Cal’s brows furrowed in a mix of consternation and intense concentration. The creature’s ability to rapid-cast spells was impressive, and without even knowing the full span of its arsenal he sensed that they were in for a tough fight. But he also noticed something else, which he quickly pointed out to his companions.

“Above!” he shouted, pointing toward the ceiling. And indeed they could all see what the gnome had detected, that this time the wall of force did not extend all the way to the ceiling above, twenty feet above the thick stone blocks of the floor. Whether by intent or accident, the enemy caster had left a gap of about four feet at the top of its wall.

Dana quickly cast a fly spell, leaping into the air even as the spellweaver protected itself with a barrage of mirror images and the surging nimbus of blue flame of a fire shield spell. Both spells were cast nearly simultaneously, and the odd creature immediately launched into a new wave of spells, its many hands conducting the somatic components of multiple spells at once. Still it had not spoken, and it had to be triggering the vocal component of its magic through some alternative, elder lore that was unique to its race.

Mole's thoughts were along those lines as she watched the creature from behind one of the pillars in the back of the room. Forgotten by everyone, including (hopefully) the spellweaver, she'd slipped around the side of the room to the rear moments before it had brought up its second wall of force. Now, essentially alone with it, she steeled herself to do what had to be done.

With a normal wizard, she would have tried to time her attack to spoil its latest spell. But this... thing seemed to be drawing magic in a constant surge, without interruption. She was invisible, of course, and she trusted to that and her exceptional talents for stealth to keep her from being detected as she came up behind it. It was facing half-away from her, so it shouldn't be too difficult

Except that as soon as she stepped from cover, the creature immediately turned, fixing her with those dark, emotionless eyes.

The hard way, then, she thought, running straight at it. The creature seemed to be ignoring her, continuing its spellcasting. She'd intended to spring up into a surprise leap at the end of her charge, catching it off guard, but on her last stride her foot landed on a broken piece of crockery, throwing off her charge. She still managed to recover and came out of her flip with her knife stabbing at its throat, but instead of puncturing its larynx as she'd intended, the blade merely scratched its chest just below the left shoulder. She kicked off it, landing back on her feet five feet away. Her entire arm felt numb, and her dagger was covered with frost, the backblast from striking its fire shield.

Should have used your crossbow! she said to herself, knowing that she'd probably just earned something very unpleasant from the alien caster.

But the spellweaver merely continued infusing itself with magic.

"Mole, get back!" Dana urged, as she cleared the top of the wall of force. The gnome backflipped out of the path of the priestess's flame strike, which spiraled down out from above into the spellweaver. The creature merely absorbed the force of the divine blast, its shield protecting it from some of the damage. As the flames cleared, revealing the scorched but still hale body of the creature, it made an intricate gesture with four of its hands, directing a spell at its attacker.

"Ooof!" Dana grunted, as a huge transparent hand appeared from thin air and slammed into her, catching her up and driving her across the room. The hand was far stronger than she was, and she was pushed roughly backward until she was slammed roughly against the wall in the nearest corner, more than twenty feet away, and no longer in the line of sight of the spellweaver. She struggled against the hand, but it simply held her there, resisting her every effort to break free.

Dannel could only watch as his companions engaged the creature. “If only I still had my magic slippers!” he exclaimed.

He’d only been speaking to himself, but Cal, standing adjacent, heard him. “If mobility is what you need, I can assist,” the gnome said. “Eat this!” he commanded, presenting a small wrapping from his pouch. The elf took it, observing that it moved slightly. He was familiar with the spider climb spell, so he did as was directed, while Cal infused magic into him.

As Dannel ran off toward the nearest wall close to the translucent barrier, Cal walked forward to join the warriors. They had confronted the barrier with their own tactics. Arun had spent some moments in concentration, summoning his celestial mount, the giant lizard Clinger. The creature appeared and instantly divined the needs of its master, waiting for the paladin to strap himself in before it started toward the nearest wall. Beorna, meanwhile, had called upon the power of Helm to enlarge herself, doubling her size to just over eight feet tall. She quickly grabbed Lok, lifting him toward the top of the wall.

“Gods, man, you are heavy!” she grunted, even her augmented strength barely enough to lift the genasi—or more exactly, the incredible weight of his arms and armor. Lok tossed his shield aside, but even with Beorna’s boost, the top of the wall was still several feet above his reach.

Mole was relieved that she’d been spared an attack, especially after seeing what it had done to Dana, but at the same time she felt a bit insulted that it was simply ignoring her. But why not? Without being able to sneak attack, her little weapons just weren’t very effective; and it didn’t look like it was going to fall for any of her feints or special moves.

Of course, it didn’t know about all her surprises, she thought, reaching into her bag of tricks. She threw the little furry ball through the creature’s feet, and as it grew into a creature—a big wolf, this time—she moved forward to flank it.

Cal, meanwhile, reached out to touch Beorna’s leg, intending to teleport both her and Lok with him to the far side of the wall of force. But the spellweaver lifted off the ground, avoiding Mole’s clever plan as it flew up to the ceiling, close to its conjured barrier. The maneuver opened it to Dannel’s line of fire, and the elf immediately let fly with an arrow that drew a violet gash across one of its forearms.

But the spellweaver survived the hit, and unleashed its own surprise: a horrid wilting.

The spell had a devastating effect, sucking moisture from the bodies of the heroes. The potency of the spellweaver’s magic was incredible, and only Beorna was able to resist it, using the mettle granted her by Helm’s patronage to avoid the power of the spell. Dannel collapsed, gasping as his desiccated lungs struggled to absorb air, and Cal likewise crumpled in a shivering heap. Clinger, halfway up the wall, collapsed, dropping Arun painfully to the ground, the paladin likewise severely affected. Only Mole, by virtue of being on the far side of the wall of force escaped the effect of the spell.

Lok had avoided the worst of the spell through his considerable fortitude, but his skin looked stretched over his bones as he looked down at Beorna. Even with Beorna's boost, the spellweaver was still a good eight feet above him. "Hurl me up!" he shouted.

Beorna nodded, although she could barely lift the man, let alone utilize him as a projectile. But she focused her will, drawing upon the strength of Helm to infuse her muscles with potency, and with a roar literally pushed the genasi up toward the enemy.

The spellweaver drew back from its magical rampart, but not fast enough as the genasi's free left hand closed upon the top of the barrier. Lok's strength and the impetus from Beorna's push carried him up and over, hanging there just long enough for him to bring his axe down in a deadly arc that coincided with the exact center of the spellweaver's skull. There was a reverberation that echoed through the chamber, as the axe unleashed its thundering power upon impact.

Fifteen feet below, Mole had to get out of the way in a hurry, before the bloody carcass of the spellweaver landed with a heavy splat at her feet.

Chapter 412

The sky above was a blasted expanse of ugly reds and sickly browns, the landscape below an equally mottled collection of malevolent color and hostile terrain. Occasionally flashes would shatter the landscape across a far horizon, yet it never seemed to actually rain. Rain would have been welcome, something to cleanse this horrid scenery. Foul odors assailed the nostrils of any traveler, and the only music that carried over the wind was the screams of suffering and harsh laughter evoked at the suffering of others. Signs of organized settlement were few and far between, mostly ugly citadels atop isolated bluffs, and fortresses ringed with high battlements surmounted by spikes and tangles of sharp wire.

This was Carceri, the Prison Plane, a place of suffering and blight.

Benzan trudged through a mire that clung to his boots with each step, releasing his foot only reluctantly with a sickly slurping sound. He still carried the limp figure of Embril Aloustinai in his arms, and he was careful to keep her trailing robe clear of the mud that seemed to coat every exposed surface in this place.

After a time, he came to a small rise, and found a fairly flat stretch of ground covered by sharp tufts of red grass. Spreading his cloak upon the ground, he carefully laid his burden down upon it. He ran his hands over her body—not lasciviously, but with purpose, finding a gleaming gem nestled carefully in the folds of her garment.

He took up the gem, and looked at it. In the ruddy light it seemed to gleam with a crimson tint like fresh blood. The light flickered slightly, as if it were a candle's flame frozen in the mineral lattice of the stone.

He smiled.

“You shall be the tool that earns the final freedom of my Master,” he said. “Graz’zt wants you badly, oh, yes, he does...”

He laughed, a sinister laugh that wasn’t his own. Placing the gem in his pouch, he bent down and picked up the woman again, and started out once more across the blasted landscape of Carceri.

THE END OF “STRIKE ON SHATTERHORN”

Book XI: “Asylum”

Begun 5-9-05

Chapter 413

Dana Ilgarten walked through the long grass, the night wind blowing her hair and her cloak out behind her as she walked. Fat drops of rain struck her face, cold, hard. Mud squished between her toes; this rain was only the last of a series of storms that had struck the region, and more would be coming, if what her senses told her on the wind were true.

She was clad only in the long silvery sheen of her mooncloak, and carried no weapon or other gear, other than the milky white icon at her throat, the moon mote that, like the cloak, was born of the sacred moonfire of Selûne. It was cold here, far colder than it had been in the south, and it would not be unheard of for snow to come with one of the later storms. She had warded herself against the cold, but even so barely noticed the weather, so immersed she was in her own thoughts and feelings.

On this rainy night, it was as if she was utterly alone in the world.

That was not true, she knew. This world was full of living things, many of which wanted to hurt her. And there were other worlds that touched this one as well, places of darkness and horror and blight. In many ways she was a fool to be here, alone, vulnerable. She should have remained in her quarters, secure within the radius of Cal’s private sanctum. Hiding under her bed, perhaps.

She spat out a curse—one of the ones she’d learned from Benzan. Self-pity was not becoming. But nor could her anger at herself obviate the great rent she felt inside herself, a pain that nothing could fill.

She came to a squat crag that jutted out from the meadow, little more than a collection of boulders that had probably sat here for generations, absorbing sun, wind, and rain with equal equanimity. It was a place she knew well. Moss grew on the ancient stones, and mud slicked everything in sight, but she did not hesitate, scaling the boulders to the small flat space atop the tor, fifteen feet above the waving grass below.

Here the full force of the storm battered her, as if indignant that this puny mortal creature would dare to challenge its rights here. No, it seemed to say, in each gust of wind, each gust of rain, you belong in a shelter, beside a warm fire or under a thick quilt. Begone from this place! You do not belong!

Dana ignored the wind and the rain. She knelt, welcoming the hardness of the stone beneath her knees. It helped to distract her from the pain.

But her mind could not be so easily distracted. It traveled back, over a conversation earlier that day.

"Dana, are you all right?"

She looked up at the warm eyes that were filled with concern. The feeling there was not easy to find, surrounded by such a harsh exterior, but Dana had known Lok for many years, knew him perhaps as well as anyone, better even than his own people.

She could not speak. She turned away, looking down at the objects she'd laid down in the matted grass at her feet.

Lok recognized them as her bracers, the ones that she'd worn into battles for years now, the ones she'd worn earlier that day, on their second invasion of Shatterhorn. Blessed of the goddess, sacred product of the moonfire, like her cloak and amulet.

"I do not understand."

Of course you do not, my friend... how can you know, my failure... Go away, she willed, not wanting to expose her frame before her friend. He would not judge her but that did not matter; she had already judged herself, and despite all her vaunted wisdom, despite knowing that she was wrong, it did not help.

He was not going away. He was standing there, looking down at her... It would have been easier with Cal. But the gnome was gone, seeking aid for their cause.

She looked up at Lok, forced herself to meet those deep gray eyes.

"I could have saved him," she said.

"We did everything we could," Lok replied.

"No. I could have saved him," she repeated. With these," she added, kicking the bracers with a foot, as if the inanimate metal could feel her ire. "They grant the power to dimension door. I should have gone right through the wall of force, not waited for Cal, not turned to him... I should have gone right through, and stopped her from taking him..."

Lok shook his head. Lok, always the quiet one, despite his deadly presence on the battlefield, quiet... who nevertheless saw so much. "That spell-creature would have killed you. We would not have been able to help you in time, you would have been alone on the far side of the wall, and it would have killed you. It would have accomplished nothing."

She knew the words to be true, her gods-damned wisdom saw that, saw even without that infernal periapt that sharpened her will, turned her insight into a dagger that cut both ways. But knowing the truth and knowing the truth could be different things...

She shook and quivered, weak, crying, mewling with the pain that she could not hide, not from her closest friends, not from herself. First Delem... then her father... now, the man that she loved, taken from her.

She would fight. She would rage and those who had taken him would know fear. Yes, that would come. But for now, as she felt rough, strong arms encircle her, she knew that for now, the best thing would be to let the grief out.

Now she was alone, in the wind and the rain. The others would have come... Cal would have insisted, in fact. She'd made the decision for them when she'd dimension doored out of the camp, using the bracers that had betrayed her before. Or had she betrayed them? The goddess provided the power, but it was up to the wearer to use them properly, to further Her goals.

The night was dark, with little moonlight making its way through the storm clouds banking the sky above. It did not matter; Selûne was there, and her follower could feel Her presence.

Dana slid out of the cloak, exposed herself to the storm. Her skin seemed pale white, too white, in the faint light that penetrated the storm. The sigil at her throat seemed to glow with its own opalescent fire, the light of the moon reflected here upon the earth.

She opened her mind. It was not easy; even with decades of prayer, reaching the necessary equilibrium did not come easily this night. But her patron offered solace as well as power, and finally she succumbed to that familiar embrace.

On some nights she had remained in that blissful exchange for almost the entire night, stirring only with the setting of the moon in advance of the rising of the new day's sun. But this night she had a purpose, and Selûne granted the power she needed.

Completing her prayers, she opened her mind once more, and began the casting of a powerful spell.

Chapter 414

Despite his darkvision, Arun was nevertheless startled when Dana appeared out of the storm, approximately an hour later. Each thought that the other looked tired and disheveled; neither had gotten much sleep in the last twenty-four hours. Neither spoke, the paladin escorting the priestess into the fortified tower that they'd chosen as their new base of operations before returning to his vigil. The templar, Beorna, was still likely atop the tower, the two dwarves alert for another assault from their enemies.

Following the disaster at the Lucky Monkey, they'd shifted their headquarters to a small rural community in the Western Heartlands, at a crossroads in the sparsely-populated region known as the Fields of the Dead. This site was an ideal target for the teleport spells of Cal and Dana, for it had been their home for many years. The settlement had been founded by Cal and Lok following their return from the Abyss almost twenty years ago, and since then had grown into a considerable town with over a thousand permanent residents. The region was still rather unsettled, and so a twenty foot high wall of real stone surrounded the place, with watchers who patrolled its length at all times of day and night alert to dangers that might threaten from without. A slender tower fifty feet tall was the most distinctive feature. The structure looked sleek and almost unnatural, as if crafted by a sculptor from a single block of stone. In some ways it had; urdunnir from Lok's home in the North had participated in its construction. It was commonly known as "Travelers' Rest," although the town proper was named Ember Vale.

Both the paladin and Beorna had expressed concern about "abandoning" the refugees from Cauldron. But Cal had responded with irrefutable logic; their enemies were interested primarily in seeking them out, not with inflicting further harm on the unfortunate survivors of the volcano city. The victims at The Lucky Monkey had been collateral damage, and their presence at the refugee camp would only have encouraged additional attacks.

Of course, even here, over a thousand miles from Cauldron, they were not wholly secure. But even before they had come to the aid of the people of the shackled city the Travelers had earned a number of enemies, and in the course of the construction of the tower both Cal and Dana had infused it with a number of magical protections. The place was secure against scrying and other forms of magical detection, and was further hallowed with an enchantment that prevented magical teleportation into the citadel. One of the improvements made by the urdunnir was the excavation of a secure chamber deep under the place, lined with many feet of solid stone, just outside of the hallow's effect. This place, secured from the remainder of the stronghold both by heavy mundane portals and numerous glyphs and wards, allowed the veteran adventurers to enter and exit the place conveniently by magical means as necessary.

Dana stepped through the foyer—also fortified against assault—and into the richly apportioned great room that took up much of the first floor of the tower. The place was maybe thirty feet square, but it had the look of an intimate study. Plush armchairs lined the walls adjacent to numerous bookshelves packed with volumes. A small fireplace added a merry glow to the place, augmented by a half-dozen brass lamps that contained continual flames, now shuttered in the deep of the night. A worn table that had clearly seen many years of use occupied the center of the room; a forgotten tea service still lay upon it at one end.

There was one occupant in the chamber. Dannel was sitting in one of the chairs near the fire, one of Cal's books laid open in his lap. The elf had not unshuttered the lamps, using only the firelight to read. The flames shone on his narrow features, glimmering in the dark eyes that looked up as she entered.

"Have Cal and Mole returned?" she asked.

“No,” Dannel said, rising. He raised an eyebrow at her disheveled, soaked condition, the streaks of mud covering her feet, legs, and hands. He brought a blanket from the back of a nearby chair and laid it over her as she sat down in the chair on the far side of the hearth. “I imagine that they remained overnight, so that Cal could recover his teleportation spells.”

Dana nodded, expecting as much. Despite the burning need to act that filled her, the chair seemed to embrace her, luring her into sleep. Shaking her head, she forced herself to remain alert. Thoughts of Benzan, and what might be happening to him even now, helped her in that regard. She doubted if sleep would be welcome, right now, with the dreams that would surely come.

Dannel noticed her agitation. “What did you find out?”

Dana did not look up from watching the fire. “He is being held at the asylum of Skullrot, on the prison plane of Carceri.”

“Do you know the location of this place?”

Dana shook her head, suddenly weary again. At that moment she looked older than he’d ever seen her, the elf thought. “I attempted a commune, immediately after discerning his location. I wasn’t able to get much information. Apparently there is some sort of magical veil over the place, clouding its location, and any information about anyone or anything within. I could learn nothing about Benzan, except that he is there.”

“Hidden even from the gods?”

“I suspect that whatever enchantment wards the place is more masking my spell than their knowledge,” she admitted. “Cal would know better, I think.”

“What were you able to learn?”

She did then finally look up at him. “That Adimarchus is exerting a greater influence outside his prison.”

“It’s clear that he was driving the Cagewrights, and their madness, at least,” the elf noted.

“I asked if he would be able to escape his bondage, if we did nothing to intervene.”

“And?”

“There was a long pause. At first I thought that the spell had been broken... but then I got my answer. Yes.”

“Predicting the future is never a sure business, even for the gods,” Dannel reminded her.

“Were your researches able to offer any insight?” Dana asked, indicating the small stack of books on the end table beside Dannel’s chair.

Dannel nodded. "I wasn't able to find many references to Adimarchus in the literature on the planes." The elf indicated the handful of books from Cal's library that he'd been reading. "He was an angel that led a revolt in Celestia, as Wiejeron told us. The sources are unclear as to his status in the hierarchy of the greater fiends, but he was likely not short of the status of prince, and may have even been analogous to a demigod. He is said to have ruled an Abyssal layer, but was betrayed by one he thought to be an ally."

"Occipitus."

"Indeed."

"If Adimarchus does escape, then your friend there may be in trouble."

"Sending him a message may be difficult. I don't even know how we'd get back there. Kaurophon brought us over, on our last visit."

"You'd need to obtain the right focus, in order to facilitate a plane shift. But we have a more immediate destination."

Dannel nodded. "Skullrot, on Carceri. But how will we get there?"

"Cal believes that the amulet that we took from the drow is a planar transportation device, keyed to Carceri. I can use it as a focus for my plane shift, and bring up to eight of us across. As for finding Skullrot... we'll have to search once we arrive. Someone there has to know where it is located."

"So just grab a passing fiend, and beat the information out of it?"

Her gaze turned icy. "We will find a way. We have no other options. If you prefer, you can return to Cauldron, and we will handle this matter."

"That is not what I meant, Dana. We are together, all of us... Mole, Arun... likely Beorna as well, although I have not spoken to her on the matter. But you saved us, saved Cauldron from destruction, and prevented a planar apocalypse. We will not forget Benzan, do not fear."

Dana lowered her head, rubbed her eyes with the palms of her hand. "I know, Dannel. You have been a great help... I... I know that you have suffered a loss as well."

"I loved her," Dannel said simply.

She reached out and took his hand. "I know."

After a long moment, he spoke again. "Do you think that we will find Adimarchus there as well?"

"I do not know. Benzan is there, and that is all I need to know."

"You need to get some rest, Dana. I can prepare a draught, if you like, to help you sleep."

“No, that won’t be necessary. I’m not a total fool, Dannel.”

“No one who knew you at all would say that about you.”

She rose, overcoming the lure of the chair through sheer effort of will. Pulling her still-damp cloak around her body, she started toward the spiral stair that led up to the quarters higher in the tower.

“We’ll get him back, Dana.”

She looked back at him and managed a sad smile, then walked up the stairs, leaving the elf alone with a troubled look on his face.

Chapter 415

“There is nothing to be gained by delay,” Cal said. “We are not as prepared as we could be, but we have no choice but to act.”

The seven companions stood around the old table in the great room at Travelers’ Rest. Before them, spread out across the table, was an amazing assortment of weapons, cases of ammunition, scrolls, potions, wands, and other diverse items of magical power. They’d pooled their resources, chronicling everything that they had available to them, everything that could and would be needed in this deadly venture. Along the wall behind the gnome were piled cases, sacks, waterskins, coils of rope, small casks of oil, and other mundane supplies that would be carefully loaded into their extradimensional storage devices. Each would carry a small pack with additional items carefully selected from their total stores, a backup in case they were placed into a situation where their magical bags and backpacks failed to function.

“Mole and I were able to find the help we needed at Twilight Hall,” the gnome went on. “Cylyria was not in attendance, but fortunately the man we needed to see was there. Jarthel was reluctant to lend us his most prized treasure, but we ultimately prevailed upon him to lend the device to our cause.”

“We got a magic flying rug, too,” Mole added, indicating the ten-foot roll that had been laid carefully off to the side, out of the way. “A big one, that should be able to carry all of us.”

“You all know what’s at stake here,” Cal said. “Our primary mission is to find the location of the prison Skullrot, and recover Benzan. But several of the Cagewrights escaped to Carceri, and we also have in the mix a mad demon lord whose shackles may be failing.”

“Sounds like an average outing for this group,” Lok commented.

“Jarthel was able to provide the name of a starting point on Carceri from the Harper libraries,” Cal continued. “A citadel known as the Bastion of Lost Hope. We’ll start our search there.”

“Let’s be about this, then,” Beorna said. “We know what we’re about; all this chatter serves no purpose.”

They said little more as they packed up their gear, double-checking everything in the manner of experienced veterans. Cal had prepared a tally of everything they had, and had carefully totaled the cumulative weight of everything they were bringing with them. They literally had almost no spare space; everything had its place and every one had their specific assignments, down to the spells they’d selected for that day. They would be going in somewhat light in that regard, due to the spells that Dana and Cal had already cast, but they were not willing to sacrifice another day, to leave Benzan in the hands of their enemies longer than was necessary.

“I feel as though something is missing, without an acerbic complaint from Hodge,” Arun said, as he slid his backup weapon—an adamantite battleaxe—into its loop across his back.

“His strength will be needed to help the people of Cauldron return and rebuild,” Beorna said. The dwarf templar’s mien was utterly serious, her solemn expression set in stone as she tended to her own weapons. She’d taken Jenya’s death quite hard, and the prospect of revenge was driving her as powerfully as Dana’s goal to recover her husband. She had immediately volunteered to join them as soon as Dana had shared her revelation about their next destination.

Finally, the table was empty, the supplies along the walls vanished into their assigned containers. Lok went to pick up the heavy carpet, when a solid knock on the outer door interrupted them.

A hiss of swords being drawn from scabbards was followed by the bright glow of Arun’s holy avenger shining in the room. Wary of yet another attack, the companions followed Cal over to the viewing port installed near the portal. The device, a gnomish innovation, consisted of several mirrors installed covertly in the frame of the door so that someone on the inside of the portal could look out at whoever stood on the outer threshold, without their being aware of being watched. Cal looked through for a moment, then stepped back, surprised.

“It’s a man in golden armor. One of his eyes is... burning, it looks like. He is accompanied by an avoral and a celestial whose flesh has been marred with abyssal markings.”

Arun, Dannel, and Mole exchanged a look. “Morgan,” Dannel said.

Cal drew back the bolts and opened the door. The man in the golden armor smiled, although the expression was made ominous by the wisps of smoke rising from his left eye socket, where a bright orange flame burned.

“Greetings,” Morgan Ahlendraal said to his erstwhile companions.

The reunion was rushed, both because of the urgency of their own quest, and because of the news that Morgan brought with him from Occipitus.

“Adimarchus’s power grows within his prison,” the cleric of Helm told them, when they’d allowed him and his unusual companions into the great room of the tower.

“We’ve recently learned that as well,” Dannel said. “In fact, we had sought a way to contact you, to warn you.”

“I have heard you speak of this man,” Beorna said quietly aside to Arun, who was standing next to her near the hearth. With so many people in the chamber, it was getting a bit crowded. “A servant of Helm, yet he allies himself with one of the Fallen?”

“Morgan accepted the redemption of Occipitus as his task,” Arun replied. “Perhaps he includes the deva as part of that mandate. In any case, it is clear that the power of his god is with him.”

Beorna frowned, but her senses did tell her that Arun was right, that Morgan had in fact been chosen by Helm as a divine agent of the god’s will. By all rights—and the rules of her order—she should defer to him, but her eyes shifted to the scarred figure of Saureya, and her frown deepened.

“We have thwarted the plans of the followers of Adimarchus here on Faerûn,” Cal was saying. “The time has come for a final confrontation; we were in fact preparing for a shift to Carceri when you arrived.”

“Even in his prison, Adimarchus is powerful,” the fallen deva said. “Freed of his bonds, he will be beyond your power. Even in his madness, he is still what he is.”

“Who holds him?” Lok asked. “How was such a being imprisoned?”

The deva looked to Morgan, who nodded. It was a significant gesture. “He was betrayed by one whom he thought to be his ally,” the deva replied. “His closest companion, who turned out to be the son of his enemy. It is that enemy now that holds the key to the shackles that bind the dreaming god.”

“Speak plainly, Fallen,” Beorna rumbled. “Say the name of this foe.”

“Graz’zt. The one who holds Adimarchus, the master of Skullrot, is Graz’zt, Prince of Shadows, Lord of Azzagrat.”

Chapter 417

The fallen deva’s words struck the gathered companions with the force of a trebuchet stone.

“Graz’zt!” Cal exclaimed.

"Gods, no... he has Benzan," Dana said, staggering back as if struck. Lok quickly reached out to steady her.

"We cannot face a demon prince," Dannel said. "No matter how powerful we have become, we are not that strong."

"We have quarreled with the ebon lord before," Cal said, although it was clear that he was shaken by the news.

"My oath is unchanged," Beorna said. "And in any case, it is unlikely that the demon prince will be present at the prison when we arrive. From what I understand, they tend to spend most of their time secure in their fortresses; they are as much a danger to each other as they are to the realms outside of the Abyss."

"Do not underestimate him, templar," Morgan cautioned. To the others, he continued, "So then, you would continue on this mission?"

"We must," Cal said, as Dana looked up, steel in her eyes.

"Without our intervention, Adimarchus will break free," she intoned. "Such is the vision of Selûne."

"I would offer my aid, but Occipitus lies on the edge of a razor," Morgan replied. "But there is the matter of more immediate import, that which brought me here."

"You had said that Adimarchus's influence is growing," Cal said. "He is fighting your efforts to redeem Occipitus?"

"Not consciously," Morgan replied. "But the taint within the plane... it is difficult to explain, but there have been... surges, waves of madness that have passed through the place. My bond with the place," he said, subtly indicating his smoking eye, "makes me sensitive to these effects, although myself and those allies I have been able to recruit to my banner are resistant to their effect. However, there have been a number of manifestations in recent time, hindering our efforts."

"The most recent of these... effects... directly impacts you," the cleric went on. "Occipitus has of late been visited by a powerful entity. A huge beholder, infused with dark energies and fiendish potency, named Vhalantru."

"Vhalantru!" Arun exclaimed. "But we destroyed him!"

"Not thoroughly enough, it would seem," Dannel noted.

"The beholder seeks revenge upon those who destroyed him here on the Prime," Morgan said.

"But Morgan... you left us before we learned of Vhalantru's true nature," Mole pointed out. "How do you know about it?"

The cleric deferred to the angel beside him. "It was I who initially detected the beholder's presence upon Occipitus," Saureya said. "Being curious, I approached the creature, and spoke with it."

"I am surprised that it did not destroy you out of hand," Dannel said. "It had a bit of a temper, as I recall."

"I surmise that the creature was reborn out of Adimarchus's madness," the deva continued. "It was disoriented, and had no knowledge of how it had arrived upon Occipitus. But it burned with a fury for vengeance against those who had defeated it. After speaking with it, I notified the Chosen of my findings, and he raised a force to destroy the tainted monstrosity."

Morgan nodded. "We tracked it to the Smoking Eye, in the center of the plane. It overcame the guardians I had placed there, and entered the plasma matrix. The energy column should have destroyed it, yet somehow it used the power there to transport itself out of Occipitus."

"Where is it now?" Mole asked.

"That I do not know, but I suspect that it will come here if it can, and destroy you. It is driven by the last motivation that animated it in life, and is now likely insane."

"Well, it can follow us to Carceri if it wishes," Dana said, standing straight. "We thank you for the warning, sir cleric, but this changes nothing."

"Wait a moment," Cal said. "If this thing did return to Faerûn, it would seek us out first at Cauldron. We cannot leave an insane, fiendish beholder wandering about."

"We don't have time..." Dana began.

"Our personal obligations do not obviate our obligation to the people of Cauldron," Arun said. "We have the power to at least confirm where the beholder is, at least."

"And if it can travel between planes, we would be ill-advised to let it come upon us at a time and place of its own choosing," Dannel said. "Vhalantru was a fierce enemy; he has infused himself with the power of a Tarterian creature, and his powers go well beyond even the considerable abilities of a normal beholder."

"I can attempt to scry the location of the beholder, if it is upon this plane," Morgan said. "It will take time..."

"I can do it faster," Dana said. "Lok, I will need my font." The genasi withdrew the small platinum basin from his bag of holding after a minute's search, which Dana filled with a vial of holy water. The liquid formed a thin, shimmering sheen along the shallow bottom of the font, into which the priestess summoned the power of her goddess. It took only a matter of seconds before a picture formed in the font, and the others crowded around to see.

"By the gods," Dannel said.

The beholder filled the image, a huge, bloated monstrosity. It looked even more terrible than it had the last time they had faced it, its foul hide broken and mottled with patches of cracked, blackened flesh, trailing ugly lines of glistening ichor. Its central eye had been replaced with a blazing ember of flame trailing smoke, a foul copy of Morgan's own marking. As they watched, they could see beams of energy erupting from its eyestalks, and they saw it fly over a wall, with smaller structures visible below. The spell did not give them enough distance to clearly distinguish what it was attacking, but Mole recognized the location from the subtle clues visible in the font.

"That's Redgorge!" she said. "Remember, Arun, Dannel? We were there, for that meeting with the Chisel..."

"They will not be able to stand before the beholder," Arun said. "We must take action!"

Even Dana seemed overwhelmed by what she saw, and she nodded. "I can take five with me. Cal?"

"I can bring four," Cal said, staring down at the image in the font, marking a target location for his greater teleport. "I'll take Mole, Dannel, and Lok. Dana, you take Arun, Beorna, Morgan, and his companions. We'll be out in the open, and it may notice us right quick, so spread out quick and be ready to attack. Everyone better get a missile weapon ready. I don't know if that flame effect upon its central eye means that it no longer possesses its antimagic power, but be ready to have any spells upon you cancelled when it faces you."

"Arun, give me your quiver," Dana said. "I can only affect one batch of arrows, so you will have to share them out once I have laid my enhancements upon them."

"Go ahead," Dannel said. "My missiles require no such enchantment."

The paladin nodded, distributing a number of the empowered arrows to Lok and Beorna. He slung his shield across his back, and fitted one of the long shafts to his bow.

The companions quickly readied themselves, gathering around their appointed spellcaster. They waited only about twenty seconds, casting buffs and other spells in anticipation of engaging the enemy. Then, taking hands, they formed two circles around Dana and Cal, who cast their teleport spells, sending them halfway across Faerûn into the mouth of danger.

Chapter 418

The two groups materialized in the midst of a maelstrom of noise and violence.

The beholder was instantly visible above them, drifting over the town, rays of energy blasting from its eyestalks into structures and the screaming forms of fleeing townsfolk. Redgorge's population had been greatly expanded by the flight of refugees from Cauldron, but the half of the town's buildings had been empty to start with, so shelter had been found for everyone. Now the beholder was destroying building after building; as they watched, it disintegrated the entire front face of a two-story building, causing it to collapse forward, the upper facing sagging to the street as though the structure was tired and was lying down for a nap.

Vhalantru was distracted; the townsfolk were offering some resistance that thus far was proving ineffective. A robed man emerged from a large stone structure, surrounded by visible auras that bespoke magical wards, and as he emerged he hurled a fireball up at the beholder. The companions recognized Maavu Arlinal, one of the leaders of the organization known as the Chisel. The building was their headquarters, which the companions knew from their earlier visit to Redgorge, an inn named The Redheaded Miner. Arlinal's fireball flew true toward its target, but Vhalantru quickly spun, focusing the gaze of his burning central eye toward the spellcaster. As soon as that gaze passed over the fireball, the projectile winked out of existence. Another armed man appeared in one of the upper-storey windows of the inn, firing a crossbow at the beholder. The bolt struck the bloated form of the eye tyrant, but it appeared to merely stick harmlessly in its thick hide. Another man, armed with a long spear and wearing a leather bartender's apron, was ushering panicked people into the inn through its side entrance.

The members of the Chisel were offering what resistance they could.

The companions had appeared behind Vhalantru, separated by approximately sixty yards. Cal, Mole, Dannel, and Lok had appeared at street level, surrounded by the wake of destruction formed by the beholder's passing. A man lay in a bloody heap a few paces away, half of his torso blasted away, while a petrified figure of a fleeing woman stood in the middle of the street a bit further on.

Dana and the others appeared atop the town's outer wall, the massive bastion originally raised by Surabar Spellmason centuries ago. Morgan, the avoral, and Saureya all lifted into the air at once, while Dana began spellcasting. Beorna and Arun hefted their bows, drawing the arrows that had been magically enchanted and aligned to Good by Dana's magic.

"I don't remember it being that big last time," Mole said, staring up at the monster. Indeed, Vhalantru was now a huge spheroid nearly sixteen feet in diameter, its ugly black hide even more garishly unwholesome in the flesh.

"It's turned away... blast it, quickly!" Cal urged, putting his own words into action as he fired a disintegrate ray into the beholder's body. Vhalantru resisted the spell, but it nevertheless took some damage from the destructive energy of the spell.

Vhalantru had detected the new threat as soon as the companions had appeared, its many small eyes making it almost impossible to surprise. Even as the companions fired their bows or closed the range, it started unleashing blasts from its eyestalks. A beam lashed across Saureya's torso, drawing a black scar across his body as the fallen deva turned out of its path. Another struck Cal in the chest, attempting to return the gnome's favor by disintegrating him, but the gnome, his fortitude augmented by magic, was able to resist the effect.

But even as it started unleashing attacks, the beholder came under heavy fire from the bows of the companions. Beorna and Arun, atop the wall surrounding the town, were at a decent range, almost a hundred yards from the beholder, but the huge orb still made for a fairly big target. Arun scored a hit with his first shot, the enhanced arrow stabbing deep into the beholder's body, but Beorna's smaller bow did not carry quite so far, and while she impacted it her first arrow failed to penetrate its tough outer hide.

Dannel, on the other hand, was both closer and better with the bow than either of the holy warriors. His weapon sang in his hand as he fired shot after shot up at the beholder. At a little over a hundred feet distant, his shots struck with perfect intensity exactly where he wanted them to, punching deep into Vhalantru's unnatural form. Each shot flared with a discharge of magical energy as it struck home, releasing the power imparted to them by the elf's magical bow.

But Vhalantru was not done, and it quickly targeted the elf with another eyebeam, blasting him with a violet ray that overcame Dannel's will, filling him with a stark terror that drove all logical thought away. Dropping his bow, the elf ran screaming from the battle.

"You... will... all... pay..." the beholder hissed, its voice barely comprehensible as it drifted back toward them. As it moved the gaze of its central eye swept over them, the companions could feel their magical protections and the efficacy of their items fade. It kept the angle of its gaze down, allowing it to continue to use its eye-beams on foes located above ground level.

The barrage of missiles continued, with the members of the Chisel continuing to add their support from behind, while they escorted the panicked townsfolk to safety. Maavu Arlinal blasted it with a volley of magic missiles, but the glowing darts merely evaporated as they struck its body, defeated by the creature's spell resistance. An eyestalk swiveled back to track the magic-user, blasting him with a ray that spread out over his body, turning him to stone. With that threat removed, the beholder continued its focus on the enemies that had already destroyed it once before.

Saureya dove at the beholder, prepared to strike. He carried no weapon, but looked no less dangerous for it, his raven wings folding close around his body as he slashed through the air. The beholder tracked him with one of its eyestalks, and even as the fallen deva lifted a fist to strike it blasted him with the full force of a ray at point-blank range. Saureya immediately went limp, his inertia carrying him straight down and through the slate roof of a nearby house in a clatter of dust and noise.

The avoral, seeing that the beholder's central eye was directed downward, let out a screech and conjured a lightning bolt at the monster. The blast vanished as it struck the beholder, as did the blast of searing light that Morgan unleashed at it a moment later. The knight let out a cry in Celestial, echoed by the avian outsider as the two dove toward the beholder, claws and sword outstretched. Again, Vhalantru was ready, and beams lanced out to strike its attackers. The avoral was hit by the same ray that had injured Saureya earlier; this time, however, its target was not able to resist the grim power of the beholder's finger of death. And as the winged celestial fluttered lifelessly to the street below, another beam struck Morgan, fixing him within a blue glow and hurling him bodily to the side, into the gaze of the beholder's central eye. The beam winked out as it entered the antimagic cone, but so too did the power of flight granted by Morgan's armor immediately fade, and the knight plummeted hard to the muddy ground fifty feet below.

Chapter 419

"Keep firing!" Cal enjoined, his own magic temporarily neutralized by the beholder's gaze. "Once your missiles pass out of the cone, the enchantments on them will return!" And indeed, the barrage was having an effect, with both Lok and Arun scoring additional hits that appeared to penetrate the beholder's hide. Fat gobs of blood fell from its body now, splattering with a hiss on the ground below.

A scuffling noise from a nearby ally between two damaged buildings drew Cal's attention around. A mad-eyed dwarf appeared and rushed at him, his intent clear even before he leapt at the gnome, hands outstretched. Cal quickly sidestepped the charmed commoner's rush, unwilling to injure this hapless pawn of the beholder's will. Lok glanced his way, but Cal only pointed up at their foe, a grim look on his face.

A rush of air atop the battlements announced Dana's summoning of a huge air elemental. She instructed it in Auran, and the creature darted almost straight up into the air. Vhalantru could temporarily banish it simply by lifting its gaze, she knew, but that would reopen it to magical attack from the enemies below.

The beholder, meanwhile, had ceased its approach, slowly gaining more altitude as it settled into an ideal range for its own attacks. Whatever its rebirth had done to its mind, it seemed no less canny an adversary than when it had fought them before, in the dark undertunnels of Oblivion. But one thing was clear; it had come back far tougher than it had been before. Already it had absorbed more damage than had killed it in their first confrontation, and it only seemed to get more enraged with each arrow or spell that drove through its defenses.

Its approach had brought the enemies on the battlements within the range of its eye-rays. It blasted Arun the blue ray that it had used against Morgan a moment ago, lifting the dwarf from his feet and hurling him back roughly over the battlements. It was a long fall to the ground below, and an even longer walk to the nearest opening in the wall; for the moment Arun was out of the fight.

"Try that with me, you bastard!" Beorna said, firing another arrow. But Beorna had yet to injure the beholder, and it focused its attention upon more dangerous foes.

It found one of those in Dana, who stood her ground as Arun was blasted away just a few feet from where she stood. She called upon the goddess, summoning a column of flame down from the sky that descended onto the body of the beholder. Her spell overcame its spell resistance, and while it was resistant to fire, it could not absorb the divine energies infused in the flame strike. Snarling in pain, it blasted Dana with a pair of beams, but the priestess was strong in both mind and body, and she resisted both effects.

Mole had come into the battle knowing that mere invisibility wasn't going to help her remain unseen against this adversary. Thus, as soon as they'd appeared she darted around the edge of the nearest building, moving closer to the beholder while staying out of its direct line of sight. It had taken her about twenty seconds to get to where she was now, crouched under a water trough almost directly under the creature. Silent as a mouse, she cocked her crossbow, and took aim.

The beholder shuddered as Dana's air elemental slammed into it from above, blasting it with solid blows of ultraconcentrated air. The elemental was a powerful creature, but unfortunately it lacked the resistances of the adventurers, and it could not resist as Vhalantru almost casually disintegrated it.

The beholder roared in pain as it took another pair of hits; another powerful shot from Lok's longbow, accompanied in the same instant from a shocking bolt from Mole's crossbow. It spun its body, lifting its gaze upward, settling it purposefully upon Dana, who was forced to abort a second flame strike. As Dana set out in a run along the wall, trying to get out of the radius of its antimagic cone, the beholder fired its eye-beams at Lok and Mole. Lok was struck by its fear ray, and despite his considerable mental strength he could not overcome the power of Vhalantru's power. Even as the genasi fled the beholder fired another pair of rays down at Mole. The gnome darted behind the cover of the water trough as the first ray struck it, disintegrating it. As she was revealed she leapt back, avoiding a second ray that blasted a long scorch across the muddy ground where she'd been standing an instant before.

"Nyah, nyah!" she shouted up at it, firing another bolt from her crossbow before tumbling into the cover of a nearby doorway.

Saureya, meanwhile, had reappeared, covered in dust from his forced landing. His expression was strangely detached as he leapt again into the air, but he'd gained barely thirty feet of altitude before several of eye-beams lanced into him. One cut a swath of rent flesh across his shoulders, inflicting a painful wound. The second was the fear ray that had already taken two of the beholder's enemies out of the fight. The deva was likewise affected, and it aborted its attack to fly off, departing the battlefield.

"Run, little angel!" the beholder chortled.

Cal had been grappled by the charmed dwarf, but as soon as Vhalantru's gaze had shifted upward his protections returned, making the commoner's efforts significantly more difficult. The gnome immediately teleported out of his adversary's grasp, leaving the dwarf looking around in confusion. The gnome didn't go far, reappearing under a porch he'd spotted a short distance down the street, out of the immediate view of the beholder.

Once there, he made himself invisible before sidling carefully into position, slowly moving forward until he could just see the lower half of the beholder's body—without it being able to spot him.

Morgan had been stunned but not seriously hurt by his fall, and once the beholder lifted his gaze he was quickly leap into the air, carried aloft once more by the power of his celestial plate. But once again the beholder seemed to be waiting for this, blasting the cleric with a black beam that slammed into his chest with dark finality. With a scream Morgan barely overcame the fell power of the finger of death, and he flew up below it, his sword lancing out in a brilliant arc that opened a gash several feet long in its gruesome hide.

Now truly feeling the pain of the many attacks it had absorbed, Vhalantru spat a violent gibberish of curses and insane promises of wrath. It spun again, catching up Morgan in the effect of its central eye as the cleric turned for another attack. Once more he was helpless to stop it as the power of his armor faltered, and again he fell to the ground, landing hard on top of an overhanging porch attached to the front of a nearby house, crashing through it to land in a clatter of broken wood and clay tiles.

Meanwhile lancing rays of energy continued to blast out from the beholder in all directions. Beorna, frustrated at her inability to score a hit with her bow, had finally unleashed a searing light that had managed to overcome its spell resistance, but her reward was a barrage of beams that tore mercilessly into her. Bolstered by the mettle granted by her service to Helm, she was able to avoid being killed outright by its finger of death, but its sleep ray overcame her, and she slumped down behind the battlements, blissfully unconscious.

Dana had moved into position for another flame strike, but she'd barely managed the first syllable of her invocation when Vhalantru found her with another beam, turning her to stone.

Mole had moved into position behind the building where she'd taken cover, and appeared just long enough to shoot the beholder with another shocking bolt, the missile disappearing into its body with a fizzing pop. The gnome stepped back into cover almost in the same instant, but Vhalantru had apparently been expecting this as well. Its disintegration ray sliced into the corner of the house, vaporizing a good portion of the surrounding wall. A moment later the blue telekinesis ray impacted the roof, directing the inevitable collapse of the building onto the spot where the gnome had just vanished.

Vhalantru's laughter redoubled, reek with its madness, the sound a terrible echo across the town as the beholder continued unleashing destruction all around it. It kept laughing until the moment when Cal blasted it with an empowered disintegrate, transforming the monstrous creature into a plume of fine dust that drifted down onto the ruins of Redgorge.

Chapter 420

Dana's first words on being restored to living flesh were to the point.

"How many days?"

She was in a small, nearly empty room with wood paneling covering most of the stone walls. Other than a few mostly unpopulated bookshelves and a couple of well-worn armchairs, the room was empty. Cal and Lok were the only other ones there.

"Two days," the gnome replied.

"Two days? Why so long?"

The gnome sighed, and sank back into one of the smaller chairs, designed for folk of his size. "Because that's how long it took," he said. "The power of the beholder's magic was considerable, and I suspect significantly augmented since our friends last tussled with it. I was able to restore Arlantal and a few of the commoners who'd been petrified, but with you... it was as if some of the beholder's essence lived on, fighting me. To be honest, I'd considered teleporting you to Waterdeep, to seek help from one of the Guild mages, or perhaps the Blackstaff himself."

The priestess stretched her muscles, grimacing as her body experienced the strains of recovering from the transformation. "I'm sorry, Cal," she said. "I just cannot help but think of what's happening to Benzan, with each moment we spend here, delayed."

The gnome nodded. "We do not help him by rushing blindly to our doom."

"My mind recognizes the wisdom of your words, even as my heart rails against them," Dana admitted. She sighed. "What else has transpired?"

"Morgan and Saureya have returned to Occipitus. The knight of Helm left this for you." He handed her a small, thin metal device about six inches long, shaped like a dagger shorn of its hilt and crossguard. It was actually a slender fork, the two tines separated only by the barest of spaces.

"A focus for the plane shift spell," Dana said.

Cal nodded. "It will allow you to take us to Occipitus, should the need arise."

"From what the others have said about the place, it does not sound like a pleasant locale," Lok said.

"The fallen deva believes that the power of the plane may revive the beholder again at some point, so long as Adimarchus continues to exert his madness beyond the confines of his prison," Cal said.

"Wonderful," Dana noted dryly.

"Arun and Beorna have been helping the people of Redgorge," Cal said. "Nine people lost their lives in the attack, while over fifty were injured, some seriously."

"It could have been much worse, had we not intervened," Lok said.

"Is everyone else all right?" Dana asked. "Dannel, Mole?"

"Mole had a house dropped on her," Cal said. "She broke a few ribs, but she healed up all right."

"Then we are ready."

“It would be better if we regained our spells, first. My higher valences have been focused upon the task of restoring you, and your spells are heavily depleted from the encounter with the beholder.”

“My plane shift is ready,” Dana insisted. “I had prepared two, so that we can return to the Prime if necessary.”

Cal met her eyes for several long seconds, then nodded. “Let us go get the others.”

Chapter 421

Carceri.

Everywhere was devastation, from one horizon to the next, alternating between marshes fetid with the stench of rot, to blasted hills covered with razor-sharp black weeds that oozed poison from their tips, to cracked flatlands where wisps of toxic vapors swelled unpredictably from the ground. Above it all was the unchanging sky, its colors a mélange of blood and mud and foulness. In whole the place was unwelcoming, unpleasant, and inimical to long life.

But life did exist here. Demodands, the masters of the plane, tormenters and wardens and guardians of those condemned to this place. Other races of fiends were common, and even some other outsiders could be found, pursuing their own business. There were very few other indigenous species, most of which eked out a hard existence preying upon members of those other categories.

There were settlements scattered across the plane. Most were prisons, fortresses tall or squat, but alike in the cries of agony and madness that filled the air around them. There were no cities per se, but one could find the occasional safehold, a place where visitors and residents of the plane could meet to trade and deal, using any of the varied currencies of the planes where souls and magic were as important as coins and gemstones.

It was toward one of these sites that the companions from Faerûn traveled. Their conveyance was the large magical carpet that Cal had acquired, flying low over the ground, just high enough to avoid the obstacles of terrain that occasionally rose out of the blasted landscape. The carpet was loaded down almost to its maximum capacity, and it traveled barely further than a man’s brisk walk, but it did not cease, and they made good time toward the destination. Dana had cast her find the path spell shortly after their arrival; while the spell had since faded, they continued in the direction that it had indicated, toward the hold that the Harper researches had indicated might hold some answers for them.

“The Bastion of Lost Hope,” Dannel said, breaking a silence that had lasted for almost an hour. “It does not sound like a pleasant place.”

“Let Dana and myself do the talking,” Cal said. “I will see that we are all veiled to disguise our true natures, and my tongues spell will ease communication, if necessary. We’ve dealt with these sorts of creatures on their home planes before.”

“Arun, will you be okay with this?” Mole asked. “I mean, there’s bound to be a lot of nasty folks there who won’t like bumping elbows with a paladin.”

“I can... restrain myself,” he said, though his hand drifted to the hilt of his holy sword as he spoke.

“Even so, you may wish to wear that extra ring of mind shielding that we took from the Cagewrights after their little ambush,” Cal pointed out, holding up his own hand to indicate the silver ring there.

“What of Beorna?” Arun asked.

“I can ward myself,” the templar said. “Do not worry about my presence or actions spoiling your schemes; if necessary you can have we warriors represent ourselves as your bodyguards.”

“An excellent suggestion, and in line with my own thoughts,” Cal said.

“We’ve got company,” Dannel said, drawing their attention ahead and to the left, where a small speck was visible in the distance, flying at what looked to be a few hundred feet off the ground. The companions readied weapons and spells, and looked warily in that direction.

“What is it?” Beorna asked, stringing her bow. She’d replaced the compact weapon that had been so ineffective against Vhalantru with a full-sized longbow she’d purchased in the village. It was a bit crowded on the carpet, and Dana had to dodge back to avoid being poked in the eye with the weapon.

“Too far to tell,” Dannel said.

“Time to put on our disguises,” Cal said, casting his veil spell. “Remember your roles.”

“It just got a lot closer... I think we’ve been spotted,” Dannel said. And indeed it had suddenly just... shifted closer, maybe a thousand yards out, now, close enough to identify it.

“Vrock demon,” Dana said, somberly.

“Should we land and dismount?” Lok asked.

“Wait, let’s see if we can bluff past a confrontation,” Cal suggested.

“If it comes to a fight, we’ll be at a disadvantage, all squeezed together here,” Beorna pointed out.

“If need be, you and I can dismount,” Dana said to the genasi, casting her fly spell upon him. Her own magical boots offered the same means of mobility.

“I’ll take the carpet down, if it looks like trouble,” Cal insisted.

“More of them,” Dannel reported, although they could all see the two additional vrocks that had teleported in, flying now well off and above them, giving them a thorough examination from a safe distance.

Cal stood. “HINDER THE EMBASSY OF THE YUGOLOTHS AT YOUR PERIL, FIENDS!” he shouted, his voice greatly augmented by a ghost sound cantrip.

The vrocks did not appear fazed by the warning, continuing their lazy flight around them before all three teleported away.

“Think they bought it?” Mole said.

“That, or they’re getting help,” Dannel replied.

There was nothing to do but press on. Several nervous minutes passed without any sign of the demons. Finally, when they were starting to think that they’d escaped a confrontation, a massive demon nearly twenty feet in height appeared directly ahead of them, hovering in mid-air. It looked to be a humanoid cross between an ape and a boar, with tiny wings that nevertheless seemed quite able to keep it in the air. The vrocks had returned with it, six of them, now, flying a good distance above and around them. That wasn’t all; a quartet of demons had appeared on the ground below them, loping in pace with the carpet; hezrou demons with bloated bodies and toad-like visages. Cal reflexively brought the carpet to a halt, maybe thirty feet away from the demon blocking their path.

The nalfeshnee laughed. “I thought I would pay my respects personally, to the mighty ‘embassy’ of the Yugo...”

It never got a chance to finish, for Cal had quickly recognized the nature of the demon, and realizing that it possessed the ability to see right through their disguises, he shouted, “Take it!”

Chapter 422

As Cal spoke his command, his companions, ready for battle, immediately released their attacks. The demons were prepared for a confrontation as well, but in that first critical moment, the adventurers from Faerûn claimed an edge measured in fractions of a heartbeat.

Mole was by far the fastest of all of them, and even as Cal opened his mouth to shout his command the gnome had gauged the threat and lifted her small bow to fire. Her little bolts would not have done much against the huge demon, but before it could react she’d already fired a shot into its throat, the tiny missile all but vanishing into the thick folds of flesh gathered there. Clearly she’d had an effect by the way that the demon’s eyes widened and it roared in pain and outrage, but before it could counter she’d already slapped the string down and palmed a new bolt into place, lifting and firing in a motion that an ordinary crossbowman never could have managed. The second bolt struck within an inch of the first, adding to the demon’s discomfort.

But the nalfeshnee was a grandee of the Abyss, a potent beast indeed, and a few bolts, sneak attacks notwithstanding, were not going to take it out of the fight. It called upon some fell power, and an aura of multicolored beams of gyrating light sprang up around its body, rapidly building in intensity.

Cal, true to his word, commanded the carpet to descend, aware of the hezrous but knowing that their warriors would be seriously hampered in such a crowded space. As the nalfeshnee gathered its smite power the gnome used what was rapidly becoming his favorite tactic, an empowered disintegrate that lanced through the nimbus of lights into its fat form. The demon resisted being turned into ash, but even so the gnome's ray cut an ugly black slash in its thick hide.

The vrocks screeched in anticipation of the fray, a sound echoed by the terrible croaks of the hezrou below. As the carpet descended, the hezrous leapt up in anticipation of tearing into its passengers. A few started to conjure unholy blights or chaos hammers, the better to soften up their prey.

All that ended, however, as Dana rose up above the carpet, her boots sprouting tiny magical wings, and spoke a holy word.

The four hezrous were instantly struck down, slain by the divine purity of the word. The nalfeshnee was very fortunate, its spell resistance barely holding against the power of the magic, but it swiftly draw back, quick to recognize that these foes, while not what they claimed to be, were nevertheless extremely dangerous.

Lok leapt off of the carpet a moment later, flying in a straight line toward the nalfeshnee. Arrows from Dannel's bow sped past him, burying themselves into the demon. The elf was using the blessed white-fletched holy arrows, which struck the fiend with great effect. By the time that Lok reached it three arrows already pierced its chest, trailing ichor that ran down its body through its furry hide to fall in fat drops to the ground below.

Lok added his own voice to its troubles by swinging his axe at the creature's head. Its reach far exceeded his, and its huge jaws snapped at him as he dove at it. Lok did not try to avoid the attack, twisting to the side as its tusks pounded his shoulder and side, and driving his axe down in a powerful arc that removed one of its ears.

The vrocks, meanwhile, had thus far avoided damage, well outside the radius of Dana's spell. Mirror images appeared around several of them, while three dove down in a tight knot about eighty feet above them, twisting and gyrating in a complicated aerial dance that, whatever its purpose, clearly didn't bode well for their enemies.

Arun and Beorna were the last to act. Beorna lifted her bow and took several shots at the nalfeshnee. The thing was so big that she could hardly miss, but her arrows were no longer aligned, and the shots merely stuck in its hide, doing little or no damage. Seeing that archery would not have much effect, Arun instead summoned a magic circle against evil, warding them against the dark powers wielded by the demons.

It was a timely gesture, for a moment later the rainbow hues dancing around the figure of the nalfeshnee exploded in a brilliant display of light. Each of the companions felt a sudden wave of disorientation as the lights twisted around them, creeping into them, filling them with whispers of terror and images of that which they feared most of all.

For the most part, their wills stood up to the barrage, but Dannel, Mole, and Lok all suddenly stiffened, dazed, their eyes wide with the horrors that they suddenly saw before them.

Screeching madly at the success of the nalfeshnee's smite, the vrockes began to circle lower, claws outstretched.

Chapter 423

What had started as a random encounter with a pack of demons had suddenly gotten a lot more serious, as the nalfeshnee ensnared three of the companions with its fell power.

The nalfeshnee wasn't taking any chances, flying farther back, calling more aid to its cause. The air around it shimmered as it drew upon the power of the Abyss, opening into a pair of rifts that disgorged another pair of vrockes. The summoned demons let out loud screeches, happy to join the developing battle. One dove at Lok, clawing at him, while the second dove at the rug, which had nearly settled to the ground. As soon as it had gotten close enough, it let out an ear-splitting screech, but the companions were able to resist its effect.

The other vrockes dove in to exploit their advantage, except for the three that continued their mad dance above. Cal, recognizing the danger of that ritual, opened his mouth to issue a warning, but before he could speak another diving vrock let out another screech, and he fell onto his back, stunned.

Dana, hovering in the air about twenty feet above the ground, drew the attention of the other two diving vrockes. Surrounded by mirror images, they looked like a horde of demons, and they quickly flanked her, eagerly tearing with claws and bite. The priestess had called upon the divine power of Selûne, but her weapons were not enhanced to pierce the demons' damage resistance, nor did she have another spell with the potency of the holy word.

So she did the only prudent thing, and dimension doored to a safe distance.

Arun drew his holy sword, but the vrockes kept their distance, tormenting him with evil cackles and cruel hisses. They could feel the power building above them even if the mortals could not, and they waited for the power of their fellows to be unleashed. Beside him, Beorna uttered a prayer to Helm, whose blessing reached across the planes to fortify them and hinder their enemies. She then crossed over to Dannel, grabbing the dazed elf's quiver with its cargo of holy arrows.

"These might have more effect!" she said to Arun, as she and the paladin stepped off from the carpet onto more stable ground. The vrockes above continued pacing them, but did not immediately attack; they were joined a moment later by the two that had threatened Dana.

All now were protected by mirror images, and had infused themselves with heroism. Another issued a shriek, and while the dwarves again resisted it, Cal was again stricken, unable to move.

“What are they waiting for?” Beorna asked, firing through a mirror image.

Her question was answered a few seconds later. When the dance of the vocks reached its height, a terrible sound filled the air, like a roll of tough fabric being ripped apart. A wave of sizzling energy spread outward from the three linked vocks, enveloping all of the companions, with the exception of Dana, in its radius. Each of the companions was blasted by the terrible energies of that wave, and while no one was killed outright, even the dwarves found themselves hard hit by the effect. Before they could fully recover the rest of the vocks were upon them, diving and clawing with all four of their taloned limbs. The dwarves held their ground, laying about them with their swords. One of the vocks dove onto the carpet, where Cal was just beginning to stir from the effects of the demons’ terrible cries. It seized hold of him roughly and started to lift him into the air. Arun quickly leapt to the gnome’s aid, charging into the vrock, smiting it in the back with his holy sword. The vrock immediately dropped the gnome and teleported away.

Beorna found herself hard-pressed as two vocks tore at her. Her adamantine armor and inherent toughness made it difficult from the vocks to seriously harm her, but they had her flanked, and both released clouds of spores that sifted through the small openings in her mail, burrowing painfully into her flesh. One vrock nailed her with a claw that snagged in her visor, piercing her forehead and nearly taking out her eye. She was already reeling from the energy blast from the dance of ruin, and could not take much more punishment. Her own counterattacks struck images, and the demons laughed at the futility of her counterattacks.

But the templar was not alone. Lying on his back, Cal tossed a dispel magic into the midst of the vocks. Their magical powers sloughed off of them, with mirror images vanishing from two, and a third seeming to fade slightly as its heroism was removed. Screeching in anger, the demons redoubled their attacks, hoping to overcome the dwarves through brute force. They were reinforced by the three diving down from their aerial dance, conjuring added defenses as they came.

Once the true location of her foe was revealed, Beorna did not hesitate. Channeling the power of Helm into her sword, she smote the demon that had struck her, taking off the arm that had struck her just below the shoulder. The demon screeched and started to fall back, but having bled her opponent she was not going to let it get away that easily. Her follow-up strike was a thrust that tore into its belly, disemboweling it. The demon’s screams turned into gurgling hisses as it collapsed to the ground, flopping about as it bled out the last of its life.

Arun was hit in the back as a vrock tore at him with claws and bite in a violent fury. The paladin merely took the hits, letting the demon get its fill of him before he abruptly turned and tore into it with a full attack. This demon too paid the price for the loss of its mirror images, and within a few seconds it joined its comrade bleeding out upon the cracked Carcerian soil.

During the entire battle with the vrock, no further attacks had been forthcoming from the nalfeshnee. The reason for this was the running battle that the demon had been engaged in with Dana. After opening her dimension door to take it out from the grasp of the vrock, she'd reappeared a few hundred feet behind the giant demon. Its back had been to her, but she quickly got its attention with a flame strike that ravaged it despite its inherent resistance to fire. Turning, the demon countered with a dispel that canceled the power of her boots, sending her plummeting to the ground. Fortunately she hadn't been that far up, only about sixty feet off the ground, but even so she landed hard, collapsing into a roll that ended with her dusty and bruised, but alive.

Looking up, she saw that the demon wasn't quite finished with her yet. It hurled its power at her, seeking to destroy her reason, but the attack slid effortlessly off of the iron discipline of her mind.

Nice try, demon, she thought, forcing her battered body to obey her commands as she pulled herself to her feet. The demon was trying another tack, and as she started limping away—let it think it's got me—a bolt of lightning shot down from the clear skies above, slamming painfully into her back right between her shoulder blades.

"Okay, that's it," she said. The demon had not fallen for her ruse, and indeed had pulled away some, and was now pretty far away. But not far enough, as she fired a beam of searing light that blasted into its chest. For the already battered demon, it was too much, and it fell to the ground to land in a massive rumble of dust and sound.

Dana could see that vrock were still swarming over her friends, and saw the familiar glow of Arun's sword as the paladin fought them off. Ignoring the stabbing pains that continued to shoot up her legs, she called upon the power of her boots again, and lifted off into the sky toward the battle.

She saw Lok, still floating in the air, caught up in the aftereffects of the nalfeshnee's stun. He did not look to be seriously hurt; the vrock that had been attacking him had returned to where it had come from, its summons by the greater demon having expired. She flew on, approaching the area near the grounded magic carpet where Arun and Beorna were still fighting against the remnants of the demon forces.

The demons were losing, she saw. Only their mirror images were keeping the last few vrock in the fight; two had already been brought down, and while the dwarves looked to have taken a beating they fought on with indefatigable vigor. And the rest of her friends were recovering from the effects of the nalfeshnee's smite; as she drew near she saw Dannel shake his head, reaching for his bow.

Hoping to tilt the odds more in their favor, she cast a dispel magic onto the battle, trying to focus the center of the spell high enough so as to catch up the vrock in its effect without stripping any remaining buffs from her companions.

She needn't have bothered; the demons were already growing tired of this fight which had claimed a number of their fellows, including their leader, without much in the way of result for their side. As Arun connected with one demon, nearly taking off its left leg, the four demons let out a loud but non-magical screech and without further preamble teleported away.

“Is everyone okay?” Cal asked, scratching his arms where some of the vrock spores had taken root and started to burrow into his flesh.

They’d all taken a beating, especially from the blast from the dance of ruin. Beorna nearly collapsed a few moments after the vrocks departed, her entire body aflame with the painful infection of vrock spores across her face, arms, and upper torso. Already thin tangles of vine-like growths dangled from her skin. Arun and Lok were likewise affected, but Dana purged them with a bles spell that killed the spores and caused the painful affliction to ease. After that it was a simple matter of applying healing, which all of them sorely needed.

“Well, we survived the welcoming committee,” Beorna said when they were done, cleaning her blade of demonic ichor. They spent a few minutes cleaning off the magical carpet as best they could, and then piled back aboard, carefully resorting their stores to make sure that nothing fell off the edges.

“This was just a roving band, probably opportunistic raiders,” Cal said. “What we really have to worry about are the organized groups. We’ll have to be extra careful from here on out.”

Dannel shuddered. Neither he nor Mole or Lok spoke of the things they’d seen while under the effects of the nalfeshnee’s power, and no one pressed them on the matter.

Leaving yet another bloody battlefield behind them, the companions rose up into the air upon their magical conveyance, and soon were on their way once more. Mole glanced back, once, at the bloody wreckage that had been eight demons, already just vague mounds on the blasted plain.

“Wherever we go, it always seems to end the same way,” she sighed.

“We brave evil in its den, so that others may live without experiencing what we just did,” Arun said.

Beorna nodded. “We’ll teach these bastards what it means to interfere in the lives of those under our care,” she said, her eyes as sharp as the adamantite steel of her sword.

Chapter 424

“Ah, but there are so many asylums on Carceri,” the cambion said, leaning back in a chair that creaked alarmingly to hold his bulk. He made a gesture with one a finger topped by a three-inch, lacquered nail, and the succubus standing at his left shoulder popped a white globe roughly the size of an eyeball into his mouth. To his right stood a massive minotaur with glowing red eyes, who had stared menacingly at the intruders since the beginning of the interview. “I would so love to help you, my dear, but you understand how these things are.” He shrugged, the movement causing the layers of fat draped down from his bloated neck to jiggle unpleasantly.

“We are grateful for your time, master Cymberion,” Dana said. “If we were referred to you in error, then I certainly apologize for disturbing you. If, however, your superior recollection can direct us to the particular locale we seek, then we would be most grateful.” The priestess made her own gesture, and Cal quickly stepped forward, laying a small package of scrolls onto the low table that separated them from the cambion and his entourage.

The cambion leaned slightly forward, even the small movement requiring an obvious effort from the bloated fiend. He shifted the scrolls with a long fingernail, enough for him to read the names of the spells written in Cal’s neat hand on the outside of the parchment.

“Hmm... yes, well, I am sympathetic to your plight, as you may well understand. I myself had a cousin who was wrongfully imprisoned over a trifling matter, some decades ago. A terrible inconvenience! But let me see, let me see...” He touched his chin with a long nail, displacing a fold of bloated flesh. But he also made a subtle movement with his eyes, and a rail-thin figure clad entirely in black—they never did discover his race or particular purpose—detached himself from the wall of the cramped booth and quickly moved to the curtained entry, standing where he could scan the rest of the tavern outside.

Cymberion leaned forward conspiratorily, his belly flopping out over the edge of the table. Dana leaned forward as well, although she had to will herself not to gag at the demon-spawn’s foul breath, which smelled like the inside of a sewer.

“Skullrot is not easily found, my dear. Its master cloaks it in a powerful dweomer... one does not stumble upon it, nor can one utilize the... usual spells of location-finding to discern its location. Indeed, the only way I have heard of reaching it is to be escorted there by one who knows the way.”

Dana’s gaze dropped down to the scrolls in the middle of the table, and the cambion, observing the gesture, was quick to continue. “Now, there might be someone who can be of assistance to you, I think. Have you heard of Harrowfell? Ah, no matter, I can easily direct you to that place; many of my clients make use of the shattered stone that is the citadel’s most prominent feature. Its current owner is a marilith named Byakala. She has a certain... shall we say, interest in the most famous resident of Skullrot, and it is quite likely that she knows its location.”

Cal and Dana shared a look; they had a good idea to whom the cambion was referring.

Dana stood back, her manner indicating that she considered the exchange acceptable. “Very well, master Cymberion. If you could direct your instructions to my valet... I thank you for your time, and trust that your discretion in this matter will be up to its reputed standard.”

The cambion nodded. The scrolls had disappeared somewhere; it was probably best not to dwell upon where the creature had hidden them. “Of course, my dear. I hope that we will have the opportunity to do business again, if your interests bring you back to Carceri.”

The succubus knelt beside Cal and whispered in his ear; from the way that the gnome flushed it was clear that she’d passed on more than just the location of the marilith’s hold.

Then the black-clad figure drew aside the curtain and ushered them out, so quickly that they barely had time to glance back before the heavy black fabric was drawn shut behind them. The others stood as they reappeared in the back of the tavern's common room; a few nearby fiends cast idle glances their way, but no one took any further action to hinder them.

"Let's get out of here," Cal said.

They made their way out of the crowded tavern back to the main hall of the Bastion of Lost Hope. The fortress was really a small town, a sprawling complex packed into the space within the massive black basalt walls. The three warriors formed a wedge in front of the others, moving those who did not make way for their party with hard looks bolstered by a few inches of drawn steel. They did not speak until they were clear of the gatehouse, warded by a pair of gorgon demons that cast hard looks at them. Even then, the companions did not linger. The citadel was located on a wide shelf nestled in between a range of ugly black peaks, within a range of mountains it had taken them two hours to ascend even with the magic carpet. Oddly, the temperature was exactly the same as it had been in the lowlands, obviously this place did not follow the rules of their home-plane with regards to geography and climate.

"We have a destination," Cal told the others. "But we've been on Carceri now for at least ten hours, with a battle to boot; we need rest, first." Dana opened her mouth to speak, but thought better of it, shaking her head and turning away.

"I take it we are not going to take advantage of the high-class accommodations available in the Bastion," Dannel said.

"Something tells me that folk don't sleep too soundly in there," Cal said. "No, let's take the carpet back down to that valley we passed on our ascent. Then, we'll see if the prized possession of the Harper High Mage meets our needs."

Chapter 425

On Carceri, there was no cycle of night and day, so the sky outside was exactly the same ugly shade of red and brown as the companions rose from their rest and gathered in the lower chamber of their citadel for the "morning" meal. Dana had prepared a heroes' feast for them, so at least the provisions were of exceptional quality, particularly by Carcerian standards.

"We could have really used this, back in the early days," Lok said, running a hand along the smooth black stone.

"Indeed," Cal said. "But instant fortresses are not cheap, nor are they easy to come by. In fact, when he learned where we were planning on taking his, Jarthel almost demanded it back. I had to turn over the drow's spellbook, and both of Rhiavati's books, to him as security before he'd agree."

“The Harpers owe us,” Dana said. “We would have done at least as much for them, if it had been Jarthel, or Cylaria, who’d been dragged off to another plane as a captive.”

“So what is the plan for today?” Arun asked.

“The cambion gave us enough specific information for us to teleport directly to Harrowfell,” Cal said.

“You trust that... creature?” Beorna asked.

“Of course not. But it’s the only good lead we have. Based on the reactions we got from others at the Bastion when we asked about Skullrot, I think that we’re not likely to get better information.”

“No one wants to mess with a Prince,” Arun said. “Especially not one holding a god captive.”

“First a cambion, then a marilith,” Beorna said, her expression sour. “These creatures are for spitting upon holy blades, not for coy words and deals. They are corrupt, and negotiating with them only invites their corruption to spread.”

“I like it little better than you... less, likely, since I had to treat with that grotesque monstrosity directly,” Dana said. “But it is but a means to the end we seek.”

“A philosophy of chaos,” Beorna scowled.

“You knew what we were about here when you agreed to join us, templar,” Dana said, not giving one inch in the argument. “Yesterday you agreed to play your role, and now you question the morality of it?”

Beorna glanced over at Arun. “You have been silent for some time, paladin of Moradin. Does my understanding of the Soul Forger’s creed reflect an erroneous view of its dogma? Do I stand alone with my concern?”

Arun met her gaze squarely, although there was feeling in his eyes as he regarded her. “Long have I had to follow my own path, alone. Thus I have had to learn to interpret the doctrines of my faith according to the commands of my heart, rather than the theological dicta of the high clerics. I am not disciple of moral relativism, nor do I believe in the whim of the moment as justification for actions that violate my beliefs. But I do not feel shame in what I have done.”

“Perhaps you would feel more comfortable wading through the blood of a neverending sea of fiends,” Dannel said. “For you could swing your sword until your strength gave out, Beorna, and not make a dent in the evil of this place. It is only prudence to use stealth and cunning, rather than brute strength, in these circumstances.”

Beorna’s expression darkened. “I am not a fool, elf...”

“Friends,” Cal said. “We cannot afford to drive a wedge between us, not here, not now, even if that wedge is merely one of words and ideology. I agree that allowing ourselves to compromise our beliefs is a dangerous path, and one best avoided. Believe me, templar... I understand whereof I speak; this is not the first time that we have sojourned to the Lower Planes. But I will respond to you now as I did to my companions then. It is not right to fight evil with evil. We cannot descend to become what we fight, in the name of justice. But we face a foe of unspeakable power and utter depravity. Adimarchus has already nearly cast our home into an apocalypse of planar war. If he escapes his prison, lost in his madness, I fear for what dark days may follow.”

The conversation ended on that note, and the companions completed the meal and busied themselves with their preparations. Weapons and spell components were checked and double-checked, and then the company followed Cal out of the citadel onto the surrounding plain. A word of command from the gnome archmage caused the instant fortress to collapse upon itself in a matter of seconds, leaving a small black cube that he placed into an inner pocket of his tunic.

“Everyone ready?” he asked. They formed into their two groups, around him and Dana. They cast their usual suite of protective spells, joined hands, and then the spellcasters teleported them to the next destination in their journey.

Harrowfell was an ugly tower, perhaps ten paces across, squatting atop a stone bluff overlooking a blank, desolate landscape that extended to the horizon in every direction. The travelers from Faerûn materialized near the entrance, perhaps thirty paces from the dark archway that served as an entry to the tower. The place had an odd texture to it, which resolved into a quick realization from the companions that filled even their veteran composites with disgust.

“Armor, weapons, and bones,” Dannel said.

“An odd material for construction,” Cal said.

“I can feel the Taint from here,” Arun said. “Fiends nearby.”

“Well, let us not keep them waiting then,” Cal replied, starting toward the dark archway.

There was no stirring from the black maw of the tower, or any other sign that their arrival had been noted, as they crossed the bluff to the entrance. Up close the tower seemed even more menacing, and they hesitated for a moment there.

“Perhaps our... bodyguards... should wait here,” Cal suggested quietly.

“We stick together,” Beorna said, although her expression indicated what she thought of this venture.

They had not bothered with a veil this time; the marilith would be able to see through such magic with ease. They had, however, agreed to conceal any overt signs of their faith or allegiances, another gesture that had not improved Beorna’s mood but which was so patently necessary here that even she could not dissent. With Cal in the lead, they entered the tower.

The place was empty save for a nine foot, v-shaped spike of black stone that appeared to have been jammed into the ground here like a dagger. The split stone oddly reflected the weak light that filtered in from outside, and when the eye turned away from it there seemed to be hints of movement briefly visible in its sheen.

“Fiends, on the walls,” Dannel warned, just loud enough for them all to hear. They looked up and saw them, babau and hezrou demons hanging from the interior walls of the tower, hissing warnings at the intruders upon seeing that they’d been detected. One babau shifted and a fat drop of red ichor dropped from it to land sizzling on the ground by their feet.

Why come you to Harrowfell? a voice echoed in their minds. They turned as a sibilant hiss of movement drew their attention to the sundered stone, around which a terrible monstrosity became visible. The marilith seemed to grow out of nothingness; the stone clearly wasn’t large enough to conceal her, yet there she was, coming around it into view. Her upper body was that of a woman, but her six arms and fiendish visage instantly ended any parallels that one might draw to a mortal creature. Each hand held a black-bladed sword with a jagged cutting edge, and behind her trailed the rest of her body, a mottled gray and black serpent’s tail that trailed for nearly twenty feet behind her. Her considerable presence filled the place, a power that whispered obedience and submission to her will. She was nearly nine feet tall, and they had to crane their necks to look into her black eyes.

“You do not belong here,” she said, her swords clinking slightly together as she moved, forming a crossing pattern of steel in front of her body. At her words, the demons above began to laugh, an eerie cackle that filled the confines of the tower.

“Uh oh,” Mole said.

Chapter 426

“I agree with your assessment, Lady Byakala,” Cal said, stepping forward. “But nevertheless, we have not come seeking a confrontation. Your citadel and your stone there are quite renown here on Carceri; a fiend at the Bastion recommended you to us.”

“The fee for its use is a minor magical item of a specified value, or a living humanoid, per individual use.” The marilith chuckled, sensing the discomfort that her words had provoked in them, especially the dwarves. There was some movement among the demons hanging above; possibly a preparation for an attack.

“We do not seek to use the stone,” Dana said.

The marilith regarded her coldly. “You would not be wise to attempt your powers upon me, priestess,” she said. She drew herself up to her full height, almost eclipsing the magical stone beside her. “I do not enjoy parlay with clients, and even less intrusions by those who have no purpose here. Speak your business, so I may be quit of you.”

Dana and Cal shared a look, but it was Arun, to their surprise, who stepped forward. The paladin was not a diplomat like Dana or brilliant arcanist like Cal, but he had the ability to weigh the moods and words of others, and he could likewise sense the growing tension between the two groups here that could explode into chaos at any instant. “We seek Skullrot,” he said plainly. “We were told that you might know its location.”

The marilith did not bother to hide her reaction to the name. “Much depends on your reply to this next question,” she hissed. “Why do you seek the asylum?”

For a moment the demoneess and the paladin stood facing each other, the others on both sides deferring to the two who weighed each other, each evaluating what they could of the motives of the other. Finally, Arun said, “A companion of ours was taken by those who serve Adimarchus. We have reason to believe that he has been taken there.”

“So the Dreaming God is your enemy, then?”

Arun hesitated again before replying, but this time the marilith was inscrutable, giving no clue as to her own feelings. Dana finally said, “We do not wish to see him escape from his bonds.”

The marilith chuckled. “Nor do I, priestess. Nor do I.”

She turned, her massive body trailing behind her as she slipped around the far edge of the broken shaft. “The masters of Skullrot will not be as... welcoming... as I have been.”

“We are determined,” Arun said, and there was nothing but truth in his voice.

“So I see. Well then, perhaps... perhaps we can reach terms.”

The demons hanging from the walls seemed a bit disappointed, but the companions were relieved as the immediate tension ebbed somewhat. The negotiations with Byakala lasted nearly an hour, and ended with the companions handing over another portion of their magical wealth, in the form of another pair of scrolls and an attuned gemstone from Dana. In truth, the price was lower than they’d expected, and afterward Cal had suggested that the marilith likely had some sort of grudge against the current owners of the prison.

“It may be a trick,” Dannel said, later, as they sped over the blasted wasteland that was Carceri. To increase their speed and save time, only half of the companions rode upon the magic carpet; Dana, Arun, and Beorna were all wind walking alongside, easily pacing the slower magical conveyance. With the lightened load the carpet was able to manage a higher speed, and they elected this time to travel at a higher altitude, trading a wider line of sight for the greater risk of drawing attention from aerial predators.

“Perhaps,” Cal said. “Demons are certainly master liars, and I doubt any of us would have been able to tell if she was weaving falsehoods. But they do understand power, and I think that she knew that we have a good share of it ourselves. It looks like she’s made quite a fief for herself around that magical stone, and I doubt that she’d be willing to give it up unless it were necessary. If I were in her place, I'd not want to risk having us return to Harrowfell seeking blood."

"Perhaps," the elf said, but he didn't look convinced as they continued their progress high above the surface of Carceri.

But this day luck was with them, and they detected nothing either in the air or upon the ground below as they made their way steadily in the direction that Byakala had indicated. The demoness had scoffed at Cymberion's contention that the place could only be found by one who had already visited; the site of the citadel was real and stable enough, she said; it was just magical detection that was thwarted by the potent enchantment laid upon it. The landmarks that the marilith had described were easy enough to follow.

Almost twelve hours had passed since leaving Harrowfell when their route took them over a vast swamp. The stench of rot reached them even flying hundreds of feet above the ground, and the misshapen growths of diseased trees jutting from the mire seemed to be clawing at them, frustrated by their inability to reach into the sky and draw them down into their embrace.

"I am real glad we don't have to walk through that," Mole said, bending out over the edge of the carpet to look down at the landscape passing below.

"We're going to need to stop soon," Cal said, looking over at the insubstantial forms of Dana and the warriors floating through the air nearby. Those on the carpet could take turns resting, but those under Dana's spell had no such luxury.

"Look!" Dannel said, pointing at the swamp ahead of them.

Peering through the murk, they could see what the elf had detected, sprawled across the swamp, half-buried in mucky pools and stacked atop muddy hillocks.

"Demodand bodies. Lots of 'em," Mole said.

"It looks like a battle was fought here, not too long ago," Lok said.

"I wonder why," Mole said.

"The army of fiends," Dannel said.

"Yes," Cal said, knowingly. "We must be nearing the place where the gate between worlds was to be opened by the Ritual of Planar Joining."

"I don't understand," Mole said.

"When the portal failed to open, the fiends must have turned on each other," Cal said. "While not as chaotic as demons, demodands are nevertheless nasty, cruel, and selfish. No doubt they were gathered here with promises of a new world to conquer, an escape from this," he said, indicating the whole of their surroundings with a wave of his hand. "Bring this many together, and then disappoint them..."

“It looks like there were thousands of them,” Mole said.

“Good thing they didn’t make it through to Faerûn,” Dannel said.

“Indeed,” Lok agreed.

They progressed further over the landscape, holding their noses against the smell of decay and corruption that rose up off the battlefield in waves. The swamp seemed endless, stretching out over the horizon as far as they could see in any direction. Cal called out to Dana, urging her to join them upon the carpet, but the wind walking priestess ignored him, drifting out ahead of them, all but forcing the dwarves and the others to follow her.

“Stubborn,” Cal grumbled.

“I think we can all understand her feelings,” Lok commented quietly. “She remembers Delem...”

Cal nodded.

“There’s something ahead,” Dannel said, drawing their attention forward once again. It was not long until they could all see what the sharp-eyed elf had spotted, rising up out of the swamp ahead in the distance.

It was a citadel, obviously massive even from their current range, growing exponentially more impressive as they drew closer. The place was set atop an outcropping of rock that rose up out of the swamp. In the garish half-light of the Carcerian sky the place had the look of baked adobe, rather than cold stone. Skullrot comprised a thick central core, rising high up into the sky like a tower, before splitting into four spires that curved outward before coming back together, bending to almost touch several hundred feet above the mire below. Black gobs hung on the sides of the structure, resolving into iron cages that appeared to be fixed to the exterior walls at random intervals. Those cages moved, slightly, although there was no wind.

There was sound, at first a vague stir on the air, becoming a cacophony of screams and mad gibberish that grew louder as they drew closer. It was as if the walls of the citadel were porous, allowing the noise to pass through clearly, and Cal grimly stated that it was not an illusion; what they were hearing was coming from inside the place.

Skullrot.

They had arrived at their destination.

Chapter 427

“Look, Dana and the others are landing,” Lok said.

Cal guided the carpet down to the hillock of exposed, muddy earth that the wind walkers were descending toward. A narrow, treacherous path led up the outcropping, although the only possible entrance that they could see was a narrow balcony that jutted out over the swamp; they'd need the carpet to get up there.

"Not very welcoming," Cal mused.

Dana materialized, followed by Arun and Beorna. As soon as her body had returned to substantial form she collapsed, falling to her knees in the mud, sucking in tired breaths. Arun, somewhat better off due to his considerable dwarven fortitude, moved to help her, but she held him at bay with an outstretched hand.

Cal had the carpet hover a foot or two above the muddy ground, close enough to the others to reach out and touch them. "We need to rest," he said. "We should head off, find a place to erect the fortress. The inhabitants of the place have seen us, no doubt, but that cannot be helped."

"No," Dana said, gaining control enough to look up, although she as yet did not try to rise. "We go in, now."

"Dana, don't be a fool," Cal said. "You can barely stand, and the dwarves, for all their strength, are surely little better off. And even those of us who rode the carpet all day need sleep..."

"Benzan is in there," Dana said, plainly. "I understand what you are saying, and I know the wisdom of your words. But rested or not, we cannot afford to wait. As you said, they know we are coming, and we cannot give them more time to take him away from us."

Cal looked at her, and then at the faces of his friends.

"I suppose you are going to tell me that you are going ahead, whether or not we elect to join you," the gnome said sardonically.

Dana did not respond, but her feelings were clear in her eyes; she could not have concealed them if she'd wanted to.

Cal sighed. "So be it," he said. "But we go in prepared."

"And not alone," Dana said.

The priestess cast spells of restoration to purge herself and Arun of their fatigue; Beorna used her own magic to do the same. Dana then began the familiar invocation of aid that would draw a powerful celestial to this place. The others kept watch while she cast her spell, scanning the surrounding swamp, their gazes drawn constantly back to the shadowy fortress that rose up out of the murk behind them. The light of Carceri was a constant, but down here at ground level, a dense miasma not unlike a brown fog hung in the air, blurring the outlines of anything more than a few yards distant. The air was foul, but at least it offered them some degree of concealment.

Dana's summoning drew on for minutes, but finally she threw down her hands in exasperation. "There is no response," she said. "I do not understand; I can feel the link to Selûne, strong even in this place. The spell should work."

"I can call upon helpers, when it comes to it," Cal said.

"Whatever potions or other limited-use items you have, don't be afraid to use them," Dannel said, drawing out and consuming a long-lasting potion of barkskin. Arun invoked a magic circle against evil.

"Dana," Cal said, stepping over to the priestess, who was enchanting another quiver of arrows for the warriors.

She did not turn to him. "Don't say it, Cal."

"Dana," he repeated, his tone firm, his voice compelling her to acknowledge him.

"We have to get him back."

"We are all in agreement on that. But you're the only one who can get us out of here... and you're the only one who can bring a fallen friend back to life. We all depend on you, Dana."

"I am not going to throw my life away!" she said, angrily. Seeing everyone look up, before turning quickly back to their preparations, she took a deep breath and looked down at him again. "All right, you've made your point," she said. "I will not fail in my obligation to the group."

"I know you won't," he said, touching her on the arm. "Come, let's go."

They boarded the carpet, which again sagged under their combined weight, and at Cal's command rose up above the swamp toward Skullrot. As they drew closer, the sound of screams from inside became almost overwhelming. They could see that the cages contained skeletons and zombies, twisting uselessly within their prisons, reaching through the bars toward the carpet bearing the companions.

"Remember your training, and your experience," Cal said softly. "Rely on the others, and work as a team."

"Take out the leaders first, and then worry about the grunts," Dannel added, testing his bowstring. In addition to his magical quiver, he'd hung a backup quiver full of holy arrows from his belt, secured to his thigh by a length of leather cord.

"Helm watch over us," Beorna said, running a length of cloth over the black adamantine length of her sword. At that moment, it was difficult to determine whether blade or woman was stronger. Arun reached out and clasped his hand on her armored arm; after a moment she covered it with her own. Within their helmets, their eyes could not be seen, so the others could not know what passed between them in that moment.

“Hold on, Benzan,” Dana mouthed silently, her eyes focused on some vague point ahead of them.

“Hoo, boy, this is exciting!” Mole said, hopping up and down on the edge of the carpet.

They reached the edge of the balcony, and quickly dismounted. Cal commanded the carpet to cease flight, and Lok and Arun quickly rolled it up. It was bulky, but carefully rolled it fit into Lok’s spacious bag of holding. Of course, that also meant that it could not be accessed quickly if needed again.

Up close, they could see that the fortress was constructed from an insane composite of skulls, all of varying size and shape. The place had to include literally millions of them, held together by some sort of resin. They didn’t need to test to know that the result was likely more durable than any masonry construction, and the skulls allowed the sound from within to pass through, explaining why they had heard the cries of Skullrot’s inmates earlier. This close the noise was almost deafening, but the companions steeled themselves to the suffering in those plaintive cries.

There was a single heavy metal door in the wall before them. Mole checked it quickly for traps, shooting them a thumbs-up before turning invisible.

Dana had used her discern location and greater scrying spells again that morning, in Cal’s magical fortress. Again Benzan had been reported at Skullrot, although the spell was not more specific, and this time she had attempted to scry Embril Aloustinai, without success. Dana still had her locate object spell, and she cast it now, focusing on one of Benzan’s possessions.

“Inside,” she said, after a moment. Arun and Beorna moved to flank the door, while Lok approached it, his axe tucked under his shield arm, in easy reach.

“Ready?” the genasi asked, his voice soft, even.

One by one, the others nodded.

Lok opened the door, and the seven companions from Faerûn entered Skullrot.

Chapter 428

The initial welcome was far from... welcoming.

The metal door screeched open reluctantly to reveal a large square hall, maybe fifty feet across. On the far side of the room a staircase led up to an open arch that presumably led to another portion of the prison. As the door opened the stench of demodands rolled out over them in an almost overpowering wave, its source instantly evident in the press of bodies that occupied the chamber.

“Farastu demodands!” Lok warned, even as coruscating beams of pale light lanced out at him. One hit the jam of the door, splaying out harmlessly into wisps of violent energy, but a second caught him in the chest, weakening the genasi. Several of the fiends—there looked to be about a dozen in the room—immediately rushed toward him, their sludge-encrusted claws reaching eagerly to grasp the intruder.

That stopped immediately when Dana unleashed her first holy word.

The farastus screamed and collapsed, their bodies quivering out of all control as they fell to the ground. One of the creatures, the one that had blasted Lok with its ray of enfeeblement had chanced to be in the back of the room, just out of the range of Dana's spell, and it hastily ran toward the stairs, intent upon escaping the power that had blasted its comrades.

Lok had moved into the room, hindered somewhat by the thick layer of farastu slime that coated the floor. He cautioned the others, who remained clustered by the doorway. Dannel entered, already drawing a bead on the fleeing farastu, and shot it in the back with a white-fletched arrow. The creature screamed in pain, but kept up its flight.

"All of them must be destroyed!" Cal said. Eyeing the floor dubiously, he cast a spider climb spell and started up the wall, intending to circle around and come at the stairs from above.

The demodand had reached the top of the steps now, with two of Dannel's arrows sticking out from its back. Beorna blasted it with a ray of searing light, and for a moment it looked like it would be enough to take it down, but it staggered up the last few steps and vanished through the arch.

Dana lifted into the air, carried aloft by her magical boots, but Cal cautioned her. "Let it go," he said. "We should get ready for the help it will bring, however."

Meanwhile a gristly scene played out on the floor of the chamber, as Lok and Arun put an end to the paralyzed farastus. Beorna trudged across the sticky floor, carrying Mole on one shoulder, while Dannel remained in the entry, covering them with his bow.

They did not have to wait long for the response. Barely ten seconds after the wounded farastu had disappeared, a sick sucking sound drew their attention back up to the arch. A dark form appeared... becoming a bloated, massive figure of a kelubar demodand.

With six arms.

Hexavog did not look happy to see them, and it promptly conjured an acid fog that billowed out from the center of the chamber floor, engulfing Arun, Lok, Beorna, and Mole in the corrosive green vapors.

But having unleashed its destructive power upon them, the demodand quickly came under heavy attack. Less than a second after creating the fog, before the mists could rise up to block the line of sight to the entrance, Dannel shot it with an arrow that vanished into the thick folds of its body, releasing a devastating pulse of electrical energy. Even as that gave it pause, it was engulfed in a painful blast of flames, as a flame strike from Dana caught it up, hurting it despite the considerable resistance to fire that it possessed. This was quickly followed by a lightning bolt from a tiny figure crawling upon the ceiling that Hexavog hadn't immediately seen. The magic was mostly shadow, which the demodand had recognized, but it still felt a nasty sting from the bolt that it preferred not to experience again.

As if that wasn't bad enough, two of the enemies within the fog quickly appeared, a dwarf woman waving around a big sword and another gnome, darting nimbly up the steps as if it going to engage Hexavog directly!

Heavily outnumbered, the demodand decided that it would be the better part of valor to withdraw and seek Slouva's assistance in dealing with these intruders. It wasn't going to let them off completely free, so as it retreated it hurled a dispel at the flying woman, grunting in satisfaction as her magic faded and she fell into the acid fog. Then it added a quickened fear, which hopefully would distract at least a few of its foes from pursuit. Without waiting to see how effective those tactics were, it retreated back into the core chamber of the prison to call upon some allies. The injured farastu was still there, cowering near the doorway, so Hexavog ordered it to create a fog cloud at the top of the stairs, again to better confound the intruders. The mutant kelubar would have liked to become invisible, but that of course was not possible here.

But even as the pathetic little farastu moved into position, one of the tiny gnomes appeared, moving very quickly for a creature of its unassuming size. The farastu saw it too late, and even as it turned the gnome leapt up into the air, somersaulting into an attack that easily befuddled the demodand. Something flashed in the gnome's hand, and the farastu collapsed, the hilt of a small rapier protruding from its ruined eye. The gnome didn't bother to try to recover her weapon, instead drawing forth a tiny knife as she landed smoothly on the stone tiles of the asylum floor.

"Slouva, get down here!" Hexavog shouted, its booming voice filling the vast interior of Skullrot. No doubt the little creature's friends were already making their way up to join her, but it would not be driven off by one tiny mortal, no matter how fast it was!

Thought became action, and Hexavog leapt forward, multiple arms raised to squash the daring, but foolish, rogue that had followed it alone to her doom.

Chapter 429

Mole looked up at the huge, six-armed monstrosity that towered over her, and felt a tingle of anticipation.

There's been a moment of uncertainty before, when she'd leapt off of Beorna's shoulder and rushed up the stairs, using the steep stone banister rather than the actual steps. The wave of fear from the kelubar had awakened a familiar gnawing pit of doubt in her gut, bringing back all the terrors and uncertainties that she'd felt in the wake of Zenna's loss and her own trip Beyond. Her will was not as strong as Arun's or Uncle Cal's or even Dannel's, and she'd often fallen prey to enchantments that clouded the mind, leaving her looking like a fool while her friends dealt with the threat.

But this time an unfamiliar surge of anger had flooded through her on the heels of the fear, banishing it, and as it departed she felt a burst of energy as she rushed up to the arch, darting through it without even a thought of hesitation. She saw the farastu step into her path, and leapt into an attack that left it dead, her rapier stuck for good in its skull.

She could not help but be astounded at the sight that greeted her, even with the giant kelubar dominating the chamber directly in front of her.

The interior of Skullrot was dominated by a vast open shaft that ran up the full height of the structure, hundreds of feet above. The lower tiers of the asylum contained side wings that ultimately opened onto the shaft, with low balconies at uneven intervals in all four directions. The sound was almost overpowering, the cacophony of mad cries from the cell blocks of the prison filling and rebounding in this central space. The whole was a heady insanity that was really quite intense.

But Mole's attention was quickly drawn back to the kelubar, which apparently decided it had had enough of running. It moved with a speed surprising for a creature of its size and bulk, and the ground shook—or was that just her heart pounding in her chest?—at its coming. Its smell preceded it, making her want to gag, but she fought off the reflex. It opened its jaws and a gob of acid shot out at her; well, that was something she could deal with, anyway, as she smoothly side-stepped the acid arrow. She leapt over the first sweeping fist that slammed into the ground where she'd been standing, but as she came down another clipped her solidly on the side, knocking her flying. She was able to land on her feet, ignoring the sizzling pain where the acidic slime covering its body had contacted her flesh, but quickly had to leap back as another fist pounded into the ground. It followed her, keeping up a violent all-out assault.

She didn't even bother to try an attack, putting all of her effort into keeping it busy, staying in one piece. She knew that her friends would be coming, but she'd seen how the floor in the last room had made even walking a struggle even for her stronger companions. An arrow emerged from the archway, buzzing as it stabbed into one of the kelubar's arms, but it did not even appear to notice the attack. Mole smiled, but quickly had to contort her body to avoid another powerful attack. Her face burned as something sharp just clipped her on the forehead, and she staggered back, hot blood pouring down her face. Before she could recover another fist slammed solidly into her with the force of a battering ram, and she was knocked back roughly, landing on her chest and sliding several feet more before she came to a stop.

"Ouch, good one," she muttered. The kelubar started toward her, but it stopped as a green beam struck it in the chest, blasting away a great swath of rancid flesh. She heard a clank of metal behind her, and didn't have to turn to recognize the familiar sound of Beorna joining the fray. Lok and Arun would not be far behind, she knew.

But even as the demodand roared in pain from the power of Cal's disintegrate spell, Mole caught a hint of movement that drew her attention behind the creature. Emerging from a shadowed stairwell came a gray skinned, muscled hag, easily eight feet tall. And behind her, making her seem puny in comparison, came a pair of massive, shuffling monstrosities, humanoid things that looked, to her horror, to have been stitched together from the hides of other creatures.

"Well, well, what have we here," Slouva hissed.

Chapter 430

Mole waited for the kelubar to try to finish her, poised to spring back up into an evading roll. But Hexavog, it seemed, had decided that close combat with tough foes was less desirable than beating upon a solitary gnome, and its small wings beat furiously behind it, combining with its magic to lift it into the air.

It didn't get very far as a barrage of arrows knifed into it. Three missiles slammed into the fat kelubar's body in rapid succession, and as the last disappeared into its bloated neck, its wings suddenly stopped working, and it plummeted to the ground to land in a sick splat upon the stone.

Mole glanced over her shoulder at Dannel, who'd changed—he'd sprouted wings! The elf was already drawing out another arrow from the quiver at his hip, switching targets to the hag.

Beorna was already on her way, charging the witch, calling upon the power of Helm to infuse her sword with divine potency. Slouva merely gestured for her golems to flank the charging templar, their incredibly long limbs giving them the ability to attack long before Beorna drew close enough for her own attack.

Mole flipped herself back onto her feet almost effortlessly. She glanced back again, and saw Cal standing at the peak of the arch that led back to the farastu room, clinging to the wall with his magic. Lok and Arun appeared in the opening below him, both looking a mess with acid burns on their armor, and their bodies and weapons coated with tendrils of clinging farastu slime. Dana had not yet appeared, and Mole hoped that she was all right.

But at the moment, the battle continued, and she turned her attention to helping Beorna. The templar took a pair of mighty hits from the golems, staggering but not abating her rush toward the hag. But even as she lifted her sword to strike the hag leapt suddenly at her, seizing her with her claws, grasping her arms and twisting, sending agonizing spikes of pain through her body. Pinioned by the hag's incredible strength, Beorna could only struggle weakly, unable to break free.

"That's right, my pretty," the hag said, her face inches from Beorna's. "It hurts... but soon it will hurt much more, every day more than the day before!" Cackling, she twisted again, and something popped in Beorna's body, and the templar screamed in pain.

Dannel had sighted down the length of a white-fledged arrow, but held his shot; the annis and templar were so closely intertwined in the grapple that even he could not clearly force his target. He'd already used his seeker arrow against the kelubar, so there was nothing he could do to aid the dwarven woman.

But he could help his companions. Lok and Arun had immediately charged after Beorna, although the remnants of the farastu ooze continued to hinder them somewhat. The golems moved to block the pair of warriors, but by a subtle agreement Lok moved to engage them while Arun burst through, ignoring the powerful blow that caromed off his shoulder as he blasted between them. The golems immediately set about battering Lok, but the genasi was far too tough for even these foes to take him down quickly. The genasi unleashed several powerful blows with his axe, and soon one of the golems was staggering backward, great rents opened in its legs and lower torso under Lok's assault.

Dannel picked that one, and commanding his quiver to produce normal missiles he began peppering it with arrows. The golem was resistant to his missiles, but Dannel infused each shot with magic, and collectively they began to have an effect, tearing at the very form of the monstrous construct.

Dana appeared through the arch, flying high over the battle through the power of her winged boots. The priestess looked even worse than the warriors, her white skin splotched with acid burns, but a barely-controlled fury burned in her eyes as she fixed them upon her target. The annis sensed her coming, but did not release Beorna, continuing her pressure until the inevitable snap that would mean the end of her first victim.

But Dana wasn't going to wait for that, and as she landed behind Slouva she reached out to lay a gentle touch upon the hag's shoulder.

Slouva let out an involuntary scream as the priestess's harm spell ravaged her body. Snarling, she spun, hurling her grappled victim into the priestess, knocking both of them to the ground as she staggered free. Arun rushed at her, but while he was able to just clip her with the tip of his holy avenger, it was not enough to stop her as she spun and darted rapidly away toward a door not far from the staircase where she'd appeared. The paladin did not immediately pursue, instead looking to Beorna.

The templar could not move, both of her shoulders dislocated and several bones snapped, but through a haze of pain her gaze fixed on Arun's. "What are you waiting for, you fool! Stop her!" she shrieked. It was clear that only dogged stubbornness kept her clinging to consciousness; her body had absorbed more damage than anyone should have been able to take.

But Arun only helped her up, pouring healing energy into her as he did so. Only when it was clear that she could stand on her own power did he turn toward the departing annis.

But she'd already vanished through the door. And Dana, he saw, had rolled to her feet, and was already there, rushing through the portal after her.

"Dana, no!" he cried. Hoping that Lok could handle the golems alone, he ran after them.

At that moment, Lok was having difficulties. While his armor was holding against the powerful blows of the golems, each hit was driving a pulse of momentum through his body until his organs began to feel like jelly within his body. Another few hits, he knew, and he'd be in trouble.

But the golem he'd targeted was likewise having problems. Dannel's arrows and his own powerful swings had left its body a mess of shredded flesh, with only the fell power animating it keeping it together. The second golem was a problem, able to get in unabated attacks against Lok's less-protected flank, but the genasi was aided by a shadowed dire lion that leapt onto the creature, slashing and rending with all four of its claws. The brainless construct immediately shifted to this adversary, leaving Lok free to focus his attacks upon the golem in front of him. It managed one more punch that Lok took on his shield, then the genasi brought his axe up into its left knee, severing the already-savaged joint and sending it toppling to the ground. The golem struggled feebly for a few moments, then fell still.

Arun reached the half-open door through which Slouva and then Dana had disappeared, when a familiar scream from the chamber beyond, full of pain and despair, chilled him to the bone.

“Dana!”

Chapter 431

When Dana chased the fleeing hag, she really didn't have a clear idea of what she was doing; on the one hand, she was too seasoned not to know that she might be running into another trap. But the buzzing in the back of her mind triggered by her spell was still there; she knew that Benzan's wedding ring, the focus for her earlier locate object enchantment, was nearby, in the general direction of the annis's flight. And where the ring was located, Benzan might still be...

So she chased after Slouva, darting through the door just in time to see the hag exit through a portal on the far side. The chamber was fairly spacious, maybe thirty feet by sixty, with another door on the far wall in addition to the one that the annis had used. It looked like a workshop, dominated by a huge table apparently fashioned of bone, with a thick cover of stitched flesh stretched atop its surface. At the corners of the table bone hands about twice the size of a man's were extended, shaped like claws, with what looked to be faces stretched out over the tips of the fingers. Several large glass vats were stationed along the walls, most filled to the brim with a reddish fluid from which rose a harsh chemical odor. Above the vats shelves were crowded with clear jars and pots that held body parts preserved in fluid.

But of more immediate concern was the fact that she was not alone in the room. A pair of the huge golems were already moving forward from the flanking walls toward her. Dana's stomach clenched in disgust as she got a good look at them; like the others outside their hides appeared to have been stitched together from the flayed faces of hundreds of diverse beings. The nearest was already close enough to swing at her with an unnaturally long arm. The priestess dodged, but even so took a glancing blow that knocked her roughly to the side, almost dropping her into one of the vats.

“Look out, Dana!” came a warning from behind. Mole's voice; apparently the gnome had followed her in here. She spun around and leapt back as a massive limb shattered the vat. Cold fluid washed over her legs, and a body that had been submerged in the vat fell out onto the stone floor of the chamber. Her breath froze in her chest as she realized that the face of the dead person had been removed, and she felt a terror building inside her as the familiar outlines of that mutilated body impressed themselves in her mind.

The hulking table was jostled aside by an onrushing golem as it rushed toward her. She turned, and got a good look at the golem's face... or rather, at the features of the face that had been stretched over the oblong shape of its head...

She screamed, as the distorted visage of Benzan, her husband, looked down at her.

A moment later, the golem's fists slammed into her chest, and everything went mercifully dark.

Chapter 432

Mole couldn't do anything to help Dana as the golem bashed her with both fists, knocking her roughly across the room to land in a limp heap next to one of the processing vats. From Dana's reaction to the faceless body, she had a pretty good idea of who he was, but she had other problems right now, as the second golem attacked.

She dove under the table, which sagged as a golem blow pounded into it. For a moment she wondered if this was the best strategy—despite the nature of its construction, the thing looked damned heavy, and could likely crush her beneath it if it gave way—but then the sounds of battle filled the room, and she knew that her friends had arrived.

She flicked a creature from her bag of tricks out into the room, to help distract the bad guys.

A creak drew her attention to one of the far doors. As it opened, she heard a buzzing noise that filled her with a strange lethargy. She tried to fight it, knowing the danger as she saw the gray legs of the hag reappear, but it was hopeless as she sagged to the ground, falling into a deep magical sleep.

Arun heard the buzzing too, but was able to shake off the somnolent effects of the drone, bolstered still by his earlier magic circle. He saw the hag return, accompanied by a huge, grotesque fly-like fiend, the source of the buzzing. But he could not focus on either just yet, as the golems pressed their attack. A fist imprinted with a stretched humanoid face slammed hard into his shield, sending a jolt of pain up his arm.

He knew that his best option was to retreat, and try to draw these foes out into the larger room where his friends could bolster him. But he'd seen Mole vanish under the table, and saw Dana's limp form as he'd come in, and knew that if he fell back, that his companions were dead.

So he stood his ground, and stepped forward to attack the nearest golem.

The annis seemed a bit more cautious now, content to let her allies focus on the foe. The chasme, floating nearer but still well out of Arun's reach, blasted the paladin with a ray of enfeeblement, which certainly did not help his situation any. He'd already seen how much damage the golems were capable of inflicting, and knew that the time he could hold out was measured in the seconds. And he'd already used most of his healing on Beorna, earlier.

Ah, to the hells, he thought, and taking the hits he knew he would, he leapt forward, and smote the chasme.

That got its attention.

A roar announced Beorna's return as she burst through the open doorway, followed only a few paces later by Lok. The templar's body still moved awkwardly, as if her limbs didn't quite know what her brain had in mind for them, but she ignored the pain as she rushed toward the nearest golem, slamming it with a mighty two-handed strike from her adamantine sword as it turned to meet her. The blow carved through its body, knocking it back a step despite its huge size. But it was incredibly tough, and quickly countered with a pair of blows that in turn drove Beorna back. She'd healed herself, and Arun's magic had likewise aided her, but she was quickly back on the brink of consciousness, another hit or two from joining Dana on the floor.

Lok rushed into the fray a moment later, choosing as his target the same damaged golem. He aimed for the gap in its body opened by Arun and Beorna, and his axe clove deeply into it, backed by his considerable strength. A snap announced the severing of its spine, and it crumpled into two disparate halves, each trying uselessly to function.

"Beorna... help Dana!" Lok urged, turning to face the second golem, turning to catch its fist on his shield. The dwarf obeyed, falling back away from the melee; although she knew that Arun was in trouble, duty infused her, and she had to turn away.

The chasme, meanwhile, disengaged from Arun, but not before lashing out with a foreclaw that stabbed through the visor of his helmet, opening a gash at the corner of his eye that oozed blood. As Arun tore free, lifting his sword to strike, the demon buzzed higher into the air, lifting its grotesque body just out of the paladin's reach. With the holy warrior unable to intervene, it called upon its power, and a buzzing many times stronger than its own lulling drone filled the air.

Beorna knelt beside Dana's stricken form, battered but still alive. Calling upon the power of Helm, she cast a powerful healing spell upon the priestess, who stirred, the positive energy channeled by the templar snatching her back from the brink of death.

"We need your power, priestess!" the templar urged, before a familiar voice drew her around.

"Come back for more, did you?" Slouva cackled. With the chasme distracting Arun, the hag had circled around the edge of the room, intent upon finishing Dana. Seeing how seriously wounded Beorna was, the hag leapt at her, long claws outstretched.

"EEEEeee!" she screamed, as a holy arrow blossomed in her side. Electrical energy blasted through her as Dannel's arrow buried itself deep into her, and she aborted her attack to leap instead toward the open doorway.

A storm of buzzing insects—locusts, each almost half a foot in length—filled the chamber, called by the power of the chasme. The insect swarm surrounded the combatants in a blinding storm, slamming into them, crawling into gaps in their clothes and armor to bite and scratch. Hundreds settled onto the golems, both the active one and the one already destroyed, feeding on the ruined flesh. Others leapt eagerly upon Mole, who still slept, deep under the effects of the chasme's buzz.

Dannel held his ground as Slouva appeared in the doorway, just ten feet from where he stood. The hag leapt at him, taking the arrow he fired into her chest. She seized him with her powerful claws, tearing at his flesh even through his magical armor. She was so incredibly strong; even as injured as she was, she flung the elf around like a rag doll, spinning him around before flinging him roughly into the nearby wall. Dannel, stunned, could barely stand, fighting to get back the breath that had been dashed from his lungs.

"Perhaps we will dance again later, pretty boy," she cackled, turning toward the nearest stair.

Her laughter became a scream as another ray from Cal blasted her in the torso, highlighting her in a green nimbus before she was disintegrated by the beam.

"Thanks," Dannel said to the gnome, who was clinging to the wall just above the side doorway.

"Just taking out the trash," the gnome said. "We'd better get in there," he added, gesturing toward the room where the chaos of battle and the noise of the insect swarm sounded yet from within.

The warriors fought on, greatly bolstered by a mass cure critical wounds spell from Dana. The chasme held its ground, but that only gave Arun and Lok a chance to double-team the remaining golem, hacking it to pieces with their powerful blades. The demon used its power of telekinesis to hurl one of the heavy tables at Arun, knocking him roughly to the ground, his shield arm jutting at an unnatural angle from his side. The demon sought to follow up its advantage by descending enough for its deadly claws to savage the crippled paladin, but before it could reach him several holy arrows darted through the still-raging storm of locusts to sink deeply into its body. The chasme keened in protest, but its own distraction caused it to notice too late the bulk of Beorna, enlarged by the magic of Helm, approaching through the swarm. The templar unleashed her own smite against the insectoid fiend, cleaving it in half with a single mighty blow of her adamantite sword.

Lok got a hold of Mole and dragged her out from under the table, and the companions withdrew from the chamber. Some of the locusts came with them, but most remained where the chasme had summoned them, feeding on the remains of the golems.

"Gah, get them off!" Mole exclaimed, waking to find several yucky insects crawling around in her hair and under her clothes.

"Good thing she didn't wake up a minute ago," Dannel said to Lok, as the genasi helped her.

Dana, meanwhile, started back inside the room, but Cal quickly moved to grab her. "Dana, what are you doing?"

“He’s in there... Benzan’s body!” the priestess cried. “We have to get him out, before those bugs...”

Cal nodded. “Let me see what I can do.” And indeed, a quick dispel magic cleared the swarms, sending the summoned insects back to wherever they had come from.

They went back into the room, closing the door behind them, wary of more guards coming from the prison in response to the battle. In the frenzy of the melee they had each almost tuned out the constant noise of the asylum, such that its return made them start, the screams of the mad prisoners tearing again at their senses.

Dana knelt beside Benzan, holding his ruined body against her. “I’ll help you, my love, I’ll bring you back,” she said, sobbing softly. “Get his... his face, it’s attached to that golem,” she said, pointing, but not turning to look at the ravaged form of the creature that Lok and Arun had destroyed.

The paladin and genasi carefully removed the flayed skin of their friend, returning it to Dana, who laid it almost tenderly upon Benzan’s ruined face. She then began chanting, calling upon the power of Selûne to return him to life.

“We are still in danger here,” Beorna said, looking around. “I do not believe that this is the sum total of Skullrot’s defenses.”

“You are likely right,” Cal said, plying his healing wand upon his companions. Nearly all of them had been heavily wounded in the running battle that had begun when they’d opened that first door, and only luck or fate had allowed them to avoid fatalities in this initial engagement. Arun and Lok took up a warding position near the outer door, while Dannel and Mole checked the rest of the room. Mole started toward the left door in the far wall, the one opposite the portal that Slouva and the chasme had used, but Cal forestalled her.

“Let’s wait until Dana finishes her spell,” he suggested. Mole nodded, giving the door a quick examination for traps before returning to the center of the room.

Dana’s incantation continued, her voice all but drowned out by the ongoing cries of the asylum’s inmates, which passed through the porous walls as though they were not even there. Cal drew out his lyre, and played a melody that created a dissonance between those horrible sounds, the tune filling the room and making the background cacophony seem to fade slightly. It wasn’t much, but it helped their resolve as they waited for the priestess to finish her casting.

It took only about a minute, but it seemed like longer, given the circumstances. Dana abruptly stopped and rose, her expression betraying the outcome of her spell even before they looked down at Benzan’s immobile corpse.

“It’s not working,” she said. “His soul cannot return.”

The companions shared a look; none of them wanted to say what they were all thinking. But Dana herself put it into words, her voice empty, as though her own life had been drained away by her failure to restore Benzan’s.

“Graz’zt has him,” she said. “It’s Delem, all over again. Graz’zt has him...”

Chapter 433

“Dana, we don’t know that for certain,” Cal said. “We’ll take him back with us, we can try again when we return to the Prime...”

He trailed off as she saw that she wasn’t listening; she’d turned her attention toward the two doors in the far wall, an odd look of concentration on her face.

“There is one more matter that we must deal with, ere we depart,” Beorna said.

Lok nodded. “Adimarchus.”

“Whoever or whatever still wards this place, it no doubt knows we’re here, and is prepared for our coming,” Dannel said.

“We must be cautious,” Arun said. “Whatever happens, we do not wish to facilitate the imprisoned godling’s release from his bonds.”

“I thought we were here to destroy him?” Beorna asked.

“It may come to that... but at the moment we do not know if such a thing is even possible,” Dannel said.

“If he is bound, his powers may be weakened,” Lok said. “Cal, what say you?”

But the gnome was turned away. While the others talked, Dana had started toward the left door. “What is it, Dana?” Cal asked her.

“Benzan’s ring... the focus for my locate object spell... it is beyond that door.”

“Careful,” the gnome said. He and the others moved quickly into ready positions near the door. Dana barely waited for them to prepare before she reached out and pulled the heavy door open.

The chamber beyond was square and almost thirty feet across, but it seemed much smaller due to the utter blackness that filled it, seeming to resist the light shed by their magical items like some living thing. But nothing stirred in the room, which was dominated by three tables fashioned out of some sort of black resin, glistening as the illumination finally reached it. The tables had been crafted to resemble great mushrooms with their tops flattened. Laid out upon those surfaces were an assortment of grim artifacts, including black-bound grimoires, scrolls manufactured from flayed skin, vials and jars of rare powders and condensates, and other objects of indeterminable use and function. The most dominating item was an intricately fashioned pair of metal claws. The sculpture, set on the nearest table facing the door, had been arranged so that one of the claws clutched a dull metal bottle, while the second had its long nails dug into the bottle’s stopper. Behind the tables they could just make out what looked like an iron chest, close against the far wall. The entire place was infused with a subtle odor; not the familiar and ferocious stink of demodands, but a charnel smell that was reminiscent of graveyards and decay.

They all paled as they looked into the room's interior, but Cal was especially grim. "The magical auras in this place," he breathed. "Gods, the level of power... it makes my own spells seem cantrips in comparison..."

"There is evil present as well," Arun agreed.

Dana had been looking for one thing, and as she saw it—a familiar ring, left almost casually on one of the tables—she stepped forward into the room.

And as she did, the metal hands shifted, drawing the stopper from the iron bottle atop the near table. Almost immediately a gout of green smoke was disgorged from within the container, swirling and growing rapidly into a substantial being.

"An iron flask!" Cal exclaimed, too late.

It took only a few seconds for the prisoner of the flask to appear in full form. It was huge, looming over them, its head nearly brushing the ceiling fifteen feet above. Its body was lean and skeletal, with ugly green flesh clinging to its bones. Its ribs formed a cage around an empty hollow in the center of its body, a hollow that was occupied by a small, terrible remnant of a being, trapped within the prison of the monster's body. That figure opened its mouth in a silent scream, mockingly echoed by the gaping jaws of the devourer as it eagerly regarded the living foes that had released it with a hungry look burning in the twin pinpoints of life deep within the sockets of its skull.

Chapter 434

Having released a huge, advanced devourer clearly set as guardian over this place, the companions wasted no time in getting down to business.

"Destroy it!" Cal shouted, stating the obvious in case anyone was too overwhelmed by the creature's sudden appearance to attack. Cal was quick to put his own words into action, blasting it with an acid arrow from a wand. The acid splashed over its body, doing little damage, but one look had told the gnome that this enemy would not go down easily.

But the others were already adding their own attacks to the tally. Mole darted around the edge of the threshold long enough to fire her crossbow into the creature; the tiny bolt did little damage but unleashed a jolt of electricity into its body as it sank into its thigh. Dannel likewise was able to fire over Dana, scoring two hits that ricocheted off of the thick bones of its torso, tearing away strips of ugly green flesh. The imprisoned being inside the devourer's chest tried to shrink away from the impacts, shielding its head in a pathetic gesture.

"Dana, clear the doorway!" Lok urged, his axe at the ready. The priestess lifted a hand and fired a bolt of searing light into the devourer's body, blasting away part of its substance, driving it back. She stepped aside, deeper into the room, to let her companions enter, but the undead monster was already reaching for her. Its claw was large enough to seize her head entire, but it merely reached out, touching her lightly with the tip of a claw, drawing a pinpoint of red blood from the center of her forehead.

Dana staggered, fighting off a cold chill that she recognized as an attempt to paralyze her. She was made of stern stuff, however, and she was further bolstered by Arun's still-active magic circle against the evil touch of the devourer. But even as she regained control, she felt a wave of mental energy wash over her, forcing her to shift focus from strength of body to strength of mind. Her will was such that this attack too slid off of her without effect.

But her companions were not all equally gifted. The confusion effect unleashed by the creature took hold of Mole and Lok, taking hold of their minds and temporarily stealing their sanity. Lok just stood there, his axe lowered, but Mole lifted her crossbow and shot her uncle point-blank in the shoulder.

Arun turned as Cal grimaced in pain, but the gnome pointed at the creature with his wand. "Destroy it first, then we'll worry about them!" he urged. The paladin nodded, and followed Beorna into the room, their weapons raised to strike down the huge undead abomination.

The creature's size and reach made just getting to it difficult; Beorna took a powerful hit that staggered her, its claw crushing into her shoulder, the brief contact draining her of a fraction of her life essence. The templar merely grunted and shook off the monster's claw, driving forward to rip her adamantine sword deep into its leg, shivering the bone beneath the emaciated flesh.

Arun, a step behind, rushed around the odd mushroom-shaped tables to flank the creature, coming at it from the side. But before he could reach it, the devourer released another wave of mental power. Again Dana and Beorna, their minds fortified by their commitment to their gods, resisted the effect, but this time Arun faltered. The dwarf, screaming incoherently, brought his holy blade down across the table, striking the iron claws and sending them flying across the room.

The devourer followed up its advantage by blasting Beorna with a ray of enfeeblement that sapped her strength. But the templar merely tightened her grip on her sword, and invoked the power of Helm.

"You made your mistake by letting me get close," she hissed, her jaw clenched.

Then, with a roar, she unleashed a full assault of power attacks against the huge undead creature. The devourer, being undead, was not vulnerable to the critical strikes that would have disemboweled a living creature, but it was nonetheless staggered by the powerful impacts of the templar's ultrahard bastard sword.

But Beorna found herself nearly alone against the monster, as her companions were finding their hands quite full with their confused companions. Dana tried to release Arun from the magic holding his mind, but her attempt to dispel the devourer's magic failed, and the paladin charged at her in a rage, swinging his holy avenger. Dana darted back, narrowly avoiding a cut that would have impaled her, but still taking a glancing hit along the ribs that stung through her light tunic. She leapt into the air, her magic boots carrying her out of the paladin's reach.

Back in the outer chamber, Cal and Dannel were likewise having difficulties. The gnome had lifted his wand to fire another blast at the devourer, but he saw Lok turn to face him, madness in his eyes, and quickly aborted that plan. Knowing that he could be diced into stew meat if he remained adjacent to the genasi, he instead fell back, out of Lok's reach. Predictably, the warrior followed, but Cal quickly cloaked himself in invisibility and leapt to the side. It was a close call—close enough for him to feel the breeze caused by Lok's axe as it whipped close by his head.

But while Cal had temporarily escaped his ally's attack, the maneuver left Lok close by Dannel, who likewise had no choice but to withdraw, taking him out of the line of sight of the doorway, and the enemy.

"We've got to take that thing out!" he yelled.

"Working on it!" came Cal's voice, from nearby.

Beorna felt her life force ebbing as the devourer tore at her with both claws, tossing another quickened confusion at her for good measure. Again she resisted—barely—and returned its attacks with more two-handed strikes from her sword. But she was getting weaker, the energy drains combined with its earlier ray of enfeeblement to sap her vitality and very skill with the blade. She had no choice but to cut back on the all-out desperate strength of her blows, as a power attack deflected harmlessly by its unnaturally durable hide. The entity trapped in its ribs cowered, shrinking with each release of its captor's powers.

Thus occupied, she did not see Arun turn away from Dana, and step toward her from behind, his holy sword coming up slowly above his head.

Chapter 435

"Beorna!" Dana warned, seeing the confused paladin step forward to strike down the templar from behind. The templar glanced back and tried to adjust, but was hindered by another series of attacks from the devourer, including a claw that seized at her helmet, ripping the adamantine headpiece roughly from her head, exposing her to death if she took another blow to her exposed skull.

"Selûne's light!" Dana cried, hurling her second—and last—dispel magic at the paladin in a desperate attempt to forestall a tragedy.

Arun hesitated, his sword quivering in his hand, just another step away from being within reach of Beorna. Then he roared out a challenge in dwarvish, this time his fury directed at the monstrosity that had nearly caused him to strike down the woman he loved. He came forward, but it was not to attack Beorna, but rather to bring his holy avenger down in a brilliant arc of white light that cut through the devourer's body. The trapped being seemed to flicker and then vanished, as half of the devourer's body—its left leg and a big chunk of its torso—went flying across the room, while the rest simply dropped to the ground in an inanimate heap.

Meanwhile, out in the chamber, Lok turned toward Mole, who'd simply remained there with a dull look on her face, occasionally breaking out into a series of crazy giggles. The genasi's body trembled with effort, and for a moment lucidity returned to his gray eyes. He did not hesitate, ripping his helmet off of his head and shucking his shield, and with a mighty effort he slammed the flat of his axe into his own face.

His face splayed with blood from his shattered nose, Lok toppled to the ground, unconscious.

Mole screamed, running at full speed across the room, and through the far door, into Slouva's personal chambers. Fortunately there was no trap or other guardian waiting there, and the others found her huddling in a corner, whimpering. Arun and Beorna took hold of her, and shortly thereafter she returned to her own senses.

Dannel had bound Lok securely with rope, using about five times more than what he would have used to tie up a normal man. But when they healed the genasi he too had recovered from the devourer's magic. Cal and Dana plied their healing arts, and quickly restored most of the wounds they'd taken in the battle. Beorna was still drained, however; it would be another day before Dana could prepare more restorations.

"That was a close one," Cal noted. "If one or two more of us had succumbed to the confusion, we could have done real harm to ourselves."

"I am sorry," Lok said.

Dannel grinned. "Don't be. In fact, we owe you gratitude, for what you did... to yourself. Can't say I've ever seen that approach to enemy mind-control magic before."

Arun looked equally grim, but Beorna poked him with the tip of her sword. "Don't you be feeling sorry for yourself, either. Mind magic is nothing to sneeze at, and there is no shame in being under its power."

"It was potent," Dana said. "I failed to dispel it the first time, and very nearly failed to the second as well."

"This always happens to me," Mole said. "I may as well hang a sign around my head that says, 'Weak mind here, cast a spell on me.' I need something... Uncle Cal, is there an item you can make for me that will help protect my mind from these sorts of things?"

"I may be able to craft something," Cal replied. "But it will have to wait until we return home."

"Speaking of which," Lok said. "Perhaps we should attend to our task."

"Let's clear out these rooms," Cal suggested. "Quickly, but carefully. Mole, if you would?"

Arun and Beorna kept watch on the outer door while they conducted a quick search. Lok assisted Dana in carefully wrapping Benzan's body, which they stored in one of their larger bags of holding. The priestess's body shook as she bound the mutilated corpse of her husband in white cloth, but when they finished, her expression was frighteningly intense as she stood and took up her weapons. Lok, too, looked uncharacteristically grim.

Cal, Dannel, and Mole found nothing worthwhile in the annis's chamber, other than a bed apparently fashioned of flayed skins, but the same could not be said for the other room, the black chamber where they'd fought the devourer. There they discovered numerous items of magical potency, on the tables and in the iron chest in the back of the room. They found the rest of Benzan's items, which they temporarily shared out to those best able to use them, along with a number of magical potions and scrolls, another bag of holding filled with thousands of gold coins, and a small ebon lacquer box containing three huge black sapphires. They also found a pair of bundles with some familiar items: a longbow carved with a leaf pattern accompanied by a quiver, sword, cloak, bracers, and an amulet wrapped in a mithral chain shirt; and a headband, pearl pendant, wand, and a small wooden replica of a chest wrapped within a bright red robe. Even before Cal found the two familiar rings in a vellum wrap at the bottom of the chest, they had a good idea of who the two packages of items had belonged to.

"It looks like the Cagewrights that fled here were unsuccessful in their bid to release their master," Cal noted, handing the unstrung bow and quiver to Dannel. The elf admired the weapon—Kyan Winterstrike's frost longbow—for a moment before storing it, along with the extra arrows, in his efficient quiver. Cal placed the other items into his haversack, for review later when they had more time to spare.

"Do you think they're held here now?" Dannel asked.

"I wouldn't be surprised," Cal noted. "Although I would be surprised if they were in any condition to speak with us right now." As if to bolster the gnome's comment, a fresh surge of screams filtered through the walls, a babble from dozens of voices that seemed to mesh together in a backdrop just shy of painful upon the ears. Of more concern was the damage being wrought to their minds and souls; Cal wondered how long it would take all of them to become mad, in this place.

"These are worth a lot of money," Mole said, lifting one of the sapphires to examine it with an expert eye.

Cal had turned to the books upon the tables. "These are foul tomes, full of dark lore, sacred to the Prince that is our enemy."

"We should destroy them," Dannel said.

"I agree, but we lack the time and perhaps the means to do so here," Cal noted. "And we may learn something of use about our foe. I will exercise caution," he added, noting Dannel's expression, "but for now, we will at least remove them from the grasp of our enemies." He placed the books into his haversack, making room by redistributing some of their extra supplies.

“Are you ready?” came Dana’s voice from the outer room. “I’m getting sick of this place, and want to be quit of it soon.”

Dannel, Mole, and Cal rejoined the others. The archmage looked at each of his friends, noting the effect that the discovery of Benzan’s body had had upon Lok and Dana, in particular. He understood all too well what they were feeling, but he also knew that they risked even more, if they let their emotions dominate them, in an unforgiving environment like this one.

But the part of him deep within, beyond his godlike intellect, beyond the clinical analysis of the archmage’s mind, grieved for the loss of his friend.

“Let’s go,” he said, barely able to keep his voice from shaking.

They opened the door and started back into the main hall of the prison.

And screamed as a horrid wilting blasted into them, sucking the very life from their bodies.

Chapter 436

The companions staggered as the dark magic tore through them, drawing moisture from their flesh and organs, turning breathing into an agony, tightening their throats until even their cries of pain rattled in their gorges like dice in a cup. Even Beorna, weakened as she was by her earlier clash with the devourer, could not resist the effect, and Dannel and Mole were each particularly hard hit.

“Where?” Cal hissed, coughing as he fought the word out.

“Above!” Arun said, lifting his sword to point into the cavernous empty interior of Skullrot rising hundreds of feet above where they stood.

Looking up, they could all see it, sixty or seventy feet above them. Wrapped in diaphanous robes that were little more than shreds of black silk, it was a monstrosity straight from the most depraved nightmares of sickened minds. It was skeletal, part man, part something other, with huge wings that were only struts of bone jutting from its back. Those wings could not keep it aloft, yet somehow it flew, drifting slowly down toward them. It carried a scythe with a black blade that seemed to ooze bloody red light, and its eyes were points of black fire that were somehow darker than the deepest night, mesmerizing orbs that drew the viewer in, releasing them only with an effort of will.

“What... is... that...” Mole chattered.

As if in response, each of them heard a voice within their minds, a rustling of wind through a graveyard.

I am the Dark Myrakul, mortals... and you have violated the sanctum of the Great Lord... Rejoice in your last instant of free thought, for the rest of your existence shall be spent as wards of Skullrot, trapped in an eternal prison of your own suffering...

“A lich...” Cal breathed, the sound of his own voice breaking the spell of the Dark Myrakul’s fearsome appearance and terrible words. “Spread out!” he warned, following his own advice as he retreated back into the doorway to the golem laboratory. He cast a spell—not at the Myrakul, for he knew that his wands and few remaining attack spells would be of little use against it—but at his companions, bolstering them as best he could against what he knew to be coming.

As the others spread out across the floor of the wide main hall of the asylum, drawing out their missile weapons or preparing their own defensive magics, Dannel stood his ground and unleashed a barrage of rapid-fire holy arrows. Equipped with Benzan’s greater bracers of archery, his shots were even more devastating, and while the skeletal body of the lichfiend was largely immune to even Dannel’s potent arrows, the holy missiles discharged their blessed power into the body of the fell monstrosity with each hit... one, two, three impacts that drew a mental scream from the creature.

“That’s it, blast it, Dannel!” Mole said, shouting encouragement. The gnome rogue was at a loss for what to do herself, given that she had no holy ammunition for her bow, and she thought (in hindsight, as her shout echoed through the interior of Skullrot) that it might not be a good idea to draw its attention to her in any case.

Darting into one of the shadowy stairwells that occupied the corners of the hall, she tried to think of something to do.

Dana ran toward the stairs that led down to the exit, not intent upon escape, but merely on gaining position for the battle against the lichfiend master of Skullrot. She cursed herself for choosing to give up her undead to death spell for the heroes’ feast that she’d cast that morning; not that the spell would likely have worked against this foe’s mental defenses in any case. She was drawn by Lok’s call.

“Dana! I must close with it!”

She nodded, and opened her mind to the goddess as she ran over to the genasi.

Beorna and Arun moved together across the hall, drawing out their heavy bows. “If we cannot bring it into melee, we will be hard pressed to harm it,” the templar muttered. Arun agreed, but while he had no doubt that its scythe was a terrible weapon in close quarters, he suspected that it would most likely remain high above them, raining down destructive magic from its secure perch in midair. Dannel was really the only one who could hurt it, with his incredible skill with the bow, combined with the holy arrows in his quiver.

He was right on both counts. The Dark Myrakul had come to the same conclusions as the paladin, and as the brilliant white shafts continued to fly up into the empty hollow of the fortress’s interior from Dannel’s bow, the lichfiend drew upon the fullness of its dread power, and calling upon the most potent of its magics it imploded Dannel. Even with Cal’s magic bolstering him, the elf could not resist the spell, and his body crumpled in upon itself, his deadly bow clattering to the stone floor beside the crushed heap of flesh that had been the arcane archer a heartbeat before.

Chapter 437

“Dannel, no!” Mole cried, only able to watch as another of the Heroes of Cauldron fell, destroyed by a powerful enemy.

Flames engulfed the lichfiend as Dana called upon her last flame strike. But the column of searing divine flame faltered as it struck the body of the Dark Myrakul, dissipating against the undead priest’s spell resistance. It turned toward her, its mocking gaze terrible as its dark orbs pierced her, promising suffering to come.

But the master of Skullrot faced a more immediate problem as Lok lifted off of the ground, empowered by Dana’s fly spell, and knifed straight up toward it. The genasi’s axe was not the ideal weapon against the resistances of the lichfiend, but the look on Lok’s face said that he would not be forestalled by any such hindrance. The Dark Myrakul ignored him, focusing its still-active implosion spell upon Dana. The priestess screamed as the magic gripped her, but staggering backward she drew upon every last reserve of her focus and determination, and was barely able to overcome the potency of the spell before it left her like Dannel, a crumpled mound of flesh.

Lok roared and lifted his axe in both hands, dropping his shield and focusing instead on an all-out attack. Had he struck, he might have sundered even the unholy fabric of the lichfiend’s corporeal form, but as he drew within ten feet of it he rebounded off of an irresistible invisible shield. Momentarily stunned, the genasi’s momentum carried him off to the side, beyond the lichfiend, as he reverberated from that barrier—an antilife shell—and slowly spun to a stop fifteen feet away.

Arun had strung his heavy bow, but what he’d seen thus far had told him that his shots would have no effect upon it. If only he’d been able to close, with his holy avenger... but then the outcome of Lok’s aborted attack told him that the lichfiend had prepared against that contingency as well. The paladin turned and retraced his steps back to where Dannel’s body lay. Only the vague outline left by his garments and armor revealed that the gruesome remnants had once been a living man, but Arun did not spare thoughts for his friend now; this foe would not stop until all of them were either like the elf or forever imprisoned in the cages of Skullrot, their screams adding to the cacophony of insanity that filled the place. The paladin saw what he wanted, and took up Dannel’s bow and magical quiver.

Beorna had realized what he was about, and had followed him. As Arun rose he held out the quiver, which on command had already produced several of the white-fletched arrows from its extra-dimensional space.

A flash of light and a rush of air from the doorway to the golem laboratory announced Cal’s latest contribution to the battle; a shadow-eladrin, a bralani who rose up into the air toward the lichfiend, firing arrows from its holy longbow as it came. Against the mundane and magical defenses of the Dark Myrakul, however, its attacks were little more than a distraction.

Lok turned in mid-air and immediately came at the lichfiend again, lifting his axe to strike. This time, however, as he neared its barrier he tensed and hurled his weapon at it. The axe struck its body squarely and bounced back, doing little damage but certainly drawing its attention. The Dark Myrakul gestured, and a black beam lanced into the doughty warrior. Lok had faced dragons, fiends, and even gods, but he could not withstand the power of the energy drain as it mercilessly stole away a considerable fraction of his life-energy. Already seriously injured by the horrid wilting, the genasi had no choice but to fall back, barely clinging to consciousness.

But Lok's efforts had given the others a few precious moments to act. Arun and Beorna opened up their own barrage of holy missiles, and while they lacked Dannel's skill, they still managed at least one solid hit that further damaged the undead creature. Dana had withdrawn into the cover of the archway and was engaged in a powerful summoning, while Cal was doing the same from within his own shelter. Mole, unsurprisingly, had disappeared.

The Dark Myrakul unleashed a terrible cry, a sound barely audible to normal hearing, but which seemed to grate upon the soul like fingernails drawn over a slate. At first the companions thought they were under another magical attack, but the noise seemed to do no lasting harm, and they wondered what it portended.

They did not have long to wait.

"What in the Hells was that?" Beorna said, as she drew another holy arrow and fitted it to her bowstring. As the two dwarves lifted their bows, they saw what looked like a huge black orb appear in the shadows high up near the summit of the spire. The orb grew larger as it plummeted down toward them, taking on form, thick arms and legs, misshapen body...

"Get back!" Arun yelled, pushing Beorna aside before retreating back in the other direction. The Dark Myrakul calmly shifted position, moving out of the way of the plummeting newcomer, which streaked down past it to strike the floor below. At the last moment it had unfolded considerable wings that caught the air, slowing it, but it still hit with enough force to crack the ancient stone.

The thing was huge, bigger even than the misshapen flesh golems they had fought before. It had a similar look, constructed of body parts from various creatures combined to form a new level of monstrosity, but this creature was formed from pieces of fiends, adding the worst elements of multiple species of demons and demodands into one hideous being. The force of its impact would have broken every bone in the legs of a mortal creature, but the demonflesh golem indicated no hindrance whatsoever as it lumbered forward, its massive claws reaching out for the two dwarves.

Chapter 438

Arun felt a cold touch of fear settle over his soul as the gaze of the demonflesh golem met his. But he was a knight consecrated to the hammer of Moradin, and the fell power of such a monster held no power over him. Drawing his sword, he rushed at it, taking the hit he knew he would have to withstand to get to it, tearing free from its grasping claw, lunging forward and bringing his sword down into its leg.

It was like hewing at old leather with a dull knife. The thing's hide was incredibly strong, but the construct was infused with evil, and that made it vulnerable to the power inherent in Arun's weapon. The paladin stood his ground as the golem pounded him with its huge claws, one larger than the other, drawn from different creatures. It was strong—insanely strong—but Arun was full of the power of his god, and he gave as good as he got.

And then Beorna was at his side, hewing at it with him, her own deep voice adding a strident dwarvish battle cry. It was only then that Arun realized that he'd been singing a song of battle that he had not heard since his youth in the Rift, part of the past he thought he'd put behind him.

But the golem was not merely a tough physical combatant; it was infused with dark magical powers as well. It demonstrated this by opening its jaws wide and breathing a cloud of vapors upon the dwarves that tore into their already desiccated bodies; it was in effect another horrid wilting upon the one that the Dark Mrykul had hit them with before. But the dwarves stood their ground. Beorna was able to shake off the effect this time, her divinely granted mettle protecting her. Arun lacked that gift, although he withstood the worst of the effect, and while he was weakened, he was able to fight on.

But then a coruscating pillar of flame descended from above, a gift from the Dark Myrakul who still hovered sixty feet above them, wreathed in its multilayered wards, all but immune to attack. Beorna had simply taken too much abuse; she collapsed, smoke rising from the gaps of her armor, a stench of burned flesh rising above her. Arun had been protected from fire, but he too suffered from the corrupt energies of the strike, and suddenly his situation looked a lot more dire.

But with Beorna lying unconscious beside him, he could not retreat, even grievously wounded with a dire foe looming over him. He lifted his sword again, knowing that without help, there could only be one outcome.

But help was in short supply, as the dwarf's companions were finding themselves in dire situations of their own.

Dana had summoned an avoral, which she'd commanded to aid Lok. The genasi had withdrawn to one of the galleries flanking the main hall, barely conscious, collapsing to the floor behind the shelter of one of the stairwells, fumbling with a healing potion from the pouch at his waist. He felt weak, diminished; the energy drain had stolen much from him.

The Dark Myrakul had ignored the bralani thus far, which had closed to almost point-blank range, firing arrows that caromed harmlessly off its many shields. The lichfiend recognized it as a shadow-creature, of course, which further diminished its effectiveness. But as a quartet of lantern archons—also shadowed—rose up from below, blasting with their light-beams as they came, its patience was exhausted. It spoke a word of blasphemy, instantly destroying the summoned creatures, including the avoral as it headed toward Lok's retreat.

That small matter attended to, the master of Skullrot examined the battlefield. Its demonflesh golem had the dwarven warriors well in hand, especially after its flame strike had taken out the female. The enemy spellcasters had withdrawn to shelter to summon allies, but if the shadow-creatures and the avoral were the best they could do, then this engagement would soon be completed.

Content in its own invincibility, the lichfiend began its own powerful conjuration.

Mole's heart pounded in her chest as she ran up the stairs, the sound warring with the noises of battle and the usual screams of torment that filled Skullrot. Desperation thrust her onward, and she rapidly gained height, ascending the varied tiers of the citadel, glancing out over each balcony that she passed, dreading the sight of the lichfiend waiting, watching her, ready to blast her with some nasty magic. The sinister powers inherent in Skullrot kept her from becoming invisible, but cloaked in her dark garments, and nearly silent, she was almost undetectable. Still, she did not trust in her skills to conceal her from this enemy, which had already killed one of her friends with apparent ease.

It'll kill all of them, if you don't do something! came that annoying voice in the back of her mind that tried to interfere whenever she did something crazy.

"I'm working on it!" she hissed back, coming to a stop at one of the galleries. She was a little bit below the lichfiend's level, now, although as she saw the roar of a flame strike knife down at her friends below, she knew that she didn't have any more time to go higher.

But instead of running toward the balcony and the battle raging in the interior of the asylum, she ran outward, deeper into the gallery. Huge portals of iron set with small, barred openings were set along the walls at regular intervals, from which the familiar screams issued intermittently.

Mole glanced through a few of those openings, hopping up with her magical boots long enough to look through. Finally she came to a likely candidate, and stopped. She drew out the chime of opening she'd taken from Slouva's body, but she didn't need to use it immediately; the door was open.

That was odd, and it gave her pause, but the desperate sounds from without drove her forward.

As she entered she saw why the outer door hadn't needed to be locked. The prisoner was secured with chains that surrounded him entirely, pinning arms, legs, and body with a thoroughness that she had to acknowledge even as she felt pity for the poor thing's suffering. The captive was a planetar, his wings battered remnants, the rest of his body in little better condition. He lifted his head and regarded her, his eyes full of a deep madness that Mole might have recognized had she not been in such a hurry.

"We're having quite a lot of trouble with that lich," she told him, as she lifted the chime toward him. "If you could... well, you know, use your holy powers and all, help destroy it... well, that would really be helpful."

She struck the chime, and the chains loosened their grip upon their captive. Of course, she wasn't quite ready for the reaction she got from the released celestial. It wasn't quite the gratitude she'd expected...

Chapter 439

They were nearly done, Arun thought, as another blow from the demonflesh golem slammed into his shield. He saw it twist, its tail coming around at his face, but he could not move swiftly enough, not now, with his body stiffened by the wiltings it had absorbed, blackened by fire, battered by the hits he'd taken from the golem. He'd called upon Moradin's power to bolster him, but even so he knew he could not take more than another hit or two. The golem's tail struck him square on the front of the helmet, driving him back, his vision full of exploding stars. But some stubborn core kept him going, demanding that the next hit, not this one, would be the one to take him out.

"Arun!" Dana cried, rushing back out from cover, toward him. The paladin knew that she offered hope, healing magic that could keep him going longer, fighting on... or succor for Beorna, restoring her to the battle, drawing her back from the brink.

He thought he could see the blue glow forming around her hands, when a vrock demon dove down from above and into her, sending both rolling back in a tumble of arms and legs and wings.

He did all he could do. He attacked. He could only reach the lower half of the golem's body with his sword, and his attacks were feeble—he could almost sense its anticipation, as the paladin's blows slid off of its thick legs. The massive fists came up. There was no way he could resist them, no way he could take another hit...

"Have faith," came a voice from behind him.

Despite himself he started, and even as he recognized Cal's voice a billowing cloud of gray smoke swept out over him, momentarily obscuring everything in its folds. But then the leading edge had passed, and he realized that it was just a figment, concealing the dwarves and the gnome archmage, lingering back outside of the reach of the golem.

"Get her, quickly!" he urged, directing the illusion. Arun could dimly hear his own voice, and the loud clatter of the golem's movements, and realized that the smoke had been only part of the gnome's distraction. The paladin took up Beorna, and half-carried, half-dragged her with the gnome into the relative shelter of the golem lab.

Cal thrust a potion into the genasi's hands. "Heal her... we haven't got much time." He immediately began spellcasting again, drawing upon what was left of his magic.

Dana screamed as the vrock tore into her with its talons, feeling her skin burn as its spores tunneled into her flesh. The demon was tougher than she was, but she had anticipated close-quarters combat and had infused herself with divine power. Thus fortified, she was able to slide out of the vrock's grasp. She immediately shot off through the doorway back to the entry foyer, calling upon the power of her winged boots to carry her swiftly away.

The vrock, letting out an eager screech, was quick to follow.

The Dark Myrakul was an ageless creature, undead for so long that it could barely recall the vicissitudes of mortal life. But that part of it that could still feel was growing impatient with these enemies who so tenaciously fought on, against the odds that were so stacked against them. They had destroyed Slouva and its golems, but that was no great matter; minions could always be replaced. The annis had been plotting to supplant it in any case, and probably would have had to been removed at some point anyway. But these enemies had intruded upon its citadel, had undermined the security of its charge. And for that if nothing else, they would experience torments...

Impatience became annoyance as the dwarves were evacuated out of the reach of its mighty golem, drawn away by a simple figment. The construct lunged after the two illusory dwarves, and the lich had to admire the complexity in the hastily-crafted spell; the figments were just too swift, moving out of its reach, while remaining close enough to lure the golem further after them across the chamber. A sentient being would have recognized the illogic in the scene, but the golem, intent only upon destruction, was fooled.

Waving a hand, the Dark Myrakul dispelled the major image.

Sensing movement, the lichfiend turned to see that the genasi had reappeared at one of the balconies, holding a greatsword now, burning—and freezing—in an unusual combination of elemental powers. The mortal warrior had healed himself somewhat, but even as he stepped forward and lifted into the air to return to the fray the Dark Myrakul hit him with a destruction that enveloped him in black fire, blasting him backward to fall unmoving to the ground.

Two, the Myrakul thought.

A loud cry—familiar—drew the undead ancient's attention back around, to yet another gallery. It saw a diminutive form charging toward the balcony—the gnome rogue, coming for... a suicide attack? The gnome leapt for the railing of the balcony, too soon to clear it, it seemed. But that was her intent, as a moment later she twisted her body as she hit the floor and slid between the metal bars that supported the railing, coming to a halt as she dangled over the edge of the gallery, placing herself in a clearly unenviable and vulnerable position.

The reason for her odd behavior became obvious a moment later as a charging form appeared behind her from the shadowy depths of the gallery. The insane planetar caught sight of the Dark Myrakul and leapt at it, madness radiating from him in his gaze, his movements, and the nonstop screaming that filled the air around him. He struck the antilife shell of the lichfiend and battered against it, slamming it with his fists in a violent but useless gesture.

The lichfiend calmly blasted the angel with another destruction, surrounding it with unholy fire. But the fallen celestial was beyond mere pain, and some small part of his mind whispered of powers never lost. With another cry he dispelled the aura keeping it at bay, along with a few of the lich's other wards, although most of its spells remained intact. The angel eagerly dove at its tormenter, slamming at its skeletal body with desperate strength. Several ribs snapped as he blasted the lichfiend with a powerful punch. For a moment it looked like the ancient undead priest would be overcome by the sheer violence of the attack, but the fallen celestial's assault faltered a moment later as the Dark Myrakul swept its scythe up in a sudden arc, intersecting the angel's body with a red flash. The angel fell back and down, its head separating from his body as both plummeted sixty feet to splatter on the hard stone below.

Holy arrows slammed into the lichfiend from below, as Arun and Beorna, recently restored at least to partial health, reappeared from below and opened fire. Again they were largely ineffective, although this time it was Beorna who scored a lucky hit, penetrating the undead priest's defenses with an arrow that glanced off of its oblong skull. The demonflesh golem, alone and unoccupied at the far end of the chamber, immediately turned and lumbered toward them, and the dwarves retreated into the room, forcing the golem to bend low and attempt to squeeze through the doorway after them.

The Dark Myrakul's summoned vrock returned via the eastern arch, sans the priestess it had chased out a few moments before. With the golem fully occupying the doorway to the laboratory where the dwarves had taken refuge, it spotted an easier prey in the form of Mole, and it flew toward her as the gnome flipped back up over the railing, running back into the gallery with the winged demon following.

The Dark Myrakul let it handle the retreating gnome, instead taking advantage of the momentary lull to refresh the magical defenses that protected it. The planetar had brought down its spell immunity, but with the enemy spellcasters having yielded the battlefield, it did not look like it would need that protection... and in any case its spell resistance was still potent.

A crash that reverberated through the hollow spire drew its attention upward. The sound had originated in That Place That Must Be Guarded At All Costs, the focal point of its duty in this place, the prison that held Skullrot's most powerful "guest". Immediately the lichfiend launched straight up into the air, ascending the shaft, casting ahead with all of its unnatural senses

A slender form appeared high above, knifing through the air as it plummeted down the central shaft of Skullrot toward the Dark Myrakul, much as the demonflesh golem had just a few moments earlier. But this time the newcomer was much smaller, smoother, diving with fists extended above her head straight toward the undead priest. It was Dana, and her body seemed to glow as she cut through the darkness. The lichfiend reflexively adjusted its position and hurled a spell at her, but both were ineffective; she shot right through its final destruction, fighting through the agony of the black fire, and using her boots she altered her course to match the Dark Myrakul's.

The lichfiend lacked time to cast another spell, but it brought its vorpal scythe up to intersect the priestess's descending form. They struck at the same instant, the undead priest stabbing its weapon deep into the woman's body even as her fists, empowered with a heal spell, drove into its skull. With its greater spell immunity stripped away the full power of the Selûne's divine light tore through its body, bathing the interior of the citadel with the soft life-affirming glow of gentle moonlight. For a few brief moments the suffering of the asylum's inmates eased, and their screams faded to a silence that seemed wholly peaceful.

The two combatants drifted downward in a tangle of black robes and shattered bone. Half of the lichfiend's skull had been blasted away, and blood poured from the terrible wound in Dana's chest opened by the Dark Myrakul's scythe. Dana fought a surge of pain and madness that radiated out from the body of the undead ancient, but could not resist a terrible feeling of horror that crawled over her flesh as the lichfiend's ruined skull twisted, fixing her with a black gaze that radiated still from the ruined hollow.

I am not finished with you, Dana Ilgarten! came a voice, and with a terrible realization she knew that it was not coming from the Dark Myrakul, but from someplace... else.

But in the here and now, bony claws locked around her throat, binding the two of them together. Poison spread into her through that touch, poison and madness and death. Dana screamed and unleashed the power of Selûne through that link, countering its fell darkness with pure healing energy.

The two priests, undead and mortal, crashed into the ground in an explosion of bone and blood and black fire and white light.

Chapter 440

"Dana."

The voice drew at her across a great gulf. She was floating in darkness, but it was calm, reassuring, not the shadows that filled the place where the voice originated. She did not want to go back there, but the voice was insistent.

"Dana. Come back to us... we need you."

She wanted to turn away, but could not. She was brought back across the boundary, back into a light that was blinding, painful. She lifted her eyes to shield them, and realized that she could do so; she'd regained physical sensation and awareness of her body without realizing it. Vision came somewhat slower, as she gradually recognized the forms that hovered over her.

"Wha... what happened?" she managed to ask. Her throat felt as dry as the sands of Anauroch.

"Drink this," Cal commanded, offering her a waterskin. The water tasted amazingly good, but her throat was unable to handle it all, and she choked.

"Careful, slowly," Cal said, easing her head up enough so that she could recover, before offering her the skin again. She couldn't quite get up, not yet.

"What happened?" she repeated.

"You took out the lich," Cal said. "It was really quite dramatic."

"I remember that," she said. "If by 'dramatic' you mean 'crazy'. What happened after that... is everyone all right?"

“Dannel is dead,” the gnome said. “Lok nearly joined him, but he stabilized at death’s door. Fortunate that he’s as tough as he is.”

Dana turned her head—it took some effort—and looked around. They were still on the ground floor of the prison. She saw that the door and a big part of the surrounding wall leading to the golem lab had been torn away.

“Arun and Beorna took out the demonflesh golem,” Cal said. “I burned an entire healing wand and most of my remaining buffs keeping them standing, but they did all the hard work themselves. They also killed the vrock that the lich had summoned; Mole was able to keep it busy long enough for them to come and help. I saw it chase you out; when it came back without you, I’d feared...”

“As soon as I cleared the outer doors I dimension doored up to the top of the citadel,” she explained. “Once there I used my adamantine nunchaku to batter a small opening in the wall, enough to just slip through. There’s a huge chamber at the top of the spire; somebody’s up in a cage up there, but I didn’t get a good look.”

Cal nodded; he had a good idea of who it was, but they had more immediate concerns at the moment.

“Help me up,” Dana said.

“You’ve taken a heavy beating—not just physically, but mentally and spiritually. You should take it slowly...”

“Help me up,” she repeated, in a way that did not brook disagreement. Sighing, the gnome complied. Her body was responding to her commands, although she felt more than a bit unsteady. She called upon Selûne’s power and cast a cure serious wounds spell upon herself. It helped, some, although Cal was right; she’d been battered in ways beyond the power of a simple healing spell to resolve. In particular, that dark voice that had spoken in her mind, at that last moment...

“Dana, what is it?”

“I’m all right,” she said. “Where are the others?”

“They are helping Lok. Ah, look, there they are. Come on, I think he’ll need what healing we have left.”

They gathered together again, surrounded by the debris of battle and the remains of their enemies. The mad cries of the imprisoned had resumed at their full strength, and the weary companions felt oppressed by the aura of the place, somehow stronger now that they had overcome its guardians.

“Let’s get out of here,” Mole said. They’d done for Dannel what they could, gathering his possessions and wrapping his body as they’d done for Benzan, putting what was left of the elf into one of their bags of holding.

“We are not finished here,” Beorna said.

“We have little strength left in reserve, Beorna,” Cal said. “Adimarchus would be too much for us, in our current state.”

“Even at full strength, that might be the case,” Lok noted.

“There is another thing to consider,” Arun said. “Assuming that the lich was the final guardian, then Adimarchus’s is now without defenders. What would stop any of the Cagewrights from entering this place and releasing him?”

Cal frowned. “We don’t even know how to release him.”

“If anyone has that knowledge, it would be his servants,” Lok said.

“I agree that retreat may be necessary,” Beorna said. “But I would first look upon the one responsible for Jenya’s death, and all of the suffering unleashed upon the good people of Cauldron.”

Cal looked up into the great shaft that formed the interior of Skullrot. The heights above them were lost in darkness, but the spire had been where the lich had come from, and its deadly golem.

“Come on then,” he said, starting toward the nearest stair.

Slowly, they began to ascend.

Chapter 441

The companions made their way up through the tiers of Skullrot, passing the galleries with their prison cells.

“What should we do about them?” Lok asked, as they passed another ward of the prison.

“There is nothing we can do about them,” Cal said. “We do not know what crimes led them to be placed here, but we do know that all are almost certainly insane, like that celestial Mole freed.”

“I think it is premature to assume they are criminals,” Arun said. “Their only crime may have been to antagonize Graz’zt.”

“I would be cautious in using that name, especially here,” Dana said.

“In any case, we have enough on our plates right now,” Cal said. “Let us first deal with Adimarchus, and then we will revisit the issue of the fate of the prisoners.”

They rose up higher into the citadel’s spire, now over a hundred feet above the ground floor below them. The galleries gave way to blocks of cells placed on the inside of the spire itself, between the stair and the inner hollow within the spire, so they could no longer see the central shaft. At each corner another flight of stairs curved higher up into the fortress, opening onto another row of iron doors to their left. These cells were obviously much smaller, barely big enough for a full-sized human, and those that were occupied did appear to hold humanoid creatures encased in straitjackets crafted from black hides. Those unfortunates reacted unpredictably to the passage of the companions outside their cells; some lay in comatose states, others babbled in strange languages, and others screamed at the top of their lungs, hurling themselves at the door and not ceasing until the intruders were well past.

“This is the worst place I have ever visited,” Mole said miserably.

“I think that we will find our objective at the top,” Cal said, urging them ahead. Mole, in the van, charged up the nearest flight of steps, the others close behind. As they reached the landing of the next tier of cells, they saw Mole crouched by the doors of one of the cells up ahead.

“What is it, Mole?” Cal asked.

“Fresh blood, here on the stairs,” she said. “Whoever’s in here, they were put in fairly recently.”

The companions gathered before the small iron door. The door was tightly secured, but a note from Mole’s chime of opening caused it to swing open, revealing the crowded space beyond.

The only occupant was a woman of middle years, naked, wreathed in blood and sweat and a stink that washed over them as the door opened. Her hair was matted and tangled about her scalp and across her shoulders, and she was entangled in a mass of black chains that bound her arms and legs tightly together, forbidding even the most basic of movements. The chains were interwoven with metal barbs that pierced her flesh, opening fresh runnels of blood that ran across the filth that covered her, dripping to the resinous floor that seemed to drink up each splash eagerly, leaving the floor dry and bare.

She looked up as the door opened, and they recognized her; she was the woman who had taken Benzan, back in Skullrot. But there was nothing else about her that was familiar; in her eyes there was only an empty depth, a vacuous nothingness that seemed as hollow as the empty promises that had brought her here.

“You...” Dana said, sucking in a breath, her fingers tightening to white on the haft of her spear.

“Embril Aloustinai, former High Priestess of Kelemvor, in Cauldron,” Cal said. “Mystic theurge... and Cagewright.” The woman did not show any recognition at the gnome’s words, but a thin keening noise sounded in the back of her throat, a piteous mewling that was not quite human.

Chapter 442

“How do you know that?” Arun asked. “Hers was a name we’d heard a lot, in Cauldron... but we’d never seen her, the whole time we were in the city.”

“Yeah, even when we trashed the temple of Kelemvor,” Mole added.

“After our last... encounter,” Cal explained, “While we were in Redgorge, I spoke to several of the members of the Chisel about what we’d learned in Cauldron. Maavu Arlintal was able to match my description of the woman we met in Shatterhorn with the name of Aloustinai.”

“How the mighty have fallen,” Beorna said.

Dana had leaned into the cell, staring at the woman. Embril did not react, but the chains seemed to tighten around her body, opening new wounds as the barbs dug into her flesh. It wasn’t clear how she could continue to take so much abuse and still live.

“Careful, Dana,” Mole said. “I think those chains are... alive.” Remembering an encounter with a chain-creature in the depths of the Malachite Fortress under Cauldron, an encounter that had not ended well for her, the gnome rogue shuddered.

“She deserves to die for her crimes,” Dana said.

“She may yet have information that may be useful to us,” Cal said. “She was a leader among the Cagewrights... and she knows more of... of both of our enemies, I think.”

“She is mad,” Dana said.

“Madness can be healed,” the archmage returned, softly.

“We are not far from the top of the spire,” Lok pointed out. “If she is not... going anywhere...”

“I do not condone torture, but in this case I must agree with the genasi,” Beorna said. “Adimarchus is not far, I suspect.”

At the mention of the demon prince’s name, Embril’s head shot up, causing the chains to twist reflexively tighter around her torso. Even barely unable to draw breath, she shuddered and screamed, “The Eye! The Eye! The Smoking Eye! It burns! It burns forever!” The sound of her voice filled the hall and distorted eerily up and down the spire, until it echoed back as a grotesque cackling.

“Shut up, SHUT UP!” Dana cried, finally slamming the haft of her spear into the woman’s face. The screams shut off as the Cagewright crumpled, blood oozing from her broken nose.

For a moment the Heroes of Cauldron just stood there, silent with the noise of Skullrot surrounding them.

Finally, Cal sighed. "Let's go."

They made their way up the last few flights, until the stairs opened onto a massive open chamber, a rough hemisphere with a ceiling that rose to a dome nearly fifty feet above them. Other than a hole in the center of the floor that accessed the hollow interior of the spire, the room was devoid of unique features. There was a small hole in the ceiling, opened by Dana during the battle with the lichfiend and its minions, through which the ruby sky of Carceri could be seen. The only other design element was a large cage of black metal, suspended over the opening by a long chain that passed through a socket in the ceiling, trailing across the room to a secure mooring on the far side of the chamber. Sitting inside the cage was the figure of a man, the details of his form obscured by the thick bars and ugly flourishes that decorated the structure. The cage itself was familiar, resembling too keenly the soulcages wrought by the Cagewrights as part of their bid to join Carceri and Cauldron, and free their master.

"Echoes of madness," Cal said, as the companions stepped warily from the stairwell into the open space of the room. Spreading out, they slowly approached the cage, each step reluctant, as if they were fighting the reflexive and sensible instinct to flee this place and never return.

Adimarchus did not respond to their presence, to the sounds of their approach, or even to the holy light of Arun's sword as it penetrated the cage and spilled over his flesh. He was slumped over, looking away from them, an ebon-skinned figure clad in a skirt of metal scales, with four tentacles that rose from his back, culminating in mouths that unconsciously gaped open every now and again, as if tasting the air. The body of the captive god was muscled, shorn of hair, impressive even in captivity.

As they watched in silence, the form of the imprisoned figure shifted, blurred. Then they were looking at the same being, yet at the same time completely different in form and appearance. Still in the shape of a man, the captive prince's body became a violet hue covered in golden runes that crawled over his body, disappearing beneath the golden breastplate he wore. Golden wings spread out from his back, replacing the tentacles, and he wore a golden gauntlet that culminated in sharp points that idly scratched at the flesh of his thigh, without conscious realization of what he was doing. Still he did not acknowledge their presence. After a few moments the angel-figure shifted, again reverting to the form of the black-skinned demon.

"By the gods," Dana said. "What... what is he?"

"A demon prince," Cal said. "A godling... a being of incredible power. But mad... whether through the collapse of his own mind, or by the efforts of his captors."

Arun looked unsteady, and did not refuse Beorna's steadying hand. "The Taint... so strong... I have never felt the like."

"Does he even know we are here?" Lok asked.

“On some level, I am sure he does,” Cal said. “But from what we’ve observed, and what we have learned, most of his influence is more subtle, working through the minds of his followers, drawing them into his madness. The Ritual of Planar Joining... even the design of the soulcages; they have been shaped by him, from within the confines of his prison.”

“I don’t know about the rest of you, but I get the feeling that we are treading upon a very, very narrow bridge, overlooking a great precipice,” Lok said.

No one offered any disagreement.

“So after all of it... after everything we’ve gone through to get here,” Mole finally said. “Now what do we do?”

Chapter 443

A simple question, yet it opened a great many uncertainties.

“We cannot do any more,” Dana said. “We have to leave this place, return with our dead to Faerûn... and then, do what we can.”

“Just leave him here?” Beorna said, with surprise.

“There is nothing more we can do,” Lok said. “Dana is right.”

“He doesn’t look so tough... Arun’s blade through his back should solve our problem, demon prince or no.”

“I do not think that would be advisable,” Cal said. “But this may require further deliberation. There are two things that we need to remember. The first is that if we do depart now, we may not get another chance to stand where we stand now. The second is the response we received to Dana’s commune.”

“If we do nothing to intervene, then Adimarchus escapes his prison,” Dana said, nodding as she recalled the information she’d received in her last bonding with Selûne.

“Um... should we be talking about this in front of him?” Mole asked. “He’s not doing anything, but he’s still really creeping me out.”

“There is still the fate of the prisoners here, including the Cagewrights, to consider as well,” Arun said. “What is it that you propose, Cal?”

The gnome did not respond for a moment, rubbing his chin with one hand. “We need more guidance,” he said. “And to study this situation further. At the moment we seem to be at a détente, but that could change at any moment.”

“Including the return of our host,” Lok said.

“I have not forgotten that possibility.”

“Let him come,” Dana said.

“I agree with your sentiment, Dana, but getting ourselves killed or enslaved is not going to help Benzan. We shall not forget him; this I swear. But as to... the master of this prison... it's far more likely that he would send emissaries, rather than come in person. To be honest, I am more than a little surprised that we have not heard from him already.”

“All the more reason to leave,” Dana said.

“I think I see what you are getting at,” Arun said. “We can raise Dannel here, and cast the spells you need to learn more, without returning to Faerûn.”

“Not without rest,” Dana said. “And this is not my idea of a campsite...”

“I can erect a private sanctum here, in this very room,” Cal said. “It blocks sound and vision, both mundane and the sort accessed through scrying magic. I can sculpt its confines to suit our exact preferences. We would have to post a rotating watch on the exterior, in order to detect any threats before they became apparent.”

“If Hodge were here, I believe he would make some comment about gnomes all being crazy,” Arun said. “Settle down to share a quiet night's rest with a demon prince who's cage may be more precarious than we know.”

“We're all crazy, we who choose this life,” Cal noted simply.

“What about him?” Beorna said, indicating the prisoner.

“Well, he isn't going anywhere,” Cal said. “And while our dreams may not be placid, I suspect that his cage separates him from the physical world, at least while he is in it. I will have to make a more detailed analysis, but I believe that even your threatened sword thrust would have no effect upon him, so long as the cage is intact.”

“This is nuts,” Dana said. “But as long as we can find a way to hurt Graz'zt, then I am in.”

Chapter 444

Arun felt tired. As wearying as the physical exhaustion that days of battles and almost constant battering was the emotional drain inflicted by the constant noise of suffering that filled Skullrot. And on top of that was the presence of the entity trapped... securely?... in his cage on the far side of the room.

One mere step offered solace; to his left as he walked his sentry path was the cloudy white border of Cal's private sanctum. Inside, he knew, Lok was his second on watch. The companions had agreed that they'd hold double watches, with one person inside, one just outside of the sanctum. Those inside could see out, but no sound penetrated the outer border of the spell effect, forcing them to keep someone on post outside lest they miss the sounds of an approaching enemy. Prior to their rest Cal had laid an alarm at the main entrance to the citadel below as well, but none of them wanted to take any chances, not here, not with the dangling cage and its inhabitant as a constant reminder of what was at stake.

Arun cracked his back, twisted his arms to loosen them, and kept walking. Lok would spell him after a while; despite their experience one could not help but have their senses dulled by the constant cries of Skullrot's mad inhabitants. The paladin had already inwardly decided that he would not wake Beorna for the second watch; the templar needed her rest, especially for the spells that she would be able to cast after a good night's sleep. They'd already determined that Cal and Dana would sleep a full eight hours uninterrupted. Unfortunately that meant long shifts for the warriors.

Arun was used to long nights; during his training he'd spent several watches of twenty or more hours at the ramparts deep under the earth, below the Great Rift. Those had been lonely watches, with only the darkness to keep him company. Darkness that could contain goblins, orcs, or worse—foul abominations come up from the Underdark seeking warm flesh and hot blood to feast upon.

The paladin had found himself thinking of his homeland more often of late. He'd accepted his exile, had come to grips with it... and he'd found a new place to call home, a place that had embraced him. In talking with Beorna there had been oblique mention of plans, of a future... nothing they'd wanted to put into concrete terms, not with the threat of obliteration a constant on this mission. But it was enough to know that there was hope, beyond all of the blood and evil and madness.

Despite all that, his thoughts drifted back. Maybe it was the solitude of this watch; even though his companions were just a few paces away, the barrier of Cal's spell separated him from them, partitioned them off into a shadowy reality that was less real than the screams and cages and dreaming godling that were his companions this night.

Lok had not complained. The genasi was possessed of a calm fortitude that Arun found to be refreshing and reassuring. He was still suffering from the effects of the lichfiend's energy drain; all the more reason for Dana to get her rest, to restore him before the effects of the spell took hold upon his soul and became permanent.

Arun reached the end of his circuit and turned back. As he did, his gaze stole back to the cage for the thousandth time. Adimarchus had not stirred, although occasionally he shifted between his two forms. Angel and demon. The juxtaposition spoke of a shattered mind, and from what Arun knew of the fallen creature's tale there was a suffering beyond mere mortal comprehension trapped in that cage with the immortal lord.

He lowered his eyes and continued his patrol, but before he'd taken two steps in his circuit around the borders of the sanctum a sound, faint, drew his attention back around. At first he thought that the noise had come from the cage—his heart pounded even with that flickering suggestion—but then he realized that it had originated from the dark shaft below it, the one that opened onto a two-hundred foot drop to the blood-splattered floor of Skullrot below.

He moved quickly over to the edge of the opening, careful not to draw too close. He did not like heights, but liked even less the sounds he could just hear over the background noise of the citadel. A rumbling vibration, very faint, accompanied by a clatter of what might have been falling stone.

“What is it?” Lok asked, his body materializing through the edge of the sanctum. Arun didn’t answer, but they could both hear the loud sound that followed, a loud screech, something new, yet at the same time vaguely familiar.

“Wake the others!” Arun urged, edging forward and leaning out over the dark opening to get a look down. The pale red light that shone through the walls of the fortress wasn’t very good to see by, but when they’d returned to the ground level for Cal to cast his alarm spell, they’d left Dannel’s old torch, glowing with continual flame, in the eyesocket of one of the skulls that comprised the walls. The golden glow of the torch seemed wan and feeble in the great interior of the prison, but it was still somehow reassuring to see it far below them, flickering still.

Something drifted into view, appearing through a new gap the size of a house that had been blasted into the wall of the citadel, maybe thirty or forty feet above ground level. The source of the sounds, then; although there was only a faint hint of dust floating in the air, no evidence of an explosion or other forced entry. The intruder was little more than a vague outline in the weak light, but its size and shape were distinctive. Arun felt a sickening twist in his gut as recognition dawned.

“What is it?” Mole asked, appearing through the edge of the sanctum a few moments before the others, Beorna holding her armor in one hand, and her bare sword in the other.

Arun turned to face them. That his report would be bad was evident on his face even before he spoke.

“It’s Vhalantru... the beholder’s back.”

Chapter 445

Vhalantru’s mad cries were a reflection of the cacophony that built from the galleries of Skullrot as the beholder floated into the central hall of the citadel through the opening it had disintegrated in the wall. Its invasion of the fortress had taken it through part of a cell, releasing an insane slaad, but the chaotic outsider was now just a gory red carcass—most of a carcass, anyway—still half-tangled in what was left of its chains. The beholder’s eyestalks twisted as it scanned the interior for a moment, but then it began to rise, its body tilting until its burning central eye peered upward through the haze of smoke that issued from the empty socket.

“Oh no, not again,” Mole said, frozen with terror as that evil stare seemed to lock onto her.

“We are in no condition for a rematch with that thing,” Dana said.

“We can’t just let it have Adimarchus,” Beorna said, moving with grim efficiency as she slipped her heavy breastplate over her shoulders. Arun moved to help her.

“Is there anything we can drop on it?” Mole asked, but as she looked around she saw only their bedrolls, and the other things they had brought with them; there were no furnishings in the room save for the great cage and its inhabitant. Something must have shown in her face as she glanced back down the shaft, for Cal said to her, “Don’t even think about it!” Glancing over his shoulder at Beorna and Arun, he said, “We may need an escape route!”

Arun nodded, turning from fastening a buckle on Beorna’s armor and reaching, not for the holy avenger, but for the adamantine battleaxe he’d recovered from Shatterhorn. Dana had already proven that the walls of the citadel were not invincible, although the fact that they were two hundred feet above the ground might have given them pause, had it not been for the more pressing threat rising up from below.

Lok had unlimbered his bow and fired a holy arrow down the shaft at the beholder, but it was too dark to see if the shot had any effect.

“Careful, it’ll be in range in a moment...” Cal began.

But even as he spoke, multicolored rays of energy erupted from the beholder’s eyestalks, stabbing up through the shaft toward them. They had the advantage of range and the cover provided by the lip of the shaft, but that didn’t protect Lok from the first beam, which shot into his chest. The genasi staggered back but resisted the effects of the ray, which might have been disastrous if he’d succumbed to magical sleep while leaning over the edge of the shaft. A second beam lanced through the empty space where he’d been standing a moment before, and a third impacted the floor a few feet back from the shaft’s edge, missing them entirely.

Of course, that wasn’t necessarily a good thing, as a segment of the floor suddenly vanished, disintegrated by the beholder’s eye ray. Doubly so since Cal had been standing there, and now found only empty space beneath his feet. Gravity took its inevitable hold, but even as the gnome started to fall Mole leapt across the shaft, her hand outstretched to snag hold of her uncle’s cloak. Her momentum carried her forward, just enough for her other hand to catch hold of the new edge of the shaft by the tips of her fingers. Cal dangled below her, one hand holding onto his cloak, the other holding a wand that he aimed down at the beholder, blasting it with an acid arrow.

“You... need... to go... on a... diet!” Mole gasped, fighting to maintain her precarious hold.

“Hold on, Mole!” Dana said, directing the spiritual weapon she’d just conjured to harass the beholder, then diving to grab onto the gnome rogue’s wrist. Dana wasn’t particularly strong, but Arun was there a moment later, kneeling at the lip of the chasm to help her drag the two gnomes to safety.

“It’s still coming!” Cal warned. Lok had kept up his barrage, but was hit by another pair of beams in quick succession. While he’d avoided being disintegrated, turned to stone, or instantly killed, as he drew back from the edge of the precipice his labored movements did indicate that he’d been slowed by the beholder.

“If you have any ideas, I’d love to hear them!” Dana said.

As soon as Arun had pulled her up, Mole had drawn back and dug deeply into her bag of holding. She found what she was looking for; a small wooden box that opened to reveal a number of lumpy canvas sacks stashed inside.

Sometimes the old favorites are the best, she thought, taking all three of the tanglefoot bags out and tossing the box aside. One must have had a tear or something, for the interior was hard and dried out, but the other two seemed okay.

She returned to the edge of the chasm. Beorna, she saw, was hacking at the outer wall of the chamber with her adamantite sword; the others had fallen back from the opening, apparently yielding that defensive position to the beholder, who seemed able to target its eye-beams with precision no matter how little of them was exposed to its searching eyes.

“Mole, what are you doing?” Cal asked.

“Just going to tangle it up a bit!” she replied. Then, before he could dissuade her, she lifted the bags and darted up to the edge of the opening.

The first thing she noticed was that the beholder looked a lot... bigger; it had managed to climb quite some distance up the shaft and now wasn’t more than sixty or seventy feet below. It literally was the size of a house—and one built for humans, not just the compact structures sized for gnomes that she remembered from certain neighborhoods back in Waterdeep. It had clearly been waiting for one of its enemies to reappear; for as soon as she saw it one of the fist-sized eyes atop the twisting eyestalks flashed, sending death her way.

“Woah!” she yelled, snapping her upper body back before her conscious mind could order her body to react. She dropped the tanglefoot bags, but that was the last thing on her mind as she saw the green ray lance inches past her face, stabbing upward, finally intersecting the chain that stretched between the top of Adimarchus’s cage, through the eyehole in the ceiling, and across the room to the heavy winch set into the far wall.

Oh, no, she thought, as the beam seeped into the chain, infusing six or seven of the heavy links with a green glow that lasted less than a heartbeat before they just... vanished.

Leaving the cage holding the imprisoned prince to plummet through the hole in the floor and down the shaft.

Mole would not have been who she was if she did not immediately snap back to the edge of the shaft, her eyes wide as she observed what transpired next. She saw the cage falling toward the beholder, which fired a blue ray at it seconds before it hit. The beam had no apparent effect upon Adimarchus’s prison, although it did leave a flickering blue glow around the bars of the cage, giving the whole of the construct an eerie corona that persisted even as the cage struck the beholder, driving it halfway down the depth of the shaft before Vhalantru twisted away and separated from it. The cage, still glowing with the afterimage of the beholder’s power, dropped like a stone the remaining seventy feet to hit the unyielding floor below with a resounding crash. The cage bounced into the air and to the side as if hurled away, rebounding off a nearby wall before landing again and rolling to a battered stop some distance away.

As Mole's gaze drifted to the cage, she saw that the blue glow was gone. But even worse, it was empty, its crumpled door creaking faintly as it twisted on ruined hinges.

"Oh my gods..." Mole breathed.

Adimarchus lay on the ground, a black smear in the flickering light of the torch. This far away, he didn't look all that different from a man, battered and tormented, the torchlight glistening on his bare ebon skin.

Then he stirred, and slowly, began to rise.

Chapter 446

"Mole, what is it?" Cal asked, returning to the opening where his niece stood transfixed, watching the scene below. She could only point, unable to turn away from what happened next.

Vhalantru may have been reconstituted through Adimarchus's power, but that certainly didn't appear to have sweetened the beholder's attitude toward the Prince. The beholder spun and fired a series of blasts into the freed lord, beams that lanced into his body as he slowly pulled himself to his feet. One cut a bright swath across his torso that hissed black vapors, but all of them had expected Adimarchus to have considerable resistance to magical assault, and Vhalantru's initial barrage seemed to have little overall effect.

The Demon Prince of Madness reached his full height and spread his arms wide, the tentacles sprouting from his back forming a wide "X" behind him. He opened his mouth and unleashed a scream that shook the citadel of Skullrot to its foundation.

"Okay, we're in trouble," Cal said.

The beholder continued its assault, blasting the demon prince with more eye-beams, trying to find a combination that worked. It hit him again with the disintegrate ray, and again the prince suffered another flesh wound that hissed black smoke and drained black ichor.

Adimarchus seemed to belatedly recognize the presence of the adversary trying to destroy him. He lifted his hand, and unleashed a power upon the beholder. The companions could see its effect even at this range, as Vhalantru's body shook in agony, ravaged by a powerful horrid wilting.

Vhalantru quickly responded by shifting its body and opening its central eye, bathing Adimarchus in antimagic. The Prince snarled as he recognized the smoking orb, a larger cousin to his own right eye, trailing a wisp of black smoke, its radiance brightening with the demon lord's fury.

The beholder did not let up, running its disintegrate ray along the base of the railing that fronted one of the nearby galleries. Even as the moorings holding the metal construct were sundered, it hit the barrier with its telekinesis ray, ripping the structure from its remaining supports and hurling the entire thing at Adimarchus.

The demon prince made no move to dodge or avoid the huge object, merely bringing his arms up across his face. The metal barrier struck him solidly. The impact would have utterly crushed an ordinary man, as the banister had to weigh at least several hundred points. Adimarchus was driven back.

One step.

The form of the Prince of Madness shifted, and he took on the other form familiar to the companions, the golden-winged angel with the clawed gauntlet. The prince leapt into the air, his wings carrying him easily aloft, out of the radius of Vhalantru's antimagic field. The beholder, now drawing back, resumed the full fury of his barrage, hitting Adimarchus with another series of eye-beams. Apparently recognizing that most of its beams with mental effects had little chance of affecting this enemy, the beholder had settled upon combination strikes with its disintegrate and finger of death rays; even when the full potency of those was resisted, they still inflicted considerable damage. Those beams drew black lines across the perfect features of Adimarchus's angelic form, but did little to stop the demon prince as he flew directly at the beholder. Vhalantru blasted him with its telekinesis beam in an effort to drive the charging demon back, but to no avail. As Adimarchus flew past the beholder his golden wings lanced out, cutting deep gashes in the giant orb of its body. The golden claw shot out a moment later, puncturing the beholder's body, drawing out a terrible sigh of agony as the gauntlet drew back covered with black blood and gore.

Now seriously discomfited, Vhalantru abruptly dropped twenty feet, its eyestalks twitching in unison as they all fixed onto the angelic figure directly above. Adimarchus was swallowed up in a blaze of colored light as beams from all ten of the beholder's eyestalks blasted into him. Rents opened up in his violet skin, and fat droplets of golden fluid trailed from his body to drip down onto the beholder's bloated form.

The beholder's attacks were clearly starting to take their toll, but Adimarchus did not appear to be seriously hindered as he abruptly closed his wings around his body, and plummeted straight down. Vhalantru tried to get out of the way, but moved too slowly as the golden gauntlet was extended, straight down, and the demon prince slammed into the beholder's body, his weight driving that member deep into its body. Vhalantru screamed as the prince unleashed some potent energy through the attack, an energy that drove into the core of its corrupted being. As Adimarchus clung to it, his arm sunk into its body up to his elbow, a bright glow seemed to shimmer around the beholder. Then, so quickly that an eyeblink might have caused one of the watchers to miss it, the orb collapsed in upon itself like an overfull waterskin rent open by a dagger. Adimarchus withdrew his arm as the wreckage of the beholder was reduced to a mass smaller than he was, and as he spread his wings to catch the air once more what was left of Vhalantru plummeted to the ground below to land in a sad heap on top of the mangled form of one of the Dark Myrakul's flesh golems.

Up above, the companions had watched the entire exchange. With Vhalantru's destruction, it was as if a switch had been thrown, suddenly restoring their ability to act.

“Um... we’d better get out of here, don’t you think?” Mole said.

“He has been weakened,” Arun said. “This may be our only chance to overcome him.”

“Did you just see the same exchange I did?” Dana asked. “We have to go, now!”

Cal nodded. “I agree.” He turned to the opening that Beorna and Lok had wrought in the wall of the chamber; fully ten feet across, it revealed the blighted landscape of Carceri in all its terrible glory. There was no wind, no indication other than the vast panorama that they were more than two hundred feet above the ground.

Mole was the last to leave the opening to the shaft. “Here he comes!” she said to the others, who needed no further incitement to gather at the breach.

Lok had taken the flying carpet out of his bag of holding, and was preparing to unroll it. “There’s no time for that!” Cal said. “Everyone, take hold of someone else; Dana, in the center; you’ll need your hands free. On the three count, we leap, as one.”

“You’d better know what you’re about, gnome,” Beorna said, as they took their positions. Lacking time to repack the carpet, Lok merely slung it over one shoulder.

“One, two, three!”

On that last word they leapt, the warriors all but carrying the gnomes, Dana locked in the center of the ball of interlaced limbs as they plummeted down, down, down.

More than one of them screamed, although Mole’s cry sounded suspiciously like a whoop of exhilaration.

Cal let them fall about a hundred feet before he invoked his feather fall. Their rate of decline abruptly eased, and they could hear Dana’s invocation to her goddess as she drew open the veil between worlds.

Even as he sensed the magic building around them, Cal chanced to glance upward, back at the spire. He saw Adimarchus, still in his angelic form, emerge from the opening in the prison, his wings spreading as he burst out into the open air. Cal imagined that he could feel the multiverse tremble as the demon prince hovered there, drinking in the liberty that had so long been denied.

He wasn’t sure, but as the bright glow of Dana’s spell enveloped them, taking them home, he thought he heard one wondrous and terrible word echo out across Carceri.

“FREEDOM!”

Chapter 447

It was deep in the night in the Western Heartlands of Faerûn, but one would not have known it from the crowded, windowless space of the study, separated off from the rest of the world by thick stone walls and potent magical wards. The bookshelves on each of the walls made the place seem even smaller than it was; most were overflowing not only with books, but with scrolls, boxes of polished wood and handwoven wicker, and dozens of other assorted items ranging from the mundane to the extraordinary. The dominant feature of the chamber was a low desk and matching chair, the former likewise burdened with miscellany, the latter occupied by a small figure clad in a soft robe of faded blue silk. He was bent over a book, his pen making a constant scritch, scritch as it darted over the parchment, pausing only for a refill from the adjacent bottle of ink. The two candles burning brightly atop the desk—no danger to the books and scrolls, these were continual flames—highlighted the writer's features; he was a gnome, fixed with an incredible look of concentration and gravity undermined slightly by the large smudge of ink above his right eyebrow.

The door to the room opened, but the gnome did not even look up.

"You need to rest, Cal," Dana said.

The quill stopped its steady progression across the page. Cal looked up.

"Did Selûne refresh your spells?"

Dana nodded.

"I can tell from your expression that you've already tried to find Benzan, without success."

"Yes."

"And Adimarchus?"

"I did not even try. You know where he's going, Cal."

"Yes, I suppose that I do."

Dana came more fully into the room. There really wasn't anywhere else to sit, but she carefully pushed back a stack of books from the corner of the desk, and situated herself there, just a few feet from her friend.

"Is Dannel all right?"

The priestess nodded. "Weakened somewhat, but that is normal. Mole is keeping an eye on him."

"Good. Coming back from Beyond... it is not an easy experience."

"Arun and Beorna are chomping at the bit," she said.

Cal sat back in his chair, folding his hands together in his lap over his belly. It had become more ample, over the years, but he could still walk the average laborer into the ground, even without all of the magical augmentories that each of them carried in abundance. "And what do you feel?" he asked.

"I think that Adimarchus will quickly regain much of his power, if he is not stopped."

"I did not ask what you think," Cal said. "I asked what you feel."

She met his gaze for a moment, then turned away. "My heart tells me to find Benzan, whatever the cost." She looked up again. "I will do what is necessary."

"We need you, to get to Occipitus, and to make our way back safely."

"And in between?"

Cal laid a sheet of blotting paper into the fold, and then closed the book. He had not mastered any of the spells of the highest valence that had just opened to him, or any of the other spells from the bundle of scrolls that rested in the small but sturdy iron box attached to the underside of the desk. If only he could have twenty-four uninterrupted hours... but there was no time, not now.

He stood, and stepped away from the desk and the power that would have to wait.

"In between, we knock a Prince off his throne."

Chapter 448

"Are you sure this is the right place?" Mole asked.

"It does look... different," Dannel said, turning as he took in the full panorama of their surroundings.

"Better, or worse?" Dana said, her expression indicating her own feelings about the matter.

Dannel, Arun, and Mole, the three who had been to Occipitus before, turned to the others. "Better, I'd say," Mole noted.

Occipitus had changed, although its underlying core remained recognizable. The deadly plasms that had filled the sky on their initial visit were gone, replaced by a low-hanging golden sky that resembled the interior of a great domed cathedral, with a soft glow that added a faint metallic tinge to their skin. The surrounding ring of mountains were there, but they no longer looked like jagged teeth; indeed, they were almost like pillars holding up the huge dome. The ground was still soft, giving slightly beneath their feet, and the landscape was still marked by blighted ruins and odd forests. There were none of the oozing red pools that they'd encountered the last time, at least not within visual range, and the odor had improved as well, although only in comparison to what it had been before. And in the center of the plane...

"There's a storm over that mountain," Lok said.

"Not a mountain," Arun said. "It's a great skull... the center of power in this place. Our last visit was... unpleasant."

"But Morgan's in charge, now," Mole said.

"I wouldn't put a large wager upon that," Cal said. They all stared at the distant mound, where occasional flickers of energy were visible darting in and around the place. There was a disturbance above it; not quite a cloud, but something not unlike the vortex that had appeared above Cauldron during the Ritual of Planar Joining.

"It doesn't look very far," Dana said.

"Distances can be deceiving here," Arun pointed out.

"No horizon," Cal said, grasping what was "wrong" about the geography of the plane. "Occipitus is flat, unlike the surface of our Toril. I wouldn't be surprised if it were a hundred miles from here to that skull-fortress."

"Whatever's going on here, it looks like that's the place where it is happening," Dana said. "We could teleport directly there..."

"We have already covered this. It may not be wise to hurl ourselves blindly into a situation with which we are unfamiliar," Cal said. "We must be cautious. While we can see the skull, we have no idea what the situation is there; the place could be quiet, or it could be crawling with demons."

"Let us hope that you are right," the priestess said, turning away and busying herself with the straps of her pack.

Lok was already unrolling the flying carpet; as soon as it was ready they embarked and set off. They had already discussed their plans, and so did not need further conversation as they made efficient preparations. Mole, Dannel, Arun, and Cal rode upon the carpet, while Dana cast her wind walk spell, transforming herself along with Lok and Beorna into insubstantial wisps of pale white cloud. The two groups lifted off into the air together, moving quickly across the landscape. Despite her impatience, Dana remained close by the carpet, pacing the magical conveyance. They were not looking for trouble.

As it happened, trouble found them first.

Chapter 449

"Something's coming from above, approaching fast," Dannel pointed out.

The companions readied weapons and spells, and looked in the direction that the elf indicated. They'd spent maybe half of an hour flying toward the center of Occipitus since arriving via Dana's plane shift, and true to Arun's earlier comment they seemed to have come little closer to their destination.

"If it looks like a fight, Dana, get ready to empower Lok with flight and then disembark yourself," Cal said. "I'll bring the carpet down to ground level." The spellcasters wove a few preliminary buffs, preparing themselves for a confrontation.

"Hold," Dannel pointed out. "I don't think it's a demon."

As the intruder drew nearer, the companions could see that it was a golden winged serpent, easily twelve feet in length, with a broad feathered wingspan more than fifteen feet across. It was beautiful to behold, and indeed it bore a certain majesty about it that seemed to radiance calm and reassurance.

"I sense no Taint," Arun said.

"Indeed not, paladin," Cal said, quietly. "It is a couatl, a powerful emissary of Good."

"Travelers from the Prime," the creature said as it came up alongside their conveyance. "I bring you greetings and bid you follow me, at the summons of the Master of Occipitus."

"Which one?" Beorna asked.

"You knew him as Morgan Ahlendraal," the couatl said. "Your attendance is most urgently required... time is short."

"He's not at the Big Skull?" Mole asked. "Is Adimarchus back?"

"The Master will answer your questions," the couatl replied. "Please, you must accompany me with all speed."

"We're pretty slow on this thing," Cal said. "But with a thorough description of the destination, I can teleport us there. Dana will have to materialize to do the same with the others."

The couatl complied, providing a terse but accurate narrative of Morgan's headquarters as it related to their current location and other landmarks visible across the plane. As it spoke, Cal gently guided the carpet down to the ground, with Dana and the other wind walkers close behind. By the time it was finished, they had fully materialized, and stood ready. Lok helped Arun roll up the magical carpet.

"Did you get all that?" Cal asked Dana. The priestess nodded.

"I can bring you as well, couatl, if you can come close so that I can touch you," Dana said. The outsider responded by polymorphing itself into a slender, muscled youth, with golden skin and a metallic skirt around his hips.

"I am prepared," he said, his voice soft and melodious.

They materialized directly in front of their destination. It was a place well familiar to Dannel, Mole, and Arun, who had been here before to face the trials of Adimarchus for the rulership of his abandoned realm. The ancient celestial cathedral looked to be in far better condition than that last time, its white walls shimmering faintly in the diffuse golden light. But it was still a ruin, with gaps in its walls and large segments of its roof missing, collapsed in the trauma that had torn Occipitus free from Celestia and ultimately deposited it here in the Abyss.

The place had the look of a military camp, although the forces gathered here were sparse in the least. They saw several archons, gleaming bulbs of flickering light and sharp-eyed humanoid hounds carrying bare greatswords in ready stances, and a wolf-like lupinal that disappeared into the temple before they could get a good look at it.

"There is a lot of sadness here," Dana said, surveying the exterior of the structure.

"Come on, it's pretty cool inside," Mole said. "There are these 'flashbacks' to another reality, where it's all intact and shining and peaceful..." She outpaced the couatl who was directing them inside, but even as she reached the open double doors—they, at least, showed signs of recent repair—Morgan appeared.

The companions sucked in a startled breath. For Morgan, too, had changed since they last saw him. His golden celestial armor was fouled with blood and black char, and his right arm was simply... gone, replaced by a stump at his shoulder hastily wrapped with a bandage thick with crusted blood.

Chapter 450

The knight of Helm regarded them with a tired but determined expression. "I am glad you have come. I'd feared that you had not gotten my message."

"We did not get any message," Arun said. "What happened?"

Morgan did not answer for a moment. "I'd feared that my sending did not get through... it is as I suspected; his arrival immediately began to interfere with my grasp upon Occipitus, already tenuous..."

"You encountered the demon prince, I take it," Dannel said.

But again Morgan seemed not to have heard. "Already tenuous..." he repeated, cupping his chin in his remaining hand in a strangely mundane gesture, ruined by the wisp of smoke rising from his left eye socket, where the Smoking Eye flickered. For a moment it seemed like he'd forgotten their presence.

"Morgan?" Mole gently prodded.

The divine agent looked up. "If you are not here at my summons, then your arrival here is merely happenstance?"

"Not quite," Cal said. He briefly related their experiences on Carceri, culminating in their visit to Skullrot. Morgan's earlier vacuous mood seemed to have finally shifted, and he paid close attention to their words. "We were present when the Prince was freed, although we were not the agents of his release. Vhalantru, restored again, somehow followed us to the asylum, and opened his cage."

Morgan nodded. "It makes sense; the beholder was given new life through Adimarchus's madness; it would have been drawn to him, much as the Cagewrights had been."

"So now the demon lord has returned to his home," Dana prodded, glancing at the distant skull mountain and its surrounding nimbus of violent energies.

"He already works to reform Occipitus," Morgan said, spitting the words with contempt. "All my work here will be undone in short order."

"What happened?" Arun asked again.

"He came upon us very quickly; I can sense in a general way what happens here, but I had very little warning. He descended upon the Great Hall of the Flame like a hurricane, sweeping away all opposition with a wave of his hand."

"We would have sent warning, if we could have," Cal said. "As it was, we were pretty battered and depleted of magic when we left Carceri, and we came here as soon as we could recover our spells and utilize the key you had left for us."

Morgan nodded, some of the drive in his expression softening to mere weariness. "I do not blame you, friends. Long had I feared this, ever since the buildup of power I sensed growing here in the very fabric of the plane. I spoke of this to you, on our last encounter?" At their nods he went on, "All my efforts were to naught. His power is beyond anything I have ever encountered."

"He came nearly alone; there were a few minor demons, babaus, mostly, which my forces engaged at the base of the Skull. Adimarchus came directly to the Hall of the Flame, accompanied by a marilith."

The companions shared a look, but did not interrupt.

"We met him with our full strength; everything I'd been able to prepare. He shrugged off the full power of Helm, including the Crushing Hand of Righteousness, the greatest gift granted by the Vigilant One to his mortal servants. He smote through my allies with a single word of blasphemy. I was somehow not affected..."

"Perhaps your power grows greater than you realize," Beorna said. "Do not question your own commitment, knight of Helm."

But the cleric-turned-master of an Abyssal layer waved his hand dismissively. “I believe was Occipitus itself that sheltered me, through the touch of the Smoking Eye. It touches all with a slick of Taint, despite all of my efforts to redeem this place from the depths of the shadow in which it lies.”

“I stood nearly alone against the Prince of Madness, with only Saureya still at my side. I should have drawn some conclusion from the fact that he was not harmed by the demon’s power either, but my attention was fully absorbed by my enemy.”

“I brandished Aludrial’s Shard, the mighty blade that I found and recovered through the grace of Helm. Calling upon the power in that long-lost artifact, and the righteous might of the Vigilant One, I smote the Prince. He was injured already, it seemed; at close quarters I could see black marks upon his cursed hide. The blessed blade harmed him, and I drew faith as he recoiled from the divine power of the Shard.”

“I prepared to press my advantage, but in that moment I realized my error. Saureya betrayed me, striking from behind, wresting the holy blade from my grasp. The Prince... changed, his false aspect of angelic purity shifting to a monstrous form of utter demonic depravity. The wounds I had seen earlier, and the hurt I had inflicted upon him with the Shard were alike gone; it was as if a new creature entire faced me. Tentacles jutting from his back tore at my flesh, stealing my life energy, and he drove a sword of smoke and ash into my arm, consuming it in a searing blast of flame...”

“I do not know how I survived. When next I could perceive my surroundings I was looking up into the eyes of madness. The Prince regarded me as a man might regard an insect that had managed to sting him. He spoke... I cannot repeat his words, even now, though they are seared into my soul!” Even the thought of it seemed to stagger the man; he flailed with his remaining arm, as though trying to fight off an invisible attacker.

“Morgan!” Arun exclaimed, coming to the man’s side, taking his arm in both of his muscled hands, steadying him.

Slowly the knight seemed to come to his senses. “I... I will be all right,” he said, gulping breaths of air.

“You’ve been through an incredible trauma,” Dana said. “You need to rest; once I recover spells I can pray for magic to restore your arm.”

Morgan shook his head. “There is no time! Already Adimarchus is bending Occipitus to his will, regaining the power that had been sapped from him in his captivity. I have no choice... I must face him again now, or he will become unstoppable!”

“But from what you said, and what we ourselves saw on Carceri, he’s virtually invulnerable now,” Dannel said. “What chance do we have against a demon prince, even one freshly released from captivity?”

“We knew that the odds were long when we agreed to come here,” Beorna reminded the elf.

“But if he can blaspheme, to give just one example, then how can stand against it? That magic cannot be resisted. I remind you of our encounter with the balor, in case you have forgotten.”

“I do not think that his power is unlimited,” Morgan said. “And Aludrial’s Shard harmed him, although it is lost to me, now.” He reached around and drew a bastard sword from the scabbard across his back. The weapon was clearly old, with small pits and other imperfections visible in its blade, and it looked dull, as though its forging had been completed with cheap metal rather than fine steel.

“Cold iron,” Lok said.

Cal slapped his forehead. “Damn it, I am a fool! I should have had us reequip before coming here.”

“Arun’s sword will do well enough,” Beorna said. “And my blade can hack through anything, given enough muscle and spirit.”

“I don’t doubt your conviction, templar,” Cal said, “But the Prince is not a mere demon. He will be stronger by far than even a balor. His damage resistance will be a problem.”

“I have a few of the cold iron arrows we found in Shatterhorn,” Dannel reported.

“And we still have the rapier we took from the drow warrior in one of the bags of holding,” Mole said. “That was cold iron as well, I remember Arun saying something about it.”

“Give it to Lok,” Cal said. “Dana can align it; that should be sufficient to penetrate his damage resistance.”

“So we’re doing this, then?” Dannel asked. “Attacking a demon prince, on his own turf.”

“It’s not so bad,” Dana said. “We’ve done it once before.” But despite her easy words, her hands were shaking; she clenched the shaft of her longspear tightly to still them.

“We will be victorious,” Morgan breathed. “There is no other option.”

Cal turned toward the center of Occipitus. “The other problem is how to get there. I can greater teleport directly to the Skull, but Dana has already spent her magic...”

“We can resume wind walking,” the priestess suggested. “Or, I have my remaining teleport.”

“It is over a hundred miles, although it may not look it,” Morgan said.

“That’s not the difficulty,” Cal said. “The difficulty is that one cannot use a regular teleport to journey to a place one has not visited.”

“How about transporting directly on top of the skull?” Mole suggested. “I mean, you can teleport wherever you can see, right?”

“In a sense,” Cal said. “But at this range, it is impossible to clearly mark the destination. It would be a huge risk; the chance of a mishap or false destination would be at its greatest. Dana and everyone accompanying her could end up teleporting into the mountain, suffering injury or possibly even death.”

“I think we’re beyond the point of balking at risks,” Dana said. “We will all have to do whatever we can.”

“I will accompany the priestess, then,” Morgan said. “We will share the risk. How many can you transport, together?”

“Five each,” Cal said, “In addition to the caster.”

“You take your other companions, then,” he replied. “I will go with the priestess, and bring what allies that I have...”

He turned back to the interior of the cathedral, and raised his hand. Immediately they could hear a loud clanking noise, more like the bellow and creak of machinery than the clatter of armor.

“I have begged Lord Helm for aid against this enemy,” he said, as two figures strode forward from the shelter of the cathedral into view. The first had the shape of a centaur, a half-man, half-horse melding, while the second was a massive brute the size of an ogre. But it was immediately obvious that neither of them were living creatures, even before they could clearly mark the nature of the flesh that lay beneath the suits of heavy armor that each wore.

“Inevitables,” Cal said.

“As inevitable as Adimarchus’s doom,” Morgan said.

“I have to wonder which side is more insane,” Dannel whispered to Mole.

“Yeah... but you have to admit, it’s pretty damned exciting.”

Chapter 451

With a faint shimmer the two groups of companions materialized upon the bleached white expanse that was the summit of the great skull crag that dominated the center of Occipitus. They found themselves in the midst of the storm that enfolded the citadel, but instead of familiar rain and wind, they encountered only a strange darkening of the ambient light combined with a tickle of power that made the hairs on their arms and on the backs of their necks stand on end.

“Taint,” Arun said, drawing his holy sword. The paladin was a veritable beacon of magical buffs, focused upon him more than the others due to his ability to harm the demon prince with his holy sword. As for the others... well, their efficacy would have to be proven in the encounter. They had prepared their best weapons and tried tactics, but against this foe all were cognizant that their best may not be near enough.

Their misgivings about their method of transportation had proven unfounded as Dana and Morgan appeared a mere sixty feet or so away from Cal and the others, the hulking form of the marut and the sleeker figure of the zelekhut behind them. Each step made by the marut made the ground tremble beneath their feet.

“Well, there goes any chance of surprise,” Dannel said, as the two groups rejoined.

“There never was any chance,” Morgan said simply. “He knows that we are here.”

“Let us be about this, then,” Beorna said.

“Come,” Morgan said, leading them across the skull, toward the front side where a tendril of smoke rose up into the air from below, ahead of them out of sight beneath the curvature of the white summit.

“Watch your step,” Cal said, as the slope grew more treacherous. The zelekhut unfurled segmented metallic wings from its back as a caution, while the marut simply plodded forward, its weight acting as an anchor, for now.

“Perhaps we should affix some ropes,” Dannel suggested, but before the others could comment Mole pointed to the destination Morgan was leading them to, a great crack in the surface of the skull, starting only a few inches across but widening to nearly ten feet by the time that it joined with one of the cavernous eye sockets that they knew connected to the Hall of the Flame below. On their last visit that opening had been filled with deadly plasms that issued regularly from the pillar, rising through the gap into the sky above. They had made an approach from this direction incredibly hazardous, but with the plasms gone their access to the interior of the citadel was currently open.

“Stay together, and I’ll use my feather fall to slow our descent,” Cal said, as they made their way carefully to the nearest point where the crack was wide enough to accommodate them.

They had already discussed their approach, and possible tactics, utilizing the best of their own skills, as well as the abilities of Morgan and his outsider allies. Peering through the gap, Mole reported that the great chamber below seemed empty. Arun confirmed that the Taint was strong here, an overwhelming aura that prevented him from singling out individual creatures. Morgan said that Adimarchus was here, close; perhaps waiting for them to show themselves before he made his appearance.

Most of the group dropped through the opening, using Cal’s spell to drift safely to the ground sixty feet beneath the crack. Dana remained aloft, using the magical powers of her boots to give her some distance from the others, while Cal slid through the crack and started walking on the upper side of the domed chamber, using his spider climb spell. The zelekhut likewise spread its wings and remained aloft, long spiked chains emerging from its wrists as it flew, while the marut merely drew upon its power and opened a dimension door directly to the chamber floor.

“Well, this is different,” Mole said, as she landed gently upon the floor.

The huge chamber was dominated, as before, by the swirling pillar of surging plasma flame that continued to issue black threads of smoke that rose up through the skull-eye into the sky above. But everything else about the place had been changed. Where on their last visit here the rest of the chamber had been barren, empty, now it was occupied by stone forms that appeared to have risen directly from the floor and the walls. These figures, of varying shapes and sizes, resembled statues or bas-reliefs, although their design was blocky, unfinished. It was as though a sculptor had begun work on each only to grow bored with the project, moving on to the next one. The only exception was the faces; these were captured in perfect detail, almost as if they had been cast from the original living models and used to carve incredibly detailed reproductions. There were dozens of them, forming an intermittent forest throughout the chamber.

“Cagewrights,” Dannel said, recognizing some of the faces.

“Umm... I think this one’s Arun,” Mole said, indicating a squat form that did indeed seem to resemble the dwarf. The sculpture’s helm hid most of its face, but they could see that its jaws were spread wide, frozen in a silent scream. They found other familiar faces; the Heroes of Cauldron were all represented, captured in expressions of turmoil and torment. A short distance away they encountered a winged, skeletal form that could only have been the Dark Myrakul, and across from it, a robed figure that bore the face of Jenya Urikas, her face twisted into an evil scowl.

“Blasphemy,” Beorna said, turning away from the figure of her slain superior.

“Madness,” Cal said, as they spread out across the room. “These would be the faces of those who touched him—or whom he touched—in his captivity.”

“I don’t like this,” Mole said, staring at a depiction of her that was little more than a piteous ball, her face peering upward from the compressed mass of stone, looking small and utterly alone.

“Stay alert,” Morgan warned. “I sense His presence here.”

On the far side of the room, facing the pillar of fire, a great throne of stone had formed out of the floor. In front of the seat was another stone figure... no, two of them, they saw, half-melted into each other. They looked vaguely humanoid, but with misshapen features; it was difficult to determine more, as they were formed in a supplicant pose, bent over on their knees before the empty stone throne. Lok knelt briefly beside the pair, noting that while their bodies were indistinctly represented, both had six fingers on each hand.

“Adimarchus! we have come for you!” Morgan cried, his voice echoing throughout the chamber.

“Wonderful,” Dannel said, tensing his bow, a cold iron arrow already fitted to the string.

Behind the throne something stirred.

“The staircase!” Mole warned, directing them to the chamber’s only exit, other than the opening through which they’d entered.

A slithering sound accompanied by the clink of metal announced the arrival of a familiar foe. The marilith Byakala moved forward slowly into the light, her six swords held in a ready position, forming a ring of steel around her body.

The warriors and the inevitables moved to face the demoness, forming a half-circle on the near side of the stone throne.

“Byakala!” Cal said, the gnome’s voice echoing through the chamber from high above. “You don’t have to do this... we’ve come to destroy Adimarchus! Join us, and you can be free!”

The marilith’s expression was almost one of regret. “I was never truly free, so long as He existed,” she said.

Lifting her swords high, she unleashed a keening wail that combined rage and despair.

Chapter 452

“This may be a distraction,” Dannel hissed as the others parlayed with the demoness, scanning the dark corners of the chamber with his keen eyes. But the room appeared to be empty, save for the marilith, the companions and their allies, and the stone sculptures. Morgan had empowered himself with true sight, so he should have been able to penetrate any ruse or illusion, but none of them would take anything for granted as far as the demon lord was concerned.

“If you stand with Adimarchus, then you have sealed your own doom,” Morgan said. Pronouncing the might of Helm through a brief invocation, he began to swell in size, drawing upon his god’s righteous might until he dwarfed even the marut, standing over twelve feet in height.

“Let her come to us, do not allow her to set for a full attack!” Arun urged his companions. But Morgan was beyond reason, infused with power and the madness of Occipitus, and he screamed something incomprehensible as he leapt at the demoness, his borrowed sword a gleaming arbiter of destruction in his hand.

The others could do naught but follow him into melee.

Morgan’s expanded size gave him considerable reach and allowed him to strike before the marilith’s extended blades could touch him. He rose high into the air in an unnaturally arcing leap, driving his sword down into her body with incredible force. The blow crushed into the left side of her body, driving deep through a lung, releasing a spray of black blood from the devastating wound that splattered over the shining armor of the knight. Behind him the others were rushing forward, although a direct charge was blocked by the enlarged form of the knight, delaying them for a precious second or two.

But even as she screamed in pain, Byakala unleashed a storm of death upon Morgan. Her blades sliced through the air and into the knight's body from every direction, driving through his armor and cutting deep into the flesh beneath. Morgan staggered backward, his blood flashing out from his wounds, brought from full health to the brink of death in a flash of an instant. Nor was the marilith finished; with surprising speed she suddenly reared up, snapping her long tail around. The agile member clove through a nearby statue, sundering it into fragments, before smashing into Morgan's head, knocking him aside like a child's discarded doll. The ground around him shook as he hit the floor hard, dislodging another statute that fell beside him. The stricken knight did not stir, oozing blood that formed a sticky pool around his unmoving body.

"Heeeaaaa!" Byakala keened, exulting in the defeat of her adversary.

But her moment of triumph was very short lived, interrupted first by a long shaft that slammed into her torso, driving a hot wedge of pure pain through her body. The zelekhut flew overhead, lashing her with its spiked chains, but those nasty weapons did little damage through her potent resistances, and she was completely immune to the jolts of electricity that shot through her with each hit. She slashed at its underside with one of her swords, but the creature was just out of her reach as it flew past.

She turned back as the diminutive—to her scale—enemy warriors charged at her, two spreading to come at her from the flanks while the last rushed straight on into the position just vacated by the fallen knight. Byakala focused on that one, for he bore a brilliantly glowing sword that she instantly recognized as a holy weapon. Her long reach allowed her to strike him solidly across the body before he could reach her, but despite what had to be a painful hit he continued his charge, that deadly blade coming down in an arc that she knew was final even before she felt it intersect with her body. That pain overwhelmed the sensation of the two other attacks that drove into her sides, and with a final cry of agony she collapsed into a twitching heap, her body almost severed in two by the deep cuts opened by the weapons of the companions.

Dana had flown down immediately on seeing Morgan fall, and she was relieved to see him stir as she poured the pure restorative energies of a heal spell into him. Arun, she saw, was being attended by Beorna, although the one hit he'd taken could not have been that serious for the durable paladin.

"Where is Adimarchus?" Morgan asked, as he struggled to get up.

"He's not here," Arun said, looking around. "He abandoned his minion to be destroyed."

"No," Morgan said, toppling another statue as he struggled to his feet. "He is here..."

They turned, as one, as the feeling that had animated Morgan became obvious to all of them. The intensity of the light that filtered down from the crack above, and the pulsing flow of the plasma pillar, did not change, but it was as if a shadow had been passed over the room, filling the place with a miasma of dread.

Adimarchus stepped forward out of the roaring column of fire into the chamber. He was in his demon form, carrying the smoldering length of his greatsword, the deadly artifact called the Ashen Blade, easily in one hand.

“I knew that you would bring them all to me,” he said to Morgan, his voice soft, even, yet somehow filling both the expanse of the chamber and the hollow of their minds together. Shifting his attention to all of them, he said, “Yours is the first installment in the measure of my vengeance. First I will repay you... and then I will extract my revenge upon my six-fingered adversary!”

Chapter 453

“Do you fear Graz’zt so yet, that you tremble even to speak his name?” Arun shouted, lifting his holy sword between himself and the demon prince.

“I will have my vengeance!” Adimarchus screamed, his yell a pulse of dark energies that sent quivers of sharp pain through the minds of everyone gathered in the chamber. Most of them weathered the release of power, but Morgan seemed particularly stricken, staggering back before the potency of the true master of Occipitus. Several of the statues crumbled, and others seemed to briefly come alive, clutching at the sky or clawing at the sides of their heads as if they were the targets of the demon lord’s despair.

“I think you pissed him off!” Beorna yelled at Arun, as the two dwarves charged forward.

Tendrils of flame abruptly burst out of the plasma column. At first it looked like some dire new attack from the Prince, but they coalesced into a humanoid form, over thirty feet tall, which stepped forward and enveloped Adimarchus with its long arms. The dwarves hesitated, not so much from the heat radiating from the elemental—both had been warded against fire—but out of desire not to aid the demon lord by inadvertently hitting Dana’s summoned creature.

Their hesitation did not last long. Just a few seconds after it had grappled Adimarchus, the elemental disintegrated, torn asunder by a full series of attacks from the Ashen Blade. The Prince’s arms and body bore marks of black char from the elemental’s brief embrace, but it was clear that he had not been seriously injured.

But the demon lord now found himself under heavy attack. The marut had lumbered forward, and now bashed Adimarchus with a pair of heavy blows from its massive fists. It may as well have been punching a wall of adamantite; although it defied reason for the huge creature’s impacts to have no effect upon the much smaller Prince, somehow it was the inevitable that was repulsed.

Still, the attacks kept coming, the companions pressing their assault with everything they had. A cold iron arrow from Dannel’s bow clipped the Prince’s shoulder, doing minor damage but at least proving that he could be hurt. A single drop of utterly black fluid separated from the wound and dropped to the ground, burning a small hole through the very fabric of Occipitus. The warriors swarmed around the marut and unleashed their own attacks, stabbing at the Prince with perfectly aimed attacks that did very little, even Arun’s holy sword glancing harmlessly off of Adimarchus's ebon body. The zelekhut flew overhead, lashing at the Prince's body with its spiked chains, trying to knock the sword from his grasp, but failing utterly.

Surrounded by foes, Adimarchus calmly unleashed a horrid wilting upon the spot where he stood.

The inevitables were not affected by the spell, but the same could not be said for the companions. The wilting was utterly devastating and utterly irresistible; they best they could hope for was to fight off the worst of its effects. But Adimarchus's spell was more potent than that of any mere mortal caster.

Dannel and Mole were nearly killed outright by the released power, the elf collapsing, gasping to suck in air through his desiccated lungs. The others were hard hit as well, but they did not hesitate, continuing their attacks despite their ineffectiveness thus far. Dana, flying above, her skin crinkling painfully with every movement, cast a mass heal that poured life back into them, washing away the effects of Adimarchus's dread power in a single gesture.

Thus far, they seemed to be holding their own. They even started to inflict damage, as Morgan leapt into the battle, looming over the smaller forms of Arun and Beorna, using his superior reach as he thrust his blade into Adimarchus's shoulder. The Prince snarled as the point of the ancient weapon, its fragile iron empowered with Helm's divine power, sank a few inches into his body. When Morgan drew the weapon back, its tip smoked with black blood.

The marut, seeing how ineffective its attacks were, gave up its physical assault and merely enfolded Adimarchus's body in its huge arms. The serpent-tentacles sprouting from the Prince's back snapped and tore at those mechanical limbs, but the inevitable stoically absorbed the attacks, trying to hold on.

The grapple had an effect, but it didn't last long enough to turn into a tactical advantage. Adimarchus, perhaps reminded of his captivity at the hands of Graz'zt, screamed and vanished, teleporting out of the marut's grasp.

"Where is he?" Arun asked, searching the chamber. But Morgan looked directly up, to the summit of the dome, where the black figure loomed above them. This aspect of Adimarchus lacked the power of flight, and he started to fall, but then he... shifted, and the angelic form of the demon prince spread his wings, a beautiful but corrupt avatar of destruction.

"I purify you!" he shrieked, unleashing a word of chaos.

Chapter 454

It should have ended right there.

The word was pure power, and spoken by one of the demon lord's might, it would have resulted in confusion or death for all who heard it. Dannel, Mole, and Dana would have avoided its potency, their own philosophies of life resonating with the echoes in that rending utterance. But Arun, Beorna, Morgan, Lok, Cal... and the inevitables, too... they would have been fully affected, either struck down or their minds clouded with madness. Divided, weakened, turned against each other, the advantage would have surely swayed decisively to the side of the Prince.

Several of them had various forms of spell resistance, granted by spell or item, but it would not have mattered against Adimarchus's power.

Cal saw all of that in a single instant, the moment Adimarchus opened his mouth to utter the word. He also knew that his own intervention had almost no chance of stopping that outcome; he'd seen the demon lord's power firsthand, and despite his own brilliance, or perhaps because of it, he knew what he faced. But their plan had placed the ultimate hope in his hands, and he did what he'd been ready to do, since the confrontation had begun. He had held back his actions thus far, ready to intervene should the Prince call upon his dread power.

Even as he spoke his own word, triggering the final release of the greater dispel on the scroll he carried, he knew he would not succeed. It wasn't a question of confidence; he could feel the power of Adimarchus's magic building, how own spell a dagger thrust against a stone wall. How could there be any other outcome?

But there was one factor that the gnome did not include in that instant's calculation. The scroll that he used was not his own; he had not had time to transfer the spell into his own books, to make it his. Thus the spell was one borrowed, found upon the scroll taken from one of the Cagewright strongholds; he'd even forgotten which one.

What he did not know, was that the scroll had been originally scribed by Thifirane Rhiavati.

Thifirane Rhiavati, the mad transmuter with dreams of power and glory, pawn of Adimarchus. Though the spell was arcane, not divine, so much of what she had become, at the end, was tainted by the madness of Adimarchus that the words scribed upon the scroll were as much his words as hers.

The power of the greater dispel struck the energies of the word of chaos, impacting with a perfect harmony, for they ultimately had come from the same source.

The deadly sound quivered in the air, once, and died.

Morgan leapt into the air, pursuing his adversary, the rival to Occipitus whose madness now bound the two of them together through the very essence of the plane. His sword clove into Adimarchus once from below, this time knocking the Prince noticeably aside, opening a shallow gash in one violent leg, the golden runes inscribed into the flesh glowing around the injured member. They could see, now, that the angel-form of the demon prince retained the wounds of the earlier battle they'd witnessed on Skullrot. True to Morgan's earlier words, they could see the scars wrought by the black powers of Vhalantru's eye-beams, and the ugly tear where Morgan had smote it earlier with Aludrial's Shard.

Arun followed the knight, calling upon Dana's earlier-cast fly spell to come up behind the demon lord. But again his swing had no effect, turned by one of the razor-sharp golden wings, clanging off it as though it were a shield of layered plate steel.

Another arrow knifed into the Prince from below, caroming off of one of his wings without apparent effect.

Despite his injuries, both old and new, the Prince was still a powerful enemy in this form, even without the Ashen Blade and his life-draining tentacles. Adimarchus smote Morgan across the face with his clawed gauntlet, piercing the knight's golden helmet, opening bloody gashes across his face. The knight screamed as golden light suffused the wounds, seeping into his body, threatening to crush him much as Vhalantru had been crushed, back in the cavernous hollow spire of Skullrot. But Morgan resisted the implosion, and fought back with another series of attacks that for the most part failed to penetrate the demon prince's incredible defenses. In fact he came off the worse for the exchange, as the golden wings tore at him, opening up long gashes in his legs. Already the warrior of Helm had bled out enough to kill three men, and kept fighting only through the earlier intervention of Dana's magical healing.

Morgan continued to take an incredible amount of abuse. But again he was not alone, and his allies finally began to make their attacks be felt.

Hovering behind the Prince, Arun kept trying to find an opening, and finally managed a swing that darted under the golden wings, tearing into the Prince's back. His holy sword opened a depressingly small rent that trailed brilliantly bright droplets of white liquid. Another arrow slid into the melee, a gift from Dannel that zinged off of the metallic skullcap of the demon lord. The elf's cold iron missiles were spent, but he was using Benzan's bow, and the holy arrows that he now fired could injure Adimarchus, even if the arrows themselves had little chance of penetrating his demonic—or angelic—hide.

Chains lashed at the Prince as the zelekhut joined the attack, flying around the borders of the melee, careful not to interfere with Morgan or Arun. It whipped a chain around the Prince's arm, snaring on the deadly gauntlet, trying to grip and hold the limb. A look of momentary annoyance crossed the demon lord's face as he twisted his body, drawing the larger outsider in despite the frantic flapping of its wings. The zelekhut tried to disengage, but before it could extract itself from its own grapple Adimarchus drove his gauntlet into its chest. The golden light flared from the impact, and the creature released a tinny screech as it crumpled into an oblong shape a small fraction of its original size. Adimarchus shook free the chain holding him and let the outsider drop, falling atop a stone statue and crumpling it in a spray of stone shards.

The exchange had only taken a few seconds, but it was enough time for the companions to continue their attacks. Morgan managed to injure the Prince once more, cutting through the heavy gauntlet to score the flesh beneath, but Arun's attacks were again ineffective. Dannel's supply of cold iron arrows had been already exhausted, but his shafts, empowered by Benzan's evil outsider bane longbow, still possessed a potency against one such as the Prince, and one of his arrows managed to lodge in his thigh, digging a scant few inches into the muscle there.

A number of flickering lights appeared around the melee, slightly hazy, as if viewed through a pall of thin smoke. Cal's shadow conjured archons immediately did what they had been called to do, blasting Adimarchus with rays of holy light. They did not appear to have much effect, but the Prince responded by unleashing an unholy blight that surrounded him with a brief but deadly nimbus of evil power. The shadow-creatures were immediately blasted out of existence, but both Morgan and Arun were able to hold their position and continue to press their attacks. Each accomplished a minor injury upon the demon lord, and were bolstered a moment later as Dana healed their injuries with a mass cure spell.

Adimarchus was starting to show the effects of his wounds now, the angelic figure's body riven by numerous cuts and gashes. The two holy warriors prepared for another full assault, but suddenly the Prince drew his wings close around his body, dropping out from between them to the ground below. As he landed, he shifted form once again, returning to his demonic manifestation. The two forms were clearly distinct identities, for the wounds the angel had suffered were gone, replaced by those hurts he had taken during his initial manifestation. Unlike the angelic form, however, the demon identity obviously had the power of healing, his wounds from the earlier stage of the battle already beginning to fade.

The Prince came immediately under attack from the rest of the companions that had remained on the ground. Lok, armed with Viirdran Daragor's rapier, infused with divine magic, scored his first hit of the battle, coming in under the demon lord's guard to sink about six inches of the blade into Adimarchus's side. Backed by Lok's very considerable strength, the blow had to have hurt it, but Adimarchus merely snarled at him. Somehow the gesture made the Prince seem... smaller, more like the common foes that they'd fought and defeated before.

The others joined in the attack, Beorna rushing at the demon lord's flank, while Mole appeared out of nowhere and rushed past in a near-blur, leaping into the air, kicking off a statue, and past Adimarchus's face in a blur, her knife cutting a tiny but obvious scratch in his forehead. The marut came forward as well, again using its reach in an attempt to pound the demon lord's body into ruin, again without much success.

Arun and Morgan descended from above, ready to strike with their blessed blades. Morgan misjudged slightly and his stroke was turned by one of the long tentacles; a second lashed out and seized his ankle. The tentacle sought to sap his life energy, but Morgan was protected by a death ward, which protected him from that form of attack. The knight's efforts gave Arun a chance to slip in opposite Lok, bringing his sword down in another heavy slam that dug deeply into the Prince's back between the roots of the thick tentacles. This time his blade bit deeply, and Adimarchus turned, death in his eyes.

"No! Fight me, you bastard!" Beorna yelled, swinging her sword at the demon lord's head. Her sword had crushed stone walls and foul monsters of all sorts, but the blow merely rebounded off of his oblong skull, almost knocking the weapon free from her grasp.

Adimarchus fixed Arun with his dark gaze. The paladin roared and lifted his sword to strike, but the Prince merely said, "Be gone."

And Arun disappeared.

Chapter 455

“NO!” Beorna yelled, redoubling her assault, again to no effect. Blind with fury, she simply threw herself at him, hoping at least to grapple or hinder him in some way, but Adimarchus merely shrugged her off, knocking her away to fall hard upon her back.

A storm of attacks came in from all directions, all but ignored by the Prince, who seemed to act according to his own altered perceptions of his surroundings. Arrows from Dannel’s bow, melee attacks from the warriors, even a disintegrate from Cal that dissipated harmlessly as it struck his spell resistance. The attacks may as well have been made with wooden practice weapons. They were hurting him, if gradually, but in his demonic form Adimarchus continued to heal, the wounds knitting shut even as the companions watched.

“Keep attacking!” Lok urged, stabbing again with his rapier, without effect. Beorna tried a new tack, turned her assault toward the Prince’s weapon, but Adimarchus wielded the Ashen Blade like an extension of himself, easily turning aside Beorna’s sunder attempts like a master defeating the clumsy strikes of a beginning student.

The marut finally got lucky, smashing its fist across Adimarchus’s face as the demon prince turned around. A thunderclap sounded from the force of the impact, although Adimarchus was again barely moved by the punishing blow. Still, when the marut’s fist came back, a faint trail of black blood could be seen running down his face from one nostril.

Ignoring the foes that continued to hack at him furiously, Adimarchus lifted the Ashen Blade and drove it into the body of the huge construct. Half of the length of the greatsword vanished into its torso, and the thing let out a high-pitched screech as red fire burst from its gut and its back. Adimarchus drew out the sword and the inevitable fell backward, smashing a pair of statues as it crumpled and fell still.

Morgan let out a loud yell as he dropped to the ground, crashing his sword into the back of Adimarchus’s head. The Prince shuddered from the impact, but only slightly, and he quickly turned to confront his adversary.

“You will now be destroyed, pretender,” he said, bringing up the Ashen Blade. Morgan lifted his sword to strike, but Adimarchus moved in a blur of speed, the greatsword crashing into him even as the deadly tentacles seized his body. Although his life force was protected by his ward, his defenses could not shrug off the deadly impact of the Prince’s blows. Despite his divine protections, and the fact that he doubled the Prince’s size, Morgan was driven back, pursued at each step by Adimarchus. The others tried to distract him, but even though Lok managed another solid jab into the Prince’s side, Adimarchus seemed fixed on his chosen enemy. Finally the demon lord drove his weapon into Morgan’s gut, and the knight fell to his knees, blood spilling from the terrible wound in a torrent. Morgan’s allies lashed at the demon from behind, trying to stop him, but as he met the eyes of the Prince of Madness the knight realized that at that moment, Adimarchus didn’t even know they were there. Morgan felt his divinely-granted power fading from him, and he shrank back to his normal size, all of his wards and protections fleeing before the demon lord’s power. He could do nothing to resist as Adimarchus seized him by the throat in an iron grip, the Ashen Blade held over him in the Prince’s steady right hand.

“Now you shall have the fate you have earned, you who would claim MY throne. But another will bear witness to your failure, servant of Good.” The last word was a sneer, infused with the deep contempt only possible to one who had known the extremes of both the Light and the Dark.

Adimarchus glanced across the room, toward the mighty throne, and made a subtle gesture. The stone chair began to change shape, its thick base coming apart to reveal a hollow space within. Within there was a figure, crushed into a compact shape. Black wings and pale, marked flesh were visible, revealing the identity of the prisoner even before he lifted his head.

Saureya.

“Come forward, slave,” Adimarchus intoned. “It is my wish that you witness the death of hope, and learn that none but I will be master of Occipitus.”

The fallen deva rose and came forward slowly, clearly fighting pain with every movement. His wings were both crumpled against his back in jarring positions, obviously broken in multiple places; his left knee was also bent in an unnatural angle. His expression, however, was utterly devoid of feeling, and his eyes were the empty cavities of one who knew he was damned, and no longer cared. He came to within ten paces, and stopped.

“Do what you will,” he said.

Morgan’s companions hurled themselves at the Prince, trying to distract him from his prey, to free the knight from the doom that awaited him at the hands of their adversary. But the three—Morgan, Saureya, and Adimarchus, seemed locked in a separate drama that they could not pause or derail. Morgan and Beorna tried attacks that simply failed, and Dannel, while he manage to stick a pair of arrows into the demon lord’s back, did not even draw a glance. Lok tossed his shield aside and stabbed the rapier through his belt, leaping upon Adimarchus from behind, trying to grapple him, to tear him away from Morgan. The genasi was stronger than any of him, but he may as well have been grappling a statue cast in steel. He did draw a counter from the Prince, as two of the tentacles sprouting from his back seized him, siphoning life from the warrior’s body. The attack broke the genasi’s grip, and Lok trembled and staggered back, a significant portion of his life force torn from him.

Dana dove down at Morgan, intent on attempting a dimension door to free him from Adimarchus. The Prince’s eyes flickered upward as she descended, and while he did not alter his grip on Morgan, another of the tentacles flicked forward at his command.

“Do not interfere, Moonmaiden,” he growled. The tentacle’s “mouth” spread and grasped onto Dana’s throat, and before she could even cry out the Prince sent her to another plane of existence.

In desperation Cal hurled another disintegrate at Adimarchus, but again the spell-beam dissipated against his spell resistance.

“You feign disinterest most convincingly,” Adimarchus said to Saureya. “But I know what it is to have hope. Learn what I have learned... hope is an illusion, a cruel trick! Hope is naught!”

And with a cruel laugh he drove the Ashen Blade down into Morgan’s skull, piercing through his head deep into his torso. As the sword penetrated the knight’s body it flared out with unholy fire. Adimarchus kept pushing until the point of the sword clanged down into the stone of the floor, then he planted his foot on the ruin of what had been a man, drawing the artifact free, holding it up.

“And so is the fate of all who oppose me,” the Prince of Madness said.

Chapter 456

Adimarchus arched his back as Lok drove into him from behind, using both hands and all of his strength as he pierced the demon lord’s body with his cold iron rapier. This time the weapon sank deep, penetrating Adimarchus’s body until its point jutted from the front of his body just above his left kidney. The Prince roared in pain, and the weapon snapped off just above the hilt, smoke and ichor rising from both openings where the metal shaft entered and exited his body. Lok fell back, already reaching for his axe.

The Prince spun, bringing up the Ashen Blade to grant Morgan’s fate to another foe.

As he turned, the smoking greatsword intersected the descending arc of Beorna’s adamantine blade. Infused with the power of Helm to serve as a holy sword, this time the mighty bastard sword crashed full onto the evil artifact, driven by mortal muscle against the inexorable strength of the demon prince. Adimarchus reflexively shifted to draw off the force of Beorna’s strike, but this time he was a barest instant late in adjusting.

There was a flash of light and a scream of pain, and when they could see again, the companions could see the demon’s blade riven, with a jagged edge wreathed in smoke ending less than a foot from the end of the sword’s hilt.

“You fool!” Adimarchus shrieked. Beorna lifted her weapon to follow up with a strike aimed at the demon lord himself, but before she could unleash the blow the demon seized her, tentacles pinioning her arms as he reached out and grabbed onto her body with his hands. She too had been sheltered by a death ward, so her life force withstood the draining touch of the Prince, but his mundane strength was sufficient to lift her off the ground, armor and all, and hurl her bodily across the room. She landed twenty feet away, almost on top of the twin statues before the remnants of the throne, stone giving way before her adamantine-sheathed form.

Stunned, it took her a moment to regain her bearings.

Another arrow slammed into the demon’s shoulder. Turning toward Dannel, the Prince snarled and hurled an unholy blight at the archer, injuring and sickening him.

Mole leapt past, stabbing at the Prince as she went by. Her blow managed only a tiny gash in his upper arm, but this time she drew a response; one of the tentacles shot out, snared her by the wrist, and hurled her across the room into the dark stairwell, out of sight.

Lok came in again, hefting his axe this time. He drove the weapon into the demon lord's chest, unleashing a blast of sonic energy as the power that Cal had infused into the weapon was released. Through that cacophonous blast the genasi thought he heard a faint crack, but he could not be sure. Adimarchus was certainly not weakened by the attack, it seemed, as the Prince lashed out with his tentacles, striking the genasi in the chest and arms, sucking more life from the warrior. Lok, weakened now almost to the point of death, still tried to hold his ground, but Adimarchus struck him solidly in the head with the back of his left hand, knocking him out flat upon his back, unconscious.

"It is over, you puny fools," the Prince intoned. But although he continued to heal, it was obvious that the demon lord had taken a beating. Wounds crossed his body, and several arrows jutted from his torso.

He turned to Saureya. "I command you to heal me," he said.

Saureya came forward.

Beorna fought to get back up; the room seemed to spin a bit around her, and the weight of her armor made it difficult to extract herself from the ruins of the statues. She thought she heard a whisper in her mind.

In His enemy, His destruction lies.

She glanced down, and saw a gleam of silver jutting from the still-intact portion of the bent and kneeling statue.

A whisper of rushing air and a faint gleam of light was the only announcement of Arun's return. The paladin, finally escaping Adimarchus's maze spell, immediately spotted his enemy—and the few of his friends that remained—and charged.

Opposite the demon lord, Beorna rose, holding Morgan's sword, Aludrial's Shard, bright in her hand.

Saureya extended a hand, and grasped his master on the arm. Adimarchus looked into the eyes of his slave, and reveled in the emptiness that he saw there. Battered, he let down his defenses for the instant it would take to fully restore him.

In that instant, he knew his mistake.

Saureya's grip tightened, even as the whirling storm of a blade barrier erupted around the two. The fallen deva was too close to avoid the barrier himself without releasing Adimarchus, and he made no effort to do so. In fact, his face twisted into a slight smile as the storm of blades cut into his flesh. Adimarchus, far more durable, suffered less from the cutting blades, but even so black droplets flew from the wounds cut into his body by the spell.

“You will have an eternity to regret your betrayal,” the demon prince said. His defenses lifted again, and the magical blades began to dissolve as they impacted his spell resistance.

Arun and Beorna charged in from opposite directions, their rush perpendicular to the plane of the blade barrier. The two dwarves each carried a weapon anaethema to the Prince of Madness. Adimarchus, realizing his danger, started to teleport away, but Saureya, still locked onto him, knowing his master’s thoughts even before he did, disrupted the magic as it gathered.

Arun and Beorna each yelled a dwarven cry of battle, fused with a deep invocation to their respective gods, as they struck.

Two holy blades pierced Adimarchus’s body.

The demon prince staggered, and fell away from Saureya, crumpling to the ground, his face frozen in a look of dark despair.

Chapter 457

A great rumbling shook the entire chamber. Arun and Beorna staggered back, as a cloud of black vapor rose from the demon lord’s body, coalescing into a figure that took on a golden glow as it solidified into coherent form.

“The angel-aspect... it is still a threat!” Cal shouted.

The alternative manifestation of Adimarchus took on solid form, rising up higher into the open air of the chamber, out of the reach of Arun and Beorna, who rushed forward to face it. Arun, still empowered by Dana’s fly spell, rose up to meet it, and Dannel continued his barrage of arrows, which zinged off of the demon prince’s wings even as they became substantial.

But Adimarchus, or what was left of him, had clearly had enough of the fight. The angel-form was also seriously wounded, and rather than remain to confront his foes, the Prince shimmered and vanished.

Looking down at the ruined body of the Prince’s demon-form, the companions wondered at the ultimate fate of their adversary.

“What happens now?” Arun demanded, turning to Saureya.

The fallen celestial shrugged. “The fate of Occiptius is not mine to determine.”

Mole, who emerged from behind the sundered stone throne, somewhat drained but otherwise intact, was the first to notice the other change.

“Morgan’s body... it’s gone!”

* * * * *

High above the surface of Occipitus, in fact almost directly above the chamber where he had battled the companions from Faerûn, Adimarchus rematerialized. The angelic countenance of the demon lord was savaged by the blows he had suffered. The sacred markings that covered his flesh, already profaned by what he was, were further mangled by gashes and tears. Droplets of golden ichor trailed after him as he rose higher into the sky. He had a tired look about him, his earlier anger fading now into resignation, for now he had to live.

A presence alerted him, and he turned, fury rising again into his features. His angry shout filled the air. "Occipitus is mine!"

Something manifested in the empty expanse of the Abyssal plane's skyscape. The golden glow that suffused the plane's dome began to coalesce, much as Adimarchus's spirit had left his demon form to return to the second half of his shattered personality.

"I destroyed you once, and shall again!" the demon lord shrieked. "Occipitus is mine!"

"Occipitus rejects you," came a Voice from Everywhere.

Golden light flared through the sky, and the Prince screamed.

* * * * *

"What's happening?" Mole asked. They could all see the disturbance wrought in the sky above through the opening at the top of the Skull, and those sensitive to such things could feel the roiling currents of power that trembled throughout the entire plane.

"Judgment has been rendered," Saureya said, and for an instant there was a hint of emotion in the fallen celestial, a hint of what he had once been.

They looked down at the body of the fallen Prince. Adimarchus's demon form started to shake, and the dwarves reached for their weapons, fearing that their foe was not yet destroyed. But before they could close a shaft of pure brilliance shot down from above, lancing through the opening, striking the fallen lord. The companions staggered back, shielding their eyes from the radiance. It lasted only a second, and when it was over, all that had been left of the Prince of Madness was gone.

"It is over," Saureya proclaimed.

"We've won?" Dannel asked, incredulity evident in his voice.

Beorna was helping Lok, who groaned as he stirred. "What about the priestess?" she asked, looking up at the deva.

"She returns," he said.

“She had a second plane shift memorized,” Cal said.

“And Morgan?” Arun asked.

A hint of an ironic smile twisted at the edge of the fallen celestial’s mouth for a moment. “I would have thought you would have known that answer,” he said.

Cal nodded. “Will we see him again?”

“Perhaps. If there is one thing that I have learned, it is that nothing can be foreordained.”

“What will happen to you?” Mole asked.

The deva shrugged. “Whatever it is, that, too, will come in time.”

“I cannot believe it,” Arun said, his sword lowered at his side. “We just took out a demon prince.”

“Ah, come on, you didn’t really think we were all going to just come here and die, did you?” Mole asked, a wide grin plastered on her face.

The companions passed around a look; that had seemed a far more likely outcome than their current victory.

“It feels... empty, somehow,” Dannel said, coming forward to join them. Beorna jabbed him in the side with her elbow.

“Let it all go, elf,” she said. “We’ve won a mighty victory today. There will be more darkness tomorrow, no doubt; but this day, the world has been changed.”

“Look!” Mole cried, pointing upward.

They all craned their heads, sheltering their eyes as another bright shaft of light stabbed down through the opening in the skull above. But this was not another temporary release of power like the one that had wiped away the remains of Adimarchus. It took them a moment to recognize it for what it was, for while it was something common to their reality, it was something foreign to the Abyss.

“It’s the sun! The sun is shining!” Mole exclaimed.

“Toril’s sun, shining in the Abyss?” Dannel whispered to Cal. “Doubtful, to say the least.”

“Just enjoy it,” the gnome replied, with a grin. “Whatever it means, it is better than before, no?”

“Hodge would have liked to have seen this,” Arun said. Beorna leaned up against him, taking his hand in hers.

The companions stood there, close in each other's company, letting the healthy glow of golden rays wash over them, driving away dark memories, and filling them with the hope of a new day.

THUS ENDS "ASYLUM", AND THE CONCLUSION OF THE SHACKLED CITY ADVENTURE PATH

Shackled City Epic: "Vengeance"

Begun 6-17-05

Prologue

Clarity came gradually, like a roadside sign materializing out of a thick fog. He became aware of where he was, what he was, and who he was, in that order. His body was numb, a leaden appendage only loosely bound to the mind that shuddered with the inflow of memories of this place, the realization of what had happened.

With a great effort, he was finally able to move, but the attempt was cut short by the shackles that bound him against the wall of the chamber. The wall of his prison.

The room was circular and not spacious; had he been free, he could have crossed to any point by taking less than six steps. There was no door that he could see; his recollections did not include any details of this room, nothing useful that could help him escape.

Escape. He laughed, a sound that rattled in his chest so menacingly that he quickly clamped his mouth shut tightly enough to hurt. Pain... that was a good sign in a way, that he'd recovered enough to have sensation, but he knew that the feeling was just a precursor to what he would feel, in this place.

A sound, faint at first, then resolving into the measured tread of booted feet. The prisoner tensed, although there was nothing that he could hope to do; the shackles that bound him had been designed to hold fiends capable of ripping down the walls of fortified citadels. The part of his mind that had regained the capacity to think clearly whispered at power that he should have had, spells he could have cast to flee, but that part of his brain was a clean slate.

A door opened. Or rather, it was more exact to say that a part of the wall... retreated, widening from a point that became large enough to accommodate the figure that stepped into the cell.

He was ebon skinned, beautiful, of a height and approximate build with the prisoner, but there all similarity ended. He was attired in a shimmering raiment of dark, conservatively cut silks and trim leather that managed to look outrageously expensive without being festooned with gaudy baubles or other fancy decorations. He had six fingers on each hand, and youthful features that nevertheless bespoke a noble bearing and an epic self-confidence.

The prisoner had been ready to hate his captor, but as his eyes met those of the black-hued youth, the emotion drained from him like water from a punctured skin, replaced by a wave of admiration and even adulation. Had he not been bound, he would have knelt before the newcomer, and abased himself as an acolyte suddenly presented with the living avatar of his god.

“Graz’zt,” he was able to stammer out.

The youth laughed. “No, but the mistake is an honest one; His line breeds all too true.” His mouth twisted slightly in a hint of a frown; for some reason that sent a pang of sadness through the captive. He laughed again, the sound not harsh, but as light and pleasing as the soft melodies of his words. “No, I am Athux, scion of the ebon lord whose enmity you have so richly earned. And you are Benzan, Traveler of Faerûn, although I suspect that my father has a new identity prepared for you.”

At the man’s words Benzan felt a part of his own fire return, and he tugged his gaze away from Athux’s in a gesture that he knew was futile. “I will not be Graz’zt’s pawn.”

The cambion’s look was almost sympathetic. “It is already too late for that, Benzan,” he said earnestly. He reached out and touched Benzan’s cheek; the soft slide of Athux’s fingers sent a paroxysm of joy through the tiefling that drew a sob of despair from his chest.

“We will speak again, soon,” Athux said. He kept his gaze on Benzan as he drew back to the entry, then turned and vanished, the opening closing behind him in the blink of an eye.

Benzan felt a wave of revulsion pass through him in the wake of the false emotions that the demon had evoked in him. His strength left him, and he sagged down against his bonds, his body wracked with agonies both physical and mental as he cried for what he had lost.

And for what he had yet to lose.

Chapter 458

The underground chamber was cavernous and clearly of volcanic origin, formed within the earth by ancient combinations of pressure and heat. The interior space was irregular and complicated by later alterations wrought by air and water and deposits of minerals that had built up over time. But even with that clutter and the various twists and bends that jutted off of the core, the great open space in the center was easily a hundred feet across, and a stone dropped from the highest point would easily have fallen twice that distance before it finally came to rest amidst the cracks and crannies of the chamber floor.

A reddish glow brightened the interior of the cavern at one end. A first glance would have likely led to the surmise that its source was some remnant of volcanic activism, but that assumption would be quickly dispelled by a more intense scrutiny. For resting within a niche roughly thirty feet off the ground, hovering above a ledge of stone that jutted from the cavern wall, was the source of the light, an oblong latticework of red crystal the size of an ogre’s skull. That wonder might have drawn more attention but for the fact that its rays brilliantly reflected off a splendor of golden wealth more substantial than the treasury of a kingdom. The cavern opposite the glowing crystal rose in terraces like a stepladder fashioned for a titan, and there countless coins of varied mints and metals were scattered as if to collect the gleam of the light to best effect. Mixed in among that hoard were other items of obvious wealth; scattered gemstones, precious jewels, objects of rare wood polished to a shimmering shine, assorted pieces of armor and weapons, and even the head of a statue shaped from solid mithral, crafted after the appearance of a bearded man of stern visage and of a scale at least six times that of its subject.

But even this fabulous treasure, however grand, was not the most notable focus of the chamber. For on a wide ledge yet further distant, a dragon slumbered.

It was a huge red, its body the size of a middling farmer's cottage, easily sixty feet from the ends of the teeth that jutted from its spacious jaw to the tip of its tail. It lay recumbent upon the surface of the ledge, its tail curled around its lower body, wisps of smoke rising from its nostrils with each massive breath. The creature bore the scars of numerous engagements, including some marks that looked to be fairly recent in origin. Several scales had been torn from its body, two broad healed gashes crossed its breast, and one wing still bore a foot-long tear that dragged an uneven flap of leathery skin. None of those badges of experience detracted from the aura of power and potency that surrounded the creature, however. Even at rest, Hookface was a monstrous foe, representative of one of Faerûn's most devastating races.

Even with the dragon asleep, the cavern was full of sounds, subtle noises of the stone, currents of air that shifted deep underground, adding their always-changing whisper to the background. Thus it might have easily been missed when a soft noise like a breaking wave sounded upon a ledge near the base of the wall opposite the dragon's perch, and six individuals materialized out of nowhere into the cavern.

The six newcomers—most of which hovered slightly above, rather than stood upon, the ledge—immediately started moving. They had weapons at the ready, and bore the tell-tale auras of numerous spells, betraying instantly their intent. The dragon, asleep, looked to be easy prey, despite its considerable advantage in size and bulk.

But that impression changed almost immediately. Even as the echo of the faint noise caused by the teleport faded, the dragon reared up, its eyes widening more with rage than surprise, its jaws opening even as it lifted its body, clutching the edge of the ledge with its fore and rear claws. Even the most agile of the newcomers had barely managed to cover ten feet from the point of arrival when Hookface unleashed its deadly breath, and filled the cavern with fire.

Chapter 459

Flying.

The sensation could not be beaten, in Mole's estimation. The freedom of it, the speed, the grace, the rush of air past one's head, the ability to look down at the poor ground-locked masses and laugh!

Uncle Cal should have bought one of those wands of flying earlier, she thought. Maybe she could convince him to craft for her a more permanent device, one that would grant her control over the exercise of the power. A ring, perhaps... although that would force her to make a decision over the two she already wore, since for some reason known only to arcanists and sages an individual could only wear two magic rings at a time.

All of those thoughts flashed through the gnome's head like streaks of light, for she was being blasted roughly aside by the concussive force of the expanding plume of dragonfire, and the cavern wall was getting mighty close. The dragon's breath had been way off to the side, instead of focused right in the knot of them as she'd expected, and it had sort of thrown off her evasion.

A stalactite promised an unfortunate collision, but Mole effortlessly twisted her body and slipped past it with at least a full inch to spare. She kicked off the wall behind it, using her legs like springs to transform her momentum into a bound that was further augmented by her magical boots. Her leap carried her out into the open air again like an arrow, rising high above the cavern floor below. The rush of heat from the backblast of the dragon's breath had washed over her like an overheated oven, but with the wards against fire that all of them wore, she barely felt it. Not that something as basic as a dragon's breath weapon would catch her, she thought.

A brief hint tickled at the back of her thoughts, a memory of a lava-filled cavern, and another dragon, its jaws opening to unleash a stream of death upon her...

But that memory was old, and she shrugged it off as the intensity of the moment, the adrenaline surge of battle, filled her. The warriors had emerged from the flames to fly toward the dragon, their oversized choppers ready for some hacking and slashing. As the inertia of her spring-leap began to flag, and the power of the spell reasserted itself, Mole looked down to see that the fire from the dragon's breath continued to burn—no, she reassessed, recognizing what was happening, it was a thing that lived in the fire, an elemental unleashed somehow by the dragon to help it guard its lair. Ah, so that's why its aim had been so poor, she thought. It had emerged from the burning lattice-crystal, now gone, shattered by the intensity of the dragon's initial attack.

Damn, that's big, she thought. And indeed, it nearly reached her current height, at least forty feet tall, a living bonfire with arms that swept out at her friends while she watched. The warriors had already pulled away from it in their charge against the dragon, but Cal and Dannel were vulnerable, her uncle staggering as it blasted him with appendages of living flame. Cal was protected against fire, she knew, not to mention about a dozen other defensive wards, but even so, those blows looked like they hurt

"I'll take care of it!" she heard Beorna yell, even as she distantly heard her uncle shouting for them to focus on the dragon. But the templar either did not hear or was ignoring him, for she flew straight into the elder elemental, swinging through the ephemeral substance of its body with great sweeps of her adamantite sword. How effective she was Mole could not gauge, for the elder elemental did not bleed. Beorna did seem to get its attention, however, as it lifted its arms and started pummeling her with powerful blows.

The dragon rose even as Arun and Lok charged into it, their blades flashing in the reflected firelight. The dragon's superior reach allowed it to attack before they could get close enough to strike. Its head darted out on its long neck, its jaws snapping at Arun in an effort to snatch the paladin right out of the air. But the paladin, his own considerable strength augmented by powerful magic, tore free and slammed his sword down into the side of the dragon's head. Hookface roared and drew back in time to take a second hit from Lok, who buried a foot of his axe's blade into its shoulder on the opposite side of its body.

Rather than unleash a full attack upon the two warriors, the dragon leapt into the air, using its bulk to knock Arun and Lok roughly aside as it arced across the cavern to the far wall, some seventy feet above the ledge where Cal and Beorna battled the elemental. Along the way several arrows from Dannel's bow bit painfully into its torso, punching through the thick scales with the force of the elf's potent magic behind them. Dannel had withdrawn far enough from the elemental's position to get a clear shot across the cavern, spider climbing along the uneven maze of chasms and ledges that spread out across the lower part of the complex, and now he put his deadly bow to use, tracking the dragon's movements as he rapidly reloaded and fired.

Arun and Lok quickly recovered, and flew across the cavern after the dragon to reengage. But Hookface was not finished, and again it leapt across the open interior space, gaining more height with a single powerful stroke of its wings, taking hits and inflicting them as it passed. It drilled Lok with a snap of its tail that would have broken the breastbone of a lesser combatant, even through plate armor. But these foes were stronger than any the dragon had ever faced, and they followed it still as it again clung to the cavern wall with all four claws, perched like a salamander upon a rock. It was high up now, over a hundred feet above the lowest crevices of the cavern floor below.

Beorna, infused with the power of Helm, was singlehandedly unleashing a ceaseless storm of destruction upon the great elemental. Its blows pounded her mercilessly, but protected from fire as she was, and further resistant to physical attack through her divinely-granted gifts and the durability of her armor, she merely grunted softly with each impact and surged forward once more to the attack. Beorna had empowered her weapon to function as a holy sword, and although the elemental was not technically evil, the enchantment was more than sufficient to penetrate its resistances to mortal attacks. And it was becoming clear that she was having an effect upon it, for the roaring inferno that comprised its body was rent now with huge gaps, through which the far side of the cavern behind it could just be discerned.

Finally, the fact that this confrontation was heading inexorably in one direction seemed to impinge upon the elemental's dim mind. It moved suddenly forward, enveloping Beorna, taking another hit in the process but wrapping its fiery arms around her. Those tendrils of coherent flame twisted around her until she was engulfed in fire. Even as she struggled to free herself the elemental drove her down, slamming her into a crevice into the ground. It held her there, looming over her, continuing to stream red-hot waves of fire and heat into the crack. Her protection to fire spell, overwhelmed by the earlier force of the dragon's breath and the constant attacks from the elder elemental, began to falter.

"Over here, you overgrown bonfire!" Cal challenged, casting his newest and most powerful spell, weaving a web of shadow into a powerful blast of quasi-real elemental energy.

Strength of will was not the elemental's strong suit, and it failed to recognize the shadowy nature of the gnome's cone of cold. The spell tore through it, vaporizing swaths of its body that were turned into great plumes of steam that exploded outward through the chamber. That was enough of an opportunity for Beorna, who tore free from the elemental's grasp with a yell and leapt up out of the crevice, the still-active fly spell allowing her to ascend and bring her sword around in an arc that bisected the twin points of coherent flame that were the elemental's "eyes". The creature let out what sounded like a tired hiss, and then it dissolved into wisps of fire that quickly vanished.

But even as the elemental was overcome, a cry of alarm filled the cavern. High above them the dragon had dug into the cavern wall after its latest leap. Arun and Lok, still in pursuit, rushed toward it, their weapons already slick with its blood, several new wounds added to the dragon's inventory of injuries. Thus far it had evaded their full attacks, and had inflicted several heavy hits of its own upon the warriors. But like with the elemental, it looked as though this could only end one way. Already it looked like the dragon was starting to flag, despite its incredible fortitude, while its two adversaries only came on with greater intensity, unrelenting as they drove Hookface further back into a corner from which it could not escape.

But then the dragon's strategy became evident a moment later, as it turned and hurled a dispel magic at the closing warriors. The magical power holding them aloft faltered, and both plummeted toward the uneven ground, over a hundred feet below.

Chapter 460

"Call!" Dannel yelled, drawing the gnome's attention upward to the falling warriors. The elf was too far away to intervene, having moved away from their arrival point in order to secure a good position from which to snipe at the dragon, but he knew that Cal's magical power exceeded his by a considerable margin.

Cal looked up and instantly gauged the situation. Like the others, he had been empowered with the ability to fly, although he had not yet taken advantage of that power. He did so now, darting across the floor of the cavern, mere feet above the uneven surface. Lok and Arun had been fairly close when the dragon had hit them with its dispel, but the gnome frowned as he judged the distance between the two descending figures. He figured that both were tough enough to survive the fall, but better not to take that chance...

A musical chord erupted from Cal's lips, and his feather fall caught both Lok and Arun a mere twenty feet off the ground, softening their descent so that they landed easily upon the jutting ridges of stone that would have otherwise done considerable damage to their armored frames.

"Thanks," Arun said, looking up in time to see the dragon descending rapidly toward them.

For a moment, Mole forgot what she was supposed to be doing as the dragon soared majestically through the darkness of the cavern. It had gotten a lot dimmer when the elemental was destroyed, although her keen eyes allowed her to see just enough from the light of their magical weapons and Cal's light spell to make out huge silhouette of the dragon passing by below her. Thankfully it seemed more intent on her friends below than on plucking her out of the air; but that might have been because thus far, she hadn't really managed to harm it in any way. It was just sooo damned big that her tiny crossbow bolts just weren't going to harm it in any significant way.

From below, the companions responded to the dragon's dive with their own volley of attacks. Arun and Lok were effectively out of the fight for the moment, their mobility reduced to scrambling over the rough ground of the cavern floor, but Beorna could and did rise to meet it, despite having been considerably roughed up by her encounter with the elemental. Dannel continued his barrage, scoring hit after hit with his enchanted bow, his arrows jutting from the dragon's neck and body like needles in a pincushion.

The dragon roared as Beorna lunged at it. The templar sword dug into its side, but the dragon merely shifted its course slightly, flying through her, knocking her roughly aside into a violent spin that continued for several seconds before she could recover and steady herself. Hookface continued its dive, flashing through the space above them in a black blur of shadow. Halfway through its pass fire exploded downward in a torrent, a stream of flame in a long line that engulfed Cal, Lok, Arun, and Dannel in its reach. Their resistances held, for the most part, although Cal and Lok both took damage as Dana's wards were overloaded and dissolved.

The next one's going to hurt, Cal thought, as he reached Arun and touched him with his wand, renewing the fly spell upon the paladin. But even as Arun lifted off and turned toward the dragon's wake, they saw it tuck its wings close around its body and vanish like a catapult stone into a broad tunnel that gaped like a black mouth at the far end of the cavern.

"No way we'll catch it, moving at that speed," Dannel said, coming over to join them. Beorna, too, landed nearby, looking a mess in her flame-blackened armor.

Cal grimaced and stared into the passage where the dragon had disappeared. "It's up to Dana, now," he said, drawing out one of his healing wands from its scabbard at his hip.

* * * * *

Hookface barreled through the underground tunnel, using its legs, wings, and tail alike to propel it through the passage at a speed greater than that of a mounted knight at full gallop. Streaks of hot blood marred the rocks of the tunnel walls and floor as it passed, steaming in the cold air of the deep ways far beneath the earth. It was already nearly a mile away from its lair, and the volcanic heat that still warmed that place had long since faded.

Fear and humiliation burned under a red-hot surge of anger in the dragon's thoughts as it fled—no tactical retreat or mere withdrawal, this! To be forced from its lair, and worse, to abandon its treasure to a lot of... humanoids! The mere thought filled the dragon's vision with red and banished the pain of its many wounds, nearly driving it to stop and return to reclaim what was its.

But Hookface was far too canny to second-guess itself for long. Within the first ten seconds of the engagement it had recognized the intruders into its lair, and had also acknowledged that the foes it had battled in the wreckage of Cauldron had grown significantly in prowess since that last confrontation. And they had new friends as well; the gnome was obviously an archmage, while the earth genasi struck even harder than the paladin, with that axe that the dragon could sense was veritably dripping with magical enhancements. Even the powerful elemental whose services it had... acquired, had barely slowed them down. No, Hookface knew that if it had lingered to battle the intruders, then the humanoids would now be enjoying the prize of an elder dragon's corpse in addition to its fabulous horde.

Hookface had yielded the day, and the advantage for the moment. But nor was it without resources, even with its lair overrun, and while these humanoids were powerful, they lacked the experience... and patience... of an old red dragon...

Light appeared up ahead; the end of the tunnel was approaching. Hookface barreled forward, but as it neared the secret exit to its lair a figure appeared, drifting down from above to float in the middle of the opening. A woman, human, clad in a form-fitting robe with a soft white cloak drawn aside to spill down her back, leaving her arms and legs free to maneuver.

Hookface did not stop, did not even slow, charging forward with jaws open to engulf the woman.

Faced with the impressive spectacle of a huge red dragon coming toward her with incredible speed, the woman did not even flinch. Instead she waved a hand, and uttered a powerful invocation.

The result was immediate, and there was no way for Hookface to avoid it. A deep rumble shook the tunnel, and even as the dragon tried to charge through the area of effect of the earthquake, the ceiling collapsed upon it, burying it under tons of fallen rock and debris.

The woman drifted back a few paces as a cloud of dust arose from the mouth of the tunnel. She was already casting again, even though the dragon had completely disappeared beneath the mountain of rock that had completely blocked the passage.

Her caution was well founded, for a moment later the debris pile shifted. A claw burst through into open air, followed a heartbeat later by the jagged shape of the dragon's head. The dragon was covered in pulverized stone dust and dirt and looked terrible. One eye had been crushed and oozed black fluid, but the other fixed onto the woman, and promised a reckoning. With a painful hiss the dragon surged forward, just a few feet at a time, now, shaking free from the imprisoning stone that still pinned its body.

The woman calmly continued her invocation. Finally, she stopped, and regarded the dragon with eyes that were coldly neutral.

The dragon had freed nearly half its body now from the rubble, and was moving faster now, dragging huge boulders out of the slick as it pulled its body clear. But it was caught off guard as a pair of massive arms rose out of the tunnel floor, locking around its neck in a punishing grip.

The dragon screamed and tore at the grappling arms even as they were followed by a massive body and head that nearly filled the tunnel. The appearance of the massive elemental obscured the dragon, which fought on with desperation. Red flames poured out from around the woman's conjured ally, almost reaching her at the mouth of the tunnel, but she merely watched as the elder elemental she'd drawn from across the planes punished the critically-wounded dragon. In the relatively cramped confines of the tunnel, with nowhere for it to retreat, there was only one possible ending.

Finally, it was done. The woman floated forward to confirm it, then dismissed the elemental with a wave. She spoke a word of magic, and was gone.

* * * * *

Back in the dragon's lair, the companions looked up as a light shone in the exit tunnel where the dragon had disappeared just a few minutes previously. They readied their weapons, but the light quickly resolved into the familiar form of Dana, surrounded by the soft white glow of moonlight, flying through the power of her magical boots.

She came to them, hovering well above the ledge where they'd gathered to wait for her. Most of them, anyway; Mole was already going through the dragon's horde.

"It is done," she said, her voice flat.

Chapter 461

Cal was not working when the door opened and Dana slipped silently into the chamber, but the number of books and scrolls piled in neat stacks across the heavy mahogany table indicated that he had been quite busy indeed. The gnome lay back comfortably in the chair, his eyes closed, and at first the priestess thought that he was asleep. But a moment later, he spoke.

"Welcome, Dana." Without opening his eyes, he indicated the chair adjacent around the corner of the table, one sized for humans.

Dana came across the room and seated herself. The table and accompanying chairs were of quite clever construction, offering comfortable access at a similar level to persons of radically different height without straining either a gnome or a tall human excessively in adapting to the needs of the other. Cal had been spending more time here than in his study, both because of the greater space and because of the comfortable feeling that this chamber gave him. During normal times it would have been more crowded, since this room was situated in the center of the tower and persons passing through to other parts of the building would often have to pass through it. But at the moment, he and Dana were the only occupants of the place.

"You have something on your mind," Cal said simply, finally looking up and meeting her eyes.

"I suppose you already know what I am going to say," she began. "You always were the sharpest of us, even before you acquired that magical headpiece. But I guess you don't have to be a super-genius to know what I'm thinking; I haven't been very secretive about my feelings, I suppose."

The gnome let out a small sigh. "You know—I hope you do—that we are all with you in this matter."

Dana slapped her hand down on the open surface of the table, making a loud noise that seemed to surprise her. "And yet, what are we doing?" she exclaimed.

Cal did not respond, and a moment later the woman took a breath, steadying herself. "I'm sorry. I know that you and the others have been doing your best. Our contacts, our friends... the divinations you and I have been making every day since our return... everyone has been trying. And I know what you're going to say, about me pushing myself too hard, but Cal, we know who has him. We may not know where, yet, but I think we both know where to start looking."

The gnome nodded and reached across a thick book for the mug of tea he'd left there some time previous. It was cold, and he summoned a quick cantrip to heat the half-full container before taking a sip. Dana said nothing during the delay, although it was clear in her expression and posture that she was barely containing herself.

"Your last commune suggested that things have... changed... on Azzagrat. Given the nature of our departure, on our last visit, it might be better if we spent more time investigating the matter before we take action."

"All the more reason to set out for Sigil now," Dana replied quickly. "Where better to find out more information? Graz'zt is clearly masking his activities, and I doubt that more spells are going to reveal more than the little we already know."

"It seems that I do not need to make any arguments," the gnome said, lightly. "You are anticipating each of my points."

"I have thought this through," Dana said.

Cal let out a small sigh. "The encounter with the dragon demonstrated the advantage of being prepared. We dictated the terms of the confrontation with Hookface, and as a result were victorious."

Dana nodded brusquely. "I agreed to go along with that, agreed with Arun's plea that the dragon remained a dire threat to Cauldron. And the dragon's treasure will facilitate the process of gathering information on Sigil. But I do not understand why we must delay further. Cylyaria has given us the focus for my plane shift; we have a list of contacts to get started. The spell is in my memory; we can leave right now, right this minute."

Cal made a small gesture that took in the whole of the quiet chamber. "Our companions..."

Dana sliced her hand across the space between them. "You're stalling, Cal; it's not like you. If it were you who'd been taken..."

The gnome leaned forward earnestly, as she trailed off, frustrated. "Dana, I want him back as much as you do! But it's not as if we are all wasting time here!" He prodded one of the heavy books; it barely budged before his effort. "Ever since we first came to Cauldron, we've barely taken time for a breath, driven by the rush of events, by the demands of the moment. Yes, we rushed to Carceri... and barely escaped with our lives. Then Occipitus... and there we had allies, and a foe who was only at a fraction of his true strength, still weakened from his long imprisonment, with few allies. Do you think Graz'zt will fall as easily as Adimarchus? You know that he is one of the six most powerful Demon Princes in existence! You know his sway, even upon our world! You know the legions that he commands..."

During Cal's speech, the priestess's gaze had sank to her lap. Now she looked up, and her eyes shone with moisture. "Cal..." she said earnestly. "I cannot just give him up..."

The gnome reached out and took her hand, holding it tightly. "I know, Dana. None of us will. We're doing what we can... I have gained new powers, and am working on spells... they might be enough to give us a chance. And our new friends, they will help us as well, I know it. Arun and Beorna have their responsibilities in Cauldron, but once the rebuilding is well along, they will join us. And we have other allies who aided us once before..."

"I cannot wait any longer," Dana said. "I... I know that everything you say is true, my friend, my dear friend. But..." She took a deep breath. "I am departing for Sigil today. Now. I took the extra bag of holding we found in Skullrot, and have filled it with... things I may need for the journey."

Cal met her gaze for a long moment. The silence drew out, but Dana's determination did not waver. Finally, the gnome rose, and walking across the room to a hutch situated against the far wall, unlocked a drawer and drew out a small laquered box. Returning, he handed it to her. Dana opened it to reveal the three huge sapphires that they'd recovered from the lair of the Dark Myrakul, in Skullrot.

She met the gnome's eyes. She knew, as he did, that the stones were more than just unusually large and valuable gems; in the hands of a powerful spellcaster they could serve as foci for a soul bind spell.

"Be very, very careful with those," Cal said. "They won't help with our... 'friend,' of course. But if you find yourself needing particular leverage in Sigil..."

"I will be wary, old friend," Dana said. "And I plan on bringing help with me; I'm not going to rush blindly into this situation."

"I know, Dana. But even so, I will expect a sending on every fourth day."

"The spell doesn't always pass the barrier between planes..."

“I know, but make the effort nevertheless. I cannot cast the spell myself, but I’ll have Beorna or another of our friends keep in touch with you from this end. And remember to prepare an extra plane shift each day, in case you need to make a quick retreat back here.”

“Ever cautious,” Dana said, with a hint of her old smile. “Old mother Calloran.” But both knew that her levity was forced.

“Damned straight. And I want an oath, that you are only seeking information, this trip. You will not confront the Lord of Shadows or his followers, without first getting our aid. I don’t want to have to plan out a rescue operation for two friends.”

“I swear it.”

Dana stood. The two friends faced each other for a moment, then Dana knelt and embraced the gnome.

“Be careful, Dana,” he said.

“Tell the others... tell them...”

“I will tell them to be ready,” Cal said. “I was planning on heading to Cauldron tomorrow, in any case. After I finish these latest spells.”

Dana nodded, and without further words turned and left the room the same way she had come.

“Good luck,” Cal whispered, long after the door had closed behind her.

Chapter 462

INTERLUDE

In his private chamber, the cambion Athux looked up, a slight hint of a frown marring the sculpted beauty of his features. He started to return his focus to the huge and ancient tome that dominated his desk, the pages open before him covered in a scrawling script almost as old as the book. But even as the slender quill hovered over the line he’d been scribing, he hesitated, turning back toward the chamber’s only door. It was not the only way out of the room—he’d existed too long to be so foolish—but the iron-banded portal was the only obvious exit, sunk deep into a threshold that revealed the thickness of the massive stone walls of the citadel.

With the charismatic prince as a contrast, the spartan accordings of the chamber seemed downright plain by comparison. Other than the desk, which was a functional slab of black wood, there were only a few tapestries that looked temporary, a single shelf of tomes and scrolls, and a mismatched set of furniture that had the styles of at least a dozen different cultures stamped upon them. For all his smooth self-control Athux never regarded the shelf without his face twisting into a scowl; for all the power represented in those books (and they were, in truth, only a fraction of what he carried with him, or had stashed in other convenient locations), they were a reminder of what had been left behind or destroyed in Zelatar.

It was true, that his sire had forfeited more, much more, if one considered other forms of power in addition to arcane lore. But unlike Graz'zt, Athux's power was derived from wizardry, and he was particularly sensitive to the foci that all the practitioners of that craft, great and small, depended upon for the application of their craft.

A small noise penetrated the thick door that exited onto the corridor outside. Athux closed the book decisively and rose, extending a hand that was immediately filled with the reassuring solidity of his rod. The artifact tingled with an odd anticipation that the cambion found unusual, but he put that aside and crossed decisively to the door. He paused a moment there, calling upon a few defensive wards. The door itself was silent, the sound that he'd detected not repeating. Within a few moments he was prepared, and he pulled the heavy portal aside and stepped into the corridor beyond.

The connecting passageway was rather cramped in contrast with the wide halls of the Argent Palace, the stone walls starkly bare with visible cracks where the massive slabs that constituted the fortress were joined. The passage split and turned in several directions, offering access to various other parts of the citadel, and Athux knew that there was a staircase not fifteen feet from where he stood. The silence here was familiar yet somehow oppressive; there wasn't a lot of activity in the place, certainly not as much as one would expect given its current owner. But that was in part because the Argent Lord's remaining forces preferred to keep a low profile; the Master was a bit... unpredictable.

Athux closed the door behind him and took one step forward down the left branch of the corridor when a nycaloth stepped around the nearest bend, five paces ahead of him.

The four-armed fiend squinted and registered the presence of the cloaked figure before it, lifting a massive double-bladed axe as an inchoate growl formed deep within its throat.

Athux simply stood there, and as the fiend's weapon reached its apex and started down, its eyes met his for the briefest instant. The descent of the axe immediately stopped, and the nycaloth stood there, rapt in the gaze of the cambion lord.

Athux noted that the dusky steel blades of the 'loth's weapon were wreathed in a familiar nimbus of pulsing blue light. Axiomatic weapon, he thought. Specifically suited to slaying demons. A holy weapon would have been equally deadly, but of course would have been equally potent against yugoloths. The implications whispered clear connections in his mind, and he frowned as he considered them for a heartbeat or two.

The nycaloth stood there in silence, waiting. Athux opened his mouth to query it, but his eyes shifted down the passage as a pair of insectoid mezzoloths stepped into view around the far bend twenty feet further down the corridor. The two new arrivals spotted him, lifted their three-pronged spears, and rushed down the hall toward him.

"Slay those bugs," he commanded the nycaloth, who instantly leapt to the cambion's bidding. Even as the sounds of battle and the chattering shrieks of the mezzoloths filled the passage, Athux was already walking down the side passage from which the nycaloth had emerged. He'd set upon a destination, and walked toward it with deliberation, if not haste. If what he'd deduced was correct, rushing heedlessly forward would accomplish nothing, and might even place him into danger.

There were sounds now in the citadel, additions beyond the conflict he'd spawned behind him. He stepped over several bodies; a canoloth with its armored torso staved in, a succubus sundered in two, a lamia pinned to the wall by a bloody spear that had sank a full foot into the stone. The last still clung with grim determination to life, and her eyes fixed imploringly upon the cambion as he strode past, but he barely paid heed to her presence.

The corridor culminated in an arched foyer where several other passages from different parts of the citadel met. As he had expected, the great doors on the far end were partially open, and he could hear the sounds of battle from just beyond. His fingers tightened on the haft of his wand—drawing a thrill of eagerness from the item into him—and warily continued through the gap into the huge chamber beyond.

Unlike most of the rest of the fortress, the great hall was generous with space, with an unobstructed open center nearly fifty feet across and thirty feet deep, and a broad, concave alcove dominated by a huge stone throne on the far side.

The chamber was full of yugoloths of varying size and function; a pair of nycaloths and at least a dozen mezzoloths shared space with a small host of armored canoloths, and even a disgusting fish-like pisoloth skittering around the back of the room. Athux caught sight of an ultraloth hovering in the shadows at the edge of the chamber, directing the assault upon his father in the center of the room.

Prince Graz'zt was magnificent, dominating the chamber even surrounded by creatures that loomed several feet over him. His bare torso shone with a slick of sweat and blood—none of it his own, it seemed, for he bore no obvious wounds. His face was obscured by a faint black haze that hung around his head like a drawn-up cowl, but within that artificial gloom the cambion could clearly mark his father's eyes, bright points that drew him in even through the chaos of the battle. There was a frightening fire in those eyes, a burning rage even deeper than that which was being unleashed upon these intruders who had come into this sanctum.

Athux stood there, watching, as the great wavy-bladed sword spun a circle of death around the mighty demon lord. Already a dozen dismembered yugoloths lay in a mangled ring around him, but the survivors pressed heedlessly in, seeking an advantage. The nycaloths beat their wings to gain a few paces of clearance and then leapt at the prince from both sides, their claws outstretched in an effort to grasp and hold their foe. One was hit and went flying across the room, one wing and two arms shorn clear of its body, but the second descended upon the demon lord and seized hold of him, its weight bearing down upon the Prince with inexorable force while its smaller cousins swarmed upon him from all sides with eager diligence. One thrust a blue-haloed blade into Graz'zt's torso that did achieve a noticeable effect, the axiomatic blade cutting a shallow gash in his iron-muscled side. The Prince's roar shook the huge stones of the chamber walls, but only seemed to further entice the 'loths, which pressed their attack with even more fury.

For a moment it looked as though the demon lord's situation was hopeless, but Athux, who had as of yet not moved further into the room, knew better. So, too, did the ultraloth, which hissed commands in its sinister language, directing its forces to continue pressing upon the Prince, until only flashes of black skin could be seen beneath the swarming horde. It hurled magic, as well, invisible tendrils of power stretching out from it that Athux could sense like strands of music floating on a faint breeze.

And then the nycaloth screamed, and seemed to... shiver was the only word Athux could think of, as he watched. Tendrils of diaphanous energy the color of faded bloodstains twisted around the 'loth's body, and where they touched, its flesh seemed to melt away. The other yugoloths knotted around the grappled Prince likewise began to scream and fall back, with parts of their bodies disintegrating as the scarlet fibers sliced into them.

Athux stared in wonder as the yugoloth attackers were literally torn to pieces. He had not witnessed the casting of many epic spells, and even before he saw the pinpoint of white light within the black halo of energy around Graz'zt's head he knew that his sire had drawn upon the power of the Heart of Axion. Thoughts rushed into his head to accompany the sudden flush of heat that made him feel almost dizzy. Something important had changed here, just now; whether he would be able to discern the nature of the shift was something that would have to be worked out later, when he had time to reflect.

The last few 'loths had completely abandoned their attack, their efforts now focused merely on escape. But their fate was sealed; the spray of red tendrils expanded to engulf each of them, and where it came, death accompanied its arrival.

Only the ultraloth, by virtue of its simple distance from the melee, had a chance to escape. But even as it called upon its magic to flee, Athux finally intervened. It was a trivial matter to ensnare its mind; its potent resistances protected it for all of two seconds before the cambion shattered them and seized what he wanted. But even as it succumbed to his will, a black shaft shot out from the already fading aura of gory death around Graz'zt, materializing into the wavy blade of the Prince's sword. The weapon pierced the ultraloth's breast, driving through it and into the wall with enough force to sink half of the blade's length into the stone. The yugoloth quivered on the sword for a moment, finally falling still.

So much for an easy interrogation, Athux thought. There were other ways of finding out what one needed to know from an enemy, of course, but they were invariably more... messy.

A dozen demons burst into the chamber a moment later, too late to do anything but watch their lord stride forward across the ruined corpses of the yugoloth invaders. The chamber floor resembled an abattoir, with hardly a square foot not covered in the mess of dead monsters. His body covered in blood and gore, his face hidden in the black shroud he wore like a cowl, Graz'zt looked truly what he was, a corrupt entity of pure unadulterated Evil. Athux knew this to be true, and yet he shivered involuntarily as he took in the sight. The Prince walked over to his still-quivering sword, drawing it free from the stone with a quick jerk, letting the ultraloth collapse into a bloody heap at his feet.

Athux could feel the overwhelming power that radiated from the aroused Prince, and he bowed as Graz'zt's stare bore into him. His father's eyes were now hidden within his dark mask, but Athux could feel them nevertheless.

"My Lord," he said.

Graz'zt's gaze fixed him for another minute, and then it shifted to the wreckage that surrounded him. "Clean up this mess," he said, and with a desultory wave he turned and walked out of the room.

Chapter 463

Cauldron.

The volcano city had narrowly escaped being transformed into a gate-town, the conduit for a fiendish invasion of Abeir-Toril. Although it had survived the corrupt plots of the Cagewrights and their dark master, the city had been permanently transformed by its ordeal. The map of the city had been reshaped by the tremors that had accompanied the Ritual of Planar Junction. A considerable segment of the caldera rim had collapsed outward, opening a gap in the volcano's rim that allowed the central lake to drain out in a dramatic cascade that had formed a new river that plummeted down the side of the mountain in a series of spectacular waterfalls. Whole districts were just... gone, including such familiar sites as the Temple of Kelemvor. Other areas had suffered widespread destruction, such that as many as half of the city's buildings were unsafe for habitation without considerable repairs and reconstruction. The city now resembled a giant "C" when seen from above, with the gap containing the new river gorge where the first waterfall plummeted down almost five hundred feet to spray against the mountainside below on the first stage of its journey to the lowlands.

The crisis that had swept over Cauldron was still a very recent memory, but the city was now a beehive of activity as its residents returned and set about the work of rebuilding. Many of its residents had perished in the catastrophe, and others had elected not to return, seeking new opportunities in less tumultuous lands. But most had returned, and they were joined by others; newcomers from Almraiven or the lands adjoining the Lake of Steam to the east. Shield dwarves came from the mountains to the northeast, knowing that their skills would be much in demands, and even an embassy of tall moon elves from the northern Miir could be seen in the city, meeting with city leaders to negotiate their aid to the reconstruction efforts. The new mayor, Ankhin Taskerhill, was putting in long hours meeting with these and other delegations, and already was winning renown as a tireless advocate for the people of Cauldron and the future of their city.

Balander Calloran materialized in the courtyard of the Temple of Helm. The place was familiar despite the new work done on the stables the scaffolds that covered the entire front of the temple sanctuary. The courtyard was quiet, but Cal could hear the din of construction work from all over the city, the constant noise of hammers, saws, and working men and women.

Crossing to the temple, Cal encountered an acolyte who wore both the mantle of Helm and the sigil of Arun's Hammers. The undercleric reported that "Lord Goldenshield" and the High Priestess had both traveled to Almraiven two days previously, by means of the group's flying carpet. Cal asked about Lok, and the young cleric said that he believed the genasi to be helping with the construction of the Victory Bridge, in the southeastern part of the city.

As he made his way through the city streets, Cal smiled slightly at the reverence infused by the young man in Beorna's new title; the templar had resisted being granted this new authority and responsibility, but ultimately she deferred to her superiors and reluctantly accepted the role that she had been granted. Arun had told him that she'd already begun the process of nominating Jenya Urikas for sainthood, a considerable honor within the church of the Vigilant One, Cal knew. She would have no trouble gaining testimonials from the people of Cauldron, Cal thought.

As he made his way through the city Cal took in the faces of the people he passed, gauging their mood and commitment to their work. These people had suffered a lot, he knew, but from what he saw they were dedicated to restoring the city they called home, and with it their own damaged lives.

The wind shifted slightly, bringing a hint of moisture and another, familiar scent, to his nostrils.

"Hello, Mole," he said.

The air beside him shimmered, and Cal's niece materialized, to the surprise of a nearby vendor who nearly dropped a basket full of apples. "I would have had you, if not for the breeze changing," she said with a wide grin.

"How did you know I was in town?" Cal asked.

"Oh, I've got my little birds that tell me things, now and again."

Cal raised an eyebrow. "I suppose you've already got half the town under your... supervision."

Mole shrugged. "It's pretty chaotic. There's no thieves guild, not at the moment; there were a few Last Laugh remnants who tried to organize something but I persuaded them that the last thing Cauldron needed now was more of their hijinx."

"Persuaded?"

"Well, you know," Mole said, flashing a wide grin.

"I suspect I probably don't," Cal said, but he smiled as he said it.

"You just missed Arun and Beorna."

"I heard; I've just come from the Temple of Helm."

“Helm and Moradin, now. Beorna and Arun are going to reconsecrate it to both gods, once all the rebuilding is finished.”

“That’s not all that surprising, I suppose.”

“Want to join the pool? Me and some of the others have bets on when the two of them get married.”

“Dwarven culture is a bit different in such things. It may take years.”

“Words are good, but gold talks.”

Cal shook his head. “How are other matters?”

“Lok’s been helping a lot with the rebuilding, especially with the bridge project. Dannel’s left the city; he decided he needed to make a visit home. From what I could sense, the prospect raised some mixed feelings.”

“He’s been through a lot, lately.”

“What about Dana?”

“She’s gone to Sigil. We’re still looking for information... about Benzan.”

Mole nodded, her demeanor shifting to become more serious. “How long, do you think, until we head out again?”

“It’s tough to say, right now. There’s too many variables, too many things we don’t know.”

“Well, let me know when... hey, there’s Lok! Lok!”

The genasi was coming down Lava Avenue toward them, and when he saw them he immediately hastened his pace. He was clad in plain working garments rather than his heavy armor, but he carried his battleaxe at his side as though he thought he might have use for it. Behind him they could see the pilings of what would become the Victory Bridge, connecting the city across the new gorge. Work had progressed swiftly; in addition to Lok’s expertise with stonework Cal knew that magic had been used to expedite the construction.

“Looks like he’s got something on his mind,” Mole said, as the genasi approached.

“What is it, Lok?” Cal asked, as their friend reached them.

“I am glad you are here,” Lok said. “I just received a sending from Gaera. I need to return to the North, at once.”

Cal and Mole shared a look. Even before they heard the details, they had traveled and experienced enough to know the sound of Trouble when they heard it.

Chapter 464

"I'd forgotten how cold it gets here," Cal said, shivering as a frigid gust tore at his cloak, causing it to flutter out behind him.

"It is winter," Lok said simply, already walking across the barren field, snow crunching beneath his heavy boots.

Cal looked around as he followed the warrior. Mole was nowhere to be seen, but that was no surprise; she would be somewhere nearby. His gaze rose to the tower that was Lok's destination. Eyes watched from there, he knew; the dwarves of the North had learned vigilance, and had they been foes they already would have heavy crossbow bolts sticking from them, no doubt.

A lot had changed since their first visit to this rocky shelf, situated on the shoulder of the mountain that the dwarves knew as the Maker's Anvil. Only a few days' travel from the shield dwarf stronghold at Caer Dulthain, this was the site where Lok had been found by one of those surface warriors, nearly forty years ago, now. It had been a battlefield, then, strewn with the corpses of orcs and dwarves. Now it was an outpost that served a dual role. It warded the northern edge of the shield dwarves' land from the fierce orc and ogre tribes that dwelled beyond the Anvil. But it also served as a gateway between two very different worlds; the surface realm of the shield dwarves and the community of the urdunnir, far below them in the depths of the Underdark. On their first visit, they'd entered the Underdark via a deep shaft concealed within a narrow cleft in the mountain located here. Now, the tower here warded the shaft, which had been equipped with a winch assembly and a miner's cage to facilitate traffic between the two dwarven realms. It would have been easier to teleport directly into the tower, or better yet, into the urdunnir halls, but the former locale was warded against such magic, and the latter was inadvisable, as the strange energies of the Underdark interfered with the efficacy of teleportation and made magical means of transportation there very dangerous.

The heavy stone door, set deep into a lintel with murder holes all around, drew open as Lok approached it. Cal saw a cowed figure that he suspected was Gaera Silverheart, the priestess of Berronar Truesilver whom they had met on their first visit to this region, when they had come to free Caer Dulthain of the grasp of a powerful ghour demon. It was not a pleasant thought, for that encounter had marked the beginning of Delem's ordeal, and had catapulted them into a trial that would end in their first confrontation with the Demon Prince Graz'zt.

"Are you just going to stand there and freeze?" Mole's voice came from ahead.

Cal shook off his musings and followed his friends into the citadel. He felt like he was walking into a cave as the huge stone blocks of the entry surrounded him; the walls were easily eight feet thick, testimony to the permanence of dwarvish architecture. A shield dwarf in steel plate and with a huge brown beard stood watch at the interior of the door, a double-edged battleaxe ready against his shoulder. The interior of the tower appeared to be comprised of a single chamber almost twenty feet across. A balcony ringed the tower about fifteen feet up, where light filtered in through narrow slits that pierced the thick walls. Cal could see that the arrow slits were protected by iron shutters that could be used to seal them from within; from what he knew of the dwarves that practicality was rooted more in concerns of defense than from protection from the weather. Or at least the tower seemed as cold as it was outside; the break from the frigid wind offset by the cooling effect of the massive stone cylinder. There was a curving staircase that led up to the balcony and the higher levels of the tower, and another that descended to the entrance to the shaft leading to the urdunnir settlement far below.

“Welcome, archmage,” Gaera said with a nod of respect, drawing him into the conversation that the priestess had been having with Lok. Cal had not heard that initial exchange, consumed more in his own musings, but he quickly got the gist of the matter.

“What is the nature of the threat?” Lok asked.

“I am not entirely certain,” the priestess admitted. “The urdunnir elders became quite agitated about two days ago, culminating in their request that I contact you at once, earlier today. They say that a powerful urdun’a—a spirit of the world—has awakened and threatens the People.”

“A ‘spirit of the world’... what is that, some kind of elemental?” Mole asked.

“I do not know,” the priestess explained. “Berronar was unable to provide more clarity, and my own detection spells revealed nothing out of the ordinary. I asked them if they wanted me to ask Koruth to send warriors to help their defenses, but they only insisted on your presence. I got the impression that whatever it is that threatens, it’s not something that can be fought with axe and hammer.”

“Well, an axe they may have to settle for,” Lok said. “Come, let us go, then.” He started toward the downward stair, but hesitated, turning back to Cal.

“I am sorry, my friend, but you know my errand in Waterdeep demands that I return at once,” Cal said. “The Blackstaff’s schedule is such that I may not get another opportunity for several tendays.”

Lok nodded. “I understand. When the time comes for us to act, I will be at your call.”

“Don’t worry, Uncle Cal,” Mole said, materializing suddenly and causing Gaera to start slightly in surprise. “I’ll keep an eye on things here. With a Calloran on the job, there’s nothing to worry about.”

Lok and Cal shared a look. “Good luck,” the gnome said to his friend.

“And you.” Without further ceremony, the genasi turned and descended the staircase, his heavy boots scraping the stone, his armor and weapons clattering slightly against his body with each step. Gaera and Mole followed quickly behind.

Cal waited until they were gone, and then turned to depart. With a nod to the guard, he strode out into the snow. Even as the heavy portal closed behind him, he summoned his magic, and was gone.

Chapter 465

The story of the urdunnir upon—or more precisely, beneath—Faerûn was replete with tragedy. If anything, this made the tale of Udon Oryx more tragic, both for the potential of what might have been, and for the darkness that he brought upon his people.

The Thunder Blessing, the gift of Moradin, had been extended to all of the Soul Forger's children. It even reached the urdunnir in their homes far beneath the stones. One of the sets of twins born of the Blessing were two males named Udon and Urok. They were very different; Udon was strong and hale, while Urok, while slight of build, was possessed of agile limbs and a quick mind evident even in his earliest years. The bond between the two twins was uncanny, a trait shared by many of the matched pairs born of that generation of dwarves in the annum of Moradin's gift. Their parents observed that often one would sense what the other was feeling, even when the two children were not in the same room.

But life in the Underdark was as cold and unforgiving as the deep tunnels themselves. As the twins neared their fifth birthday, a pestilence swept through the urdunnir community, a wasting disease that stole vitality and sapped the very life from the bones. The disease resisted the calls of the urdunnir priests to the Keeper of Secrets. Most of the dwarves, with their adamant constitutions, overcame the sickness, but the weakest succumbed, with over a dozen claimed by the illness. One of those who fell was Urok. The child's parents were consumed with grief, and did not fully observe the change in their remaining son, Udon. But something subtle happened to the surviving child; it was as if the disease had claimed a part of him as well.

In a strange way, the disease helped prepare the urdunnir for what would come, for only three years later, the duergar penetrated the Shield Wall through dark treachery and foul arts, sundering the urdunnir community, slaying those who resisted, and enslaving the remainder. Among those killed were Udon's parents; his father at the Shield Wall, and his mother in a dark corridor, dragged away by sneering duergar warriors, never to return.

Many of the children of the urdunnir did not survive the dark raid or its aftermath. The duergar were interested in securing slaves for their dark project, designed to restore the fallen dragon-god Tiamat to life. Children were a burden, and only those that could be of use to the enslavers were kept alive. Udon survived into adulthood for two reasons. First, he was already stronger in his youth than many of his kin four or five years older. Secondly, he found that he could curry favor with their masters by informing upon his own people. Over the decades in captivity the dwarf did what he had to in order to survive. Several of his people died at the hand of duergar torturers due to the words he whispered to the overseers, but his heart was dead, and he embraced the darkness that had enfolded his people. He scorned the hope that some of his kin clung to as the years went on, and scoffed at promises of deliverance and of a messenger that the Keeper would send them, to shatter their chains and release them from their bondage.

Freedom was long in coming, and many of the urdunnir perished in those long years. But ultimately it was one of theirs who released them, an exile who returned with powerful allies and divine mandate to confront the duergar leaders and their malefic ally, the dragon-god. Lok led his people back to their abandoned community, and led them in rebuilding their homes and their lives.

While many of the urdunnir viewed the genasi as a hero, and to some almost a god himself, Lok's leadership was not hailed universally within the urdunnir community. Some resented Lok's efforts to build a bridge between the urdunnir and the shield dwarves who lived closer to the surface. Some of the younger urdunnir left their homeland to travel among the outsiders, sharing their talents and learning new skills. These sojourners returned with strange ideas and alien philosophies, and in some cases with words about different gods, challenging the monolithic dedication to the Keeper, Dumathoin, the god of the chosen people who had dwelled within his deep halls. The faith of many of the urdunnir had been weakened by their long ordeal, and many of those who could channel the Keeper's power had been slain by the duergar, who had not wanted clerics stirring up their captives against them.

Udon had long since left the faith of his people behind. As the years after the Return passed, the misguided urdunnir again found his place in seeking personal advantage at the expense of his peers. It was perhaps not surprising that he fell into the lure of a competing message, a new faith that had taken hold of a small but growing segment of his kin.

Six years after the Return, almost to the day that commemorated Lok's defeat of the duergar, Udon swore oaths to the cult of Abbathor in a secret chamber deep within the urdunnir settlement.

For a time the secret cult of greed flourished, hidden within the bowels of the urdunnir community, preying upon the deep dwarves and their surface kin, exploiting the cracks in the new arrangements to advance the personal ambitions of the evil group's followers. But greed often turns in upon itself, and in time the cult's activities became known to those in power. It was Lok himself whose axe sundered the mask of the cult leader (and the skull beneath), bringing low the corruption that had long festered within the dwarven community. Udon escaped and fled into exile, traveling deeper into the dark expanses of the Underdark.

The intervening decade passed swiftly. While Lok fought to rebuild the lives of his people, Udon drifted, his anger and desires for revenge and power driving him, giving him the edge that he needed to survive. He eventually ended up at the drow city of Asran Vok, where he served as a mercenary to one of the lesser Houses. As an un-caste alien warrior his life was of little value, but Udon had long practiced the art of staying alive, and he quickly gained what passed for influence in that place of malice and deception.

The story might have ended here, with the dwarf living out the rest of his years as a thrall to the dark elves. But his accomplishments and covert dealings led him to the service of a powerful drow wizard named Ebbar Thora. Thora might have been an archmage in the colleges of magic in Waterdeep or another of the great cities of the surface world, but in the drow city his status was defined more by his gender and his low caste—his House was not one of the greater—than by his considerable talent. This embittered him, and it allowed one such as Udon to get close enough to take advantage.

The wizard's most prized possession was a collection of ancient tablets that contained potent spells of elemental summoning. Most of the tablets contained magical writings of a clerical, not arcane, nature, and Thora had long been maneuvering to use the tablets to gain advantage with the priestesses of Lolth. The effort was probably doomed from the start, for the servants of the Spider Queen were not generally aligned to being manipulated by a male, no matter what magical tricks he knew. But in any case Thora's plans never came to fruition, for Udon, upon realizing the potential of the wizard's cache, had struck him down from behind and stolen the entire collection.

He had to flee the city for his life, of course, but he'd made preparations for that contingency as well. Nor was his flight random, for when he'd made his decision to steal the tablets, he'd also set upon a destination.

In his travels, Udon had learned a great deal. One bit of lore he'd stolen from its original owner was the secret of a great underground cavern, located several leagues from the drow city. From what he'd learned, the place was a nexus, a rare site where the elemental planes overlapped with the Prime. He made his way there, his urdunnir abilities allowing him to escape both the drow parties sent to hunt him down as well as the other predators of the Underdark. Finally, he reached his destination, the elemental nexus.

The dwarf felt a bit of humility as he entered the cavern; a feeling foreign to the selfish creature. He encountered several xorn, creatures drawn to the node, but was able to bluff his way past them into the inner reaches of the cavern. Here, the stone itself seemed to possess life, swelling and twisting as the very makeup of the place shifted before his eyes.

Udon did not dawdle long. Even his own nature, so at touch with the powers inherent in this place, would not preserve him long from the shifting tides of elemental energy at work in the nexus. Setting up wards to protect himself, he used the stolen tablets to work a calling of incredible potency, further amplified by the power present in the cavern.

The working of the spell took hours. Udon did not call a mere elemental, even one of the potent elder entities that could tear down castles and crush dozens of warriors beneath their massive fists. No, he called a being like himself; one of the sentient elemental lords, an organism seeped in malevolence and shadow. Its truename was unpronounceable by mortal tongues, but it could be called Terror, for that was what it brought with it into the Prime Material.

Udon was not intimidated by it; his spell of calling had bound it with invisible tendrils of compulsion; it could not harm him. It filled the cavern, an amorphous thing of stone that flowed like a frozen wave risen up from the ocean floor. Dark pools of utter black served it as eyes, and they shone with hatred as they focused upon the mortal dwarf.

Why have you called me to this ugly place, it said, its voice an echo in Udon's mind.

The dwarf smiled. Destruction, he thought.

He wasn't certain, but he thought he felt a tremor of pleasure pass through the entity. Yes, they understood each other... He gave his instructions, sensing the Terror's resentment grow at being shackled, but knowing it could not resist the impetus of the magic that bound him here. It would not remain long... but long enough, plenty, for the mission he gave it.

For destruction.

The end shall be done, the Terror said to him. Yours shall be the first.

Udon felt a cold sliver of fear. You are bound to my will! he shrieked in his mind. You cannot harm me!

The end shall be done, it repeated. The urdunnir spun as he sensed the truth in its words, in time to see four xorn rise up from the ground around him, surging at him with their claws outstretched.

Despite being caught off guard, he destroyed two of the elemental creatures before he fell, his lifeblood pouring from deep gashes torn in his flesh. The last thing he sensed was the Terror, looming over him, eager to devour what his failing body would issue.

And so it began.

Chapter 466

Mole wandered the halls of the urdunnir settlement. She was battling an enemy more treacherous than dragons or wizards or fiends... boredom. It had been at least two hours since she, Lok, and Gaera had come down from the tower above. The lift had been interesting, especially when she'd leaned out over the edge, looking down the shaft which vanished into darkness that sounded (from the echoes of the wind currents) like it continued for miles below. Lok had simply stood stoically in the middle of the lift, saying nothing for the entire descent, while Gaera had paid her little heed, her own worried features focused on the genasi.

She'd looked forward to the meeting with the urdunnir elders, but she'd been disappointed when Lok told her that she could not sit in on the council, which by custom was restricted only to the People. Gaera, as a fellow dwarf, and a recognized ally, got a pass, it seemed, but a gnome... a guest! at that, was not allowed...

Exploring the urdunnir settlement was interesting... for all of about ten minutes. The tunnels and chambers were all so uniform, and the people equally drab. Their main interest seemed to be work, and most of that involved painstaking shaping of metal or stone objects, at a pace that sometimes made it appear that the worker had fallen asleep. Or so it seemed to Mole, who might have been surprised at the way she appeared to the urdunnir, who saw her as a flighty spirit who danced through their midst and was gone in a flash, before her appearance could even fully register upon their senses. That was when they detected her at all; stealth had become such a habit to her that she blended with the shadows almost subconsciously, even when she wasn't using the power of her ring to become entirely invisible.

She finally found herself in a side tunnel that appeared to be unpopulated, at least until she emerged with surprising abruptness into a small square room much like all the other small square rooms she'd explored thus far. While the urdunnir work areas had been dimly lit by small stone disks that shed a pale gray light as faint as a candle's flame, this corridor had been unlit. The urdunnir, like all dwarves, possessed darkvision, and so Gaera had lent her a small candle that was enchanted with an everburning flame. Drawing out the taper from her pocket, she had pressed on down this side tunnel, wondering if the darkness hid anything interesting. With her excellent vision she needed no further illumination, but in that weak light she did not immediately realize that this room was occupied until she was almost in the middle of the place.

That figure was an elder urdunnir, ancient if the maze of canyons and ridges etched into his face was any reliable guide. His skin, beard, eyes and tunic were a uniform gray, causing him to blend into the surrounding stone, explaining her initial failure to detect him. In fact, at first she thought him to be a statue, until his eyes shifted ever so slightly, following her movements.

“Hey,” she said. “I thought all you elders were at the council meeting.”

The dwarf betrayed no reaction at first. She finally was wondering if he spoke Common, or if he was senile, when he rumbled, “I am not so old as all that, little daughter.”

It was an odd thing to say, but inwardly she shrugged; the urdunnir were a weird people with odd customs. “I’m a friend of Lok’s,” she said, moving around the perimeter of the room, looking for anything distinctive. The place seemed to be pretty much exactly what it appeared; a small dead-end chamber.

“You are like quicksilver,” the old dwarf said. “You travel the world, slipping through the cracks, undetectable, unstoppable.”

Mole grinned, taking the comment as praise. “Well, I am pretty fast,” she said, casually twisting with her next step into a cartwheel that brought her left foot around in a circle above her head and then back again to the ground without breaking pace.

“And yet, you often act without thought. Action follows stimulus; there is no consideration in between.”

Mole’s smile disappeared. Had she just been insulted? What did this old dwarf really know about her, anyway? They’d just met.

The dwarf slowly drew his hand out from his cloak, and opened his palm to reveal a small stone. “Take this from me, if you can.”

Ah. So the fogey wanted to play a game, eh?

“I don’t really think you want to...” she began, turning toward the wall, running her hand along the stone. In mid-sentence she twisted and kicked off, flying across the room like a bolt shot by a crossbow. The dwarf hadn’t moved; it was like taking candy from a...

There was a sudden twist, and she found herself lying on her back a few feet away. There was a vague pain, nothing too bad, but mostly surprise.

She snapped her body and sprang up to her feet. The dwarf was still sitting there, the stone unchanged in his palm. “What did you do?” she asked. “Are you a wizard?”

The dwarf laughed. “Come, try again, little daughter. And this time, think as you act.”

Time passed, and Mole found herself being repeatedly humiliated by the aged dwarf. Her cheeks burned and her backside was feeling particularly sore, but the dwarf did not seem to take pleasure at her misfortunes, instead urging her to react, directing her with subtle hints and clues. For all his aged appearance, he appeared able to move at the speed of light when he desired, changing position so quickly that she didn’t even see a blur in between. She quickly realized that she had no chance of outmaneuvering him; she had to outthink him, discern where he was going to be, figure out how her adversary thought and use that against him.

She was coming close, she thought, finally; something new was opening up to her from these impromptu lessons. But as she pulled herself up—no more hopping to her feet, not after the last few failures—the dwarf rose and came to her, placing the stone on the ground before her.

“Your friend comes for you; our time is at an end. I hope that you will take to heart what I have tried to show you.”

Mole nodded. “I will,” she said earnestly. The dwarf turned and walked past her out of the room, but she forestalled him. “Wait! I don’t even know your name. I’m M...” she hesitated. “I’m Clarese, Clarese Calloran.”

The dwarf nodded. “Some have called me Lord Liggett, in the past.”

What an odd name, Mole thought, but she only nodded, offering the dwarf a respectful bow.

“Take the stone,” he told her. “You may have need of it someday.”

She bent to recover the gift. The stone was little more than a pebble, oddly smooth, and it felt cool in her hand. When she turned back, the old dwarf was gone.

She took her candle, which she’d laid aside during the... training, I guess it was, she thought. She left the room and looked down the corridor, and wasn’t really surprised that there was no sign of the dwarf. It fit with his odd personality, and the strange skills he had possessed. But she could hear a familiar clank in the distance, and then her name being called.

“I’m coming, Lok!” she cried, running down the passage back to the main halls of the urdunnir citadel.

Chapter 467

A faint haze of dust hung in the air over the drow city of Asran Vok. Situated in a twisting cavern shaped roughly like a huge letter “S”, the city had been organized around a long avenue that ran roughly through the center of the place. The low valley in the center of the cavern was packed with fungi farms and ponds stocked regularly with fish, while the higher ridges that adjoined the cavern walls contained the fortified estates of the city's great Houses. The northern terminus of the cavern contained the precincts of the Temple of Lolth, while the southern end contained a trading bazaar, warehouses, and a barracks where fifty drow warriors donated from all of the city's Houses provided collective security for the trade center and monitoring of the primary access points where the city interfaced with the surrounding Underdark.

All of it, now, was in ruin.

The broad central avenue was a swath of destruction, littered with rubble that in some cases had been hurled from a hilltop estate torn from the sloping ridges and strewn across the valley floor, sometimes hundreds of feet distant. Drow bodies were littered here and then, interspersed liberally with the corpses of deep rothe, bugbear and orc slaves, duergar mercenaries, and other races that associated with the drow lords.

The gates of adamantine that had fronted the entry to the temple grounds where the Spider Queen's servants held sway had been twisted and torn free of their moorings. One bent segment of that barrier still held the impaled corpse of a priestess, her face frozen in a look of utter terror, her tentacle rod lying forgotten a few dozen yards away. The temple itself looked to have been almost split in two, like an overripe melon dropped onto the hard pavement. A sickly stench of rot rose from within, accompanied by the skittering of vermin who were already eagerly devouring the products of this gory conquest.

But one thing was missing from this scene of carnage. All of the bodies were of the victims, all of the destruction belonged to the drow and their minions. There were not tracks, no trace of the engine of this devastation. It might have been an earthquake, except for the thoroughness of the obliteration that had been wrought here. Asran Vok had simply ceased to be. Later, the few survivors that had fled the Terror would return, amazed at the complete end of everything that they had known.

* * * * *

Lok's expression was inscrutable as he entered the cavern. The place was dark and still, the faint sounds of water and wind reaching his ears, echoing softly to produce an impression of great solemnity and empty space. It was a cathedral, of sorts, like the tomb of a dead god.

The genasi shook himself of such dark thoughts. He hadn't slept much since his meeting with the urdunnir elders, troubled by what they'd told him, and troubled by the path his own dreams had taken.

He became aware of light and sound. Gaera and Mole, coming up behind him. It was comforting to have friends here; although he'd first tried to insist on coming here alone, to face whatever it was that was threatening his people, inwardly he was glad that the two women had refused to remain behind. The urdunnir warders had likewise been confused at his directions, at his statement that he would go out beyond the Shield Wall to face the threat alone, but the elders had only nodded, accepting his decision as an inevitability that was clearly evident.

If only it was so clear to him, Lok thought.

He'd dreamt of the Keeper, in that halfway-real place between wakefulness and sleep. Dumathoin had not spoken to him—not this time—but Lok had sensed that there was something there, that the dream-encounter was not just a product of his own imagination and memory. He had come far since that last encounter, since Dumathoin had spoken to him.

It is not yet time. You have accomplished much, but you are not ready...

Those words had come in the aftermath of their confrontation with the avatar of Tiamat, the dragon-god of Unther, brought back into the Prime by the plottings of the duergar and their deep-dragon ally. When he'd heard those words his physical body had been dead, lying empty on the cold stone in the duergar citadel. But Dumathoin had had other plans for him...

I send ye back into the world, my Lok, as a defender of the urdunnir and those others that need thy aid. I send you not as a missionary, for my star has already passed its zenith, and even now descends swiftly toward its nadir. But you, who have walked the many diverse pathways of the world, will not make the same mistakes that I made... That is my hope, my son.

Was now to be his time? the genasi thought, unlimbering his axe and laying it on the stone before him. The quiet cavern was a fitting place for the meeting, solemn, so far beneath the world in which he had lived his life.

"Mole, you should return to the settlement," he said. He didn't even try to convince Gaera; the woman had made her feelings on the issue quite clear earlier. The priestess did not agree with him coming here, but nor was she going to let him stand here alone. None of them understood what they faced here; Lok did not have any additional insight into that, but from what he'd learned from the elders, and from his own dreams, he knew that it was something ancient that had the power to strike down what he had accomplished with the urdunnir.

"In the words of another dwarf I once knew, go stuff yourself," Mole said with a grin. "Besides, I want to see what it is."

What is it? Lok thought. He stared into the darkness, but although his darkvision penetrated it, there was nothing there to be seen. The elders had spoken of a vibration in the stone, a tremor that spoke of a thing that was coming toward them, moving quickly and with purpose directly toward the heart of their community. Lok had not been able to feel it, but he knew his people well enough to sense the unease that suffused the inhabitants of the settlement. The urdunnir were a people in close harmony with the stone, and even when the warnings were subtle, they could sense wrongness, even when it could not be fully identified. The elders had been able to give him a direction and a time. The former intersected with this cavern, and the latter... well, the latter, Lok realized had just about run out.

He knelt, drawing off his gauntlet and pressing his fingertips against the cool stone of the floor.

"I don't feel anything," Mole said, imitating Lok's motion. She dropped to the ground and pressed her ear against the stone, trying to improve the efficacy of the detection stratagem.

"Quiet," Gaera said, her own voice a whisper. The priestess was clad in a breastplate of shining mithral, and with her heavy mace and shield, both of fine dwarf-forged steel, she looked more martial than she felt. She'd already laid several long-lasting wards upon them, including a potent invocation against evil that surrounded her, enveloping her two companions.

Lok did not respond to them; he focus was on the stone, and his senses. He had never possessed the urdunnir gifts that his mother and the other of his kin had as their birthright. But he was of the earth, and on some deeper level, he felt a bond with the stone, with places such as this...

Then he felt it. Alien, malevolent, surging through the crust of the world beneath them like a shark through the ocean.

And close. Very, very close.

Lok's eyes popped open. His hand tightened on his axe, and he pushed himself to his feet.

The only other warning the others had was when a massive tremor shook the cavern, a pulse like an explosion that threw them all roughly from their feet. The two dwarves fell hard, but Mole landed on the ball of one hand and popped back to her feet instantly, where she bounced lightly against the bucking stone.

Since she was standing she saw it first.

It was as if the stone floor of the cavern had become water, and a massive tsunami was forming in its surface. The wave filled the cavern, the floor and walls coming together into a surge that rose almost to the ceiling of the place, forty, fifty, maybe even sixty feet above them. It was... huge wasn't even close to enough to describe it. The time it took from when she saw it emerge from the rock to when it was looming above them could be measured in fractions of a single heartbeat. As it came, it became more distinct, with massive arms erupting from the wave, and black points of utter malevolence becoming visible in its top, its 'head', Mole supposed, although to give something like this humanlike traits seemed somehow wrong.

"We're in trouble," the part of her mind that could still think managed to say.

Then the wave broke over them.

Chapter 468

A massive arm at least six feet thick and thirty feet long detached from the amorphous mass of the Terror and descended toward the stunned adventurers. Gaera shrieked in fright, but Lok grabbed her and rolled, hurling the cleric free as he himself twisted out of the path of the huge hammer-shaped fist that smashed into the ground where they'd been lying. The impact shook the cavern, and both Lok and Gaera were knocked roughly back by the concussive force of the blow, shards of stone zinging off of their armor.

Mole, of course, was well away, darting back into a crevice in the wall about ten feet away, wondering just what in the heck she could do against such a... monstrosity.

Ignoring the smarting pains already starting in his limbs from being battered about, Lok pulled himself up and rushed at the Terror, uttering a deep-throated cry to meet the rumbling potency of the elemental monster. The genasi barely kept his feet as he rushed into the surging, uneven mass of stone around its lower body, but he came close enough to drive his axe into the broad expanse of the wave. The metal sang oddly as it clove the stone, and rather than shatter the liquid rock into fragments, as might be expected, the stone tore, opening bloodless gashes like meat carved by a butcher. But despite the strength and fury of the genasi's assault, the effects were like an assault upon a great ancient oak by a child wielding a kitchen knife. The Terror was just so huge that there seemed no way that Lok could do enough damage to hinder it.

Even so, Lok's attack seemed to have gotten its attention. Twin arms of rock descended upon Lok like battering rams, clearly meant to simply smash him to a pulp. The genasi glanced up and saw death coming, and shifted into a defensive position, his heavy shield coming up, his body tensing to withstand impacts that could have pierced a castle wall. There was a woman's cry, but whether it came from Gaera or Mole he could not tell; everything was the rumbling and then the pain that drove through even his nearly indestructible adamantine shell and the only slightly less hard flesh and muscle beneath.

No mere man could have survived those twin blows. And yet when the terrible fists, each almost twice the size of the warrior's entire body, drew back, Lok rose to his feet and charged again, that axe of his cleaving through the Terror once more, opening gashes several feet long, hewing at it with an almost fatalist fury. He's stood against an inexorable force and fought on, but it was obvious that even Lok could not take much more of the creature's might and live.

But the genasi did not stand alone, and his companions now came to his aid. An electrically-charged bolt shot up into the creature's "head", but Mole's shot merely vanished against its bulk, less significant even than a mosquito's annoying bite. Gaera came forward toward Lok, enveloped in a white glow of divine power. The Terror brought down a long arm that would have crushed her into gory ooze had it connected. The priestess cried out and threw herself desperately forward, even so taking a glancing hit across her back that knocked her sprawling. With Lok hewing at it with desperate ferocity the injured cleric drew herself up and staggered close enough to touch its "body," unleashing her dispel evil spell against it.

The spell was potent, and the Terror was certainly evil, but the entity's ancient malevolence was far greater than the priestess's magic. The surge of light vanished into the Terror's monstrous form, and Gaera drew only violence as a response as the body of the creature seemed to rear up before her, the cavern floor rising up like a rug that was lifted up and snapped to dislodge dust. The power of the surge sent both Gaera and Lok flying across the room toward the entry, as though the two armored dwarves were insignificant ants.

And then, as they reached the apogee of their arc and started to fall, the Terror slammed a fist down into Lok in mid-air, driving him down twenty feet into the ground with enough force to crack the stone.

Chapter 469

This is crazy, crazy, crazy! that little voice in Mole's head screamed. The voice usually only came out at times like this, when the sensible course was just too blatantly obvious to miss. Yet somehow, she always seemed to miss it, nevertheless...

When she'd seen the Terror strike down Lok, she'd just acted, letting her instincts hurl her into a desperate maneuver in just the way that the old urdunnir had critiqued. As the elemental monster drew back its arm, already shifting its other forward for another attack against Gaera, Mole was running up its length, following its curving course toward the Terror's shoulder and its upper body. She was still at a loss for how she was going to affect it; if Lok's strikes didn't do anything, then what could she hope to accomplish? But she knew as clearly as she knew her own name that it was going to kill Lok and Gaera, and while she might be able to avoid it, she could not return to Uncle Cal and tell him she'd stood by while his best friend was murdered by an animated mountain.

"Yaaaa!" she screamed, running across the creature's form, rapid-firing her crossbow into what she took to be its head, the lump across the cresting wave where a twisting spiral of utter blackness was focused. The shots did nothing, as far as she could tell; the thing did not appear to even acknowledge her. She heard a desperate cry from below; Gaera's voice, and sensed the creature shifting its weight, the big arm coming around to squash her, and Lok. If Lok wasn't already dead; could anyone have survived that slam?

In frustration she threw her crossbow at it, feeling incredibly useless. The weapon bounced off its head and vanished into the dark below, and she slipped, bouncing onto her chest in surprise, barely keeping from plummeting off of her perch to the ground far—very far!—below.

She felt a stabbing pain in her right breast. What now? she thought, pulling herself up quickly, shifting her motion to match the movement of the creature. Even in all the chaos and grief and fear of the moment, she was glad that no one had seen her almost fall like that.

She found the source of what had hurt her—the pebble that the old urdunnir had given her, dropped into her pocket.

It was at that moment that she finally came to the realization of what “Lord Liggett” had meant. Stunned, she almost fell—again!—but Gaera’s second scream shook her back to reality.

This time, she thought first, a crowded insane jumble of thoughts that raced through her mind in the course of a single heartbeat.

Then she acted.

The Terror’s movements had turned its “face”, if that’s what the black-spiral thingee was, away from her. So she sprang forward and leapt, twisting her body as she passed before it, snapping the stone square into the middle of the dark pattern. Then she was falling, and falling fast, and had to attend to not breaking her neck. She spread her limbs wide to slow her descent slightly, and then as she reached the ground she tucked into a roll, absorbing some of the force of her fall with her legs before tumbling forward. She detected a jutting, sharp-edged ledge that rose about a foot above the ground surface just before she would have slammed into it, and expended the last of her momentum in coming up into an easy somersault before landing on her feet.

She turned and looked up. She’d expected something at least moderately dramatic, maybe a smoking ruin where the Terror’s head had been.

But the elemental monstrosity was still intact. It just loomed there, quivering, an earthquake in place. Mole could see that gray cracks stretched out from where she’d hit it with the magic stone, but even as she stared it seemed as though the creature was recovering, the disruption or damage or whatever she’d done to it being absorbed, overcome.

“Damn, you could at least have given me a few more rocks,” she muttered under her breath. She turned and saw Gaera bent over Lok. The genasi was moving, now, although he was bent over on his knees and forearms. Mole frowned—she’d give Gaera plenty of time to heal the warrior, and in terms of distractions, she’d used up her best, and apparently only, gambit that was going to work.

“Gaera, look out!” Mole warned, as the Terror lurched forward once again, as if the priestess could not sense the massive form and the huge rumbling that accompanied the resumption of its assault.

The priestess turned from Lok, and rose. She called upon the power of her goddess, firing a lance of white-hot energy into its damaged face. But like her earlier dispel evil, the beam of searing light was merely absorbed by the creature, with little apparent harm done to it.

Gaera looked determined, resigned, as she lifted her mace, standing in defiance of the Terror. But rather than attack, the black spiral twisted, and a gray beam exploded from it, sweeping over the woman, surrounding her with a soft aura that faded within just a few seconds. And when it had disappeared, it left her changed.

Turned to stone.

Chapter 470

Lok hovered in the gray border between consciousness and the dark void that threatened to simply absorb him. His body felt like a burden dragging him down, and his breath rattled in his chest as his crushed lungs struggled to draw in life-preserving air. The part of him that struggled against the inevitable urged him to keep fighting, for if he faltered now, then it meant death for him, his friends, and ultimately, his people.

But that narrow wedge of the cavern visible through his helmet visor blurred and faded, and Lok knew that he had lost this fight.

He did not hear Gaera cry out to him, or feel the surge of healing energy that tore into him. The heal spell from the priestess restored his broken body, but it did not penetrate the gray veil that had surrounded him, nor did her desperate cries reach him as the Horror loomed over them to put an end to the hopes of the urdunnir.

In that moment, as events passed quickly on the Prime Material, Lok found himself lying on a bare stone floor in a familiar stone room. The place was warm, and cozy, and safe. The genasi could do no more than raise his head, which alone took an insurmountable effort, enough to see the figure seated in the ancient stone chair, regarding him with a sad look on his face. The dwarf seemed as old as the world, his face lined with troubles.

“Father,” he managed, his voice rasping.

“It is time, my son,” the elder dwarf said.

“Father,” he repeated, unable to say more. He tried to shake his head, but only managed a shivering quake.

“I name you my Chosen,” the dwarf said, and with that word he seemed to... diminish. The last thing that Lok saw was his eyes, points of light in the darkness as everything else went gray around him once more.

Reality returned, and with it action. The sound of battle and the incessant rumbling of the Terror was everywhere around him, in him, as he tore free from the last lingering threads of unreality that had held him. He drew himself up, his wounds mostly memories. He saw Gaera, froze into stone, but turned the rage at that sight against his enemy. The Terror had been hurt by his friends, he could immediately see, but it was still coming, still a deadly force.

His axe was gone, knocked away when he had been sent flying by the monster. There was no time to search for it now; he instead hurled aside his shield and drew out Coldburn, rushing past Gaera to meet the Terror. He saw the inevitable strike coming and hurled himself aside, his boots skidding on the uneven surface of the ground complicated by the still-roiling effects of the elemental entity's presence upon the surrounding stone. He felt something hard carom off his armored torso from the side, but his attention was focused wholly forward. He rushed up a slope of rippling stone that trembled beneath his hard boots until he could unleash his assault upon the body of the Terror. The wounds he had opened before with his axe had vanished into its body, enveloped by its shifting mass, leaving no indication of whether they still hindered it, or had been simply repaired. But the massive two-handed sword opened a fresh gap four feet long lined with blackened char on one side, and crystals of ice on the other, as the odd magical effects of the sword inflicted their damage upon the entity.

Lok expected a counterattack, and it came swiftly, powerful blows that rained upon him from the Terror's massive fists. Healed by Gaera, infused with the power that had been imparted into him by Dumathoin, he nevertheless felt the hits shake his body; for all of what he was, he was still mortal, and this foe seemed to be beyond the power of mere weapons to defeat.

He felt a momentary calm settle over him, as the huge stone fists lifted up to continue battering him down. He felt... different, and part of that was a new perception, something inexplicable that he felt through the body of the monstrosity that confronted him. He could sense its link to the surrounding stone, the creature both of and against the fabric of this world that was not its own, and he could feel the tendrils of energy that infused it, leeching strength from without to restore itself from the damage being inflicted upon it.

Releasing one hand from the grip of his sword, he reached out and plunged it into the body of the Terror. The stony surface gave way at his touch, rippling out like a pool of water around the point where the limb vanished into the depths. Lok leaned forward, until the entity had absorbed his arm up to the elbow. Through that connection, he felt an odd synergism with the elemental, and a rage that made him shake with the overwhelming strength of the emotion.

The Terror was shaking too, now, clearly not happy with what was being done to it. Its upper body was looming over Lok, now, and its fists came together from the sides to crush the warrior between them. But an instant before the impact, Lok plunged forward, his body sinking into the elemental's form entirely. The stone fists smashed together with incredible force, but when they drew back there was nothing there to be seen.

But whatever Lok was doing, it was obviously having an effect. The creature drew back, receding away from the spot where it had engaged Gaera and Lok. But as it fell back, its body began to split apart, like a cloth being torn from its base upward. In that opening, Lok became visible, still holding Coldburn, dropping away from the grasp of the creature as its substance retreated from him. Looking up, he saw that the stone of the Terror's body had crumbled away enough to reveal a great black lump, right where the heart would have been had the elemental been a living, mortal creature.

Above that, the black spiral, now twisting in agitation, of the monster's "face" had focused upon him. It unleashed another pulse of energy at its tormenter, enveloping him in gray light that threatened to swallow up the genasi. Lok struggled within that enveloping glow, his movements slowed as though he'd been dropped into a vat of molasses.

And then Mole shot into view. She'd recovered her crossbow, and fired a tiny bolt into the thick of that black mass, the monster's "heart".

The Terror shuddered, and the gray beam faltered—only slightly, and only for a span of time measured in fractions of a second. But in that instant Lok surged forward, thrusting through the enveloping field of energy, and he drove Coldburn upward, through the black heart, the flames and frost engulfing the corrupted knob as the steel slid deeper into its substance.

The gray beam of energy vanished, and with a roar Lok twisted his body, tearing his weapon and half of the matter of the black orb free.

The cavern was filled with another violent tremor, but this time the pulse was the death-throes of the intruder, as the substance of the Terror began to dissolve. Great chunks of it broke free and crashed to the ground, and finally the hulking mass of its body collapsed backward, filling the cavern with a surge of pulverized stone and shards of debris that gradually settled to the ground. Lok and Mole staggered free of the radius of destruction, the gnome coughing for breath, until they stood at the point where Gaera's petrified form stood, her mace still lifted in bold defiance.

"Well, that was something," Mole said, looking back at the ruins, clapping her hands to clear them of dust.

"We must take Gaera back... the elders should be able to restore her," Lok was saying, but he stopped as Mole turned toward him and her jaw dropped in surprise. "What is the matter?"

"You look... different." And indeed, the genasi's appearance had changed. The stone-like coloration and texture of his flesh was as before, although now it was smudged with dust and dirt. But where his dark eyes had been, now twin sparkles of pale white light shone, like lonely stars witnessed through the haze of clouds on the deepest of nights in the world above.

Chapter 471

INTERLUDE

Athux stepped through the wide stone arch into the hall, patently ignoring the two towering glabrezus who flanked the entry, peering down at him with their eager red eyes. He likewise took no notice of the succubi who cooed at him as he walked though the foyer and into the hall proper. The demonesses hissed in frustration but did not follow him; only a fool would have missed the prominent shift in the air, the tangible aura that reflected the mood of the large chamber's most prominent occupant.

Athux's perfect features did not betray any concern, although he was more sensitive to such things than most of his fiendish kin. Of course, it did not take much knowledge of the Prince to know that his mood of late had been foul, not with all that had happened.

Just over fifty hours of subjective time had passed since the yugoloth assault upon the citadel, and despite the thorough cleaning Athux could still sense the stink of death and corruption in the hall. As his peripheral vision slid over the weathered gray stone and the stark, angular lines of the buttressed ceiling fifty feet above, the contrast with the glories of the Argent Palace could not simply be ignored. Such stray thoughts were dangerous, and distracting, and he quickly schooled his mind to smooth, unrevealing stillness. It was among the first skills he'd mastered, given his upbringing; demons who revealed too much quickly found themselves exploited by their ruthless kin, no matter whose line they rose from.

The sound of the cambion's tread filled the hall as he walked across the barren stone floor. This was despite his agile stride and soft-soled boots; a trick of the acoustics of the place.

"Son," Graz'zt said, from the shadows of his throne.

Athux came to a stop in the center of the floor. His sire filled the simple but considerable chair of stone and iron, his upper body wreathed in darkness in the depths of the far alcove opposite the foyer through which Athux had entered. That was artificial; there was no "sun" in this place to cast shadows, and the magical illumination shed by steady ochre globes in the four corners of the ceiling above were well able to brighten every corner of the chamber. But the light did not reach to Graz'zt; it just died as it entered the alcove, simpering into a murky death that absorbed the tenuous rays.

"Father," Athux said, his voice utterly neutral, compliant. These days it was impossible to predict what would provoke the Prince, but Athux, at least, was fully cognizant of his own importance in the schemes of his sire to cling to the last lingering vestiges of his power.

"You have learned nothing new?" Graz'zt asked.

Athux squelched the urge to raise an eyebrow. Graz'zt knew that he had not left the citadel since the attack. Was the Prince acknowledging his knowledge of his son's outside sources of information? Or was there some other game at work here? Before the pause could become awkward, the cambion's intricate mind had already worked through a dozen permutations, and ultimately settled upon a simple approach.

"No, father," he replied, his manner utterly open.

Graz'zt seemed to sink into himself, and a long silence filled the chamber. Athux finally allowed himself to ask the question that had been on his mind.

"Do we not risk much in remaining here?"

The Prince's hands tightened on the stone rests of the throne, where deep impressions had already been pressed into the gray surface to match those twelve long fingers. It was just one of the ways that this place had already begun to shape itself to the whims of its master, but to Athux's eyes those changes only highlighted how far they had fallen.

Finally, Graz'zt regained control, and relaxed. "The attack was merely a random raid," he said. "If my enemies truly knew I was here, they would not have bothered with such a pathetic assault."

Athux did not respond, but Graz'zt must have sensed his doubt, for he added, "You can ease your fear. My power, and the potency of the Heart, conceals me from those who would take advantage. And servitors can be replaced. There are always more demons, always more of the weak to serve the strong.” The last words were thick with scorn, but Athux knew they were not truly directed at him—although the subtle message underlying them, of course, was a warning.

Athux bowed deeply.

“You waste your thoughts in nostalgia for what was,” Graz’zt went on. “We must focus on what is, and what will be.”

Athux shook himself inwardly, silently berating himself for allowing his focus to waver even the slightest bit. “I am at your command, father.”

But Graz’zt merely leaned back in his seat, more of him sinking into shadow until only his long legs and his hands upon the stone rests were clearly visible. A rough shape that Athux knew to be his father’s great curved sword was visible in profile against the side of the throne; he hadn’t noticed it there before.

Belatedly Athux became aware of another presence in the room. Turning, he regarded the new arrival.

Like the cambion, his appearance was youthful, his features attractive. But the newcomer was fair in coloration, with a shock of hair the color of fire gathered into a braid that descended into the gap between his shoulders. He was muscular, clad only in a rippling skirt of silver scales that covered him from his waist to just above his ankles. Faint scars covered his torso, but they merely accentuated the smooth proportions of his frame, drawing the eye to the perfect lines of flesh and muscle over laid over bone. He bore no weapons, but there was something in his eyes that gave one pause. Those who had seen such before might have recognized the iron determination of the fiercely committed... or the fanatic.

He strode across the chamber, paying no heed to Athux until he stood adjacent to him, facing the alcove and its occupant. He then fell to his knees, his fist slamming into his chest with a smack that had to have inflicted pain. “I serve.”

“Rise, Malad,” Graz’zt said.

The youth stood, and only then acknowledged the cambion standing beside him with a faint tilt of his head. “Brother,” he said.

“We have a new guest you might be interested in, Malad,” Athux said smoothly. “A friend of your father’s, I believe he was.”

Something flashed in the youth’s eyes, but he did not reply. His armor shifted slightly around his hips, at first appearing to be a simple response to a subtle adjustment in his stance. But that impression was belied a moment later as the silvery scale skirt rippled and flowed up his body, twisting around his torso and muscular chest until it covered his entire body from his neck to his knees. Athux betrayed no reaction at this amazing development, but inwardly he chuckled slightly.

Well, Synesyx is not happy to see me, he thought.

But the subtle exchange between the two men was cut short as Graz'zt emerged from his alcove. Both lowered their eyes, but the Demon Prince barked something, a syllable infused with command, and their entire attention was drawn back to him, a compulsion raw and powerful. At the same order, the demons still attending in the back part of the room retreated hastily, drawing the huge doors of the foyer shut behind them. As he came forward the black haze that had obscured him faded away, revealing the Lord of Shadows in all of his glory.

Graz'zt reputation was of a sensualist, a creature of debauched interests and utter depravity. His charisma, and the alien beauty of his features were renown, and sages in a hundred worlds and realities noted the legendary seductions that he'd completed, and the extreme nature of the rites practiced at his temples across the multiverse. He had been ranked among the six most powerful of the lords of demonkind, with connections and tendrils in extreme locales far removed from his lair, the three layers of the Abyss known collectively as Azzagrat.

But this plain citadel was not the Argent Palace, and the light that filtered from the slits high in the walls was not of the Abyss.

And the Graz'zt that appeared to his two most favored underlings was much removed from the being noted in the accounts.

He wore a half-robe of black cloth with the texture of silk and the sheen of metal, draped loosely over a body that was flawless in proportion and form. One hand was hidden beneath the fabric of one sleeve, while the other was twined into the straps of an intricate belt of gray strands, those threads slipping in and about his six long fingers as though alive. He wore a necklace of golden links, which supported six black gemstones in a weave of adamant that bespoke the potency of the enchantments upon them.

But above that, wreckage.

The Demon Prince's face was a ruin, a foul landscape of sickening, pocked flesh, wasted and dead. One eye socket was a ruin, the surrounding flesh burned away, leaving only a gaping hole in which a sightless gray orb was fixed. But on closer examination that "eye" was revealed to be something else, as there was a faint gray glow from within.

That was the artifact, the Heart of Axion. While it did not grant Graz'zt sight to replace the eye he had lost, it was possessed of far greater powers, drawn from the trapped soul of a demigod who had fallen millennia before the first human beings had walked upon the surface of Faerûn.

Continuing across the Prince's twisted visage, at several places hints of white showed were enough of the covering skin had been violated to reveal the ivory skull beneath. A faint smell of rot hung about the Prince, and Athux had to fight the urge to gag, for all that he was familiar—intimately familiar—with the true face of his father.

The cambion managed a covert glance aside at his companion. Malad had not flinched at the revelation of Graz'zt form; if anything, the fanatical devotion in his expression had deepened. Athux could not read his fellow cambion well enough to know if that dedication was real, feigned, or simply the product of the still-considerable aura that Graz'zt projected. Even defaced by wounds that could not be healed, Graz'zt was still what he was, and his lure could not be fully diminished. In some ways, it had been enhanced, for Athux knew that horror could be as powerful an attractor as beauty.

Malad did not react as Graz'zt came before him, overwhelming him with that horror, fixing him with his remaining eye, the one that still perceived things in the mortal realm.

"You have grown in power," he said, finally. "You approach transcendence, so quickly." There was the slightest gesture, a flicker of movement that Athux did not miss, and which caused him to seethe inside. Malad had come up fast, very fast, and was now quite near the level of power of Athux himself. The demon lord's son had been on the cusp of the transition to truly epic status that Graz'zt had referenced for some time. It was no light matter to take that final step, and Athux wondered at how this news boded for the complex relationship between the Prince and his underlings. Demons were very zealous of their power, after all, and too much in one under them was always considered in the context of how much of a threat even the most apparently loyal could provide.

Graz'zt finally released Malad from the power of his attention, and stepped back. "Share your news, my powerful young thrall."

Malad bowed. "The Blood Legion has experienced schism, as you expected, Great Lord," he said. "Two companies of vrock and a host of flying hordelings attempted to defect, but their treachery was detected in time, and your loyal forces tore the would-be-deserters to pieces. We also came under surprise attack from allied forces commanded by... several of your prominent rivals, Great Lord."

Athux could feel the rage radiating from Graz'zt like a tangible wave, but he controlled it. The devils had to be having a grand celebration right now, Athux thought.

"Continue," Graz'zt said.

"I commanded a withdrawal, sacrificing a unit of hezrous whose loyalty I had reason to question," Malad went on. "Once I had secured our position I consolidated the remaining forces, weeding out a few more units of doubtful reliability. I can report that you have nine companies under your banner, at your call, ready to kill or die at your command."

Athux tried to weigh Graz'zt response to the news. Nine companies, assuming Malad's reorganization had not inflated or deflated the total number of forces, meant that about two-thirds of Graz'zt's armies had been destroyed. That did not include the demons and allied troops that the Prince could call upon from his other outposts and holdings across the planes, but Athux knew all too well that they as well had suffered greatly in the purges, struggles for power, and opportunistic attacks that had followed the Disaster.

Malad simply waited, while Graz'zt regarded him with an unreadable visage. Long minutes passed, but none of those present in the room relaxed in the slightest.

Finally, Graz'zt spoke. "You have done well, Malad. You have preserved what could be kept in the face of catastrophe, and increased your personal prowess in the bargain. It is time for you to complete a final test, one that will install you to the maximum secrets of thralldom, and join your brother on the threshold of transcendence."

Malad bowed. Graz'zt turned away from them, but did not yet walk back to his throne and the shroud of darkness that would again conceal him.

"And then, then I shall have a final assignment for you, and for the Blood Legion," he continued.

Athux waited for more, but Graz'zt was still keeping his plans, whatever they were, close. The Prince made a subtle gesture that was a dismissal, and the two cambions, rivals and masters of great power in their own right, bowed and departed the room, leaving their master to his private thoughts.

Chapter 472

The air was thick, musty, alive with the odors of life and growing things as Dannel Ardan made his way swiftly on foot deeper into the Wealdath Forest in northwestern Tethyr. It had rained recently, and the thick blanket of leaves were still slick with damp, but the sure-footed elf had no difficulty making his way. There were no tracks or trails in this part of the wood, nothing but an endless expanse of thick wooden shafts that seemed to go on forever as far as one could sense in every direction.

It had been six decades since Dannel had last set foot amidst those ancient giants, but the smells and sounds of the wood had catapulted him back. It was a part of him, he realized, and no matter how long he had spent living in the world outside, working for the causes advanced by the Harpers, he had never really left it behind.

The only detractor from his experience was that someone was following him.

He hadn't been sure at first, his woodlore a bit rusty despite the two days he'd spent traveling through the woods since his arrival by means of the portal that had transported him hundreds of miles across Faerûn from the Forest of Miir. The druids tending the fey crossroads warding the portal had been welcoming, recognizing something even he hadn't seen in himself, a sense of belonging to this place.

The forest was not without dangers, but Dannel had advanced in skill and power to the point where he had little to fear from common predators. At one point he'd had to use an alter self spell to grow wings and fly high above a small pack of displacer beasts that had been more than casually interested in his scent. The monsters had followed him for a time, but a few expertly-aimed shafts from his bow had persuaded them toward the task of choosing a new alpha to replace the one that had gone down with an arrow stuck in its brain.

The elf came to a clearing, perhaps twenty paces across, with a cluster of boulders covered in moss gathered at the far end, shaped roughly like a giant who had sat down to rest and then gradually solidified into this permanent formation.

Here's as good a place as any, he thought, drawing his bow out of his magical quiver and stringing it in a single smooth motion.

He did not have to wait long. There was no sound, no odor to betray the pursuer, but he knew that something was there. Moving slowly, he drew out a long arrow and fitted it to his string.

"You never paid heed to the lessons of woodcraft," came a voice from the trees.

Dannel lowered his bow, but kept one hand around the arrow, holding it in place against the string. "I remember much," he said, loud enough to carry to the still-invisible speaker.

An elf appeared and stepped into the clearing. Like many of their kind, his age was indeterminate, but he had a hard look to him, and he wore dark garments of green and brown in a pattern that tended to blend with the surrounding forest. His tunic was bulky enough to suggest at least a chain shirt underneath, and he carried both a sizeable longbow across his back, and a slender longsword that he carried drawn at his side as he faced Dannel.

"A child could have tracked you," he said.

"It is good to see you, too, Eldren," Dannel replied, deliberately putting his arrow back into the spare quiver at his hip. The other elf did not reciprocate the gesture. "I appreciate the escort, but I think I can still find my way to Aldair Kelalei without your assistance."

The other elf frowned. "You do not sense it, do you? Truly you have lost much since you left, cousin."

"What do you mean?"

"Darkness stirs in the Wealdath. I suppose you would have found out soon enough, but there is still enough loyalty in the Ardan family to not let one of its own stagger blindly into it. Come with me—I am going to Korul Ulgor, and you'd be well advised to follow."

He strode across the clearing and vanished back into the wood, not waiting to see if Dannel would follow. The arcane archer did, after a moment, and he had to hurry to maintain the pace set by the other elf. Eldren did not seem amenable to conversation, and so the two moved swiftly through the woods for a good number of minutes before Dannel got exasperated and asked the obvious question.

"What is the nature of the darkness you spoke of?"

The elf shot him a look. "I would have guessed that the first question would have been about our family."

"I know that Alindre has taken service at the elven court in Evereska, and that Olondril has... has passed Beyond," Dannel said. Letting more bitterness into his voice than he'd intended, he added, "I have not been so casual about keeping in touch with the doings of the Ardans."

"Grandmother might disagree," Eldren said, but he did not offer further argument.

"And my question?" Dannel asked, impatient.

Eldren darted under a fallen log that offered only about three feet of clearance, leaving Dannel to fall behind as he negotiated the obstacle with more difficulty. When he'd caught up, Eldren said, "Odd creatures have been spotted in the woods, seemingly part undead, part animated plant material. They are very resistant to attack and difficult to destroy, but fortunately there have not been any apparent pattern or consistency to the encounters."

"Where do these things originate from?"

"The arcanists and clerics are not certain, but some have suggested that they originate in Bryth'an Torgul."

"The ruins?"

"You remember. Good."

"I suppose a scouting party has been sent."

"A pity we did not have your incisive strategic acumen here before. Yes, of course. They have not returned, and attempts to scry the area from afar fail, of course, because of the mythal."

"Isn't there supposed to be a guardian there?"

"Have you spent so much time among the humans that you remember nothing of the history of your own people? Yes, there was a guardian—a baelnorn of ancient power from a noble family of the Second Age. No elf living today has communicated with him, however, so we do not know what role, if any, he may have in broader events."

Dannel digested that, and they pressed on in silence for some time further. When it was broken again, it was Eldren who spoke.

"Why did you decide to come back, Dannel?"

"This is still my home," the arcane archer said quietly, almost to himself. But Eldren heard what he said, of course.

Even running through the woods, there was a certain stillness around them, so Dannel was able to make out the faint telltales that indicated someone drawing near, from up ahead and slightly to the right of their current course. Eldren had indicated no reaction, so he hissed out a warning, and again drew up his bow, slipping an arrow once more to the string.

Eldren looked at Dannel's sudden alarm and sneered. "Calm yourself, cousin. It is no enemy that approaches." But Dannel noticed that as the other elf turned away, a brief flash of concern crept into his features.

The newcomer drew swiftly nearer, speed clearly overruling stealth in the manner of her approach. But even so, by the time the stranger was close enough to clearly discern, she was nearly on top of them, her face slightly flushed with the exertion of hard running. She was an elven woman, clad and equipped much like Eldren, although she wore strands of vegetation woven into her auburn hair, and carried a slender rapier at her hip in lieu of a heavier blade, like the ranger. She was attractive, Dannel thought, and although her elven cloak obscured the sigil on the oak medallion she wore at her throat, he thought that she had the air of a priestess of the Seldarine, the pantheon of elven gods of Faerûn.

"Jannae, this is my cousin, Dannel Arden," Eldren said. But the priestess barely spared a nod for the archer, worry obvious on her face as she focused upon Eldren.

"The outpost at Korul Ulgor is under heavy attack," she said. "You are needed, at once!"

Chapter 473

Dannel felt a bit lightheaded as the trio of elves continued their mad dash through the forest, their soft boots barely touching the dense carpet of fallen leaves as they darted between the maze of thick trunks. At one point they ran through a small clearing where a massive bear was drinking from a small pool; Dannel barely had time to meet the surprised bear's eyes before they were past, continuing their sprint. He was bringing up the rear, with Eldren at the front and Jannae only a few paces distant, and only by digging deep into reserves of strength he didn't know he had he'd been able to keep up with them at all. He doubted that they would stop for him, if he did not keep pace; the look on his cousin's face at Jannae's news had told him that much.

At the start of the sprint he'd called upon magic to enhance his speed, but clearly the other elves had similar abilities, for even with the longstrider spell in place, he could only just keep up. But the anticipation of battle gave him enough of an edge to dig deeper, to press on. His bow was strung and an arrow fitted to the string at his side, his fist locked around the shaft to keep it in place. He only hoped that when they reached their destination that he still had enough breath left in him to use the weapon effectively.

As if summoned by that thought, he heard sounds from up ahead; all-too-familiar cries of battle, the noises of conflict muted somewhat by the blanket of surrounding vegetation. His cousin and his companion rushed ahead, reenergized by the proximity to their destination, but now finally Dannel put on a burst of speed of his own, energizing himself through the song of power that exploded through his limbs with the power of an expeditious retreat spell. But in this case his objective was attack, and the other elves regarded him with surprise as he shot between them, weaving between the low-hanging branches, clinging to bushes, and fallen limbs that posed constant obstacles in the forest undergrowth.

“Dannel!” Eldren’s cry came after him, but whether the call was a warning or a request, the arcane archer never knew. For in the next moment he caught sight of the outpost, and his attention was drawn entirely to the scene of carnage developing before him.

He had never been to Korul Ulgor prior to his departure from the Wealdath so many years ago, but the outpost matched the familiar pattern of other similar bases he’d remembered. The main focus was three platforms perched in sprawling treetops spaced approximately sixty to eighty feet apart, ranging from as low as fifty feet off the ground to just over a hundred. The platforms were normally connected by rope walkways, but those had all been cut now, and Dannel could see that the lowest of the platforms had already been overrun, horrible figures crawling over the wreckage of the defenders, who had been hurled to the forest floor below or torn to pieces where they stood.

The invaders were fearsome undead, skeletal humanoids, perhaps once elves themselves. But unlike the mindless lesser creations that adventurers of all stripes had been destroying for century upon century, these monstrosities were clearly faster, stronger, and possessed of an animating cunning that guided their actions. Plant matter clung to their bones, sinuous vines woven through their skeletal forms, and a packed mass of loam that seemed to pulse with life jammed into the empty hollow of their ribs. They clung like ants to the thick trunks of the two trees that supported the two remaining outposts, and some had already reached the lowest of the struts that formed the foundation of the lower of the two, eighty feet above the forest floor. Dannel could see elves atop both platforms, not more than a dozen in all, fighting desperately to repel the attackers with bows and long spears. Neither, of course, was ideal for combating skeletal undead, he knew, and some had reversed their spears, using the ends as staves to try and dislodge their foes from their ascent.

Even as his mind took in it all he was drawing and firing. His first arrow, a white-fletched holy missile, slammed into the skull of a skeleton as it fought its way onto the lip of the lower platform from below. The impact dislodged it from its precarious hold and it fell, tumbling in midair before impacting hard on a cleared stretch of packed earth. Dannel had already fired two more arrows and scored two more hits by the time that the creation landed, and to his concern he saw that it had not been destroyed by his missile or the long fall, the vegetation clinging to it cushioning the impact and holding it together as it slowly clattered to its feet.

And he also saw that he was not alone. Several of the skeletons were still on the ground, a few also having survived being knocked to ground by the defending elves, and they quickly caught sight of him, heading in his direction.

As worrying as that was, it was nothing compared to the loud crash that drew him around, in time to see a massive, lumbering hill of earth and rotting flesh in the rough shape of a giant crash through the bushes and come surging toward him.

Chapter 474

The zombie-giant-earth thing was obviously powerful from the way it uprooted bushes as tall as Dannel in its rush, and each massive step forward caused the ground to shake noticeably. But it was slow, and that allowed Dannel just enough time to dodge back as it unleashed a two-handed overhead strike that slammed into the earth where he'd been standing a moment before. He gave ground, the creature lumbering behind.

The skeletons were much faster, and three of them moved to intercept them. As they came lengths of what looked like green vine twisted from their open jaws, and as Dannel recognized them he felt a cold fear grip him in the gut.

Mohrgs! he thought, knowing that if one of those barbed tentacles touched him, he might be in trouble.

"Wealdathanthala!" came a loud cry, announcing the arrival of his two companions to the fray. Eldren appeared and leapt at the giant zombie's flank, his enchanted sword cleaving deep into the substance of it, sending clods of earth flying from its side. But the unholy force animating the creature was potent, and it quickly turned to face him, sweeping out its massive arms in a powerful but inaccurate attempt to crush him. The ranger dodged to the side, but a jagged length of branch jutting from the limb caught him in the shoulder, tearing his cloak and knocking him off-balance.

Jannae had initially helped Dannel, by firing a blast of searing light into one of the mohrgs threatening him. But seeing Eldren in trouble, she quickly moved to his aid, shifting into position to flank the giant zombie and distract it from the injured ranger. It was an effective tactic against most foes, but the zombie had few weaknesses that could be exploited through tactical advantage.

Dannel, giving ground, still augmented by his earlier spell, was easily able to outdistance the mohrgs while continuing to snap off the occasional shot from his bow. But as Jannae blasted the one with her divine spell it and another broke off and rushed at her, while the last continued to press him, its spiked tendrils proving the air ahead of it, eager for the elf's flesh.

"Damn," Dannel said, immediately stopping and planting his feet as he spun around. The mohrg, seeing its prey turn to face it, eagerly rushed forward. It was only about fifteen feet away from the elf at that point, but with each step it took forward another white-fletched arrow slammed into it, unleashing a combined blast of divine and electrical energy into the undead abomination. One skeletal arm went flying, sundered by a precise hit, followed by an explosion of shards as half of its skull was shattered by a second. With its next step a rib was destroyed, causing half of the mass trapped inside its chest to crumble into dust, evaporated by the holy power of the missile. And finally, even as it lifted its remaining arm to strike, closing the last gap separating them, the elf drove a final arrow into its torso with enough power to penetrate the foul muck clinging to its ribs and slam into its spine with enough force to shatter the vertebrae. The mohrg expired with a soft sigh, collapsing onto the loam.

The screams of the elves above told him that the second platform was falling, but Dannel could spare them no attention; his two companions were in dire straits. Eldren had unleashed a series of precise but largely ineffective attacks against the zombie. In exchange he'd lingered an instant too long in the same place, and suffered a glancing blow to the head that almost took him to the ground, staggering him for a moment. Jannae, quickly realizing that her sneak attacks were of little effect against the huge undead creature, reached out and laid a bare hand against its flank, unleashing a cure serious wounds into it. The soft blue glow of healing burned it like fire, and large chunks of packed earth and flesh turned to ash and dropped away from its hulking frame. The hulk turned ponderously toward this new threat, giving Eldren the seconds he needed to recover.

But the priestess paid for her action a moment later, as the two mohrgs swarmed on her from behind. She sensed the first and dodged its penetrating tentacle, but the second intercepted her and delivered a punishing blow across the jaw that drove her back almost into the zombie's hulking mass. And then, before she could recover, the monster's tongue shot out and stabbed momentarily into her forearm. The contact between them lasted only an instant, but Jannae stiffened, collapsing paralyzed onto the carpet of dead leaves at the feet of her enemies.

Chapter 475

"Jannae!" Eldren exclaimed, darting into jeopardy by leaping behind the zombie, coming up into a roll directly in front of the priestess before the mohrgs could take advantage of her helplessness. The zombie, already turning, slammed him in the chest, but the ranger almost immediately leapt back to a defensive position over the incapacitated woman, deflecting the probing tentacle from the second mohrg with his sword as he did so.

Dannel came to their aid with another flurry of arrows that knifed with keen precision into the mohrgs. He focused on the one that looked the most damaged, and scored three hits in rapid succession that left it shattered into inanimate fragments. Without pausing he started in on the last one, hitting it solidly in the back of its skull, sending it forward into Eldren's sword. There was a moment of tension as it nipped the ranger's cheek with its tentacle, but the ranger fought off the paralysis and swept his enchanted blade around in a decisive arc that separated its head from its torso.

But even as the mohrg clattered to the ground, the zombie struck Eldren yet again, clouting him solidly across the shoulders and driving him to the ground. Lying across Jannae's motionless form, he struggled to rise, his breath driven from his lungs by the force of the blow.

The zombie's massive arms came up to finish him, but Dannel again unleashed a punishing barrage, fitting arrows to his string as fast as his magical quiver could produce them. His first shot went through the zombie, taking a hunk of its form with it, but his later shots vanished into its massive form, sending tendrils of electrical energy out from the points of impact. For a moment it looked like it would shrug off the incredible punishment it was taking, but then a last arrow slammed directly into the center of its head, and it exploded in a shower of clods, corrupted flesh, and shards of bone. The thing just stood there for a few seconds, then it toppled backward into an inert heap.

Eldren struggled to his feet, drawing a healing potion from one of the pouches at his belt and downing its contents. Dannel, meanwhile, looked up at the evolving scene of chaos above them.

In just the few moments since they had entered the clearing, the second platform had been overrun. A few of the defending elves could still be seen at the edges of the platform, held in the grip of mohrgs that tore them to pieces. Even as he fought the rising gorge in his throat, Dannel saw that the last platform was being swarmed by nearly a dozen other mohrgs, most of which had reached the platform and were already fighting with the defenders to gain access to the top.

Once even one or two made it up there, Dannel knew, it was all over.

“Dannel!” Eldren warned. The arcane archer saw that one of the mohrgs that had been knocked from the middle tree in the last rush had noticed them, and was heading toward them.

“Defend Jannae!” Dannel returned, already lost in the growing intensity of the magical song that tied him together with the bow in his hand and his distant targets. Time seemed to slow around him as he called upon his quiver, which disgorged the first of a sequence of white-fletched holy arrows at his command.

Eldren watched in amazement as Dannel erupted into a blur of motion, fitting and firing arrows with a speed even he, who’d considered himself a peerless archer, had never before seen. The ranger was dimly aware of the song of power that his cousin wove around himself as he unleashed a hail of arrows at the mohrgs assaulting the platform. Even as the first arrow slammed into a mohrg’s skull from behind, a stream of others were on their way. When the barrage finally stopped, and the elf archer sagged wearily back, his limbs moving again in real time, ten arrows had been fired, and ten direct hits had been scored. That first mohrg had been destroyed, three others had been knocked free of their perches by the impacts, and six others had suffered damage, the force of the arrows augmented by the electrical damage imparted by Dannel’s bow and the holy energies stored in the blessed arrows. The few surviving elven defenders were quick to take advantage, using their own bows and spears to target the injured undead, knocking another two from their grips on the bottom of the platform.

“Dannel!” Eldren warned again, and he spun to find the damaged mohrg rushing at him. Calmly he stood his ground, reloading and firing, sending two arrows into the mohrg, which collapsed at his feet. By the time its skull crashed against his boot he was already turning and firing again, sending more shafts up to the aid of the elves fighting above. He destroyed another mohrg, but then he had to return his attention to the ground, for several of the mohrgs he’d dislodged before were getting up, and quickly heading his way.

“Behind me, I’ll give you cover to shoot!” Eldren urged, downing another healing potion as he moved into a defensive position in front of Jannae’s limp form. Dannel complied, moving swiftly into position as the mohrgs formed up into a loose cluster, reinforced by several of their fellows who were descending from the second seized platform. Dannel shot one of those for good measure, knocking it free to land on another just below, sending both to the ground in a clatter of bones. But neither was out of the fight, and they quickly joined the rush at the defiant elves.

With a yell Eldren met their charge, deflecting the lunging slam of the first, and narrowly avoiding the stabbing tongue of the second that tried to pierce his neck from behind. He smashed through the rib cage of the first with a powerful swing of his sword, causing it to falter, but then found himself overrun as a third, and then a fourth, came at him, one seizing him from behind while the other dealt a punishing blow to his body with its skeletal fists. The long vine-tendrils plunged at him, and while he fought off the cold paralysis that would have left him helpless, he could not fight free from the strong grasp of the monsters grappling him.

But the ranger's fierce defense had bought precious moments, and Dannel had not wasted them. The mohrg Eldren had damaged fell as a long arrow punched through its damaged rib cage and sundered its spine, and a moment later the one that had punched him fell back, spun around by the force of one, two, and finally a third arrow that exploded its shoulder and sent an entire arm flying free. Eldren finally was able to plant his feet and spin, knocking one of the mohrgs holding him into the second, disrupting their hold enough for him to pull his sword arm free. Even as they lunged at him again he brought the elvish blade down into the first, smashing its skull, knocking it limply back. The second got a solid hit in that in turn left the ranger's face bloody, his nose broken, but he met it and cut through the long tongue as it stabbed in to strike, and a moment later two arrows from Dannel finished it.

The ranger spun, looking for another enemy, but the battle was coming to an end. Dannel continued to fire, plucking mohrgs out of the trees above with almost casual grace. Thus far, of all the arrows he'd fired, almost every one had scored a telling hit. The elven warders had secured their platform from immediate threat, and now they had joined in the barrage, targeting mohrgs that still lurked on the middle platform or who were descending the tree in order to engage Dannel and Eldren. None of the undead monsters tried to retreat, but within another minute the grove fell quiet once more as the last undead creature was reduced to inanimate bone fragments and piles of noxious, rotting vegetable matter.

Eldren was helping Jannae up; the priestess groaned as she shook off the last lingering effects of the paralysis. The ranger indicated the rope ladder being lowered by the elves from the last high platform, but Dannel shook his head.

"We have to abandon this outpost, and fall back to Aldair Kelalei."

"It is not your right to..."

"Eldren. Listen to me. This was not a casual raid, nor were those monsters mere undead. This is an invasion, and all of the residents of the Wealdath are at risk. We must warn the elder lords, if they do not already know, and find out who or what is behind this... before it is too late."

Chapter 476

A soft breeze redolent with the smells of lavender and autumn rustled through the trees, swirling through the open spaces of the ancient grove. The gentle wind tugged at the threadbare, ragged cloak worn by the solitary individual seated upon the throne of cragged gray wood shaped from the remains of a long-dead stump. In the late afternoon light, here in the depths of the old wood, the figure's face was lost within the shadows of its cowl, for all that the garment was little more than wisps of fabric as ephemeral as moonlight, seemingly kept together by a memory of what it had once been.

The seated figure did not smell the fragrant hints upon the breeze. It did not remember the rich odors of the forest in autumn, or what it felt like to have the afternoon sun filter down through the canopy to strike the face in a forest clearing. It did not remember the joys of running through the wood, or chasing butterflies, or enjoying the soft patter of rain upon the leaves.

It did not even remember its name.

All that it remembered was its mandate, to preserve the forest, to maintain the purity of the Wealdath. Even that name was lost to it, and it remembered only the Wood, always the eternity of the ancient sentinels, the holiness of this place above all others on the surface of the world.

And now, the Wood was in danger.

The figure rose, silent. It turned and walked solemnly toward the nearby ruin. The stone arch rose above it in greeting, although the interior was now little more than cracked foundation beneath its feet, with walls that barely rose to its chest in most places. Age—time—had done to this place what it could not do to the walker, for it too was eternal, ever bound to this holy site and to the Wood.

A pulse of power greeted it as it entered the sacred core. It had not left the ruin, but the Wood was no longer visible. Here, it was both within the Wood and outside of it, the reality here torn by the vast power of the mythal.

The baelnorn regarded the ancient artifact. It knew the currents of power radiating from the crystal better than it knew its own self, recognized them like old friends. To its eyes the black smear of taint upon the crystal, consuming the entire upper half of its surface, seemed a natural part of it, unchanged since forever. That taint spread outward from it in a web that embraced the ancient lich, welcomed it as the undead thing came forward into the uneven glow of the artifact.

As soon as it could sense fully the flows of energy it knew that it had failed in its mandate. The threat to the Wood had grown, its efforts rebuffed. The impurity would swell and undo all that it had fought to preserve...

No. The baelnorn grew calm once more. It reached out toward the mythal; not actually to touch it, but some habits died hard. The gesture drew tendrils of power from within the web, tendrils that coalesced until they had become visible as a black distortion that hung in the air a few feet in front of the undead guardian. The mythal pulsed beyond that growing disruption, drawing more power into itself along the threads that linked it to the worlds beyond this place.

Minutes passed, hours, but what was time to a creature that existed forever? Finally the blackness faded, or seemed to; as the matrix dissolved the faint light from the mythal revealed three larger regions of un-light hovering in the corners of the chamber.

“Go forth, purify,” the baelnorn commanded, its voice sounding like the faint hiss of a candle’s flame consuming the last bit of wick. The dread wraiths, however, heard the command clearly, and bound to obey, merely vanished, passing through the barrier that surrounded the mythal and separated from the world beyond.

The baelnorn remained for a time longer, drawing more power from the ancient but flawed artifact. It would need more power, would need to draw upon all it could to complete its mandate, to save the Wood from the threat posed by the life forms that infested it. Even if it meant its own destruction, it would complete that task, would be the scourge that would finish the final cleansing of the Wealdath.

Chapter 477

The face of every elf in the Arbor Hall in the moon elf community of Aldair Kelalei was creased with worry and exhaustion. Many outsiders commented that elves often did not display their emotions outwardly, but that could not be said of those gathered here, clearly concerned about the dire threat to their people.

Dannel sat quietly in a low chair fashioned out of a single curving slab of wood, and listened to the discussion going back and forth between the elders of the community. Eldren had been a prominent speaker, and Jannae had added some words as well, but few had even acknowledged him. He recognized many of the leaders of the community, who appeared unchanged to his eyes; he’d been gone almost sixty years, a great deal of time in the world outside, but to elves decades were just small increments in the long span of flowing time.

“The mythal in Bryth’an Torgul has begun to surge unexpectedly,” a gray-haired elf who looked ancient even by his race’s standards was saying. He was Phelan Tarin, and while his body looked frail, all but absorbed by his copious blue robe, he was one of the most powerful archmages ever to walk the forest paths of the Wealdath. Oddly, Dannel found himself reminded of Cal when he saw him, although outwardly there was little in the way of similarities between them.

“What of the guardian?” a lean elf clad in mithral chainmail queried.

An elf clad in green robes decorated with an intricate leaf pattern came forward. “The Green has been disrupted throughout the western Wealdath,” said Harin Alindrela, High Priest of Rillifane Rallathil. “I have attempted to contact the ancient one, as has master Tarin, but the disruptions caused by the wakening of the mythal block all magic in the region of Bryth’an Torgul.”

“So the baelnorn is fallen, or is himself corrupted by this surge,” Eldren said. “Do we have any idea of what caused this calamity?”

Alindrela and Tarin shared a look, but neither had an answer for him. “It could have been many things,” Alindrela said. “The mythals are of an elder age, and not fully understood even by the wisest of us today. Their power is... unpredictable.”

“Think of Myth Drannor,” Tarin said abruptly. That place was well known to elves across Faerûn, and from the looks that passed around the gathering the reminder was not a pleasant one.

“There has been no word from our scouts?” another elf asked.

“They just... vanished, into the wood,” Eldren said. “We have heard nothing at all from the region beyond Korul Ulgor, since the assault.”

“Have there been other sightings in this part of the wood?”

A silver-haired elven woman named Thalia Oliades, clad in the simple brown tunic of a senior druid, shook her head. “The druids have set up a line of watchers—plants, animals, and elves—along the frontier of Kelalei to the west. Dark things move in the wood beyond that line, but nothing yet has penetrated deeper, as far as we can tell. But beyond, the Green has become silent to us.”

A general disquiet had developed, as the limits of their knowledge became more stark. Finally, there was a long silence, and it was Dannel who finally broke it, coming to his feet and drawing all attention to him.

“Well then, we’ll have to send a force to Bryth’an Torgul, to deal with the threat at its source.”

“You have chosen to be an outsider, Dannel,” Eldren began, frowning, “It is not your role to...”

“Oh, do shut up,” Jannae said, cutting him off. “I love you, dearest, but you’re wrong; Dannel is one of us, and you saw him at Korul Ulgor. And you saw what we’re up against; we need all the aid we can get.”

Eldren clearly bristled at the admonition, but he held his tongue.

“We have come to the same conclusion as you, Dannel Ardan,” Alindrela said. “But the danger will be great. The power of the mythal is beyond mortal comprehension, and its disruptive power is such that our arts may be of little avail to the elves we send.”

“Steel is still steel,” Eldren said, simply. “And an arrow will still fly straight regardless of whether it bears enchantments.”

“A small, fast, stealthy force might be best,” Dannel said. “But you should still have a contingency, in case we fail.”

“Word has already been sent to the other communities via magic and by messenger. If necessary, we will fall back to the eastern wood, and prepare our stand there, at a place and time of our choosing. Farther from the mythal, the power of our foes will be weaker.”

“Evacuate Aldair Kelalei?” Eldren said. “I did not know of this.”

“With the grace of the Seldarine, it will not be necessary,” Alindrela said. “But we must be prepared.”

“Then we should begin at once,” Eldren said. “I already know who I want on my squad; most of them should be here in Aldair Kelalei.”

“Time is short, but we need rest, and time to make preparations,” Dannel said. “And our enemies may be stronger in the darkness.”

“It’ll be dawn in about five hours,” Jannae said. “We should be well on our way by then.”

“We will grant you what magical aid we can, both divine and arcane,” Alindrela said.

“And we can see that you are transported swiftly to the edges of the mythal’s power,” Oliades, the druidess, added. “But from there, you will be on your own.”

Chapter 478

From there, you will be on your own.

The words of the druidess rang true in Dannel’s ears six hours later, the morning fog still stick throughout the forest as the dawn light still gathered to filter down through the dense canopy high above. Even to Dannel’s keen eyes the elves running beside him were like wraiths, shadows moving through the surreal landscape of early morning in the wood. It was a disturbing impression and one that he quickly tried to banish from his mind.

Eldren and Jannae was some distance ahead, running swiftly in the van, his trained senses alert to the slightest sign of trouble. Dannel knew little of the eight elves that were his companions on this mission, save that each was an expert woodsman, hand-picked by Eldren. Most were rangers, and a few had animal companions with them, including a huge gray wolf and an eagle that easily paced them on their journey through the forest. All bore bows and various melee weapons, but one had also worn a symbol of Corellon, indicating a second cleric in the group, and another had carried familiar small component pouches on his belt alongside his longsword and quiver that suggested a fighter-mage.

With the entire company empowered by long-lasting magic, either through their own arts or by draughts provided by the elven druids, the elves maintained a pace that rapidly consumed the miles. Dannel briefly thought of Dana, and her ability to wind walk, which would have made their journey a matter of hours rather than days. But even though the High Mage, Tarin, could have transported them to the vicinity of Bryth'an Torgul instantly using his magic, Dannel knew enough about the lore of the mythals to know that such an attempt would have been incredibly risky. Especially if, as they had theorized, the unpredictable surges of power coming from the ancient artifact was directly responsible for the rampaging undead in the forest.

And so they ran, pausing only briefly to take rests and eat food concentrates drawn from Eldren's small bag of holding. There was little small talk; all of them had been briefed on what had happened at Korul Ulgor, and knew that they were heading into great danger.

Eldren had criticized Dannel's woodlore, but even the arcane archer could sense the deepening sense of wrong that pervaded the forest as they pressed on, morning turning into afternoon. The fog finally dissolved around noon, but the wood remained deep within a pervading murk, as though the light from above simply could not muster the effort of reaching the forest floor. The Wealdath was eerily silent—not even the faint whisper of the breeze, or the subtle sounds of the forest's teeming wildlife, accompanied their progress. In that ominous quiet even the faint whisper of the elves' cloaks against the underbrush as they passed and the soft exertion of their breathing as they ran sounded excessively loud to Dannel's ears, an announcement of their coming to whatever dark entity awaited them.

He quickly broke in his new boots, although in all fairness the supple elven craftsmanship was far kinder to his feet than the best human-made footwear that he could have purchased in Cauldron or even one of the larger cities of Tethyr or Calimshan. The elven boots made not even a whisper even at their hurried pace. He'd also acquired new arrows—although far fewer of the blessed holy arrows than he would have liked—and several potent healing draughts, gifts of the elves of Aldair Kelalei. The other elves were likewise very well equipped. Jannae carried several scrolls bearing potent clerical spells, and Eldren wore a soft green mantle over his torso that resembled a patch of lush green moss but which in actuality was a powerful garment that offered protection against some of the more terrible powers commonly possessed by the greater of the undead.

By mid afternoon their pace slackened some, as their store of longstrider potions and spells became depleted, and exhaustion at their rapid pace began to catch up to them. Eldren seemed impatient, but Jannae spoke to him and he eased his pace to the need of those accompanying him. Dannel was grateful for the reprieve, although he too felt the sense of urgency that drove them all on, to dig deeper into their reserves of energy.

The day's light had already faded well into the gloom of twilight when Eldren called a halt. He'd directed them to a grove of especially massive trees, a place he apparently knew well, for he led them quickly to a particular tree with a trunk over fifteen feet across, and which bore faint marks on its bark that Dannel recognized as subtle aids for climbing.

"All right, we'll take our rest up above," Eldren said. "Jovran, go up first, set a line. Dalan, Yaela, clear the perimeter and then follow us up."

Jovran, a lean, angular elf, shot up the tree with a speed and agility that reminded Dannel of Mole. Dalan and Yaela, siblings who looked almost alike to be twins, vanished into the forest on their scouting assignment, taking their animal companions with them. Meanwhile, the others made their way up the tree, rarely needing the rope that Jovran tossed down to aid their descent. Dannel carefully stashed his bow into his efficient quiver and climbed, not ashamed to use the rope to help with the ascent.

The upper branches of the tree contained enough flat space to accommodate all of them, and it clearly had been used for such a purpose in the past. The elves set safety lines and watched, with Jovran climbing higher into the canopy to set the first watch. Dalan and Yaela returned a few minutes later to report that the immediate area was clear. Dalan's wolf remained below, but Yaela's eagle floated in to perch atop the ranger's shoulder, regarding all of them with what Dannel took to be a suspicious look in its eyes.

The fighter-mage, a raven-haired elf named Oloran, placed an alarm spell in the middle of their perch. The elves remained close, wrapping themselves in their cloaks, dropping into trance to refresh their minds while their bodies rested, while those on watch hovered at the edges of the branches like shadowy gargoyles perched on the battlements of an ancient castle.

Dannel had claimed a spot close to the central bole of the tree, a few yards away from the others. He sensed a presence and looked up to see Jannae coming over to him. Eldren had disappeared; he hadn't seen the ranger since they had started up the tree.

"He's verifying that the position is secure," she whispered, sensing his question. She indicated the spot beside him, and when he nodded sat down, her back against the trunk of the tree.

"He doesn't mean to be so abrasive toward you," she said, finally. "It's just that he feels very committed to the traditional ways, to family, to the obligations that he himself has made such a central part of his life."

"You do not need to defend him," Dannel replied. "I do not ask Eldren to be anything but what he is, any more than I can be anything but who and what I am."

"We are not ignorant of what the Harpers accomplish, out in the wider world. And I know that he is impressed with your skill, even if he will not come out and admit such openly. From what I understand, you were much the same way, in your younger years."

"You've been talking to our grandmother," he said, but his tone was light.

"Give him a chance, and he will accept you."

"I'm afraid that right now we have more important things to worry about than old family squabbles."

She shrugged. "There is always darkness and danger in the world; at times like this family is even more important."

"I thank you for your wisdom, priestess. I will think on your words, I promise."

"Good. It's good to have you with us, Dannel."

He nodded and the elf woman rose, silently walking over to another empty space on the branch before pulling her cloak around her and lying down, becoming just another dark shape in the night.

Dannel let out a sigh, thinking of life and fate, before calming his thoughts, softening his breathing to a slow rhythmic flow as he fell into trance.

It seemed like just an instant later when he was startled back into reality by a chaotic explosion of sound. A tinkling of chimes announced the triggering of Oloran's alarm spell at the same time that Yaela's eagle screeched loudly and leapt into the night. Even as Dannel registered those sounds, his hand already darting for his bow, they were followed by a scream, a terrible cry of agony from above. A dark form hurtled toward him, and he drew back just in time to avoid being struck by the falling body of Jovran, his face frozen in a look of terror, his flesh a sickly pale white.

Looking up, he saw the huge dark forms that had killed the elf descending toward him.

Chapter 479

Reflex took over as the elf registered the threat. The song filled him as he drew, sighted, and fired. The shot was true, bisecting the center of the first dark mass, but Dannel realized his mistake an instant before the arrow passed harmlessly through the wraith.

"Ghost touch," he whispered, his magical quiver producing one of the ten translucent gray missiles from its extradimensional space at his command.

Both wraiths—gods, they were huge—descended toward him, blocking out the faint light of the moon and stars that filtered down through the treetops. But Dannel was a seasoned veteran, and while he could have leapt from the tree, relying upon his feather fall spell to drop him safely, he was not one to abandon companions. He could hear the other elves in the party stirring to wakefulness, but knew that it would still take precious seconds for even the experienced rangers to respond to the sudden attack.

And so the arcane archer's bow sang, the enchanted missiles stabbing true through the body of the first wraith. It was fast, incredibly fast, but Dannel was one of the foremost archers of the Realms, and by the time it had descended the twenty feet to his perch he'd already scored two solid hits. The wraith made no sound, but in that dark, unknowable part of the mind where nightmares were born he could hear its baleful scream. Great rents were visible in its body as it reached him, and it extended a long incorporeal claw that pierced his chest and tore at his very soul. Dannel felt an icy chill grip him at that touch, and staggered as the dread wraith ripped a portion of his life energy from him.

The second wraith moved around the first to press the attack, and Dannel would have been hard-pressed to withstand another such assault. But before it could reach him the night was transformed by the golden blast of a ray of searing light that Jannae fired into the undead monstrosity's black form. The wraith writhed as the holy power of the cleric's attack tore at its substance, and as the light faltered it immediately turned and dove at the priestess. Before it could reach the branch where she stood, however, another black shadow detached itself from the bole of the tree and leapt to intercede itself between the undead and its target. The undead appeared as though it would pass right through the defender to get at its chosen victim, but a greenish glow flared around the body of the newcomer as the wraith approached. The wraith recoiled from that light, which revealed the features of Eldren, who lashed out at it with his magical sword. The blade, empowered by elves as a potent talisman, cut through the substance of the wraith. It was damaged, but not seriously so, and it quickly assaulted the elf blocking it, piercing Eldren's defenses easily with its incorporeal claws. The mossmantle that the elf wore protected him from the life-draining effects of the wraith's touch, but even that potent device could not inure him fully against that dread contact.

Arrows knifed through the wraith from behind as the rest of the elves joined the battle from the adjacent branch. The rangers had been equipped with a supply of magically-enhanced arrows, but most of them still passed harmlessly through the creature. Fortunately the elves had aimed carefully, so none of the errant shafts threatened Jannae or Eldren. More effective was Oloran, who blasted the wraith with a trio of magic missiles that tore glowing holes in the fabric of the undead creature.

Unfortunately, that success also drew attention to him, and he screamed when a few moments after his spell, another black wraith emerged through the branch at his feet, having come up at the embattled elves undetected from below. The wizard drew out a wand and discharged a current of electrical energy through the wraith at point-blank range, and the nearest of his companions tried to distract it with attacks of their own, but they could not save Oloran as the wraith hungrily drew the rest of the elf's life-force out from him. Oloran screamed and stiffened, collapsing backwards and slipping off of the branch to plummet into the darkness below.

The wraith turned hungrily at once toward the next nearest victim.

Dannel stood his ground against the wraith, firing his deadly arrows at it point-blank. The wraith tried to strike him again, to draw off more of his life energy, but Dannel sliced an arrow through the vaporous claw, dissolving it into wisps of gray that quickly vanished. The wraith tried to simply envelop the archer, but as it lunged forward Dannel drew a final missile and buried it into the core of wraith. The unholy apparition seemed to shudder, once, and then with a soft sigh it evaporated into nothingness, leaving not even the arrows Dannel had buried in it behind to mark its existence.

Dannel did not hesitate to enjoy his victory, turning to aid the others. But even as he shifted he caught a hint of movement, and looked down in time to see a black form emerging from the ghastly corpse of Jovran, the elf scout.

"Ware the fallen... more are spawning!" he warned the others, dodging the initial attack from the thing that had minutes ago been a friend and ally.

Eldren danced along the very edge of the branch, his nimble feet carrying him within inches of plummeting off to the forest floor fall below. His efforts paid off, however, as he kept the wraith from getting around him to Jannae. The wraith had drifted back slightly, making it difficult for the ranger to attack it directly. But Jannae could still attack. Protected by Eldren, the priestess unrolled a scroll, and reading from the soft glow of her holy symbol she summoned a spiritual weapon that she sent to assault the undead creature. The glowing quarterstaff slammed true into the body of the wraith, its soft glow piercing its black substance like a shaft of moonlight through shadow. The wraith reacted immediately, abandoning caution to lunge at the cleric. It passed over Eldren as it did so, and the ranger immediately struck, his blade bisecting it lengthwise, tearing a great rift in its form that continued until the entirety of the wraith had been split in twain, destroying the creature.

Jannae immediately directed her spell-staff at the wraith that had destroyed Oloran.

The aid came none too soon for the embattled rangers. Despite what had happened to their peer they fought on bravely, for all that the majority of their attacks passed through the wraith without harming it. One of them boldly stepped forward and stabbed the wraith with a wand of cure light wounds, searing it with holy healing energy. The elf paid for his courage as the wraith enveloped him, but even within its black form the others could see the blue glow as the ranger continued damaging the wraith, up until the moment when the undead creature withdrew, leaving behind the withered husk of the man lying motionless upon the bark surface of the branch.

But the elf's sacrifice had won precious moments, and the elves rallied to focus all of their attacks upon the last undead creature. Dannel, having dispatched the weaker wraith spawn that had emerged from Jovran's corpse, now directed the last of his ghost touch arrows at the dread wraith, each hit piercing its incorporeal hide. Likewise Jannae's spiritual weapon damaged it. Eldren unlimbered his own bow and sent his own stream of potent magical missiles into the creature, and combined with the barrage from the other elves, this finally resulted in the destruction of the creature.

"Ware the spawn!" Dannel cautioned. The elves drew back from the body of the elf ranger, and thus warned were able to destroy the black form that emerged from the body a few seconds later before it could attack or escape.

However, they never did find the one that would have come from Oloran, although they did later find the body of the slain elf later, his skull crushed from landing on a jagged-edged rock below.

"His alarm spell gave us warning," Dannel said of the magic-user, as the elves gathered together. Jannae called upon her gifts to lay a lesser restoration upon him that eased some of the loss he'd suffered from the wraith's touch. He still felt acutely the echo of that chill contact, but he smiled and nodded gratefully for her aid.

"Likewise Jovran and Caylen gave their lives for our cause," Eldren added. "We should not remain here."

"Without rest, we will not be as effective," Dannel pointed out. "And the night is not our ally."

"We will go cautiously, but go we must," Eldren insisted, an edge to his voice as he turned to face his cousin. "Our enemy will only grow stronger, the longer we delay."

Dannel nodded, deferring to the ranger.

“What of Jovran, and Caylen?” Jannae asked. “We should not leave their bodies to be claimed by the undead.”

“Bless them then, but make haste. We do not have time for a pyre; we will treat them properly upon our return, if that is our fate.”

The elves made their preparations quickly and in silence, and descended the tree to the forest floor below. Down below the depth of the night was almost total, proof even to sharp elven eyes. But the members of Eldren’s company were veteran trackers, and even in the near absence of light they made their way forward. The ranger remained in the lead, accompanied by Dalan, whose wolf companion’s senses helped them maintain their course. But progress was slow, and Dannel found himself stumbling several times, once even falling flat on his face when an unseen root caught his ankle firmly in its grasp. Finally one of the trackers took his arm, and the arcane archer allowed him—her? He could not even see enough to discern the ranger’s gender—to guide him.

To Dannel’s senses they traveled at a crawl, but at least there were no more undead attacks; in the darkness they would have been easy prey for another ambush. Finally, however, he realized that the wood around him was becoming more distinct, the trees resolving into more than just vertical shadows slightly darker than the surrounding night. Dawn was approaching. He felt a weariness that was deep in the bone, as though it had been a lifelong companion. But he also knew that there would be battle this day, and blood, and likely death. When it came, he knew he would be ready... but that anticipation did nothing to ease the exhaustion that tugged at his limbs as he pressed deeper into the western reaches of the Wealdath.

Eldren seemed indomitable, driving them all further on, and as the light gradually brightened Dannel could see that the rangers openly showed the same strain that he himself felt. Somehow, oddly, that comforted him. The elf at his arm withdrew, now that it was light enough for him to clearly mark the trail. It was a woman, he saw—Ellene, he thought her name was. Despite having spent almost a day in the company of the elven scouts, he’d exchanged barely a dozen words with any of them. The hunters communicated as often with hand signals as with spoken words, and the silence seemed appropriate to this cursed forest, where even the whisper of a boot against bare rock seemed like an unwelcome intrusion.

Finally, Eldren called a pause. Dannel resisted the urge to topple onto his backside; his feet, despite the relative comfort of his new boots, each felt like a single massive callus. The elves gathered close around him, so that his words would not travel beyond their company.

“We draw near to Bryth’an Torgul,” he told them, his voice a soft whisper. “The animals grow agitated, and will not go further.” The elves all nodded, as if this was patently obvious; Dannel realized that he had not noticed. He was a ranger, like them, but in this alien place he felt as though his skills had departed him. Had he spent too long living in cities, among humans? He felt the reassuring weight of his bow at his side. That, at least, was something he could rely upon.

“Food and drink. Ten minutes,” he told them. He drew out supplies from his bag of holding, and distributed them to the elves. Dalan and Yaela went off a short distance and appeared to communicate with their animal companions, likely bidding them wait here for their return. Dannel took his light trailcake and waterskin and leaned up against a nearby tree. He did not trust himself to sit down, doubting whether he would be able to get up again. He was not in poor shape, and his magical amulet augmented his stamina, but the effects of the wraith’s touch lingered, despite Jannae’s assistance earlier.

The appointed rest period passed too swiftly, and Eldren called them together again. The elves rose wearily, checking their weapons, but their hesitation ended when Ellene hissed a warning, and they spun to see the baelhorn standing twenty feet behind Eldren, regarding them calmly.

Chapter 480

Dannel had never seen an elven lich, but there could be no doubting the nature of the unannounced intruder. It was tall, still bearing the lines of the noble elf it had once been, its features desiccated, its gray skin stretched tight over the angular shape of its skull. It was clad in a robe that had seen better days, now a ruined fragment that hung about the lich’s form like wisps of cloud.

He had an arrow ready in a heartbeat, but held his fire, alert to any sign of threat or spellcasting. One of the others was less hesitant, and loosed a shaft that passed through the lich before vanishing into the surrounding undergrowth.

“It’s an image,” Dannel said, his eyes shooting around, observant for other threats.

“It can still cast spells through the projection,” Jannae warned. She had readied her own magic against it, but Dannel knew that it was highly unlikely that an elder creature like the lich would be discomfited by the limited powers of the priestess.

“What is your business, guardian?” Eldren said, boldly stepping forward to address the creature. “Is the evil in the wood your doing?”

The lich hissed, like air coming from a leaking bladder, and it took them a moment to realize that it was speaking. “Evil...” it said. “Yes... evil... evil must be purged, the Wood must be cleansed...”

It lifted up its hands high above its head, looking up as if to invoke the very skies above to smite its enemies. “Ware!” Eldren said, drawing back in alarm. But the lich merely shuddered, and with a faint shimmer it disappeared.

“What was that all about?” Yaela queried.

“It sounded... mad,” Dannel said.

Yaela’s eagle, perched on a nearby branch, cried out and leapt into the air. Dalan’s wolf echoed the bird’s alarm, backing away with its teeth bared in a hostile growl.

“What is it...” Ellene asked, her bow half-drawn.

“Something stirs...” Jannae said.

They could all feel it, a sense of building unrest in the wood. The feeling became reality a moment later as a massive rumbling shook the forest floor around them, almost strong enough to shake them from their feet. But even over that cacophony they could detect the sounds of something massive coming at them from the forest, from the direction of their ultimate destination.

“Ready yourselves!” Eldren shouted, casting a ward that immediately toughed his flesh to the color and consistency of rough bark. The other elves made whatever similar provisions they could, consuming potions or taking up positions of relative cover. They did not have long to wait. Whatever was coming was moving slowly, but from the sounds they heard it was coming straight through the undergrowth, the tearing of plants and crushing of brush sounding unduly harsh through the otherwise silent wood.

Dannel had taken up position atop a nearby fallen log, and from that vantage watched for a look at the approaching enemies. He caught sight of them quickly, four bulky masses approaching through the forest, but the obstructing trees and dense brush obscuring them made a shot difficult even for him. He could fire a seeker arrow that would penetrate that maze, but with only one such missile per day, he elected to hold his fire for the moment. A few of the other elves attempted shots anyway, but none of their arrows made it near the approaching forms as far as Dannel could tell.

“Four of them!” Eldren warned, having spotted the same thing as Dannel.

The four creatures finally emerged from the brush into the open, giving the elves a clear look at their foes. The intruders resembled massive heaps of rotting vegetation, animated into the crude resemblance of a humanoid form. Each was almost ten feet tall, and from the way the ground shook at their movements, they had to weigh thousands of pounds. A wave of rot swept through the clearing ahead of them. They clearly knew exactly where their foes were located, for they came immediately forward toward the elves without hesitation, massive “arms” unfolding from their bodies as they begun their attack.

Chapter 481

Dannel had drawn and sighted down the length of a long arrow as soon as the enemies emerged into the open, but before he could loose Eldren’s voice forestalled him.

“Hold, Dannel!” the ranger warned. “Shamblers... your shock-bow will only empower them!”

Dannel nodded, remembering that bit of lore. He cursed his decision to leave Benzan’s longbow, itself a potent magical weapon, back at the Traveler’s Rest in Ember Vale, in Cal’s care. He had no other backup, and without it the firepower he could bring to bear was greatly impaired.

“Dannel!” Jannae cried, drawing his attention around as she tossed her own longbow up at him. The priestess’s bow had a weaker pull, and lacked the powerful enchantments laid upon Dannel’s weapon, but he was an arcane archer, and the song filled him as he drew, aimed, and released his first shaft.

The first shambler staggered as a half-dozen arrows slammed into it. The thing apparently could be harmed by mundane weapons, for it seemed to be hindered by the impacts, although the missiles jutting from it seemed miniscule in contrast to its incredible bulk. The other shamblers moved around it, but all four were engulfed in a spread of entangling growth as the forest floor suddenly became animated, clinging to them as they moved forward. The huge shamblers were far too strong to be long hindered by the entangle spell, but it did slow them, leaving them open targets for the ongoing barrage of arrows coming from the elves. Another ranger laid a second entangle at close range, extending the area of effect to almost directly in front of the line of defenders.

The first shambler went down as the storm of arrows continued, the huge creature sagging with over two dozen missiles stuck into its body. The others pressed on through the entangled areas, however, not even bothering to try to avoid the radius of the spell effects, simply tearing forward through the clinging growth. By unspoken agreement the elves shifted their fire and focused on a second foe, sending a hail of arrows into it as well. Yaela’s eagle flew low over them, trying to distract them, but the monsters paid the small avian no heed. Dalan kept his wolf close at hand, lest the animal move forward into the entangle spells.

Damn, these things are tough! Dannel thought, as he fired yet another arrow into the second monster. With time and distance they could possibly slay all of them without loss, as they were slower than the elves; a few of the scouts had already shimmied up into the lower branches of nearby trees, to give them a protected vantage from which to fire. All of the elves moved faster than the shamblers, and with his own expeditious retreat spell he could easily lure them off while maintaining a more or less continuous barrage of fire. He glanced back over his shoulder, looking for the easiest route of retreat; what he saw, however, caused his heart to pound in his chest.

“Mohrgs!” he yelled.

The elves turned and saw that the undead monstrosities had formed a wide ring around them, and were rapidly closing in. There were almost a dozen, their tentacle-tongues already probing in anticipation of stinging warm flesh.

Chapter 482

“Go high!” Eldren shouted, putting his own words into action as he rushed to the nearest tree and started to climb. The elves immediately started aiding each other, those already in the trees tossing down lines to help those still below.

Dannel knew that his position atop the fallen log would not give him much advantage against the charging mohrgs, whose skill at climbing he’d already seen in action. He instead called upon his magic, and used his ability to alter self to take on the form of an avariel, wings sprouting from his back through the careful seams he'd long ago had installed in his armor. He saw Jannae, exposed in the center of the clearing, and leapt down beside her. Taking the priestess into his arms, he beat his borrowed wings to lift the two of them slowly into the air. She was not exceptionally heavy, but Dannel was not a natural flyer, and the nearest shambler was only about fifteen paces distant when he finally got high enough off the ground to be sufficiently clear of their reach.

"There, that branch!" Jannae said, pointing out a good destination.

"Dalan!" cried Yaela, from halfway up the trunk of another nearby tree. The elf ranger had not joined them in their ascent, instead taking up a defensive position amidst the protruding roots of another tree, his wolf by his side.

"Yaela, don't stop!" Eldren warned, seeing a shambler lumber toward the woman ranger's tree. She started up again, but the massive creature slammed into the tree with a powerful all-out blow from its thick arms. The trunk of the tree was easily seven or eight feet thick, and even the shambler could not unroot it, but the blow was enough to shake it severely. The elf screamed as she lost her grip, plummeting into the waiting grasp of the plant creature. For a moment she looked as though she would get free before it could grab her. Bouncing off its spongy mass she tumbled to her feet, darting away as it turned.

But then a second shambler rose up before her, and engulfed her in its huge arms before she could even scream.

"Yaela!" Dalan cried. He started toward her, his wolf running ahead, but almost immediately had to defend himself as a mohrg leapt at him, trying for a bite that would leave him paralyzed and easy prey.

Ellene let out a battle cry as she leapt from her own tentative perch, using the rope she'd been climbing to swing her into the melee. She caromed into the mohrg with enough force to send it sprawling, and as she landed she drew out her twin shortswords with a flourish. "Behind you!" she warned Dalan, engaging the mohrg she'd knocked down while the elf and his wolf faced another three of the skeletal undead, with others close behind them. The last two rangers had already reached secure branches about thirty feet up and had wedged themselves into firing positions, and started blasting mohrgs with accurate shots from their masterwork bows. One, locking her knee around the branch to steady herself, fitted two magical arrows to her string and fired both into a charging mohrg's chest, shattering bones and stabbing deep into the putrescent mass inside its ribs. But none of the undead started for the trees, not yet, swarming instead upon the embattled elves on the ground.

Dannel dropped Jannae on the branch and immediately took up his bow again. They were relatively safe, but only so long as their friends distracted the enemy forces. Without hesitation he called upon one of the greater powers of his song, launching another hail of arrows that slammed down into their foes in a devastating barrage. A second shambler went down, Dannel's arrow finally pushing its tally of injuries over the threshold of what it could take, and several mohrgs took hits, but they already knew that these enemies were too tough to be taken out with a single blow.

Jannae, meanwhile, drew upon her powers to bless her allies; there was little more she could do, with Dannel's bow lying atop the fallen log almost forty feet below them.

Yaela's eagle dove down at the top of the shambler holding its companion, digging its claws deep into its dense mass. The attack was little more than a distraction, but the ranger became momentarily visible as she tore herself free from the creature's grasp and fell hard onto her back before it. The shambler immediately lifted its huge arms to crush her, but before it could strike Eldren yelled and leapt from his position thirty feet up a nearby tree, drawing his sword as he fell. He slammed sword-first into the shambler's body, driving the elven blade deep into it, even its momentous bulk affected by the weight of the elf impacting it. As Yaela leapt free, Eldren tore his sword out from the wound and fell back, tumbling on impact and coming awkwardly to his feet. As the shambler turned, he glanced to the side, where two mohrgs were already coming his way.

"Come on then!" he yelled, leaping inside the shambler's reach, taking a solid hit across his shoulders but avoiding its enfolding grasp.

"He's crazy!" Dannel exclaimed. The last shambler, still coming slowly through the second entangle spell, was only a few steps from reinforcing its peer, and the mohrgs were everywhere. He tried to help Eldren by firing arrows into the back of the one he'd dropped onto, but again the missiles seemed of little individual effect.

"Yes," Jannae whispered, as she stepped forward and dove off of the branch.

Dalan smote a mohrg across the front of its skull with his longsword, sending the already-injured undead staggering back. Beside him, his wolf Longfang had borne a second of the undead monsters to the ground, and was trying to shake it to pieces. But the elf cried out as three mohrgs leapt at him from ahead and each flank, two of the piercing tendrils stabbing through his armor into his flesh. The elf stiffened and went down, barely feeling the punishing blow across his back as he fell. Longfang instantly leapt to his help, or tried to; the mohrg he'd taken down nipped the wolf in the flank, and the animal crumpled, paralyzed.

Ellene could do nothing to help either, struggling against two mohrgs that were doing their best to flank her. Her head swam from the effects of the glancing punch she'd taken to her left temple, and she felt stiff from the toxic bite to her hip that she'd barely resisted. She was a master swordswoman, very adept at the two swords style that maintained effective offense and defense, but these were no common adversaries. She was not alone, as her friends continued to rain down arrows from above, but the mohrgs seemed able to withstand an incredible amount of punishment.

Eldren ignored the blows that punished his back, focusing on the shambler. The mossmantle protected him from the mohrg's paralysis, but he thought he felt a rib pop as another crushing blow slammed into him. And on top of that, the shambler was winding up for what looked like a pretty intense attack of its own, its arms coming up high above its body. Yelling a curse in elvish, he swept his sword through its torso, feeling the resistance of its body collapse before the preternatural sharpness of the blade. The shambler staggered back and toppled over, crushing Yaela beneath its crumbling bulk.

The ranger turned just in time to take a solid hit across the front of his face from the last shambler, and everything went dark.

Chapter 483

Ellene fell back before the assault of the mohrgs, dodging their probing tentacles and the punishing blows from their fists. The potions she'd consumed at the start of the battle had bolstered her strength and stamina, but she was still mortal, a living and breathing creature with the weaknesses that these adversaries lacked. Thus far the only thing keeping her fighting was the lingering effects of those draughts, instinct, and the magical suit of elven chain that she wore. That suit had been in her family for seven generations, a legacy passed down to her through her grandmother, who had been a fighter of incredible skill.

Now, it looked as though it would be finally lost, torn apart by undead in the depths of a cursed wood. She was tough, and had already resisted the paralyzing effects of two mohrg bites, but as she heard the sounds of Dalan and Longfang being torn to pieces by the mohrgs, despair thick in her throat, she knew that there was only one way that this battle could end.

But she fought on, as her grandmother had at the Battle of Kevlan Grove. The relief party had found Alyana Aleastralas lying among the bodies of twenty-six orcs. The same Alyana who'd initially had to find a private tutor to learn the talents of the blade, as the martial orders had refused to accept the slight woman, barely four and a half feet tall, for training. All of the slain orcs bore wounds caused by her slender sword, Moonstream. The sword had gone to another of her descendents, but Alyana's armor had been passed down to her. That was the armor she wore now, an elegant but functional suit of elven chainmail that Ellene had worn for seventeen years now. Ellene, whose gifts had impressed everyone in a family already blessed with an impressive history, was now the inheritor of the tradition of honor and skill created by her grandmother.

She was one with the twin blades, blocking and countering without conscious thought. That would have killed her, had she even given an instant to considering Dalan's fate, and the fate of the others around her. The mohrgs kept pressing her, kept hitting her, but she kept hitting back. The one in front of her finally went down, her sword—Left Sword, as she called it—smashing its skull. But three others rushed forward to take its place, and she saw with horror that their claws were red with fresh blood.

She fell back, against the fallen log that Dannel had used as a perch, and which now offered at least some cover from being flanked.

Dannel saw Ellene being threatened, and how the elf woman fought back against odds that should have meant her death at once. A part of him longed to duplicate the insane sacrifices of the others, leaping into the melee to save friends in jeopardy. But Dannel had fought in too many battles, was too experienced not to recognize that the leaps of Ellene, Eldren, and Jannae into the melee, while motivated by bravery and self-sacrifice, were foolish from a tactical standpoint. His wings could place him anywhere on the battlefield in an instant, where he could unleash Alakast against these undead in defense of anyone he chose. But it would only take one nip from a mohrg's "tongue" to take him out of the battle, permanently. And while he could wield the staff with skill, that was nothing in comparison to the damage he could wreak with even a borrowed longbow.

All these thoughts darted through his mind as he continued firing arrows in a steady stream, the missiles slicing through the air with a hum punctuated by a solid thwack as each arrow hit its target. The song of the bow filled the arcane archer, and his quiver produced each arrow that he requested in a steady stream. He went through all of the magical shafts provided by the elf wizards and priests, the arrows unleashing splashes of acid or frozen blasts of cold upon impact. When those were gone he switched to normal missiles, which were infused with the power of the song, adding to their efficacy, transforming the elf-forged shafts into deadly lances of destruction that hit with the force of a ballista shot.

He tracked the last shambler, pouring arrows into its back that vanished into the mass of its form and passed through, tearing huge chunks of rotting vegetable matter out as they went. He could not stop the thing from pulverizing Eldren, nor the mohrgs that eagerly leapt onto the fallen elf. But there was another who could, and did.

Jannae landed lightly at the base of the tree, tumbling into a somersault that culminated back in a standing position, absorbing some of what still had to be an incredibly painful jolt to her legs. She used the momentum to leap forward, her sword slicing from its scabbard. The shambler swept a huge limb at her, but she ducked under the powerful but clumsy stroke, coming up into a wild swing that nevertheless got the first mohrg's attention. It leapt off of Eldren and came at her, punching her solidly in the shoulder, driving her back a step. Its tongue lashed at her face, but she had protected herself from evil, and that divine reinforcement allowed her to resist its paralytic touch.

The second mohrg paused for a moment over the helpless ranger, intent upon delivering a coup de grace to finish this foe before moving on to the next. But before it could strike, an avian cry drew its attention back up a moment before Yaela's eagle flew into its face, lashing with its claws. The attack did nothing to harm the undead creature, but it distracted it for a moment. Displeased at being diverted from its victim, the mohrg lashed the eagle with its tongue. As the bird stiffened and began to fell, the undead monster slammed it aside, knocking it away to land broken a few paces distant.

Turning back to its prey, the mohrg lifted a fist to crush the dying ranger's skull.

The first arrow struck it solidly in the temple, cracking the bone and staggering the undead monstrosity. The mohrg looked up just in time to see Dannel release his second shot, which flew as true to carom off the mohrg's shoulder, shattering the clavicle and half-tearing its right arm joint away. The mohrg, knowing it could not get at the elf archer, instead focused on killing the helpless one at its feet. But as it drove down its left fist, another arrow struck its humerus, shattering it. The powerful blow became a weak swipe that barely glanced off of the ranger's chest.

The mohrg looked up hatefully, in time to take the final arrow between its eyes.

Ellene's arms felt leaden, and her body felt cold, as though she'd been doused in ice water. She'd taken more of the stabbing bites than she could remember, yet somehow she fought on. Every movement sent sharp pains through her from the broken ribs in her left side, from a mohrg punch that had hit with devastating force, and her jaw bled from another punch that had knocked out several of her teeth. Thankfully the wounds were growing as numb as the rest of her, and she knew that she wouldn't have to worry about the pain for much longer.

She'd finished a second mohrg, and Aymie and Lyson above had destroyed a third with their supporting archery, but there were still four more pressing at her. The fallen log offered enough cover so that only three could really come at her at once, but that was small solace; those three could inflict more than enough damage.

She somehow brought Right Sword up and deflected a punch aimed at her head. But before she could draw the weapon back into a defensive position, or offer a counter, another mohrg smashed her forearm with enough force to dent the bracer, driving it back hard into the log. Ellene heard, rather than felt, the snap, and in her attenuated perceptions it was the tumbling of the sword that caught her focus, as the blade slowly fell to the ground a few feet away.

The mohrgs pressed in. She grinned, though with her shattered jaw it looked more like a mad scowl.

"Cub on den!" she spat bloodily, jabbing Left Sword into the first mohrg's face. To her surprise, the undead's skull exploded, and the creature toppled forward to land at her feet.

The second mohrg stabbed her with its tongue. Again she fought off the paralysis. But it followed with a solid blow to her chest that drove her back against the log, her breath stolen from her lungs by the force of the impact. She tried to bring up Left Sword, but her arm felt like a lead weight, like the ones that Master O'dan had commanded her to strap to her arms for days, forcing her muscles to thicken and develop. She screamed, and barely lifting the blade to horizontal drove Left Sword with the force of her body into the mohrg.

The blow was pathetically weak, but the mohrg just seemed to come apart, shards of bone exploding from its torso. The creature sagged and collapsed, Ellene almost going down with it. There was another one behind it, but it too was on its last legs, half of its skull missing, its "guts" dangling from the wreckage of its rib cage. It tried to hit her, but only managed to fall over as its leg crumpled under it.

Looking down, Ellene saw the feathers of an arrow buried in the loam, finally understanding what was happening. She looked up and saw Dannel, outlined faintly against the faint light filtering down from above, arrows knifing down all around her, each striking a target, shattering undead bones. The sound of the arrows was loud in her ears, and for a moment she thought she heard a faint melody as the shafts whizzed past.

She smiled, and toppled forward, Left Sword falling from her grasp as she collapsed into unconsciousness.

Chapter 484

Diffuse rays of golden light filtered down through the forest upon the elves from Aldair Kelalei, as they made their way into the ruins of Bryth'an Torgul. They were six, now, leaving Dalan and Yaela behind to mark their latest confrontation with the baelorn's minions. Dalan had been torn to pieces by the mohrgs, along with Longfang, but they hadn't been sure of Yaela when they'd pulled her out under the remains of the slain shambler. She'd looked peaceful, without any obvious wounds, but when they'd lifted her they'd found a sharpened stub of a branch that had slid through her back into a lung when the mass of the dead creature had fallen on her. A freak wound, ill fortune, and another death. They'd left behind Yaela's eagle, which had survived its own encounter with the mohrgs, but which had simply watched them from a high branch as they departed the fateful clearing.

Their healing wands and potions had restored the survivors to health, but all of the elves bore haunted looks with them as they completed the final stage of their journey. Dannel had considered the wisdom of proceeding, but none of them raised the possibility of retreat, at least not out loud. Their encounters on this trip had reinforced the gravity of the danger facing the elves of the Wealdath, and all of them remained committed to doing what they could to defeat that threat.

The quiet beauty of the morning in the forest seemed to mock them. It seemed as though nothing dangerous could exist in this place, but they knew better, continued hyperalert to the slightest stirring around them.

Ruined structures of old gray stone rose up out of the forest around them, almost invisible until they were almost adjacent. The forest had reclaimed them over the centuries, until only the odd artificiality of their shape distinguished them from the natural curve of the land and the dense growth.

Eldren seemed to know where he was going, leading them down a narrow path that wound deeper into the ruins.

Dannel paused at one point to summon a minor magical spell. The result was immediately, he staggered back, dropping his bow as he clutched his head.

"Dannel! What is it?" Ellene asked, appearing at his side to help him. Her words were slightly slurred by the wreckage of her jaw; multiple cure light wounds had healed most of her wounds, but that spell alone could not fully repair the damage done to her face by the mohrgs. The others quickly gathered on him, alert for any sign of ambush or assault.

"I... I'm okay," he said, as the effects of the spell—lost immediately upon casting—faded. "That was foolish," he said. "I tried to detect for magic, but it's everywhere, here... overwhelming."

"We're close," Eldren said, unnecessarily. "Use whatever wards and protections you have, now." He took his own advice by consuming another barkskin potion, then led them forward once again.

“The baelnorn... what can we expect?” Ellene asked.

“The elves that become undead guardians were among the most powerful spellcasters of our history,” Jannae said. “High priests, hierophants, archmages. The potency of their magic is greater than almost any elf living today.”

“And with the mythal at its command, that power may be even greater,” Dannel said.

“How can we deal with the artifact?” one of the other elves, Lyson, asked.

“Focus on the lich,” Eldren said. “Once we take out the guardian, then we’ll deal with the mythal.”

Dannel, having touched that power directly, had his own doubts about that, but he said nothing.

The forest cover began to thin out somewhat, and more sunlight was visible ahead in a broad clearing populated by several clusters of ruined stone interspersed with occasional ancient trees. Brush covered everything in a dense carpet, except along a pathway that may have once been a roadway of smooth paving stones. Now, that avenue was a tangle of weeds and fragments of ancient stones, frequently interrupted by gaping holes that had been claimed by weeds and dense knots of thornbushes.

The center of the clearing was dominated by a pair of low mounds, compact hills grown over with brush and waist-high brown grass. Between them sat a more cohesive structure, a ruin that still had partially-intact walls grown over with vines and clinging brush. There was enough of the building left to hint at what it might have once been, a beauty of flowing, curved walls and aspiring vaults. Pieces of broken stone lay about, carved in intricate patterns that reflected an exceptional craftsmanship even after millennia of exposure and neglect.

As they drew nearer, they could see that a stone arch over the entry to the ancient building remained intact. The stone had been fashioned to resemble an arbor, complete with intricate carvings of roses that had been worn down by the passage of time. A strong smell hung over the place, the stench of death and decay.

Jannae lingered back with Dannel as Eldren led them slowly toward the structure.

“I understand your concern,” she whispered. “If Eldren and I should fall... there is a potent device in my pouch, a blanket formed of a weave as light as spiderwebs. There is also a scroll, an incantation in the old dialect. I do not know if you can read it, but if it comes to it...”

She was interrupted by a cry from Eldren, followed by the twang of a bowstring. They turned to see the lich standing in the entry of the structure, its arms uplifted, its eyes closed. Apparently oblivious to them, its lips moved in a silent invocation. Dannel saw the arrows fired at it veer suddenly upward as they entered the building; clearly some sort of magical ward protected the undead spellcaster.

“Come on!” Eldren said, drawing his sword and rushing forward. The others followed, but Dannel hesitated as he heard a crackling sound, and turned to see a twisting thicket erupt out of the ground in a wide ring around the ruin, encompassing the southern of the two hills within its radius. The wall of thorns rose to at least fifteen feet high, and was so thick that Dannel could not see anything beyond it.

Trapped! he thought.

He had barely started running again when a massive roar filled the clearing. “What now?” he hissed, stumbling and nearly going down. Jannae, a few paces ahead, had fallen, and she clung to the ground. The other elves were likewise affected, abandoning their charge in an effort just to stay on their feet.

Only the lich appeared unaffected, secure within the walls of his shelter. As the tremors eased, Dannel bent to help Jannae, who quickly regained her footing.

“That doesn’t bode well,” she began, and her eyes widened as she caught sight of something behind him.

Dannel turned in time to see the “hill” rise up, tearing itself free of the ground. A sick smell of rot washed over them, a dozen times stronger than before, the foulness of a slaughterhouse floor left abandoned on a hot day. As the elves watched, the top of the mound split into a gaping, jagged maw, and long tentacles appeared from within the bulk of the thing, lashing out at the invaders.

Chapter 485

As the gargantuan ghoulish tendriculos rose up out of the ground, revealing the full insane scale of its form to the elves, Dannel surrounded himself with the magic of his song. Empowered by the expeditious retreat spell, he did exactly that, grabbing Jannae and running swiftly toward the far side of the ruin. One of the tendriculos’s tendrils smacked the ground where the two elves had been standing a heartbeat before, but they were able to make their escape from its reach before it could fully mobilize itself from its entrenched position.

Of course, they could not go very far, given the constraints of the lich’s conjured wall of thorns.

With their main adversary apparently protected against their arrows, Ellene, Aymie and Lyson turned their bows toward this new threat. The elves held their ground and unleashed a potent barrage, but their arrows simply vanished within the incredible bulk of the creature.

Eldren, on recovering his feet focused upon the lich. Charging into the arch that marked the entry of the ruin, he slammed hard into an invisible barrier, and fell back. He cautiously stepped forward and probed the obstacle; while his sword passed through, his hand was blocked by what felt like an utterly smooth, impermeable wall of force.

The lich lowered its arms, and met Eldren’s gaze with its own undying stare.

A scream sounded behind the ranger.

Eldren snarled, and turned back to his companions.

The tendriculos moved ponderously, its own bulk hindering its movements. But its long tendrils gave it an incredible reach, demonstrated as it lashed out and caught up Lyson by the ankles. The elf screamed as the creature lifted it into the air, but the sound died as the fell power of its undead touch froze his muscles. The ghoulish tendriculos lifted the stiffened ranger up above its huge body, and dropped him into its waiting jaws. The elf just disappeared within, vanishing with finality.

“Lyson!” Aymie screamed, unable to do anything to stop it, except to fit a pair of arrows to her bow and fire both into the body of the undead-plant combination. The missiles tore into its body like all the others, but the elves could see that the injuries that it was suffering were quickly closing, healing as the monster regenerated.

“It is vulnerable to blunt weapons!” Eldren shouted, his extensive woodlore including knowledge of such creatures, although he’d never before faced one that was a ghoulish as well as a plant. Such things were... impossible, he would have said, but here they were dealing with the raw power of an out-of-control mythal, and lore that had been ages lost when his great-grandparents had lived.

Mayhap that knowledge, that power, was better lost.

Despite Eldren’s knowledge, the fact was that nearly all of the elves’ weapons inflicted slashing or piercing damage. Eldren improvised, leaping forward as one of the tendrils lashed out at his back, narrowly avoiding a hit and coming up into a roll that brought him within range of the creature’s body. Striking with the flat of his blade, he managed to smack it solidly, crushing the vegetable matter that made up its leathery hide, sending a quiver through the creature’s ample body. Sensitive as it was to such blows, the tendriculos immediately focused its attention upon the ranger, slamming him with both tentacles and rolling forward until it had almost toppled onto him, the huge maw coming around with the rotation of its body, until it could seize the ranger with a single huge bite.

Dannel was running forward, Alakast coming into his hand as he ran, his still-effective spell adding speed to his movements, his boots seeming to barely touch the ground with each preternaturally long stride. Ellene had drawn out her own blades, but Aymie looked uncertain, her skills with her sword inferior to her efficacy with the bow.

“Keep firing, overwhelm its regeneration!” Dannel shouted at them, at all of them, for he knew that Jannae was coming up behind him, and knew that her own sword would be of little use against the massive creature. He spared a glance back at the ruin, wondering why there had been no more magical assault from that quarter. But the arch was empty, the baelnorn gone.

That respite was welcome, but it still left them facing the undead horror.

Eldren slammed the flat of his blade down on the tendriculos's maw as he darted back, the massive opening closing on open air with a grinding snap. The ranger tried to evade, to gain a new position from which to strike, but one of the tendrils slapped him on the leg, knocking him off-balance. The creature took advantage, and wrapped the other tendril around his neck, jerking him back into the waiting opening where Lyson had vanished moments ago. The elf struggled and kicked, somehow summoning the fortitude to resist the paralytic touch of the creature, but he could not avoid being hurled into that dark gap.

Dannel was there an instant later, too late to stop it, but able to lash out with a heavy blow that smacked solidly into its side. The tendriculos, arrows sprouting from its body as Aymie kept up her fire, shifted to face him. He dodged a tentacle that nearly caught him in the forehead like a bullwhip, but a second twined around his left ankle, pulling him roughly down. It started to lift him, but before it could add the arcane archer to its list of swallowed foes Ellene was there, hacking at the dense vines with her swords. Right Sword cut deep into the tendril, which loosened enough to deposit the elf roughly upon the ground.

Jannae arrived a few moments later, eschewing a martial attack for a simple touch attack, unleashing a cure moderate wounds into the monster. The blue glow burned at its hide like fire, and it slammed a tendril across her side, knocking her sprawling—and, unfortunately, overcoming her resistance, paralyzing her.

Dannel, pulling himself back up to his feet, launched an all-out attack at the creature, trying to draw it toward him, and away from the helpless priestess. "We have to get Eldren and Lyson out of there!" Ellene said, hacking at the body of the tendriculos, although the wide gashes she opened began almost immediately to close.

"I know!" Dannel replied. His blows with Alakast were doing damage, but he lacked the sheer destructive power of Lok or Arun. Either of the warriors would have made short work of this foe, the elf thought... but they were not here, so he had to make the best of what he had at hand.

A tendril came sweeping down at him. He saw it coming, and leapt aside... but the creature's maw was coming down again, its huge bulk shifting forward to engulf the elf. He darted out of the way of that bite, but the creature's momentum carried it into him nevertheless, knocking him roughly back. The elf spun and slammed his staff hard into the monster's body, its sick green hide turning gray as the blow destroyed its tissues.

Ellene had dragged Jannae out from under the path of the surging monster, and now rushed in again, her swords at the ready. Aymie continued to fire her bow in a staccato rhythm, the shafts sinking into its body, forcing it to maintain the energy of regenerating the punctures in its body.

Dannel lifted his magical staff again, but a tendril came around and snared the weapon, twisting around the long shaft and one of the arms that held it. The elf felt the sickly chill of paralysis creep into his body through the touch, but gritting his teeth he was able to resist that numbing flow. But even though he retained control over his muscles, he was unable to keep from being lifted off his feet by the creature's incredible strength. For an instant he was hurtling through the air, high above the battlefield, the landscape rushing past his vision in a blur.

And then he was descending, straight toward the open maw that gaped wide to accept him.

Chapter 486

Dannel only had an instant to react. Calling upon his magic, he summoned a feather fall. His descent slowed, although he was only a few strides from the huge opening of the tendriculos's "mouth". The undead plant's maw snapped shut prematurely, sending a gust of air sick with the stench of rot up at the elf. But his respite was momentary, as the creature reared up, lifting the upper half of its body to meet the descending elf, intent on engulfing this prey, one way or another.

There wasn't anywhere for him to go; the spell did not give him control over the direction of his fall. The tendriculos's maw opened wide again, four, six, eight feet across, leaving no option but the dark hole deep within the creature.

Dannel saw the jagged-edged opening clench, and as it started to snap shut, he set Alakast in its path.

The tendriculos's powerful jaws closed on the staff, and Dannel's descent abruptly stopped as the creature impaled itself on both ends of the weapon. One side of the staff sank two feet into its body, while the other caught on a dense ridge of muscular fiber that rimmed the interior of the maw, tearing half of the creature's jaw construction from its moorings. The creature quivered and plunged forward, and Dannel, already gagging from the stench of the monster's insides, could only hang on as it pitched around on its axis, falling for a full second before it came to a sudden and abrupt stop. Dannel was slammed against the insides of its mouth opening, a spongy mass of fibers that oozed greenish sludge. The stuff burned his hands, but the tendriculos had stopped moving, and he was able to get up. Alakast was still wedged into place in its jaws, supporting a narrow opening that he was able to crawl through.

Ellene was there to help him extract himself. It would take more work to recover his weapon, but for the moment, verifying that the creature was indeed dead—well, more dead—seemed more prudent.

"We need to cut into it, get Eldren and Lyson," he began, but Ellene pointed to the side of the creature, where a long gash was visible in its bulbous body. Aymie was helping Eldren, who was covered in the acidic green goo, drag Lyson's limp form through the gap.

"Eldren went at it from the inside while you were slamming at it from without," Ellene said. Her words were barely understandable, her jaw a swollen red mess, but Dannel found her presence a welcome sight. The tendriculos did not appear to be regenerating further, so he glanced back at the ruin, and the empty arch.

"It did not attack us," Ellene said. "Do you think it's waiting in there for us?"

Dannel nodded. He wiped his face, pulling away some of the sticky green muck. Ellene handed him a clean rag, and he nodded in thanks. He felt spent, and for a moment he could not speak.

Eldren came over to him. If he was a mess, the ranger looked like death personified. The flesh of his face, neck, and hands bled freely where the acidic ooze inside the tendriculos had burned it. It was a miracle that he'd been able to resist its paralysis, Dannel thought, but then he saw the fire that burned in the elf's eyes, the determination that had taken on an almost frightening intensity. He walked under his own power, Aymie having gone to help Jannae. Lyson remained where they'd laid him; that he was dead was obvious even before Dannel got a good look at his face.

"Once the paralysis wears off, we will proceed inside," Eldren said.

Dannel found a sudden and irrational anger rise up inside him. "Nice of you to show such concern," he snapped, glancing meaningfully at Jannae.

Eldren's gaze looked like it could have frozen water. "Do not speak of what you know nothing. We are here to complete a task, and that gets first priority—above anything. Everyone here knows that. Lyson knew it, and Caylen, and Jovran, and Oloran, and Dalan, and Yaela. Think of the elves at Korul Ulgor, and think of the same at Aldair Kelalei, and throughout the wood."

Dannel thought of the ranger leaping down to aid his companions against the shamblers, and the way he'd rushed to Jannae's defense against the wraiths. "I spoke hastily," he said. "I think we're all near the limits of endurance."

Eldren took a breath. "We will have to push that limit a little, cousin," he said quietly. Turning, pain evident in every movement, he turned and walked back over to Aymie and Jannae, limping slightly.

They distributed the last of their healing—a few potions, a few cure light wounds from Jannae, once she'd recovered from the tendriculos's paralysis. It was not enough to fully restore the injuries suffered in the battle, but it would have to be enough.

During their preparations nothing stirred from within the ruin.

The five elves gathered before the arch.

"Let's finish this," Eldren said, stepping forward into the ruin.

The transition through the arch was mostly symbolic; the walls of the ruin were irregular and rose barely to chest height at their tallest, so they did not feel that separated from the world outside. The stones that made up the floor near the entry were cracked and seeded with intrusive vegetation, but as they penetrated further inside their condition improved, though still worn by time and exposure. Runes and other designs had once been carved into the floor, it appeared, but now only faint outlines were left.

They continued through other remnants of rooms. At several points they had to detour around massive piles of fallen rubble, including columns up to five feet thick and thirty feet long, now reduced to broken slabs of white marble. Dannel began to think that through some trick of perception the interior of the place had to be bigger than its outward appearance; by his judgment they should have already exited out the rear.

And then they saw the portal up ahead.

It was another arch, but it made the one outside seem feeble by comparison. It was not unduly high, reaching an apex perhaps eight feet above the smooth stones of the floor, but it stretched at least fifteen feet across. The arch was formed of white stone, as pure as new-fallen snow, fashioned into a weave of twisting vines interwoven into a strand about two feet across. The arch stood unsupported, and architecturally should have collapsed under its own weight. They could see the chamber beyond it, yet another unremarkable ruined hall, but there was an odd haze between them, like a bit of heat-mirage rising off of sun-baked pavement.

Jannae reached down and unfastened the clasps on her pouch. Eldren glanced at her, and she nodded.

The elves stepped forward, through the arch. Dannel felt a tingle pass across his skin, followed by a sudden wave of nausea.

He looked around. They were through, and behind them there was the portal, filled with a haze through which he could see the ruins outside. But their immediate surroundings had changed.

The walls were still cracked and uneven, of the same white marble and gray granite of the ruin outside. But the sky, the sun, the soft breeze of the day... all of that was gone, replaced by a neutral gray haze that surrounded the chamber like a translucent dome. Ahead of them broad stone steps led down into a sunken hall, its floor maybe seven or eight feet below their current level, and that was new too.

They walked forward slowly, silently, as if in a dream. Dannel felt a lurching twist that passed through his body... not like a wave of sickness per se, but more like a fundamental wrongness against which his body rebelled. The others felt it too, he could see.

The floor of the hall was covered by smashed pieces of stone of varying shapes and colors. It was as if a frieze on the ceiling had come collapsing down at some point... but above, there was only the gray dome. Amorphous forms on stunted pillars surrounded the hall at even intervals. Perhaps statues once, now all that was left was shattered remnants that might have been feet; it was impossible to tell. Eldren lifted his sword, indicating a wide doorway that lay between two of those figures, through which an odd light emanated.

They pressed on, trying to avoid the loose rock that crunched loudly beneath their boots, elven magic notwithstanding.

The doorway opened quickly onto a long chamber, maybe twenty feet across and twice that in depth. Enough remained of the intricate carvings on the walls to indicate that this room had once been beautiful. But they only noticed that in passing, for their attention was immediately drawn to the center of the room.

The mythal was a dagger-shaped wedge of crystal, about six feet long and a foot thick. It rested on a pair of white marble pillars about four feet off the ground, perpendicular to the doorway, which appeared to be the only way into or out of the chamber. The glow came from it, a yellowish light tainted by the ugly black smear that suffused the center of the crystal, at the top. That taint was projected by the light out upon the ceiling and upper half of the walls, shifting slightly to make it look like creeping black vines were crawling forward across the cracked ancient stone.

“It’s... beautiful... and horrible...” Eldren breathed. For a moment, they were overcome, and could only stand there, watching it.

Something buzzed in the back of Dannel’s mind. He tried to shake it, as it was distracting him from the awesome power of the artifact, but it kept at him, until he suddenly realized what was wrong.

The lich... where is the lich!

He felt rather than heard Jannae coming forward, her hands digging into her pouch. She moved slowly, as if she was underwater, pushing through a flooded grotto. He and Eldren turned at the same moment, looking at her, and so both saw the lich materialize behind her, its bony claw outstretched, rimed in a black aura that echoed the corruptive stain upon the mythal.

“Jannae!” Eldren yelled, willing his body forward, his sword coming up.

Too slowly, too late.

The elf priestess turned and saw the lich. The baelnorn laid its hand upon her face, its long fingers claspng hard upon her temples. Jannae screamed as the lich poured a harm spell into her, and her body contorted in obvious agony before it broke the connection, and she collapsed like child’s doll tossed casually away.

Chapter 487

“You bastard!” Eldren yelled, attacking the lich in an all-out assault. The baelnorn barely seemed to acknowledge him, even as the elf-forged blade tore into his ragged garments and the withered flesh and ancient bones beneath. The ranger’s blows lifted small puffs of dust from the creature’s body that swirled around it from the force of the impacts, but otherwise it was like hacking at one of the marble pillars they’d encountered in the ruin outside.

An arrow caught the lich in the chest, sticking into a bone. Aymie’s hands shook as she reached for another missile. Ellene drew her swords and came at the lich from the side opposite Eldren, using tactics designed against living foes, trying to flank it. The lich did not even turn as her blades caromed uselessly against its torso. Despite its apparent frailty, the lich was insanely durable.

Dannel saw his companions attacking the lich, knew he should be joining them, however futile the assault was. But his gaze was drawn to Jannae, lying broken at his feet. The priestess was still conscious, somehow, and her gaze fixed the arcane archer, drew him to her.

“Take... Weave... only... hope...” she managed to gasp, as he knelt at her side. Her face was a deathly white, and Dannel could see the blue scars where the lich’s fingers had grasped her. Her eyes drifted down, and Dannel followed them to the open pouch she’d dropped when it had struck her down.

He reached for it, but then Jannae screamed, her body contorting as a fountain of bright red blood erupted from her mouth, splattering Dannel’s chest and face with scarlet droplets. Dannel felt to his knees as he felt like something was exploding inside of him, and as he looked up, he saw that the others had been hit equally hard. Eldren staggered back, blood oozing from his nostrils and the corners of his eyes, clutching his gut with his off hand. Aymie had fallen, her hands spasming as she clawed at the stone, her body arched. And Ellene had dropped to one knee, her face clenched as the injuries she’d suffered in the desperate battle against the mohrgs violently reopened, the healing spells undone by the lich’s mass inflict critical wounds spell. Maximized by the mythal, the spell had been devastating.

With a roar, Eldren hurled himself at the lich once more. This time he held his sword reversed, his gloved hands wrapped around the blade, and he drove the heavy pommel down into the center of the lich’s skull. There was a flare of silver light and the lich shifted—slightly, but something ugly burned in the red glow of its eyes as it turned to face the ranger.

Dannel reached out and grabbed the pouch. Jannae was dead... that much was instantly obvious, but they would all join her within moments if he did not act. He drew out the Weave, the device the priestess had spoken of. It felt as light as air, sparkling softly in his hand, like a web of shimmering lace. The entirety of it was small enough to conceal in both of his hands.

Staggering back as the pain shrieked mercilessly through his body, he rushed toward the mythal.

Eldren, his face a gory red mask, lifted his sword to strike again. Ellene had resumed her attacks from the opposite side, hacking at its body. The lich opened its mouth and whispered something, a deadly benediction. The mythal flared, the black tendrils squirmed eagerly, and the two warriors were hurled back as a new wave of agony exploded out from the undead lord, strengthening it even as it stole life from the invaders of its sanctum.

Dannel felt the new surge and nearly crumpled. This one wasn’t as strong as the first, but in his weakened state it was still almost enough to finish him. He wouldn’t survive one more mass inflict, he knew. He heard metal clattering on stone and knew that he was now alone against the lich. But did not turn, leaping forward, letting the Weave come open in his hands as he rushed at the mythal.

“NO!” came a voice, sepulchral, filling his mind. But he defied it, and swept the diaphanous blanket over the surface of the artifact.

Something hard slammed into him from behind. He was blasted roughly across the room, his flight interrupted by the sudden arrival of the far wall. He hit hard, and slumped down, only partially conscious. Later, he would not be able to clearly distinguish what had been real, and what had been an illusion of his battered mind.

The light from the mythal had brightened, but filtered by the Weave, it was now a soft golden glow that filled the vault with warmth. The lich was still there, standing like a grim harbinger of death over the motionless bodies of his friends.

But they were no longer alone.

The golden light shone on the translucent forms of at least a dozen elves, standing close along the walls of the chamber, the ancient reliefs showing through their insubstantial bodies. They were of varied gender, all showing the signs of age that for an elf meant they were truly venerable. They wore elaborate robes that drifted around their bodies, as though a faint wind stirred in whatever reality they existed.

The lich looked upon them, something flashing in its burning eyes—grief? Regret? Anger? Dannel could not tell, the baelnorn’s emotions unreadable in the alien nature of its eternal existence.

“I have failed,” it said, its voice scratching through its desiccated throat.

The ghostly elves spoke, their voices sounding in Dannel’s mind. He could not tell which of them was speaking at any given moment, but the voices sounded slightly different, though all of the words resonated with power and ancient wisdom.

Yes, Aladir Ardan.

But not through a lack of dedication to your task.

You have been led astray, corrupted by the faltering of the power you warded.

But your line has remained true.

Your error has been redeemed by sacrifice.

Now is the time for your long service to come to an end. Your rest has been well-earned.

Two of the elven spirits detached from the wall and approached the lich. The undead creature did not react to them, but as their ephemeral fingers brushed its face, the unholy glow of its eyes softened, replaced by a soft gray light that felt like the sadness of a rainy day. Dannel felt a pang as the lich’s head turned slowly to face him.

“I am sorry,” it said. “I...”

Dannel managed to shake his head. Tears streamed down his cheeks. What could he say? He thought of the death he’d seen since returning to the Wealdath, of his companions, torn to pieces. All for—a mistake?

The lich nodded, as if sensing the elf’s feelings, knowing that forgiveness could not be granted, accepting what could not be changed.

The spirits drew back, and the baelnorn’s body began to grow insubstantial. “Wait!” Dannel said. “Jannae... the others...”

Your kinsmen and the other warriors yet live, and shall go on.

The priestess has been accepted to the bosom of the goddess.

Dannel had known the truth of Jannae’s fate, but he still could not stifle a sob that clenched at his chest at the spirit’s words.

We are not the gods, child. We can only shape what is, what not was, or will be.

Dannel lowered his head, overcome, his battered body fighting him as he struggled to remain above the crest of the black wave that threatened to overcome his awareness.

What now, then? he thought.

You will go on, the voice said in his mind, gently, he thought.

A loud crack surprised him, drew him back to full awareness, and his head shot up.

The vault was again quiet, dark. The spirits, and the baelnorn, were gone, and he could just make out the shadowy outlines of his prone companions—and the body of Jannae—in the near darkness. But his attention was drawn to the middle of the room. He knew what he would see there even as his eyes adjusted to the dark sufficiently to make out the altered outline of the mythal, now lying broken between the two pedestals, the remains of the elven weave still draped over it.

Grimacing at the pain that shot through his body at the movement, he started to crawl toward his fallen companions.

Chapter 488

The soft whisper of the arrows in flight knifed through the forest clearing, each followed by the more substantial “THWACK!” as the missiles buried themselves into the makeshift target in the cleft bole of the dead tree. The arrows, slender practice shafts with weighted nubs for heads, all lay within a tight cluster, close enough so that one could have encircled them all within the ring of a thumb and forefinger.

Sixty yards away, Dannel lowered his bow, letting the song fade away, welcoming the brief pang of regret that always accompanied its withdrawal. The bow felt... right in his hand, although it had a less than elegant look to it, and it certainly could not be judged a masterwork weapon. It had a strong pull to it, enough to test the arcane archer's strength. It was the first bow he had made from scratch. He'd been studying the bowyer's craft for some time, and had even begun a few test weapons, but with the frantic pace of events that he'd been caught up in over the last few months, there had not been an opportunity to complete his work. Upon returning from Bryth'an Torgul he'd thrown himself into the manufacture of the bow he now held, embracing the distraction from memory and still-fresh wounds that he'd brought back from that journey into the deep wood.

"A fine effort," a voice said behind him. He'd been so distracted that he started slightly, even though Eldren had not been actively trying to sneak up on him.

"I am sorry if I am intruding upon your quiet," the ranger said.

"No, please," Dannel said, gesturing to the space beside him. He started to unstring the bow, but Eldren forestalled him. "May I?"

Dannel handed him the bow, which the ranger examined with an expert eye. Eldren, he knew, was a master bowyer. "Not bad," he said, finally, after running his hands along the shaft and testing the pull.

"You are too generous."

Eldren peered at the distant target, where the knot of arrows was dimly visible in the shadows of the broken trunk. "Even the best craftsman cannot work well with an inferior tool," he said, handing the bow back. "If you like, I could show you a few tricks. You've picked up some talents out there in the wider world, but we elves of the Wealdath still have a few particular talents that are our own."

"I would enjoy that opportunity."

For a moment, the two elves stood there in silence. Dannel unstrung and checked the bow before laying it against the trunk of a nearby tree. There was a fallen log nearby, and he leaned against it, wrapping his arms across his body. After a moment, his cousin joined him.

"You'll be leaving soon," Eldren finally said.

"I have... obligations," Dannel said. "An oath made to friends."

"Friendship is important," the ranger replied.

"And family as well."

Eldren nodded. "I know that Ellene would be pleased, if you should decide to return."

Dannel looked up at the long shafts of the trees rising up around him. “Since I’ve been back... I’ve come to realize how much of this place is still with me, has always been a part of me.”

“Jannae said that the forest and its life were in the blood of our people, and that our hearts beat in tune to its pattern.”

Dannel looked over at his cousin. “I miss her, too.” He squashed a feeling of regret that came over him. They had spoken, once, about raising the priestess, but Eldren had dismissed the idea. Dannel knew the customs of his people, who saw death as a natural transition to another stage of life. But more than that, Jannae had made her own wishes clear on the subject, and whatever he felt about her, Dannel had to respect that.

But he knew his cousin well enough to know that despite all that, the wound caused by Jannae’s death would not heal swiftly for his cousin.

“So, the magic you command is fairly impressive,” Eldren said, after another long silence. Toying with the shaft of his own longbow—a masterwork weapon also crafted by his own hands—he continued, “I wonder how your skills are without it?”

Dannel managed a soft smile. “Three flights of four?”

The ranger stood, and extended a full quiver of arrows. “Let us see, then,” he said, drawing out a handful of shafts.

INTERLUDE

Chapter 489

Benzan ran through a tortured iron landscape, his breath searing his lungs, his heart pounding angrily in his chest. Above him stretched a wild gray sky, occasionally populated by distant blockish objects that were just slightly too misshapen to be moons or planets, but were too indistinct to clearly identify. Around him the ground was the same dull metallic gray of old swords and battered shields, a comparison reinforced by the actual presence of old broken weapons found in ugly heaps with more than casual frequency. Occasionally a bone could be seen to accompany the discards, but for the most part it was as if the landscape were the dumping ground of some mad blacksmith who produced enough excess for a hundred armies.

The ground was uneven, and frequently erupted in jagged openings rimmed by razor-sharp projections of rough raw iron. There were forests, too, leaning shafts of metal rising up out of the plain before sprouting into dozens of branches that likewise often culminated in a dangerously sharp point that seemed poised to impale the unwary traveler.

In all, it was a landscape of peril and threat, devoid of color and life.

The tiefling came to a halt before a wall of the uneven iron trees, blocking his path. As he fought for regain his breath he glanced back over his shoulder. He was fleeing... what?

He felt disoriented. He knew that something was chasing him, had been pursuing him, and if it caught him, he would be dead. He had to keep running...

Yet he hesitated, for a moment.

He glanced down, lifted his arms to examine the familiar bracers, the heavy leather gloves, the shimmering links of his mithral armor. He felt a familiar presence at his hip, and ran the fingers of his left hand along the hilt of his sword, the old familiar weapon, its bronze blade crafted in an archaic style on another world, but empowered with a magic that had saved his life more than once...

Benzan frowned. Something... wasn't right. The sword was familiar, but there was something... missing. He tried to remember what it was, tried to concentrate, but the effort only created a buzzing in his head that quickly threatened to explode into a full-out headache.

In any case, the effort was interrupted by a familiar sound behind him. Instinct overcame his confusion, and he hurled himself aside just as the familiar rush of noise and heat from a fireball blossomed near the point where he had been standing.

Danger overcame prudence, and he rushed forward, into the thicket of iron trees. Deadly spikes passed inches from his body as he negotiated the initial boundary at a speed that was purely reckless, but the risk proved valuable as a second blast sounded behind him among the trees. This one erupted not in orange flame, but a thunderous pulse of sonic energy that tore through the trees mercilessly, filling the air with fragments that formed deadly projectiles. One stabbed deep into his shoulder, and the tiefling bit back a cry of pain as he staggered and nearly fell into a thicket of needle-like spikes that rose up into his path as if it had been waiting for him to falter. He leapt over the obstacle, and kept running, his head ringing from the vibrations of the blast.

He plunged recklessly forward, and saw that the forest began to thin out ahead. He emerged from the thicket and stopped, his breath rasping in his chest, the pain in his shoulder stabbing deeper with each gasp of precious air.

Ahead of him the ground dropped off abruptly, a cliff that formed a precise line exactly perpendicular to his direction of travel. Warily he came forward, until he could see that the drop was a sheer one descending as far as he could see, until a flash of vertigo drew him back. It was as if the world had suddenly just... ended, here.

A preternatural whisper of danger drew his attention around, to the threat that would have him ended, as well.

He saw the figure approaching, flying over the forest of iron trees. He started to rush for cover, but his hunter already had his arms extended, and as Benzan ran he unleashed a blast of focused sonic energy that impacted Benzan high upon his right shoulder. The tiefling screamed at the pulsing wave tore pounded through his body, ripping and tearing at the tissues beneath the flesh as it passed. Nearly blinded by the intensity of the pain, he staggered forward back into the thicket of iron spikes and twisted forms, disappearing from view.

Malad dropped easily down to the ground, the shifting black aura of death armor enfolding his body, augmented by the translucent field of a shield spell. As his bare feet touched upon the rough iron, he conjured a thunderlance that shone in his hand like a wedge of white flame. He held the magical weapon with easy familiarity, born of over a decade of constant struggle against demons, devils, and other unholy monstrosities in the gore-filled trenches of the Blood War. The light flickered dully on the hard iron shells that surrounded him, casting menacing shadows through the area. As he finished his casting, the skirt of shimmering metallic scales drawn around his hips swelled and grew across his torso, spreading out across his upper arms until he was clad in a form-fitting hauberk that moved with his easy motions, like a second skin or a dragon's scaly hide.

The corrupted sorcerer moved forward, the burning lance probing ahead. As he moved into the outer edges of the forest, however, darkness seemed to gather around him, as though the iron trees themselves were calling forth night in this place without sun, moons, or stars.

"Darkness will not conceal you from me, Benzan," Malad said, his senses fully alert to the hunt. "You are my final test, and I will not be denied the power that is rightfully mine."

He saw the shadows shift slightly ahead and to his left, and drew upon his magic. But Synesyx sensed the trap before he did, caught the faint scrape of leather upon the ground that betrayed his quarry. Malad spun, but before he could hurl another sonically-substituted fireball a sharp pain tore into his right side. Glancing down, the sorcerer saw the jagged edge of an old, broken blade jutting from his torso.

And then his prey was upon him, his bronze longsword catching the light from his thunderlance. Malad darted back, twisting away from the path of the cutting blade. The edge of the sword caught on the scales protecting his body, but Synesyx easily turned the attack, and Malad felt only a slight sting through the excellent protection provided by his magical armor. Sneering, the sorcerer lifted his thunderlance, driving it with his magically-enhanced strength deep into his foe's shoulder—the same one he'd blasted with his sonic ray. The mithral links of Benzan's armor parted before the driving power of the energy-lance, and a jet of blood erupted from the vicious wound. The agonized cry torn from his enemy was quite rewarding.

Malad smiled as the two foes broke apart, warily facing each other. Malad had the advantage of reach with his long weapon, and his adversary was more seriously injured. But the demonspawn sorcerer seemed to be in little rush, now that he'd brought his enemy to bay. The wound in his side continued to ooze blood, but Synesyx rippled against the uneven length of the improvised weapon, forcing it out of the wound as the magical armor closed again over Malad's torso. The bloody shaft clattered against the ground, splattering droplets of bright red blood around the sorcerer's feet.

"Why are you doing this?" Benzan said, his sword up in a defensive position. The effort involved in that was instantly obvious in his face. "Are you another of Graz'zt's pawns?"

"Thrall' is the word you are looking for," Malad replied with a broad smile. "And I am one of the greatest in His service."

“A slave with special titles and privileges is still a slave,” Benzan spat.

“You know nothing, little man,” the sorcerer began, but he was cut off as Benzan suddenly lunged forward, his sword sweeping around in a wide sweep toward Malad’s throat. Synesyx flared, the metal scales of the sentient suit rising up to protect its master, but Malad reacted faster, his thunderlance flicking almost casually into Benzan’s forehead as the tiefling entered his reach. Benzan went down, dropping his sword as he clutched at the gaping wound that spurted blood into his eyes, blinding him. For a long moment Malad merely watched the suffering man, something dark shining in his eyes.

“Go ahead, finish it,” Benzan finally said, kneeling, his face a bloody mask as he looked up. “None of this is real... or if it is, then you have the power to destroy me anyway. Either way, I am tired of playing Graz’zt’s game.”

Malad dipped the end of the thunderlance under Benzan’s chin, forcing the tiefling up with enough pressure to sear the flesh of his jaw, filling the tiny clearing with a sick stench.

“Does that feel real?” he asked, chuckling as his foe’s body stiffened. “Reality is itself an illusion, Benzan. This place, Acheron, it is real enough, in that it responds to our presence. These iron trees, if we are careless, they can cut our flesh. My weapon burns you, my spells can inflict damage and pain. Yet in the ultimate calculation, this power is but fleeting.”

“The torture’s bad enough without the lecture,” Benzan said, spitting a fat gob of blood to the side.

Malad smiled. “You would learn this lesson soon enough, but I will share it with you anyway.” He came closer, the length of the thunderlance shortening so that its point remained focused upon the tiefling’s throat. Leaning close, he hissed, “What we perceive is the real reality, Benzan. And power, real power, is the ability to shape the perceptions of others. You can force someone to do your will—that is easy enough, especially when you are surrounded by demons your entire life. Likewise, you can employ magic to cloud an enemy’s mind, bend their will to yours. That is the track that Athux uses; but that, too, is ultimately just a crude bludgeon.”

“No, what power is, that is real control. Not the simple tools of emotion—fear, lust, greed. No, the truth of what Graz’zt represents—what all of the great Powers represent—is shaping reality by controlling the very perceptions of us all.”

“Have you ever thought about religion, Benzan? No, I don’t suppose you have, much; you have known clerics, but never really comprehended their dedication to their causes, to their gods. The truly dedicated, they are the ones who prove the point of my argument. You and I are much alike, in that we have both been outsiders in our respective societies.”

“Your ramblings are getting a trifle hard to follow,” Benzan sneered. The tip of the thunderlance flickered, slightly, opening a new runnel of red down the tiefling’s throat, but then the iron control returned. Abruptly, the magical weapon vanished, and Malad kicked Benzan solidly in the chest. The tiefling fell back, dimly aware of pain in his back as sharp spines of the iron bushes behind him pierced the links of his mail and penetrated his flesh. He couldn't move, could only lie there, a red haze settling over his vision.

"I can see why the Prince is so aggravated by you," the sorcerer said. "But I am still glad that we met."

"Not... mutual..."

"I understand that you any my father had your differences, as well."

Benzan said nothing, but Malad could see that he'd gotten his attention.

"Oh, you cannot say you hadn't wondered," Malad continued. "One will produce a scion, that will prove the bane of nations..."

"How... do you know... how could you know..."

"My father shared everything he knew, in his time with us." Malad's lips twisted in an evil smile. "Shared rather more than that, indeed." He leaned forward so that all Benzan could see was the upper body of the other tiefling, the stark iron branches of the surrounding trees forming a hazy backdrop behind him, out of focus for his fading eyes. "I know a great deal about you, Benzan. Know what you desire, what you fear... and what you love."

Benzan lashed out, but the spines piercing his back held him, and he could only manage a feeble grab that ended with his fingers inches from his enemy's throat.

"You are strong in your passions. That's too bad... for you."

He turned away. All Benzan could see now was the vague outlines of the branches, a gray web that resembled the bars of a prison. But his other senses could still feel the sorcerer, nearby... and others, now, dark shadows creeping closer.

"And now, we begin."

Benzan began to slip away, but the last thing he heard was Malad's chuckle, and a spoken command.

"Bring him."

Chapter 490

The dwarf stood like a pillar as the traffic on the edge of the busy street flowed around him, pedestrians barely sparing a look for the oddly-dressed figure. He was clad in a suit of gold-chased half-plate that was partially covered by a heavy linen mantle bearing prominently the sigil of an anvil and hammer in silver thread. He was a gold dwarf of the Great Rift by his coloration, his skin the dark brown of freshly tilled earth.

He stood in front of a building that was obviously a tavern by the look of it, and by the expression on the dwarf's face he was not pleased by either the smell, the noise emitting from within, or perhaps its very existence upon the face of the earth. But the information he'd been given placed his objective within, so after a moment, he adjusted the huge warhammer slung across his back (where it kept company with a large steel shield, a massive full helm, and considerable traveler's pack), and stepped inside.

The dwarf's appearance drew some curious attention from the tavern's patrons, but here in Cauldron the unusual made for casual fare, and most returned to their prior activities within a few moments. One who didn't was the man who nodded to the dwarf as he crossed the room to stand before his table.

The conversation was brief and to the point. What he learned was similar to the other bits of information that the dwarf had spent the better part of the day collecting, since his arrival in Cauldron that morning. He'd spoken to about a dozen people, mostly tall, lanky humans, most he'd sought out, a few who'd offered a few casual words of their own initiative upon seeing him and the symbol he wore on his breast.

"Goldenshield? Yeah, he's that pal'erдин o' Mordan, ain't he? Hey, 'e's got that same simber on 'is jacket, yer guys related?"

"You are a priest of Moradin, aren't you? I am honored, sir, but I have only been a member of the Hammers for a few tendays, since right after the Catastrophe. Are you a retainer of Lord Goldenshield? I... hey, where are you going?"

"Arun? Yeah, he's a damned wonder, right like. Did you know he saved my sister once? During the Troubles, damned demon would'a tore her to pieces ere that dwarf come along. Cut the damned thing in half with that damned holy sword of his. Damn, we're lucky to have him..."

"Well, don't tell anyone I told you this, but my sister's got a friend whose cousin is an acolyte in the Temple of Helm, and she says that Arun and Beorna are going to get married, and fuse the two temples together! They're such a cute couple... Isn't that great news?"

"If you ask me, they should make him the mayor. That Taskerhill guy, he gives me the creeps, what with them beady eyes of his. Them merchants just care about making money; hells, we wouldn't even have a town if it weren't for the Heroes of Cauldron."

"Well, the Hammers can be a bit heavy-handed, but I'm not one to complain. Better than those damned half-orcs, by a fair margin. And hey, I'll put a few coins in to the collection box for the Anvil as ready as for the Gauntlet... heck, Cauldron can use another patron god, ever since the Kelemvorites damn-near destroyed the town."

"You want the dwarf temple? It be up on Obsidian Avenue, near the north gate..."

Umbar Ironhammer looked up at the notable structure he'd been directed to. From the outside it looked moderately impressive, a solid temple building of undressed stone adjoined by a walled courtyard and what appeared to be a rectory and stables. The temple had sustained obvious damage, with the arched portico above the entry stairs sundered and open to the sky above. It looked as though it had been hit with a trebuchet stone, the dwarf thought. From what he'd seen of the rest of the human city, it was surprising that it hadn't suffered more damage.

He approached, marking the obvious sigils of the human god Helm; he looked for other indicators, but saw none. The doors had clearly been recently repaired. He did not bother to knock, but pushed the left portal open and entered.

The temple was quiet; there were a few humans about, engaged in quiet prayer in the pews that flanked the central aisle down the middle of the structure. None noted his entry. He made his way down the aisle toward the sanctum, separated from the worship area of the church by a polished wooden railing. There was a white cloth bearing the sigil of Helm above the plain marble altar, and few other decorations; in all, the temple had a starkness to it that appealed to the dwarf's sensibilities.

But Umbar was not here for a study of human religions.

As he reached the opening in the divider, his armor clanking slightly with each step, a white-clad acolyte emerged from the curtained arch that presumably led to the sacristy. She looked barely old enough to be considered an adult by human standards, but she bowed respectfully to the dwarf. "Can I be of assistance, sir?"

The dwarf fixed her with a stern expression. "Bring Arun Goldenshield to me."

The girl's eyes widened slightly, but she retained her equilibrium as she shook her head slightly. By Moradin's hammer, she looks like a slight breeze will carry her off, the dwarf thought. I thought Helm's was a martial sect? But he kept his feelings hidden beneath the wrinkled exterior of his face.

"I am sorry, sir, but Lord Goldenshield is not available at the moment. If you'd like, I can take a message for you, or if you'd prefer to wait..." She trailed off at the intensity of the dwarf's frown; that look had caused veteran warriors to quaver, so it wasn't a mark against her that it had an effect.

As she tried to rally, Umbar's attention was drawn to the side, where the door to the courtyard opened and another dwarf appeared.

"Ah, Shirl, glad ye be 'ere. I be needin' another load a concrete a'fer..."

The dwarf stopped as he caught sight of Umbar.

The newcomer was obviously a shield dwarf, although his much paler skin was barely visible under the thicket of tangled hair and the truly chaotic beard that exploded from the lower half of his face. Umbar frowned as the dwarf's unkempt appearance, but the dwarf's only reaction was a scowl in response as he felt himself being judged. The dwarf was clad in a simple workman's tunic that bore several noticeable stains, and he wore a leather harness weighed down with what Umbar recognized as stoneworking tools, likewise marked with signs of recent use.

One of Goldenshield's 'followers', no doubt, Umbar thought, his frown deepening. He could not resist saying, "Do all your folk show equal disrespect to the servants of the All-Father?" he asked.

The dwarf's lips twisted, as though he wanted to spit, but was resisting the urge. "Praise the Anvil," he said, making a fist. "Now, whaddaya want? Arun didn't say nothin' 'bout no cleric comin' by, but I guess we ken be usin' the 'elp. Been a few outbreaks o' sickness in the city, o' late, ken ye cast remove disease?"

Umbar was barely able to conceal his outrage at the dwarf's presumption; as it was his hands tightened into fists. "Where is Arun Goldenshield?" he said, in a voice that brooked no delay in reply.

But the dwarf appeared to be in no hurry. "What be yer business with 'im?"

Umbar came forward. "While human customs are often different, it is not my custom to discuss church matters with an outside audience." The other dwarf glanced at the worshippers, who indeed had taken a decided interest in the proceedings, although a few were still pretending to be engrossed in their private prayers, their eyes dropping quickly as the dwarf looked at them.

"Arright, yer lordship, come on then," the dwarf said. To the human girl, he said, "Shirl, be sure to put in that order fer the concrete." Then he departed back into the courtyard, the gold dwarf cleric not far behind.

She seemed grateful to watch them leave.

The private chapel in the back of the rectory had clearly been created as a human place of worship. The short benches of polished wood looked far more comfortable than the plain stone seats Umbar was accustomed to, and there was even a bar of wood across the floor in front of the compact altar—presumably for the human priest to kneel upon when prostrating himself before his god. Again there was not an excess of decoration, with small figures of Helm in the warrior aspect along the walls... but here, Umbar quickly saw, there had been additions; a definite emblem in silver above the generic altar, the familiar anvil-and-hammer sigil that the priest wore upon his own breast.

The man he had come to see was kneeling—upon the stone, not the wooden slat—in the small open space before the altar. His head was bowed, with one fist laid flat upon the ground before him, the other holding a longsword point-down against the stone beside him. A brilliant white glow shone around the weapon, surrounding the praying warrior with a bright nimbus of radiated light. He wore a simple tunic of gray cloth fit neatly to the considerable muscles of his squat frame, and beneath the evenly-trimmed brown hair his skin was a nearly identical shade as that of the priest of Moradin.

The entry of the cleric and his escort had not been silent; the praying dwarf heard them and turned around. He was clean-shaven, Umbar saw, but also prominent was the same sigil so evident upon the far wall of the chapel, captured in a plain iron disk that the dwarf wore as an amulet upon his chest. When he caught sight of the priest, surprise was visible in his eyes.

Arun rose. Even without his armor, with the holy avenger blazing in his hand he cast a picture of a holy knight, ready to smite down evil.

“Prelate Ironhammer,” Arun said, inclining his head in the customary dwarvish bow.

“Yer know this feller then?” Hodge said.

The priest ignored him, fixing his full attention upon Arun. “My title has changed. I am here in my function as Inquisitor.”

Arun’s brow tightened, but he merely nodded. He seemed to realize that he was still holding his sword bare in his hand; he reached over to the nearby bench and recovered the scabbard, sliding the blade home. Its absence seemed to cast the chapel back into gloom, the late afternoon light struggling through the narrow windows that faced away from the direction of the setting sun.

The cleric drew out a small parchment scroll, bound with strips of leather, and sealed by a dark gob of wax marked with an oval sigil as broad as a thumbprint. Arun took it without comment, his eyes cold.

“Arun Goldenshield,” the priest said, “It is my duty to hold you for an inquisitorial hearing, into violations conducted against the terms of your exile, and against the doctrines of the Faith of our people.”

“Violations? What are ye talkin’ about, man?” Hodge said.

“Hodge, please,” Arun said softly.

But the priest acknowledged this question. “The charges are detailed in the document you have just received, but they include: violation of the terms of exile, to wit, claiming the title of a paladin of the All-Father, and public misrepresentation to that purpose. The inculcation of personal followers who are not only non-dwarves, but are not properly initiated servants of the Faith. Doctrinal heresy, specifically the merger of worship and doctrine of the Faith with elements of a... human religion.”

Hodge’s mouth dropped, but Arun kept his reaction to the news hidden, although something flared in his eyes at the priest’s words. He only said, however, “I understand.”

“I am the representative of the Council here,” Umbar said. “This will be a hearing only, subject to the dictates of the Law. I will make the determination of whether you are to be bound and returned to the Rift for presentation to the full Council and the Inquisitorial Court.”

“Very well. Then I submit myself to the judgment of the Inquisitorial Council.”

Hodge looked about to say something, but Arun silenced him with a look. Umbar extended his hand. Arun looked at him for a long moment, silent; then, slowly, he reached up, and withdrew the symbol upon his chest, the icon he'd carried with him into battle since his arrival in Cauldron. He handed it to Umbar, who took it and placed it into a small pouch at his belt.

Chapter 491

"This is insane."

Beorna paced back and forth across the small room that served as Arun's quarters, her heavy boots making a loud clatter against the thick wooden floorboards. She was not clad in her heavy adamantine armor, but even in her robe she could not appear as anything other than the warrior that she was.

Arun, by contrast, stood calmly by the plain rack that held his armor and sword, on the far side of the room, his hands folded across his chest. "You know about my past," Arun said.

Beorna made a dismissive slashing gesture with her hand. "Bah, so you wouldn't slaughter innocents... But that has nothing to do with this. You are a paladin, you've been fighting on the front lines of the battle against evil nonstop for the last year! How anyone could doubt that is... it's... insane!"

Arun sighed. "From what I've learned about Helm and his church, you do not do things all that differently. The Law..."

"I know about the Law! I'm a templar... I've served on tribunals of inquisition! But we aren't so bound by blind tradition that we ignore reality that is starkly clear..."

She trailed off, frowning. The fact was, she could remember several cases where just that had happened. She herself had been caught in that trap, the danger of all those who followed a strict code, and who tended to rely on that code rather than confront difficult situations where nuance trumped clean and easy solutions. But she wasn't going to let that change what was so blatantly wrong about the current situation.

Snorting, she started pacing again. "So. What happens, if you are indicted? Are you just going to go with this cleric back to the Rift, surrender yourself for trial, a thousand miles away? Walk away from all we've done here, from what still needs to be done?" Her voice cracked slightly with the last sentence, and she turned away for a moment, disgusted at herself for letting her feelings undermine her argument. Arun pretended not to notice, and she pretended not to thank him for it.

"It is highly unlikely that I would be ordered back to the Rift. My return would be... problematic, and the Inquisitor is perfectly able to pronounce and implement the sentence, should I be found guilty of the charges."

Beorna turned back toward him, frowning. “I admit that I do not know enough of the details of the All-Father’s doctrine to know this, but what are we talking about here, in terms of penalty?”

“A mark of justice, combined with an outright prohibition on wearing the icons of Moradin or his church, or claiming leadership therein. Possibly a public lashing. In a dwarven community, that would be naked, but I do not know how the law would be applied within a mixed-race community such as Cauldron.”

“Oh, Taskerhill would probably sell tickets,” Beorna drawled.

“I am sorry that you have to be involved in this,” Arun said. “This is my burden, not yours, and a public hearing could bring shame upon the Temple of Helm.”

Beorna came over to him. “Now you’re just being an idiot,” she said. “This foolishness is no fault of yours, even a child could see that. Whatever happens—whatever!—we will face it together.”

“Beorna—“

“Do not challenge me on this! I have your oath, do not forget, and while this fool cleric may doubt your word, I know better.” She took his hand, crushed it in hers, lifted it to her lips and brushed it with them. Then, as if embarrassed by the action, she released him and stepped back.

“The matter is settled, then. I have a meeting with that blasted Taskerhill, I’m already late for it. But tonight, we will have dinner, and discuss your defense at this hearing. Assuming you weren’t planning on playing at a martyr and meekly accepting the judgment of this Umbar Ironhammer.”

“I may be many things, but meek is not one of them,” Arun said.

“Good, because I cannot stand milksops.”

She started toward the door, but as she reached it she turned back to him. “I know that you know this, Arun, but it is the man, not the symbol, that is important.”

“I know, Beorna.”

She nodded, and departed. She was already thinking about the unpleasantness likely to occur during her meeting with Taskerhill, so she nearly collided into Umbar Ironhammer in the hall outside. Arun, unfailingly polite, had offered the priest lodging on the temple grounds, and while Beorna did not feel particularly hospitable toward the gold dwarf, she was compelled to recognize the respect due his office. The cleric no longer wore his full plate armor, but the tunic he wore still bulged with the presence of at least a shirt of chain links beneath. The sigil of Moradin was still featured prominently upon the garment, spreading across his chest.

“Templar,” the priest said, with a curt nod.

Beorna did not trust her voice, so replied only with a nod so abbreviated that it could almost have been perceived as an insult. The corridor was narrow enough to make it difficult for the two to pass each other easily, but after a moment the cleric of Moradin turned aside, letting her depart. Her boots made a loud clatter as she stormed away, expressing her displeasure at the unplanned encounter.

Umbar glanced after her, then continued to the door through which she'd appeared. He rapped upon it.

"Come in."

He opened the door to find Arun seated at the compact desk arrayed in a corner of the plain chamber. The warrior quickly rose and bent his head in the traditional gesture of respect.

"I am not here in my official capacity," he said. "I know that the hour is late, but I wished to speak to you."

"I am at your disposal, Inquisitor," Arun said, indicating the only other chair in the room, a simple three-legged stool that looked sturdy enough to support the muscled dwarf. But the dwarf remained standing, crossing to the armor rack where Arun's magical platemail shone in the light of the room's single oil lamp. The breastplate bore prominently the mark of the anvil and hammer, and the cleric's gaze lingered on that sigil.

"The armor was a gift from the Temple of Helm," Arun said.

"It is a fine suit." The cleric turned his attention to the scabbarded longsword placed in the slots atop the rack. "You once wielded the warhammer, as I recall."

"In the struggle against evil, I have made use of the weapons that have come to me. The sword is a holy avenger," Arun said. "It has proven a great ally."

Umbar reached for the weapon, after directing a glance at Arun for permission. No matter what their respective statuses, it was still a great insult to take a warrior's weapon without leave. Arun nodded, and the cleric drew the weapon, examining the blade in the light of the lamp, as it did not radiate its usual glow in his hands.

"I have not had the fortune of handling such a weapon," he said finally, replacing the weapon in its holder. "The mark upon the blade... the sigil of the human god Lathander, is it not?"

Arun nodded. "We found it in the hands of an evil cult that had headquartered in the tunnels beneath the city. They were intent upon the destruction of Cauldron, and the facilitation of a permanent gate between Faerûn and Carceri."

"So I have heard," Umbar said.

"I can prepare a written overview of recent events, from my perspective, for the record, if you wish."

Umbar shook his head. "I am certain that all of that will be addressed in sufficient detail in the hearing." In an odd parallel to Beorna's actions earlier, he turned and strode across the small room, pausing near the door, looking away from him. "Your actions have created no small amount of disruption within the leadership of the Rift," he finally said.

"I have always tried to follow the dictates of our faith, as dictated by my conscience and my best judgment," Arun said.

The inquisitor snorted, and turned. For the first time, some hint of emotion was visible on his face. "This isn't some chaotic elf-faith, Goldenshield! Our religion is based upon rules, and order. The dictates of your 'conscience' have no bearing upon this matter, but rather the violations of our code, and the defiance of ecclesiastical law, that you have perpetuated."

"It would seem that I have already been judged," Arun said, quietly.

"You will receive a fair hearing according to the letter of the Law," Umbar intoned.

"Perhaps I should reserve any further comments for that event," Arun said.

"I do not wish to be your enemy, Goldenshield. It is not my intent to try you again for the sins of the past. My responsibility now is to my office."

"I have never expected any less of you, Inquisitor. Yours was not the deciding vote for my exile..."

"But I voted in favor nevertheless," the cleric finished for him. "I hope you understand why it was done."

"I accepted the judgment. And I will accept any lingering consequences of my actions."

The two dwaves stood there for a long moment, facing each other in a silent confrontation of wills. Finally, Umbar opened his mouth to speak, but his words were distracted by the sound of a commotion in the hall outside. The noise of hasty footsteps was followed by an equally abrupt patter of knuckles on the door.

"Lord Goldenshield!" came a muffled voice through the portal. "Lord Goldenshield, forgive the intrusion, I know it's late, but there's trouble in the city..."

Arun came forward, waiting for Umbar to step back to provide access to the door. The cleric's expression had hardened again into a stony commentary of disapproval as Arun drew the latch and opened the door to reveal an agitated young human, clad in the blue livery of the Hammers. He glanced at Umbar, momentarily uncertain.

"What is it, Caleph?" Arun asked.

“There’s reports of an attack, near the river chasm,” the young man said quickly. “No one’s really sure who it was, but it seems that several people have been abducted... they just vanished!”

Chapter 492

Arun knelt beside the body, covered in a dark cloak that seemed an amorphous gray in the weak light. Even before he drew back the covering, he knew what he would find; he’d grown accustomed to the feeling of death.

The victim was a young man, in his early twenties by the look of him, with the stubble of several days on his cheeks and his raven hair flying unkept around his head. The cause of death was instantly apparent; there was an obvious dent where his skull had been bashed in. There was very little blood, but it was likely he had been killed instantly by the blow.

Droplets of water fell around them. A light rain had started up on their walk across the town to this place, and the remnants of the roof of the ruined building provided only a nominal protection against the elements. In addition to the omnipresent mustiness there were other odors that suggested that a number of people had called the partially-collapsed warehouse as a home.

“There were no signs of the other residents?” Arun asked.

The Watch sergeant hovering behind him shook his head, then belatedly realized that Arun couldn’t see him. “No, sir. The witnesses we talked to said they heard sounds of a struggle; one old woman who’s been staying in another of these condemned shells nearby said she saw some shadowy figures heading out into the night, toward the chasm, but couldn’t provide any details. She and the other witnesses have been taken to the town hall for statements; if you like I can have them made available to you.”

Arun nodded, but for now they needed to see if anything could be found here. It would not be easy; the wet, booted feet of the guardsmen who’d initially come upon the scene had obliterated any tracks, and it was highly unlikely that whoever had been behind this attack would have lingered long enough for their trace to be discovered. Arun could sense an echo of Taint, a memory of the dark deeds done here this night, but it was not strong enough to provide direction of where the assailants had left.

“You let your people live in such conditions?” Umbar growled.

“We have been doing everything we can to relocate people into appropriate housing, and get damaged structures restored to a status safe enough for occupation,” Beorna responded quickly. “We’ve marked condemned buildings, but without posting guards, it’s almost impossible to keep people out of the shells.”

“Human civilization,” Umbar muttered.

Arun saw Beorna tense at the implied challenge of the statement, and quickly rose, hoping to forestall this exchange. The cleric’s presence had been the result of a compromise.

When they'd gotten the news of the attack, Umbar had not be insensitive to Arun's desire to investigate, but he'd insisted upon accompanying him. Arun had gotten the impression that the priest of Moradin was not going to let him out of his sight until the date of his hearing. His other companions had not been pleased with that decision; the dark clouds brewing in Beorna's expression, combined with the utter impossibility of Hodge restraining himself from saying exactly what he thought of the matter, made collectively for an explosive situation. Now all he needed was for a clash between the cleric of Moradin, Beorna, and the harried members of the Watch.

"Inquisitor, can your spells reveal anything of use from the victim?"

The cleric glanced down at the battered corpse, the victim's eyes staring sightlessly up into the air. He shook his head. "I do not have that blessing prepared. Perhaps on the morrow." His expression indicated his feelings about the prospect of using his gifts to communicate with the spirit of a murdered human. Arun ignored that, and turned as Hodge came over to him, holding something.

"Found it in a pile of rubble, near the back door," he said. He held out the object. In the flickering light of the hooded lanterns of the Watch it was just a vague oblong, but the dwarves had darkvision, and could pierce the deep shadows. Umbar, who'd come up behind Arun, hissed in a surprised breath as he saw the item: a long dagger with a curving blade. "Drow!" he exclaimed, recognizing the craftsmanship of the weapon.

The guardsmen exchanged a few nervous looks.

"Aye," Hodge said. "Hasn't seen a whetstone in a while, though."

"There are entrances to the Underdark beneath the city," Arun said. He knew of one in particular, a dark tunnel in the Malachite Fortress, a place that was not associated with good memories.

"I thought those had been closed," Beorna said.

"Those we know of... or perhaps the quakes might have opened another access point," Arun said.

"You think dark elves are behind this, ser?" the sergeant asked.

Arun shook his head. "Doesn't fit with what the witnesses reported... and it just doesn't sound right, not for drow."

"The dark elves wouldn't bother with abducting a few thugs," Umbar agreed.

"Have there been any other people reported missing in this neighborhood?" Arun asked the sergeant.

"Not that I'm aware of, ser."

"Has there been anything else unusual here, in the last tenday or so, that you recall?"

“Well... we’d heard a few rumors—nothing concrete, mind you—of something creepin’ around these ruins. Kinda put it off to spooks, folks uneasy, you know? We’d been walkin’ these streets as part’a our patrols, ‘long with your Hammers, we hadn’t seen nothin’ unusual. Cleared some folks out who weren’t s’posed to be there, unsafe buildin’s, an’ all.”

Arun wore his heavy armor, but a blank tabard covered the sigil etched in his breastplate, another result of the compromise he’d reached with the inquisitor of Moradin.

“It could just be a clash between rival gangs, ser,” the sergeant suggested. “They say that there’s a few lingering elements of the Last Laugh left in the city, fighting over the scraps of their organization.”

Arun nodded, but his own information, imparted by Mole, belied that possibility. And his gut felt something... wrong, here. As if a murder on a stormy night could ever be “right”.

“Whoever did this, they be long gone, like as not,” Hodge said.

Arun inwardly agreed, but he could not let this go without at least trying to find some clue. In the morning, divination magic might be able to uncover more, but by then the trail of the assailants might be even colder. He turned to the guardsmen and their sergeant. “We’ll take a look around the neighborhood. Our darkvision will allow us to see better without the lamps. I want you to send two men to the Town Hall, and alert the Captain of the Watch of what’s happened here. Tell him I want twenty men dispatched here at once. Have the rest of your men set watches here, and wait for our return.”

“Ser!” the sergeant said, saluting. He turned to offer orders to his men, while Arun turned to the other dwarves.

“We’ll get more done if we split up, but we should always remain within sight of at least one other at all times, in case something happens.”

“You are taking command of this operation, I presume?” Umbar asked.

“He’s doing what needs to be done,” Beorna snapped, but Arun laid a hand on her shoulder. “We would appreciate your assistance, Inquisitor,” he said.

The cleric nodded. “We should start in the direction that the assailants were last spotted heading,” he said.

Arun nodded, and the four dwarves set out into the night.

Chapter 493

Gusts of wind drove fat droplets of rain into the dwarves’ faces as they made their way deeper into the neighborhood surrounding the river chasm. Hodge sneezed, and grumbled something that was lost on the breeze. Here, within bowshot of the new-formed gorge, casual comments could not be discerned. The sound of the river making its way down the side of the mountain, combined with the noise of the wind rushing through the chasm, was loud enough to override most other sounds. Most of the buildings here had been condemned and remained vacant; eventually they would be torn down. It was unlikely that there would be much rebuilding here. Although magical divination had revealed that the majority of the city had regained geologic stability in the aftermath of the disaster, the constant noise and the general human fear of unwarded heights provided little incentive for such projects.

The bridge that would eventually cross the new river gorge was still just pilings at this point, and the tenuous rope bridge that crossed the chasm was far from safe even on clear days, let alone on stormy nights when gusty winds blew through the gap that had forever changed the landscape of the volcano town. On this night, the neighborhood was all but deserted.

Which was not to say that the neighborhood was uninhabited. In addition to what they'd seen tonight, Mole had reported that several of the abandoned buildings had been claimed by squatters, refugees who had lost their homes, or simply poor folk who had owned nothing to start with. A lot of people had left Cauldron before the disaster, and others had died in the calamity, leaving a lot of empty buildings that could be reclaimed. But restoration work took time, and Arun suspected that there would always be people who slipped through the cracks, who for whatever reason preferred to hide in the shadows beyond the ebb and rush of the town's active life.

Beorna remained close at his side, and she touched his shoulder as they left the ruined warehouse behind them. "If they are dark elves, we'll never see them," she said, speaking loud enough to carry over the wind, but not loud enough for her words to carry to the other two dwarves.

Arun nodded. "We still have to look," he told her.

They spread out then, following Arun's injunction to remain within sight of at least one other at all times. There wasn't much to see; several buildings had collapsed entirely, leaving only piles of rubble slick with wet from the rain. One entire block had been consumed by fire, leaving only heaped ash and a few blackened timbers that jutted from the mess, clawing at the sky like barren fingers. The streets had been cleared enough to allow passage, but they still occasionally had to move around a heap of rubble that protruded out into the avenue.

A strong gust slammed into Arun, and for a moment the street ahead was lost in a spray of water into his eyes. He drew off his helmet, wiping his face to clear his vision. When he could see, he noticed that Umbar had stopped in the entry of an alley, one of the steeply sloping corridors that connected the terraced layers of the city. One thing that these connecting streets allowed for was the drainage of rain down to the center of the city, to the rushing river that now drained out into the gorge and down the mountainside to the southeast. Most of the alleyways had either subterranean pipes below the pavers or runnels to either side that allowed the water to drain to the next tier without washing away pedestrians passing by, but the quakes that had reshaped the city had damaged many of them, making even cautious travel a risky proposition.

The current level of precipitation wasn't enough to fuel heavy levels of flooding, not yet, but small plumes of water nevertheless flared around the dwarf cleric's ankles as he stood there in the mouth of the alleyway. Arun motioned to Hodge and Beorna and moved to join him.

"What is it?" he asked the priest. The two buildings to either side of the alley were mostly intact, at least from the exterior, but deep cracks in the foundations and the shattered windows indicated that this block had not escaped damage in the disaster. This neighborhood had been mostly an industrial district prior to the disaster, with workshops and warehouses occasionally interspersed with retail establishments that now gaped empty, their contents evacuated by their owners or looted by the opportunistic in the aftermath of the disaster. Arun remembered one shopowner who'd insisted on reopening his business even though the building had been condemned; after the collapse that killed him, his wife, two children, and two customers the city officials had become more stringent in cracking down on such foolish choices.

Umbar shot his fellow gold dwarf a cold look. "You have forgotten much of your stonelore, it would seem."

Arun peered into the alley. High stone walls that also served as part of the foundation of the flanking buildings formed a long passage that led up to the next avenue about fifty feet away and above them. The only thing of note here was a storm drain, set vertically into a recessed depression to one side, blocked by a grille of heavy iron bars that were set into the surrounding stone.

"No debris," Hodge said, pointing to the drain. The dwarf stepped through the swirling water to the drain, and bent to examine it. Spray washed around his hips and the current tugged at his cloak, but he ignored both as he completed his search. Then, after glancing back at the others, he reached out and gave the bars a yank.

The entire stone frame around the drain slid outward several feet, sufficient space to allow a man-sized creature to pass into the pipe beyond. Beyond the initial narrow opening the shaft appeared to widen into a circular tube about four feet across, sloping downward at a considerable but not impossible angle.

"Most of these drains ended up at the lake, didn't they?" Arun asked.

Beorna nodded. "With the quakes, who knows where they all go, now. Though it would be unpleasant, if one were suddenly catapulted into the river gorge."

Arun concentrated, but he detected no hint of Taint. "It's a lead, but we have no way of knowing if the attackers came via this route."

"The All-Father can provide the answer," Umbar said. "I will embark upon an invocation, but it will take some time." Without waiting for a reply he began casting, a sonorous chant in the Rift dialect of dwarvish, a tongue heavy with long syllables and complicated pronunciations. Inured to the water washing around his boots, the priest delved into the power of his office, communing with his god.

The other dwarves kept watch, but as minutes passed with the chant continuing unabated, Hodge began to fidget. "Could we not have waited someplace dryer while 'e did this?"

"This is a complicated spell," Beorna said. "Be patient."

Finally the chant came to an end, and the cleric stepped forward. He placed his bare hands upon the stone around the grate entrance, and leaned forward until his bearded cheek was pressed up against the wet stone.

"Yer expectin' that stone to tell yer what happened?" Hodge snorted.

"Exactly," Arun said, like Beorna recognizing what the priest was doing.

They watched as the dwarf cleric stood there against the stone, his eyes closed, his lips moving soundlessly. Finally, he drew back, shaking water out of his beard before putting his helmet back upon his head.

"What did you learn?" Arun asked.

"The stones had much to say," Umbar replied. "We now know the identity of our enemy."

Chapter 494

In the shadows, the Chosen waited.

The only illumination was the coals in the braziers set in a half-circle around the dais, their ruddy light shining off the glossy black sheen of the chamber's walls. The light was insufficient to reveal details, only suggesting at the considerable size of the room. Thick stone pillars supported the ceiling above, which was utterly lost in darkness, giving the illusion of a vast endless space.

The light also reflected on the faces of the occupants that crowded the chamber. There were dozens of them, humanoid, but with monstrous visages and sightless white orbs for eyes that glowed redly in the glow of the braziers. The light also had some odd effect upon the mostly-naked creatures, for it seemed to shine through their skin, as though their flesh was translucent, infusing them with a carcerian nimbus that added an additional fierceness to their appearance. Their hides were marked, criss-crossed with scars and piercings that looked to have some sort of ritual significance. All were armed, mostly with heavy axes of black metal, although some bore small swords, metal bludgeons, or curved knives tucked into the wiry leather harnesses they wore across their bodies.

The creatures all faced the dais, where the Chosen sat upon a plain stone bier, shrouded in a long cowled robe of heavy gray fibre.

"Bring the petitioners forward," came a voice from within the cowl, thick and gravelly but decidedly feminine.

The cloaked figure rose as the gathering of creatures parted to reveal several wide-eyed humans, some still struggling against the unyielding grip of their captors. There were five of them in all. The last one was unconscious, his left eye a bloody mess, dragged easily by the strong humanoid warrior who'd taken him.

The humans stared up at the cloaked figure in obvious terror. Her identity was lost within the darkness of the cowl, but a small gray stone floated around her head, animated in its lazy orbit by some foreign magic. She lifted an arm, the robe falling away to reveal a slender, feminine hand that was so transparent to be almost invisible, like the appendage of a ghost.

"Wha... what do you want with us?" one of the young humans managed to squeak.

"I am the Chosen of the Cha-Sabratoh'ka," she intoned, pointing at them with an eerily indistinct finger. "In your tongue, surfacers, that means, 'the children of the ordeal.' For many years we have wandered the underworld. All hands are raised against us, for we exist outside of the bounds of mere mortal folk. We have been through the fire and through the flensing, and the weak have been pared away like the dust. Those that remain have become strong, but we continue always the trial, to pare away those that are not worthy."

The humans could only look up at her, fixed by the potency of her power and the iron hands of those holding them.

"At last, after passage of the tests set for us, we were guided to this place, the Cairn of the Fade. Here, and in the halls above, we found the true purpose of our search, the gateway to the evermore, that beyond this world of ordeal and suffering... release... truth... deliverance."

"Oom bar sabrat," the gathered creatures chanted as one, causing the men to flinch at the cold potency of that united sound.

"At first we feared that gift, the touch of the Fade. But then, it was revealed, that this was not another ordeal, but rather the final test. The Fade has taken some of us, and those that remain must prepare for the last transition into Beyond. Ours is the ordeal. Oom bar sabrat."

"Oom bar sabrat," the collective echoed.

The cloaked figure looked down at the humans cowering before her. "When we learned of the proximity of your surfacers settlement to the Cairn of the Fade, our final purpose was revealed. We will bring the Fade to all... such is our purpose, why we have been left in this mortal realm of suffering, while our brothers and sisters have gone ahead into Beyond to prepare the way. Your people will be first, and you few will have the honor of being the first pilgrims to chart the way for those that must follow."

"Bring forward the vessel," she commanded.

A scarred creature of the same race as those others gathered came up upon the dais from behind, bearing an oblong container that resembled a miniature keg, perhaps two feet long and a foot thick. The bearer's hide was mangled with carvings, piercings, and fetishes that were too patterned to be anything but deliberate, but it was not evident how a living being could have suffered so much damage without going insane.

The bearer held forth the container prominently as he came forward. The red light from the coals glimmered on golden runes inlaid into the thick wood, but they were meaningless to the humans, who were not familiar with the gnomish language. But the obvious veneration given by the creatures and their leader to the device were enough to instill a great fear in them, and they quailed within the grasp of their captors.

The robed female produced a small silver cup from under her robe, and extended it to the small spigot on the side of the container. She touched the rune marker with her other hand, and whispered something, a command, perhaps, although it was barely audible and not in a language that any of those present spoke. That knowledge had been difficult to come by for the Chosen, as well, but she was a being of great resourcefulness and cunning, and after much effort the little keg had yielded its secrets.

A small trickle of liquid issued from the container into the cup. It only took a second to fill it; the female quickly muttered another word to stop it, and the mutilated acolyte withdrew, remaining on the edge of the dais with his burden.

"You will now take into yourselves the gift of the Fade," she said, moving closer to the first young human with the silver cup extended. As she came, the two creatures holding him released him, although they remained close at hand, offering little chance of escape.

Still, the prisoner lashed out immediately, striking the female's hand and knocking the silver cup flying.

"Worm!" she hissed. "You refuse the blessing we would bestow upon you? You are not worthy!" And she reached up and drew down her cowl. Her servants had twisted the other prisoners, turning them away, leaving only the single man to face her. He tried to break free, but the rough hands drove at his body, offering no escape.

He tried to lunge ahead, across the dais, but as he stepped forward he caught sight of the woman looking down at him. Her features were not at all like the crude visages of the other creatures, the outlines of her form smooth and even sultry. But her flesh was still nearly transparent, and the red light of the braziers revealed that her skin bore a texture to it, rough like scales.

And her hair... it moved, animated by a living force... no, not hair...

The young man's mouth fell open to scream, but he never got a chance.

When the other prisoners were turned back toward the dais, the female's cowl was back in place, and their erstwhile companion stood frozen in mid-lunge, a statue perfectly captured in grainy gray stone.

The medusa gestured, and the acolyte came forward again, bearing the keg. Another of the creatures had recovered the cup, bowing deeply as he placed it once more into her hand.

“Now... let us see if the rest of you are worthy,” she said.

Chapter 495

“Grimlocks,” Hodge said, the word coming out as a curse. He followed that with several other juicy epithets, directed at their enemies, the rain, the mucky slickness of the pipe, and the universe in general.

“Silence yourself,” Umbar said, from ahead of the former miner. “The creatures have phenomenal hearing, and will detect us coming.”

“I doubt that they will miss us, regardless,” Beorna noted, as the four armored dwarves clanked their way down the sloping shaft of the pipe. For humans, the pipe would have been incredibly difficult to traverse, but even for the squat dwarves, used to tight underground spaces, the descent was far from easy. The water draining from the street above drove down at them, making each step treacherous, and the surrounding walls were slick with layered muck and filth that had accumulated over time. Arun was in the lead, and he used his shield and right arm as wedges to steady his progress as he made his way forward. They bore no light sources, as Arun’s sword was in its scabbard and the four needed no external illumination with their darkvision in any case.

The pipe continued straight for about sixty yards. Occasionally small drains opened onto it, a foot in diameter or less. They kept a close eye also for hidden doors or other possible digressions, but saw nothing. Arun paused frequently to seek out hints of Taint, but likewise his divinations proved empty.

Finally they came to an oddity, a break in the pipe. The water collected here in a frothing pool about four paces across that drained into the continuation of the pipe on its far side. The break had obviously been opened by the recent quakes, and they could see that a wide crevice, two feet above the level of the water, appeared to extend for some distance into darkness to their right.

Arun tried to move toward the crevice, but he stumbled and nearly slipped into the pool. Beorna’s steadying hand was upon him in an instant, drawing him back.

“Careful,” she said.

“Take my shield for a moment,” he said, divesting himself of the bulky object before extending himself again toward the crevice. This time he made it, grasping onto the tenuous edges of the crevice and pulling himself up into it.

“It goes back quite a ways,” he told the others. “It was probably opened by the quakes, but there are definite signs that it’s been cleared and widened. It looks like another passage, extending further below the city.”

“Well, let’s get this over with, then,” Hodge said from back in the pipe.

Arun took his shield back from Beorna, and working together they were all able to make the transition into the new corridor. This tunnel was even tighter than the pipe, despite the effort that had gone into widening it, but it was drier, and they quickly were able to descend for about another fifty or sixty yards before the tunnel widened and opened onto a chamber of worked stone.

This room clearly predated the earthquakes, but it likewise showed signs of recent damage. The place was maybe thirty feet square. The tunnel they’d negotiated entered onto a wall that was flanked by a pair of massive stone hearths, now quiet and dark with debris. Additional rubble cluttered the floor, possibly from furniture, for the ceiling appeared to be mostly intact, with just a few small cracks. A small, low rough-hewn passage exited to their right, and directly ahead of them on the far side of the room gaped an empty round doorway with a thick stone threshold. Wooden shards of what might have once been the door were scattered across the floor on both sides of that opening; they could see what looked like an even larger room beyond.

Arun looked around, a strong suspicion dawning in his mind. While the others checked for any traces of their quarry, he crossed to the round doorway, bending to examine the curving lintel. The rune he found there confirmed what he’d expected to find.

“Jzadirune,” he said. “We’re in Jzadirune.”

Hodge and Beorna both understood the significance of that name, having heard the tales of Arun’s first journey to this place. But Umbar shook his head. “What does that mean?”

Arun opened his mouth to speak, but he did not get a chance to immediately elaborate, for a round object flashed past his eyes, and the room was filled with an explosion of blinding light and surging heat. The flare blinded him, but he could hear the sounds of scurrying feet approaching from the larger room, accompanied by an inhuman croaking noise from many throats. Drawing his sword, he lifted his shield in time to take the first heavy blow that clanged solidly against the bulwark, driving him back.

Chapter 496

Hodge had actually gotten a momentary warning of the ambush. He’d been standing by the rough-hewn northern passage, most of his attention on Arun and that heap of self-righteous cleric, when he heard a skittering noise from the tunnel opening. He’d started to turn, reaching for his magical waraxe, when the explosion in the center of the room blinded him. Fortunately he’d been looking away; he blinked a few times, the bright stars clearing from his vision. He smelled something acrid, a stench like burning rags, and looked down to see that his beard was on fire.

The hurled oversized flask that had narrowly missed Arun had struck the ground in the center of the room, almost at Umbar’s feet. The force of the explosion had knocked the dwarf backward, but even though white flames licked at the entire front side of his torso, the remnants of the explosive mixture coating his armor from his helmet down to his greaves, the cleric was quick to recover. Beorna, who'd been partially shielded from the blast by the cleric's body, moved to help him, but she had to turn and draw out her sword as a horde of grimlocks erupted from the small side passage, bearing black axes that they quickly put to use as they engaged the dwarves.

Arun, likewise, found himself hard pressed by another group that swarmed through the small round doorway to assault him. The grimlocks were raging, launching violent all-out attacks upon the dwarves, but they also moved with cunning, setting up flanking positions that allowed them to slip devastating sneak attacks through the dwarves' defenses. Arun's potent armor protected him from the first few blows, but he found out firsthand the hazards of letting himself get surrounded as an axe crushed into his hip from behind, sending a white-hot wedge of pain through his limb. He gritted his teeth and blinked his eyes furiously as he tried to clear his vision enough to clearly distinguish the enemies swarming around him. His first stroke had gone utterly wild, cleaving only empty air, and he heard the mocking chatter of the grimlocks, confident that this foe would be easily overcome.

Unfortunately for them, they were gravely mistaken in that assessment.

Umbar pulled himself up in time to stagger as a grimlock hurled himself bodily into the cleric, trying to bear him down to where he could be hacked to pieces. The priest of Moradin was menaced by only this one foe at the moment, as Hodge and Beorna had blocked the others, who crowded around them in a blur of vicious cuts and counterattacks. Blood sprayed across the room as Hodge took one grimlock's arm off at the shoulder, but he fell back a moment later as another stabbed the finely-edged length of a drow shortsword into a crease in the armor plates covering his torso. Beorna, likewise, had been surrounded by four of the creatures, but her adamantine sword was already wreaking havoc among them, the deadly black blade exploding a grimlock's chest and then cleaving into the jaw of the next, sending teeth and bits of bone across the chamber in a gory spread.

"Taste Moradin's justice, foul creature!" Umbar said, thrusting the grimlock off of him and the driving the head of his magical warhammer solidly into its face. The blow would have shattered the skull of a common man, but the grimlocks were fiercely durable, honed by the trials of the Underdark into machines of violence and destruction. The grimlock, absorbed in its rage, snarled, spraying blood from its shattered nose and jaw as it hacked at the cleric with its axe. The adamantine weapon clanged hard into the dwarf's armor, failing to penetrate the layered plate but nevertheless inflicting pain as the impact of the blow drove through Umbar's body.

The cleric, of course, merely grunted and kept fighting.

Hodge paused a moment to slap at the gob of burning... whatever that had splattered his beard from the explosive contents of the grimlock flask. Hot wisps of flame had spread across the unruly mass of whiskers that the dwarf had cultivated like a wild forest, but he could not spare more time to deal with the growing calamity as three grimlocks pressed him intently, spreading out to take him from left, right, and ahead. He could feel blood running down his side and leg from the nasty stab wound one had put into his torso, but that too was a lesser concern to the deadly axes that continued to batter at his magical armor. He wasn't as experienced a fighter as Arun and Beorna—the cleric was still an unknown quantity—but he was veteran enough to know that these were no common foes. He had a gnawing suspicion that only their heavy armor had kept them up as long as they had, and as he saw the one whose arm he'd taken off stagger back up, grasping its axe with its other hand, he knew that these guys would have to be literally taken apart.

Well, so be it. Grimacing, the dwarf planted his feet—a decisive gesture for one who'd taken the path of a defender—and started laying about him with his axe, accompanying the assault with a steady stream of dwarven profanity.

A few feet away, Beorna thrust her sword deep into the body of the grimlock whose jaw she'd mangled a few moments earlier. The creature fell, blood exploding in a fountain from the grievous wound, but even as she turned toward the next of the two still attacking her, the mortally injured grimlock seized at her legs with desperate strength. That alone would not have been near enough to threaten her, but the one behind her detected the stratagem and hurled itself at her, latching onto her shoulders and dragging her down with its full weight. The templar could not adjust her footing with the grimlock literally holding onto her legs with a death grip, and she collapsed back onto the one holding her from behind. That creature paid a price as the heavily armored dwarf woman crushed its chest with her considerable weight, but it continued to clutch at her, seizing her helmet and yanking it free. Her last foe, the one she'd been about to strike, had been waiting for that opportunity, and it stepped forward, its axe lifted above its head in both hands, ready to separate her head from her troublesome body.

Arun staggered under the impact of another blow that had penetrated his defenses. He swept his sword up against his attacker, and connected, but the angle had been poor and the grimlock spun away from the impact, a deep gash in its side gushing bright red blood.

As he lifted his sword to strike again, one of the grimlocks behind him leapt and seized the limb, trying to force the deadly sword from his grasp. The creature was strong. Not as strong as Arun, especially with the paladin's magical belt, but it had allies, and Arun was still somewhat disoriented by the aftereffects of the explosion and its accompanying flare. A battleaxe clanged hard off his helmet, dazing him, so that he did not immediately see the grimlock who darted in, a long knife poised as it targeted the vision slit in Arun's helmet, intending to finish the job begun by the bright flash of light upon the dwarf's vision.

Chapter 497

Arun felt a crushing pain in his wrist, and despite himself felt his holy blade wrenched from his hand by the grimlock behind him. He twisted to see the grimlock fall back, clutching the sword, and so the knife thrust from the one ahead of him failed to find the narrow opening in his visor, instead glancing off of the side of his helm.

Ignoring that attacker, Arun drove forward at the one who'd stolen his sword. The grimlock tried to withdraw, and Arun took a hit to his side from a grimlock axe that felt damned painful. But the paladin called upon the power of Moradin, and with a dwarvish cry of battle he smote the creature with a punch from his gauntleted fist. His fist crunched solidly into the creature's face, and it staggered, dropping its stolen treasure.

Arun bent to recover it, taking multiple attacks of opportunity from the surrounding grimlocks as he did so. Every breath, now, was driving sharp needles of pain through his battered torso; he was tough, but the beating he was taking was phenomenal.

Beorna looked up into the face of the monster standing over her, unable to react quickly enough to stop it from a deadly blow to her head. But before it could strike, a ray of searing light blasted into its face. Its eyes were not susceptible to light, but the holy light ravaged its hide, filling its sensitive nostrils with the sweet stench of its own burning flesh. The beam distracted it only for a moment, but that was enough for Beorna, who swept her sword around with a desperate surge of strength, catching the grimlock in the kneecap. The preternaturally sharp sword tore through the limb, severing it, driving the creature to the ground.

The grimlock beneath her was still tearing at her, one of its hands clutched in her hair, the other wrapped around her body, its foul breath hot against her neck as it tried to seize her with its bent teeth. She slammed her head back against its face, which quieted it somewhat, but it refused to release its grip.

So, focusing her concentration, she called upon Helm to enlarge herself.

The grimlock's squeals as her mass increased eightfold were quite rewarding. Her magical growth had put her within reach of the grimlocks that were assaulting Hodge, so she lashed out with her boot, delivering a heavy blow to the back of the neck of the nearest. Hodge took advantage of the distraction, bringing his already bloody axe down into the skull of the grimlock, crushing it in a spray of blood and brains.

"Get up from that one, ye blasted bugger!" he shouted. The dwarf had stood his ground against his enemies, laying about him with his oversized axe. This was the second he'd dropped, including the one whose arm he'd severed, and who had returned to the fray in time to take an uppercut that clove through six ribs and laid open its chest. That one lay on the ground, now, its struggles continuing even as the lake of blood around its torso grew inevitably.

But that still left two, and Hodge was winding down rapidly. His defensive stance had given him a second wind, but he knew from experience that the added burst of vigor would not last long, and his axe already felt like an anvil in his hand. The two remaining grimlocks had shifted to keep him flanked, and continued to press him with their axes, looking for a momentary opening for a devastating sneak attack that would put the dwarf down.

A retreat would have been timely, the dwarf thought, but there was nowhere to go, so Hodge just kept fighting, laying into the nearest with a tired sweep that still tore a foot-long gash in the creature's gut.

Arun rose, drawing upon the power of Moradin until it felt like he would burst. Infused with Order's Wrath, he laid about him with his sword, hewing at the gray-skinned monsters that ringed him in and pressed at him from every direction. Blood filled the air in a fine spray as his sword flashed brilliantly in his hand, each blow opening a deadly wound. The grimlocks should have fallen like stalks of wheat harvested by the scythe, but in their rage they remained standing with wounds that should have left them screaming upon the barren stones. Only outright death would forestall them, and Arun gave them that, the paladin himself lost within his own rage, caught in the intense flood of battle, ignoring the blows that continued to rain upon him, dealing out destruction.

Finally, only one foe stood before him. The dwarf, still half-blinded by sweat and blood that splattered his visor, lifted his sword in challenge, but the adversary raised his hand.

“Peace, warrior,” Umbar said. “This battle is won.”

Arun lowered his blade, took a heaving breath, and collapsed.

Chapter 498

“I have fought the blind stalkers before, but never have I encountered ones like these,” Umbar said, the pale blue glow of healing fading from his hands as he drew back from Hodge. They were in the larger hall outside of the small chamber where the ambush had been sprung, although they brought the stench of blood with them, their clothes and armor liberally sprayed with gore from the short but vicious fight.

“They were rather durable,” Beorna said.

“Blast, but not a one o’ them even tried to retreat,” Hodge observed, nodding to Umbar in thanks for the healing. Beorna had already treated Arun, and while the four still had a few cuts and bruises to show for the ambush, their enemies were worse off by a pretty significant margin.

“That’s not all,” Arun said. “Did you notice their hides?”

“Aye,” Umbar said. “Odd... almost transparent, some of them... like skulks. Some magical effect, perhaps?”

“No,” the paladin said. “No, I wish it was so simple. We’ve encountered it before... it’s the Vanishing, a magical affliction that destroyed this community, the gnomes that lived here decades ago. It’s part disease, part curse, and it causes the infected to fade, gradually losing substance and reality.”

“I remember you speaking of it,” Beorna said. “Zenna had been infected by it, right?”

“Yes. She got very sick before we found out what was happening and had the curse removed.”

Hodge’s eyes widened as he looked down at the bloody front of his tunic. He’d already lamented the damage wrought upon his beard by the fire-blast of the grimlocks; at the moment, he looked like a butcher who’d worked several back-to-back shifts. “Yer sayin’ them things were infected with this... Vanishin’? That mean we got it, now?”

“You need not fear any ailment, magical or mundane, while traveling in the company of the high priest of Moradin,” Umbar said.

“It’s not spread like a normal disease, anyway,” Arun said. “At least none of the others had shown any symptoms, despite having been close to Zenna during her affliction. She believed it spread through infected magical items, like the scrolls we’d found down here during our first visit.”

“So you think that these grimlocks found some of this cursed magic, and are now affected by the disease?” Beorna asked.

“If that is true, then they are destroying themselves,” Umbar said. “Within a few tendays, the problem may resolve itself.”

“If they are intent upon assaulting the city, we may not have a few tendays,” Beorna retorted. “We handled a dozen, with our combined talents, but even one of those things is more than a match for two or three of our city guardsmen.”

“Then we must seek out the remainder and destroy them.”

“That may be difficult,” Arun said. “This complex is a maze; there are many more of those doors like the broken one we came through, most of which have potent, still-active defense mechanisms.”

“What about those burrowed tunnels?” Hodge asked.

“The most recent occupants of Jzadirune, a gang of dark creepers, opened up those side passages using a few gnomish pulverizer automatons that they were able to gain control over,” Arun explained. “They do bypass some of the doors. There is also a lift that provides entrance to a deeper complex further beneath the city; a place called the Malachite Fortress. There was an entrance into the Underdark in that latter location.”

“The humans seem willing to tolerate a lot of things beneath their city,” Umbar commented.

“It’s not that dissimilar from the existence of the Underdark beneath the Great Rift,” Arun said. The cleric frowned at the comparison, but Arun continued, “I know that the dwarves guard all such transitions very intently, and monitor any digging or new tunnels that approach their chambers. When we cleared out Jzadirune, and fought slavers who’d established themselves in the Malachite Fortress, we likewise sealed the entrance that connected the former to Ghelve’s Locks up in the city. Later, another band of adventurers traveled below and sealed the entrance to the Underdark itself.”

“It would appear that they did not do a thorough job,” Umbar said.

“As I told Beorna earlier, it is likely that the quakes opened another access point.”

“So the rest of the grimlocks, and the prisoners, may be either here in Jzadirune, or below, in the Malachite Fortress,” Beorna said.

“Those little tunnels be beggin’ fer more ambushes,” Hodge pointed out.

“Well then, we’d better get started finding them,” Arun said, sliding his sword back into its scabbard.

They spent the better part of an hour probing through the accessible parts of Jzadrune. They found no ambushes, although they did spring a few traps that, while not lethal, caused damage that clerical magic was required to treat. There were also more signs of the grimlocks, but they did not find any of the creatures themselves. A few more of the gnomish doors had been breached, but it looked as though the lair of the creatures lay somewhere beyond.

“Down it is, then,” Arun said, directing them by memory to the location of the hidden lift that descended to the black halls of the Malachite Fortress.

After their last expedition down here, when they’d fought and overcome the half-troll slaver Kazmojen, they had considered destroying the lift that connected Jzadirune and the deeper underground fortress. Ultimately they had agreed to leave it be, after setting the mechanism so that the lift could only be activated from up above. Apparently the grimlocks, if they had indeed found their way up through the Underdark, had found a way to confound that precaution, for the lift appeared to be in working order and showed signs of recent use when they finally reached it.

“Clever,” Umbar granted, as the four of them activated the lift and started down. “Gnomish work, you say?”

“So far as we could determine,” Arun replied, standing near the center of the platform as it ground its way steadily down the approximately octagonal shaft. The journey took several minutes and progressed without incident, the lintel of another recessed door appearing as the platform slowed and finally ground to a halt.

“Ready?” Arun asked.

“A moment to bolster our defenses,” Beorna said, invoking a blessing of Helm upon them. Umbar, likewise, took a moment to augment his own considerable stamina, while Arun created a magic circle against evil to enfold all of them.

Hodge used the delay to steal a few swallows from a small flask he had tucked into a pocket of his surcoat. When he’d put it back into its hiding place, he looked up to find the other three dwarves looking at him.

Wiping his mouth with the back of his hand, he tapped his axe. “Right then, ready.”

Chapter 499

Once they were prepared, they essayed the door. Beyond lay a wide passage familiar to Arun; on their first visit they’d battled a strange stone spike and a vicious ogre here. The iron cages that had dangled from the ceiling that last time—used by the former occupants to hold fire beetles for illumination—had been torn down and lay in battered heaps amidst scattered crushed stone debris along the walls. An ugly odor hung thick in the place, but nothing stirred to challenge them as they moved forward into the Malachite Fortress.

“What a foul stench,” Beorna said. “I thought these grimlocks relied on their sense of smell; how can they distinguish anything over this?”

“On our last visit it was worse,” Arun said. “The ogre we fought here lived in utter filth, in a chamber beyond that door up ahead.” They gave that room a wide berth, Hodge looking in briefly to confirm that the room was empty. They made their way to the far wall. Once there had been a secret door there, but it too had been torn free of its moorings, leaving an irregular gap into the next chamber beyond.

“It’s like they are compelled to destroy just for the sake of it,” Beorna commented.

“Do not expect logic from such as these,” Umbar said. “They are vermin, fit only to be tread upon by a heavy boot.”

The others exchanged a look, but did not offer comment. It was clear from the vehemence in the cleric’s voice that there was a considerable hatred behind those words.

“I do not sense Taint,” Arun said. “Let us proceed.” He stepped through the open doorway into the next room, the others following close behind.

This chamber was still mostly intact. The four xorn-shaped braziers in the corner were empty and dark. The statue in the center, of an armored dwarf facing to the huge double doors to their right, was missing its head, but otherwise appeared much as Arun remembered. There was another set of doors to their left, and Arun led them in that direction.

The paladin paused before the heavy stone portals. Coming here had triggered memories he’d thought were well and left behind. It had only been a little over a year since that trip, not long after his initial arrival here in Cauldron. He’d been angrier then, much wilder in his words and deeds, trying to recover something of what had been lost in his exile from his homeland.

He glanced at Umbar, who was looking at the dwarven statue, examining it with a critical eye. It was strange, really, Arun thought; the arrival of the cleric, a none-too-subtle reminder of his past... shouldn’t it have bothered him more? The cleric had threatened his honor, his faith, and his new-found standing within this, his adopted home. Now was not the time for introspection, but still, it was a thought he could not fully banish as he turned toward the doors.

As he turned his gaze briefly met Beorna’s, and she nodded, ready.

Maybe that was part of the answer, he thought, as he reached for the handle.

“Beyond these doors lies a corridor that leads to the main hall of the fortress,” he told the others. “If our foes are down here, then we’ll likely find them there.”

“Well, what are we waitin’ fer?” Hodge muttered.

“Smite evil,” Umbar said to Arun, in the dwarvish dialect of the Rift. Arun nodded, appreciating the meaning in the gesture.

“Smite evil,” he returned, pushing the door open.

The corridor was as Arun had said, running ahead for a short distance before turning right at a diagonal and continuing for at least another fifty or sixty feet before fading at the edge of the dwarves’ darkvision. Arun already knew what lay at the end, another set of double doors that led to the bazaar, the great hall where they’d confronted Kazmojen and his evil allies. About halfway down the length of the passage smaller side corridors branched off of the main route, and several doors could be seen, opening onto small rooms that they’d only cursorily searched on their last visit. They’d come here after the conclusion of their battle with the half-troll and his minions, and had been more interested in making their way back above to the clean air of Cauldron at the time.

“What a mess,” Beorna said.

The length of the corridor was strewn with debris. It looked like the grimlocks had drawn out all the furnishings from the surrounding rooms, smashed them into ruins, and then strewn the wreckage casually down the length of the hallway. The passageway was about twenty feet wide, leaving plenty of space for them to make their way through, but the assorted trash left plenty of cover for anything that might be lurking in wait.

Arun paused, sensing for Taint. He felt a vague sense of unease, but nothing else within the range of his ability.

“This smells like a trap,” Hodge said, putting the paladin’s feelings to words.

“There’s another way around,” Arun noted. “There’s another secret door in the statue room, which leads to a block of cells and a bridge across a chasm that opens onto the main hall from the west.”

“They will likely have warded every approach,” Umbar said, but he did not challenge them as Arun drew back and closed the doors, turning to the wall opposite the one through which they’d entered. The secret door there had not been destroyed, and after a few moments Arun was able to locate the hidden portal. But it refused to budge at his push, even when Beorna added her strength to his efforts.

“There may be something bolstering it from behind,” she suggested. “A bar, or maybe even a collapse in the space beyond.”

“What about those doors?” Umbar said, indicating the huge portals in the northwest wall.

“That was the entry to the Underdark,” Arun said. “The access point was originally closed by another adventuring band after our visit... but it may be open again.”

"If they 'ave retreated into the Underdark, then catchin' them will be tough," Hodge said.

"Agreed," Umbar said.

Arun nodded. "The passage, then," he said, turning back to the double doors to the south.

They headed into the debris-choked corridor, with Arun in the lead, Beorna a step behind, then Umbar, with Hodge bringing up the rear. They hadn't gone more than twenty feet when Arun lifted a gauntleted hand, calling a stop.

"Taint!" he warned, pointing at the double doors they could now see at the far end of the passageway. As if in response, they caught sight of a flicker of movement, as something shifted behind one of the piles of ruined furnishings.

"They be a bit more cautious, this time," Hodge noted.

"Perhaps they can be persuaded to venture forth," Umbar said. Lifting his hammer in invocation to Moradin, he called upon the power of his god. A grid of blue light, the pure energy of absolute Law, erupted around a point centered upon the doors. Order's wrath drew angry cries from the grimlocks hiding behind the debris, three of whom came into view, snarling at the dwarves. One pushed open the doors and darted into the space beyond, while the other two remained behind cover, close by two levers that jutted from the passage walls near its end.

"They seek to lure us in," Arun began, but his words fell upon deaf ears in at least one case, as Umbar lifted his hammer and charged forward, a dwarvish battle cry shaking off the walls. Arun felt a strange feeling of déjà vu... hadn't he always been the one to lead the assault? When had caution stilled the power of righteous anger that had always guided his sword?

Hodge was watching him; apparently his cohort had no qualms about leaving the glory of the charge to others. Umbar had reached the intersection in the middle of the corridor, Beorna a few steps behind. Arun drew his sword, its glow filling the passage with its brightness, and he started after them.

He had barely managed two steps before he saw the grimlocks leap up, and reach for the levers.

Damn! he thought, a moment before the floor collapsed from under him, and he was falling, staring down at the forest of jagged spikes rushing up to meet him from below.

Chapter 500

The dwarves were all veterans, but luck abandoned them as they fell prey to the grimlock trap. When the levers were pulled, two trapdoors the full width of the passage, twenty feet wide by ten feet long, had fallen open beneath the charging dwarves, one on either side of the intersection in the middle of the passage. Umbar tumbled facedown into the first, and Beorna, close on his heels, could not arrest her charge in time to avoid following him in.

She tried to leap across the gap; normally a ten-foot jump would have been trivial for one of her strength, but her armor weighed her down, and she slammed hard into the far edge, her sword going flying from her grasp as she clutched at the bare stone, the weight of her gear threatening to drag her down after the cleric. She held on as a wave of heat rushed up from below, enveloping her in wisps of white flame.

Arun's momentary delay had put him right over the second pit, and luck was not with him as he tumbled down into the black opening. Hodge was the only one not to fall, the dwarf halting right at the edge of Arun's pit. But he could do nothing but watch as the paladin landed hard on the spikes below. Arun's armor protected him from serious injury from the spikes, but their situation was complicated an instant later as the flasks that the grimlocks had piled under the debris choking the tunnel shattered on the spikes, flooding the pits with an explosion of white fire. Hodge fell back, blinded by the intensity of the flare, hoping that the paladin, lost within the inferno, could withstand the immolation.

Beorna looked up to see the two grimlocks rushing forward toward her, their axes poised to drive her back into the burning pit. Calling upon Helm for a surge of strength, she roared and pulled herself up in time to meet them. One tried to bull rush her back into the pit, but against her augmented strength it may as well have been trying to topple a stone wall. It rebounded off her as she stood, and she reached out, snaring it by the throat with the iron grip of a gauntleted hand. The grimlock tried to shake free, and its companion laid into her with a powerful blow of its axe, but she ignored both and bodily hurled her captive into the pit behind her.

"Arun!" Hodge yelled, as the white fire continued to engulf the pit, hiding the paladin from view. The dwarf had a rope, but if he could not see his friend within the pit, then how was Arun supposed to see the line?

But the question became moot a moment later, as a glowing length of steel rose up out of the pit, wreathed in wisps of persistent fire and trailing smoke. Arun's sword landed with a loud clatter on the far side of the pit, followed a moment later by the paladin himself, leaping out from the smoke to seize the pit edge, pulling himself up with a surge of strength before he collapsed in the middle of the intersection, blinded and coughing.

Thus incapacitated, he didn't see the door at the end of the side corridor to the east burst open, or the half-dozen grimlocks that surged through it, axes raised as they rushed toward him.

Beorna turned to face her remaining foe, taking an axe hit across the front of her helmet that failed to do anything more than cause her ears to ring. Her bastard sword was out of reach, so she drew forth her backup weapon, stepping into the grimlock's reach to punch the dagger meatily into its torso. A foot of steel stuck into its side had to have hurt it, but the creature only unleashed another series of attacks with its axe, each of the blows clanging uselessly off of the templar's adamantine armor.

But her prospects took a turn for the worse as the double doors behind it opened, and a horde of the creatures came charging through it.

And beyond the doors, a shadowy figure momentarily stepped into view, but behind the more pressing wave of grimlock barbarians, the templar failed to notice it. She saw her sword, lying about six feet away down the corridor, but there was no way that she was going to be able to recover it before the wave broke upon her.

So, being practical, she called upon Helm and transformed her dagger into a holy sword.

The grimlocks surged into her, moving to flank her, leaping at her with powerful two-handed blows from their stolen axes and swords. The pit, a mere pace behind her, protected that flank, but that still left her open to up to five attackers at time, pressing in at her from every direction. Another tried to grapple her, but she dissuaded it by punching her dagger into its shoulder, opening a gusher of red blood that ran down the front of its scarred torso.

Behind her, white smoke billowed out of the pit, forming a wall at her back. A familiar roar signaled the arrival of reinforcements, as Umbar vaulted out of the pit. The cleric was transformed, filled with the righteous might of Moradin to double his normal size. He'd dropped his shield in the pit, but as he clambered up into the corridor he drew his warhammer—likewise significantly increased in size—out of his belt, driving it into the face of the first grimlock that turned his way. The creature staggered back, but was immediately replaced by three others that violently surged at the cleric, trying to keep him off balance. The priest, his defenses significantly augmented by his spell, shrugged off the hits.

"Fall before the righteous!" the cleric said, laying about him with powerful blows of his hammer, crushing bones with each solid impact.

"Arun, look out!"

The paladin was trying to pull himself to his feet as Hodge's warning reached him. His sword was lying just a few feet away, but even with its bright glow he could not see it, the aftereffects of the flare and stinging white fire having thoroughly blinded him. The first grimlock eschewed its axe and hurled itself on top of the paladin, seeking to bring him down with sheer weight and fury. Arun straightened, refusing to be overborne, but the movement opened himself to powerful blows from the axes of the grimlock's friends. One blow cracked heavily into his left elbow, drawing a cry of pain from the paladin; his shield too had been lost in the escape from the pit.

"Damnation!" Hodge cursed, watching the grimlocks surge over his friend. The ten-foot gap between them might have been a league for the armored dwarf; he'd watched Beorna, who was far stronger than he, fail that leap, and while he was a decent climber, Hodge had never been much for jumping over chasms. Especially not ones filled with spikes and lingering wisps of white fire and burning smoke.

"Moradin's balls!" he finally yelled, dropping back and shucking his shield, taking his axe up in both hands as he rushed toward the gap. The smoke seemed to swirl up to enfold him, and he nearly misjudged the edge; but then he was flying across, the smoke absorbing his vision for a moment before he was through, and a grimlock was rushing straight for him. He was a bit surprised when his boots landed on solid ground.

“Aaaaaaaaar!” he shouted, bringing his axe down into the grimlock’s chest. The weapon tore a deep gash in its chest but snagged on its breastbone. Two grimlocks were on him in a flash, stabbing with hook-shaped curving swords that tried to find gaps in his plate armor. He suspected that if he let them, they’d gut him and hang him up to rot soon enough.

“Eat crap, ye bastards!” he yelled, laying out with everything he had. It was a gamble, since these guys were tough and agile, and too much strength would overextend himself and cause a miss, leaving him open to the inevitable counterattacks. But his first power attack connected, hitting the one he’d injured with enough force to cut through its body all the way to the spine. The grimlock went down in a bloody mess, almost wrenching his axe from his grip before he could yank it free. A sharp point snagged in his side, no doubt puncturing something significant, but there wasn’t time to worry about that just now.

“By yer right foot!” he yelled at Arun, not able to spare even a moment to look over to see how the paladin was doing. Well, he hoped; he had a feeling he was going to need some help in a couple of seconds, and he’d lost sight of Beorna and the cleric in all the smoke and confusion.

Something hard caromed off of the side of his head, and he staggered. The white smoke rose up and he could feel the edge of the pit drop off on the side of his boot. Damn, that was close, he thought.

Then a pair of grimlocks slammed into him, and the lot of them went over, swallowed up into the searing white fog.

Chapter 501

Beorna and Umbar formed a dwarven wall before the menacing gap of the pit at their backs. The grimlocks formed a bloody wave that blasted against that wall, but each surge was driven back, leaving behind bits of itself as detritus that oozed blood and gore from huge gashes and crushed skulls.

Beorna could not reach her sword, but her dagger, infused with divine magic, was punching deep holes into grimlock bodies with each thrust. One grimlock already lay at her feet, its body pierced by several such thrusts, and in a momentary lull she defensively cast a quick spell, infusing herself with divine power. Thus fortified, she met the next attack with a jab that pierced a lung, followed immediately by a slash across the grimlock’s throat that sent it tumbling back into its fellows, bleeding out the last of its life upon the stones.

But even the templar’s storm of controlled violence faded in potency compared to what Umbar was doing beside her. The dwarf, now over ten feet tall, was knocking grimlocks around like straw dummies, his hammer pulverizing even the insanely tough bodies of these foes. Yet the grimlocks, driven by their insane fanaticism, refused to give way, launching attacks that could not penetrate the dwarf’s resistances.

The battle was rapidly turning into a slaughter, the dwarves’ attacks becoming a mechanical process of transforming living enemies into corpses. There was one momentary break in the melee, as a high-pitched noise, not quite human, sounded in the dark gap in the partially open double doors at the end of the corridor. That opening was limned in a soft red glow, giving it a diabolic aura. The dwarves looked up and saw a dark form moving in that opening, just for a moment; each felt a surge of something wash over them, a sick feeling of malevolence that their sturdy constitutions quickly shook off. They had not even paused in their attacks, each sending another grimlock to the ground with their next blow.

“What was that?” Beorna shouted over the din of violence.

“Evil!” Umbar returned, stepping forward, through the muck of corpses and still-struggling survivors. At least four grimlocks that could still stand threw themselves at him, but the cleric ignored them, pushing forward to the doors.

There was nothing there; the chamber beyond was huge, but no enemies presented themselves within. His motion had opened himself to a cunning attack, however, and a pain erupted in his leg as a grimlock cut into his hamstring with its axe. His greave held and the wound wasn’t crippling, but it forced him to turn around and punish the offender with a solid two-handed blow to the chest that sent it flying backward.

“Arun!” Beorna shouted, unable to turn because of the two grimlocks that were still pressing her, unable to see through the lingering smoke that hovered above the pit in any case. “Are you all right?”

The paladin could not immediately respond. His armor had kept him alive in that initial surge, ironically the grimlock clinging doggedly to his back helping to protect him from the axes of its fellows. A second tried to yank his helmet off, but he was ready for that trick, and he knocked it back with a solid punch to the head. He heard Hodge leap over to aid him, and could hear enough of what was going on across the far pit to know that Beorna and Umbar would be too busy to help them.

So he cast out his mind, and called for aid.

He felt the familiar presence even as the cries of the grimlocks announced the arrival of the newcomer. Clinger tore into the grimlock ranks, seizing the grimlock on the paladin’s back with its powerful jaws, and yanking the pesky foe off. Grimlocks attacked the celestial lizard, tearing into its golden hide with their axes, but the loyal creature remained by its master, shielding him until he could recover.

Arun’s vision was still hindered by the stinging tears left over from the acrid smoke, but the bright glow provided enough guidance for him to find what he was looking for. Bending down to recover the holy sword cost him, as a pair of blows clanged hard into his back, one crushing a plate and opening a bloody gash just below the lowest rib on his left side.

But he had the sword.

He straightened. Both grimlocks lifted their axes to strike again.

The paladin called upon Moradin, and unleashed a red storm of death upon them.

Six seconds later, both grimlocks lay on the ground, looking like they had been dropped into a threshing machine.

Arun turned to help his companion. Clinger had the last grimlock still fighting pinned in its jaws, but that didn't stop it from trying to hack at the lizard with its axe. However, Arun taking its head off its shoulders did put a tone of finality on its efforts.

"Hodge!" he cried, looking around for his cohort.

"Down 'ere!" the dwarf shouted, the words followed by hacking coughs.

Arun rushed over to the edge of the pit. The fire had mostly burned out, although some of the ruined furniture still flickered with more "normal" yellow tongues of flame. The smoke cleared enough for Arun to see Hodge standing amidst the spikes. One of the grimlocks that had knocked him down was impaled on the metal stickers, while the second lay a few feet away, a round oval in the side of its skull where Hodge had chopped through with his waraxe. The dwarf looked a mess, and he pressed his hand to his side where blood continued to ooze from a shot that had gotten through his armor.

"I could use a hand up," he managed.

Arun nodded, instructing Clinger, before turning toward the far end of the corridor. Through the gaps in the fading wall of smoke, he saw Beorna and Umbar, the cleric still empowered by righteous might, surrounded by a veritable wall of bodies. The templar's eyes met his, and he felt a surge of relief.

But the relief also meant that the pain, pushed aside in the rush of battle, came rushing back, and he decided that it might be a very good idea to call upon Moradin's power for healing.

Chapter 502

The battle in the corridor appeared to have broken the strength of the grimlock tribe, for they encountered no further resistance as they continued their exploration of the Malachite Fortress. Once again clerical magic restored them to health, although this time they also had to rely upon a few potions to supplement the abilities commanded by Umbar, Beorna, and Arun. The four of them had absorbed enough damage to lay low a battalion of common soldiers, and Arun hoped that their enemy did not have some further surprise waiting for them deeper in the complex.

The pit levers, when raised, lifted the trapdoors back into position, settling with an audible click. "Dwavish work," Umbar noted, with an approving nod. This allowed them to reunite and press on, into the great hall at the end of the passage.

The place was barren, nearly empty, although it bore enough similarities to Kazmojen's bazaar to stir dark memories in Arun. There were four iron braziers set up around the raised dais on the southern end of the chamber, their dying coals still shedding a faint red light.

To the west, a heavy stone door opened only after considerable effort to reveal a gaping chasm. The bridge that Arun remembered from their last visit was gone, destroyed in the recent quakes, leaving only a narrow ledge that ended in crumbling stone.

So they turned to the other exit, in the east wall. That door opened to reveal a long chamber, once a dining hall, now showing the same signs of deliberate destruction they'd encountered elsewhere in the fortress. The remains of several large tables were scattered across the floor, and garish things had been sketched on the walls in what looked like dried blood. Five doors, three to the left, and two to the right, offered a wealth of choices. The four dwarves spread out to quickly check the room for any signs of their quarry.

"Hey, this one's been wedged shut," Hodge said, drawing them to a door in the far corner of the room. The iron spikes were quickly removed by Umbar's hammer, and they forced the door open to reveal a twenty foot square room beyond. Huddled in the back of the room were four young human men.

"Who... who are you?" one of them ventured. They were in poor condition, their garments torn and hanging in remnants from their pale bodies, shivering together against the cold. Several bore marks of struggle.

"Friends," Arun said, coming forward.

"Be careful!" one of them said. "Those... things, they infected us with some sort of disease. We didn't want to drink, but they made us... they turned Orran to stone!"

The dwarves shared a look, but Arun did not hesitate, assisting the men, treating their wounds with trickles of positive energy. Calling upon his power, he purged them of the taint of the Vanishing, and each relaxed as the healing surge passed through them.

"You're... you're Arun, the dwarf paladin, aren't you?" one of them asked.

Arun nodded. "Tell us what you can about the grimlocks."

The one who had initially spoken shuddered. "They came up on us by surprise, up in the city. Gratham tried to fight back, he actually hit one with his dagger, but the thing just punched him... damn near killed him! The rest of us couldn't do much, I'm afraid... those things are strong."

"Aye, that we know," Hodge said.

"Are they all..." another youth began.

"We killed a good lot o' them," Hodge replied. "If there be more, then they be smart to run off."

"Tell us more about what happened to Orran," Arun prodded.

"Their leader," the first youth said. "Gratham was out cold, but the rest of us saw it," he said, as if doubting that the dwarves would believe him. "She was... well, we thought she was a woman, but she said such terrible things, told us we were the first, that others would follow."

"She called it the Fade," another of the men added. "She made us drink from the gray cask. Orran wouldn't do it, he knocked the cup away. That made her mad... they turned us away, and when we turned back, Orran was a statue! They took him away somewhere, I didn't see where."

"Petrification," Umbar said. "Sounds like a medusa. Common leader for grimlocks, works out since the blind stalkers can't see."

"Tell me more about this gray cask," Arun said.

"She said some kinda magic word, and water came out," one of the men said.

"And she had a rock flyin' around her head," another added.

"Magic items," Beorna said. "And you said that the Vanishing was transmitted through cursed magic items..."

Arun looked at them. Something clicked as the pieces came together for all of them.

"They intended to infect the entire city with the plague," Umbar said.

"We've got to get above, quickly," Arun said, picking up one of the young men. Despite the healing, they were still weak from their ordeal.

"Perhaps we should leave them here, for now," Umbar suggested. By the looks on the young humans' faces, the prospect did not hold appeal for them.

"No one stays behind," Arun said. "Come, let's get back to the lift."

The dwarves all but carried the weakened humans as they retraced their steps through the underground citadel. They were wary of another ambush, but nothing emerged from the darkness to hinder them. Within a few minutes they had made their way back to the shaft leading up to Jzadirune, where they made a not entirely unexpected discovery.

"Someone's taken the lift up," Beorna said. She looked up into the shaft, but there was only darkness for as far she could see up into it.

Arun pulled the triggering lever that would bring the lift back down. There was a grinding noise from up above, and then a loud clatter that grew rapidly louder.

"Get back! Out!" he shouted, putting his own words into action as he retreated into the outer passage, Beorna only a step behind. Umbar and Hodge were already clear, along with the humans.

Only a heartbeat after Beorna had burst out through the open doorway, a loud crash announced the arrival of the lift, falling from its upper station at Jzadirune. Shards of shattered wood and a plume of dust poured out over them as the heavy mechanism settled upon the floor of the shaft, although none of them were harmed.

Hodge came forward and looked at the wreckage. "Well, now what?" he asked.

Chapter 503

"We must find another way to get back up to the city," Arun said.

"Your companion," Beorna said. "Clinger can take you up, and then come back for us."

Arun frowned. "I will try, but the walls of the shaft are almost sheer; there are limits even to what he can do."

"I can assist here," Umbar said. He lifted his arms, spreading wide his shield and hammer, his eyes closing as he intoned the rough syllables of a dwarvish prayer. The chant went on for several seconds before a rumbling in the ground startled them, and they retreated from the spot where Umbar stood. A moment later, a rough humanoid form, a good eight feet in height, rose up out of the ground before the priest. The earth elemental bowed to the cleric, who addressed it in the Terran tongue.

"The elemental will bear you up the shaft," Umbar said to Arun.

"It won't be able to carry more than one of us at a time..."

"It will only remain long enough to take you; bring a rope to toss down to us below, and we will follow."

"But..."

"There is no time, warrior! The medusa must be stopped. Go! We will follow behind as swiftly as we can."

Arun nodded, accepting the rope from Hodge and stepping forward toward the elemental. The creature did not hesitate, taking up the paladin and treading ponderously into the shaft, ducking to pass through the low threshold of the entry. The elemental immediately started up the shaft, its legs sinking into the stone as though they were soft sand, using its bond with the earth to carry it upward, its upper body holding Arun clear as it ascended.

The ascent seemed to take an eternity, although consciously Arun knew it was only a little over a minute. The elemental deposited him in the doorway at the top end of the shaft, and then vanished back into the surrounding stone.

Arun wasted no time tying off the end of the coil of rope to the nearby doorjam before unwrapping it and tossing it back into the shaft. It had been a thick coil, well over a hundred feet—but was it enough to reach the bottom of the shaft? If only he'd had the foresight to bring the flying carpet, despite its bulk... but no, it remained in secure storage in the Temple of Helm above.

The paladin shook his head. He was wasting time, and there was no time to delay. He already had a good idea of where the medusa was going; rising, he drew his sword, its brilliant glow banishing all shadows and doubts.

Making haste, he started back toward the shaft that led back to the surface.

Chapter 504

The storm had intensified somewhat, the icy rain off the Alamirs now falling in a continuous stream that ran down the streets of the city, draining steadily down the sides of the caldera before ultimately trailing off through the city's drains into the river chasm in the center.

Down by the lowest tier of the city, Lava Avenue was awash in puddles of water that in some places were up to a foot deep. This lowest tier of the city had suffered particular damage in the disaster that had reshaped Cauldron, and with the draining of the lake a number of buildings, now perched precariously over the river chasm, had been condemned as unsafe. At places, the remnants of once-busy docks trailed out over the darkness, over fast-moving waters below that were starting a tumultuous descent down the side of the mountain. The street was still navigable, but the quakes had caused damage here as well, and street repair was being postponed until the structures that could support citizens of the town were restored to a safe condition. The streets were all but deserted, even the Watch not in evidence on this particularly unpleasant night.

But even if there had been more of the town's inhabitants out in the predawn hours, it was unlikely that they would have seen the dark figures that made their way stealthily through the town. The first was a slender, nimble figure, the robe that flapped around her form like a flap of discarded gray fabric dancing in the wind. The pale flesh protruding from the sleeves and hem was almost completely invisible in the near-darkness. The second, following close behind, was more bulky and ponderous, but likewise its neutral gray skin was nearly translucent, a shade in the night. This one was hunched over, its arms wrapped around a cumbersome burden that it clutched close against its body.

To the Chosen, even the darkness of the city in the depths of the stormy night seemed bright to eyes that had known only the dark reaches of the Underdark. The rain and wind were bewildering in their intensity, the great open space above the caldera strange and terrifying to one who had always known the tight confines of a cavern roof above. But she was driven by a fanaticism that allowed her to push all of those fearful distractions to the back of her mind. She knew her destination from the careful descriptions provided by her scouts, and even though the last of her grimlocks were likely already destroyed by the invaders into the Cairn of the Fade, she at least would prove worthy of the ordeal placed before her by the powers of her universe.

It rose up out of the night, ahead, a massive rectangular shape. The massive cistern lay on the chasm side of Lava Avenue, upon a broad shelf of jutting stone that had once supported a pleasant park, Before. The landscape was still reassuringly green during sunny days, but now, in the depths of the night, the trees formed dark shadows with bare branches that resembled grasping claws. The Chosen saw these and shuddered, consumed with apocalyptic visions of death and destruction.

The collapse of the volcano's rim and the loss of the lake had presented a problem for Cauldron; the city's water supply was dependent upon that resource, and many of the city's wells had gone dry once the water had found a way to exit its former confines and pour down the volcano toward the lowlands and the yet more distant sea. The cistern was the first step in providing the city with a new water supply, a stopgap until new wells, pumps, and pipes could be put into place. It had been created in just a few days, both through combined labor and the intervention of Beorna of Helm, who'd cast a dozen stone shape spells over several days to form the stone gathered from the wreckage of the city into a rectangular container fifty feet long, twenty feet across, and up to eight feet deep. The cistern was filled by a simple pumping system that used collapsible leather buckets attached to a winch and pulley assembly, drawing up river water from its rapid course to an open pipe that fed the container. That assembly had been safely stored now, and with the rains continuing to fill the already awash cistern it was unlikely it would have to be used anytime soon.

The cistern had been partly built into the ground, so that its lip was only about five feet above the level of the surrounding street. A simple wooden platform had been set up to abut it, and a spillway installed on one of the narrow sides, so that water could be drawn from it easily into barrels or other large containers. The Chosen and her companion made their way up to the platform. Water trickled out over the edges as rain continued to fall into it, the droplets splattering across the flat plane like tiny spiders crawling over a stone floor. The cistern held sixty thousand gallons of water; enough to meet the needs of three thousand people on an average day, slightly more than the current population of the town.

"And so we fulfill our destiny," the Chosen said, clicking her tongue to signal to her companion. The scarred grimlock acolyte came forward carrying his heavy burden. The gnomish variant on the decanter of endless water itself could have solved Cauldron's water issues, had it not been infected with the corruptive influence of the Vanishing. As it was, it was the perfect vessel for the completion of the Chosen's twisted plans.

The grimlock strained with the weight of his burden as he lifted it up to the lip of the cistern. The little keg itself wasn't very heavy, but several large paving stones had been attached to it with thin but durable elastic lines. At the bottom of the cistern, it would appear to just be a large rock to anyone not actually within the huge container.

A clanking noise that sounded distinctly over the noise of the storm drew the attention of the medusa around. She turned to see the dwarf paladin standing in the street, the rain sloughing off of his metal skin.

"Yield, or die," he said, his hand tightening on the hilt of his sword.

Chapter 505

Just getting back up to the city streets had been a challenge for the dedicated dwarf. The broken drainpipe had been flooded with a steady rush of water from the wet streets above, threatening to dislodge him every time he took a step. He was soaked through by the time he emerged into the open air once again, but he ignored the physical discomfort he felt in face of the gravity of his mission.

He did not divert himself to seek out the Watch. Convinced that his hunch about the medusa's destination was correct, he'd ran directly toward the cistern that he and Beorna had helped build shortly after their return to the town. He encountered no one out on the street, and within a few minutes he'd reached Lava Avenue, and could see his destination ahead.

And the two figures creeping up to it.

He kept his sword in its scabbard, to avoid drawing their attention, and continued at a more measured pace toward the two stalkers. Their backs were toward him, but he could not effectively mute the telltale clank of his heavy armor, and the woman—the medusa—turned and looked at him before he'd crossed half of the distance between them.

"Yield, or die," he said, his hand tightening on the hilt of his sword. He did not truly expect them to comply, but he hoped to distract them from their purpose.

The medusa drew back her hood, fixing him with the fell power of her gaze attack. Arun did not flinch, his inherent dwarven fortitude combined with the dedication of his calling allowing him to easily resist being petrified by that gaze. Still, he did not tempt fate, averting his eyes as he drew his sword and started forward. A ring of bright golden light surrounded him as the sword blazed out of the scabbard, a halo against the night and the storm.

The medusa muttered a command in Undercommon, and the grimlock leapt off the platform and charged at the paladin. It drew a pair of long black knives from the harness at its waist, and a low, guttural sound emitted from deep within its chest as it flew into a tightly controlled battle-rage.

Arun stood his ground, and let the enemy come to him. The first dagger thrust was turned by his breastplate, and he quickly counterattacked.

There were few evil creatures upon or beneath the surface of Toril that could withstand a full attack from Arun. The grimlock acolyte was not one of them.

Arun stepped over the carcass, his eyes narrowing as he scanned the surrounding darkness. The "battle" with the grimlock had taken all of about five seconds, but the medusa was gone. Wary of a trap, he rushed up to the platform. The water in the cistern, level with the lip of the container, was a sheer plane broken by the patter of raindrops, glowing in reflection of the light of his sword. Arun leaned forward and stabbed his blade deep into the water, peering into the water. Nothing. He paused for a moment, just a moment, to scan for Taint. There was a faint, indistinct aura that clung about this place, but not enough to pinpoint the presence of the medusa. Had she fled, and taken the gnomish device for use at a later time?

Arun knelt upon the edge of the cistern, and removed his helm and shield. With one hand balancing himself on the stone rim, he dipped low, stabbing his head beneath the surface of the water, thrusting the sword deeper with his other hand.

There—just barely visible, below; a gray object that did not belong.

Arun did not hesitate; taking a deep breath, he leapt into the cistern, vanishing beneath the surface of the water with a mighty splash.

Weighed down by his armor, he sank to the bottom of the cistern like a stone. His sword brightening the dark waters, he immediately turned and pushed forward to the location of the object. It was the gnomish keg, held in position by several heavy stones securely fastened to it, quivering with the force of the water that was pouring from it. Arun did not know how much of the tainted water it had to produce for the fell disease to be potent, and did not intend to wait to find out.

He tugged at the throngs holding the keg, drawing aside one of the stone blocks, revealing the deep brown wood beneath. The light of his sword glimmered off of a golden rune set into the wood. Standing, he braced himself over it, and lifted his sword, both hands wrapped around the hilt.

A surge in the water alerted him. He turned, narrowly avoiding a stabbing thrust of steel that sliced into his cheek as he ducked back. The wound burned like fire, and as the sword came around with him he looked up into the face of the medusa, snakes writhing in a halo around her alien features, the light shining through her translucent skin. Her weapon was a slender rapier of black metal, its blade oozing green droplets that formed tiny plumes in the water as she wielded it.

Arun tried to bring his sword up to stab her, but the water impeded him. The medusa dove at him, her mouth open in a silent scream as she dug her fists into his hair, dragging her face down to his in a sick parody of a lover's embrace. Arun felt a cold feeling creep into his bones as the medusa's gaze swallowed him up, followed by pinpricks of agony as the serpents upon her head stabbed their tiny fangs into his forehead and temples.

Chapter 506

The medusa, driven by her insanity, held the paladin in her grip, attacking with enchanted steel, venom, and the dark power of her gaze attack all as one. Against such an onslaught, any defender would have been hard-pressed to survive.

But the gods shone their blessings upon the paladin, and none more than his sturdy patron, who infused the knight with the power of the forge, the iron of the anvil, and the might of the hammer. Arun snarled and reached out with his free hand, locking it around the medusa's throat. The creature did not retreat, her serpents snapping at the fingers that tightened into a fist around her scaly neck. If anything, her grip upon him tightened, her own fists yanking at his black hair, drawing them even closer.

And then Arun brought up his other hand, and thrust the length of his holy sword deep into her body.

The medusa quivered as the blade entered her, then she began to thrash with an inescapable agony as the paladin drove the sword deeper. It pierced her, and a shaft of light penetrated her as it emerged from her back. Even as her struggles deepened she still forced Arun to meet her eyes, willing him to die, trying to drag her enemy down with her into oblivion. But Arun's fortitude was unflinching, and she wailed with frustration and anguish as her power slid harmlessly off of the dwarf's resistances.

Arun drove the sword a last foot, until the crossbar slammed hard into her chest. The medusa's struggles ceased, and she drifted, her eyes now lifeless and harmless. Blood floated in around them in a spreading plume.

Arun began to feel the first stirrings of what he knew would become an insistent need, as the gulp of air he'd taken began to burn in his lungs. He lifted a leg and kicked the medusa free of his sword, the slain creature drifting back to settle to the floor on the opposite side of the cistern. The whole thing would have to be drained and cleansed before refilling, now, he knew, but his more immediate concern was the vessel that continued to pour out its pestilence a few feet away.

He returned to the keg, braced his feet, and with a single powerful drive of his sword he pierced the wooden container. There was a tiny flash as the magical steel drove through the golden rune, and then the thing just came apart, bits of wood floating about in an eddy.

The need was growing greater, now. Arun sheathed his sword, and with a powerful kick he leapt up and grabbed the edge of the cistern with a gauntleted fist. When he drew himself up, that first breath was a relief, filling his lungs with cold purity. He clung there, for a moment, holding onto the side of the cistern, letting the raindrops fall upon his face. His head turned to the east, where the horizon above the town's wall had just begun to brighten with the promise of the coming new day.

Chapter 507

The hearing was held within the private chapel in the Temple of Helm. It was low-key, and the only individuals in the chamber, with the exception of a few witnesses called to testify, were dwarves. The pews had been temporarily replaced by two tables covered with white linen cloths. Arun Goldenshield sat at one, clad in a simple gray robe belted at the waist with a length of cord. At the other, Umbar Ironhammer sat as both Adjudicant and Prosecutor, his heavy iron symbol of Moradin laid out on the table in front of him.

Beorna sat to Arun's left, clad in a long white robe that prominently bore the sigil of Helm across its chest. She was serving as Arun's Advocate, but as the hearing progressed, her expression grew more tempestuous, as her ability to hold her anger in check steadily eroded.

But even that was better than Hodge, who'd been ejected before the end of the hearing's first hour.

There were not many witnesses called. Arun had refused to allow Beorna to issue sendings to their friends, who could offer testimony on the paladin's behalf. "There are greater matters at stake," he'd told her.

"Greater than your honor?" she'd replied, trying to sting him. But he'd only turned and returned to the hearing room. His face had been a stone mask during the entire proceedings, but when Umbar opened by reading the charges against him from the parchment scroll he'd originally delivered upon his arrival, something flashed in his eyes.

They'd had two days to prepare a defense, but Arun had spent most of that time helping the Watch seal the new entrance to Jzadirune, and in draining and refilling the cistern. Beorna had lost her temper, suggesting that Arun was not taking the dwarven cleric's mission seriously, but both knew that the charge was not true. Hodge had suggested a more direct course of action, suggesting that they could use the cleric's bloated head to close the pipe leading down into the abandoned gnome fortress.

They'd found a few more items infected with the Vanishing upon the medusa's body. There was no more insights as to why the creature had been so consumed with infecting herself and her people with the strange illness, and spreading it to others. Having gained some insight into madness through the whole ordeal with Adimarchus and the Cagewrights, Arun realized that no logic or reason would apply in this case, so he let it go as just another threat that had required the blade to purge.

"At some point, we should conduct a thorough search of the tunnels under the city," Arun had suggested, in his quarters the night before the hearing. "If Cauldron is going to be safe in the long term, then we must be certain that other threats are not brewing beneath us."

"You might want to apply as much concern to your own affairs as to the citizens of Cauldron," Beorna had retorted. "I cannot believe you are allowing yourself to be subjected to this travesty of justice."

"It is part of the code which I have sworn to uphold."

"The code of the same order that threw you out on your ass? Where were they when fiends were overrunning Cauldron? Where were they when the portal from Carceri was opening? Where were they when we battled Adimarchus? You do not need to prove yourself to anyone, Arun! You have sacrificed..."

He'd interrupted her by clasping her hand tightly in both of his, and holding it close against his heart. "I know you do not understand, Beorna, but I must ask that you defer to me in this case. I will need you by my side tomorrow... but for tonight, let us not pass our time in argument."

And now, as Beorna scowled openly, Umbar Ironhammer looked up and fixed the accused with a stern gaze.

“Arun Goldenshield,” he began, “In the past few days, I have been witness to your courage and determination in service of the people of this human town. It is clear from those witnesses that this tribunal has heard that the people of Cauldron have adopted you gladly, and that you have found a new home here.” The cleric’s eyes shifted momentarily toward Beorna, who met his look with a stare that could have cut glass. But the priest turned his attention back to Arun. “It is also true from the accounts submitted in your defense, that you have held true to the ideals of the faith of our people, and continued to struggle against evil, darkness, and corruption in our shared world.”

“But one of the bulwarks of our people is the Law. We the golden dwarves live in a realm where the tides of shadow dwell constantly beyond our fortifications, waiting only for the slightest relaxation in our vigilance. Our enemies would deny us land, provender, and life alike. This, I know, you understand, perhaps more than most.”

“You have not denied the fundamental charge against you, that you acted with deliberation against the terms of your exile. Perhaps it was not your intent to breed a heretical cult of the All-Father in this place, but ultimately it was your actions and choices that allowed this course of events to develop.”

Beorna opened her mouth to speak, but Arun grabbed her arm with his hand, forestalling her. With a look of disgust on her face, she subsided.

“Therefore, Arun Goldenshield, this tribunal finds you guilty as charged. Your punishment will be merely to obey the strictures placed against you by the full body of the High Order of Moradin. You shall forever eschew the wearing of the sigil of Moradin, or any other accoutrements of that faith. You will not claim to be a paladin of the All-Father, nor shall you proselytize in advocacy of the faith. In light of your defiance of the initial judgment of the High Order, it is required that you submit to a Mark of Justice.”

Chapter 508

“What!” Beorna said, shaking off Arun’s restraining arm to come forward to the space before the Inquisitor’s table. “After what you’ve heard, what you saw below the city... you would still spit upon this man’s honor in this way?”

Umbar fixed her with a hard stare. “This matter is not within your jurisdiction, Templar of Helm. The warrior may refuse to comply with the sentence; he is already exiled, and as my authority outside of the Rift is limited by the bounds of the human laws of this region, the result would merely be decretum extundo.

“A decree of expulsion?” Beorna asked.

“Severing is a more accurate translation. The warrior would choose to fully sever himself from the dwarven people. He would be free to live his life as he pleased here among the surface world, but no dwarf of the Rift would even recognize him, for he would have foresworn them.”

Beorna turned to Arun, already knowing what she would find.

Arun stood behind her. He met her eyes, and while she did not agree, could not agree, with what she found there, she respected the man too much to defy his will further.

She stepped back.

“I accept the judgment of the tribunal,” Arun said. He carried his holy avenger, scabbarded in his hand. As Umbar came around his table the paladin knelt, and drew the sword, placing it point down upon the bare stone of the chapel.

“Are you certain you would not prefer a warhammer?” Umbar said, very softly, glancing down at the etched symbol of Lathander prominently featured upon the blade near where it joined the hilt. “As a weapon, such is not covered by the dictum.”

Arun shook his head fractionally. “It is part of who I am, another choice, perhaps.”

Umbar nodded. He intoned the words of the spell, a complex ritual that stretched on for several minutes. Arun knelt, immobile, while Beorna watched. A tear formed in the corner of the Templar’s eye, but the dwarf angrily blinked it away.

Finally, the priest of Moradin’s holy symbol began to glow. Arun did not blink as he lowered it to the paladin’s forehead, speaking the final word of his invocation to lay the mark of justice upon him.

A brilliant flare of golden light erupted from the iron symbol as it touched Arun’s forehead. Umbar staggered back, the symbol flying from his hand to land across the room, where it lay smoking in the corner. Arun’s body arched back, his mouth erupting in a silent scream as he stared up at the bare ceiling. A golden aura surrounded him like a bright halo, focused upon the bright star of pure energy that blazed upon his brow.

Beorna came instantly to him, but was driven back by the intensity of the aura, which surrounded him like a tangible wall. “What did you do!” she shouted, turning on Umbar.

“It... it was not I!” the cleric managed, his own eyes wide as he stared at the paladin.

The golden glow intensified until the two of them could no longer look, lest they be blinded by the intensity. The windows in the chapel, along with every other glass surface within the rectory, shattered. The ground and walls trembled, and a distant sound filled their heads, like the pounding of iron upon a forge.

Then the noise and light and confusion died. Arun was left, still kneeling, his head bowed, his hands still wrapped around the hilt of...

“By the gods...” Beorna breathed.

For the paladin’s sword, his holy avenger, had been replaced by a golden warhammer. Even with the fading of the holy radiance that had engulfed the paladin, it seemed afire, shining with an inner light.

“What in the hells is goin’ on...” Hodge yelled, bursting into the room. But as he saw what Beorna and Umbar had seen, he trailed off, for once at a loss for words.

Arun turned to gaze at them. The sigil branded into his forehead still glowed, a pale golden radiance that seemed almost alive. The hammer and anvil. The sign of Moradin.

While Beorna and Hodge looked on, still too stunned to respond, Umbar fell to his knees before Arun. “Forgive me,” he said, his earlier feelings overwhelmed by an intensity of adulation in his eyes. “I did not know... I did not see.”

“Forgive me, Chosen of Moradin.”

Chapter 509

INTERLUDE

Zev’vat looked up at the towering form of a glabrezu as he materialized in the portal chamber. The massive demon was several times his size, but it was the glabrezu who backed off, inclining its head ever so slightly in what passed for a bow, among its kind. It might have put up more bluster, had Zev’vat not been here because of a summons. Or if it had been a fool. For there were few here who did not know of Zev’vat, both what he was, and who he served.

The kelvezu spared little thought for the demon guardian, or the pair of hezrou that warded the heavy iron doors that led out into the main corridor of the fortress. Graz’zt is wary, he thought, at the same time that his eyes fell over the poor condition of the place, stark even after all this time of exile. Memories of the Argent Palace were not likely to fade soon, not when juxtaposed against such a precipitous decline.

Lo, how the mighty have fallen, he thought with a inner chuckle. He did not bother to censor his thoughts, not even here. He was entirely conscious of his own precarious position within a precarious situation, even before the tumult of recent events had begun pushing things toward a cusp of change once more. But his current position with his current master had been won through judicious use of his intellect and candor, and changing that now would likely put him in more jeopardy.

His destination wasn’t far from the entry chamber. No place within the fortress was; it was small, crowded. As he made his way down the central hall, he passed a side passage from which disturbing screams issued. Someone was being tortured; he knew all too well that Graz’zt’s specialists in that art were quite proficient. Zev’vat had heard and seen far worse, however, so he put it aside as he reached his goal.

The heavy stone door swung open at his approach. He was expected, after all. The sole inhabitant of the chamber nodded at Zev’vat as he entered, but neither spoke until the door had swung ponderously shut behind the kelvezu.

Zev'vat did not bother with slaving obsequiousness or other false preliminaries. He and his patron knew each other well, and could forgo all of the petty games demons usually played with each other.

"Welcome," Athux said. "Sit?"

Zev'vat took the indicated chair.

"My father is moving ahead with his plans. He has ordered Malad to gather the remnants of the Blood Legion, in advance of an all-out bid for power. We will not be returning to Azzagrat; our rivals expect such a play, and have prepared for it."

"I see." Interesting. I wonder if his Mightiness shared his precise target with you noble prince? Or if we're all equally in the dark about the plans of the Lord of Shadows...

Athux fixed him with an intent look. "You're wondering if I myself have been trusted with the knowledge of Graz'zt's ultimate objective. You can ease your curiosity; I have not. Graz'zt mistrusts me, as he mistrusts everyone and everything around him. Given his current position, he would be a fool to do anything else."

"And yet, the ultimate fate of many revolves around his decision," Zev'vat said.

Athux leaned back, smiling a perfect smile; it was hard not to be drawn in by the cambion's incredible presence. "I have my suspicions, of course. But father is playing the cards very close to his chest. And, naturally, he has already set plans into motion, setting a web within a web. He is mad, his ego under test by the strains of recent events. But he is no less cunning for that."

"I assume that I am here to be a string in one of those webs?"

"You assume correctly. Father is intent upon minimizing several variant factors that could spoil the careful alignment of his plans. In particular, there are several primes with a potential for great disruption."

Zev'vat's thoughts flashed back over the screams of the tortured man he'd heard in the hall.

Athux nodded. "For your own sake, you might want to avoid walking down that path just yet," he said. "That is a complicated matter. Suffice it to say, these primes are your concern."

"On Faerûn," Zev'vat said.

"You know, then."

Zev'vat snorted. "I know what everyone in service to Him knows, about them. I'd wondered, to be honest, why he hasn't moved against them before."

"As always, the matter is complicated."

“Well, he certainly has had a lot on his mind.”

“Focus on the matter at hand. Permanent destruction is likely beyond your means, but in any case they must be distracted from intervention when my father reveals his hand. They are scattered at the moment, which may give you an opportunity.”

“What sort of time scale do I have to work with?”

“The critical time will fall between one hundred ten and one hundred forty local hours from this meeting. With the time conversion...”

“Just under five days, on Abeir-Toril. Not much time.”

“You have completed more challenging tasks in less.”

“It’s been quite a while since I last visited the Forgotten Realms. I do not have any active contacts there, but I may be able to tug a few threads, call in a few favors.”

Athux nodded again; he was well acquainted with Zev’vat’s connections, and his not inconsiderable personal talents. “We are not without resources there, but obviously this matter must be approached with discretion, at least until it is too late for secrecy to be of avail to our cause. Obviously direct involvement is inadvisable. I suppose I do not have to tell you not to underestimate these particular primes.”

Zev’vat let out a dry chuckle. “Not after what happened to the last Abyssal lord who underestimated them.”

The statement was bold even for the outspoken kelvezu, and for a moment an awkward silence hung between them. There was nothing more that had to be said, so Athux subtly signaled the end of the interview, and the kelvezu left without even a bow of respect. Patron and client, prince and vassal, lord and servant. Their relationship had been long and fruitful, and always difficult to classify. But Zev’vat was close enough to Athux to know that Graz’zt’s scion had his own plans at work, and that his own role in this drama was very likely to be much more significant than a mere distraction.

It was going to be an interesting period of days ahead.

As he departed, he passed once again the corridor with the screams of the torturee still audible. His suspicion of the identity of the poor sod had been confirmed by what he’d just learned. Zev’vat didn’t have to venture further to know that the cries he could hear through the stone door at the end of the corridor belonged to a man experiencing the true depths of physical and mental suffering.

Zev’vat shrugged and headed for the portal chamber. He had his assignment. The friends of Graz’zt’s prisoner would join him in his misfortune, soon enough.

Chapter 510

The common room of The Cutter's Folly was an amalgam of every tavern cliché on any of a thousand worlds, from the stink of sweat and spilled beer, to the raucous laughter and boisterous jeers of its diverse inhabitants, to the steely faced bartender and the pinchable wenches who ran a steady circuit between the kitchen, the bar, and the forty tables scattered across the wide open area. The place only had a single story, but there was a hall subtly situated in the back corner that offered access to additional rooms to patrons who were willing to pay for a bit of extra privacy.

The clientele of the Folly was a mixed lot, even by Sigil standards. They tended to fall into the middle of the spectrum; the worst fiends and the purest celestials usually preferred to gravitate toward their own establishments, both for the services that catered to their particular needs and for the need to avoid confrontations. Sigil was a place that had a reputation for being rough, but the city was officially Neutral, and open conflict drew the attention of the Lady.

That certainly did not mean that the Folly was a "soft" tavern by any means. A number of the stains that had all but obliterated the original color of the hardwood floor were more than just liquor, and most of the furniture had the look of having been repaired more than once. A pair of hulking ogrillons in mithral shirts provided obvious muscle to discourage trouble, and the bartender hung a blast crossbow in obvious view over the bar, but even so only a fool came to the Folly if he, she, or it couldn't handle themselves.

Thus when the swinging doors parted to reveal a newcomer, a face not familiar to the bar's regulars, most quickly returned to their own concerns. The newcomer was a human woman, quite comely in outward appearance, clad in a light-colored tunic and breeches with a pale cloak trailing down across her shoulders and down her back. A few gazes lingered upon the woman, either out of lascivious curiosity or because of the veritable trove of magical auras about her person. But one look at her eyes was enough to encourage even those to return their focus to their beverages or their companions.

She walked boldly into the center of the common room, and just stood there. A few conversations at the tables around her quieted as their attention returned to her, but while her stare was challenging, she said nothing, just scanning the faces.

Finally, she crossed over to the bar. The bartender, a bariur of considerable age, nodded at her. "What'll it be?"

She replied in a voice designed to carry clearly across the room. "I want Barrat Ghur."

A number of looks were spread across the room, behind the woman's back. The bartender betrayed his reaction just for a moment, then he lowered his eyes to the bar, running a dirty rag across the polished surface. "Lord Ghur no longer frequents this establishment, ma'am. Perhaps a glass of Aelendur firewine?"

A rumbling behind her alerted the woman. She turned to see a mountain of a man step forward, his bulk all but blocking out her view of the room behind him. He looked to be some sort of combination of a minotaur, ogre, and fiend all in one, with the least appealing features of each. He stood a little under seven feet tall, only a bit more than a foot taller than the woman, but he had to be almost that much again wide. His shoulders were broad enough to serve as a table for four men, and each of his arms were thicker around than the woman's entire body.

"No trouble in here," the bartender said. "Take it outside."

The hulk ignored him. "You look puny, human woman," he growled. "Why you want Ghur? Oogok show you plenty good time."

The woman's lips tightened in disgust. "I'd sooner smear myself in goristo feces," she said. "As it is, I can barely stand the stench of being in the same room with you. Go away." Dismissing him with a wave, she started to turn back to the bar.

Oogok snarled and reached for her with a meaty fist. But the woman spun smoothly, a red glow erupting around her hand as she reached out and splayed her palm across the massive expanse of the hulk's chest. A fierce red glow spread outward from that point of touch, seeping into the body of the fierce monstrosity. Oogok's eyes widened and he staggered back, his upper body quivering as an ugly mewling issued from his mouth. The woman maintained her touch until the red glow had faded. A spray of bright crimson blood fountained from the hulk's mouth, pouring down his chest, leaving little flecks upon the otherwise pristine cloak of the woman. He fell to his knees, staring up at her with eyes wide with terror as she looked down at him, a cold look in her eyes. Then she turned back to the bartender.

"I think I'll pass," she said, turning and walking past the cowering hulk toward the door. No one moved to stop her; in fact everyone in the room suddenly seemed quite intent upon doing something other than appearing to pay any attention to her. By the time that the doors swung shut in her wake, the din of conversation and activity had returned to its former level of intensity.

Oogok, kneeling in the center of the room in a puddle of his own blood and piss, finally toppled forward, coughing up gobs of gore from his shredded lungs.

Sighing, the bartender gestured for his bouncers to help him heave the crippled creature out onto the street.

* * * * *

Dana Ilgarten did not go far after leaving the Folly. Idly rubbing a fleck of blood on her cloak with a fingernail, she concentrated on the ring she wore on the third finger of her right hand.

Do you have him?

Yeah, I got him. Took off like a shot out the back way, just like you said. Hey, how'd that big bastard look when you harmed him? Always thought Oogok had it coming...

Focus on the matter at hand, Dana thought through the telepathic link.

Yeah, yeah. Okay, he's going into the Hive. You want me to—what am I saying? Of course you do. Have I told you yet today that this plan is crazy?

Just do it, Dana thought, already walking briskly in that direction. Her sense of direction around Sigil was still a bit vague, and she thought she'd never get used to the way that the terrain ahead curved up, or the way that she could glimpse the far side of the torus through the wisps of cloud above. Sigil lay on the interior of a massive ring, existing in defiance of all of the physical laws of the world she knew.

If he goes deep into the Hive, we'll lose the bastard, Dana thought. She hadn't intended for that to get out through the link, but a moment later she heard the retort, Well, maybe that wouldn't be... wait! He's ducking into a warehouse... it's just a few blocks from the main drag. I thought I saw a bruiser let him in, damn, the place looks like a fortress.

Dana came to an abrupt stop. Give me a fix on your location, and a relative direction and distance to the target.

There was a momentary pause. Dana... are you sure that's a good idea? Remember the last time you tried that...

Just DO IT!

She felt a slight surge along the link. The rings had been damned expensive, and having the status power added to the telepathic bond had put a hefty premium on the devices. But they'd already proven their worth several times over even in the relatively short time she'd been here. The thought made her regret her harsh tone over the link. She was getting frustrated, but it made no sense to take it out upon her cohort.

Apology accepted, she heard, through the link. All right, it's sixty paces coreward and fifteen rising arc from my position. Should put you right behind the door, or damned near it.

Thank you, LL.

Be careful; if there's trouble I'll try to get to you, but...

I know, she thought, then she spoke a word and vanished through a dimension door.

The bustle of the street was replaced by the dank interior of the warehouse. She was in a roughly square chamber thirty feet on a side, mostly empty save for some debris cluttered against the walls. Iron posts reinforced the ceiling, and the few murky windows tucked under that roof, thick with the accumulated muck of years, were both incredibly narrow and warded with thick iron bars. There were two other doors besides the one that led outside; presumably they led to other quarters of the building.

And standing directly in front of her, his back to her, was her quarry.

Her arrival had not gone unnoticed. Mocker Darr turned, his disfigured face twisting into a scowl as he saw her. Behind him, near the door, stood a pair of bugbears, clad in black chainmail that blended with the deep shadows of the room. The door itself was built like the portal of a vault, with a heavy iron wheel mechanism in its center that drove four thick bolts into the surrounding threshold.

Dana reached for the tiefling, but he was faster, his reflexes obviously supernaturally empowered as he leapt back several feet, between his goons.

“Put this berk in the dead-book!” Darr snarled, drawing two daggers with a flick of his wrists. Even in the bad light, greasy smears were visible along the lengths of the blades. The bugbears produced ugly jagged-edge shortswords that also probably were poisoned, and started menacingly forward.

Dana uttered a holy word.

As the echoes of the pure syllable faded off of the heavy iron plates that made up the walls of the place, the priestess of Selûne stepped forward to stand over Mocker Darr. She kicked the daggers out of his hands, and then knelt beside him. The tiefling lay quivering upon the ground; the bugbears were both unmoving, blood trailing in soft red currents from their ears. Dana took a few seconds to expertly search the tiefling, then looked down at him.

“I know you can hear me,” she said. “Your eyesight will return in a few moments, but you’re not going to be able to move for a rather longer than that. What happens after that... well, that’s up to you.”

Hey, are you going to let me in or what? came a voice in her mind.

Sorry, she thought, standing and stepping toward the door.

She hadn’t covered the first step when one of the room’s other doors burst open, and a chittering horde of mezzoloths poured into the room, screaming for her blood.

Chapter 511

They were on her in seconds. Dana regretted not having a second holy word handy; she’d been relying heavily upon divinations since arriving here, and two greater scryings per day had proven more necessary even than the devastating power of the former spell.

She dodged back as the first rank of insectoid fiends rushed at her. Pain blossomed along her side as one grazed her with one of the tines from its trident. The weapon was barbed, designed to cause particularly vicious wounds, but despite her apparent vulnerability, the priestess was warded with a number of potent magical protections. The second mezzoloth found this out as it thrust its weapon at her chest, only to have the blow turned by the defensive auras projected by her moon bracers and ring of protection.

Dana! came the voice through the link.

Busy! she shot back, moving further back before the 'loths could encircle her, leaping into the air as her winged boots carried her out of the reach of their tridents. Several of the fiends hurled their weapons at her, but none scored a hit as she twisted nimbly in mid-air out of their streaking paths. As she gained clearance over them—it looked like there were about a dozen!—she caught sight of a shadowy figure that remained in the doorway, fixing her with a stare infused with a tangible malevolence.

That would be the boss, she thought, her suspicion confirmed an instant later as a crackling black beam—a ray of enervation—shot out from the creature and stabbed into her gut. She felt the icy touch of the beam spread through her body, although her life energy was strong enough to mostly resist the fell power of the necromantic magic.

The mezzoloths could not reach her as she lifted almost to the ceiling fifteen feet above. But the fiends had magical power, and before she could venture her next course she could feel surges of energy from them, seeking to disrupt her magic. Her own spells were of far greater potency than the power commanded by these lesser fiends, but her boots were not, and she realized her error even as a dispel took hold, and she plummeted straight down into the knot of waiting fiends.

And if that wasn't bad enough, another of the 'loths conjured up a cloudkill that spilled out over the chamber floor, forming a plume of sick green vapors that swallowed her up as she fell.

Chapter 512

Dana! I'll get you out of there... I'll break the icon ...

Dana coughed as the acrid fumes of the cloudkill burned her lungs, dodging madly as the mezzoloths swarmed upon her, stabbing at her with their tridents. Already several gashes covered her arms and legs, but thus far she'd avoided a serious injury. There was no way that that could continue, though, she knew, but even so she sent a strong response back through the link.

NO! If we lose Darr, we may never find Barrat Ghur!

She could feel the frustration that came back through the link, but her cohort respected her will, did not sunder the small icon that she'd given to him, prepared with a refuge spell as a last-ditch escape mechanism.

The cloudkill did not hinder the 'loths in the slightest, as they were immune to toxins. But it did at least grant her some cover, obscuring her from the yugoloth leader and from those of the mezzoloths that weren't right upon her, stabbing with their tridents. Casting defensively, she drew down a flame strike that slammed down into their ranks. The 'loths were heavily resistant to fire, but the divine energies in the blast ripped through their spell resistance and into their corrupt bodies. Several of the mezzoloths were incinerated by the power of the spell, and the flames tore into the rank of attackers in front of her, drawing chattering cries of pain as the blast seared them from behind.

“Don’t like that, do you?” she cried. Driven to fury, the ring of attackers thrust at her with renewed vigor, but in the confusion of smoke and swirling vapors only one attack hit, opening another shallow gash across her bicep. A few of the ‘loths tried to return the favor she’d offered with her spell to summon balls of fire that they hurled at her, the fist-sized gobs of flame streaking brightly through the fog to splash across her cloak. But Dana had taken the precaution of protecting herself against several types of elemental energy before she’d stepped foot inside the Cutter’s Folly, and the little blasts of flame inflicted no harm upon her.

She took advantage of the disruption caused by her spell to infuse herself with divine power. That cost her another pair of gashes, but they were offset by the surge of vitality that flowed into her through the spell.

She drew out her adamantine nunchaku, and stared out at the ring of glowing red eyes that surrounded her out in the fog. The toxin was starting to affect her, but her fortitude was such that she could ignore its effects, at least for a few moments. The cloudkill had spread to fill the entire chamber, the vapors rising up to the rafters above, so there was no easy escape, save for transporting herself out of here. But to do that would be to yield Mocker Darr, and her best chance of finding Benzan.

That, she would not do.

“Let’s dance then, you fiendish bastards,” she snarled, snapping out the nunchaku, crushing the skull of the nearest mezzoloth with a powerful blow of the adamantine weapon. Another came forward to take its place, its body blackened from Dana’s flame strike.

A massive clang filled the room, the sound only slightly muted by the cloying toxic fog. Dana didn’t turn, but a few of the mezzoloths glanced in the direction of the door, built to withstand a siege.

Dana grimaced and fought on. The mezzoloths were starting to score more hits, now, with her flanked and slowly weakening from the cloudkill. A few more hurled dispels at her, trying to bring down her defensive wards, but their efforts were futile against the power of her magic.

The clanging noise continued, growing in intensity.

A dark shadow materialized out of the fog, taller and leaner than the bulbous mezzoloths. Dana did not see it immediately, but she felt the touch of a spell, as a cold voice sounded in her mind.

Lay down your arms, and cease this foolish struggle, and we can talk, it said. We can provide you with the information you seek...

For the barest instant, she hesitated. But finally, in reply, she laughed. “Nice try, fiend! Your feeble suggestion is of no avail against me!”

The ultroloth, however, merely lifted a black hand, drawing upon the power of its magic once more. Dana, alerted to its threat by its initial attack, immediately hurled another flame strike that descended upon it in a twisting blaze of raging fire. The 'loth withstood the blast—although several mezzoloths around it were incinerated—but it took the hint, withdrawing back into the mists.

But a moment later, pain exploded through her back. A mezzoloth had waited for her attention to shift away, and took advantage of her casting to drive its trident forward, impaling the jagged spines solidly into her back. She staggered forward and fell to her knees, the insectoid fiends surging forward to finish her.

Chapter 513

Benzan... I'm sorry, Dana thought, as the mezzoloth behind her continued to tear at her back, while the others stabbed at her face and upper body from ahead and to her sides with their tridents.

A last massive clang sounded, followed by a terrible noise of creaking metal that culminated in a loud resounding crash. The mezzoloths turned as the poisonous cloud shifted and swirled from the disruption. A dark form streaked forward out of the mist, massive, nebulous as it caromed into the mezzoloth standing behind Dana. The insectoid fiend simply vanished, borne off into the fog with the newcomer.

The mezzoloths, surprised by the sudden development, hesitated for just an instant. That respite was enough to give Dana the opportunity to summon a heal spell, fully restoring herself, burning away the toxic effects of the cloudkill. Too late, the mezzoloths surged at her again, but even as they stabbed at her she leapt up, spinning around in a wide arc, her nunchaku laying about in a deadly barrage of powerful blows. Fortified by her divine power, each impact sundered chitinous exoskeletons and segmented limbs. More mezzoloths staggered forward to fill the gaps as she killed, but all bore the marks of her flame strikes, and it was clear that the fiendish surge was abating.

The hulking newcomer returned, catching the fiends from behind. He was big, standing nearly eight feet tall, covered in fur that seemed a pale gray in the weak light and swirling vapors. He snarled as two of the mezzoloths turned on it, lashing out with powerful claws that delivered crushing blows against their alien bodies. The first twisted and chattered madly as the creature snared it and dragged it up to his powerful jaws, and its struggles abruptly ended as they closed upon its head in a nasty crunch. The second one tried a single feeble stab of its trident, but when that failed to even scratch it, it turned and tried to retreat.

It didn't get very far.

Dana was left facing five of the yugoloths, but her violent attacks were quickly driving down that number. The ultroloth had not reappeared, and the fiends seemed to come to the belated realization that this fight was not going to end in their favor. Once the rout began it ended quickly, with the fiends drawing upon the power and teleporting away. Or at least most did; Dana caught another from behind as it tried to draw upon its power, smashing its back with two powerful blows and then snapping her weapon down upon its neck as it fell.

That's the last of them, her cohort said. Are you all right?

“Get Darr,” she said aloud, calling upon a dispel magic that cleared away the toxic cloud. As the room came back into focus, she could see the battered-down iron door, as well as the iron fence-post that her cohort had used as an improvised battering ram.

As the cloud dissipated, she could also clearly see him. He was an impressive humanoid with animalistic features, covered in fur and a loose-fitting toga that was ruined with yugoloth blood and stains from its exposure to the cloudkill. His long limbs ended in sharp talons, and his face was clearly feline, with dark blue eyes that fixed Dana intently. His jaws did not look to be suited to speech, but when he spoke it was without accent or any apparent difficulty.

“Bah,” he said, spitting out a mouthful of gore. “I’m not going to get that taste out of my mouth for a month.”

“You’ll get over it, LL,” she said, looking around the room. She quickly searched the landscape of corpses to confirm that the yugoloth leader was not among them. There were sixteen dead mezzoloths scattered around the room, many with their black carapaces scorched with divine fire. But her interest lay elsewhere, as she turned to Mocker Durr.

The tiefling’s features were green, but he still breathed, his breath rattling in his throat as he fought to draw air into his poison-ravaged lungs. His left hand was outstretched, trembling as he tried to close his fingers on the grip of a dagger, but the paralyzing effects of Dana’s holy word still held him. She checked him quickly, to make sure that he wasn’t in danger of dying from the poison in his system. Thus satisfied, she crouched over him on the balls of her feet, where he could see her clearly. The lion-man came over to loom threatening behind her, sending an obvious message.

“Now, Darr. It’s time for you and I to have that little talk.”

Chapter 514

A thick, cloying heat hung over the city of Suldolphor, dry and clinging despite the presence of the adjacent straits that connected the Shining Sea with the Lake of Steam. Not even the slightest promise of a breeze offered relief to the residents of the city this day. From the distance a wavering haze hung over the blocky tan expanses of the city’s wards, crowded upon the slender peninsula upon which the city perched. The sea of brown was broken only where the sunshine glittered brilliantly off of a bulb-shaped tower covered in leaf of precious metals, in the wealthier districts where temples or rich estates overlooked the more humble neighborhoods of the urban poor. Above all in terms of grandeur and brilliance was the spacious palace of the city’s governor, subject to the Syl-Pasha of Calimshan in name, but obligated to his nobles and merchant lords in practice. The city’s position on the wild frontier that was the lands upon the great lake, and its strategic location, ensured that its fortifications were not neglected. Iron-faced men clad in hauberks of bronze rings, despite the heat of the day, stood vigilant upon massive walls thick enough for wagons to pass each other upon the battlements.

But despite the glories of the city's temples and palaces, most of the city of Suldolphor was characterized by narrow, twisting streets that wound unpredictable paths between rows of tan multistory structures stacked atop each other like crates jumbled in a warehouse. The Old City nearest the bluff overlooking the straits was fashioned mostly out of weathered granite, buildings hundreds of years old, but the sprawling districts outside the inner wall were built mostly of mud brick. In the humid climate those structures had to be rebuilt frequently, giving the city the look of a patchwork of old and new in constant juxtaposition. One hundred and forty thousand people were crowded into the space within the outer walls, a tidepool of teeming life.

The smells of the city core were likewise layered, with the sizzles of meats mixed with the stench of animals and people crowded into too small a place. In these crowded alleys the sea breezes rarely penetrated, and when the autumn rains came they often created short-lived but violent floods that purged the streets of the gathered filth and detritus of the long, hot summer. On many streets the buildings on either side, stacked with floors piled tentatively one upon the other, leaned inward until they almost touched, leaving only a sliver of blue sky above that was almost tantalizingly distant. Within those warrens the noises of the poor neighborhoods could be almost deafening, the words, cries, and screams of its residents overlaid with the barking of dogs, the lowing of cattle, and above all the constant buzz of insects—the one race that outnumbered all others by a considerable magnitude.

Suldolphor was a unique city in that its rich and poor were often juxtaposed in an odd medley; it was possible to leave a richly appointed temple of Deneir, make a wrong turn, and end up in a dead end alley where urchins in tattered linen tunics swarmed like hungry rats. Few could claim to know fully the maze of the city's streets, and fewer still knew all of the hidey-holes and arcane mysteries tucked here and there, offering opportunity and danger for those seeking either.

In the back room of a small, nondescript shop, one of the most dangerous men in Faerûn sat in a small chair behind an ancient desk cluttered with a miscellany of unusual objects. A thin thread of white incense rose into the air from a censer placed on one of the dozen or so shelves that lined the wall behind him, filling the air with an odor strong enough to make the head swim. The place was uncomfortably hot, but the man appeared to be unaffected by the heat, and in fact wore a heavy linen tunic that was bulky enough to have hidden almost anything within its layered folds. His face was lined with the folds and crags of a difficult life, the flesh a rich olive brown, but he could have been fifty years or eighty, the specifics of him difficult to discern in the dim interior.

The man sat watching keenly the only other occupant of the chamber. His guest was a tall, lean man, clad in a voluminous robe in the style of a Calimshite nobleman or wealthy man of business. The scimitar at his waist looked to be more for show than for use, with the rich ivory inlay of the hilt unworn by experience. But he looked no less dangerous for that, especially when one took the time to look into his cold, hard eyes. Those gray orbs weighed the smaller man much as he himself was being weighed, and for a moment there was a quiet détente between the two in the silence of the crowded chamber.

“You have come a long way,” the older man finally said.

“I have,” the rich lord said. “Your organization comes highly recommended as the best at what it does. I have need of the best.”

The older man nodded, taking up a tiny cup from its perch on the edge of his desk, and lifting it to his lips. When it became clear that he was not going to immediately respond, the man in the noble garb continued. “It is my understanding that you are not limited by distance, so long as the target is upon Faerûn. You have access to powerful magic, and are accustomed to dealing with powerful foes with unique talents.”

The older man took another sip of his beverage and put down the cup. “You are well informed.”

The rich man inclined his head slightly. “The price, of course, would be commensurate with the difficulty of the task,” he said. He produced a small bag from an inside pocket of his robe, and leaned over to place it upon the desk. He shook it slightly, so that some of the contents spilled out onto the table. They were small cubes, maybe an inch on a side, and even in the limited illumination were instantly obvious as platinum.

The man glanced at them. “The runes, on the sides?”

“The cubes are enchanted with a magic that keeps them at this size. When the trigger word is spoken, each cube becomes a block of the metal ten inches on a side. One thousand times the current volume, solid platinum. There are fifteen within the bag. I could demonstrate with one, if you wish.”

The old man shook his head casually, as if the fact of such wealth—if the rich man’s terms were accurate, the sum value of the offer was not much less than a full year’s assessment of taxes of the entire kingdom of Calimshan—was just a small curiosity in the course of his daily business. “And the target?”

The rich man spoke a series of names. He produced a scroll from the same pocket where the bag had originated. “I have here descriptions and a list of the locations frequented by...”

He’d started to place the scroll beside the bag, but was forestalled by a negative shake of the man’s head. “I am sorry. We cannot accept this commission.”

The rich man’s expression betrayed more than a hint of anger. “If the offer is insufficient—”

“Not at all. The price is extremely generous.” He rose, the movement so fluid despite his casual stance and bulk that he seemed to organically flow from one state to the next. He turned to one of the shelves and its crowded collection of items, and from a hidden space drew out a small book bound in leather so dark as to be almost black. He offered it to the man, who opened it. The inside of the book was a single page of parchment, meticulously rich, carefully scraped so that no stray mark or remainder of past writing remained upon the page.

The rich man's look betrayed his recognition of the words scribed upon the page. Twenty names, penned in a neat script, organized into a numbered list.

"That list is updated twice a year," the old man said, settling back into his chair. "A considerable portion of my organization's efforts is dedicated to ensuring that it is current and accurate. As you can see, three of the names that you mentioned are on the list."

"I see. So these are individuals that your group will not interfere with."

The old man inclined his head slightly. "I am glad that you understand my meaning. I make no judgment about your interest in this matter, or offer evaluation upon the ability of my association or any other to complete the assignment. However, there are certain individuals, whether through personal power, organizational affiliation, or favor with the more powerful of the gods of Faerûn, who simply provide too much risk for an organization such as mine to countenance involvement. If you like, I can suggest a few alternative groups who may be willing, perhaps."

"Perhaps a partial commission, for the names not on the list?"

The old man shook his head. "In this case, it is a matter of association. All of those individuals you cited are closely involved, as no doubt you yourself know. And I suspect that at the next revision of the list, all of the individuals you cited will ultimately end up upon the page. Assuming their rise does not meet a premature interruption," he added, with a slight nod to the visitor.

The rich man nodded. "Very well then. I thank you for your time."

The old man smiled and sat quietly while the other stood, placing the black book upon the desk, recovering his bag and the rune-marked cubes that had spilled out. Neither made an effort at further communication as the richly robed man turned and left. He did not even bother to fully depart through the beaded curtain that led out into the front of the shop before he shimmered and vanished, teleporting away.

The old man sat there for a few long moments, looking at the contents of the black book, sipping his drink. Despite his deferral of the rich man's commission, he knew that his organization would have to conduct some follow-up on this matter. Even though the Society of Stealth was not going to be directly involved, when a greater demon showed up looking for assassins to take out some of the most powerful individuals currently alive upon Faerûn, it was a matter to be noted.

Chapter 515

The chant sounded off of the thick stone walls of the vault, amplifying the sound and adding a sonorous echo reminiscent of a dirge. Flickering flames atop a half-dozen candles set in sconces along the perimeter of the room dimly illuminated the six figures that were the source of the chant. The dark forms, clad in body-concealing black robes with heavy cowls, were arranged in a circle around a rune-inscribed ring etched into the ancient stone blocks of the floor. A dank mustiness filled the place, and lichens grew in the cracks of the walls, hinting that this subterranean vault was linked to the sewers that kept the city above clean and orderly. The very place seemed suited to mysterious and secret activities, such as the ritual underway here.

From deep in the shadows, Zev'vat observed the ritual. His eyes hovered briefly over Grendalla, her back to him at her position at the "head" of the circle. His lips tightened briefly in some unfathomable emotion. It certainly wasn't affection, despite the fact that the leader of this cult cell had welcomed him and gladly professed her loyalty to Graz'zt with the offering of her body. Her depravity had been... well, after experiencing the dark orgies held within the Argent Palace, back before the Disaster, anything that these mere mortal followers could come up with seemed pathetic by comparison.

The chant intensified, and in response a green aura began to coalesce within the ritual. Zev'vat watched closely. The kelvezu had almost immediately gauged that Grendalla was not up to the task that he required of her. Her little coven was weak and craven, scuttling around in the foul pits beneath this prosperous western city. But to be truthful, the demon was forced to admit that he had few choices left with which to work. Graz'zt's followers had suffered along with the calamitous decline of their sponsor, and most of the once-potent cells had long since been overrun or turned by the demon lord's powerful rivals. A few had even fallen to non-demonic cults, absorbed by the followers of this Prime's gods of evil. Those that had remained loyal, like Grendalla's little company, had been forced to lie low, crawling into the dark places under rocks where they could linger unseen.

The chant broke up as a flare of silver energy passed through the circle and into the growing green nimbus within. Screams erupted from the cultists as the silver fire intensified, binding them to the swelling disruption that now began to take on a distinct form, bridging the barrier between worlds.

Zev'vat watched the final stages of the ritual intently. It had been he who had modified the ceremony, drawing the power lacking in the cultists by using their very life forces as a power source. Grendalla, of course, he had not informed of the consequence of the change, and she had trusted him, much to her misfortune.

The ritual concluded, the silver light, green field, and cultists all snuffed out at the same moment. The summoning circle had been broken, but the five individuals now standing within made no move to exit. Zev'vat came forward, and addressed the leader.

He was easily discernable. His—if it was in fact a he—companions were all naked, the candlelight glistening off their hides, skin as black as the darkest night. Their bodies were perfectly smooth, bearing no hair or obvious genitalia, no hint at all in fact as to their gender, if they even had such. Each stood just over eight feet in height but was incredibly broad, almost like Faerûnian dwarves in the construction of their forms. Their muscles suggested great strength, and no bit of flesh appeared to be wasted upon them. Their faces were alien, noseless, with narrow slits for eyes and wide mouths that stretched across the full expanse of their faces. Each of the four escorts bore a single weapon, a bar of black metal resembling a sword but without a cutting edge on either side, the whole nearly five feet long.

The leader was clad in a simple one-piece garment, a violet drape that covered his torso, fastened around his waist with a piece of thick brown rope. He carried a gnarled staff of gray wood, carved with tiny symbols that seemed to shift slightly when the eye passed over them, creating new meaning. He watched Zev'vat intently, waiting. Neither he nor his escorts paid any heed to the corpses scattered around them.

"I greet you, Shaman of the M'butu," the kelvezu finally said, offering a short bow.

The Shaman made a clicking sound that seemed to originate deep within his chest. "We have come to the call." He looked around at his surroundings. "This place is most unpleasant." His escorts were in fact shivering, although by the way they carried themselves, it seemed as though they would simply stand there and freeze to death before they admitted discomfort.

"You need not remain long. Once the service for which I have summoned you is complete, you may return to your world." The kelvezu did not mention the means for that return, given the death of those who had facilitated the initial transition, but the Shaman did not seem troubled by that detail.

"We have come in service to the Six Fingered Man. If we complete this service, our obligation to the Six Fingered Man is complete, per the terms of our bargain."

The kelvezu nodded. "Agreed."

The Shaman's mouth opened slightly in a nasty parody of a smile; a whole lot of jagged teeth the color of old bones were visible within. "Speak then, what must be done."

Chapter 516

Cal spent his tenday in a much quieter fashion than his companions; he faced no fantastic monsters or dire plagues. But nevertheless, the gnome archmage was incredibly busy, and in that relatively short period of time he covered more ground than some merchants crossed in their entire lifetimes.

His interview with the Blackstaff was brief but fruitful. Khelben Arunsun, the Archmage of Waterdeep, was sympathetic to his situation, and was able to provide the gnome with access to several tomes and other sources of at least reasonably reliable information about the Abyss and its lords. There was a lot of misinformation about the Prince of Shadows, the master of Azzagrat, but Arunsun promised that he would dedicate more resources to the topic and forward any information he uncovered to Cal at the Traveler's Rest.

The Blackstaff was also able to help Cal in another way, granting him a recommendation that got him free access to the extensive library and laboratory facilities of the city's renown Mages' Guild. That was particularly useful, for while the Traveler's Rest had a decent study, Cal's resources were scant indeed in comparison to the rich amenities offered by the Guild to its inner circle of arcanists. Arunsun also gave Cal a reference to a contact at the Guild who was able to provide the gnome with a pair of items of great use to one in his position; a blessed book to augment his bulging, overfull spellbooks, and a small magical container akin to Dannel's efficient quiver, only designed to hold magical staves, rods, and wands. The ornate leather sleeve held up to twenty such devices, and produced the proper one upon a simple voice command. Given the recent growth in Cal's collection of such devices, the compact cylinder found a ready home at the gnome's belt.

Cal already had a good number of scrolls he wanted to scribe, and with the library of the Guild at his disposal he was set to make a good start at filling the magically-enhanced capacity of his blessed book. But first, he had other errands to complete. He still had a good quantity of treasure in his magical haversack, mostly specialized magical items left over from their errand at Skullrot, or from Hookface's horde. Those items required unique buyers, so he spent the better part of three days making contacts, collecting references from the other Guild mages, and even delving briefly into Skullport, the corrupt outpost situated deep beneath the city.

He had mastered the ability of magical teleportation, and almost every day he used the power at least twice, transporting himself to distant cities and returning later, worn out by full days of activity. With his greater teleport ability, honed to full potency by his archmage abilities, he could travel to destinations he'd never even visited, needing only a detailed description of the place upon which he could focus the energies of the spell. In that tenday he traveled to seven cities scattered all over the Realms, seeking out buyers for his remaining treasures, collecting more spells, or digging up small threads of information that each fit into the puzzle that he was constructing. That last, in particular, was especially troubling. Few knew much about Graz'zt, and even fewer were willing to speak of the demon prince openly. But what was odd was a pattern he was beginning to sense. Faerûn already had plenty of evil gods; the demon princes acted within a crowded field. But the hints that he learned suggested that Graz'zt's power had, of late, been in decline upon the Prime Material Plane. There were no hard facts to clarify this suspicion, and nothing at all about events upon the Outer Planes, and especially the Abyss. Cal actually knew more than most about Graz'zt's own realm, having traveled there personally, almost twenty years ago.

It was not a journey he was eager to make again.

Another errand he'd attended to shortly after his meeting with the Blackstaff. While in Waterdeep, he traveled to the busy crafts district situated along the broad avenue that led up from the city's docks. It had been decades since he'd lived in the city, but a few probing questions and well-placed gold pieces led him to the shop of a craftsman who could fulfill the unusual commission that he had in mind. A much larger quantity of gold set his request in motion. Toward the end of the tenday, he returned, and accepted a fairly large bundle wrapped in cloth that barely fit into the extradimensional space within his haversack.

The rest of his time he spent in a private cubby deep within the Guild library, scribing spells into his book. Even here he was forced to choose among the new spells he'd collected, and while he would have liked to scribe a few scrolls as well, there was no time. The lazy pace of magical item creation he'd followed over the last decade, while the Rest had been constructed, and Ember Vale grew from a waystop into a community, seemed a lost luxury.

Finally, on the last day of the tenday since he'd left Lok and Mole at that distant outpost so far away in the North, he returned home. He materialized in the small secure chamber beneath the Rest, and despite his exhaustion carefully disabled each of the wards that were designed to ensure a most unwelcome reception to those who arrived uninvited. After securing the heavy iron door behind him, he headed up the stairs, crossed directly to his room, and without even bothering to undress collapsed into his bed, instantly falling asleep. Outside, the last glimmers of the sun were already vanishing over distant western horizon, but the gnome was oblivious to the coming of the night.

Chapter 517

Although Cal missed the sunset, there was another watching that evening, the fading rays of the setting sun glistening off the gray orbs of his eyes. Below, spread out before the low, lightly wooded ridge upon which he perched, the watcher looked intently upon the community of Ember Vale as the cluster of buildings snug within the walls became indistinct in the deep shadows of twilight. A few lights appeared within the community as the night deepened, flickering points like the glitter of the fey-ra insect, back in his own Reality.

The Shaman of the M'butu lingered until the village was all but invisible in the gathering dark. He rose and departed, moving back into the scattered trees that spotted the ridge. His destination was a copse of scraggly trees that had grown together in a small dip in the ridge, forming a rocky dell where enough soil had settled to support their efforts.

The ground was treacherous, but the Shaman had no difficulty making his way down the uneven descent. As he reached the bottom of the dell his four guards materialized around him out of the dark, making no noise with their movements despite their size and bulk. They were clad now in plain gray robes of heavy wool that could not fully disguise the alien cast of their features, a necessary adjustment to what was for them a bitterly cold Reality. The garments did not fit well, but they served the Soldiers of the M'butu more than their former owners, the late cultists of Graz'zt whose bones were currently being gnawed by vermin in the sewers beneath the city of Scornubel.

The Shaman did not feel any such concerns; for him such minor considerations as temperature and climate were far beneath his notice. This Reality was alien, hostile, but his link to the Spirit World was still potent, his bond pulsing in a beat that was both different and familiar at the same time. He could feel the life that filled this place, tiny beads of heat in the cold surroundings of this place. Those creatures sufficiently aware of their Reality could sense what he was, and they had fled before him, knowing only that an intruder had come among them, and that he was foreign, threatening, Danger. The Shaman could have masked his coming, or compelled them to him, but thus far he had not bothered with either.

The Soldiers spread out, taking up defensive positions around the perimeter of the dell. He ignored them, kneeling beside a small mound of earth formed against the tangled root mass of one of the trees. Making a deep-pitched clicking sound in his chest, he used his staff to draw crude markings in the packed dirt. Then he reached into the ground, his powerful fingers breaking through the hard surface and turning the softer soil beneath. His fingers felt the fibrous length of a root, and he drew his hand back, pulling away the ground from the mass of the tree.

Tiny things squirmed in the ground. The Shaman clucked in approval, watching the insects, sensing their dim awareness of their Reality. A small form crawled over the exposed root—a beetle, perhaps an inch long. The Shaman extended his hand and captured it. The beetle, displeased at the rough treatment, bit his finger.

The Shaman's mouth twisted in that grim smile.

Chapter 518

Cal came awake suddenly. He was a light sleeper, but there was always still that brief moment of disorientation, when dream had not yet fully faded, and reality had not yet fully settled around him. But his years as an adventurer had honed his awareness, and within a few seconds he was already gathering his magical items, placing each in its proper place upon his person.

As of yet, he wasn't sure what had awakened him.

Taking up a tiny brass lamp invested with a continual flame, he quickly headed up the narrow stairs that connected the tower's three above-ground and two below-ground levels. Now that he was fully awake he could better sense what had alerted him, a subtle vibration through the stones of the tower, not really a deep sound, the rumbling of an earthquake, but something else, something that his long experience told him likely equated to trouble. If it was a direct assault upon the tower, then the many multilayered wards upon the place would have warned him, but that alone did not mean safety.

He paused only momentarily at the top of the stairs; first to cloak himself in greater invisibility, an action that had become almost instinctive to him. Like his ability to teleport, his advancing talents as an archmage had grown to the point where he could summon that power without preparing the spell in advance, up to four times a day. Once protected from casual view, he spoke the password to bypass Dana's glyph, one of many that protected the tower and its inhabitants. The door itself was of hardened steel set deep into the surrounding stone threshold with sheltered hinges, but the complex lock responded quickly to Cal's expert hands. Shuttering the lamp, tucking it into one of his many pockets, he stepped out onto the roof of the tower.

The night was warm for the season. Although the moon had set, the stars twinkling high above cast enough light through the thin gauze of cloud cover high above to allow him to at least make out in general the outlines of buildings, walls, and in the distance, the low hills that hovered on the horizon to the north and east.

The landscape clearly showed the work of human hands, the random curves and dips of the land shaped into more regular patterns that resulted from deliberate cultivation. In the years since Ember Vale had begun around the nucleus started by Cal and his companions, farms had sprung up along the roads to the east, west, and north. Most of the farmers still lived within the walls of the village itself—this area, still known as the Fields of the Dead, was far from tame—but Cal could see the low forms of at least a half-dozen barns and other compact structures out to about a half-mile beyond the walls, beyond which point the night made everything vague, even to his sharp gnomish eyes.

And he could also see the source of what had alerted him.

In the near-darkness it looked like a barn itself, a massive oblong shadow cloaked in black that blended with the deep of the night. But then it moved, skittering—that was the best word he could think of to describe its motion—across the plowed expanse of a field, and as he watched, it crashed into a low barn that stood between the field and the adjacent road. The barn was a sturdy structure—Lok had helped in the building—but it gave way before the... thing... in a loud crash of shattering wood that carried clearly to him even across the intervening quarter-mile or so that separated him from its location.

A few lights appeared in windows in the village below. Apparently others had heard it as well. But Cal was already casting, blending shadow and ether to conjure an ally to his side. The shadow conjuration resolved much faster than a typical summoning spell, and within seconds a bralani stood beside him, hovering on an invisible current of air.

“Go out there and investigate what that thing is, quickly,” he instructed it. “Do not engage, and report back to me in thirty seconds.”

The bralani nodded, transforming itself into a whirlwind that lunged into the air above the tower. Even as the shadow-creature sped off into the night to obey his commands, his mind was darting nimbly down other paths. Dana was out, inaccessible on Sigil. He worried about her; she’d kept to her word in terms of the updates via sending, but those brief reports hadn’t really elaborated on the subtext that Cal could sense was there. Lok was upon Faerûn, or more precisely under it; and that was the problem. Cal was all too familiar with the scattering effect upon teleportation magic in the dark places beneath the surface of the world.

Cal was not without other friends, but most of them were protected against casual scrying, and had to be contacted through more complicated processes that he did not have time for at the moment. That left two options, but either would involve a percentage of failure.

The bralani came speeding back exactly upon schedule, but by the end of its appointed thirty seconds Cal had already cast another spell, summoning a quintet of lantern archons, their shining glow dimmed somewhat by the infusion of shadow-stuff that comprised them. They hovered around him, awaiting command, as the bralani knifed down and resumed its humanoid form a few feet before him.

“The intruder is a gargantuan stag beetle,” the shadow-outsider report. “It is not alone; there are a number of equally enormous centipedes approaching this settlement from the north and west.”

Cal nodded; the information confirmed what he’d already suspected. “Attempt to distract the beetle away from the village,” he commanded the bralani. It nodded, and sped off in another whirlwind of focused air. “Tell the villagers in the structures below this tower that Cal instructs them to take shelter in the cellars, under a heavy table or other such cover,” he said to the archons. The archons likewise moved quickly to obey, but he was already running toward the door that led back down into the tower. He could still hear the sounds of destruction coming over the battlements as the beetle continued its swath of destruction.

And he thought he heard something else, a distant buzz or hum that did not improve his feelings about this situation one whit.

Wasting no stray movements, he darted swiftly down the stairs, two levels down to his study. The ornate mirror was where he had left it, and it took only a few seconds to cast the spell. Fortunately he had not used his greater scrying spell on the previous day, so he still had it burning on the periphery of his memory. There were a number of spells that he would have chosen differently had he expected combat this day, but such musings were a waste of time at this juncture. Besides, one of the things that Cal had learned, as he and his friends had ascended to the heights of power, was that they could expect to be attacked at any time.

His reflection in the mirror grew cloudy, and then resolved into a new scene. It was dark, utterly so, but Cal directed a message toward the figure his sensor was focused upon. The man he'd scryed had been asleep, but a moment later, he got a reply, and the information he needed.

"The Traveler's Rest is under attack. I will be there in thirty seconds," he whispered, turning away from the mirror and rushing toward the stairs once more, toward the secured chamber beneath the tower outside of the effect of the dimensional anchor that Dana had bound to the citadel.

Chapter 519

The walled courtyard of the Temple of Helm in Cauldron was a beehive of activity, with a dozen torches driving back the night, glowing brightly on polished armor and bare weapons. Acolytes and Hammers in their blue tunics ran around as though they could do anything to help with what Cal needed. The gnome stood impatiently as the dwarves argued, tapping his feet, aware of the seconds ticking off in his head.

When he'd teleported into the courtyard of the Temple—the church itself and the rectory were both protected against magical teleportation much as the Rest was—he'd intended to simply grab Arun and return. Beorna had been with him, and he was happy to have her sword as well. But the noise of dwarven fighters arming and armoring themselves was more than enough to wake the entire temple community, among them Arun's former cohort, Balthazar Hodge, and another dwarf, a cleric of Moradin from his attire, mussed now as he hastily donned his heavy armor while continuing his argument with Arun.

"We should attend you on this mission, Chosen," the cleric was saying. "The Soul Forger has called you..."

"My friend has called me," Arun interrupted him, as Beorna helped him buckle the straps of his own armor. "I would feel better if you remained here in my absence, to help watch over the people of the city. As we were just reminded, many threats yet lurk in this place, threatening the recovery."

He glanced at Hodge, but the dwarf only shook his head. It was difficult to tell if he'd been asleep or not; he always looked the same whether falling into bed or tumbling out of it.

“Don’t bother layin’ that favored o’ the gods charm on me, I’m goin’,” he said. He shook off an acolyte who was helping him into his greaves. “Arright, I kin do the rest meself,” he growled, accepting his waraxe from a Hammer who had sense enough to quickly withdraw. “Never thought I’d be workin’ fer an outfit where a bunch o’ humans be helpin’ ter dress ye,” he muttered.

Arun smiled, taking his helm from another Hammer and settling it upon his head.

He’d changed in the relatively short time they’d last met, Cal could see, as the paladin turned toward him. The marking upon his brow was the most obvious aspect of that, of course, but there was something else, a new aura of authority that hung about him like a familiar cloak. Chosen... There was a tale here, to be certain. But right now, as the seconds since his arrival stretched into minutes, he had to go.

“I can take all four of you,” Cal said. “But whoever’s going, we’ve got to go now.” His imagination had always been fluid, but he didn’t need much prompting to picture what might be happening in Ember Vale as they spoke. He was not so much a fool as to deny the dwarves time to armor up, and he knew enough about Arun to know that letting the temple staff and his own Hammers help them was an expediency he would not have otherwise preferred.

Beorna had not offered a comment thus far, except to issue commands to her staff. Now she drew her adamantine sword, an eager look on her face beneath the heavy black helm of that same metal, marked with the sigil of her god upon the brow.

“Very well,” Arun said to the cleric, taking up a golden warhammer that seemed somehow... right in his hand. Cal wondered about the disposition of the paladin’s holy sword, but he did not waste the seconds to ask as he gestured for the dwarves to gather around him.

“We may need immediate mobility,” he said, touching each of them with his wand of flying, infusing them with its power.

“Bah, how tough can a bunch o’ giant bugs be,” Hodge opined, although he looked a bit leery. The other dwarves looked at him, but said nothing. Cal gestured again, and they all locked hands, adjusting so that they could quickly recover their weapons once the gnome’s spell of transportation was complete.

“We’ll go right to the center of the village,” he told them, and then teleported them across Faerûn.

They materialized exactly where he’d intended. The dwarves lifted their weapons and stepped away from the gnome, looking around.

The situation was one of utter chaos. Alien noises—chittering, a constant buzz, high-pitched squeaks—overlaid familiar sounds of destruction. Overhead shadowy blips the size of wagons darted across the edges of their vision before vanishing.

Their attention was drawn toward a massive crash directly ahead, in the direction of the main gate of the village. That barrier was now just gone, some of the heavy log constructs pounded into the dirt, other parts of it scattered around in a broad radius. But the sound had come from a long two-story structure, the village inn, its front half torn away by the massive beetle that was laying waste to the building.

Somehow it must have become aware of them, for as the companions looked up at the monstrous thing, easily forty feet long and slightly taller than the building it was crushing, the beetle turned back into the street and charged straight toward them.

Chapter 520

The surrounding buildings shook as the beetle charged down the street. The avenue was barely wide enough to accommodate it, and as it came it tore awnings, overhanging eaves, and porches free from their moorings, leaving them as trampled wreckage in its wake.

The dwarves did not hesitate, using the power Cal had granted them as they lifted off and flew directly at the massive vermin. The gnome remained behind, cloaking himself in greater invisibility almost as a reflex as he too rose into the air, careful to remain far from any structure that might threaten a collapse. He saw a number of the huge flying forms alter their course and immediately dive toward the dwarves; giant wasps, he saw, as they drew nearer. But even though he'd fought such creatures before, he'd never seen wasps this large; one could have carried off an elephant without straining itself.

"Incoming from above!" he shouted in warning. One of the wasps shifted its flight somewhat toward him, but even the good eyesight possessed by the vermin could not penetrate his invisibility.

Beorna and Arun met the beetle together, launching attacks upon its broad head from both sides as it charged. Arun's hammer smashed into its head with a resounding crack, but the beetle appeared more discomfited by the powerful slam that Beorna unleashed upon it with her two-handed blade. That second hit cracked the bug's thick hide, and it immediately twisted its head toward her, seizing her in its huge mandibles as it continued its headlong charge. Hodge, who had been just a few seconds slower than the others in lifting up off the ground, was caught in that rush and was trampled beneath it, bouncing off its armored belly before being knocked roughly aside by a churning leg as thick as the trunk of an ancient oak. Arun glanced off of the beetle's top as it surged past him, but he quickly recovered and darted back toward its head, where Beorna was struggling to get free of the beetle's powerful grip.

Umbar was out of the immediate path of the beetle, the dwarf cleric having lifted up and to the side before calling upon the divine power of Moradin to strengthen him. He lifted his hammer and started back toward the beetle, but was diverted as several of the gargantuan wasps dove at him. The priest met the first pass with a raised shield and a powerful swing, but was knocked roughly aside by the second wasp, which slammed its stinger hard into his back. The dwarf's heavy armor saved him from being impaled, but as he spun around again a thin trail of blood trailed from the thin crack that the stinger had punched through the layered plates. The dwarf lifted his hammer, looking for another target, but barely had time to get his shield up before a third wasp dove onto him, driving him down a full dozen feet with another powerful sting that hit his shield with enough force to dent the magical steel.

Arun streaked through the air a few scant feet over the multicolored expanse of the beetle's armored carapace, his hammer glimmering brightly in his hand. He saw Beorna, struggling mightily in the beetle's grip, its mandibles like the jaws of a steel trap as they crushed her within her armor. Only the fact that she was clad in adamantine had kept her from being cut in half by those inexorable pincers, but even that protection could not preserve her indefinitely. Seeing Arun, she groaned and called upon the power of Helm, drawing the god's strength into her as she heaved at the crushing jaws. Arun assisted her by delivering a precise strike that cracked one of the mandibles, loosening its grip enough for the templar to fall free. She had dropped her sword when it had seized her, but she did not hesitate in drawing her long dirk, thrusting it with all her might into the underside of the beetle's long head.

The beetle complained loudly at the assault upon it, releasing a high-pitched screech that echoed painfully in the helmets of the warriors. But Arun, positioned now to inflict some serious damage, launched into a full attack upon it. His hammer came down in a punishing series of blows, leaving the beetle's head pocked with great oozing cracks. But its sheer size ensured that it would take more than even Arun's best to kill it. Twisting its body in the middle of the street, its movement caving in the front of the house on the far side of the avenue, it reared up and caught up Arun against its jaws. With its mandibles damaged from the attacks upon it, it failed to get a grip in the dwarf, but that did not hinder it from driving forward, the paladin struggling but failing to break free before it drove its head—and Arun with it—into the front of the building on the near side of the street. The stone building was stoutly built. It had been Lok's smithy, until that moment; one of the first buildings to be constructed back when the village had been founded almost twenty years ago. But as the massive beetle drove into it with its unwilling passenger, the entire front of the building vanished in a cloud of pulverized stone and mortar, followed by a crash like the sound of the world breaking.

"Arun!" Beorna cried, knowing that the paladin would not hear her.

Chapter 521

Hodge caught a glimpse of the destruction of the smithy out of the corner of his eye, but although he shared Beorna's concern about the disposition of his friend and mentor, at that moment he had other matters more prominently on his mind.

When the beetle had run over him, caroming off its underbody and a slashing leg, he'd bounced hard off the ground and rolled to a stop in the middle of the street. His friends were putting the fight to the big bug, he knew, but even as he pulled himself to his feet—that "pop" he heard from his back couldn't be good, but he'd worry about that later—his attention was drawn back to the ruined gate of the village.

His eyes widened as a horde of giant centipedes literally poured through the gap, with those unable to immediately fit merely sliding over the wall to either side as though the fifteen foot stockade were a merely incidental obstacle. And it probably was, to bugs that were forty feet long if they were a foot! The dwarf suddenly became very aware of the fact that he was standing alone, very alone, in the middle of the street, as the flood came directly at him. But then he remembered himself, and he lifted his axe with a snarl. The straps of his shield had gotten snagged and torn from their moorings in his little misadventure with the beetle, so he shook it off, taking up the handle of the axe in both hands. He placed his feet with deliberation, taking up a defensive stance right were he was. Damned if he was going to move for a bunch of bugs!

“Arright, you ugly mothers, c’mon and get it!”

A stream of liquid energy infused with black wisps of shadowstuff tore through the night sky, arcing through the giant wasps assuaulting Umbar. The wasps suffered the full effect of the shadow evocation, the simulated chain lightning blasting through all three of those attacking the priest before culminating in a fourth that had started over to join in the commotion. But although it was obvious that the strike had driven them into a fury, to Cal’s disappointment none of them fell.

Umbar joined in the barrage, calling upon a flame strike that blasted two of the wasps heavily, including the one that had been the focus of Cal’s spell. That wasp was suffering now, its body blackened from the dual impacts, but it continue to buzz angrily at the dwarf, its abdomen darting ahead of its body with its deadly sting. Umbar drew back, but took another hit from the second wasp, and yet another from the third. Unable to outmaneuver the massive wasps, he was begin battered around like a child’s ball, and while his heavy armor had protected him thus far from being impaled, Cal knew from experience that those heavy blows had to be hurting him regardless.

“Get out of there!” Cal shouted, risking drawing attention to himself to forestall what he saw to be an inevitable outcome.

Umbar appeared to see it as well, for as he spun away from the latest impact he dove down, moving toward the base of the tower and the cover that it offered. But he had only covered a fraction of the distance when the fourth wasp shot down, intersecting the path of the cleric’s flight. It did not stab with its sting, but rather seized him with the hooked ends of its legs, holding him fast before turning and flying off rapidly with its passenger.

Cal began a casting to intervene, but adjusted his plan when he saw the other three wasps heading toward him, their wings beating with enough power to buffet him even fifty yards distant. They could not see him, he knew, but he’d already long since recognized that there were not only ordinary vermin, but that something... or someone... was directing them.

You’ll have to take care of yourself, he thought, before his mind shifted from Umbar’s plight to the pending difficulties of his own.

The cloud of dust and debris continued to surge around the head of the beetle as it drove deeper into the wreckage of the forge. There was no sign of Arun within that chaos, although with the beetle’s mass in the way it was unlikely that the glow of his magical hammer would have penetrated out into the night outside the ruined structure.

Beorna rose up off the ground, her sword a black slab in her hands. Her heart pounded with dread for Arun, but after the beetle had rammed the paladin into the building she'd known that her dagger wasn't going to be enough to stop it. She'd recovered her sword, narrowly avoiding being trampled by the beetle's surging hind legs, and now emerged from under it, moving forward parallel to its massive body until she was abreast of the point where its broad head joined to its body. Most of the head was lost in the wreckage of the ruined building, which the beetle continued to thrust against, as if intent upon reducing the forge to a mere smear upon the landscape of the town.

And somewhere within that building was Arun.

"By Helm!" she shouted, her loud cry sounding over the cacophony of the beetle's destruction of the forge. Her sword came down in a powerful arc, driven by the templar's considerable strength into that joint at the base of the beetle's chitinous skull. The thing was just too damned big for her to decapitate it, but nevertheless her sword pierced deeply, her own weight driving it and her downward, cutting an opening easily eight feet long in the side of the beetle's body. Black ooze erupted from the gap, splattering her as the beetle reared upward, turning toward her.

Beorna did not flinch, only bringing her sword up to strike again.

Hodge spat a gob of blood to clear his throat, sweeping his axe into the thick body of a centipede as it knifed past him. Blood splashed onto him from his other side, whipped by the gyrations of another centipede that he'd cut in half moments after it had delivered a painful bite to his shoulder. Twisting multisegmented bodies were everywhere, and he was lost in a writhing mass of bodies that were so intertwined that he could not tell where one ended and another begun. The heads, though... those he looked out for, for in addition to bludgeoning him with their bodies, the centipedes' true danger lie in their envenomed bites. His body burned with the poison he knew coursed through his veins already from the three hits that had gotten through his armor, but there was nothing to be done about that, so he ignored it. Besides, he was a dwarf; he was damned if he was going to let a few bug bites do him in.

"Yer want more? C'mon then, yer bloody bloomin' bastards!" He swept out his axe to meet a diving head, shearing half of it away, driving the centipede back chittering furiously. "Oh, yer want a piece?" he shouted, turning as a long body snapped against his back, nearly causing him to lose his footing. Thus far he'd maintained his stance, mostly because the sheer size of the creatures was hindering their own ability to swarm over him. He chopped into the body as it twisted past him, his axe unleashing a spray of blood and gore that fountained across his already befouled features.

"I got plenty fer all a---AAARG!"

Hodge staggered forward, nearly falling as a centipede head drove into him from behind with the force of a piledriver. The burning sensation in his torso intensified a dozen times over as the thing pumped what felt like a gallon of flaming hot oil into his body. Something hard clamped onto his leg, but he barely felt it through the numbness that seemed to fall over him like a blanket. No. He was... a... dwarf...

“That the best yer got...” he mumbled, as he turned, his fists tightening on the bloody haft of his axe. Bodies slammed into him, and something glanced hard off of his helmet with enough force to dent the steel, but he had his gaze focused on the centipede that had stung him, its long body already lifting for another strike.

“Come... an... get... it...” he managed, the words barely audible as he brought the axe—suddenly it seemed so heavy—up above his head.

The head snapped forward, jaws coming wide to engulf him.

Chapter 522

The axe and the centipede struck at the same time. A gout of blood erupted from the centipede’s head, and one of its mandibles went flying, severed by the magical sharpness of the blade. But even though it did not get a solid bite, the centipede’s head caromed hard off of Hodge’s arm, knocking the axe flying and spinning the dwarf nearly half around. Hodge looked around for his weapon, half-blinded by the bloody gore that caked the front of his helmet, but all he saw was the writhing mass of centipede bodies, both the ones still living and the still-moving ones he’d killed.

“Hodge!” came a loud, familiar voice from above. “Get out of there... fly upward!”

It was the gnome, his voice augmented by some kind of magic. The dwarf looked up, but couldn’t see anything except the wide open black of the night sky. Then he saw something... a small bead of golden light, falling from above toward him. For a moment the distractions of noise and blood and centipedes slamming into him faded into the background, as he watched the bright object descend. It fell to the ground right in front of him, a shining gold pellet perhaps the size of his thumbnail.

Fly!

Something clicked in his mind, and even through the haze of violence he felt a sudden flash of embarrassment. He’d forgotten that he was still empowered by the gnome’s magic!

A loud chittering drew his focus back to his surroundings. A pair of centipedes had risen up out of the mass, and were driving at him from his left and right, jaws gaping. Instinctively he leapt up, trusting the magic to know what he wanted to do. It did, the still-active fly spell carrying him straight upward.

But the centipedes did not give up their prey so easily; several lunged upward, their upper bodies extending dozens of feet into the air as they snapped at the dwarf’s feet. Bereft of his shield and axe, Hodge could only flail his legs as he willed himself upward.

“Faster, ye damned spell!” he shouted to the air.

And then, below him, the night exploded into day, as Cal’s second shadow evocation erupted into the blazing sphere of a delayed blast fireball. The centipedes were vaporized by the blast, and when it faded a circle forty feet across had been scorched into the street, that radius full of the steaming carcasses of the centipedes. A few still twitched, parts of their bodies outside of the area of the blast, but the impact had been devastating nevertheless.

Hodge looked down in amazement. Now that was something!

But then he heard a loud buzzing coming nearer, and he realized that his troubles were only just beginning.

Beorna flew backward in a desperate surge as the beetle surged up over her, slamming its flat head downward in an attempt to crush her against the paving stones of the road. A jutting segment of hard cartilage glanced hard off her shoulder, yanking her roughly down and around, but she continued her flight, narrowly darting out under its looming form moments before the beetle impacted the ground. The blow was hard enough to crack the pavement, but even though the force of it had to have injured it, it quickly lifted up its body, spreading its damaged jaws as it drove again toward Beorna.

It didn't have far to go. The templar was surging forward to meet it, timing her stroke precisely to cleave her blade deep into the center of its gaping maw. A huge hunk of its jaw went flying with the first stroke, and she did not relent, spinning into another swing that crunched mightily into the other side of its maw before erupting out of the side of its head in a spray of blood and jagged fragments of shattered chitin.

Despite its incredible size, the beetle was clearly feeling the effects of its wounds. Its front end was now a bloody ruin, but it still thrust itself forward, using its head as a battering ram as it drove into Beorna. The templar was unable to get out of its way in time, and the impact of its considerable mass drove her roughly back, flying straight until she caught the protruding edge of a building's roof that jutted out over the street. With a cry she twisted and fell in a clatter of roof tiles and wood fragments, landing with a jarring thud upon the ground below. She grimaced, clutching onto her sword with one hand; the other lay at her side, her shoulder dislocated by her collision with the roof.

She staggered to her feet, looking up to see the beetle charging straight toward her, with no place for her to go to escape it.

Chapter 523

Cal heard the buzzing of the wasps well before Hodge detected them coming. Still protected with greater invisibility, he nevertheless knew that whoever was directing the vermin would be able to guide them to his general location as long as he was casting spells. He'd already used a major image to distract the three wasps that had come after him, sending them on a futile hunt around the tower, but he knew that tricks and misdirection would only keep them at bay for so long.

And besides, Hodge, now hovering sixty feet above the street, made an all-too-inviting alternative target.

The wasps had spotted the dwarf as well, and made directly for him while he tried to collect his bearings. Using his rod to empower the spell, Cal disintegrated the first one, but the next two merely flew through the haze of fine ash left behind by the spell.

“Fly down, take cover!” he warned the dwarf.

“Fly up! Fly down! Make up yer bloody mind, gnome!” he shouted, but he nevertheless complied, descending behind the cover of the partially intact roof of the inn. One of the wasps followed him, but the other headed for the source of the spell, buzzing loudly toward the point where the disintegration ray had originated. It stabbed its stinger ahead of it, but it passed through only open air. It quickly turned and headed back to join its fellow in attacking the dwarf.

It only got a little way, though, before another green ray impacted it, disintegrating it as well.

Hodge ducked behind one of the inn’s chimneys, but the maneuver granted him only an instant’s respite as the wasp stung through the construction, knocking the dwarf back along the roof in a shower of shattered bricks. Hodge slid back and tumbled off the roof, but fortunately he remembered this time that he could still fly, and he recovered before he hit the ground below. He tried to dart behind the building, but the wasp was right on him following close behind as it tried to maneuver into position for thrust from its stinger. Hodge, already bitten and battered to the brink of unconsciousness, felt no desire to stop and engage it. He took the corner in a tight turn only moments before the wasp clipped the building, knocking hunks of wood and shattered masonry free from the structure. The turn had not slowed it significantly, and there was no place else for Hodge to go as the wasp descended upon him. Its stinger knifed forward...

And vanished, as Cal’s third disintegrate ended it.

Hodge drifted down the six or seven feet back down to the ground, breathing heavily as he glanced up at the sky. “Took ye bloody well long enough,” he groaned.

The colossal beetle clearly wasn’t planning on stopping as it charged straight toward Beorna and the building right behind her. The templar could not move her left arm, but she lifted her sword in her right, spitting out a challenge that ended in another invocation of Helm. But before the beetle absorbed the full span of her vision she caught sight of a streak of movement behind it, and felt a surge of relief pass through her.

Arun, covered in dust and blood, shone nevertheless in the bright nimbus of golden light that emanated from his hammer as he flew directly at the beetle from behind. Ignoring its lumbering bulk as he passed above it, he rose up about fifteen feet above before descending in a steep dive toward the back of its head. The cry of the Chosen of Moradin shattered the night as he drove his warhammer with both hands into the flat center of its head, smashing a plate of chitin the size of a dinner table and driving it down several feet into the soft mush below. The beetle’s brain, a tiny lump uncomplicated by mammalian features, was somewhere within that crushed mass, but it took a few moments for the insect’s body to get the message that it was dead. Beorna leapt aside as the beetle caromed hard into the house behind her, half of the structure collapsing in upon itself in a loud crash of wood, glass, and bricks. The thing actually rebounded, staggering out into the street before it collapsed in a noisome heap.

Arun flew down to where Beorna lay, knocked prone from a random blow from one of the beetle's thick legs in its death throes. "Are you all right?" he asked, helping her up. She grimaced as the motion stabbed pain through her injured shoulder.

"Shoulder... dislocated..." she managed to say. "Yank it back in for me."

Arun did as directed, adding a flow of healing magic that eased the templar's injuries. The paladin himself was in worse shape, his body battered from his treatment as a dwarven battering ram by the beetle, so she immediately started channeling her own magic into him, the soft blue glow fading from her hands into his body.

"What about the others?" Arun said, not pausing to enjoy the relief that Beorna was offering, already looking about for more foes. The sky was clear of wasps, however, and the only other vermin that still moved were a few centipedes that were clearly in the last throes of life.

"Umbar was carried off by one of the wasps," Beorna said. "I saw Hodge... over there, by the main gate." She didn't have to be more specific; they could both see the scorched mass of dead centipedes that dominated the street.

"We'd better start looking for them," Arun said, lifting up into the air once more, Beorna only a moment behind him. But even as they rose up above the wreckage of the village's main street, Arun caught sight of Umbar flying through the night sky toward them. A moment later, Hodge emerged around the corner of the ruined inn, walking with a clear limp, gesturing for them to join them rather than flying up to meet them.

Umbar joined Arun and Beorna as they landed in the street a short distance off from the blasted circle of bugs.

"Not natural, all this flyin' about," Hodge grumbled, as Beorna healed some of his wounds.

"Where's Cal?" Arun asked.

"I am here," the gnome said, materializing out of the sky above them, before drifting down to hover a foot above the ground, enough so that he could meet the dwarves at eye level.

"Where did those vermin come from?" Umbar said. He looked battered but apparently had already healed himself, as he seemed no more the worse for wear from his encounters with the wasps. "We have huge insects in the Rift, but I've never seen an attack upon a settlement like that."

"It was a coordinated assault," Cal said. "There was an intelligence behind the vermin, directing their attacks."

"Who would have a motive to assault you?" Umbar said.

“We have made more than a few... enemies,” Cal replied. “There’s one in particular, who would have an incentive to seeing myself and my companions dead.”

He looked at Arun as he said it, and the paladin nodded; he knew who the gnome meant. Beorna, too, frowned, her expression darkening. But Arun merely turned, sliding his hammer into the sleeve that lay across his back. “The people here will need help. We should check for survivors.”

The five of them turned to the task of helping the battered people of Ember Vale, who began to trickle out of their cellars, looking around in bewildered amazement at the destruction that had been wrought upon their village.

* * * * *

In the overgrown thicket behind the ridge, a little over a mile from Ember Vale, the Shaman of the M’butu opened his eyes. His black hide was slick with icy droplets of sweat that clung to him like frozen tears. But despite the lack of clothing the cold of the night did not touch him. He was momentarily disoriented, but his iron control did not falter, and he merely swayed for a few seconds before he had fully recovered from the j’kala trance. The drug would hinder him for some hours yet, but he had learned to deal with that.

The odd white moon of this Reality had set, leaving the dell cloaked in a deep darkness, but the Shaman did not need its light to sense his surroundings, or to see his Soldiers keeping their silent vigil around him.

His initial gambit had failed. He would have to sacrifice much for the next effort. The Shaman did not welcome that sacrifice, nor what the ritual would do to him, but the price would be paid. He did not trust the messenger of the Six Fingered Man, but for a chance for freedom for his people, no price was too high to pay.

The Shaman settled back upon the rough earth. The first attack had been just a probe, to test the defenses of his enemy. He would rest, gather his strength. His enemy might flee, or otherwise seek escape, but he did not believe that it was so. His initial attack had given him some degree of insight into his enemy. No, it was more likely that this first attack would alert them, drive them to caution, and perhaps draw the foes of the Six Fingered Man together.

In other words, exactly what the Shaman of the M’butu wanted.

Chapter 524

Cal and the dwarves got no sleep the rest of that night, in the aftermath of the attack on Ember Vale. The house that the beetle had slammed into in its final rush had collapsed in upon itself, trapping a family in a tenuous space beneath sagging supports in the cellar. Umbar summoned an earth elemental to help excavate the survivors before the structure collapsed. Others in the community had been injured in the attack, but thanks to Cal’s advance warning, no one lost their lives.

There was another close call in the wreckage of the town inn. The entire front facing of the building had been torn away, revealing the ruins of the common room on the first floor, and a row of sleeping rooms directly above. Arun and Beorna had been helping to free a young man who'd been pinned under the common room's long bar by a fallen beam, when a loud creaking sound drew their attention around in alarm. Two of the heavy struts supporting what was left of the ceiling had buckled against the beetle's assault, and the third was bent, the weathered wooden pillar cracked a few feet above where it vanished into the floor.

"We're going to lose it!" Beorna said, crouched under one end of the fallen beam, using her legs to slowly push it upward. Arun was at the other end with a broken shaft of piling as a lever, pushing it up enough for the templar to drag the man out of his prison. As soon as he was free, Beorna pushed the broken beam out of her way, picking up the groaning man as she staggered toward the gaping open front of the inn, Arun just behind her.

Their efforts seemed to push the tottering inn over the edge; the beam sagged with a loud creaking noise, and debris rained down on them from above as the ceiling edge tilted a foot downward. Beorna was hit solidly by a small table that fell down from the sleeping room above; fortunately she was wearing her helmet, and she merely sagged a bit, protecting the injured man with her body.

Arun staggered against the creaking pillar, driving his hands against it, willing it to hold.

"Come on!" Beorna shouted back at him.

"Get him out!" Arun shot back.

Several other pieces of furniture and broken boards from the sundered front wall clattered down as Beorna navigated the mess of debris and staggered out into the open street beyond. Once clear, she immediately laid the injured man down in a space far enough away from the inn to be secure, and turned back to where Arun remained inside.

But the danger had passed. As the templar reentered the stricken structure, she was surprised to see Arun still standing against the strut, which now stood straight, undamaged, holding the remaining ceiling securely in place.

"What did you do?" she asked.

The paladin drew off his helmet, and ran a gauntleted hand along the length of the strut. "I'm not quite sure."

By the time that all of the villagers had been safely gathered, and those that had suffered injuries had been treated, the eastern sky had brightened with the coming of dawn. Two homes, the inn, and the forge were either heavily damaged or destroyed, but the rest of the settlement had escaped damage. The main gate was a total loss, but that at least could be rebuilt swiftly with raw materials at hand.

The evidence of the battle was just those physical remains of buildings and fortifications, streaks of blood staining the ground and the blackened circle where Cal's shadowed fireball had struck. The giant vermin had disappeared within a few minutes of the battle's end. Cal had spent some minutes in the road where the outline of the fallen giant beetle could still be seen imprinted in the dirt. He finally found something; bending down, he lifted the dead beetle, now smaller than his forefinger. He looked at it for quite some time, thoughts swirling.

Fear and uncertainty was evident in the faces of the sixty people who gathered in front of the tower, even as the sun began to break above the horizon to the east. The dwarves were there, impressive with their heavy armor and weapons, and even Cal carried himself with an aura of somber dignity and presence as he stood atop a low masonry wall that separated the tower grounds off from the main road through the village. The people quieted, looking to their leader for reassurance, for despite the gnome's short stature, his reputation among the common folk of Ember Vale had been certified over the last twenty years. He was the Archmage, and his words carried weight.

"Friends," he told them, "We have suffered a violent assault upon our community. Thanks to the intervention of a few good friends," he indicated the dwarves with a nod, and sixty faces turned briefly toward them, "no lives were lost. We do not know who or what was behind this attack, but rest assured, we will not cease looking until we uncover the responsible party. Our buildings have suffered damage, but those can be replaced. Of more importance is the healthy and safety of our people... that, we will ever fight to ensure."

"Will there be more of them?" one of the villagers asked.

"In all honesty, we cannot be certain," Cal said. "For today, I ask that you not go out into the fields. Those whose homes were destroyed should stay with friends; we will set up quarters in the Commons Hall for people who do not have other options. If you can, help with the rebuilding effort; we will try and get the gate up again first, and then work on salvaging what we can of the damaged structures. Give me a day, and we will do what we can to determine the nature and dimension of the threat."

The faces of the villagers showed that they were not entirely reassured, but there was nothing that they could do except to shuffle off to their assigned tasks, or to return to their beds to catch up on lost sleep. The dwarves lingered, and accompanied Cal into the tower.

"A fine speech," Umbar said. "So what is it you intend to do?"

"Right now, I intend to get about eight hours of sleep," Cal explained. "And after that..."

He paused, his brow tightening as something seemed to flash through his thoughts.

"After that, we gather our forces, and take the fight to our enemy."

Chapter 525

Night began to descend over Ember Vale once more, accompanied this time by folds of gray clouds that drifted in from the west, promising rain before the coming of the dawn. The sun had already disappeared behind that mass, casting the evening twilight into a deep gloom. As the light of the day faded, the outlines of the village's buildings started to slip into vagueness, broken occasionally by the bright aura of a lantern or a burning brand set with deliberation to drive back the night. Several such lights haloed the restored gate, which looked durable despite its hasty construction earlier that same day. A few of the silhouettes that loomed within the encircling wall denied the apparent peacefulness of the scene, reminders of the attack that had come upon them a little more than half a day earlier.

Mole Calloran looked out over the valley from her vantage atop the battlements of the Traveler's Rest. The evening breeze that was bringing the rainclouds closer flapped her cloak at her back, and splashed strands of unruly hair against her cheeks as she looked out over yet another scene of violence with tired eyes.

She was glad to be back here, in the thick of things. When she'd gotten Beorna's sending a few hours earlier, alerting her that Cal was coming for her and Lok, she'd responded eagerly that she and the genasi would be ready and waiting. Convincing Lok had taken a bit more effort, but ultimately the warrior's loyalty to his friends won out over his sense of responsibility to his people. Mole recognized Lok's conflict, and on some level could understand it. A year ago, before she'd come to Cauldron, she might not have had that level of insight.

The trip to the urdunnir stronghold had had its moments, but overall, it had been an exercise in boredom. After their battle with the elemental earth monster, literally nothing of interest had occurred for days. Her suggestion to Lok that she could go exploring in the Underdark—just on the immediate outskirts of the urdunnir areas, of course—hadn't really been serious, although for once she'd been able to get a strong reaction from him. She'd gone looking for the odd elder dwarf with his stones and his lessons, but hadn't really been surprised when she failed to encounter him again. She had her suspicions about "Lord Liggett", but she hadn't shared them with anyone, for once keeping a secret close to her heart. It just seemed... appropriate. She'd continued to practice her new skills and hone her techniques, but without the threat of real, immediate danger, she quickly lost interest in such exercises.

She drew her rapier, and tossed it up in front of her, so that it fell-point down toward one of the merlons on the battlement. She sprang up and flipped forward, coming down on the weapon as its tip struck the stone, her hand closing on the hilt, her body rising straight up like an arrow as she balanced there, the breeze whipping around her as she teetered on the edge of the stone with a forty foot drop just a few inches away. She closed her eyes, letting the fullness of the sensation wash over her.

Exhilarating...

"You're going to break that weapon if you keep doing that," a voice said.

Mole twisted and flipped back onto her feet smoothly, the rapier flying end over end after her until she snared it out of the air and slid it back into its scabbard with a smooth motion. "It's a good blade, it won't break," she replied. "Or are you suggesting that I've gained weight?"

Dannel came forward from the recessed portal that provided access back into the tower. “I would never make such a crass comment, and it would be false regardless,” he said. “I doubt that I’ve ever met a more athletic gnome in my life.”

Mole raised an eyebrow as the elf came over to join her at the battlement. The merlons were a foot higher than she was tall, so she hopped up onto one, letting her legs dangle down into the crenel. “Cal and I just got back,” he said. “How have you been, Mole?”

She shrugged. “Same old. It hasn’t been that long.”

“And yet, it would seem that some things have changed.”

“You saw Lok, I assume.”

“Yes, that too.” Looking down over the village, he caught sight of the dwarves coming down the main road, from the direction of the gate. They appeared to be engaged in earnest conversation, but they were too far away for even the sharp ears of the elf and gnome to pick up any of their words.

“There’s a new dwarf, a cleric,” Mole explained. “He reminds me of Morgan, somewhat. From... you know, before.”

Dannel nodded. “Clerics have not done well with our group, in the past.”

Mole turned and slapped his hand. “You shouldn’t say that, it’s a jinx. And don’t let Cal hear you talking like that. He’s worried about Dana. She went to Sigil, and was supposed to keep in regular contact with us; from what Cal said, her latest message is a day overdue.”

“I didn’t know that. I’m surprised he let her go alone.”

“Yeah, well, if you knew her better, you wouldn’t be so surprised.”

“They mean a lot to you, don’t they?”

Mole looked out over the valley again, staring at the eastern horizon that was now just a black line in the distance. Somewhere beyond that line, she knew, lay the city-states of the Western Heartlands, and the Sea of Fallen Stars, and nations and peoples that she would perhaps never get a chance to visit. Strange sights and adventures, just over that horizon. For a moment, she felt a tug deep inside her, a temptation to leave all of this behind, and just go.

She sighed.

“I didn’t get to know them until I was in my tweens,” she said. “After the Rest had been established, and the village was starting to grow. I spent a few summers there, and then more time as I got older. Dana and Benzan were like those ‘famous relatives’ that you only see on holidays and special occasions, the kind that some families have, you know? But I got to know them... first from Uncle Cal’s stories, and then, when they would come to the Rest, every now and again. They were nice, and fun to be around. And they always treated me like a grown-up, even when I didn't act like one."

"I knew of them long before I first met them," Dannel said. "To me, they were in the same category as Elminster, or Cadderly, or Storm Silverhand. People whose actions shape the Realms."

"We all shape the Realms, each in our small way," Mole said. "That was something my uncle used to say. He used to tell me that I was destined for great things. I always thought that he was pulling my leg, you know, the sort of thing adults always say to little kids to motivate them to study harder."

"A lot has happened in the last year," Dannel said.

"Yeah. Seems like just yesterday we were in the Morkoth, worrying about the Stormblades and missing wands and regular villains... you know, 'stick your sword into the bad guy, take his stuff.'"

Dannel smiled. "I don't know if it was ever that simple, but things did seem a lot less complicated back then."

They were quiet for quite some time.

"What's going to happen to us, Dannel?" Mole asked.

"I don't know. But whatever comes, we'll face it together."

"I miss her."

"I miss her too."

He came up next to her, and put a hand on her shoulder. She leaned into him. Finally, she said, "Now, what are those blasted dwarves up to?"

Dannel leaned out over the battlement, and saw what the gnome had; the dwarves—at least three of them, Hodge had gone inside the tower it seemed—were gathered in the open space in front of the tower's single door, right at the edge of the street. Arun and Beorna were watching Umbar, who had inscribed a crude circle in the dirt with the shaft of his hammer and had now knelt just outside it, his arms extended as he chanted in what sounded like a dialect of dwarvish.

"Looks like he's conducting a summoning ritual," Dannel said. "Cal didn't say anything to you about it?"

Mole shook her head.

They watched as a pale glowing fog began to take shape within the circle. The sight was familiar enough to them; they'd seen Cal and Dana conduct summonings on several occasions. The dwarf's ritual took several minutes, but finally the glowing figure took solid form, revealing a tall humanoid, apparently female, with greenish skin and large white wings. She bore a silver trumpet in her hand.

“Ah, trumpet archon,” Mole said. “Good choice.”

“Glad you approve,” Dannel chuckled, watching as the dwarf spoke to the celestial, then handed her something. The archon beat her wings and lifted into the air. As she passed the two standing atop the battlements, they felt a sense of calm creep over them. Mole waved.

“Looks like they expect another attack tonight,” Dannel said.

“I think at this point, we need to expect an attack at any moment,” Mole said. “Come on, Cal said we’d all meet in the main hall at eighth bell. Maybe we can find out more about what’s going on.”

Chapter 526

At almost the same instant that Dannel and Mole turned to reenter the security of the Traveler’s Rest, the Shaman of the M’butu lifted his head, blinking as he returned from the far realms of his meditations to the cold harshness of the present Reality. His body resisted his efforts as stood; the frail vessel of flesh that held his consciousness was finally beginning to protest the abuse he’d heaped upon it since he’d come to this alien place at the bidding of the Six-Fingered Man. For a moment he just stood there, until he had mastered himself. Then he walked over to where he had left his few possessions. A drink cleared the crust that lined his throat. He hungered as well. His people, accustomed to the rigors of life upon of the Plains of Cet’abba, were durable, and could go for several cycles without nourishment, but the rituals he’d already conducted had drained his body.

He glanced at the soldiers, who remained in watchful positions around him, ever vigilant against the dangers of this strange Reality. Their loyalty was a tribute to their clans, and the Shaman felt a momentary pang at their loss. But the feeling passed quickly. Their fate had been decided the moment they had come, and passed through the gateway to this Reality. Whether his people would be able to realize the freedom that had been promised was for others to determine. He paused, and took a moment to utter a charm for one of those who would take up the Staff and the Mantle and continue the struggle. He did not know if the potency of his invocation would pass the barrier that separated Realities, or if it would have any effect even if it did. But the action helped to settle him, and enabled him to enter the state of focus that he would need.

The night came upon them with startling rapidity; he was still getting used to the rapid progress of the cycles upon this world. But he did not need the light as he used his staff to begin tracing a series of marks upon the surroundings of the dell. Wherever the staff touched, black lines remained that seemed to ooze power. They seemed haphazard at first, placed upon stones at all angles, upon the earth, and even upon the bole of a weathered tree that had died some years before. As he worked a nexus formed, not visible to normal sight, fashioned of lines of power that emerged from someplace... else and extended through the glyphs to form an interlaced web that resembled the weave of a drunken spider.

When he had finished, he used the staff to excavate a small pit in the ground in the midst of the lines of power that he had created. Then he rose, leaning slightly upon the staff as the exertion—physical and spiritual—from his efforts took hold upon his body. His hunger had returned, redoubled, but the Shaman of the M'butu paid it no heed. He was used to ignoring the demands of his body.

The four soldiers had gathered, and watched him impassively, waiting.

Finally the Shaman lifted his head, and regarded his guardians. He had no doubt of their loyalty, although what he would ask of them lay far beyond the traditional compact that the shamans extracted from the Khalasaar. He met the eyes of each individually, a final gesture of respect, and saw there the same dedication he himself felt. And yes, even hope... if not for themselves, at least for the M'butu.

He selected the first, the fortunate one, with a nod. The soldier came forward, removing his bulky garments and discarding them casually to the side. He knelt on the ground, leaning forward over the small pit that the Shaman had excavated. The Shaman waited until he had placed his fists upon the ground and locked his arms, lifting his head until his eyes stared directly ahead. Then the Shaman reached forward, and using the ritual ka'a blade, sliced open the black warrior's neck with a single stroke. His lifeblood smoked as it issued into the pit. The soldier did not flinch, did not stir as his body cooled with the torrent, tapering finally into a oozing remnant that fell in dark runnels down his torso.

When the flow had stopped completely, the Shaman gestured, and two of the soldier's bretheren lifted him gently and placed him to the side. All three of them came forward, removed their garments, and started to kneel in front of the pit. The Shaman interrupted them to reposition them in specific locations, back slightly from the pit but within the invisible weave of power he'd created.

Once they were in position, the Shaman returned to the pit and bent beside it. To his cold-numbed fingers the soldier's blood felt like it was boiling. Taking up his hand, glistening with the soldier's life, he splashed each of the others across the cheeks, returning for more blood before adding a final bloody slap on their torsos, right where their hearts beat in their chest. The three soldiers remained utterly impassive as the hot blood steamed in the cold night air. The Shaman returned to the brink of the pit, and used his staff to draw symbols around it with the blood. As he worked, he chanted, and the tendrils of power surrounding the dell thickened.

For almost a mile in every direction, animals fled in terror.

Chapter 527

Night settled upon the village of Ember Vale, dark clouds warding even the faint glow of the stars above. No one stirred in the streets. The torches set along the walls flickered slightly, although the evening breeze had quieted, and a preternatural stillness spread over the place. In the sky above, Umbar's called trumpet archon flew in wide circles overhead, her celestial senses scanning both for mundane threats and for the presence of evil. There was something sinister in the night, an undercurrent of shadow that the celestial noted, her perfect face darkening with an expression of concern. But she could not sense its source, and she could not abandon her duty to protect this place to explore the feeling further.

Still, she was wary, and interrupted her scan long enough to cast several long-lasting defensive spells upon herself.

Within the looming mass of the Traveler's Rest, in an interior chamber warded against both magical scrying and transportation magic, the Heroes of Cauldron and the Travelers gathered against the late hour. The chamber, which took up the majority of the tower's second floor, had no windows but was warmly lit by an eager flame in the hearth and by a half-dozen lanterns that gave the place a cheerful glow. The comfortable armchairs sat unoccupied near the hearth, drawn back along the walls to provide more ample space around the low, heavy wooden table in the center. Despite being the largest room in the tower, the place was somewhat crowded, now that the others had joined them.

Cal stood at the head of the table, standing upon a squat four-legged stool that allowed him to more easily look over the table and his friends around it. The archmage had burned through a good portion of his available higher-level valences to scry and contact Dannel, recovering him from the depths of the Wealdath. A sending from Beorna had alerted Mole that Cal was coming for them as well; the archmage's niece now stood atop a chair on the far side of the table, next to Lok. Something had happened to the genasi in the Underdark, a transformation obvious in the altered appearance of his eyes, which sparkled in the lantern light. But it was more than that, something evident in a subtle shift in his demeanor that Cal had immediately discerned. There was a story there, but it would have to wait for another time in the telling. Mole had let him in on the general details of their encounter with the elemental monster outside of the urdunnir settlement, but Cal had sensed that she too was holding something back. At another time he would have pressed her to share what was troubling her, but at the moment there were too many matters of more pressing import.

Layers within layers, he thought, turning his attention back to the now, and the more immediate circumstances that confronted them. The dwarves were arguing, and Cal let out an exasperated sigh at the lack of resolution. There was ample subtext here as well. The new dwarf, Umbar Ironshield, had already demonstrated his power, and in all honesty Cal was glad to have him present, especially given Dana's absence. He'd only spoken briefly with Arun after their clash with the giant bugs, and the paladin had not ventured more about the priest's presence except to note that he'd come from the Great Rift, and that he was a consecrated High Priest of Moradin. Arun had likewise been reluctant to speak about the sigil he now wore upon his brow, or the new golden hammer he carried. From what he'd gotten out of Beorna and Hodge, they four of them had just dealt with a small tribe of grimlock barbarians that had come into Cauldron via the Underdark.

It seems like all of them had had an adventure or two in the short time since they'd parted. More tales for his book, if ever he got the chance to write them down.

In any case, Umbar Ironhammer obviously regarded Arun with something akin to adulation, but that dedication clearly did not extend to Beorna or Hodge, both of who appeared to reciprocate the priest's dislike.

"We must deal with the immediate threat first," Beorna was saying. "Whoever sent those bugs will not give up easily, and may already be planning another attack."

"We know who our foe is," Umbar said. The dwarf cleric had communed with his god while Cal had been out regathering their distant companions, but while Moradin's agent had confirmed the role of their six-fingered adversary in the attack, the yes-no questions allowed by the spell had not been able to yield a clear identification. The spell had not been in vain; they had learned the Prince's agents had come from another plane, were still active, and that at least one major demon was still present upon the Prime. It was not enough to give them a target for detection magic, even if their foes were not warded against such spells. And several questions that Umbar had directed more specifically to Graz'zt's current activities had been met only with silence. That failure apparently had done little to improve the cleric's mood.

"Would you have us translate to Azzagrat and press an assault upon him?" the templar asked.

"That would not be wise," Cal said. Even now, almost twenty years later, he still had nightmares about Azzagrat.

Umbar did not respond, but Cal noted that the cleric glanced at Arun, the look on his face perhaps suggesting that he wanted approval to do just that! Arun himself stood silent, as he had through most of the discussion. The sigil burned into his forehead seemed to pulse slightly with the faintest hint of golden light, as if sounding in echo to his heartbeat.

Two transcendences, in such short order, the gnome thought, trying to wrap his mind around the implications. So much had changed, and at times he felt like he was sliding down a greased chute, unable to slow his progress toward the unknown.

"I am concerned about Dana," Lok said, interjecting his first words into the conversation. The priestess was only a day overdue on her usual sending, but given the attack upon them, Cal's worry about her had justly intensified. At his request, Beorna had prepared and delivered another sending for her, but she had not received a reply. He wished that Umbar had waited for his return to attempt his divination; he had a number of questions he would have suggested, not the least of which was an inquiry into her fate. The dwarf had already proven that he was not one to seek approval before taking action; if the divination hadn't been enough evidence, his surprising summoning of a celestial a few hours earlier had been. Perhaps he should have anticipated the dwarf's precipitous actions, and said something earlier. If only the commune spell had been within Beorna's reach; Cal felt more comfortable with the templar than with the still-unknown variable that was the cleric of Moradin.

If only the sending had worked!

“There is a chance that the spell will simply not function, across the planar boundary,” Beorna gently reminded him. Cal looked up, not aware that he’d spoken his thoughts aloud. Or perhaps the templar had divined his feelings in his manner. “With a message and reply, there are two chances for the spell to fail.”

“I know the limits of the spell,” Cal said, a little more harshly than he’d intended. He forced a smile, nodding in apology to the templar. “Unfortunately evocation magic is outside of my sphere; blowing things up has never been my strong point. But direct action is still open to us. I have a plane shift scribed upon a scroll,” he said. “We have a copy of the focus for Sigil that Cylyria provided. We can find out for ourselves.”

“That spell will not transport you with any degree of accuracy,” Umbar said.

“That is only a minor difficulty,” Cal said. “Once there, I can scry her, and teleport directly to her location.”

“If she is... not warded.”

Cal knew all too well what the cleric had been about to say. But it was Lok who replied for him. “We do not leave behind one of our own.”

Cal nodded in agreement, but inwardly he felt the doubts raised by the cleric’s words keenly. Now, with hindsight, he wondered if he should have added the discern location dweomer to his book, rather than the binding. What had he been thinking, to even imagine that he had a chance of using the spell against one such as Graz’zt? Events had raced past them, and he felt as though every minor decision they made was leading them into dark, tangled thickets, where probability played out into greater danger no matter what choice they made. Their enemies knew more than they, of that he had no doubt. But what else could they do, except respond to events as they were thrust forward?

“We should get the people out of here,” Arun said. “Once we depart, they will be defenseless, and their association with us should not doom them.”

“We have some friends who might be able to help,” Cal said. “In addition to my remaining greater scrying for Dana, I have a regular scrying memorized; I’ll use that to contact them and ask for their aid in evacuating the town.”

“Even so, I’d feel better if we just didn’t leave them to their fate,” Arun said. “Umbar, Hodge, perhaps you two should remain here and assist in the relocation.”

“With all due respect, Chosen, you will need my power in the coming confrontation. I can see clearly, now, that there was a greater power at work in bringing me to you, that made me the unwitting agent of your apotheosis.”

“I am no god,” Arun said softly.

Hodge snorted.

“No, but you were Chosen,” the cleric continued. “And for what... if not to confront the shadow of darkest Evil? The Prince is a blight upon the multiverse, and the Soul Forger’s patience at his meddling has come to an end.”

“So now you are discerning the will of the god?” Beorna said.

Umbar shook his head violently. “You twist my words, templar. Can you not perceive that we stand upon the cusp of great events? I shared openly the result of my commune with the All Father. The Dark One has directly intervened in events here upon the Prime. He has stolen one of your companions, and may have already acted against another. I know that I have come lately to this war you are fighting against him... but I offer—freely and without reservation—my hammer, and the power that I command, in this struggle. And my life, if it comes to that.”

“Oh, it will,” Hodge muttered under his breath. But he did not turn to meet Arun’s gaze.

Cal too felt uncomfortable at the cleric’s words, which to his ears bordered upon fanaticism. But they could not refuse the aid of one of the dwarf’s power. “I suspect that we will need all the help we can muster,” Cal said, standing on his chair and placing both of his hands upon the table. “So that we may reach agreement, let me summarize our plans. As Umbar has noted, we know our foe, but we lack enough specific information to discern the location of his agents here upon the Prime. Dana, however, has access to the highest valences of clerical magic; she can help greatly in flushing out our enemies.” Cal looked across the table, at Mole and Lok. He saw in their eyes that they recognized his tactic, that he was shading his argument to convince the others. They knew what Dana could do, but they also, realistically, knew that Dana’s abilities, however considerable, were unlikely to merely produce Graz’zt’s agents upon a silver platter. They just did not know enough. And their foe, all of them knew, was a master of deception and misdirection. But they said nothing.

“How many of us can you transport?” Arun asked.

“I can take eight others with my plane shift,” Cal said. “I specifically allocated my spell selection for maximum divination and transportation today, but I have only one more greater teleport remaining.” He did not share that he’d had to reserve one of his eighth-level slots for that magic; when he’d taken out his spellbook that afternoon he’d anticipated that he might have to make more than the two round trips he’d already taken today. Between the multiple teleports and scryings he’d already burned, he only had a handful of spells left in his upper valences. And very little room left for blasting and buffs, if it came to that.

So be it. He’d cautioned Dana about the dangers of precipitous action, but he would not lose her to Graz’zt, in addition to Benzan.

And Delem. Even after ten years, that wound was still not fully healed.

“Getting to Sigil is only half of the journey,” Beorna said. “Assuming you can locate her, how many can you teleport with you to her location?”

“Four,” Cal said.

“Hey, you can stuff me into a bag of holding or something,” Mole said. “I can hold my breath for a minute or two. There’s ways around the limits of spells... heck, you guys used to do tricks like that all the time, from your stories.”

“It seems like there are a number of uncertainties in this course of action,” Arun said. “Would I be correct in assuming that you have only one of these planar transportation scrolls?”

“I have the spell in my book,” he said. “Upon resting again, I can memorize it... or the high priest can pray for it to facilitate our return.” Dana also kept the spell in memory, he knew, but he avoided that thought, knowing that the fact was evidence that she was in trouble, and was not in a position to escape.

Let it just be a problem with the sending, he thought. He knew what Arun was getting at, that it might be better for them to rest and recover their full potency before setting out on this journey. And it wasn’t unreasonable, especially since it would allow them to keep the scroll as a reserve, and cast the plane shift from memory... and even memorize two, allowing an immediate return journey in case the scrying of Dana failed.

Cal was exhausted, despite having slept for most of the day. In the six hours or so since he’d awoken he’d burned numerous potent spells and covered thousands of miles back and forth across Faerûn. But even though the practice of high-level magic was itself draining, of more weight was the constant worry, the neverending surge of plans and contingencies that kept popping into his mind. Over the years he’d gotten used to the strain of his hyper-enhanced intelligence; he’d read accounts of mages who’d been driven mad by the pressure of an enhanced consciousness. Of late, however, he’d been experiencing nasty headaches that were only worsened by the work of transcribing new spells into his book. He’d only recently gained mastery of the eighth valence, and already the final sphere, the most potent spells available to the arcane caster, were nearly within his grasp.

Beyond that there was more, a wilder terrain of magic that few mortals had tread, but that was not a journey he could even afford to think about at the moment.

“Maybe we should wait until the morning,” Mole suggested. “To see if...”

But the gnome never got a chance to finish her thought, for at that moment a great clarion note echoed through the very stones of the tower, only slightly muted by the surrounding walls. For a moment the companions shared a confused look, but they quickly realized the source of the sound.

“The archon!”

Chapter 528

The archon’s name was Abael, and as she passed over the sleeping village below, she cast out into the darkness, scanning for evil as well as for mundane dangers that might lurk in the darkness. Her senses were far superior to those of most mortals, but even so, the corruption was nearly upon the place before she detected its presence.

A dark form materialized out of the night before the village's main gates. It was massive, easily twenty feet tall, looming over the thick pylons of the repaired barrier. And yet it was silent, its approach unremaked by telltale noises one would expect from a thing of its size, until it reached down and tore the gates apart with great claws that left ugly black scars upon the fresh wood. The gates resisted for only a moment, before the heavy board, fully eight inches thick, that held the portals shut splintered explosively, and they swung open loudly on bent hinges traumatized by the rough treatment.

Abael was already diving to greet the intruder. She lifted her trumpet to her lips, summoning a clarion call that shattered the night, offering an answer to the destructive noise of the creature's arrival. She followed that with a holy smite that swallowed up the upper half of the creature in flare of pure white light.

But when the smite faded, the intruder stepped forward, unharmed. Lifting its head, it fixed Abael with a cold gaze. The archon felt a grim chill as she barely overcame the paralyzing grip of a hold monster spell; and then, before she could react, the monster hit her with an unholy blight. The spell penetrated her resistance easily, and she staggered as she fought off the cloying sickness that tried to creep into her bones through the dark miasma of the blight.

Recognizing at last the true nature of her foe, the archon cast a banishment spell. But the nightwalker was again unaffected, its potent spell resistance enabling it to shed the effects of the celestial magic. Abael tightened her grip on her silver trumpet, which at her mental command shifted into the form of a greatsword.

Before she could dive to engage the terrible undead monster, a faint whisper of wind alerted her of a new danger. Looking up, she saw a dark fold of shadow descending rapidly from above, a wave of perfect black that overwhelmed even the dark sky beyond. Abael lifted her sword in challenge, her aura flaring bright around her celestial form, but the nightwing altered its course to the side, blasting her with a finger of death as it slid past. This time the archon's spell resistance held, and the icy chill of the spell was felt merely as a momentary shadow brushing against her life essence.

But as the nightwing turned away, three discrete shadows that were only slightly smaller than the huge undead creature detached and swarmed through the night at her. Their foulness swept over her perceptions in a wave, and a look of anger clouded her face.

Dread wraiths!

The wraiths dove eagerly toward her, their insubstantial bodies spread wide like a cloak catching the wind. Abael waited until they were within thirty feet before casting a mass cure serious wounds spell that both tore into their unholy essence and restored some of the injury she'd taken from the nightwalker's blight. But there was no time for further action as the powerful undead spirits swarmed around her, trying to suck away her life essence with their cold touch. Her aura fortified her, allowing her to resist that drain, but even so their incorporeal fingers drew blue lines across her flesh where they touched, spreading tendrils of numbness through her body.

Abael knew that the wraiths were too potent for a holy word or her undeath to death spell, and would likewise not be fazed by the call of her trumpet. So she swept out with her enchanted blade, tearing into the nearest wraith. The undead creature did not even attempt to dodge the assault, trusting its semi-substantial form to protect it. But the celestial's sword cut into it, once, twice, and with a soft sigh the wraith dissolved.

But the nightshades were still pressing their assault as well. First one, and then a second unholy blight erupted around Abael. She resisted the first, but the second, originating from the more powerful walker, cut again through her defenses and ravaged her pristine soul. Weakened, she further succumbed to the touch of one of the remaining wraiths, and she felt her essence diminish as the creature greedily fed upon her life force.

The nightwing had turned, cutting a broad swath through the night sky, and started gliding back toward the embattled celestial.

Light erupted from atop the tower as the heavy door blasted open and the companions, with Arun and his glowing hammer first among them, made their appearance. They rushed to the edge of the battlement, looking for the source of the attack. The celestial glowed in the sky, its radiance muted somewhat by the two wraiths enfolding it. The nightshades were more difficult to spot, blending with the night shadows, sucking up the faint radiance that made its way from the ring of torches on the wall around the village.

Dannel was the only one who caught sight of the nightwing gliding silently down toward the celestial. Drawing an arrow, infusing it with the power of his song, he launched it at the creature. The shaft intersected perfectly with its broad form, but the undead monster did not react, continuing its dive toward the archon.

"What are they?" Mole asked, trying unsuccessfully to make out what the elf had shot.

"Empower me with flight!" Arun urged Cal, drawing upon the power of Moradin to infuse him with divine favor. The gnome complied, using his wand upon the paladin. As Arun lifted into the air, Mole turned from loading her little crossbow. "Me next!" she cried.

"Sneak attacks won't work in this situation," Cal said.

"I am next," Beorna said, already filling herself with the divine power of Helm.

"Fine, then Lok," Cal said, drawing more power from the wand.

"Back to the pit from whence you came!" Umbar shouted, blasting one of the wraiths harrying the archon with a beam of searing light. The creature let out a foul wail as the beam carved a swath through its dark substance, but it did not pause in its assault upon the celestial. Abael drew upon another mass cure, fortifying itself and weakening the undead, but the celestial was clearly suffering from the draining touch of the wraiths. She turned as the nightwing descended toward her, and lifted her sword again in challenge.

But the wing did not close to melee, instead blasting the celestial with a cone of cold as it passed. It obviously bore no concern for the wraiths; one of them avoided the attack, the blast passing harmlessly through its body, but the second was caught in the white nimbus, an outline of frost forming briefly over its substance before the wraith perished. The blast should have finished off the archon, but she'd taken the precaution of warding herself against both cold and fire earlier, and the cone failed to penetrate that defense. Despite that, however, it was clear that she was still nastily exposed to the attacks from the nightshades, as well as the remaining wraith that still hovered eagerly behind her.

“Abael! Fall back upon the tower!” Umbar yelled. The archon lifted her head, acknowledging the dwarf cleric's command. But before she could act, the nightwalker hit her with a targeted greater dispel that ripped away her defenses like the layers of an onion. Even her innate aura was disrupted by the spell. Given a moment, Abael could have restored that protection with a thought, but she never got that moment as the walker followed its attack with a final quickened blight that tore mercilessly into the weakened celestial.

Abael cried out, and stiffened. The dread wraith greedily latched onto her as she fell, and followed her down, the life bleeding out of her until she slammed into the hard earth with a flat thump.

Chapter 529

The companions could only watch as their ally was dispatched by the invading undead. As of yet, their counterattacks had been of little avail. As the nightwing had flown past the archon, vanishing back into the night, Dannel had switched targets to the nightwalker. The moderate range—the thing stood in the midst of the village, a good two hundred feet distant—was of little impediment as he peppered its body with a barrage of electrically-charged missiles. The darkness hindered his vision, but despite that difficulty he could tell that the shots appeared to have little effect, even with the full potency of his song infused in each arrow.

“I don't think I'm having any effect!” he warned, as he continued to fire.

“Join the club!” Hodge said, winding his heavy crossbow for a second shot. Mole had experienced a similar result with one of her shock bolts, and was leaning precariously out through one of the crenels in the battlement, as if considering leaping down to the ground to get more directly involved in events.

Cal had finished enchanting Beorna, who hefted her adamantine sword—transforming it into a holy sword—and leapt up into the air after Arun. Lok waited patiently for his turn, not even bothering to recover his longbow from his bag of holding.

“They are nightshades,” Cal said. “They are extraplanar beings, not of this world...”

“Save the lecture, ye daft gnome!” Hodge urged. “How do we kill 'em?”

Cal's mind darted back over the memory of dozens of books and scrolls, tales and legends, even tiny scraps of knowledge gleaned from old songs and bits of nearly forgotten lore. A scrap of doggerel clung to that sweep, a verse he'd heard chanted once in a tavern in Waterdeep...

*Shades of darkness, walker in the night,
Shy from silver, or the mornin's light...*

"Silver weapons!" Cal exclaimed.

"Where in the hells are we s'pposed to get silver weapons?" Hodge shouted, jamming his finger painfully as he tried to snap a bolt into place. "Damn and blast!" But Dannel immediately slid off his pack, and dug into it for something.

Umbar had turned away from them, and had fallen to one knee, his forehead pressed against the hilt of his hammer, obviously seeking some form of divine intervention.

Arun felt the divine potency of his patron course through his veins as he ascended into the air over Ember Vale, the night air blowing cold through the slit in his helmet as he flew. His target was the nightwalker, its outline a dark shadow against the night to his darkvision as he drew closer. The creature looked up and fixed him with its horrible gaze, and Arun shuddered as a wave of malevolence swept over him. Whatever grim power was in that stare, he was able to fight it off, and he brandished his holy hammer like a talisman as he dove toward it.

"Arun, look out!"

Beorna's cry alerted him just an instant before the wraith fell upon him. He jerked to the side, but as the two passed its cold claw passed through his hip, sending a stabbing knife of cold through his lower body. He tried to swipe it with his hammer, but the holy weapon merely passed harmlessly through its incorporeal body.

The wraith spun in mid air and turned to meet him again, but before the two opponents could close for another exchange Arun felt another magical attack hit him. His own powers held against the nightwalker's power, but the spell from Cal's wand was much less potent, and even as he realized what had happened the fly spell dissolved before the walker's greater dispel, and he went plummeting toward the ground fifty feet below.

"Arun!" Mole yelled from atop the tower, unable to intervene to help the dwarf.

"He's tough!" Hodge said, cursing as he fired another bolt uselessly toward the nightwalker. "A little tumble like that ain' gonna hurt 'im!" Still, it looked painful as Arun glanced off of a roof, rolled, and toppled down a final fifteen feet to slam hard into a lean-to shed, which crumpled under the impact.

What was worse, however, was that the nightwalker was already heading in that direction.

Lok lifted off of the tower roof, the latest beneficiary of Cal's wand of fly. Before he could join battle, however, a great rumbling shook the tower, the heavy stones vibrating under their feet. "What now?" Hodge exclaimed.

"Umm... guys..." Mole said. From her uncertain perch deep within the crenel, leaning out over the stone edge of the battlement, she could see the ground below, where the packed earthen surface of the road in front of the tower had begun to rise into a low mound.

Hodge looked down in time to see the ground erupt in a fountain of earth as the mound exploded outward, and a massive worm rose up into the air, its body easily seven feet across, formed of segments of utter blackness. It rose higher, fifteen feet, twenty, twenty five, and as the horrified companions stared down at the bulbous head its massive maw opened wide, and it disgorged a spew of black vileness that resolved into a dozen discrete forms... undead shadows, which immediately flew up eagerly toward the living beings atop the tower.

(Author's note: just for the hell of it, I house-ruled that a greater dispel from a 21st level caster could completely wipe out a fly spell from a 5th level caster (i.e. from Cal's wand), rather than lead to the soft-fall described in the 3.5e SRD.)

Chapter 530

"Uh oh," Mole said, as she looked down into the gaping blackness that was the nightcrawler's huge maw. A stench like a thousand open graves swam over her, and she fell back, gagging.

The movement caused her to look up, briefly, so she saw it coming.

"Lok, look out!"

The genasi had lifted himself a few paces into the air and shot out over the battlement, his axe ready to strike, his attention upon the nightcrawler. But Mole's warning brought his focus up in time to see the nightwing sweeping down out of the sky, directly toward him. The genasi struck at the same instant that the wing hit. From the nearly silent way they moved, and the fact that they were accompanied by wraiths and shadows, Lok had expected the thing to be nearly insubstantial, an echo of a living creature without much mass. But as the wing slammed into him, driving him back with the force of a battering ram, he realized his mistake.

Gods, it has to weigh a few thousand pounds, he had time to think, as he was catapulted backward through the air. His axe glanced off its hide, which was like leather and steel and rubber combined into a nearly indestructible combination. For a full second the two were linked, then he tore free and fell back, the wing continuing forward as it spread its wings and began gliding around for another attack.

Aware that its damage resistance would make hurting it extremely difficult, Lok deliberately shucked his shield, letting it drop to the ground below, and he took up his axe in both hands.

Umbar finished his prayer and stood as a skein of light motes gathered before him atop the tower, forming and solidifying until a celestial griffon, its hide a brilliant gold, stood awaiting his command. The cleric instantly leapt atop its back, urging it to flight. The agile summons responded, easily clearing the battlement despite the dwarf's considerable weight, spreading its wings to gather the air as its rider shouted a battle cry to Moradin.

But before Umbar could direct his mount to assail the nightcrawler, he was faced with the small horde of shadows, which eagerly rose to meet him. Several latched onto the griffon, draining its strength, and threatening to bring it down. A pair of the undead monsters came at the cleric himself, their insubstantial claws piercing his armor and drawing strength from his body.

"Be GONE!" he cried. Yellow light erupted from his hammer, from the etched sigils of his faith graved on either side of the heavy iron head. The shadows shrieked, and the nearest half-dozen evaporated as the purifying rays tore through their vaporous forms. The cleric urged his mount toward the rearing form of the nightcrawler, but the griffon's diminished strength was no longer up to the task, and he had to direct his efforts to just staying upon its back as it tried to make a controlled landing a short distance away.

Beorna had seen the nightcrawler's dramatic appearance, but her attention was focused more on Arun's fate. As soon as he'd fallen, she'd dove after him, but was drawn up short as the last dread wraith rose up from the corpse of its celestial victim to meet her. Up close, it seemed even bigger than it has first appeared, and it looked as though it would simply enfold her, to suck her life from her body in a cold embrace. The templar lifted her sword, but at the last moment called upon a blast of searing light that tore through the center of the wraith, opening a blazing hole in its body that quickly spread, until the undead monstrosity dissolved into harmless wisps of night.

But the wraith had managed to delay her, for a critical moment.

Arun pulled himself awkwardly to his feet, shattered pieces of wood from the ruined shed continuing to fall around him. His head spun and he tasted blood, but that didn't stop him from tearing himself free, staggering forward, his heavy hammer still firmly held in his right hand.

He looked up, right into the face of the nightwalker.

"Are ye goin' to do somethin', elf?" Hodge all but shrieked, as the nightcrawler seemed to continue to grow larger and larger as more of it tunneled out from under the ground. Already almost sixty feet of its body had formed a coil in the middle of the street, and its head twisted upward, until its head—and that huge opening that served as its mouth—was only a short distance below the level of the tower's battlement.

"I'm working on it," Dannel said, as he poured the contents of a small vial over a thick bundle of arrows. The liquid glistened as it coated the arrowheads, shining slightly even in the darkness.

“Well, ye better do it quick!” the dwarf said, ducking out from cover long enough to fire another bolt into the nightcrawler. His attack, like those before, appeared to have no effect.

As soon as he'd poured out the last drop of the silversheen, Dannel tossed the vial aside and rose, one arrow almost leaping to his string as he spread the others out on the merlon in front of him. His first shot penetrated the undead worm's body just below the maw, and this time he got a response. He drew again and fired as the worm surged up, extending until its head was a good thirty five feet above the level of the ground below. He knew something bad was coming, but he drew a third arrow, and even as a white storm of death exploded from deep within it, he released the shot toward its long body.

The cone of cold swept up over the battlement, piercing the crenels between the thick stone merlons. The fortifications provided some cover, although Dannel, already exposed, took the blast hard and staggered back, shivering. Most of his arrows went careening away from the blast, although he managed to grasp onto a handful as he fell. Hodge and Cal likewise huddled in cover, and of course Mole avoided the cone entirely.

Dannel struggled to rise, but the crawler gave them no chance to counterattack. Even as its head drew back, it unleashed another potent power, and laid a mass hold monster atop the tower. Against its potent magic only the strongest of wills could offer resistance. Cal's mental discipline withstood it, but Mole, Dannel, and Hodge were all caught, paralyzed.

Chapter 531

Arun grunted as the nightwalker's powerful claws slammed into him, driving him back almost into the ruin of the shed behind him. He started forward to counter, but his leg snagged on a broken farm tool, and he had to catch himself before falling flat on his face in front of the massive undead creature.

Gah, blast it! the Chosen of Moradin thought.

Beorna yelled a challenge as she descended toward the nightwalker looming over Arun, her sword shining in her hand, holy power radiating from it.

The undead creature looked up, and fixed her with its dark gaze.

Beorna's will was considerable, and she should have been able to easily shrug off the corruptive power in that stare. But as she looked down, and saw Arun, tiny in contrast to it, she felt a momentary twinge of doubt, and fear. That opening was all that the creature needed. Unleashing the power of its gaze attack, the nightwalker drove a spike of terror through the templar, who, overcome, turned and fled like a streak through the night.

“Burn you!” Arun roared, hurling forward with his hammer coming up in a powerful arc. The holy weapon smacked meatily into the nightwalker's thigh just above the knee, driving white energy into it as he smote it. The nightwalker let out a high-pitched keening, and turned its attention back to its foe.

Umbar, having dismounted after an awkward landing, commanded the griffon to attack as best it could. As the celestial creature rose into the air, it met a pair of shadows that had followed him down. The undead creatures assaulted the summoned griffon eagerly, avoiding its frenzied counters.

But Umbar's focus was on the massive worm that undulated menacingly only a short distance away. Taking up his hammer, he ran toward it, calling upon the power of his god as he ran. A white glow began to form around him, shining from the gaps in his armor.

The crawler, sensing his approach, blasted him with a quickened cone of cold, followed immediately by a finger of death.

The cleric staggered through the storm of ice, simply absorbing the damage, and likewise shook off the full effects of the deadly ray. Pure determination drove him on, although it was obvious that the crawler's magical assault had hurt him. He lowered his head and charged, but as he drew within its reach, the worm's fat head came crashing down toward him. Seeing that it would hit long before he could reach its body to attack, the priest readied himself, crouching and hurling himself aside at the last instant. It was a maneuver of a veteran combatant, and against a normal foe, it would have worked.

But the nightcrawler was a thing of dark energies and ancient potency. It adjusted slightly, and as its head struck the ground with colossal force, its neck twisted and it snared the dwarf with the very edge of its jaws. Bone-white teeth as long as shortswords pierced his shoulder, tearing through his armor. Umbar cried out as the chill of the grave entered him through the creature's bite. He tried to pull free, but the thing was insanely strong; he may as well have been trapped in a vice. He was wrenched roughly back, lifted off his feet as the crawler brought its head around in a wide sweep. His hammer went flying into the night, but he still was infused with the power of his dispel evil spell, and as he was lifted up into the air he wrenched himself around enough to splay his hand upon the black hide of the creature.

White light flared from around his fingers into the creature, but it was just too powerful. As the flare dissipated, the spell having failed to send the nightshade back to whence it had come, the massive worm abruptly spread its jaws wide, engulfing the cleric, who vanished into the blacker than black interior of its body.

As Umbar was swallowed up by the nightcrawler, Arun fought for his life against the nightwalker a scant hundred feet away. He slammed it again with his hammer, smashing the magical bludgeon against one unnaturally long arm as it reached for him. The thing was almost indestructible, but even with its damage resistance, the paladin's smites were causing it serious injury. It came at him again, but as Arun steeled himself for another full attack, the walker suddenly lunged ahead and closed its fist around the haft of the paladin's hammer, just below the head. Surprised, Arun tried to pull his weapon free, but the nightshade, far stronger than he, tore it from his grasp. Wisps of greasy gray smoke rose from the edges of the walker's hand, evidence that the holy weapon did not appreciate the maneuver, but the undead creature's unholy eyes blazed with something akin triumph as it lifted the weapon high above Arun's reach, and closed both hands around it.

And squeezed.

Chapter 532

Cal resisted the crawler's mass hold monster spell, but as the fog of ice crystals cleared he quickly saw that his companions had not been so fortunate. Unfortunately his stature limited the benefit granted by his high perch; he could not clearly see out over the battlefield. And even if he could, he mused, as he shook the rime of frost from his cloak, it was too dark to clearly resolve anything much in the way of details in any case.

We need help, he thought. Calling upon one of the few higher-order illusions he'd memorized that day, he drew forth strands of shadow and infused them with potency.

Unfortunately, those weren't the only shadows to come upon the battlements; as he cast his spell, dark forms drifted up through the crenels, eagerly seeking out the adventurers. The paralyzed companions were unable to resist as several of the shadows settled upon them; Cal drew a pair who lunged at him, their dark touches pressing against the protective barriers created by his bracers of armor and ring of protection. The gnome ignored them, focusing on his spell as his conjured shadowstuff took on the form of a quartet of lantern archons.

The archons did not wait for commands, immediately blasting the shadows with their energy beams. One of the two shadows menacing Cal evaporated, hit by several beams in quick succession. The second quivered as a beam struck it, and retreated through the stone floor beneath them. Cal ran past it to Mole, who shook helplessly as another shadow greedily drank her life-essence. The gnome drew a wand and stabbed it; as he released a cure moderate wounds into it the shadow let out a hollow shriek and vanished.

The last shadow, which had started to drain Hodge, was set upon by all four archons and was quickly dispatched.

"There is a giant undead worm at the foot of this tower," Cal said to the archons. "Spread out, assail it."

As the archons hurried to comply, Cal lifted Mole up and quickly examined her. The gnome woman shook, still caught in the paralysis, but her eyes rolled up to meet Cal's and she was even able to nod slightly.

But then her gaze drifted up behind him, and her eyes widened.

Lok had not had much luck against the nightwing since their initial clash. He lost sight of it as it vanished into the night, he'd known that the undead flyer wasn't done with him yet. His suspicion was proven correct as he caught sight of it drawing closer from another direction, having completed another broad turn out over the fields of Ember Vale. Almost as soon as he spotted it, he was hit by an unholy blight that washed over him and left him feeling violently ill. Still, as the wing drew nearer he screwed up his face and flew at it, lifting his axe with both hands firmly tightened around the long haft.

The wing, however, apparently did not care for another collision. Instead, it banked away, its speed enough to let it easily outpace the genasi. Lok felt a cold chill hit him like a mule's kick, and focused his will against whatever spell the undead creature was throwing at him. His will was considerable for a warrior, and the feeling passed in just a few moments.

Frustrated, he had started to head back toward the battle that continued to rage on the far side of the tower, when he was hit by a greater dispel and started falling.

Arun watched as the nightwalker lifted his precious hammer in both hands and started to squeeze. The weapon was incredibly tough, he knew, but a high-pitched whine of protest issued from between the black claws as it brought its strength to bear. Even the holy avenger, almost an artifact itself, could not long withstand the dark power of the nightshade.

Arun did not intent to let it have the chance. With a snap of his arm his shield flew away, and with a quick tug of his other hand his adamantine battleaxe pulled free from the loops holding it across his back. Invoking Moradin, the Chosen rushed forward. The nightwalker ignored him... until the axe came around in an arc, slamming into the creature's left knee. Arun held nothing back. He knew it was a gamble, sacrificing finesse and accuracy for all out power. But the axe hit its target, and as Arun released his third smite into the joint his holy power penetrated its defenses, cutting through black flesh and the putrid essence within. The nightwalker keened as its leg was severed, and it tumbled backward, caroming off the façade of the nearby building before slamming hard into the packed earth of the road. There was no blood from its wound, but black wisps of vapor issued from the stump of its leg, oozing out like a thick fog. It still held onto Arun's hammer with one clawed hand, and it brought the other up clutching for the adversary that had wrought this hurt upon it.

Arun leapt atop its chest. In desperation, the nightwalker tried a last gambit, summoning the power of a plane shift to cast its foe into the deepest pits of the Abyss. But against the paladin's gathered will, the nightshade's power faltered for a final time. It tried to grab him in its clawed hand, but the paladin avoided the clumsy grab, lifted the axe, and with a final invocation of divine justice he brought the weapon down with full force into the center of the nightwalker's face.

Warned by the subtle shift in focus of Mole's eyes, Cal turned around to see the nightwing bearing down upon them, gliding toward their position from above. It was... huge. He reached for the rod that hung from a long throng at his hip, but before he could act yet another unholy blight erupted in a cloying storm over them. It only lasted a few seconds, and when it cleared, the nightwing was still there, closer now, looming over them like a massive stormcloud

A silver streak knifed up through the night to meet the descending creature, intersecting its path at the point where its body opened up to reveal a maw of utter blackness. The wing shrieked and began to turn away again, but Dannel continued his barrage, sending silver arrow after arrow up into it. The elf, having finally fought off the hold from the other nightshade, got payback as his missiles tore violent rents in its substance. The nightwing pumped its wings and began to turn as it ascended, perhaps preparing to hurl another nasty attack at the foes atop the tower before it disengaged.

That tiny delay cost it, as Cal disintegrated it.

Dannel sagged against the battlement, still in pretty bad shape from the multiple attacks they'd suffered. "Need more... arrows," he said. He had plenty of regular missiles in his quivers, but he was referring to the ones he'd coated with silversheen, most of which had been blown away by the cone of cold. A few, however, lay scattered across the stone roof of the tower, almost invisible in the darkness.

"I'll get them," came a weak voice. Cal turned to see Mole, still moving stiffly as she pulled herself up and began looking for the enchanted missiles.

Cal rushed over the nearest crenel and looked down to see what had become of the nightcrawler.

It was still there, and much closer than he'd expected.

The archmage barely had time to draw back and grab a firmer hold upon the stones before the worm slammed into the side of the tower a mere eight feet below his perch. The Traveler's Rest shuddered with the impact, and for a moment Cal thought that the entire building would come down under the massive strength of the creature. But the Rest was of solid construction, fortified with magic, and it held.

"What's it doing?" Dannel asked, falling against a merlon as the tower shook again.

"It can't quite reach us... I think it wants to bring us down to its level for a chat."

"Even this tower won't hold up long against that," the elf said.

Cal nodded, and turned back toward the edge... only to clutch at the stone again as yet another unholy blight erupted just above the lip of the battlement. As he voided his stomach upon the already slick stones he thought grimly, How many of those can we take?

Glancing back at Dannel, who was barely on his feet now, his face an ashen gray, he knew that this had to be decided quickly, one way or the other. In his brief glimpse of the creature he'd seen no sign of his archons, or of Umbar. He had a strong suspicion of where the dwarf cleric would be found; which made defeating the creature now all the more imperative.

"We have to finish it," he said, more to himself than to any of the others, for his voice snagged in his throat, which felt hoarse and raw with bile. Crawling forward, he waited for the next slam, and the sound of crumbling stone that he knew would mean disaster.

But the next slam did not come. Reaching the edge of the roof, he leaned forward and looked down.

The worm had shifted, falling back into a coil at the base of the tower that had to be a hundred feet long. Its head had turned away from them, and he could see that its tail, a sinuous extension tipped with a vicious-looking sting, stabbed down at something on the ground, striking with a loud metallic clang. It took him a moment to realize what it was.

Lok!

The genasi took the hit and countered with a two-handed strike with his axe that tore into the rubbery body of the crawler. From his perch Cal could not see if it inflicted any serious injury, but from what he'd seen thus far of the undead creature's damage resistance, he doubted it. Still, the genasi's assault had drawn its attention, and the huge maw opened as the head slammed down to meet the daughty warrior.

Against that, Cal knew, even Lok had no chance.

Dannel staggered forward to the edge of the battlement, clutching a handful of silver-tipped arrows—all that Mole had been able to find. The elf looked unsteady, and for a moment Cal feared he would stumble and fall into the crenel, knocking the both of them over the edge of the tower. But the elf braced himself between the two adjoining merlons, and as his face took on that look of concentration that accompanied his archery, Cal heard a faint hint of a melody on the night breeze.

Dannel's arrows stabbed down and vanished into the body of the worm. The thing reared violently, the attack clearly inflicting a lot more harm than Lok's assault had. Its head snapped up, and Cal knew that another magical blast—another blight, or a cone of cold—would be coming in seconds. Dannel, he knew, would not survive another magical attack, and while his stamina was considerable, he had his doubts about how many more such blasts he could withstand.

Let it work, he thought, calling upon something... a prayer? He wasn't especially religious, but in that instant, he thought he felt a presence, something external to himself as he sucked in magical power, amplified through his rod, and unleashed it through the triggering words and gestures, culminating in a finger pointed down at the creature.

The green ray struck the worm in the midsection. For a moment the beam flared out in a pale halo of soft light, and Cal thought that the spell had failed, defeated by the worm's considerable resistance to magic. But then a segment of its body, about ten feet of its length, vanished, crumbling into dust.

The worm collapsed, both halves thrashing with an incredible violence. The tower shuddered against repeated impacts, and Lok was hit and knocked roughly back, falling in the shadow of the recessed doorway to the tower. But the worm's struggles were clearly its death throes, and they grew steadily weaker, until it finally—almost a minute later—stopped moving altogether.

As the worm finally expired, a gory figure slaked in black ooze staggered out from one of the ends. Umbar made it all of about five paces before he collapsed.

Chapter 533

The rain promised by the gathering clouds the night before had come and gone so swiftly that the ground was barely damp. A bright winter sun in a sky of startling blue could not banish the chill in the air, but it made the morning much more pleasant than the dreary overcast ones of the last tenday. As the sun rose, with it came the stir of life in the hills that surrounded Ember Vale, for even in this unfriendly season animals dwelled here, although they gave the settlement in the valley's center a wide berth.

There were no sounds of animals in the brush, or birds scattering at their approach, as the companions descended on their flying carpet into a rocky dell overgrown with dense brush and other vegetation. Cal, kneeling at the front of the carpet, pointed to a compact clearing below, and the carpet descended in that direction. Weapons were readied, and spell components checked for easy access.

But only silence greeted them. They were still a good thirty feet above the ground below when Dannel saw the first body. They were not surprised; Cal's prying eyes that had found this place had given them warning of what they would find. Still, they were alert for any sign of an ambush, as the carpet settled a few feet above a wide stone outcropping, and they dismounted, spreading out to watch in all directions. Dannel remained on the carpet, an arrow nocked and ready to fire.

"What manner of man is that?" Beorna asked, as Cal knelt beside the first body. Umbar's voice carried from the far end of the dell, indicating that he'd found another.

The "man", if he was that—he was of no race any of them had ever seen—looked to have been abused. His body was covered with dozens of what looked like tiny cuts, which on closer examination were found to be tears in his flesh, as though his body had simply started to come apart under some incredible stress. His eyes were clouded, staring sightlessly ahead nothing, and his jaw was locked so tightly that blood trickled from the corners of his mouth. They found a broken staff nearby, and a depression in the ground that was caked with dried blood.

"There were more of them here, at some point," Mole said, checking the ground.

"That one over there, his throat was slit," Umbar said. "He did it to himself... His hand was clutched on the blade so tight that I'd have to hack off the hand to get it, I think."

"I sense no Taint," Arun said. "There is a lingering darkness in this place... but he, at least, feels clean."

Looking down at the bloody hole in the ground, Beorna said, "It is... wrong. What was done here was evil."

"Perhaps," Cal said, still looking at the ruined figure at his feet. "I don't know if we'll ever know who these beings were, or why they came here."

"Seems pretty obvious ta me," Hodge said. "Assumin' yer ain't forgotten last night."

"Do you think that's the end of it?" Mole asked.

Cal lifted his head and looked at his companions. He saw the answer in their eyes. "No," he said.

"So where do we go from here?" Dannel asked.

“We go forward with our plans,” Arun said. He lifted his hammer. “We know who the ultimate enemy is. And while...” He abruptly stopped in mid-sentence, and his eyes grew momentarily unfocused.

“What’s the matter?” Beorna asked. The others turned to him, concern on their faces, but Arun forestalled them with a gesture. When he finally spoke, his voice was grim.

“We are out of time,” he said.

Chapter 534

INTERLUDE

Ediir drew a considerable draught from his pipe, held it a moment, and then let it out in a soft plume of sweet white smoke. He didn’t need to look to his side to see the disapproving look from his second. Avellos, like most celestials, took a pretty strict line on what could be considered a vice.

The leonal guffawed slightly, and took another puff of smoke before tapping out his pipe and tucking it back into a pocket of his war-cloak. It was almost time to move out again. He only had to nod to Avellos—think what he would, the fellow was a good leader—and the hound archon started gathering up the patrol for a resumed march.

Preparation was almost reflex now, for Ediir. He checked his weapons, although they were never far from his hands, riding easily at his hips. The two maces were very different, one small and gleaming silver, the other large and crudely hewn of cold iron. They had seen a fair amount of use during this extended patrol, but inwardly the leonal was thinking that their role had begun to transition to mopping up the remnants of the fiendish creatures that still resided here. Of course, he wouldn’t say as much to his men—no sense in having them let their guard down! Ediir could see the changes wrought even in just the short time since he’d come here, transitioning across planes to join the fight against Evil on yet another front. From what he’d heard from some of the archons, the ones that had been here before the failed attempt from the former master of this place to reassert his authority, those had been some hairy times, back then.

Not that his tally on this extended patrol was anything to scoff at. The fiendish bison weren’t that much of a threat, but they’d also flushed out a knot of dretch that had taken shelter in one of the mounds of rubble dotting the landscape, and a fiendish dire lion that had torn one of his archons to pieces before they’d finished it. It had been a pity to slay that last one, Ediir thought, recognizing a distant kinship with the beast, but in the end, it had been Evil, and his maces had splayed its brains quiet convincingly out over the turf.

He looked up as one of his scouts came buzzing into their camp. Even before the lantern archon spoke, its words sounding like they were spoken from within a long hollow tube, Ediir knew that its news was trouble. His maces sprung into his hands, and his patrol gathered around, alert for any threat.

The lantern archon's report confirmed his feeling, although as usual the celestial's words were thin on the details that he would have liked. The little ones weren't known for their intellect, but they were fearless and dedicated.

"Lead us there," he ordered.

They followed the pulsing lantern archon deeper into the forest of withered strands that they'd been skirting before their break. A faint hint of rot hung over the place, which grew stronger the deeper they progressed. It was all just a part of change, Ediiir noted; as Occipitus evolved, the old faded away, to be replaced with the new. He wasn't sure what exactly would replace this fibrous forest, but it had to be better than the grisly strands that made him feel like a flea walking upon the back of some massive hound.

The archon flashed, and they could see something up ahead, a reddish glow that had a decidedly unfriendly look to it.

"Buff up," he told his forces. The hound and lantern archons paused briefly and prepared aid spells. It wasn't much of a boost, but Ediiir had been in enough campaigns to know that every little bit helped. One of the lantern archons touched him, infusing him with the same protection, and he nodded to the celestial in gratitude.

"All right, let's go," he said. He didn't need to issue further orders; if nothing else, the archons were organized and knew their roles.

As they drew closer to the source of the glow, Ediiir could see that it originated at some sort of distortion-field that floated in the midst of a clearing in the forest of dying fibers. The sagging strands grew particularly dense here around the perimeter of the clearing, as if the ones inside the open space had been pushed back to the rim. But they gave way easily before Ediiir's mace, and the leonal stepped forward into the clearing.

The distortion appeared to be a completely flat plane, an oblong roughly six feet high and four feet wide at its broadest point. It floated about a foot off the ground, and although the surface wavered, like a pond that had been disturbed by a thrown stone, Ediiir could just make out something else beyond, a landscape of brilliant colors that was somehow jarringly wrong.

His suspicions about the nature of this oddity was confirmed a moment later, as it shimmered and something stepped through.

It resembled a tall human at first glance, but that resemblance was quickly dispelled. Its body was lean, almost emaciated, and its hide was a mottled gray, as though all of the life and vitality had been sucked out of it. Its face... its face was a monstrosity, a warped feral thing with jaws too large for its face, and eyes that gleamed with a hungry yellow glow. It moved with an awkward, shuffling gait, carrying a massive double-ended axe almost as large as it was.

Ediiir could sense the sudden surge of anger from his celestials, as they recognized the fiend. A rutterkin demon, one of the lesser tanari, but no less infused with taint for that.

The archons did not hesitate, immediately assailing the demon. Beams of pure white light lanced down from above as the lantern archons hovered overhead, the rays searing the demon's hide, ripping away swaths of corrupted flesh. The thing snarled and lifted its weapon as a quartet of hound archons rushed at it, spreading out to flank it and block retreat back through the portal.

They needn't have worried; the demon had no thought of escape. It managed to inflict a minor wound upon one of its adversaries before their greatswords brought it down, thrashing as black ichor splashed out upon the spongy turf.

Ediir was typically one to lead from the front, even against such a minor threat, but he had hesitated. The portal was clearly some sort of planar gate, but he knew that such an effort was far beyond the capabilities of a mere rutterkin. He heard a bark from one of his archons and saw that another rutterkin, this one armed with a jagged-edged longsword, had pushed through into the clearing, and was already coming under heavy attack.

Why would someone bother to open a gate to send rutterkin here?

The answer came to him in a flash, filling his gut with a sensation of dread.

"They're already here!" he said aloud, even as the air flashed around him, and the clearing filled with demons.

They appeared all around, teleporting in, surging immediately at the archons with slavering hunger for carnage. Most were babaus, their emaciated black hides glistening with the acidic red gel that coated their bodies, but Ediir saw a pair of vrocks materialize overhead, and as he heard a loud croak behind him he turned to see a squat, massive hezrou crouched behind him.

The leonal did not wait for the inevitable charge. Recognizing the toad-demon as the greatest threat—a single blasphemy would have cut through his entire force—he opened his jaws wide and unleashed a powerful roar. The sound washed over the demon and knocked it back, reeling, stunned. A babau that had been too close shrieked and collapsed, likewise rendered insensate, but that did not in any way dissuade three others from leaping at the leonal from his flanks, their claws eagerly seeking his flesh.

Ignoring them for the moment, the leonal turned back toward the portal. Another demon had pushed through, a squat jovoc. One of the hound archons, too inexperienced to recognize the threat, chopped it with its greatsword, only to roar in pain as its aura of retribution returned the pain of the wound to its inflictor, and its allies.

Ediir created a wall of force across the gateway. It wouldn't keep out the fiends that could teleport, but it would hold back the weaker ones...

But more demons were continuing to appear. Babaus were everywhere, at least two dozen now swarming in and around the clearing, and Ediir could feel the cries of his lantern archons as the vrocks eagerly tore into them, extinguishing their shining radiance.

The babaus snarled as they slashed at him with their claws. His damage resistance protected him for the most part, but the babaus were masters of sneak attacks, and he felt pain as their piercing talons sought out weak spots in his defenses. Turning, he aligned himself so that the maximum number of demons were in front of him, and then let out a second mighty roar. Nearly a dozen babaus crumpled, their bodies ravaged by the mighty blast. His own forces were not affected, but the lantern archons were all gone, destroyed, and only four of the hounds were left standing, having formed a defensive ring in the center of the clearing. Their swords hacked and cleaved into demonic flesh, the canine celestials caught up in the glory of slaying their traditional enemies. Ediir saw Avellos lift his flaming sword high as a vrock screeched and dove at him. The archon did not falter, holding his strike until the vulture demon's claws had reached his fur, then driving the blade deep into its body. The vrock let out a piercing cry of agony and lashed out with all four of its taloned limbs at its enemy, and for a moment the two combatants were lost in a wreckage of violence. The other three hound archons hewed at babaus that leapt over their stunned comrades to tear at the archons with their long claws. One shining sword broke, weakened by the caustic ooze secreted by the babaus, and its owner rapidly fell, its jaws still locked around a babau's throat.

Ediir felt a surge of glorious pride at the courage of his soldiers, but it was clear that the battle was not going in their favor. The leonal tore free of the babaus that were trying unsuccessfully to drag him down, and charged forward toward the embattled archons. He unleashed his third and final roar, and again demons fell, overcome by the holy power of that blast of sound. Avellos was quick to take advantage, driving his sword through the vrock one final time as the demon fluttered dazed at his feet. He turned immediately to aid his comrades, taking the head off a babau as it rushed past, but before he could strike again Ediir forestalled him.

"Return to headquarters... report what is happening!" Another vrock dove down at him, but he lifted his cold iron mace, and drove it up into the demon's body. The blow released a sudden cacophonous blast of sound, the full power of the thundering weapon knocking the beastly creature roughly aside.

"I will not abandon you!" the hound archon yelled, stabbing another babau. Already, his sword smoked as the toxic acid ate at the weapon. A foot away, another hound went down under a pair of babaus, leaving only one other celestial standing besides the two leaders, blood oozing from a half-dozen gashes in his fur. Both of the celestials knew that there was no easy escape for the leonal, who lacked the archon's ability to teleport.

"That is an order!" Ediir roared, crushing a babau's skull with his backswing. The vrock, recovering, let out a terrible shriek; the hound archon soldier staggered and fell into the eager arms of a babau, and Avellos only barely resisted being similarly affected. Ediir's fortitude was such that he easily shook off the stunning effects of the shriek, and he brought both of his weapons down onto the vrock's shoulders, drawing a reassuring crack as fiendish bone gave way before the assault.

Avellos nodded, drew up his sword, and vanished.

The demons, furious at the escape of one of their adversaries, only intensified their attack. The vrock, still struggling, seized one of Ediir's arms. The leonal broke free, losing one of his maces. He laughed and tossed the other away; he needed no weapons to hurt demons. His claws found the vrock's throat and tore, and the demon collapsed, gurgling out the last of its life in a bloody mess.

For a moment, as babaus swarmed around him, the leonal considered flight. It was possible that Avellos would be able to return with reinforcements; distances were of no concern to a celestial with the ability to teleport at will. He could lead these fiends on a merry chase, and rally his forces...

But as he looked up, and saw more demons descending toward the melee—chasmes, he recognized, and a palrethee—he knew that his initial suspicion about the demonic assault was correct. This wasn't a raid; this was an invasion, a campaign of conquest. Avellos would not be returning soon; if the great spire was not already under attack, it would be soon. The hound archon was loyal, and would seek to return, but Saureya was practical, above all, and he would not allow a veteran leader to throw its life away.

He could run. But while he was faster than these demons, they too could teleport.

The leonal let out a growl from deep in his throat, shaking his head to clear it of the buzz that was already beginning to lull his senses. He was bleeding now from a half-dozen deep gashes that had gotten through his defenses; everywhere he turned a babau was tearing at him.

Ediir paused a moment to heal himself, then he reached out and grabbed a babau by the skull, slamming it into his knee with enough force to crack its skull like a ripe melon. The action hurt his knee somewhat, and would likely cost him some mobility. In effect, a decision made.

The leonal laid about him with abandon, cutting and tearing and crushing. Demons died, and more came forward to take the places of the slain.

It went on.

No celestial reinforcements came.

Chapter 535

Dana steeled herself as the thick door recessed into the wall slowly opened. The receding portal did not make a sound, but its ponderous swing nevertheless clearly conveyed the feeling of great thickness and weight even before it had withdrawn enough for her to see the space beyond.

The space beyond looked dark, at first, but as her eyes adjusted she could make out the features on the walls inside, highlighted by a deep violet glow that seemed to seep from small globes that were set into the crown molding where the ceiling met the wall at regular intervals.

The dark portal finally came to a stop, leaving a gap only just large enough to allow her passage. Taking another deep breath, she stepped forward. She felt a tingle as she entered the threshold, and for a moment felt a brief thrill of panic that she ruthlessly squashed. For just an instant she thought she heard a voice, calling her name. LL? she thought, but there was only silence. Oddly, she almost thought that the voice had been a woman's, slightly familiar but too fleeting to identify.

She steadied herself and stepped forward, committing herself. She had foreseen this, and in fact would have been surprised if there had been no defense here. A ward against scrying, or extradimensional travel, or both. In any case, she was not going to turn back.

Once fully through the doorway, she immediately caught sight of the door warder, shielded behind the portal. She had to look up to meet its eyes; it was nearly eight feet tall, and its long angular wings brushed the ceiling. She would have called it a succubus but for that size, and the fact that its skin consisted of dense scales colored in a blend of gray and olive that was muted in the odd lighting. Its eyes, set deep within their sockets, were black orbs that regarded her without any emotion that she could discern.

"No weapons," it said, its voice deep and androgynous.

"I carry none," she said, spreading her cloak. She forced herself to meet that black stare as she spoke, and the meanings behind the words carried clearly. I do not need them. Her demeanor also carried the clear intimation that she would not subject herself to a search.

But the reptilian thing did not press her. It closed the door, leaning into it until it sank cleanly into its socket. She could now see that it was a full foot thick, and if it was solid metal as it appeared, it had to be insanely heavy. As it settled into place, an audible series of clicks sounded that were disproportionately loud in the confines of the corridor.

The door warden glanced down at her. Its mouth twisted into what might have been a grin, as if confirming that she was now without options. She did respond. She had already worked out the implications of this visit, which she had gone through such trouble to arrange, and was beyond second-guessing herself.

The creature gestured for her to proceed it down the hallway. She walked down the corridor, her boots silent on the thickly carpeted floor. The hall wasn't very long, perhaps twenty paces before it ended in a wide arch that curved dramatically in a fashion reminiscent of Calimshite architecture. The shadows deepened within, and it took her a moment to recognize that there was a pair of enameled wooden doors opposite her.

The doors opened easily at her touch. The space beyond was significantly brighter than the oddly lit corridor, and it took a few seconds of blinking to adjust enough to make out details of the chamber.

The floor was somewhat lower than the corridor, with a short but wide staircase leading down to the broad space below. Several additional arches around the perimeter—lushly warded by silk drapings or curtains of colored beads—led into shallow alcoves or to other rooms within the complex. A faint sound of water trickling into a basin was audible, but she could not identify its source. There was an air of luxury here, but also an undercurrent of horror that became clearer as she looked around. Faded tapestries that appeared to show scenes of frolic were actually depictions of torture, while small objects that looked like innocent knickknacks at first glance turned out to be quite otherwise when they suddenly moved, resolving into bulbous vermin or small fiends that skittered away into hidden corners. A pair of quasits sitting on a high ledge watched her movements, whispering comments in Abyssal that didn't quite reach her ears. One held something in its hand that it occasionally tweaked with a sharp fingernail, drawing a tremulous squeak of discomfort from whatever it was.

She looked back at the door warder, who merely indicated another arch on the far side of the room. This one had a more substantial opaque hanging obscuring it, but as she approached it—careful to avoid a slithering something that slid past her boot as she crossed the room—it drew back seemingly of its own volition, revealing a complex circular iron door that resembled an iris.

She stepped up to the door, which twisted open before her, revealing another chamber.

The room was shaped like a hemisphere, although there were enough bulges, ledges, and alcoves to ruin the pure outline of the form. The dome was crafted from blocks of red stone that bulged slightly, their edges rounded, giving the place the appearance of being part of the shell of some monstrous giant insect. A pair of hooded lanterns dangling from the apex of the dome provided at least a semblance of illumination. Dark shadows along the walls might have concealed exits, or they might have just been part of the unnatural curve of the dome.

A pair of massive forms flanked her as she entered. She recognized them from elsewhere in Sigil; mogs or something similar, LL had called them. Each carried an axe larger than she was. How they got in here she didn't know; they seemed too large to navigate the entry.

Dismissing them as mercenary guards, she directed her attention to the others in the room. She felt a momentary quiver as she recognized a medusa, its skin a deep shade of blue, its eyes obscured by a pair of black eye cusps that reflected the light in the room. It stood adjacent to a black divan that pointed toward the door. Opposite it stood another creature that Dana thought she recognized. It took her a moment to place it; the naked, sexless humanoid was of the same race—if not the same individual—as the creature that had betrayed her and her friends to Graz'zt when they were in Zelatar, almost twenty years ago. Its body was hairless, its bone-white flesh pulled tight over its frame, its features pinched and alien with narrow slits for a nose and mouth, and no visible ears at all. For the life of her, she could not recall the name of the creature they'd encountered that last time; in any case this one evidenced no hint of recognition, or any other emotion in its alien eyes.

But the one she had come to see what lying upon the divan, facing her.

That Barrat Ghur was a fiend was discernable at an instant's glance. Even if the black horns jutting from his temples and the sinister red tinge to his flesh did not give it away, the depth of spiritual corruption that radiated from him could never be fully masked. But from that base, all other assumptions collapsed. For one, he looked... old, his hair and beard thinning and gray, his skin wrinkled and sagging, gathered in clumps around his neck. His limbs jutted from his body like sticks, and were marked by spiny ridges that protruded up to several inches out from his elbows and knees. He was clad in a tunic and breeches that glimmered with the sheen of metal, cut specifically to the unique contours of his form.

There was a long moment of silence as the human woman regarded the fiend, who met her look with a cold stare.

“Barrat Ghur,” she finally said.

“Dana Ilgarten,” Ghur said. For his aged appearance, his voice was deep and full, booming from his chest. “You have gone through a great deal of effort to ferret me out. You have bullied your way across the torus of Sigil, slain my associates, and inconvenienced me by sundering operations carefully assembled. Now you come into my sanctum, alone, with all the arrogance of an infernal magnate.”

“Tell me, my dear... why is it that I should not simply slay you where you stand?”

The door twisted shut behind her, and the creak of the maugs as they lifted their weapons sounded unpleasantly loud in the sealed confines of the chamber.

Chapter 536

“Tell me, my dear... why is it that I should not simply slay you where you stand?”

Dana did not react, did not turn as the obvious noise of the door closing and the maugs shifting into a ready position echoed behind her. Instead, she kept her attention focused on Ghur. “I am not someone you would wish to make an enemy.”

“Ah, yes,” the fiend replied. “Perhaps you refer to your fabled thaumaturgic powers. In case you have not noticed, human, this citadel is fortified with a dimensional lock. You will not be gating in any angels to your cause this day, nor can you shunt yourself off to a place of safety.”

Dana did not respond.

“Or perhaps you refer to your friend. I was not altogether surprised to hear that you’d attracted Laertes Leonidas to serve as your planar cohort. The werelion has something of a reputation here in Sigil, and has always had something of a soft spot for lost causes. Either way, he cannot assist you here.”

“LL is not involved in this,” Dana said. “He offered to join me in meeting you, but I asked him not to intervene.”

“A selfless gesture,” Ghur said, his tone such that Dana could not distinguish whether it was mocking or sincere. “So given these limitations, why should I be leery of inflicting my... desires... upon you?”

Dana came a step deeper into the room, still a good three paces from the end of the divan. She sighed. "If you feel it necessary to wade through these preliminaries... Very well, then, here's a reason for you: I have powerful friends who would not take it well if I were to be inconvenienced."

"And yet you seem quite cavalier about placing these friends of yours into a circumstance of potential danger, through your actions."

"I am driven by a motivation beyond my control."

"Ah. Love... or hatred, perhaps? Connected like a mobius, they are."

"I would not expect a being of your kind to be able to comprehend the former. But let us speak of hate. That, I suspect, is something that you understand quite intimately."

"You presume much."

"A necessity, born of the circumstances I alluded to before."

"Let us speak of that, then. For you would not have come here, would not have undergone the obviously significant effort that you have, without a profound need."

"Would it be too jarring if we simply skipped over the little dance? You know who I am, and why I am here. If not, then I have miscalculated, and you will not likely be of aid to me in any event."

The fiend inclined his head slightly in a nod of acknowledgement. "So be it. Let us assume for a moment that all of your grand presumptions are essentially accurate. Tell me, then, why I should help you."

"You sat high in the councils of the demon prince Graz'zt; were one of his advisors for quite some time. Perhaps even one of his inner circle, for a time. You represented his interests on numerous planes, ultimately settling here on Sigil. Forgive my delving into conjecture at this point my narrative... but perhaps you grew to prefer this place to the stark harshness of the Abyss. When the Prince's fortunes underwent a period of decline, you used the opportunity to sever yourself from him, and establish yourself as an independent agent."

"You have accumulated a lot of data in a short period of time. But your narrative rests upon a tortuous web of assumptions and suppositions, the most tenuous—and risky—of which is the presumption that my 'severing' from the prince was not amiable, and that I bear some resentment of him that is sufficient to motivate me to be of assistance to you. For example... consider for a moment the dynamic if it turned out that the estrangement was initiated by he, and not I... and the potential for restoration of amiable relations, if I were to present him with one of his enemies?"

"That is of course a possibility," Dana replied. "I make no claim to knowing the truth of circumstances, only educated guesses based upon the information that I have been able to access. The problem with an investigation of this sort, is that only some of the facts are in evidence, and the motivations of the protagonists is clouded. For example, one might learn that you have thus far been approached by representatives of several Powers of the lower realms, including but not limited to the Abyss. And that you have carefully avoided any entanglements, playing off one against the other in an exercise that demonstrates a fair quantity of diplomatic skill, and guile.”

“Raw flattery, while appreciated, will not sway me to your cause.”

“Noted. It is also evident,” she continued, indicating their surroundings with a wave of her hand, “That you have undergone considerable effort and expense to cloak your operation here in a veil of... privacy.”

“If you had spent a longer time in Sigil, you would come to understand that such precautions are not uncommon. The fundamental rules upon the planes are quite different from those on your corporeal globe, not the least of which is that most of the rules themselves are mutable to some degree. But let us continue; your narrative grows interesting, even as the web strains against the weight of your assumptions.”

“Then let me offer my most tenuous statement before the web snaps altogether. You know where he is.”

Barrat Ghur chuckled. “Ah, here at last, your clever story runs into a wall formed of logic. Presume that your statement is correct. This presents several fallacies. First, if that were the case, and if your earlier statement about the mutual antipathy between myself and my former employer is likewise true, would not He be motivated to ensure my silence? Second, if I did possess this knowledge, would it not be insanely valuable? Surely one of my fundamental nature would sell or trade such information, in exchange for fabulous wealth and power. He has many enemies, as you no doubt know quite well.”

“Now you make assumptions,” Dana said. “You presumed, perhaps logically, that the ‘he’ I referred to was the Prince. I know that his location and movements are masked, by a potency greater even than a mind blank. In fact, finding out anything at all about the Lord of Shadows is all but impossible, even through direct divine agency.”

“Many things are made nebulous by the Heart,” Ghur said, mysteriously. Dana raised an eyebrow, but the fiend offered no clarification.

“Fortunately, his associates—current and former—are not so diligently shrouded.”

“And so you have set upon me,” Ghur said.

“Part of it is a question of access—you are here, after all, and not the Abyss, where a casual visit would be... inconvenient. But it is also true that you, perhaps more than any other individual of the Prince’s acquaintance, are familiar with his interests that are located outside of the Abyss. One such as he would have many bolt-holes that were not casually known, I am sure.”

“And you would be correct. It would take a lifetime to search them all, in fact.”

“I do not have a lifetime, and I think that you are being deliberately obfuscatory, in this case.”

The fiend’s eyes narrowed just slightly. “You still have not addressed my original critique about your construct of postulations. If, as you are obviously suggesting, I have some insight as to where to look, why would I not sell this information to one of His rivals?”

“That puzzled me as well,” Dana said. “But then I had to reorient my assumptions, as you might say. I grant that it would be impossible to even begin to put myself into the shoes of one who had been spawned and raised in the Abyss. But since coming to Sigil I have spent time with individuals who have been... instructive, in many ways. So my best guess is that you recognize that to share—sell, trade, whatever—this information with an Abyssal magnate would be to commit yourself to a faction, and thus forfeit the independence that you have obviously fought hard to preserve here.”

There was a long moment of silence. Finally, Ghur spoke. “Your insight is considerable, for a mortal so new to the Outer Realms. But your fault lies in your limited perspective. You do not truly understand that nature of your enemy.”

“Then enlighten me.”

Ghur shifted his gaze slightly to the humanoid to his left. The pale figure seemed to come closer, although it had not moved its feet. It shifted subtly, its hands coming up into a complicated pattern, its fingers—it only had four on each hand—twisting in a way that she could not have matched without breaking them.

The Silent, it was called the Silent, she thought. And indeed, the creature made no sound.

“What are you doi—“ she began, but then everything around her began to grow insubstantial, and she lost consciousness.

Chapter 537

Dana felt like she was floating, the surroundings of Ghur’s lair replaced by an empty gray expanse that seemed limitless in every direction. She felt a thrill of terror at Ghur’s—attack, betrayal? But the emotion slipped from her grasp, neutered by the void that was this place. Her thoughts flickered back upon the past, to Zelatar, and older treacheries, and Graz’zt.

Her attention was drawn back to the moment as the gray began to form shapes around her. The empty void was replaced by a landscape of black towers and squat buildings laid out like bricks below her; a cityscape. She was flying above it, incorporeal, a hollow observer. She recognized the place instantly; even two decades could not mute the memory.

Zelatar. The corrupt city of the Lord of Shadows, sprawling across three layers of the Abyss, Azzagrat, demesne of Graz’zt.

She could see demons, vrocks flying lazily through the air, swarms of quasits, there a succubus on some private errand. None paid her any heed. Below, the streets filled with creatures of all shapes and sizes... demons, yes, but others as well; planar travelers, yugoloths, daemons, slaad, tieflings, humanoids, giants, and a thousand other species all represented. Zelatar was far from friendly, but it was cosmopolitan, a collection of lost souls and the jetsam of a hundred realities, bound together in fear and respect for the Argent Lord, the Prince who ruled it all.

There. The Argent Palace, a massive complex that was visible from anywhere in the city, on any of the three planes on which it existed. There, the place that their enemy lurked in security, planning his wars, twisting plots through the fabric of dozens of worlds.

Dana felt something strange... a tendril of power intruding upon the edges of her consciousness. Something... familiar. She could not identify it, but it drew her attention to the depths of the Palace, to a collection of spires that rose hundreds of feet into the air, above a building large enough to hold a considerable town inside.

Something... popped.

A flash, erupting suddenly, blinding her. She covered her eyes with an insubstantial arm, blinking against the spots in her vision. She knew that she wasn't really here, but even so the flare had been painfully bright.

She still couldn't see when the blast wave hit her. She was driven back, although she could only feel the pulse of solid wind like an echo. As her vision began to return, she saw a vrock that flew past her as if shot from a catapult, there and gone in an instant.

She looked down. The city was...

Ruin. The Palace was a smoking pit. A massive orange cloud shaped like a billowing mushroom rose up from where the spired cathedral had been. A wall of flame continued to spread outward in a rapidly-broadening ring; within the ring everything was red fire and black smoke.

A giddy feeling rose up in her; madness came with it, she knew. In the nebulous shadow-state in which she floated, the feelings shore off of her like water upon an oilcloth cloak. She drifted, destruction everywhere she looked.

After a time, the scene shifted. Zelatar was still visible in the distance; a plume of black smoke hung over the city like a shroud. Columns of refugees stretched from the city in long strings. As Dana watched, a crevice in the ground disgorged a ravening pack of abyssal ghouls, who descended upon the nearest cluster of hapless souls fleeing the ravaged city. Demons and others fought the undead in knots, leaving mounds of shredded carcasses...

Another shift. A gray-green portal as big as a house disgorged a legion of heavily armored fiendish troops. A bat-winged woman in full plate atop a nightmare watched as row after row of soldiers poured into the bleak scene. She held a long spear aloft like a pennant; atop its summit hung a pair of severed heads, female...

Another shift. Carnage in a strange cityscape. Bodies rotting in the streets.

Another. A frozen landscape, frost giants with glowing red eyes, ambushed by huge wraiths that rose out of the ground, enfolding them until even their screams were engulfed.

Another. Another. Another.

Dana pressed her palms into her eyes, trying to blot out the images. A part of her knew she had to watch, had to absorb whatever clues were being revealed to her in this litany, but it was too much, too much...

Daughter

The soft voice calmed her. She cautiously opened her eyes, only to see that the neutral gray expanse had returned. She reached out with her mind. Moonmother?

Daughter, came the voice again, bringing peace, filling her with the benevolent touch of her patroness.

Were those things I saw real? Did Ghur betray me? Oh, mother... where is Benzan?

Hush, child. I have little time here, and you must save your strength for the trials that will come.

Ghur can only be what he is; ultimately he can only betray himself. He can give you the information you need... but the price will be high.

I will pay it, Dana thought, but she felt a tiny thread of caution through the link.

Do not be hasty, daughter. Some prices are too great to pay, if they cost us the thing for which we paid.

What would you have me do, mother? Speak it, and I will obey.

I cannot—no, I will not—take away that agency that is granted you. I cannot make this course any easier, daughter. But nor will I abandon you. Long have you carried my standard, and what grace I can bestow... I freely grant.

A soft glow penetrated the gray murk, a shaft of silver moonlight that bathed Dana in its radiance. At the touch of that light the fog that had hung over her senses melted away, and she felt a bright rapture as a divine glow spread through her.

Dana let that glow fill her until she thought she would burst. At that moment, she let go.

Her eyes opened. She was looking into the face of the medusa, who started in surprise. Dana saw that she was not what she appeared to be. How could she have missed it, before?

“She is awake!”

She stepped back and to the side. Dana saw that her cloak lay on the ground in front of Barrat Ghur, with several of her items laid out upon it. The fiend looked at her with an expression of interest upon his face. She started to step forward, only to realize that her arms were pinned, each held in the iron grip of one of the maug guards. Since she could not move, she fixed Barrat Ghur with a cold stare.

“I have gained insight from what you have shown me, but I still lack the information I seek,” she said coldly.

“You have surprised me, and I am impressed by your ability. But that does not change the fundamental reality of the situation that I alluded to earlier.”

“It does not have to go this way. I suggest you consider this; your interests and mine can coincide in this matter.”

“Had you come to me even a short interval earlier, I might have been inclined to agree. As it is...”

His gaze shifted for just a moment, but it was enough to confirm what Dana had already begun to suspect.

“Who are you?” she said to the medusa. “Surely it does not threaten you to reveal the truth, not at this point.”

The medusa let out a short, unpleasant laugh. “If you wish.” Her form shifted, and her already lean body elongated, her features altering. The transformation only took a moment, and when it was done a tall, impressive figure stood before her. A cloak of shiny black chitin covered most of its body, obscuring most of its form, but it was still identifiably humanoid. Its head, however, resembled that of a jackal, with milky yellow eyes that shone malevolently within deep sockets in its canine skull.

Inwardly, Dana felt a flutter of worry in her gut. But her voice was calm as she said to Ghur, “So. You have elected to throw your lot in with the yugoloths.”

Ghur tilted a hand apologetically. “Your comments upon my motivations were insightful, for the most part. But as you noted, it is very difficult to avoid taking sides. I do not make the rules...”

“We all make our own rules,” she said, quietly. “And we must live by the consequences of our choices.”

“I would have enjoyed seeing the ultimate outcome of your clash with my former employer,” Ghur said. “But as it is, I am afraid that your quest must now come to a premature end.”

He turned to the yugoloth lord. “She is yours.”

Chapter 538

Dana spoke a holy word.

Everything happened at once. Dana, her senses hyperattenuated by the expectation she'd had for this moment, all of the contingencies she and LL and Eleva had worked out, sensed the attempt of the pale asexual humanoid to counter her effort, but it failed. The power of the word filled the chamber with a resounding echo of pure Good. The merceenary maugs released her and fell back, stunned. The arcanaloth seemed momentarily discomfited, but she was not especially surprised when Barrat Ghur was not affected; his only response to the spell was a brief lapse of his calm features into a hint of a scowl. Likewise, the Silent showed no ill effect.

Ghur responded immediately with a powerful word of blasphemy. His invocation was even stronger than Dana's, and without any sort of spell resistance she should have been dazed and seriously weakened, at least.

Fortunately, the fell magic was one against which she'd prepared a spell immunity before entering Ghur's stronghold, and the sinister echoes of the magic slid off of her without harm.

The aranaloth tried to hit her with some sort of hold spell, but with her will augmented by the divine gift of Selûne, that too did not affect her. Fortunately, she had returned to awareness before the creature had found and taken her pearl of wisdom, which nestled between her breasts under her tunic. They want to take me alive, she thought. That gave her an advantage, perhaps, albeit a small one; if they did manage to ensnare her, then she was as good as dead in any case.

The battle had only lasted a second, and while Dana had withstood the initial display of power from Ghur and his allies, she knew that the odds were still against her.

Well. She would have to do what she could to shift them back.

"Selûne's might!" she screamed, kneeling and smacking her fist into the floor. As she struck, she unleashed a massive wave of energy, an earthquake that seized the room and shook it madly, tearing through the foundations of the structure and rippling outward. The yugoloth and white humanoid were thrown briefly off balance, while Barrat Ghur was tossed roughly off of his divan, as the floor shifted at an awkward angle beneath him. The construction of the place was durable, so the room did not collapse, but cracks appeared in the ceiling and floor, and the metal of the iris-door behind her creaked loudly in protest as it warped in its threshold, sealing them in.

When Ghur stood, his face had finally betrayed an expression of anger. "You will pay for that," he said, his voice cold.

For a few seconds the four combatants just seemed to stand there; to an outsider it might have seemed like a casual gathering rather than a battle between earnest adversaries. But to one sensitive to the flows of magic that were hurled back and forth, the room would have been louder than a castle siege.

Ghur shifted his tactics, focusing a greater dispel at Dana in an effort to shear away her magical defenses. But that spell too dissipated before it touched her; she'd anticipated the tactic and had included that spell in the four protected by her spell immunity.

Thank you, Mocker Darr, she thought wryly, before she felt another sharp surge against her Will. It was from the Silent, she thought; it was impossible to be certain, because the creature did not stir, it just stood there with its arms at its side, only the slight shifting of the flaps of its mouth indicating that it was alive at all. The alien creature might be the most dangerous of the three, she thought; she was certainly familiar with its ability to shift reality and sever her grip on consciousness. But her mental defenses were fully alert, her will gathered like a suit of armor, and she resisted whatever assault the creature was launching at her.

The arcanaloth blasted her with a ray of enervation. But Dana's death ward, cast immediately before she'd entered Ghur's lair, neutralized the spell. Thus far her layered wards were holding... but she knew that her enemies almost certainly had their own protections up.

So be it.

She summoned another powerful spell, lifting her hands high above her head, filling the room with the emerald glow of a dimensional lock.

Ghur, recognizing what she was doing, hit her with a power word. She hadn't protected herself against that one, but was able to resist the effects—barely, swaying slightly as the spell's power reverberated against her will.

"You play well, but you cannot withstand us forever," Ghur said. "I have twenty fiends in my service, who will be here in moments!"

As if in response to his taunt, a loud crashing noise sounded through the damaged iron door.

The arcanaloth shifted its form, shapechanging back into the blue-skinned medusa she'd first seen when she'd entered this place. It immediately fixed her with its petrifying gaze, but Dana's resisted its potency, tearing her eyes away from that deadly stare.

The priestess knelt again, touching her palm to the cold stone at her feet. Divine power flowed through her, spreading outward from her touch. The effect wasn't immediately obvious, and as she stood, she was hit by a devastating spell from Ghur.

A scream was torn from deep in her throat as the flesh on her arms and legs began to tear itself from her body, dangling in long strips. Blood trickled down her limbs as she looked down to see bare muscle pulsing garishly in the room's unsteady light. As if that wasn't bad enough, she began to hear voices whispering at the edges of her awareness, building in intensity. She glanced over at the Silent, who stood motionless at his place, as unreadable as before.

“Ah, didn’t expect a flensing, did you?” Ghur said. “Savor the pain, Dana... it is only the beginning of the agonies that you will experience. If Amok Vorr is willing to amend our bargain, perhaps I will keep you for a time, and teach you the true depths of your ignorance about the Planes.”

Chapter 539

“Go fuck yourself,” she hissed, and imploded the Silent.

As the pale humanoid collapsed in a bloodless heap, Ghur’s neutral façade cracked for the second time, now betraying a look of surprise. The arcanaloth, perhaps realizing that the situation had grown a bit more serious, abandoned subtlety and tried to disintegrate Dana. The green ray tore a painful swath across her torso, but when the beam faded she was still there, her expression cold as she turned toward the yugoloth.

The arcanaloth shapechanged into a pit fiend, but even as it lunged at her she focused her will and imploded it as well.

She paid a price for that, as Ghur kept up his attack, sending waves of agony through her as more of her flesh ripped free of her body. But she was not unaccustomed to pain, and her focus had reached the level where dedication and insanity were too close to distinguish.

She set her gaze upon Ghur. In an act of desperation, he laid a destruction upon her. The black fire scorched her exposed limbs, but even as it did a blue glow surrounded her, and the wounds were healed as the contingency she’d laid upon herself earlier—courtesy of a miracle spell—took effect.

The fiend turned and darted into one of the recessed alcoves nearby. But the secret door there refused to open; Dana’s earlier stone shape had sealed all of the room’s exits. Given time he could have forced it, but as he turned he saw that he had no time left.

Another heavy crash sounded, this time filling the room as the iron door buckled under a massive impact. The sound seemed to restore Ghur’s courage. “You can destroy me... but if you do, you will never find your lost love! It is time to make a decision, priestess!”

Dana snarled and lunged at him. Ghur screamed as the unholy red glow of a harm spell surged through him. Ravaged by the spell, he lashed out at her one last time, striking at her with a surge of fire that scorched both of them with eager red tongues. But that too faltered against one of the five protection from elements wards she wore.

Judging how injured the fiend was from her harm, she hit him with an inflict moderate wounds spell. The spell easily overcame his spell resistance, and while Ghur resisted the full effect of the destructive magic, what got through was still enough to knock him unconscious.

The door crashed again, the metal squealing as it was torn free of its moorings. Staying close enough to Ghur so that she could keep track of him, Dana stood and turned to face the newcomer.

With a final loud scream of protest, the door crashed free of the threshold and fell into the room. The figure that stepped through the doorway was not what Dana had expected, and her heart sank as she recognized the massive reptilian form of Dhur's fiendish door warden. The demon's features twisted into a violent snarl as it caught sight of her, and as it spread its claws they thickened and elongated, pulsing with an infusion of black shadow-energy.

Dana hit it with a holy word.

The demon, unaffected, stepped forward.

Oh, crap.

Chapter 540

Dana brought down a flame strike that almost missed the demon. It moved so quickly that it was on her even before her mind registered that it was attacking. Even as the stench of scorched reptilian flesh filled her nostrils she felt pain explode across her body as the thing smote her with one of those massive claws, drawing deep gashes in her torso, slicing flesh and muscle down to the ribs below. Staggering back, she opened her mind to the goddess, and poured divine energy into a stream of silver fire that splayed over the body of the demon, scoring its corrupt, scaly hide.

The demon roared in pain. It lifted its claws, snarling as it prepared to tear her face from her body.

A dark form hurtled through the doorway like a rolling boulder, slamming hard into the demon's back. Dana twisted out of the way as the newcomer and the fiend crashed hard to the ground in a tangle of limbs, the demon already twisting its body around in an effort to get at its attacker. The newcomer was just as strong and fast as the demon, however, and after a violent series of attacks, the fierce reptilian monstrosity sagged and collapsed, blood oozing from the wreckage of its back.

"You okay?" Laertes Leonidas growled as he stood. The werelion looked a sight, his fur matted with blood and scorched black across his shoulders and the left side of his head.

"Took you long enough getting here," Dana said with forced levity, as she healed his injuries.

"Yeah, well, their welcoming committee wasn't exactly... welcoming." Dana's cohort looked around at the wreckage of the chamber, the two still-insensate maugs, the remains of the Silent and the arcanaloth. "That him?" he asked, nodding at the motionless form of Barrat Ghur.

“Yes,” Dana said. She turned as another figure appeared in the doorway. He looked like an elf at first glance, although his planar heritage was clear in the odd shine of his eyes, the slightly unreal cast of his features. “Everything all right in here?” he asked, his voice musical in its lilting syllables.

“Yes, Eleva,” she said. Now that the battle was over, she felt suddenly tired. But she could not rest, not now. “Bring him,” she said to her cohort, who nodded as he went to recover Ghur’s limp form.

“Thank you again for your service,” she said to Eleva. The ghaele eladrin bowed. “You took most of the risk upon yourself, Moonmaiden. I am pleased that you were successful.”

“I would not have been without your plan. It was... brilliant.”

The ghaele smiled. “The intelligence provided by your captive provided us with the keys we needed to unlock the complexities of the tactical situation.” The statement was true in more ways than one; Mocker Darr’s headband of intellect had been one of items Dana had offered Eleva for a term of service as her planar ally, and while it had been one of the least powerful versions of said item, it had still helped to augment the eladrin’s already considerable intellect.

“Are you all right?” she asked, noting that the ghaele’s garments were discolored with scorch marks and trails of blood. His greatsword, dangling at his side, was red from the hilt to the tip of the blade. But his wounds had already been healed, and the eladrin shook his head at her offered aid.

“The fiends put up a bit of a fight,” he explained. “Your contingent summoning worked perfectly as soon as we felt the tremors of your earthquake, and the elemental made short work of the entry. But as soon as we got inside, we ran into some heavy resistance. That little monstrosity,” he said, indicating the reptile-demon, “was the worst of them; she made short work of the elemental but fortunately disengaged to return here before she became too much of a problem. I was able to distract the remaining defenders while Laertes here followed it. Your friend ran across a few blast wards, but he was quite intent on reaching you.”

“Eleva is too modest,” Laertes said, as he returned with Ghur slung over his shoulder. The fiend groaned, but did not stir back to consciousness. Dana gave him a quick examination; she did not want any more surprises. “Ghur had a good two dozen fiends and merc guards working for him, mostly light stuff: quasits, reavers, half-fiends, maugs; with a couple of nasties like the dragon-bitch there. He went through most of them single-handedly. I marked a prismatic spray, a banishment, and a holy word, and I think I saw a summoned avoral flapping around in there at some point.”

“It was a glorious fight,” the eladrin said, modestly.

“Let’s get back,” Dana said. “Eleva, please give a quick check over the rest of this place for any remaining fiends lurking in the corners, or items of power that we might use. Swiftly.” The eladrin nodded and departed.

“What about them?” Laertes said, indicating the still-helpless maug guards. “They are likely mercenaries, Dana... evil, perhaps, but not implicated in Ghur’s schemes.”

“You know the answer to that.”

The were-lion did not reply, but followed Dana as they made their way out of the complex. It was harder going out than in; the earthquake had done some damage outside of the central room, forcing them to detour around a few fallen beams, and at the doorways they had to pass over the wreckage of the portals forced by Dana’s summoned elemental.

Once they had made their way back to the covered portico outside of the main door, they paused. Dana looked back at the black doorway; the violet lighting inside the main hall had faltered during the battle.

“Dana...”

“Later,” she said. After a few moments, Eleva emerged, and nodded.

Dana cast a summoning, and after a few seconds, a trio of large fire elementals appeared. She did not speak Ignan, but Eleva had told her the words she needed, and she had memorized them. She pointed toward the dark entry.

“Go inside there. Burn everything to ashes.”

Without even stopping to see if they obeyed, Dana turned and walked away. Her friends shared a brief look, and then followed after her, bringing with them the prize they had fought so hard to win.

Chapter 541

The scene within the Hall of the Flame had the look of chaotic bedlam, with celestials rushing about, to and from the staircase that led into the room, or flying in through the cleft in the ceiling above. But most of those present were archons, and so the appearance of tumult was in fact underlaid by a precise order. Lantern and hound archons delivered reports crisply to superiors, who in turn passed the information on to others of higher rank. A hulking ursinal clad in silvery plate stood guard, its armor aglow in the golden light that shone from the burning column that gave the place its name.

The center of the buzz of activity stood adjacent to that plume, close enough that he had to be awash in the heat radiating out from it. A sword archon approached and delivered a report in precise language. After his summary was concluded, he paused.

“What else is it?” the figure standing in the glow of the golden pillar asked.

“Avellos again requests permission to return to his patrol leader,” the winged celestial said.

“No,” Saureya replied. The archon waited for elaboration, but upon receiving only silence he made a clipped, formal bow and retreated to receive more reports.

Saureya stared into the column of flame. He already knew most of what the archon had reported, had already deduced the trend in the snippets of information that had flowed in from all over Occipitus since that first hound archon had returned with his news of a planar gate opening in the fibrous forest. At that point the deva had dared to hope that this was just a raid, but it had taken very little time to dispel that dream.

At this point, the only thing he didn't know for sure was which Abyssal magnate was behind this. He had his ideas, of course. Ultimately, what did it matter?

He hadn't wanted this authority. When Morgan had... gone, leadership had somehow just fallen upon his shoulders. He had managed to convince himself that it was all for the greater good in the aftermath of Adimarchus's destruction, when no major threats lingered. But now...

He turned, and looked at the others gathered here. There was no fear, no doubt. They looked to him, and would sell their lives at as high a price as possible, if he gave the word. For the archons, there was Right, and there was Wrong. Everything between was clear.

How he envied them.

He knew that he should make another attempt to secure aid, but he knew it was pointless. Whoever was behind this, they had planned well. The link between Occipitus and the Higher Realms was blocked, and while he might have restored it eventually, using the power of the plane itself as a conduit, there was no time. Thus far the wards had held, but demons had already begun popping in and out in the airspace above the skull, and they were likely only waiting to build up a sufficient advantage of numbers before they swarmed in for a final assault.

The sword archon returned, but Saureya did not acknowledge him. Instead, the fallen deva reached out and plunged his hands into the column of golden fire. That hurt, and more than a little, but Saureya was a creature who had long familiarity with the nature of pain. The flow of liquid fire shuddered as he manipulated it, drawing upon the power of Occipitus to send a message across the boundaries between worlds. He did not even try to penetrate the barrier that lay between him and the rest of the outer planes, but instead drove in a different direction, toward the inner planes and the Prime Material.

It took almost no time. As soon as he felt the tiny pang that meant contact, he issued his sending.

Graz'zt unleashed all-out attack on Occipitus. Under heavy attack, several legions mimimum. Celestial aid blocked. Holding skull for moment. Assist immediately or Occipitus will fall.

The effort of completing the sending cost him more than he'd expected, and he sagged, the pain from the connection with the plume intensifying in response to his weakness. But he forced himself to hold the connection for a few moments longer, until the response came back, weak but still discernable.

We will do what we can.

He all but fell back from the pillar of fire. The sword archon looked at him with concern; the action in the room had paused as all of the gathered celestials watched. Instead of turning to his adjutant, the deva addressed them all directly.

“Send out the following order to all forces in the field.”

“Retreat.”

Chapter 542

With a hissing crash and a twisting of reality, Cal, Dannel, Mole, Lok, Umbar, Beorna, and Arun materialized on an open plain under the golden sky of Occipitus.

The third arrival of the companions from the Prime was not a pleasant one. Cal and Mole collapsed, voiding the contents of their stomachs; Dannel staggered and likewise would have fallen if not for Lok’s quick steadying arm. The dwarves looked unsteady as well, although they were better able to weather the surge of nausea that swept over them.

“What in the... Hells... was that?” Arun said, wiping his mouth with the back of his hand.

“Some kind of distortion effect,” Cal managed, shaking his head as Umbar started to help him. Summoning an effort, he pushed himself back to his feet.

“Are you all right, Mole?” Beorna asked.

“Oh, hunky dory,” the gnome shot back, grimacing as she wiped her mouth on her sleeve and gingerly stood. “You know, there are times when I envy you dwarves your cast-iron bellies.”

“Something is wrong here,” Arun said, looking up at the sky. They all followed his gaze, and they could see angry red striations in the gold-tinged firmament; had it been a normal skyscape, they might have called it a storm.

“We’re way out on the periphery,” Cal said. And indeed, the massive wall of cliffs that ringed the bowl-shaped plane seemed to almost loom with gray menace over them, extending out as far as they could see to either side. In the opposiste direction, toward the center of the plane, they could make out the massive spire of the great skull mountain that marked the core of Occipitus. The distortion effects appeared to be stronger there, but they could not discern any details at this distance.

“I cannot gauge the distance,” Umbar said. “This place... it is strange.”

“The layer is completely flat, and lacks a horizon,” Cal explained. “It takes some getting used to.”

“You should have seen it when it was evil,” Mole said.

“I do not think I will ever get used to this place,” Dannel muttered.

“We need to find Saureya, and find out what’s happening.” Arun said. “His sending said that several legions of demons were attacking, but that they were holding on to the skull—for now.”

“Assuming that the message was legitimate,” Cal said. “Remember, we know almost nothing about this situation. Time flows... differently here than on our plane, and the situation may be more fluid than we know.”

“You said you could bring four with your teleport,” the paladin said. “Take Lok, Mole, Dannel, and Beorna with you directly to the skull. Umbar and I will follow on the magic carpet.”

“I do not think that is a good idea,” Cal said. “Not only would the two of you be vulnerable, but we might arrive right in the midst of a hundred demons. At least let me try to scry Saureya, first.”

“That could be very time consuming, and we are very exposed here,” Umbar said, siding with Arun.

“I have the more potent variety of the spell memorized,” Cal explained. “I can establish the sensor in just a few moments, once I set up my focus.” He unslung his handy haversack which produced the oblong silver mirror on demand. As he prepared his spell, the others established a perimeter around him, scanning the open plain and the sky above for any threats.

None of them spotted the invisible quasit that hovered briefly a few hundred yards away, watching for a moment before it flew off with all dispatch in the direction of the skull.

Cal cast his greater scrying spell, and focused intently upon the mirror. The silver surface grew murky, as if he were looking through the window of a room filling with smoke. He oriented his thoughts on Saureya, the fallen deva, as he was the last time they saw him, after the defeat of Adimarchus.

The surface of the mirror faded to a dull gray.

“It’s no use,” he said. “He’s warded, or just alert to being detected; the spell has to overcome the subject’s will in order to get a lock...”

He trailed off as the gray void disappeared, replaced by a scene of intense clarity. Cal found himself staring into a familiar chamber; it was the greater chamber in the interior of the skull, with the pillar of fire just visible as a flickering glow in the back of his field of view. “Hey, I got some—”

A darkness appeared, filling the sensor. It fixed the gnome archmage, pouring into him like a torrent through the link. Darkness, nothing but darkness, carrying him away.

“Cal!”

“Cal, what’s wrong?”

“The mirror! Something’s using the sensor to attack him!”

Arun and Umbar pulled the gnome and the mirror apart, the paladin having to rip Cal’s clenched hands from the sides of the device. Cal screamed as the contact was broken, his body arching as his muscles clenched in a violent spasm. Umbar lifted the mirror to break it, but Dannel stopped him. “No, wait! The link has been broken!” And indeed, when the priest cautiously looked at the mirror, he saw only his own face.

For lack of a better solution, Beorna cast a protection from evil on Cal. The seizure seemed to be passing, and the gnome groaned in the cleric’s arms, pressing his palms against his eyes.

“What happened?” Mole said, once he’d removed his hands, and blinked up at them.

“He... he’s here,” Cal said, his voice laden with dread.

That grim announcement was followed by a pregnant silence, broken only when a harsh sizzle sounded out of thin air almost upon them, followed by a series of pops as demons materialized all around them and attacked.

Chapter 543

The first to appear were a cohort of babaus and a half-dozen apish bar-Igura, which teleported in anywhere from a few paces to fifty feet distant to the ring of companions. Wherever they were, the demons immediately let out bloodthirsty howls and leapt to the attack, covering the ground separated them from the nearest mortal in a mad rush. A few of babaus cannily hurled untargeted dispel magics into the knot of adventurers, hoping to strip away some of their defenses. The effort was mostly unsuccessful, as their magical potency was greatly inferior to the long-lasting wards cast by Cal and Umbar, but Beorna lost a protection from fire.

“Defensive ring!” Umbar yelled, invoking the power of Moradin to fill himself with righteous might. The action drew attention to himself, and three bar-Igura fell upon him, leaping up to cling to his torso, clawing and biting.

The warriors fell back into a tight circle, shielding Dannel, Mole, and Cal within, protecting each others’ flanks. The demons, confronted with a firm defense, evoked no subtlety, hurling themselves at their enemies to claw and bite.

For a moment the demonic rush seemed inexorable, as the emaciated babau and the shaggy bar-Igura swarmed over their foes, striking their armor and shields with powerful blows. The companions, caught off guard, did not immediately counter, which only seemed to embolden the demons further. More fiends materialized around the perimeter, another half-dozen babau accompanied by a fat toad-like hezrou. These moved to join their fellows, the hezrou pausing to hurl a chaos hammer into the fray before leaping forward on its powerful hind legs.

But the companions were not falling back or delaying their counterattack out of confusion or despair. No, every movement was planned, buying time and space to prepare as they consolidated their position, summoned powerful magic, and prepared.

When they did unleash their assault, just ten seconds after the first demon had materialized, it was devastating.

Arun held his spot in the circle as two babaus clawed at his armor, looking for any vulnerability. They didn't find any. His very presence bolstered his allies; not only did he radiate a calm assurance against fear, but the hezrou's hammer did not touch him or those next to him, and the magic circle against evil that he'd created helped all of them to defend against the demons' ferocious assault.

Now, his shield came down, and his hammer, the blessed holy avenger, came out. Trusting in the sacred weapon's ability to resist the caustic effects of the babaus' slime, he drove in the chest of the first with a pair of truly colossal blows that laid it sprawling upon the turf a few feet back. The second one thought to use its comrade's death to gain advantage, but even as it reached for Arun's weapon-arm it realized its mistake. The paladin turned the hammer and sent it flying again with a smooth snap of its wrist, crushing one side of the demon's torso in with a devastating straight-on blow. The demon staggered, and before it could recover a fourth attack smote it on the bridge of its nose, driving a shard of bone into its corrupted brain.

Beorna, just a step away, had faced a babau and a bar-Igura. The ape-demon had elected to simply try and bear her down, leaping upon her in the hopes of overwhelming her quickly. It found this more difficult than it appeared, as Beorna caught its weight, and taking one hand off of the hilt of her sword, grabbed its chest and hurled it back into the onrushing babau. The demons quickly recovered and came at her again, encouraged by the fact that she hesitated rather than striking at them. As with the two that had threatened Arun, they learned that hesitation did not mean weakness, as they found when the templar attacked fortified with divine power and a holy sword.

A few seconds later, the only difference between her foes and Arun's were that hers were hacked apart rather than crushed.

Lok was rushed by three babuas. He had no buffing spells to cast, and no need to pause. Once he had fallen back to his assigned place in the line, he set his feet in a defensive stance, and waited. As soon as the demons entered his reach, he was ready.

Three more demons down.

Umbar's concentration held as the three bar-Igura tore at his torso, and he too called upon the divine power of his patron. The demons clinging to him dug in with their claws and tried to rip open gaps in his armor, but the magical mail was dwarven-forged, and it withstood their best efforts. Empowered with an incredible strength, he tore one of the demons easily from its grip, thrusting it down upon the ground. The bar-Igura sprang back up, but before it could attack again the cleric drove his warhammer down into it, smashing bones with the force of the blow.

Within the protective circle offered by the warriors, Dannel plyed his bow. He did not have any more holy arrows in his quiver, but his song of power infused even the mundane missiles with magical potency, enough to punch through the damage resistance of the demons. His shock bow was of little avail against demons, with their immunity to electricity, but he now wielded Benzan's bane longbow, which was a different matter entirely. The bow, specifically designed to harm evil outsiders, tore into the bodies of demons mercilessly. His first arrow had struck one of the bar-Igura threatening Umbar, but on seeing the hezrou appear, he immediately shifted targets to that foul demon. His first shot coincided with the blast of its chaos hammer, which the elf weathered with no ill effect. If anything, the blast of energy drove him to a renewed intensity, his hands almost blurring as he transferred arrows from his quiver to the string, drawing and firing almost instantly. He felt an added surge of speed—a haste spell from Cal, no doubt. Never had he felt the song so keenly in his veins, the bow singing in his hands in harmony with its melody. The hezrou's thick hide may as well have been the parchment of a tournament target, for all the hindrance it offered to his shafts. The demon's gaze fixed upon the archer, and in those alien eyes, Dannel thought he saw fear.

Unleashing its most fell power, the demon croaked a word of blasphemy. But the heroes were warriors of legend, and the dark word washed over them, its menace fading like a fireside tale of horror remembered in the reassuring light of the full day.

The demon's foul word had barely faded when Dannel's next arrow slammed through its open jaws, and through the roof of its mouth into its brain.

Thus far, the demonic attack had accomplished little but to litter the ground with riven fiendish corpses. But the hollow flares of more teleportations went on around them, as more attackers continued to appear. Another dozen babaus appeared, along with another hezrou, and in the air above them, five vrock materialized. The vulture demons dove down toward the companions, but instead of attacking, they formed into a ring, locking claws as they spun in a mad, gyrating dance.

And if that wasn't enough, a massive form appeared another fifty yards behind the vrock, its bloated body held aloft by stubby wings jutting from its hairy back. Nevuuz took in the battlefield and the ring of slain demons, and smiled. Mortals, caught here by the surprise invasion engineered by its evil master. The nalfeshnee already had a quartet of archon scalps bound to the throng it wore across its body, enough for a fair bounty. Cutting this knot of defenders would bring a fine reward; perhaps even a succubus as a personal attendant?

Surrounding itself with an unholy aura, the mighty demon descended toward the battle.

Meanwhile, in the center of Occipitus, an ebon-hued figure appeared in the air over the skull. Spreading his arms, he rose slowly up into the air toward the golden ceiling above. Peals of thunder wracked the plane, as if Occipitus itself were announcing his arrival, and dark webs of energy began to form across the sky, as chaos surged.

Chapter 544

The companions turned from the task of slaying demons long enough to note the loud din that resounded across the plane.

“Now what?” Beorna shouted, twisting to avoid a claw that swiped hard at her helmet, and following it with a thrust from her sword that ran a babau through the chest. When she withdrew the weapon, she saw that the blade was smoking from the acidic gunk smeared along its length. Swearing, she dropped the damaged weapon, which encouraged the next two babaus that leapt eagerly forward.

“I don’t know... but...aagh!” Lok said, as an unholy blight settled onto them, courtesy of the latest hezrou to join the fray. When it cleared, it revealed another pair of babaus trying to trip the genasi, who snarled as he grabbed one by the neck and slammed it to the ground at his feet.

Cal’s voice sounded from directly behind Lok. The gnome had made himself invisible almost as a reflex, and naturally Mole was nowhere to be seen as well. “We have to take out those vocks... if they finish their dance, we won’t like the effect one bit!”

“On it,” Dannel said, already lifting his aim and choosing his target. Cal put his words into action by casting a shadow evocation, hurling a delayed blast fireball made of shadowstuff into the midst of the vocks. The creatures let out a terrible screech, but did not interrupt their dance, even when Dannel dropped his target with a direct hit.

“We need more firepower,” Cal said, even as a blast of lightning stabbed down from above them, splaying across Umbar’s broad shoulders. The cleric merely grunted and kept up his task of mashing the demons still fighting to bring him down. One of the bar-Igura had crawled up onto his back, out of easy reach, and was moving for the gap between his helmet and neck when it suddenly lost its grip and fell. Mole briefly became visible, dangling from a strap of the giant priest’s armor, then she kicked off and fell blade-first onto the demon’s chest.

“Fly me, and I’ll go,” Lok said. But Cal saw that without the genasi, they’d never be able to hold the line; already several of the babau were threatening sneak attacks as they continued to swarm around the defenders.

Grimacing, the gnome began casting again, hoping that he would be fast enough to outpace the beatdown he knew was coming.

A wave of pure stench swept over them, as a hezrou barreled into the melee. The frog-demon took a hit from Arun as it reached for Beorna. The templar tried to stab it, but the hezrou seized her bodily with both claws and stuffed her head-first into its gaping maw. For a moment the demon’s head engulfed the dwarf’s head and shoulders, but then it shuddered, its body spasming suddenly. A second later the demon disgorged its captive along with a flood of bloody gore, and staggered back; Beorna, calling upon a feat of strength granted her by Helm, had smote it from within. It managed to croak at her in a violent fury, recovering for another attack, but unfortunately its movement took it within Arun’s reach, and that was that.

“Dannel... take the one with the scorched left wing!” Cal’s voice urged. The elf nodded and let fly, his arrow stabbing up into the vrock, joined a heartbeat later by a second. The vrock faltered and broke free of the circle, its wings flapping wildly as it tried to arrest its descent. The demons smoothly closed ranks, the three remaining ones intensifying their dance as flickers of blue energy began to erupt in their midst. But just as the dance of ruin was coming to its peak, Cal hit one of the demons with an empowered disintegrate, vaporizing it. The two remaining vocks let out a frustrated shriek, and promptly surrounded themselves with a halo of mirror images as they withdrew to a safer distance to regroup.

“Nice one!” said Mole, as she rolled back to her feet beside them. “Say, could you hit me with a quick improved invis? A fly would be nice as well...”

But before Cal could respond, there was another series of all-too-familiar distortions that announced more demons arriving. All around them, in an uneven ring, babaus, bar-Igura, and hezrous materialized, almost fifty in all. And the sky above blackened as more vocks, at least twenty, teleported in, accompanied by a few sleek succubi.

“Oh, damn it all,” Lok said, summarizing the feelings of everyone present.

Chapter 545

Prince Graz’zt felt power surge through him as he rose into the air above Occipitus. He’d invested a fair amount of his power into the opening of the gates that had allowed his legions to transfer here, but that had been offset by the use of the Heart of Axion to siphon off energy from some of his minions to fuel the process. The complete annihilation of two hundred demons would be an incentive for the remainder to perform with vigor in the coming campaign.

Now, as the sky around him surged in useless resistance to his presence, it was time to ensure that victory would be the conclusion of that effort.

Extending his gaze, Graz’zt looked down at the base of the skull below. Three massive portals shone like oozing sores around that perimeter, each disgorging a column of fiends upon the plain. They were of all sorts and sizes. The demons were by far the largest contingent, and included hulking goristo, rutterkin, squat jovocs, endless slaving dretches, quasits, and even a few scattered glabrezu and jariliths. There was a knot of mercenary hordelings, no two of which were alike, and a full company of massively armored cambions, including a cohort of cavalry mounted upon fiendish dire lizards that were the size of cottages. The half-demons were the spawn of one of Graz’zt’s lesser harems, and all had been blooded in the eternal struggle against the devils. The harem was another pleasure that was lost to him, now, destroyed in the ruin of Zelatar...

The Prince allowed his anger to fill him, to fuel the growning flood of potency that gathered in him. For a few moments he hovered there, hundreds of feet above his armies, savoring the moment. Even for one such as he, what would be wrought here would be... remarkable.

Finally the columns began to thin. The noise of a sonic evocation reached his ears; the signal from his general that the deployment was complete.

Graz'zt did not rush the process. He was an entity of passion and fury, but he was also possessed of an incredible cunning, and a patience that had allowed him to bring down rival after rival over untold centuries of struggle. He was diminished, now; that could not be denied. His seat of power had been reduced to rubble, and others squabbled over the scraps he had been forced to leave behind. But this place, Occipitus... here, in this place which lay upon the cusp of possibility, a morphic reality teetering on the brink of redemption, here, he would begin anew.

It could take millennia to recover what he had lost. But Graz'zt was patient.

He gathered his Will. As the gates below faltered, he siphoned off their power as well; every little bit would help for what would come.

He reached out through the Heart of Axion, and drank of Occipitus.

It was time. Reveling in his might, the Prince unleashed two epic spells.

A massive crack shook the plane, followed by a rumbling that sounded like the end of the world. At Graz'zt's bidding the massive white mountain that marked the heart of Occipitus began to shake and tremble, caught in the eddy of the Prince's Will. The bleached white exterior of the fiendish pillar began to distort, hardening into grim plates of dull gray metal, marked by bands of jagged spikes and angles sharp enough to cut flesh. Spires and battlements jutted from the perimeter of the place in no particular pattern. Every hollow and overhang that could offer even a modicum of shelter from their view grew long, narrow spikes. The drained pool and tunnel that provided access to the place grew a massive iron door, surrounded by narrow slits that were similarly ringed by sharp edges.

The transformation took all of five seconds. When it was done, the mound of the skull was completely gone, replaced by an abyssal citadel from the depths of a nightmare.

But even as the reverberations of that dramatic alteration echoed across the plain, Graz'zt uttered the words of his second dramatic casting. The eddies of energy that the Prince had drawn to himself exploded outward in a cascade of sick emerald light that tinted everything upon the surface of Occipitus with its glow. Graz'zt spread his arms wide, drawing more and more power, screaming with the intensity of it. Again the spell developed rapidly, with the glow spreading to engulf the entirety of the plane in its radiance within a few seconds. When it had reached its furthest extent, the Prince drew upon a final reservoir of energy, and rooted the effect to the very fabric of the layer.

Graz'zt had set a dimensional lock over the entirety of Occipitus, sealing the plane.

Exhausted, the Prince half-drifted, half-fell downward toward the fortress of his creation. The armored iron roof bristled with spikes that looked ready to arrest his descent by impaling him, but at the last moment an opening appeared, the metal groaning as it gaped open and accepted the falling demon into its embrace.

Chapter 546

Faced with what seemed like a neverending horde of demons, the companions looked to be in an untenable position. Thus far they'd held out against the sheer force of the demonic rush, but even though none of them had suffered serious injuries yet, all bore wounds from tearing claws and evil spells.

Now, as the latest horde of reinforcements surged at them, they knew that their situation was becoming increasingly dire.

"We'd better think about getting out of here!" Cal shouted, as the warriors hurled back another snarling horde of demons. Up above, he saw that the vrock's had immediately started several new circles, at least four separate groups, all within range to strike them with the terrible power of the dance of ruin. The nalfeshnee he's spotted earlier seemed content to hang back for now, calling down stinging lightning bolts onto them from a distance, but Cal had no doubt that the demon was just waiting for the other demons to soften them up some before unleashing some nasty surprise of its own.

"We can handle them!" Umbar yelled, smiting a stray vrock that had dove within the extended reach of his enlarged hammer. The demon shrieked, and darted back long enough to surround itself with a bevy of mirror images. Four babaus were tearing at his legs, and another dove between them, nearly broking through to grab Dannel from behind before Mole suddenly appeared, tripping it and sending it sprawling to the ground.

"There's too many! In a few seconds those vrock's will hit us with a deluge that will kill us all! On my signal... fall back on me, and I'll plane shift us out of here!"

An unholy blight crashed over them, followed a split-second later by a chaos hammer.

"Do it!" Arun said, crushing a bar-Igura's skull with his hammer before the demon could grab onto him with its claws.

But the gnome never got a chance to execute his plan. For it was at that moment, halfway across Occipitus, that Graz'zt unleashed his power upon the plane. With the distance and the distraction of the demon horde, none of them witnessed the event, but all of them felt the reverberations across the plane as the Prince's magic shook Occipitus. The vibration through the ground reached them as a tremor nearly strong enough to knock them down; only the strong stances of the dwarves allowed them to keep the defensive line intact. The quaking was accompanied by the violent sounds that reached them even forty miles away from the transformation of the skull.

"What's happening?" Dannel shouted over the din.

But the others were too overwhelmed by the sudden rush of sensory information, and the battle to keep their own equilibrium, to answer. Even as that first pulse faded, they felt the surge of Graz'zt's lock spreading outward, tinting the soft golden glow of the sky above with a shading of sinister green. Of the entire group of mortal heroes Cal was the only one who recognized the significance of what had just happened, and even as his mind tried to grasp the reality of it, the demon prince's epic magic took hold, sealing off their retreat, their way home.

As the wave of sorcery faded, the chaos of the melee returned, the noise and the screeches of demons all around them.

But if the effects of Graz'zt's magic had disrupted the senses of the companions, it had made a much more significant impact upon the demons. All of the eighty or so demons engaged in the battle were reeling, stunned by the backlash of their master's efforts. Graz'zt had drawn deeply from all of his sources of power to fuel his twin incantations, and that included his minions. Babaus and bar-Igura staggered about, blinded, while the vrock circles came apart as the vulture demons fluttered to the ground in a daze. Even the nalfeshnee, Nevuuz, reeled, spinning in the air as explosions of dark energy filled his vision.

"They're caught in some sort of feedback surge!" Cal shouted.

"Hit them hard!" Lok yelled, putting his words into action as he chopped a stunned babau in two with his axe. The dwarves were just a moment behind him, laying into the hapless demons with full attacks that cut a deadly swath through their ranks. Arun paused long enough to tug his backup axe from the loops across his back, tossing it to Beorna. The templar immediately put the weapon to good use, carving a pair of babau into wreckage. The ground shook as Umbar pounded several demons into the ground with his warhammer. Dannel continued his barrage, targeting the two hezrous that had been hitting them with unholy blights and chaos hammers, dropping the first with six arrows embedded deep in its chest. Mole leapt upon onto the piled corpses of a pair of dead bar-Igura, using the perch as platform from which to rapid-fire a series of crossbow bolts at nearby demons. In one hand she held three bolts spread between her fingers, slapping the string of her weapon back with her palm and dropping a bolt into place one after another so quickly that it seemed that the weapon must be magical. The bolts themselves were not ensorcelled, and appeared too puny to affect the demons through their considerable damage resistance, but each struck a vulnerable spot, driving pain through the haze that clouded the minds of the attacking fiends.

Cal cast a greater shadow conjuration, intending to bring in a few lantern archons to start blasting demons, but although the spell was completed without interruption, the influx of shadow-substance normally drawn by the spell did not materialize. Cal quickly realized the significance of that failure, and he grimaced as his assessment of their situation grew yet more bleak.

But there was no time for him to ruminate more upon the big picture, for the demons were starting to recover from the backblast from Graz'zt's release of energy across Occipitus. The companions had slain a good fifteen demons during that brief interlude, but that left dozens more, including the vocks which shook their heads as they rose, getting their bearings before lifting back into the air on powerful beats of their wings. Several paused to summon mirror images, while others only bothered to gain ten or fifteen feet of altitude before they dove over their ground-based fellows at the ring of defenders, claws extended. Four of them ascended to renew their arial circle, beginning the creation of another dance of ruin.

Nevuuz threw a slow spell into the defenders' circle, countering Cal's haste. The nalfeshnee began to drift closer to the melee, still surrounded by the protective halo of its unholy aura.

The warriors withstood a renewed surge as the demons pressed their attack once more. Umbar staggered and nearly fell, as a babau savaged his left knee with its claws; opposite him, Beorna was nearly taken down by a bar-Igura that leapt onto her back, seizing her armored neck with its powerful claws. Lok and Arun continued to hew with their weapons against row after row of attackers, but both of the veteran warriors was now cautious of the damage wrought upon their powerful weapons by the slimy coating that covered the hides of the babaus. Lok dropped his axe and shield and drew Coldburn, sweeping it in a broad arc that decapitated two babaus, but he barely ducked in time to avoid the charge of a screaming vrock, its claw catching on his shoulder plate long enough to painfully wrench the joint.

As the vocks dove at the companions, they unleashed terrible screeches laden with fiendish power. The warriors withstood those potent cries, but Mole, Cal, and Dannel were all knocked reeling, stunned.

One of the vocks took advantage, flying over the center of the circle. Hovering briefly, it used its telekinesis power to seize hold of Mole, drawing the helpless gnome up into its waiting claws.

Meanwhile, Nevuuz dropped to a hover sixty feet above the battle. A weave of rainbow-colored lights began to take form around its misshapen form, as the nalfeshnee gathered its power to smite these mortals, and take their lives as its prize.

Chapter 547

Mole, stunned by a vrock's screech, only hung limply as one of the flying demons lifted her through the air into its grasp.

With Cal and Dannel momentarily unaware of their surroundings, only Lok, already turning to face the vrock hovering over him, noticed the maneuver. "Mole!" Lok yelled, staggering as his distraction cost him a painful bite to his left ankle from a babau near the bottom of the heap of bodies before him that wasn't quite dead yet.

Arun glanced over his shoulder, saw Dannel lying on his rear, shaking his head. He didn't see Cal; the archmage was still shrouded by his greater invisibility. But he did see Mole, through the shrieking chaos of a half-dozen vocks weaving overhead. Unfortunately, without a fly spell, there wasn't a lot that he could do to intervene.

A pair of babau came at him from behind, their claws tearing at the creases in his armor. Ignoring them, he swept his hammer around in a wide swipe that achieved maximum velocity right as it intersected the face of the demon splayed across Beorna's back. The demon went flying, taking one of the templar's shoulder greaves with it. As the dwarf woman straightened, Arun caught her gaze and pointed upward. The vrock had gotten both of its claws around Mole's body, and while the gnome had started to struggle, she could not immediately break free as the demon started to fly off with its prize.

Beorna at once called down a flame strike that engulfed both the fleeing demon and an additional pair of nearby vrock, but when the blazing column evaporated the demon, still clutching its prize, continued its retreat.

A second vrock evidently wanted its own trophy, as it too hovered over the melee, trying to snare Dannel with its telekinesis. But the arcane archer, taking up his bow again as he recovered his wits, resisted the tug of the spell. He started to aim at the demon, before spotting the one making off with Mole. He shifted smoothly, but before he could release, Cal shouted a warning.

"Dannel, nalfeshnee!"

The elf spun again, releasing as soon as he planted his foot, the huge demon looming large even sixty feet away. Arrows erupted in a rapid sequence from his bow, the third already in the air by the time that the first penetrated through the demon's unholy aura and its ugly hide into its torso.

Cal hesitated for a fraction of a second. The demon carrying away Mole would be out of range within seconds, but he was all too familiar with the smite power of the nalfeshnee, and his brain immediately calculated that statistically, at least three of them would fall victim to the effects of the demon's chaotic burst, with the warriors particularly vulnerable. That conclusion did not ease his worry as he drew his magic again through his rod, firing a green beam of energy that lanced into the nalfeshnee, piercing both its spell resistance and the unholy aura. The demon had an instant to look surprised before the green glow enveloped it, and it was reduced to ashes.

Cal let out the breath he'd been holding. He'd been damned lucky with that shot.

But the destruction of the greater demon did not ease the gravity of their situation. Vrocks surrounded by a confusing welter of mirror images dove down at them from above, tearing with their claws, releasing puffs of corrupt spores that drifted down through the gaps in armor in clothes to burrow into the flesh of the adventurers. Dannel was clipped by on the side of the head, tearing a bloody gash across his forehead. Two vrock descended upon Umbar's head, darting their claws under the lip of the cleric's helmet, and drawing them back wet with blood. Another unholy blight hit them, the work of the last remaining hezrou, which hovered just beyond the ring of lesser demons surging at the warriors. Beorna went down to one knee as another three babaus dogpiled onto her, their claws knifing through her armor like little daggers. Arun shifted his position enough to help her, but that let another babau through the gap in their line, the demon stumbling over the invisible Cal on its way to Dannel. The demon, cackling, paused to empower itself to see invisibility, before reaching down to grab at the spellcaster with eager claws.

A hundred feet above, three succubi flew over the battlefield, content to watch, for now.

Mole regained her senses in time to realize that she was being carried off by a very big flying demon. Her first instinct was to use her magical cape to transport her back down to the ground, but as she drew the garment around her, nothing happened! Somewhat irate at that, she then looked down to realize that the ground was rapidly falling away; already she and her captor were nearly sixty feet up and still gaining altitude.

Oh well, she thought, and with a twist of her body, slipped out of the demon's grasp.

It was a long way down, and nothing to grab onto to slow her fall. Still, she did what she could, spreading her limbs to catch the air, and then collapsing into a forward roll as she hit, her legs absorbing some of the shock and redirecting her inertia as she spun across the ground. The spongy turf soaked up some of her momentum, but she still felt like a child's ball that had been kicked hard when she finally snapped back up onto her feet. Still, falling from that kind of height and still being able to walk after it was no small feat, and the first thing she did was turn around to see if any of her friends had seen it.

But not only could she not even see any of them over the ring of slain fiends and the ones still attacking, but her momentum had carried her within spitting distance of a hulking hezrou, which turned around to regard her with a nasty look in its bulbous eyes. Its long tongue shot out, as if to taste the scent of her on the air.

Above her she heard the shriek of the vrock, which was already diving to reclaim its lost prize.

Uh oh, she thought.

Meanwhile, another surge of energy formed above the battlefield, as the vrock finally completed a successful dance of ruin. A crackling blast of energy stabbed outward from the nexus of their ritual, passing through the demons harmlessly, but tearing into mortal flesh with terrible fierceness. Arun's magic circle helped the companions withstand the full force of the blast, but Beorna, already heavily damaged, collapsed, and Umbar, already shrinking back to his normal size as his righteous might spell faded, fell to his knees as eager tendrils of energy lanced through his armor. For a moment it looked as though he would shrug off even that powerful assault, and he started to stagger to his feet. But then his divine power expired, and he too fell, as eager demons surged forward to tear him to pieces.

Chapter 548

The battle raged on, until only sheer will kept the warriors swinging weapons that felt like leaden weights at the nearest charging demon. There seemed to be an inexhaustible supply of them.

The vrock's fell dance had finally broken the defenders' line, and it looked as though a total collapse was imminent. Arun, who'd simply absorbed the blast of fiendish energy, ignoring it through sheer stubbornness, took in the situation quickly. "Lok... cover Umbar!" he yelled, as he himself rushed to stand over Beorna.

Ignoring the painful gouging he felt in his back, as several demons tried unsuccessfully to bring him down, the paladin bent over the fallen templar, driving back a babau that was trying to rip off her gorget and sink its claws into her throat. Her helmet had fallen half off her head, and she was pale, with blood trickling down the side of her mouth. Arun placed his hammer down and laid his hand upon her neck, unleashing a surge of positive energy into the broken woman as he laid on hands.

The effect was immediate; Beorna's eyes popped open, and she started to get up.

"Heal yourself the rest of the way," Arun told her, but any further discussion was immediately curtailed as a bar-igura leapt onto her chest, clawing at her. Arun reached for his hammer, but even as his fingers touched the haft a babau yanked it out of his reach. Another two were still hanging on him, and one got a good grip on his shield, pulling it—along with the paladin—down on top of it.

Cal's attention was distracted by the babau that had seized him in its claws. It did little damage through his stoneskin, but the demon lifted him up and tucked him under an arm, clearly intent on darting off somewhere quiet to dismember its catch at its leisure. Realizing that neither his maze spell nor his remaining shadow evocation would likely work, given Graz'zt's sealing of Occipitus from extraplanar channels, the gnome contented himself with polymorphing the babau attacking him into a slug.

Dannel, threatened by a storm of vrock, barely resisted another stunning screech as he fired his bow up at the dizzying array of attackers. Every shot hit, but most of his targets simply vanished as the arrow struck, merely a mirror image of a demon. Already his skin felt like it was on fire, as the vrock's toxic spores burrowed deeper into the flesh of his face, neck, and arms. As Umbar went down, the elf staggered over to him, narrowly avoiding another vrock that almost managed to tear his bow out of his grasp. Lok was already standing over the unconscious cleric, knocking off demons as they tried to finish off the stricken dwarf.

Dannel no longer used his bardic magic much; in most cases the song was much more useful in channeling the power that he used to transform his bow into a devastating weapon. But now he used it to heal, bending over Umbar, infusing him with a cure moderate wounds spell. The magic didn't do much against the dwarf's terrible wounds, but it did bring him back to consciousness.

Unfortunately, it also left him open, as a vrock dove down and seized him in its claws. Pumping its wings, it lifted him several feet up into the air, kicking and struggling, while several of its fellows dove in, tearing at his body with their claws.

Mole darted forward as the hezrou tried to snare her with its claws, tumbling between its legs and coming up behind it. It turned quickly, so it did not notice the small furry ball she'd left lying on the ground behind her. The ball expanded into a boar, which immediately set about stabbing its tusks into the demon's leg. The attack was utterly ineffectual, of course, but it did distract the demon slightly, enough for Mole to whip her rapier up into a vulnerable spot in its lower body.

The vrock flew overhead, screeching in anger at the loss of its prey. It turned around in mid-air and flew back around. It tried to grab the gnome again with telekinesis, but this time the gnome was able to resist the insubstantial grasp, darting forward a moment before the hezrou's claws tore deep gouges in the earth where it had been standing. The demon uttered a word of blasphemy, intending to stun this elusive foe, but while the spell reduced Mole's roar to a black smear, it had no effect on her as she darted away, careful to avoid its lengthy reach.

"Hoo, boy," she said as she ran, the hezrou and vrock both following her as she ran. The demons were much faster than she was, and both converged on her at the same moment, shrieking at each other as much as at her as they fought to be the first to snag the prize.

At the last moment, as both demons lunged, she disappeared.

Dannel was in bad shape. Not only had he taken damage from the series of blights that had washed over him, but the burrowing vrock spores from several of the vulture demons continued to dig deeper into his flesh, until a dense beard of furry growths jutted from his face and neck. He'd avoided the worst of the energy blast from the dance of ruin, but as more of the vocks tore at him with their claws, more attacks were getting through his magical armor and the protection offered by his magical ring. It was obvious that within a few seconds, he would be torn to pieces.

Cal had his final disintegrate ready, but in the swirling medley of vocks, most surrounded by mirror images, he could not get a clear fix on the demon holding Dannel.

"Damn it," he said, knowing that there weren't a lot of options left.

Arun's foes leapt at the paladin with a renewed vigor, encouraged by the absence of the terrible weapon that had destroyed so many of their fellows. Arun slipped his arm out of the loops of his shield, relinquishing it to the babau that had dragged him down as he pushed himself back up to his feet. Another babau was crawling away with his hammer, but he ignored it, instead charging at the bar-Igura atop Beorna, slamming into it with enough force to knock it off the templar. He helped her to her feet, shielding her with his body as she cast a cure serious wounds to restore some of the vigor taken in the beating she'd received.

That need attended to, she quickly smashed the bar-Igura with the axe she'd borrowed from Arun, cleaving it with a pair of massive blows that laid it out upon the turf.

Umbar drew upon the power of Moradin to heal his own grievous wounds, taking up his own weapon again as Lok fended off a surge of babaus, bar-Igura, and diving vocks. The genasi had abandoned his defensive stance to come to Umbar's aid, but even though he had to be exhausted, he still fought like a machine, his blows tearing demonic flesh asunder with every strike. He focused on the demons on the ground, not wanting to waste a swing on a vrock's mirror image. Coldburn was beginning to hiss now from the acidic babau ooze covering it, so when he ran through a leaping bar-Igura he let the weapon lodged in its body as it fell, drawing out his third weapon, one of the adamantine battleaxes taken from Shatterhorn. Two babus came at him from opposite sides, and the genasi swung around in a complete circle, chopping both demons down with terrible gashes to their torsos.

Surprised, Lok looked around for the next foe, only to see that he was alone. It was a momentary sensation, as a vrock's screech drew his attention around in time to face a pair of tearing claws.

"Hold on, Dannel!" Cal said, flying into the air after the struggling elf. He reached Dannel moments before a trio of vrocks did, spraying the contents of a pouch across his body as he touched him and infused him with a stoneskin spell. The spell did not render him immune to the demons' attacks, especially their powerful claws, but it gave him a moment's breather as Cal seized hold of the elf's cloak with one hand, and jabbed his rod up into the body of the vrock holding him with the other. Several of the vrocks, recognizing that there was another spellcaster here, lashed out at Cal, seeking him through his invisibility, but even though a slashing claw and a sharp beak nipped him, he was still in fairly good shape and he ignored what little damage got through his own stoneskin.

"Get... out... of here..." Dannel coughed, his lips red with his own blood, his face a garish mask from the wounds he'd taken and the growths covering his exposed flesh.

"Hold on!" he said, as he felt his rod touch solid flesh, and he fired off his last disintegrate.

Gnome and elf fell like stones as the vrock holding Dannel evaporated, dropping out of the flapping ring of demons. Dannel landed hard on his left leg and went down, that last blow finally pushing him over the border into unconsciousness. Cal recovered quickly, and stood in time to see the vrocks diving down at them.

"Need some help here!" he yelled, hurling a greater dispel into the knot of vrocks, shearing away some of their mirror images and heroism buffs, but doing little to ease the violence of their attack.

Umbar pushed forward, covering the elf with an upraised arm as a vrock tried to seize him again with its claws. The cleric tore free before the fiend could get a hold on him, and he quickly channeled a cure critical wounds into the battered elf. Dannel stirred, and Umbar shoved his bow, which had fallen nearby, into his hands.

"Shoot demons," he instructed calmly, lifting his hammer as he stood to face the vrocks once more.

Without more reinforcements coming in, the tide of the battle began to turn. Arun and Beorna appeared again as they slew the last of the demons threatening them. The vrocks began to fall as they pressed their attack, and Lok joined Umbar in shielding Dannel and Cal. Cal used one of his wands to enlarge both warriors, given them the same reach as the demons, making their swooping attacks less effective and opening them to full counterattacks that left them shredded. Arun and Beorna dealt with the hezrou that had been threatening Mole, and moved to join them. The babau holding Arun's hammer had tried to slip away, but before it could build up enough of a lead it suddenly tripped, screaming as Mole's rapier appeared jutting from its left eye socket. The demon snarled and tried to grab the gnome, but a pair of arrows from Dannel put an end to it.

And then, it was over.

The companions stood in an exhausted circle above the wreckage of dozens upon dozens of demons. The only demons to escape were the three succubi, which had started to flee as soon as the battle had started to turn, and were now just tiny specks in the distance. All of them—except perhaps for Mole—were covered in blood and gore, at least some of it their own. A foul stench already permeated the ground like a living entity, and each of them knew from past experience that it would not soon fade from their own bodies as well.

“We should consider retreating back to the Prime, to recover our strength,” Beorna said. “Those three bitch-demons will soon bring reinforcements. Our weapons are damaged, and need repair.”

Cal shook his head, his voice grim as he related what he’d learned during the battle. “There is no retreat. That backblast we felt... the green glow spreading over the plane... Somehow, Graz’zt has sealed all of Occipitus with a dimensional lock. The demons cannot teleport either, it would seem, which is some help, but neither will any of our summoning spells function.”

“Then we will take the fight to him. We will be triumphant,” Umbar said.

“Well, for now, we should find some place less exposed,” Cal suggested. “Perhaps the cathedral... if the demons haven’t overrun it, we may find aid there.”

They started reaching for healing potions and wands, knowing that this was just the beginning.

“I’m starting to think coming here was a bad idea,” Dannel said.

Chapter 549

INTERLUDE

Graz’zt, Prince of Demons, sagged and nearly fell as his feet touched upon the hard ground of his new sanctum. Above, the iron roof of his citadel slid ponderously shut, closing out the troubled sky of Occipitus above.

The chamber had changed dramatically in a short time. The pillar of flame was still there, its roiling surge a confused mixture of red and gold, reflecting the tangled war that was still being raged over the very identity of the plane. But the rest of the chamber had been altered, with tall pillars of black metal ringing the perimeter of the place, buttressing the massive iron plates that now reinforced the domed ceiling above. Spikes jutted from the walls at regular intervals, flanking crude iron carvings of varied and creative foulness. It was a reflection of the Great Hall in the Argent Palace in Zelatar; imperfect, but still imposing.

Graz’zt saw only the imperfections, and it sent new tendrils of anger through his veins. His eyesight was diminished; the Heart of Axion was dull in his socket. A high price had been demanded, and paid. He was committed; he had submitted his final gambit, and now all would rise or fall upon its fate.

A faint scuff of a boot upon the stone drew his attention. Warily, he turned to see Athux standing before him.

“Congratulations, father.”

Graz’zt snarled, and summoned his power. He was depleted, more so than even in the aftermath of the Disaster, but he was still what he was. But Athux was prepared. Black energy shimmered briefly around him, his Rod absorbing most of the potency of the attack. The scion of the Abyss gestured, and black chains shot out from the perimeter of the room, lashing into the arms, legs, and body of the Prince. A violent surge of energy exploded from Graz’zt, but the chains held, the spines interwoven with the links digging painfully into his flesh as they held him.

“You are a fool, if you think that even the Chains of Ur’don will hold me,” the Prince hissed. “You will spend an eternity in suffering for this treachery.”

Athux did not respond to the goad. His lips moved as he finished an incantation that he’d spent centuries acquiring and perfecting, in anticipation of this moment. His Rod, a potent artifact in its own right, was consumed and turned to ash, as was his amulet, cloak, and boots. Their power was sucked into the spell, as was a considerable portion of the young lord’s own energies. It was his masterstroke, and as Graz’zt recognized the flows of energy that were beginning to coalesce around him, fear shone briefly in his one remaining eye.

But as the enhanced binding began to take effect, Graz’zt did not beg for forbearance, or offer bribes or threats. Instead, he laughed. This was the way of his kind, and he knew all too well the rules that governed the lives of demons. He had failed to anticipate this betrayal, and now he might pay the price.

That did not mean he would give up easily. Surges of energy erupted around the Prince, as he fought off the thickening web of power that surrounded him. The black metal chains holding him began to melt, their substance falling to the ground in thick gobs, mixed with his blood. But they weren’t really needed, not now. Athux began to sweat, his face tightening as the strain of exerting the full power of his Will began to show. He held nothing back, nor did his sire.

Finally, however, the Prince screamed, and crumpled. Athux let out a strangled hiss that was somehow more exultant than a cry of triumph, as he directed the flows into the final stage of the ritual. All that he had waited for... it was now his.

But in that moment of victory, pain exploded in his back. The one who would succeed Graz’zt fell forward. He spun to see Malad standing behind him, the white-hot fury of a thunderlance glowing in his hand.

“What treachery is this, brother!” the cambion snarled, hurling an explosive sonic evocation at Athux.

The blast rippled around Athux, who was warded against magic much greater than this. The spell would have left strong demons writhing in pain, but the son of Graz'zt merely laughed. The half-fiend sorcerer started forward, lifting his weapon to strike, but Athux marshaled his Will upon the other, and Malad staggered, his spell fading into nothing. He resisted, but it took all of a second before he succumbed, collapsing to his knees.

That threat defused, Athux turned around, only to feel an explosion tear through his mind.

Nice... try...

He screamed, trying unsuccessfully to hold onto the sundering fragments of his consciousness. The last thing he heard was the blistering laughter of his sire, and the last thing he saw was a tiny sparkle of light through the haze of red agony that filled his senses. Realization entered him, and followed him into oblivion.

Chapter 550

The adventurers did not linger long over the gory battlefield. Once they had healed themselves, and wiped as much gore as they could from their armor, weapons, and skin, they unpacked their flying carpet from Lok's bag of holding and laid it flat upon the ground, clambering aboard. Umbar, who had never before seen an item of this sort, had to be reassured by Arun that it was more durable than it appeared, and thus settled they set out across the plain. Cal took the carpet up to an altitude of about a hundred feet briefly, just long enough to verify their location vis-à-vis a few landmarks remembered from their last visit. Much of the plane's features bore a depressing similarity, but Cal was confident enough to chart a course toward the celestial cathedral. They agreed that it was probably wiser to travel around the perimeter of Occipitus, rather than risk a more direct route that took them closer to the skull. They still did not understand fully what had been wrought in that moment of surging power, but even from here they could see that the monument had been... changed.

Cal quickly brought the carpet back down to just a few paces above the ground, and they started out at a fast walking pace across the landscape. More than a few heads turned to regard the battlefield they left behind, each wondering if the next one would include their ravaged bodies as well.

Mole had done an "informal" count—"Hard to keep an accurate track when you keep blasting them into dust, Uncle Cal!"—and had recorded fifty-eight babaus, fourteen barguras, four hezrous, twenty-five vrocks, and the nalfeshnee Cal had disintegrated.

One hundred and seven demons. It had been an impressive tally, especially given the potent abilities commanded by the various demons in the horde. They had come close—damned close—to disaster, with only quick reactions saving Dannel, Beorna, and Umbar from being torn apart. For his measure Cal offered a quick prayer of thanks to Tymora, knowing that his string of successful disintegrations was running up against the odds, and would not likely continue as more powerful demons threatened them.

But they had not escaped unscathed. Not only had they heavily depleted their spells, but their gear had taken a beating, particularly from the caustic secretions issued by the babaus. Umbar's hammer and Beorna's bastard sword were heavily damaged, unusable until repaired, and Lok's various weapons likewise had taken some harm. Arun had used the powers granted by the Soul Forger to restore his own hammer to full utility, and promised to repair the other damaged weapons as soon as he could, but he could only draw upon that power once per day. Their armor all needed a few tendays in a well-equipped smithy, but the likelihood of that happening any time soon seemed quite remote.

So they pressed on. The carpet, heavily laden with the seven of them, traveled slowly, but it set a steady pace that they could not have kept up on foot. Mole distributed food and water from her bag of holding, and they refreshed themselves as they traveled, keeping a wary lookout in every direction.

They continued for several hours, taking shifts watching while others rested as best they could. The carpet's ride was steady and stable, but worry about their situation made sleep almost impossible. At least for most of them; once it became clear that the landscape only offered a constant vista as they progressed further, Mole curled up on a corner of the rug and instantly fell asleep.

None of them expected that the respite would last long. Thus when Dannel lifted a hand to shade his eyes, peering into the distance, none of them were surprised when he said, "Oh, crap."

As the dwarves reached for their weapons, Cal looked up from the small book bound in blue leather he'd been perusing in his lap. "Could you be more specific?"

"See for yourself," Dannel said, stringing his bow and pointing with one end of it toward the sky in the distance, in the direction of the skull. There they could just make out a cluster of specks flying just under the Occipitus ceiling.

Heading straight for them.

"Demons?" Beorna asked, settling her helmet upon her head, holding the axe she'd borrowed from Arun in the other.

There was a pause as they watched Dannel watching the approaching specks. "Yeah," he finally said.

"There's another group," Mole said, pointing ahead and slightly left of their current course. They turned to see a second approaching flight, partially hidden against the backdrop of the jagged horizon of Occipitus's ring of cliffs, but definitely coming closer as well.

"Here we go again," Dannel said.

Chapter 551

"Let's start buffing up," Beorna said.

“Hold on a bit,” Cal suggested. “Distances are difficult to gauge here, but they’ll be a few minutes, at least. If they could teleport, they’d already be here, they wouldn’t give us time to prepare.”

The gnome gestured and spoke a command word, and the carpet slowed and started descending toward the ground. They were only a few paces up to begin with, so it would not take them long to reach solid footing.

“Wait,” Arun said. “Perhaps we should meet them aloft.”

“They are more adept than we in the air,” Cal said. “And as you have seen, the flight power granted by my wand is easy to dispel.”

“But the terrain here gives little advantage,” Umbar said. “And a stationary defense opens us to those explosive blasts, from the vrock dances.”

“Dannel, can you identify the types yet?” Arun asked.

The elf had been keeping a close eye on both approaching groups. “The ones coming from the spire look like vocks,” he said. “The others... I’m not certain yet. They almost look like giant bugs, if I had to guess.”

“Chasme demons, probably,” Cal explained.

“Can either type dispel magic?” Umbar asked him.

“The vocks, no. Chasmes... I do not know for certain, but I don’t believe so. We’ve only faced their ilk once before, in Skullrot. But their buzzing is a potent soporific. It can be resisted, but with so many of them, it is likely that at least a few of us will be affected.”

Mole shuddered, thinking back to an experience in the Carcerian prison.

“Maybe we can find some cover back in the cliffs,” Beorna said, pointing to the wall they’d been following for the last few hours. “A cleft, or a cave or something.”

“I don’t think we have time,” Dannel said. “They’re coming on fast... a few minutes, at most.”

“We need to make a decision,” Cal said.

Umbar looked at Arun, who nodded. “Then we use the carpet as a mobile platform,” the cleric said. “The archmage and elf, with the templar as close-defense. The genasi, Chosen, and myself, empowered with flight, fly a close formation against the enemies, staying within close range of the carpet... or vice versa. If the vulture-demons begin a dance, we draw off. If anyone is overcome by a stunning effect, then the others rally to his or her aid.”

“Hey, what about me?” Mole asked. “Sheesh, they always forget the gnomes,” she added, as an aside to her uncle. “You know, I’ve taken out my share of bad guys,” she went on, to Umbar.

“Invisible, you can linger next to one of the warriors, and deliver sneak attacks when least expected,” the cleric said.

“All right,” Cal said. “It’s a workable plan. We’ll stay close to the ground in any case, but if someone goes down, then everyone has to converge on that location, vrock dances notwithstanding. And watch out for flanking attacks; you’ll be vulnerable from all sides. Remember flying opens up the third dimension.”

“Sheesh, you sure do worry a lot,” Mole said. “Hey, how about a greater invisibility?”

“Looks like they’re pretty eager to get to us,” Dannel said. As they watched, the formation of vocks shifted course to block the avenue of approach of the second flotilla of insect-demons. Faint screeches reached their ears, followed by the bugs spreading out into two wedges that spread out to bypass the vocks. The vocks had the advantage of position, but the chasmes were slightly faster. Now that they were closer they could see that there were about two dozen demons in the first group, and about that or maybe slightly fewer in the second.

“What in the hells are they doing?” Beorna said.

“They’re demons,” Cal said. “Don’t assume they’re working together. They’re probably taking a first-come, first-served approach.”

“With us as the entrée,” Arun said, lifting his hammer.

The spellcasters began making their preparations, as the demons approached swiftly, and began their dive.

Chapter 552

Cal, holding two wands in his left hand, started rapid-firing buff spells onto his companions. With the entire plane locked to summonings and his shadow-spells, the gnome knew that his best contribution to the battle would be in the form of magical enhancements. As the others watched the demons spread out into an attack formation—or rather two, as the vocks and chasmes were definitely not working in concert—the gnome cast fly on each of them with his wand, followed by magic circles against evil from the second wand upon Arun, Umbar, Lok, and Beorna. He followed that up with a cat’s grace upon Beorna.

Beorna used an align weapon spell upon the arrows in Dannel’s quiver; her own borrowed axe got a bless weapon. She then infused herself with divine favor. Umbar did the same, and put a few ability enhancements upon himself and the other companions, including an owl’s wisdom on Dannel.

“Shoot straight, elf,” he said.

As the demons closed to a few hundred feet Dannel started opening fire. The carpet was not the most stable firing platform, and it was moving to boot, but the elf easily adjusted, targeting the left wedge of chasme demons. His first shot hit, striking a chasme solidly in the torso.

“Cal?” Arun said, tightening his grip on his hammer.

“Go!” he said, casting a haste that empowered all of them. He didn’t stop there, and as the paladin, Umbar, and Lok all lifted up off the carpet, forming a defensive wedge, he was already continuing with his second round of buffs, casting displacement on Dannel, and then shrouding him with greater invisibility. Normally such layered wards would be superfluous, but Cal suspected that the chasmes, at least, could see invisibility. And keeping Dannel active would be key to surviving this battle, he thought.

“C’mon uncle, I need that greater invis you promised...” Mole said, as Cal surrounded himself with mirror images. He’d elected to stay visible, for this battle, because with his spells either cast or unusable, he’d be more effective as a target and distractor. He slid his buffing wands into the case at his hip, drawing another out with a smooth motion. He had almost a dozen of the magical devices in his inventory, but the magical case provided the one he wanted each time with a simple command; in this case his wand of enervation.

“I’ll get to you in a moment, Mole,” he said, launching into another spell. What he didn’t tell her was that he feared that she would not be able to resist the buzz of the chasmes, and would be easily carried off by the foul demons.

The two wings of chasmes had slid around the vocks, ignoring their angry shrieks as they buzzed down toward the companions. Arun, Umbar, and Lok rose to meet them, hoping to keep them far enough away so that their buzzing would not impact those on the carpet below. At least the rivalry between the two groups of demons had aided them in one respect; none of the vocks had hesitated to call mirror images. That would probably change once the battle was joined, however.

The first chasme faltered and plummeted downward, several of Dannel’s arrows jutting from its body. Beorna had unlimbered her own heavy bow, keeping her axe close beside her, but her own shots were largely ineffective against the demons’ damage resistance. But six chasmes from the second wing detached and shot around the defensive wedge of warriors, clearly coming for those on the carpet. The first was hit by an arrow that nearly exploded through its body, a critical hit that dropped the foul demon like a rock to splatter on the ground below. The elf’s barrage continued and a second likewise fell out of formation, its wings still fluttering as its claws tore at the two shafts jutting from its face.

Cal directed the carpet into a wide turn that would keep them fairly close to the defending warriors above, firing off an enervation that lanced into one of the chasmes, draining some of its life-energy.

“Uncle Cal!” Mole urged, all but hopping as she casually fired off a bolt from her little crossbow that had no effect.

The three flying companions felt a soft wave of tiredness wash over them as the chasmes dove at them. But their wills, bolstered by their own dedication and Cal's magic circles, let them fight off the deadly lull of the chasmes' buzzing. The three formed a tight formation, protecting their flanks and letting the demons come to them. The demons tried to break that defensive knot with sheer force, several of them bashing their fat bodies into the smaller dwarves, but each time they were rebuffed by shields or raised weapons. Their drones became screeches of frustration and pain as the companions' weapons lashed out in a violent counter, and the fly-demons fell in clumps to the ground below.

Seven went down in that initial flurry.

"Fine, I'll use my own ring then!" Mole said, impatient at the delay that was keeping her from joining the battle. But before she could use her ring of invisibility, the chasmes came close enough for the power of their drone to impact those upon the carpet. "I'll show those... bas..." Mole managed, before she slumped unconscious to the fabric.

Cal finally made her invisible then, sliding her into the center of the carpet, right next to where he was standing. He himself resisted the droning, along with Beorna and Dannel with his augmented willpower.

The four demons dove eagerly at the companions, their vicious claws outstretched. They must have empowered themselves to see invisible objects, or maybe they'd pinpointed where the arrows killing them had come from; either way, they made a beeline for Dannel. Beorna intercepted the first with a powerful blow from her axe that clove deeply into its body, knocking it aside from its target. A second tore through empty space, fooled by Cal's displacement. The third did manage to get through the elf's defenses, digging an ugly gash across his temple with its claw, but as its momentum carried it past it took a blast from Cal's wand of enervation, draining it. The fourth demon never got close enough to attack, as Dannel unleashed a full barrage of arrows into it at point-blank range.

Lok, Arun, and Umbar continued shredding the chasmes that dared to press their attack. More were unleashing spell-effects now, hitting the defenders with circles of nausea and waves of grief. Arun's hammer shone with golden light, however, and again most of the fell magic of the demons dissipated against that radiance. The dark energies that did get through failed to overcome the grim determination of the three warriors. The surviving demons fell back, overcome by the ferocity of the defense. But the vrockes were right behind them, and now they descended upon the distracted warriors with terrible effect. Far stronger than the chasmes, they slammed into the defenders with powerful force. Several unleashed powerful screeches, and while Arun and Lok were able to resist their potency, Umbar was momentarily overcome. A moment later a vrock caromed into him like a falling boulder, knocking him out of his place in their formation, demon and cleric intertwined as they descended rapidly toward the ground below. But Lok and Arun had their own problems, as eight vrockes swarmed over them from forward, above, and below, tearing and slashing with their long talons.

Above, two small groups of vrockes had already begun the intertwined pattern of their dance of ruin.

Caught up in the intensity of the battle, neither side noticed the shadowy forms that appeared in the air high overhead in the distance, approaching swiftly from the direction from which the chasmes had appeared earlier.

Chapter 553

Caught up in his song, firing aligned arrows from a bow empowered to slay fiends, Dannel created a storm of death around the magic carpet.

The two chasmes that had assailed him quickly recovered and dove at him again, hoping to take advantage of the momentary distraction offered by their fallen comrade, and by the one that Beorna was still fighting at the front of the carpet. But Dannel spun suddenly, an arrow seeming to jump into his string as he drew and fired. The first chasme, already weakened by Cal's enervation, took an arrow right through its left eye socket and fell. The second attacked, but by the time it realized it had again been misled by the elf's displacement, long shafts were already piercing its body, one even passing through it to continue its flight off across the plain.

"Above!" Cal warned, bending to slap Mole's cheeks, hoping to rouse his niece in time to deal with the next threat. The companions looked up to see Arun and Lok surrounded by a veritable explosion of wings and claws, the two warriors almost invisible within the nest of swarming vrock. Umbar was falling, a vrock grappling with the cleric. Above they could see at least two formations of dancing vrock, and that still left another half-dozen, several of which were already coming around toward their position. At least two, he saw, had now taken the time to call upon their mirror images, which suggested they'd taken at least a clue from the decimation of their rivals at the hands of the companions. "Incoming!" the gnome added, in case the others hadn't all seen the threat. As Mole groaned, coming around, he shot off an enervation, but his streak ended as the beam disintegrated against a vrock's spell resistance.

Lok and Arun came together, back to back, and fought off the vrock horde. They were truly surrounded, but if they cared, they did not show it. They fought together like warriors who had campaigned at each others' sides for years on end, covering their flanks, and turning in unison to unleash truly awesome blows into the attacking demons. Arun's hammer slammed into the face and torso of a vrock, each blow crushing demonic bones, until the fierce thing had become a mangled ruin. Even as it fell back, Lok disembowled a second vrock, tearing its body open with a pair of violent swings of his axe. The few surviving chasmes chattered angrily around the perimeter of the melee, denied their victims by the vrock, but there might have been the smallest hint of relief in those cries, given how quickly their kin had been savaged by this pair.

Umbar recovered from being stunned to find a flapping vrock in his face, driving him rapidly downward. The cleric concentrated momentarily upon his fly spell, slowing his descent greatly. He brought his hammer up, but the vrock seized it, holding it in its claws, while its sharp beak snapped at his helm, splatting his face with foul-smelling spittle. The thing was phenomenally strong.

But Umbar Ironhammer was a consecrated priest of Moradin, and as such he could call upon the power of the forge to crush his enemies. “Burn in the righteous fire of the All Father!” he shouted, slamming his gauntlet into the demon’s chest, unleashing an inflict critical wounds into it. The demon shrieked and released the dwarf’s hammer—a mistake, as it turned out, as the cleric drove the axiomatic weapon into the back of its neck, snapping its spine.

Thus far the battle had been heavily one-sided; only Dannel had been seriously injured, and the gash on his forehead from the chasme’s claw, although it continued to ooze blood, wasn’t immediately life-threatening. But as the demons brought their numbers to bear, the situation quickly evolved.

Lok and Arun came under heavy attack, both from the claws of the vrocks, and from a cloud of spores that found the gaps in their armor and begun digging into their bodies. One of them grappled with Arun, immobilizing his weapon arm with a solid grip, while the one opposite grabbed onto his body, driving its claws through the layered plating covering his gut into the muscled flesh beneath. Lok likewise took several telling hits, although he avoided being grabbed.

The defenders upon the carpet likewise found themselves suddenly beset. Having dispatched the last chasme, Dannel lifted his bow to target the diving vrocks. But before he could release his arrow, a stunning screech from one of the vrocks staggered him, and he fell, dropping his bow. Cal, likewise, reeled. Beorna hacked at one of the vrocks, but managed only a glancing blow as all six of the demons landed on the carpet, their weight driving it quickly down to the ground below.

Meanwhile, less than a hundred feet above, the demons continued their dances of ruin. Sparks of energy began to flare around the twisting circles, rising now to a building crescendo.

Arun had briefly caught a glimpse of the vrocks driving the flying carpet down to the ground. “We’ve got to take out those dancers!” he said, grunting as a vrock claw caught him squarely in the middle of his face. Were it not for his helm, the blow would have taken both of his eyes.

The paladin tore free from the demon holding his arm, and launched upward, the energy of Cal’s spell carrying him upward. As he passed out of the ring of vrocks he took several attacks of opportunity, but shrugged off the painful claws that snagged momentarily on his limbs. Lok was already ahead of him, and behind them came the vrocks, eager to finish off their foes. Again the two cooperated in concert, splitting in unspoken agreement as Lok shot toward the rightmost cluster of dancing demons, while Arun rose toward the ones on the left.

But breaking free of the grapple had taken a few precious seconds, and as Arun ascended slowly toward the gyrating circle of demons, he sensed that he would not be in time.

Chapter 554

Dannel felt a blaze of pain in his gut as a vrock stumbled over him, the demon nearly falling before a flap of its wings recovered its equilibrium. Quickly sensing that it had an invisible foe nearby, it lunged at him with its claws. Dannel tried to roll away, out of its grasp, but a claw snagged on his cloak, and the demon eagerly seized upon it.

A few feet away, Beorna and Cal were coming under heavy attack. The templar swept a powerful blow toward one, but managed to hit only mirror images. Cal fired a blast from his wand at another, but once again the attack was foiled by spell resistance. The demons, on the other hand, proved quite effective in their assault, with Cal's foe getting lucky, scoring a hit through the gnome's own shifting nimbus of images. Only his quick leap back saved him from being grappled and borne down. Beorna drew more attention, with several vocks leaping at her, trying to flank her. Vrock spores filled the air, and the companions soon had to struggle with the agonizing pain of the burrowing tendrils.

Dannel tried to shake out of his cloak, as the demon quickly dug his claws up its length, trying to find its owner's head. The demon let out a triumphant cackle as a claw brushed his cap, but then it let out a screech of pain and staggered, allowing him to pull free. Dannel rolled off the carpet, grabbing his bow as he went. Another vrock heard his movements and leapt at him, but it misjudged his position, and its attack caught only empty air. The arcane archer called upon his song, and as it filled him and his bow he made the demon pay for its error.

The one that had grabbed Dannel did not follow; it had its hands full with Mole. Shrouded by her uncle's greater invisibility, she could spring in and out to unleash sneak attacks upon it with impunity, easily avoiding its attempts to grab her. Frustrated, the demon lifted itself six paces into the air, and summoned mirror images to defend itself. That was fine with Mole, who shot the one threatening Dannel with a bolt that found a nasty spot in its backside. The vrock barely had time to screech in protest before the elf finished it with a final arrow to the chest.

As Umbar took down his foe, hovering a mere two paces above the ground, he started almost at once flying back up to rejoin Lok and Arun in the melee. But he saw the vocks force his allies down upon the carpet, only about forty feet from his current position. His first instinct was to preserve the Chosen, but almost at once he felt the hard grip of Duty settle upon him. He started toward that melee, but had barely covered half the distance when a pair of chasmes, survivors from the earlier melee, descended upon him, forcing him to defend himself. Both hit him with spell-powers, and one did manage to finally shear him of his temporary ability of flight with a targeted dispel, dropping him to the ground ten feet below. The other weakened him with a ray of enfeeblement, but the cleric stood his ground, blasting the nearer of the pair with a beam of searing light that penetrated its spell resistance and scorched its ugly hide.

High above the battlefield, Lok slammed into one of the vrock dances. Knowing that he could not likely kill one in a single blow, his tactic instead was to bull rush one of the demons, slamming it with his shield and taking it bodily out of the circle. His effort was successful, in that it broke up the demonic ritual. Unfortunately, however, the three demons immediately leapt upon him, joining the three coming up from below to surround him in a surge of violence.

As Arun looked up at his own target, he caught sight now of the shadowy figures in the air above, pale white streaks like clouds coming forward at great speed. As he wondered what new threat this might portend, the insubstantial aura around the figures parted, and they resolved into a quartet of newcomers. The one in the center drew the paladin's gaze; a glorious figure of a man, clad in a white breastplate, with white wings spreading from his shoulders in lieu of arms. The others, he saw, included a pair of winged elves carrying longbows, and a mechanical half-man, half-horse creation that he recognized as a zelekhut, an inevitable.

The newcomers appeared to recognize the greatest danger at once, directing an immediate assault upon the vrock engaged in their dance of ruin. The sword archon hit them with the reverberating energies of an order's wrath. The vrock shrieked, blasted by the lawful potency of the spell, but they resisted the dazing side-effects of the wrath, and did not halt their ritual. But the arrows of the two winged elves succeeded where their comrade's word of power had failed, as white-fledged holy missiles transformed one of the dancing vrock into a pincushion, scoring five hits, including a critical hit that pierced its throat, putting an end to its chant and its life.

Arun's pursuers and the surviving two demons from the dance let out a terrible cacophony, and shot up toward the celestials, ignoring the paladin in the face of their hatred of their traditional foes. Arun smashed one with his hammer as it passed, but it ignored him, flying like an arrow toward the archon. The majority of Lok's foes likewise disengaged and turned toward these new enemies, leaving only a pair that continued to press their attack against the genasi.

The zelekhut released spiked chains from its wrists as it descended to block the vrock's charge at the sword archon. The inevitable tried to hold a vrock, unsuccessfully. The demons looked like they would just try to slip past it, but when it lashed one of its chains around the neck of a vrock, the demon fell upon the construct, its claws tearing deep gouges in its metallic hide.

Upon the ground below the arial battle, the companions continued to find themselves pressed hard by the surviving demons. Beorna wielded Arun's adamantine axe, blessed with Helm's power, as if she'd borne the weapon her entire life. Each blow tore deep into demonic flesh, and as one went down hard in a thrashing heap, her backswing caught another solidly in the side, sundering a rib. That seemed to drive the demon into an even greater fury, and as it lunged at her, a third flew down almost atop her back, trying to tear her helmet off her head.

Cal, meanwhile, was assailed by his enemy, which chased after him, tearing at his mirror images. Each hit upon a false gnome caused the image to disappear. Cal shot it with a ray of exhaustion from another wand, but again the device failed against the vrock's resistance. The demon slashed through a pair of images before it pounced upon one of only two remaining instances of the archmage. Cackling as its claws dug into solid matter, it tried to snap up the gnome in its arched beak.

Cal, finding himself in a sticky situation, didn't stop to think. Instinct took over, and magic flowed through him. Intellectually, he knew that his maze spell could not function within the dimensional lock, as it relied upon an extradimensional portal. But as the power flowed through him he... tweaked it, channeling the flow into a different outlet.

Silver fire erupted from his hands, pouring over the vrock. The demon, more than a little surprised, dropped Cal as the arcane fire savaged it. Its resistances were of no avail as the flow of liquid energy tore into its body. It wasn't enough to kill it, but it gave the gnome a moment to react, which he used to dart out of its reach.

The demon recovered quickly, and beat its wings furiously as it leapt after the gnome. Cal didn't retreat this time. Again he called upon the power of his magic, this time deliberately directing his greater shadow evocation into another blast of arcane fire. This time the demon's head was engulfed in the flame, and although it was able to lash out at Cal, striking him a glancing blow to the head with a claw, the demon's time had come to an end. Cal recognized it, too.

"Time's up, pal," he said, a moment before the first arrow slammed hard into its back.

The sword archon held its ground against the vrock charge, calling down a flame strike that swept through a dense knot of the vulture demons. Two that were already injured plummeted to the ground below, charred and blackened by the holy evocation. But the others eagerly swarmed upon the celestial, tearing at his arms and wings with their claws. Another went down, pierced by arrows from the elven bowmen. The archon maintained a look of calm even as the demons tore deep gashes in his limbs. He looked helpless before them, but then something flared in his eyes, and a white glow formed in front of him; a plane of wispy energy that took on the shape of a sword. The archon swept this insubstantial weapon before him, and where it intersected with a demon, corrupt flesh was torn asunder.

Demons died, but this only drove the remaining ones into a fury, intent upon taking at least this celestial with them.

But then Arun reached the melee, and put an end to those hopes.

Even as the battle began to wind down, the demons did not attempt flight or retreat. The two winged elves joined with Dannel in putting down the stragglers with precise shots, knocking down the last vrocks fighting Lok and Beorna, and the chasmes that menaced Umbar. The only casualty was the zelekhut, which they found entangled with the vrock that had killed it, bloody gears strewn around the spot where the two combatants had hit the ground.

The surviving celestials lowered themselves to the ground slowly, along with Arun and Lok, joining the others near the grounded flying carpet. The sword archon brushed Arun with his wings, healing him of his injuries. Cal and Beorna were already tending likewise to the others.

"We're glad to see you guys," Mole offered, as the archon, his limbs still trailing blood, landed and walked up to them.

“Yeah, we were starting to think that demons were all that were left here,” Dannel said.

“Saureya sends his respects,” the archon said. “I am the Herald’s Voice. These are Abrigen and Callendes, of the avariel,” he added, indicating his two companions. The two winged elves inclined their heads slightly in greeting, but they did not shift their wary gazes from the surrounding landscape. They resembled sun elves from Faerûn, but one look at them was enough to indicate the celestial influences in their heritage.

“What is the situation?” Arun asked.

“Graz’zt has launched an all-out invasion of Occipitus,” the Voice reported. “The initial wave came via five temporary gates through which approximately four hundred demons, most capable of teleport, came through. We were able to neutralize two of the gates almost immediately, but the demons were surprisingly coordinated, and were able to quickly annihilate the majority of our patrols. Realizing that the attack was a prelude to a full invasion, Saureya ordered all forces to fall back to the Bastion, where we have established a final line of defense.”

“The Bastion?” Dannel asked. “I don’t remember that from our last visit.”

“A few things have... changed. The Bastion of Helm was created through the will of the Herald.”

“The Herald... do you mean Morgan?”

“That is the name by which you knew him,” the celestial acknowledged.

“I think that there is a lot going on here that we do not fully understand,” Cal said. “I think we need to...”

“Incoming demons,” one of the avariel said, interrupting the gnome. All eyes turned to mirror the winged elf’s gaze. Their eyesight did not match the acuity of the avariel, but they could see the long black line, writhing slightly, upon the horizon roughly in the direction of the central spire.

“We do not have time,” Arun said. “Can you get us back to the Bastion?”

“There is a demonic army between us and it, in the canyon,” the Voice said calmly. “But their arial superiority has been heavily diminished, and while additional forces are marshalling at the Skull, we may be able to slip through. Abrigen, wind walk back to the Bastion, and inform Saureya that we will be coming through.” The avariel nodded, and began shifting back to the insubstantial form they had worn when first arriving upon the scene.

“I regret that I do not have another spell prepared to transport you, but Callendes and I will escort you upon your conveyance.”

“How many demons are we talking about altogether?” Umbar asked, as the companions gathered back upon the carpet. Beorna and Arun did their best to get as much of the demon corpses off it as they could, but it was clear that the device was going to need a thorough cleaning once they were through here.

“Our reconnaissance is hindered by the lock that has been laid upon the plane,” the Voice said. “Neither we celestials nor the demons can teleport at will. In essence, we have been reduced to a conventional army, to a campaign the likes of which you mortals may be familiar.”

“Best guess,” Umbar persisted.

“It would appear that the Shadow Lord has committed the majority of his remaining forces to this action. Approximately fifty thousand demons.”

For a long moment, there was only silence.

Chapter 555

They ascended upon their magical carpet high into the air above Occipitus, hundreds of feet, until the vaulted sky seemed to press down upon them like the interior of an actual dome. With the plasms gone the hazards of high flight upon the plane had been obviated somewhat, but even so it felt strange ascending so close to the golden firmament that lingered low over the outstretched expanse of the plane. Mole kept reaching up with her hand as they rose, as if the sky were something that she could touch with her fingers. Maybe it was; as the disjuncting effect grew more pronounced Cal leveled off the carpet, and they continued on their course, adjusted now to take them toward the cliffs that ringed Occipitus. Even as high up as they were, those black walls still seemed impermeable, a dense barrier keeping them penned in upon the broad bowl of the plane.

Callendes and the Herald's Voice flanked them, easily keeping pace with the moderate crawl of the carpet. Without their guidance, they might have easily missed the canyon, even had they known it was there. The cleft in the rocks was narrow and twisted quickly as it entered the mountains, the dark opening blending almost perfectly with the surrounding cliffs. Once they had changed course to enter the tunnel the high, jagged peaks rapidly closed in around them, and soon Occipitus was lost behind them, save for the vague image of the mighty skull-fortress that remained visible through gaps in the mountaintops, indistinct in the haze of distance and chaos that continued to swirl around Graz'zt's seat upon the plane.

The ground below them was as blasted and empty as the rest of the plane, but as they penetrated deeper into the canyon they could hear a faint noise upon the still air. Initially a soft buzz, it rapidly became more distinct, a roar of many voices, infused with dread and the promise of violence. Even had they not been forewarned of what they would find, each of them would have known those sounds to be the cries of demons. Ahead, they could see that the canyon appeared to widen as it passed around another sharp bend.

“We must not hesitate,” the sword archon said. “Stay your weapons, and follow us swiftly to the Bastion.”

“We’d better prepare,” Dannel said. “The celestials might be right in the demons not having many fliers at the moment, but it’ll only take one reaching us to knock a few folks free. And it’s a long, long way down.”

“Wise words,” Umbar rumbled. “Best empower us with flight, gnome, just in case.”

“The wand is nearly out of power,” Cal said. “If I use it on us now, that will be it for flying for us for this trip.”

“And we could be here a while,” Dannel said.

“What about spell powers?” Beorna asked.

“We should be out of range,” Cal said, but then he frowned. “Telekinesis... that can reach out to five hundred feet or more, depending on the potency of the caster.”

“We’re not quite that far up,” Mole said, leaning precariously out over the edge of the carpet; Arun started to reach for her, but then shrugged and sat back on his haunches, adjusting his swordbelt to avoid poking the tip through the carpet. The movement caused the carpet to undulate slightly. Lok grimaced slightly, sitting on the middle of the carpet with his hands wrapped tightly around the haft of his axe. The genasi did not have a fondness for high places.

“If they can knock over the carpet, you’ll wish we had the flight power,” Umbar persisted.

“Very well,” Cal said, drawing out the wand and touching it to each of them in turn. He saved himself for last, but before he could activate it, he frowned. “It is as I feared; the power of the device is depleted.”

“If something happens, I’ll see that you do not fall, uncle,” Mole said.

“Look...” Dannel said, drawing their attention back ahead, where the canyon opened out ahead of them, as they drew around the final bend.

They knew that they were looking upon just a fraction of Graz’zt’s forces, but even so, the sight was an impressive one. The canyon widened and extended more or less straight for about a quarter mile ahead of them, with a few hundred feet separating the vertical lines of jagged black stone to either side. In that intervening space, was crowded a host of demons of all shapes and sizes. At least several thousand of them, jammed together in a tangle that grew denser the further down the canyon one looked. From their high vantage, the demonic force looked like a carpet of swarming insects, crawling over the landscape like a plague.

And at the end of the canyon, they could see what could only be the Bastion.

A wall of pale stone, almost white against the sharp contrast of the surrounding black cliffs, crossed the end of the canyon. Even from this distance, it was obviously a massive fortification, rising at least a hundred feet above the canyon floor. It bowed slightly, curved like a dam laid across the flow of a river; except in this case, the wild surge was without rather than within, as the demons threw themselves against the defenses. They could see demons, tiny specks at this range, crawling upon it; occasionally one would lose its grip and plummet back into the swarming mass below. It was loud, the cacophony of the gathered demons building against the flanking cliffs until it reached them as a wave of rage and hatred.

A mountain loomed up behind the shield wall, with a massive overhang of black stone jutting out until it almost touched the summit of the wall, looming over the citadel like a knight's shield. The gap between the wall and the overhang was dark, save for in the center, where a bright golden radiance shone from seemingly within the depths of the mountain itself.

"The Bastion," the Voice said, staring at that bright glow, his calm words dismissing the fearsome, terrible hordes beneath them.

"There's no way we're going to get across that unnoticed," Dannel pointed out. He already had a long shaft fitted to his bow, but knew better than to waste his arrows on this massive array of foes.

"I will do my best to obscure us from their view," Cal said. "I will need to concentrate upon this for a time." The gnome sat at the front of the carpet. "Hold on, everyone," he said. "We're going in."

Chapter 556

High above the canyon on their magical carpet, the companions started across the long open space that separated them from the relative shelter of the Bastion. Between them and their goal, spread across the canyon floor, was gathered a horde of hundreds of demons of almost every conceivable variety.

Below, they could hear a subtle change in the roar of the demonic host that started on their side of the canyon and quickly spread. Mole confirmed their suspicion, as she looked down again over the edge of the carpet. "Company, guys." A number of hulking, distorted figures rose up out of the press on broad wings, a good dozen of them at least, similar in form but each subtly distinct, colored in sickly olives, ash grays, and burned reds. Some were decorated with horns, others with ridges of spines or stakes, yet others with humps or tails or even a second set of arms jutting from its torso. All were at least partially misshapen, with discongruent symmetries that made their appearance even more jarring than the ferocious horde of demons that surrounded them.

"Hordelings," Callendes explained, as he fitted an arrow to his white longbow, his wings flapping powerfully as he easily kept pace with the slow-moving carpet. "Be wary... they are unpredictable."

The noise from below intensified, but as they watched the flying fiends rise up slowly toward them a dark black mist began to take shape between them and the canyon below. The cloud roiled chaotically as it expanded to cover a wide swath of space nearly fifty feet on a side, an intangible barrier that sheltered them from view. Fearsome noises erupted from within that dense bank, ominous sounds of a gathering storm. Cal sat at the fore of the carpet, controlling his major image, drawing it with them as they made their way toward the shelter of the Bastion.

“More ahead!” Dannel warned. Five heads upon the carpet and two flying beside turned to where the elf pointed. A black crag jutted out from the canyon wall ahead to their right, almost of a height with the companions, and from that perch came a half-dozen flying things; fiendish gargoyles, their screeches trailing to them distinctly over the loud roar rising up from the demonic horde.

The companions were not merely waiting for their foes to converge upon them. Arrows and bolts lanced out from the carpet, striking the oncoming attackers. They could not clearly target the hordelings, who were obscured by Cal’s illusory screen, but the gargoyles felt the bite of their assault. Dannel’s first shot tore through the lead gargoyle, exploding out its back in a red haze as he scored a critical hit. The gargoyle’s momentum carried it forward a few yards, but then it dipped forward, plummeting into the gorge into a mass of demons.

Another fell sound that was all too familiar to them drew their attention to yet another threat. A few bulbous figures had risen out of niches in the cliffs on the far side of the canyon, their approach preceeded by the buzzing that lulled the senses, and threatened a deep slumber from which one might never wake. There were only three of them, but the companions knew that this did not make them any less dangerous.

“Chasmes on the left!” Mole said, loading a shock bolt into her crossbow. The gargoyles apparently lacked the immunity to electrical attacks possessed by demons, and one of the creatures already lagged, a bolt jutting from the joint where its wing met its body.

“I see them,” Dannel said, his voice a calm island within the radiance of the melody of his song. To the others, the sound was just an echo lost on the wind, but to the elf, it filled him, binding himself to his bow, and to the arrow that he fitted to the string. He was standing on a moving platform, facing an updraft from the canyon below, firing at targets a few hundred feet distant, but he may as well have been shooting at practice butts on a calm day. Filled by the song, he was one with the bow, and his first three shots all hit, the chasme faltering and finally flittering slowly down a few hundred feet before it regained control and disappeared into a crevice in the nearby cliff. Flying alongside the carpet, the half-celestial avariel added his own missiles to the barrage, and while his shots lacked Dannel’s precision accuracy at range, the second chasme soon had a holy arrow jutting from its grotesque form.

There were attacks from below, as well, as the ground-bound demons contributed however they could. A few arrows with burning heads popped up through Cal’s cloud bank, but they all shot past the companions upon the carpet. Cal continued shifting the bank around slightly, so that their enemies could not hit them merely by targeting the center of the storm. At one point a quasit popped up through the illusory cloud, but when it got a good look at the furious hail of fire coming from the defenders it quickly dipped back down out of sight.

The gargoyles approached to point blank range, shrieking as they eagerly extended their talons to attack. But at that distance, the missile fire from the companions was devastating, even through the damage resistance possessed by the creatures. Lok and Arun punched a pair of arrows into the chest of one as it swooped upon the defenders upon the carpet, their mighty bows adding considerable force to the impacts as the injured gargoyle shrieked and extended its claws toward the archers. The two reached for their melee weapons, but Beorna was there first, her adamantine axe chopping it in two.

Another pair of gargoyles surged upon the sword archon, but the celestial's semicorporeal slashing blade made quick work of both before either could lay a claw upon him. The last tried to grapple Callendes, but Umbar intercepted it, lifting off from the carpet and laying hard into it with a solid blow from his axiomatic warhammer. The gargoyle turned upon him and tore at the cleric with its claws and teeth, but the creature could not long withstand close-quarters battle against the inquisitor, and within seconds it had joined its peers in plummeting to the ground far below.

The carpet had continued its forward course with its passengers, so the brief melee had caused Umbar and the Voice to fall behind. Callendes continued to pace the carpet, although that came at the cost of volume of arrows launched from his bow.

The two surviving chasmes continued their approach. As they came within a few hundred feet, one paused to fire off an unholy blight that briefly engulfed the carpet and everyone upon it. But the companions were all fixed in their determination, and they emerged from the roiling cloud intact. The other chasme continued to close, perhaps hoping to get close enough to affect the riders with its sleep-inducing drone. But as it pulled ahead, it drew the focus of Dannel. Now that the range was closer, the elf's shots were even more telling, and the chasme took hit after hit, finally tumbling backward in an uncontrolled, spinning dive.

But even as that threat was dealt with, another presented itself. Announcing themselves with a screech that sounded like the end of days, a knot of hordelings erupted through Cal's illusory cloud, their misshapen wings pounding violently at the air as they surged upward toward the carpet from below.

Chapter 557

The hordelings almost seemed to crawl over each other as they flew up through the illusory storm, as if fighting to be the first to reach their enemies. None of them were alike, but all shared the same bestial rage, and all had a variety of deadly-looking natural weapons.

Most of them came on toward the carpet, but a few trailers spotted Umbar and the sword archon lagging behind, and instead swept eagerly in that direction. Callendes shouted a warning and spun, sending an arrow down into the face of one of the charging hordelings. The creature, which had a snub face dominated with a jaw fully three feet wide, let out a violent roar and flew straight for the half-celestial, who led the creature away from the ongoing course of the carpet.

A few of the hordelings were intelligent enough to shift their approach to intercept the carpet, while the others trailed after it in pursuit. Those three, the fastest, came up quickly from below, their jaws trailing slaver as they sought to tear their enemies' means of travel out from under them.

The foremost hordeling—a vulture-faced creature covered in olive green scales—got close enough almost to seize the fabric sheet, undulating slightly with the movements of its passengers above. But even as the fiend extended its foot-wide claws to strike, it staggered in mid-air, dropping ten feet as the beating of its wings lost their powerful rhythm. As it fell, a diminutive form could be seen on its back, clinging to the bony ridge between its wings. The fiend spun as it tried to shake its unwelcome passenger free, but Mole kept her grip with one hand, lifting her rapier to strike again with the other.

The second creature, which resembled a gray bulldog with feathered wings and four long taloned limbs, dove to take advantage of the rogue's distraction. As Mole's "steed" continued to try to shake her off, the second hordeling extended its hind claws to snap her up in its grasp in a fly-by attack. It looked like the gnome was too distracted trying to keep upon her perch to see the new threat, but at the last instant, Mole shot upward, avoiding the wild swing from the hordeling's foreclaws as it tried to adjust. The sudden movement knocked it off balance, and its momentum carried into the first creature, which let out a fierce cry of protest. The first hordeling angrily tore free of the second, knocking it away, and it surged with powerful strokes of its wings toward Mole, who was curving back up toward the carpet—which had already moved on a good twenty paces in the interim, and was continuing on its steady course, Cal's illusory storm pacing it.

The gnome moved with smooth grace through the air, but the hordeling appeared to be faster, its rage adding to its speed as its broad wings seized the air. Fat gobs of ichor continued to trail down its back from the nasty wound Mole had inflicted on it, and fell to eventually splatter upon the upturned faces of the demons below.

Mole adjusted her course slightly, broadening her curve, but did not otherwise look back at the horror that was rapidly gaining on her.

And then, abruptly, she dove, descending almost to the level of Cal's illusion. The hordeling adjusted to match her, gaining another fifteen feet on her in the process.

She shifted again, and started rising again.

The hordeling drew closer. Once again it extended its claws...

And Mole suddenly changed course again, coming almost straight toward it.

The hordeling had been waiting for another such trick, and it smashed her with a claw, cutting shallow gashes in her left side. It tried to get a grip on her, but it may as well have been trying to grapple a waterfall. The gnome slid past its claws and darted across its body before ducking under one outstretched limb, and the wing behind it. As she passed, her little knife sliced out in a quick arc. The knobby protrusion where its wing met its body was scored deeply, and the creature screamed as a tendon was severed. Its left wing suddenly stopped beating, and the creature quickly tumbled over to the left.

Right into the face of the second hordeling, which had been closing around the left side of the first, hoping to cut off the prey and catch it for itself.

For a second time the hordelings collided, and this time the two were tangled together, the first unable to control its flight with its damaged wing. Their thrashing cries continued even after they vanished through Cal's cloud, but they appeared again a moment later as the illusion passed ahead along with the carpet, which had not stopped during the entire exchange, Mole could see the two fiends still tangled together, falling rapidly toward the ground far below.

She smiled, but didn't stop to see if they would fall all the way to the ground. Spinning in mid-air, she saw that the carpet was a good sixty feet ahead, now, and getting further away with each passing moment. Several hordelings still fluttered around it, engaged in a violent hit-and-run melee with the defenders. Beorna, Arun, and Lok formed a defensive ring around Dannel, who was continuing to unleash holy hell with his longbow. It looks like they'd kept the hordelings off the carpet, thus far.

As the carpet and its shrouding illusion drew further away, the roar of the demons below seemed uncannily directed at her, despite the fact that she could only be a tiny speck in the sky to them. The feeling made her feel quite exposed, and she decided that it might be a good idea to rejoin the others. Almost by reflex, she called upon the power of her ring, and became invisible.

But she wasn't completely alone. Only about forty feet away, Umbar battled a pair of hordelings, both sides of combatants abandoning subtlety for full attacks designed to simply crush the other. Umbar was doing a good job, and one hordeling's left arm hung uselessly at its side, crushed by his axiomatic warhammer. Apparently the hordelings were starting to get it through their thick skulls that the dwarf wasn't going to just be beaten down, for as she floated up the one in front of him tried to grab his hammer. It got a slimy claw on his forearm for a second, but before it could solidify its grip, the dwarf tore his limb free and drove the hammer into the hordeling's face. Most of the left side of its jaw was smashed in by the blow, but the hordeling refused to die, although the sound that issued from its ruined face was truly terrible.

Umbar turned to deal with the inevitable attack from the hordeling's fellow, but the creature had already started its gambit. Taking advantage of the momentary distraction offered by its ally's attempted grapple, it beat its wings furiously, lifting it a few feet above the dwarf. Then it lunged forward, closing its wings around its body, extending its claws to enfold the dwarf, intending to simply let its weight drag the both of them down to the ground below.

It was a simple but effective plan, and it might have worked had not Mole slid the length of her rapier into the spot where the hordeling's oblong skull ended at the back of its neck. The creature, which never relied much on brains in the first place, was slow to realize that there was a foot of steel jammed into its gray matter, but its limbs quickly ceased their proper operation. The hordeling slammed hard into Umbar, but the dwarf quickly recovered, spinning to halt a few feet away. He looked up at Mole in surprise, who had become visible again with her sneak attack.

“Behind you,” the gnome warned calmly.

Umbar turned to see the first crippled hordeling charging at him, its ruined jaw wide open, revealing ugly rows of mismatched teeth and a long tongue tipped with a slender barb. The creature flailed at him with its remaining functional claw, but the dwarf held his ground, bringing his hammer down in a powerful arc that coincided with the fiend’s vile forehead. All that came from it this time was a strangled hiss, which died along with the monster as it plummeted downward.

“It might be a good idea to go rejoin the others,” Mole said. As she spoke, several arrows shot past them; apparently some of the demons below had missile weapons. At their distance, almost straight up, the shot would have been incredibly difficult, but Mole watched with fascination as an arrow slid past a mere foot from her face. The arrowhead seemed to pulse with ugly red light, and a thin black stream of wispy energy trailed behind it, quickly fading to nothing.

Umbar did not disagree, and the two of them hastened after the others. As the occasional arrows continued to fly past them Mole felt a bit guilty as she became invisible again, but heck, Umbar was armored like a golem, and she was only wearing a light tunic.

They were more than halfway across the canyon now, and as they caught up to their friends Mole could see the massive form of the Bastion more clearly ahead of them. There were black spots upon the vast white spread of the fortress wall, no doubt demons attempting to scale the fortification. She could also see defenders atop the summit, although to her eyes they seemed few and far between.

Overall, the place looked very secure, but Mole was veteran enough to know that once the demons brought up a large number of flyers, that wall would not be worth very much in holding back the assault. Surely Saureya knew that, and Mole wondered what contingencies the deva had in place to hold out here.

If he didn’t have any, then they were going from one bad situation into another.

The celestials, Callendes and the Herald’s Voice, were also returning to the carpet. The avariel looked terrible, with great bloody gashes in his slender form, but he did not falter in the powerful beats of his great white wings. The archon was likewise injured but led the other, its hovering blade of silver energy preceding it as it rushed to the aid of its charges.

The assistance turned out to be unnecessary. By the time that the Voice reached the carpet, Arun and Lok had slain the last hordeling, the fell creature tumbling downward, its torso ripped open from a truly punishing blow from Lok’s axe.

Mole could have shot ahead of Umbar, who was moving more slowly due to his heavy encumbrance, but she decided that the dwarf needed to have an eye kept on him. Without any trace of irony she mused that while the stout folk made good companions, and were great if you needed something hacked to pieces, they weren’t as able to get out of troublesome situations as gnomes, and generally needed supervision.

They were within a few hundred yards of the Bastion now. Cal's illusion dissolved, as the spell reached the limit of its range. The archmage directed the carpet downward, in a calm descent toward the opening between the top of the shield wall and the overhanging mountain behind it.

Mole was still about fifty feet shy of the carpet, so she was in a perfect position to see the threat. As the illusory storm faded, it revealed a massive fiend, a bloated monstrosity that had to be at least twelve feet tall. Its wingspan could have enfolded a farmer's cottage, but even so the great wings seemed barely sufficient to keep the creature aloft. Even now, it seemed that the carpet would easily outpace it.

But then the fearsome monster opened its jaws wide—gods, that thing could eat a horse in one bite, Mole thought. "Look out!" she warned, knowing what was coming, although she also knew it was too late for her companions upon the carpet to react.

Chapter 558

Having fought through fiendish gargoyles, chasme demons, and a flight of misshapen hordelings to reach the Bastion, now a single huge creature remained to intercept their escape.

Mole saw it all, knew what the giant fiend's intentions were even before the sizzling sound reached her ears. A great gob of green goop exploded from its mouth, shooting out at her friends. Lok and Beorna took the full force of the acidic spray, but all of them were hit with at least some of the caustic stuff. Worse than that, the entire back half of the carpet was splashed, and black smoke began to waft almost immediately from it as the acid quickly did its work.

Almost without thinking, Mole dove toward the monstrous fiend, although it wasn't immediately obvious what even sneak attacks could do against it. The thing resembled a lump of stone with arms, legs, and wings, and a tail that extended for a good fifteen feet behind it. A bony ridge rode down its back, all the way down to the end of its tail, which culminated in a broad bony plate like the head of a shovel. Its head was a massive oblong lump, dominated with those huge jaws and hooded slits for eyes. Black spikes jutted from its skull, horns that gave it a vaguely tauran—or draconic—visage.

Gods, it's ugly, she thought, the sentiment reinforced a second later as she got close enough to smell it.

The carpet, still descending rapidly, began to slow, as the acid began burning away not only at the fabric, but at the magical power that animated it. She saw Arun step to the smoking back edge, his holy sword hissing from his scabbard, surrounding him with a bright golden aura.

Mole saw something slither across the back of the giant hordeling. What in the hells is that? It looked like a splatter of black mud, only it moved, independent of the rhythmic stretching of the muscles that powered the fiend's wings. For an instant, she caught sight of something that might have been a head, and dark slits that held dim red coals for eyes.

Its gaze passed over her for only the barest instant, but it was enough to send a cold chill through her body.

Then it looked up at her companions on the carpet. Something shivered in the space between them, the faintest haze that Mole, no stranger to magic, recognized as a spell or power of some sort.

Even as Arun leapt off the carpet, calling upon Cal's granted flight to carry him forward to intercept the threat, all of his magical wards and protections, including that provided by Cal's wand, failed.

Mole watched in horror as the paladin's leap became a free fall, with nothing to stop his fall but the horde of eager demons waiting three hundred feet below.

Chapter 559

The black dragon Nbrathux was a queen among her kind, favored of the god-dragon Tiamat. The drake was already a blight upon the fading world of Karas-dhun when she was summoned to Avernus, the uppermost layer of Baator, by her mistress to serve in her court of power.

The honor of the appointment was exceeded only by the potential for even greater power, but Nbrathux was a creature of vast ego, a trait which did not serve her well in the court of that most powerful of dragons. Nbrathux had barely served two decades in her post before a rival betrayed some indiscreet plottings to Tiamat, and the ancient black was cast out in disgrace. Perhaps as a nod to the black dragon's chaotic leanings, or maybe as a last ironic punishment, the Queen of Dragons hurled Nbrathux into the Abyss.

Unable to return to the Prime of her own devices—her sorceries were potent, but she lacked the ability to plane shift on her own—the dragon spent a desperate year alone in the Abyss, crossing across several layers via portals or through the assistance of powerful demon princelings who lacked the power to slay the dragon, but likewise did not want her dwelling within their realm. The dragon only narrowly escaped destruction on several occasions. The power of Nbrathux was considerable even in comparison to the demons that other fiends that populated the dark layers of that plane, but she was alone, compared to millions upon millions of fiends that were not adverse to taking on a superior foe with the advantage of numbers.

After the collapse of several temporary alliances with lesser abyssal magnates, the dragon found herself in the company of a fellow band of outcasts, a small company of hordelings that been brought to the Abyss in the service of the dark lord Kotischtche, only to be abandoned when the demon lord's interest shifted to other matters. The dragon found the creatures pliant enough to fill the role of servants, and the hordelings in turn were delighted at the power that the dragon added to their cause.

If she had chosen to lay low, and given time to establish connections with other powers, the dragon might have been able to survive the Abyss, and even rise to some minor position of notoriety. As it was, however, the dragon did not even survive her own choice of companions. The hordelings, chaotic as they were, bristled at the pretensions of their new mistress, and following an unpleasant instance of chastisement, fell upon her in a rage and tore her to pieces.

But the dragon's legacy did not end there. Perhaps it was perversion, or merely a recognition that her own line was about to end, but before she was slain the dragon mated with several of the fiends. Hordelings are incredibly fecund; they almost have to be, for their race is prey not only to almost every intelligent and mindless species of the lower planes, but the chaos that they embody also causes them to turn upon themselves as often as not. Some demonologists theorize that this is due to a profound self-hatred experienced by these unfortunate creatures, but as far as it is known no interrogations with a hordeling have ever been able to prove or disprove that hypothesis.

Three children were born of those unions, twisted things that combined the traits of the dragon mother and the unpredictable mutability of the fiendish fathers. The half-dragons were possessed of certain advantages over their cousins, but were given no special exemption to the hazardous lifestyle practiced within hordeling "society", and two were quickly slain by their bretheren over assorted trifling offenses.

The final scion survived, and even prospered, after a fashion. The creature was known merely as Nax, and as it grew swiftly to adulthood, it developed talents that set it apart from its kin. It spent some time on its own, serving in the hosts of several warring nalfeshnee lords upon a layer of the Abyss that was under contest. This experience allowed it to develop its strength, and soon it was a force to be reckoned with even by the standards of the Abyss. While demons bore a certain resistance to the acid that the young half-breed could already discharge in copious quantities, their durability did not extend to grabbed and ripped in half, a tactic that Nax quickly perfected. Its strength was prodigious, but the creature also made a number of enemies. Its prospects, like those of any unique being in the chaotic Abyss, were quite uncertain.

Soon thereafter, it came upon the creature Yavuv.

Yavuv had been a babau of no great distinction, one of the countless legions of lesser fiends that infested the Abyss like flies upon a corpse. It spent four hundred years in the service of the nalfeshnee J'bok'a, until it displeased its master in a serious instance of negligence, allowing one of its rivals to seize a key advantage in their centuries-long on again, off again war. For a lesser offense, the babau would have merely been obliterated, perhaps to reform as a dretch in a few thousand years, but Yavuv would not be allowed to get off so easily.

Demons are masters at the craft of inflicting torment, but Yavuv was doubly unfortunate in that J'bok'a was the owner of several unique powers in this area. The babau attempted to flee, but was brought before its master, where it was subject to skeletal deliquescence. In other words, the demon's bones were liquified within its body, leaving it in a permanent state of heaped languor, unable to even rise, and forced to exist in a constant state of intense, penetrating pain. Having thus chastened its minion, J'bok'a opened a portal to a random layer of the Abyss, and hurled Yavuv through.

In this circumstance, a quick demise was the almost certain outcome. But somehow, in defiance of all the odds of fate, the demon persisted. Driven nearly insane by the constant agony in which it faced existence, something snapped inside the babau's mind. It lost much of what it had been, but in gained something as well, in the form of a rare manifestation of psionic ability. Perhaps it had been latent in the demon all along... but in any case, even with that gift, the demon only narrowly survived by stealth and trickery. Despite surviving its altered condition, it was still virtually unable to move under its own power, and even the simple task of standing upright was forever lost to it.

Yavuv's fate would have likely emulated that of Nbrathux, but for a chance encounter with Nax. The half-dragon was intelligent enough to recognize the benefits that the crippled fiend could offer it, and so began a symbiotic relationship that allowed both creatures, each unusual in its own unique way, to prosper.

Shortly thereafter both of the warring nalfeshnees were betrayed to a rival balor, and the pair found themselves free agents. Yavuv had heard a report of a charismatic new general in the Blood War who was recruiting mercenaries to his banner, and so the two found themselves tying their fate to that of the once-great Prince Graz'tz.

* * * * *

Dannel knew nothing of this, of course, as he drew an arrow back to his cheek, and took aim at the ascending monstrosity. Before he could loose, Arun was hit by the targeted dispel magic from the parasite Yavuv, and started to fall. The elf immediately aborted his shot and channeled the power of his song into a feather fall spell, which enfolded the paladin a scant instant before he fell out of range.

Arun's descent immediately slowed to a soft drift, but there was still nothing below him but a wave of demons.

"Call! Bring the carpet around!" Dannel urged. But the gnome was having difficulty just keeping the magical rug under control, as the acid from Nax's breath weapon ate away not only at the fabric, but also at the potency of the spell within the device.

Beorna didn't wait. With wisps of black smoke still rising from the crevices of her armor, she dove head-first off the carpet, plummeting like a stone toward Arun. Thirty feet away, on the opposite side of the creature, Umbar had also seen the paladin fall, and was only a few paces behind her, both converging on Arun's drifting form.

Mole's gaze had remained fixed on the parasitic creature clinging to the larger demon's back, so she saw its head turn, following Beorna's movement as she dove after Arun. The gnome did not have to stop to think to know what was about to happen. Her hand shot into her bag of holding, closed around something familiar. She didn't think, she just acted, drawing out the object and hurling it with precision at the demon.

The fat clay flask struck the back of the half-dragon hordeling right along the bony ridge that ran up its back, less than a foot above where the black mass of Yavuv began. The jar exploded in a white-hot flash of alchemist's fire, spraying down around his body in the backblast of the hordeling's powerful wings. The demon was largely unaffected by the hot fire, protected by its inherent resistances, but Mole had clearly gotten its attention. As it emerged from the billowing plume of smoke, flames hissing around its misshapen black body, its glowing red eyes fixed hatefully upon the gnome.

Uh oh, Mole had time to think, before the sky suddenly became insubstantial around her, as the magic sustaining her flight dissipated. She knew what it was like to fall, but somehow, with the ground black with crowded masses of demons three hundred feet below her, the sensation that filled her gut as she looked down was just that much worse.

Chapter 560

As gravity started to exert its inexorable hold on Mole, there was no time for casual pondering, only desperate action. The acrobat snapped her body, made a desperate lunge, and grabbed onto the only thing within reach that could possibly arrest her fall.

Arun remained calm despite the still-rapid approach of the ground below. The demons were packing together in a cluster below him, eagerly shrieking in anticipation of tearing him apart. It seemed like all of the occupants of the canyon were focused on the battle raging above them now, and there continued a sporadic barrage from the half-fiend mercenaries whose violated arrows lanced up at the assorted combatants. As Arun drifted downward on the feather fall, he drew more of their focus, and soon arrows were plinging off of his heavy armor, seeking the slightest vulnerability to pierce through to the flesh beneath.

He continued to fall, two hundred thirty feet above the ground, two twenty, two ten, two hundred. The demons could now be individually picked out, masses of skeletal babaus, bar-igura, black jovocs, half-fiend warriors in red and black plate, hordelings, countless dretches filling ever space between. A few larger beings, greater demons, in the press, reluctantly granted space by their lesser bretheren.

“Arun!” Beorna cried, drawing the paladin’s attention up. The templar shot down like a heavy stone, adding the impetus of Cal’s spell to the natural draw of the ground below, streaking down in a barely controlled dive. Umbar was not far behind her, converging on the paladin’s position.

Arun sheathed his sword, and extended his hand.

But even as the templar extended hers to grasp him, Arun was buffeted roughly to the side. Below, in the crowd, a bar-igura cackled as the paladin shot thirty feet distant, hovering briefly before he began once more to fall. The telekinesis attack had one silver lining, as an unholy blight hurled by a hezrou missed him, only briefly catching Beorna on the edge of the effect, who shrugged off the dark power with her divinely-granted mettle.

Arun felt more mental thrusts gathering around him, but he gathered his will and resisted the various assaults. Umbar had shifted his course and now reached for him; Beorna was now behind him, but was hastening to adjust.

A chaos hammer hit them, and a moment later Umbar grunted as an evil arrow pierced the calf muscle on his left leg. The cleric ignored both pains, and snapped his hand around Arun's. A moment later Beorna wrapped her arm around the paladin's back, the two dwarves cooperating as they lifted Arun toward the summit of the Bastion's shield wall. The celestials manning the defenses did their best to cover them, firing arrows or hurling pots of holy water into the massed demons below. Those attacks wrought heavy damage, but the defenders were few, while the demons and other assorted fiends numbered in the thousands.

For a few moments it looked like they would make it, despite the furious intensity of the missile and spell attacks. But Arun's fall had dropped them low enough for the babaus to extend their own power, and the cluster of dwarves were hit by a barrage of general and targeted *dispel*s. Again the flight granted by Cal's wand was the weakest link, and the spell upon Umbar failed. The dwarf started to fall, but Arun still held his hand. Beorna now found herself supporting both of them, their combined weight overwhelming the potency of the spell upon her, dragging all of them downward.

"Let me go!" Umbar urged.

Far above them, the battle with the half-dragon hordeling and its warped symbiant raged on. The Herald's Voice dove down to meet Nax as it flew up toward the passengers still upon the stricken carpet. The sword archon let out a clear cry as he challenged the evil thing that was his antithesis, his holy blade taking form before him. Nax eagerly lunged forward to meet him, but as it extended its long claws, the archon darted inside its reach, slashing at its body with the glowing shaft of force. The blow opened a long gash in Nax's body, a bright cut that spewed forth a deluge of putrid black ichor that steamed as it entered the air and fell in fat droplets to the ground below.

But the archon paid quickly for its attack, as Nax closed its huge arms, enfolding the celestial and pressing it tight against its body. The Voice tried to pull free but was caught as the half-dragon's claws dug into its torso. One wing snapped, and the creature tore a cry of pain from him as it dipped its massive jaws and bit a chunk out of the celestial's shoulder.

Arrows slammed into the hordeling's arms and shoulders, as Callendes and Dannel fired off several shots. The failing carpet was becoming an unstable platform even for Dannel, and he was not able to fall into the rapid-fire sequence of arrows that he typically managed. Callendes, his wings keeping him aloft as he hovered, was less distracted, but by stopping his movement the avariel made himself a more attractive target. Before he could release his third arrow, he staggered as a jagged, red-tipped violated arrow slammed into his torso just below his left breast. The impact, a critical hit, caused the winged elf to falter, and his face twisted with agony with each beat of his wings, as he fought to remain aloft.

Lok had paused on the edge of the carpet, knowing that another dispel would turn him into a burden rather than an aid in the ongoing battle. But it was clear that his bow would not make a significant contribution to this fray, even with his strength, not against foes such as these. Grimacing, he dropped the bow and drew out Coldburn, the potent greatsword he'd recovered in the stronghold of the Cagewrights under Cauldron. The blade was damaged, etched with the marks of babau acid, but there was naught to be done for that now.

Stung by the arrows, Nax hurled the broken celestial aside and surged up again toward the carpet, which was losing altitude quickly as it continued toward the wall of the Bastion. They were still above the level of that fortification's summit, but they still had more than a hundred feet to cover to reach it, and the carpet continued to smoke as the hordeling's acidic breath continued its grim work.

Lok disciplined himself to not look down. Commending himself to fate, the genasi lifted his sword and leapt at the onrushing monster.

The hordeling's powerful movements while it engaged the Voice had caused its tail to lash back and forth wildly. The small form clinging to the spade-like plate at the end of that appendage was hurled left and right, barely holding on with one hand as the wind whipped crazily around her. As it dropped the Voice and surged ahead, Mole was finally able to swing herself up and snap her legs around its tail just above that broad tip. She figured she should do something to hurt it, but at the moment nothing effective seemed to come to mind. Still, it seemed like a good idea to start climbing up the tail; the bony segments at least would make that task easier.

But when she looked up, she found herself staring right into the eyes of the black thing clinging to the hordeling's back. Malice washed over her like a wave, and she heard a sinister voice sound within the depths of her mind.

Let go, that voice said. The suggestion did not seem to be a very good one, no sirrie, but it was backed with magical compulsion, and she let out a sob as she felt her hands loosening their grip.

Don't listen to it, Mole! came an echoing voice in her mind, a sound familiar and yet not her own. She shook her head, made an obscene gesture toward the fiend, and with her legs holding her in place, she snapped up her other hand from behind her back, throwing her little knife at it. The non-magical missile caromed off its head, doing no damage, but she did succeed in pissing it off just that much more.

It responded with another mental attack, but rather than another suggestion, this time a wave of pain exploded through the head of the hard-pressed gnome. For a moment everything faded into gray around her, and then a memory returned with startling clarity; she was in the Malachite Fortress under Cauldron. She'd gone there with Zenna and Arun and Ruphos to find the missing children from the orphanage, and she'd climbed up a statue draped with chains. The chains had been some sort of golem creature, and she'd nearly died there. The pain now felt exactly as it had back then, and for a moment she nearly threw herself free, before she remembered where she really was.

Grimacing, she looked up at the demon-thing, and snarled one of Hodge's dwarven curses at it. She locked her hands around the hordeling's tail once more, and prepared to climb up to where she could do some damage.

Unfortunately, before she could so much as crawl a foot forward, the world suddenly whipped rapidly around her, and she found herself and her perch flying through space at an incredible speed.

The hordeling battered Lok with an incredible blow that knocked him roughly aside. The genasi recovered and started back toward Nax with his sword trailing streamers of flame and ice behind him. The half-dragon started to turn to face the warrior, but another arrow slammed hard into its shoulder. It looked up at Dannel in time to take a second hit that caromed hard off its angular forehead, opening a gash above its left eye.

Ignoring Lok, the hordeling pounded its wings, and lunged through the sky, covering the last forty feet or so that separated it from the struggling carpet. The maneuver gave Lok a chance to get close enough to swing at its torso, but the wound was minor at best, barely grazing its armored hide. He prepared for an all-out attack, but out of the corner of his eye he saw something sliding across the monster's back, and caught a glimpse of evil red orbs staring at him that sent a chill down his back.

But before either he or Yuvuv could act, Nax spread his wings and spun in mid air. His left claw swept out and smacked Lok hard across the face, knocking the genasi backward again. At the same time, its tail came around in a deliberate arc, the plate-like end accelerating with whiplike force until it smacked hard into the flying carpet square in the center of what remained of the fabric.

Dannel was standing about a foot from where the tail hit, and went flying like a boulder shot from a trebuchet, his left leg trailing behind him at an obviously unnatural angle. The carpet snapped around the tail and was yanked with it as the hordeling drew it back. Finally the ruined scrap of fabric tore free, no longer animated with even a vestige of magic, and it began fluttering toward the ground below, still trailing wisps of black smoke.

Rid of that trouble, the hordeling turned its full attention upon Lok.

Of Cal and Mole, there was no sign.

Chapter 561

The companions, having fought through the initial waves of demons warding the Bastion, now scattered before the assault of the half-dragon monstrosity Nax and its symbiant passenger, the once-babau Yuvuv.

Beorna's helmet fell from her head as her body tipped downward. She struggled with all her might to maintain her grip on Arun, but with Umbar attached to the dwarf, she was now essentially trying to carry over five hundred pounds of dwarf, armor, and gear forward. She was falling, and the relative safety of the Bastion seemed still too far away.

"Let me fall!" Umbar shouted again. The dwarf was trying to pull himself free of Arun's grip, but the paladin held his hand like a vice. "I'll not drag you to your deaths!"

"No..." Arun said, between clenched teeth. He shucked off his shield, which tumbled in the air as it fell, and locked Umbar's hand in both of his. "Beorna!"

“Too... much!” the templar grunted. An unholy blight struck them, and she nearly lost it, there. Emerging from the explosion of dark power, she fixed her eyes on the battlements of the Bastion’s defensive wall. They were almost level with that line, now, and still losing altitude...

Beorna drew focus from deep within her, calling upon that strength that had served her as an outsider, growing up among people different from her. “HELM!” she said, the syllable startling clear over the chaotic noise of the demons below. She filled herself with the strength of her patron, and heaved herself up, her own will augmenting the faltering power of Cal’s magic. With Arun and Umbar trailing below her, she went straight for her target, a gap in the massive merlons that ran along the summit of the wall like a row of perfect white teeth. More attacks continued to impact them, and several other dispels sought to unravel the tenuous thread of magic that kept them all aloft, and send them plummeting down to certain destruction. But luck, or determination, or perhaps the benevolent eye of some higher power, protected them. Her arms felt like they were being torn out of their sockets; that was nothing, an externality beyond the border of her iron discipline. An arrow pierced her side, sending a wave of nausea through her gut; she ignored it, lost in her solitary focus on her destination. That was all there was in the world, and she drove for it with all of her being.

The gift of Helm’s strength began to fade, but with a final surge she lifted herself and her passengers up and forward, and the three of them passed between the gap, and over the battlement. Umbar’s lower body slammed into the lip on the edge of the wall, and he would have fallen, had not Arun yanked him bodily up and over.

Lok and the hordeling exchanged a violent flurry of blows, each seeking to undo each other through sheer physical, brutish power. Coldburn, backed by the genasi’s phenomenal strength, had opened a pair of gashes in the half-dragon’s body, but in turn Lok’s body had been roughly battered, with several of his armor plates dented seriously in a way that had to be causing him incredible pain with every movement. But he did not falter, lifting himself up over Nax, intending to descend upon him with a two-handed strike to the head.

But that plan was foiled again by Yavuv, who had crept up across the back of its host, and now bent its head up over Nax’s shoulder on its shapeless neck, allowing it to strike the warrior with its power.

Once again, the dispel took hold, and Lok faltered. But the genasi had seen the others fall before him, and as the spell faded, and he started to fall, he shifted his grip and drove Coldburn downward. His own weight combined with the power of his thrust, and the greatsword tore through the half-dragon’s left thigh, and Lok’s fall abruptly ended, with the genasi dangling tenuously from the hilt of the weapon protruding from the fiend’s body.

Nax screamed, and seized the warrior in both of its claws, tearing him from his uncertain perch. Those claws had torn apart demons twice the fiend’s size, and now they crushed the genasi’s already battered body. Lok struggled, tearing one arm free of its grasp, but before he could do more, the hordeling opened its massive jaws again, and blasted Lok point-blank with an incredible spray of concentrated acid.

Chapter 562

Mole's world was comprised of two things; pain, pain that suffused her entire body, and a vague sense of falling. She couldn't see anything; she was enfolded in a tight web of fabric that clung to her, wrapping her up tight like a knot of lettuce inside a spring roll.

The comparison was so odd that it shook her out of her mental fugue enough to realize that it might be a very, very good idea to get out of here! She got her hand on her dagger, and drew the magical weapon, cutting away the cloth holding her at key points, giving her additional freedom of movement. The fabric—the flying carpet, or what was left of it, she realized—fluttered in several long trails that trailed above her. Above was the sky of Occipitus. That meant that below...

She slid free, not fully releasing the rug; though depleted of magic, the shredded mass was still slowing her fall, the strands causing friction on the air.

When she looked down, her breath caught in her throat.

Demons, everywhere. She was less than a hundred feet from the ground now, and just a few seconds from an impact that would be decidedly unpleasant for her. Most of them would not be able to see her, perhaps, with her ring cloaking her in invisibility, but enough had the ability to pierce that veil to make escape rather unlikely.

Oh, damn... she thought, her vision momentarily obscured by a blur in her vision. Then she grimaced. Damned if she wasn't going to go down without a fight, not crying like some kind of... girl!

Her confidence thus restored, she started to move, but her attention was drawn upward by a soft fluttering in the air. There was nothing there, but she grinned nonetheless, and extended her hand, becoming invisible again just as she felt a sudden grip that snagged on her wrist, and she was yanked off the carpet. She watched with rapt fascination as the remains of the carpet fluttered down into the ranks of the demons, which tore it to pieces in violent frustration. She was sad to see the flying device destroyed, but it was definitely better than having her still be on it when it landed.

The grip holding her was tight, and felt like a claw. But even polymorphed, she could still recognize the touch of her uncle, and she smiled.

Lok's body was burning agony. Enough of the acid blast had torn through the slit in his helm that he was effectively blinded, and the only thing he could smell was the stink of his burning flesh mixed with the caustic odor of the acid. He did not know whether his blindness was temporary, caused by the burning fluid and the sizzling smoke, or whether his eyeballs even now were being transformed into runnels of fluid within their sockets. The pain was too universal to distinguish. But the genasi's perceptions focused on his free hand, which closed around the familiar haft that jutted out under his left arm, across his back.

His ears, which alone of his senses seemed to still be functioning normally, were his guide. The fiend's cries echoed within the confines of his helmet, distorting but giving him just enough guidance as he swept his thundering axe up and around. The timbre of that demonic voice changed as he hit something solid, accompanied by the familiar noise of blood gushing from a vicious wound, and the cacophonous pulse that thrummed through his body as the weapon, empowered by his long-time friend, released its power.

And then he was free, and falling.

“Cal!” Mole shouted, pointing with her free hand at the falling figure before belatedly realizing that she was invisible and couldn’t see it. The archmage, changed into the form of a small dragon, was not in a position to intervene, but another individual was. Mole let out a little shout as the Herald’s Voice, his devastating injuries partially healed by his magic, flew up to meet the falling genasi. Lok could not see him coming, but the archon smoothly intersected his path, falling with him for a hundred feet before he spread his wings and rose, the genasi clutching tight to his muscled frame.

The companions and their allies converged on the shield wall of the Bastion. Beorna had landed with Arun and Umbar, the three dwarves staggering wearily to their feet as a pair of hound archons assisted them. Dannel, knocked free of the carpet by the smash of the hordeling’s tail, had recovered enough to fly down to the battlements, assisted by Callendes. He landed awkwardly on his right leg, the left broken in several places from the impact of the tail smash, but even so it was not clear which of the two was lending more support to the other. The avariel’s vicious wound still trailed bright blood, and he looked wan, barely able to hold his bow. Cal and Mole, both invisible, flew up over the battlement themselves, the gnome dropping free to land easily on her feet. Finally came the Voice, bearing the crippled genasi warrior.

The hordeling was descending on them, injured but still full of fight, Lok’s sword still jutting from its leg. Those celestials manning the defenses fired missiles up at it, but the wounds they inflicted seemed tiny on its massive frame. The battered dwarves pulled themselves to their feet and readied weapons, and Dannel leaned against a merlon and fitted a fresh string to his bow, his face twisting with pain with every slight movement. Mole just looked up in awe, knowing that a colossal collision was about to occur.

Nax spread its wings, and extended its lower legs, claws extended. But a scant second before it would have hit the battlements, it suddenly shrieked and veered off, sweeping aside into a dive that quickly took it out of view.

Stunned and mostly intact, the companions limped, crawled, and walked into a circle behind the shelter of the fortress battlements.

They had arrived at the Bastion.

Chapter 563

Benzan came back to consciousness with a pleasant, warm glow suffusing his body, which was always a bad sign.

Reluctantly, he lifted his head from where it had fallen across his chest, and opened his eyes. He saw what he'd expected to see, and dreaded. Yeela shot him the familiar smirk that he'd learned to hate as she slipped her empty syringe back into its red leather case. His languor was already fading as the substance she'd injected him with did its work. Soon, he knew, she would be ready to begin again; she never brought him around unless she was fully rested for another session. They could last hours, days; by the end he was not in any condition to gauge the passage of time.

"Ready to begin again, my pretty?" the lamia said, as always reading his thoughts with uncanny accuracy. By now, she knew him better than a friend, better than a lover. She knew things about him that even Dana had no inkling of. Benzan had no idea how long he'd been in the creature's "care", but he suspected it had been a long time, months or even years, perhaps.

He tore his gaze away from her, and looked around, more as a gesture of defiance than out of an interest in the chamber. He already knew every detail, every dangling tool, every pore in each one of the wooden and metal constructs situated around the perimeter of the room. He could not see behind him, could not even twist his head beyond a few degrees, but he knew the rack upon which he was currently stretched better than any of them. Even the splinters that touched his bare arms and legs were mapped in his mind, deviant sensations that Yeela allowed him to feel.

The lamia chuckled as she examined her table of implements carefully and deliberately. That meant that she was allowing him his momentary defiance, and that he would pay for it later. Benzan was developing an air of fatalism, but he could not help but feel a sense of cloying dread at that. For all of the ministrations that he'd experienced at the hands of Yeela, she was always able to come up with something new, a new horror that his body and mind could not anticipate, and not adapt to.

The lamia lifted an instrument and turned to him. "Today, I think we will apply ourselves to your manhood."

Benzan's heart clenched in his chest.

The lamia came forward, her claws clacking slightly on the bloodstained stone tiles of the floor, but before she could touch him the door to the chamber swung ponderously open. Yeela frowned; Benzan knew that she hated interruptions.

Another creature entered the chamber. Her soft face and slender frame were representations of the ideal of feminine beauty, marred by the charcoal wings that spread out from her back. She was clad in a clinging outfit that left only just enough to the imagination to add a certain something to the aura of raw sexuality that she radiated like heat from a bonfire. Something flickered in her eyes, but it might have only been the reflection of the lanterns that danced brightly in them as she entered the room. Benzan did not know her, but that meant nothing; the succubi changed appearance the way that other creatures changed their clothing. They'd had their turn with him as well, and their torments, while different in nature than those practiced by Yeela, were no less destructive to body, mind, and soul.

But he was helpless to intervene in any case, so he merely observed, grateful for even a few moments of relief from the lamia's attentions. Yeela shot him a knowing glance, as if to promise him that he would come to regret that feeling, then she turned toward the newcomer.

"Welcome, my dear Kireen," the lamia said, although Benzan could tell that she was anything but welcoming. Some demons practiced torture as a performance art, but Yeela was different, enjoying the solitary bond that existed between the torturer and victim. "What brings you down to the cells this day?"

"The Great Lord has an interest in this one, Yeela. I was commanded to look in on him, from time to time."

The lamia flicked her wrist in a gesture of annoyance. "I am following the Master's mandate to the letter, with this one," she said. "I do not need anyone second-guessing my skill."

The succubus spread her hands before her in a conciliatory gesture. "I certainly did not mean to challenge your admirable proficiency in the art," she purred. "In all honesty, I would as soon attend to my own concerns, but with the Master gone..."

Benzan perked up slightly at that. Graz'zt had left the citadel? He didn't know whether he considered that good or bad news, but it gave his starved mind something to turn around.

The lamia chuckled. "Your whelp is off at the Master's side now... He has come far fast, but it should be interesting to see how he fares at the forefront of events. Prestige is a double-edged sword, especially when it comes to the intrigues among the great ones."

The succubus's mouth tightened into the barest hint of a scowl, just for a moment. But she quickly mastered herself, and turned to Benzan. "He does not look to be lucid," she said, examining him with the expert eye of one seasoned to pain.

"Oh, he's awake," the lamia said, turning to her tools. The moment she'd shifted around enough to take her eyes off of Kireen, the succubus twisted her wrist, and a short white rod, perhaps two and a half feet in length, appeared in her hand. The demoness pointed it at Yeela and spoke a word of power.

Benzan felt a screaming sound rip through him as a sonic evocation, maximized by the white rod, erupted in the confines of the small chamber. Clinging to consciousness, he saw that Yeela was much worse off; she'd taken a direct hit, and blood poured down her body where blood vessels had exploded through her flesh.

But the lamia was a durable creature. Snarling, trails of bright red blood draining from her nostrils and ears, Yeela snatched a jagged hook-edged blade from the table and lunged at the succubus. Kireen ducked back with superhuman agility, but could not avoid a gash that drew a bright red line across her belly. Yeela lifted the weapon to strike again, but before she could stab the knife down into her attacker's chest the succubus fired off another sonic at point blank range.

This time, the world exploded in a surge of red, and Benzan lost consciousness.

Chapter 564

This time, his return to consciousness was both more gradual, and more painful.

“Wake up,” came a voice, insistent and demanding compliance. There was magic in that voice, and he wanted to obey, but his battered body was resisting.

Benzan could only dimly feel his body, but suddenly the tension holding his arms against the rack disappeared. He fell forward, and would have fallen except for the fact that something caught him, holding him more or less upright.

“Wake up,” came the voice again, accompanied by a flash of pain as he was slapped—hard—across the face.

Summoning a fierce effort, he opened his eyes. He was still in the torture room, being propped up by the succubus. Looking down, he caught sight of an ugly red and brown heap of disgusting wreckage that he realized was Yeela, or rather what was left of her. After what he’d been through, the sight should have been a pleasant one, but he had to fight down a sudden surge of bile that threatened to rob him of what little equilibrium he’d been able to retain.

“You need to get ahold of yourself,” the succubus said. “This bitch is done, but others may come by at any minute.”

His gaze traveled upward, and as he met her eyes, he thought he saw something there, through the fog that was still clouding his senses. “Dana?”

The succubus laughed, but it was a cruel, harsh sound. “If you can think that, you’re more damaged than I expected. No, my little tiefling, I am not your lost love, and while I might enjoy the chance to scour her from your mind and body, you must get up and move, if you wish to survive.” He flinched as she lifted her hand, holding the bloody hook-knife that Yeela had used to much effect upon him, and slammed it into the wooden rack an inch from his bare thigh.

Benzan grabbed the weapon and tugged it free, with some effort. He felt weak, his muscles strained from hours upon hours of being lashed to manacles, or this rack, or any of the other instruments of torment located in the room. He had experienced too much to be anything but suspicious of the succubus’s motives, or even the veracity of this entire episode. He was all too aware that the very substance of reality as he perceived it was mutable in this place. But he was still who he was at the core, and he would not pass up any opportunity, however slim.

He had to saw at the bonds holding his ankles, and nearly fell as he staggered forward off the rack. He had to steady himself against Yeela’s table, but did not relinquish the hook-knife as he turned to face the succubus.

“Why?” he asked, glancing down at the mangled corpse of the lamia.

“There is no time for idle chatter,” Kireen said. “The window of action is extremely limited... we must move.”

“So... you’re saying to trust you?”

The succubus laughed again. “You’d have to be a truly incredible fool to believe that. No, Benzan, I ask not for your trust. But you are free of your bonds; trust that. Your torturer is dead at your feet; trust that. And your freedom is a tenuous thing; you can trust that, indeed. Now, let us go, and swiftly. Be silent, if you do not wish to be returned to your former condition.”

He tried to walk, and found that he could, with difficulty. His legs were stiff, and the little pains that shot through his body with every movement were almost nothing in comparison to what he was used to from Yeela’s hands.

A hangover’s never going to feel quite that imposing, after that, he thought to himself grimly. But despite regaining his mobility, he knew he was far from being at his best.

“Wait,” he said, his eyes turning to Yeela’s red satchel, and the injection capsules he knew lay within.

“I would not recommend that,” Kireen told him. “The drugs restore, but the side effects will impair you significantly. I need you with your full wits about you, such as they are. You are not as harmed as you feel yourself to be right now; Yeela had instructions to keep you mostly intact.” As she spoke, she turned to the door, and pulled it open slightly. “It’s time to go.”

“I suppose clothes would be too much to ask?”

Even in her agitation, the succubus managed a lascivious glance that slid up his naked body. With his bones jutting from his lean frame, and his skin covered with a slick of old sweat and dried blood, he knew he had to look almost as frightening as some of the demons he’d seen in his time here. “Don’t worry, I’ll do my best to keep myself in check,” she said, dryly.

Grimacing, his hand clutched tight on his makeshift weapon, he followed her.

Chapter 565

The succubus Kireen led Benzan out into a corridor of bare stone, fashioned from massive blocks of rough-hewn black rock. His bare feet felt like they were being stabbed with tiny needles with each step, but he forced himself to ignore the pain. The place was as quiet as the grave, and he neither saw nor heard the faintest hint of activity in the first few rooms they passed.

“Where is everybody?” he whispered, when they paused at a junction.

“Quiet,” she hissed, drawing him hastily into a side corridor a moment before Benzan heard guttural voices from the corridor ahead, and saw shadowy figures appear in the distance, coming their way. Despite his earlier concerns he now had to trust her, as she led him around a bend, and then into a side room that opened so suddenly off the twisting passage that he nearly ran into the door as she slid it open and ducked inside.

The chamber behind was extremely small, and Benzan found himself pressed close up against the succubus in a way that was decidedly uncomfortable for him. She gave off a heady scent that affected his body despite himself, and he drew back, nearly knocking over a black crystal decanter that rested on a narrow table along the left wall.

“Careful, you fool,” she said. “We will need to move quickly.” She took something out of a cabinet of black wood—the color seemed popular in the décor—and handed it to him. It was a compact package of garments apparently fashioned of dark gray woolens. He unfolded the clothes, a simple sleeveless robe with a pair of matching boots and fingerless gloves, and pulled them while the succubus watched without comment.

“I could use a real weapon,” he said, when he was done. The clothes had been designed for someone of slightly larger stature, and the robe scratched painfully against his abused flesh, but he still felt better for having at least some form of protection upon him.

“If it comes to swordplay, then it is already too late for you,” she said. But she made no move to divest him of the small blade he carried. He held it now at his side as he came up to her again, meeting her cold eyes with a determined stare of his own.

“I think it’s time you told me what your game is here. I’m grateful for being let out of Yeela’s cell, but I’m not going to follow you blindly into another one of Graz’zt’s little mazes. I’ve played his sport before.”

For a moment he thought she would refuse to tell him anything again, but then she leaned against him, catching him off guard as she wrapped her arms around his neck. “Ah, but you are still playing, Benzan,” she said, her lips mere inches from his. “It is just that your piece has been upgraded, and moved to a different board.”

He poked her slightly in the gut with his blade, enough to get her attention. “And Malad? Is he another piece on this board?”

The succubus chuckled. “I can see why Graz’zt is so perturbed with you,” she said. “And why Athux took an interest in you, after your arrival here. There is not enough time to explain the rules of the game fully, my dear. But let it suffice to say, that if you are returned to the list of active players, it may advance my interests in the game.”

“Did Delem know the rules?”

“Delem thought himself a mouse, but a raging fire burned in his veins,” the succubus said. “That fire burns on in Malad, who is not corrupted by the weakness that you mortals instill in your young, by the pathetic ideals you espouse: mercy toward the weak, tolerance, benevolence. He has come into his power, and he knows it. His day has come, and he will finish the work that his father started.”

“You demons are all alike,” Benzan said, forcing a smile that didn’t quite reach his eyes. “Can’t wait to turn on each other, can you?”

She shifted slightly, and he suddenly found his hand caught in hers, pressing the blade between them. The way it was situated, he could not withdraw it without catching himself on the hook-end of the device. She ran her other hand through his hair, her nails scratching his scalp hard enough to bleed him. Her scent was intoxicating, and he found his body responding to her despite the revulsion that twisted in his gut. “Don’t be so judgmental, Benzan. You are, after all, one of us, no matter how hard you try to deny it.”

She held him for a moment to show that she could, reveling in the effect that she had on him, and then released him. He staggered back, upset at himself for his own weakness. His emotions were a storm that threatened to overwhelm him, and which he barely was able to discipline.

“Use it,” she suggested. “The anger and the despair, and yes, even the lust... that may help you get out of here alive.” He had no reply to that, and she moved to the far wall, where a low-handing buttress provided a shadowy nook. Her hand darted in along the wall, and a small portal opened.

The secret passage was narrow and low, forcing Benzan to shuffle forward awkwardly. The succubus seemed to have no difficulty, but she was probably used to sneaking around in these kinds of hidden tunnels, he thought grimly. In a way, it was a relief to be able to press up against the adjacent walls to steady himself. But there was no chance to rest; Kireen moved swiftly ahead of him, and after a few sharp turns she paused to open another doorway in the side of the passage.

“Come on, come on,” she said, holding the door for her. Benzan sensed the change in her demeanor, and his hand tightened on the handle of his weapon.

The room was the largest one he’d seen yet, thirty feet or more across with a high vaulted ceiling that rose up at least twenty feet above. The chamber was irregularly shaped, with deep alcoves and uneven nooks that were lost in shadow. The place was lit by a half-dozen glowing red globes that appeared to be cemented into niches in the walls; each shone with barely more light than a candle’s flame. There were a few exits, doorways warded by tall arches, but it was immediately clear why the succubus had brought him here.

The secret door opened onto a black alcove. The adjacent wall to their right was dominated by a massive gatehouse, a tunnel twelve feet wide and fifteen feet tall, flanked by a large winch apparatus that appeared to be linked by thick cables to the two black iron portcullises that blocked the passage. Benzan did not have to advance all of the way into the room to know that the tunnel led outside; he could feel the subtle shift in the air.

“There should be guards,” he whispered, as Kireen closed the door and came up behind him.

“Do you think that I would not have made preparations for your escape, before releasing you from Yeela?” she said, taunting him, but also finally acknowledging what he’d not been able to believe until now, that he was going to get out of here. What would come next was still unknown, but at the moment he considered that it had to be better than enjoying more of Graz’zt’s hospitality. “The citadel is nearly empty, but that doesn’t mean that there aren’t eyes watching. This is a secondary entrance, but a patrol may be by at any moment. Come, let’s go.”

She led him over to the winch. The device looked to be too large for even the two of them together to manipulate, but she ran her fingers along the rim of the mechanism, muttering words of commands in the Abyssal tongue. The thing creaked to life, twisting the cables around it of its own volition. The portcullises creaked slowly upward, making a noise that wasn’t especially loud, but which sounded cacophonous to Benzan’s hyperalert senses.

“What happens after we get outside?” Benzan asked, while they waited.

“Someone will be waiting for my signal,” she said. “You will be delivered to...”

But Benzan never found out the identity of Kireen’s co-conspirator. Facing toward the back of the chamber, he caught the sudden movement out of the corner of his eye; the faintest warning that would not have been enough to save him, had he been its target. He stumbled back as a fiery beam of red-hot energy struck the succubus square across her back, splashing out in a spray of eager tongues of flame that transformed her wings to blackened char, and roasted her soft flesh. She screamed and staggered, but recovered quickly enough to lunge for the exit, still mostly blocked by the portcullis. Benzan, overcome, lost his balance and fell, the hard stone jolting him roughly, and could only watch as his “rescuer” abandoned him.

But the dark shadow that had lurked in one of the alcoves near the ceiling above was quicker. Even as the succubus started to dive forward, her body jerked roughly to the side, and her forward motion was immediately arrested as she was sucked back into the air. Benzan could only stare in stunned terror as she was lifted into the grasp of a huge black thing that clung to the arch above the exit. The succubus, impaled upon one of the creature’s long limbs, struggled feebly, then was ended as several more of the creature’s limbs stabbed into her, piercing her torso and rending her organs. Blood exploded down from her savaged body, splashing crimson upon the iron gate, the bare flagstones, and on the wide-eyed tiefling who watched as his prospects took a sudden and decisive turn for the worse.

Chapter 566

Cal folded the little book in his hands, leaned back in the plain stone chair, and closed his eyes. For a moment it looked as though he intended to drift off to sleep, then he let out a loud breath and looked back down at the book in his hands.

It wasn't his spellbook, but a much more compact volume bound in blue leather, just the right size for a large pocket. It had the look of a book that had been lovingly prized and read for decades, although it had only been in Cal's possession for a little over a tenday.

His fingers passed over the binding, which felt as familiar to him as if he'd owned the book all his life. As he'd done a dozen times already, he opened the cover and looked at the message scribed therein, in an elegant script that was both quick and efficient in its march across the page.

Archmage Balander Calloran,

I have been following your efforts for some time. Your pursuit of the higher talents of the Art we share has been admirable; for a time I too had to address how to balance the demands of magic with the needs of the practitioner.

I am sure you do not need any accolades from me to know that you are among the ten foremost students of the mysteries of the Weave extant upon Faerûn. From this point on, your perceptions will continue to expand outward, into new realities that are both fantastic and basic, in a core elemental sense. You will learn much about yourself, but never forget who you were; keeping yourself grounded will help anchor you when the flux of new possibilities threaten to tear you asunder from yourself.

I know that this is not the most convenient time to explore your transfiguration; like many who have journeyed into the realm of the epic, you face a tumult of danger. I do not imagine that you will have the time for study and contemplation that you would desire. I, too, lacked this pleasure when fate took me into her less than tender embrace.

Likewise you do not need me to tell you of the true nature of your foe.

I offer this book as a gift, to ease your way. It is not a book of answers, nor is it a key to the dilemmas you face. Rather, it is a guide, to help you to develop that which you already know lies within.

The message did not have a signature at the end, but embossed into the fabric of the parchment page was a sigil, marked in silver filigree so faint that the slightest movement of his eyes from it caused it to fade from view, as if it had never existed. He knew the symbol, had carried it with him long before he had come to own the book. One finger held up, as if to assert that there was only one truth, at the center of it all.

The book had come to him through mysterious circumstances. He had been studying in the library of the Guild in Waterdeep. Cramming, really, in the manner that young students had pursued since time immemorial. He was no longer young, but the threat that he and his friends faced from the dark Prince of the Abyss drove him more than any mere professor's final examination could. He still remembered those spells he had forced... yes, that was the only word for it, spells that he'd jammed into his mind, until their formulae popped into his mind during sleep and wakefulness, pushing out more mundane thoughts like the needs of the body. He'd paid a price for those spells, indeed. But even in the short time since then, he'd already grown beyond the power that had seemed so incredible at the time.

He tried to call up the man's face, but still could not. Perhaps someday, when he had the time for contemplation cited in the message in the front of the book. All he remembered was soft blue robes, a voice that seemed to radiate a calm competence, and the book. Left for him... he must have taken it, and while he remembered reading through it on several occasions, he could not recall actually thinking consciously about it, until very recently. Perhaps he had just not had the time... or maybe, he had not been ready for it, until now.

He turned the pages swiftly. The few spells within were almost absurd in their power. Several already burned within his mind, awaiting release. And there was much more... formulae that he knew he would spend the rest of his life delving, and probably only to understand a small fraction of them. Other bits of lore, fragments, really, each promising more knowledge if he could only tease them together to reveal their secrets. Just skimming the book, he had to fight the urge to fall into the pages again, only to rise many hours later, as weary as if he'd spent a day in hard march.

He did not have many hours, of that he was certain, at least.

He closed the book with some reluctance, and set it upon the desk before him. Like the chair and the bed, it was plain unadorned stone. The Bastion was a stronghold in truth, but it lacked much in the way of amenities. Fortunately Mole had dug out—of all things!—a down pillow from her bag of holding, and since she'd barely spent ten minutes here before slipping out to explore the citadel, Cal had made good use of it.

The candle upon the desk burned very slowly, but Cal judged that they'd been here at least a half-day, as they judged the passage of time. He'd spoke to Dannel briefly a short while ago, long enough to learn that their situation had remained unchanged. For now. The demons continued pressing their assault, but as long as the Warder remained intact, the fortress was probably secure. But Cal knew that the demonic horde gathered in the canyon outside represented only a small fraction of the forces brought here by the Prince. And he knew that while the magic Graz'zt had wrought had to have taken a lot out of him, it was only a matter of time before he unleashed his final assault upon this final safehold.

Their situation here was extremely tenuous. Saureya had known it as well as they; Cal had seen that the minute he'd seen the once-fallen deva. Or was he still fallen? Saureya occupied a unique position that defied classification. Morgan had given over leadership to him, or at least that was how the other celestials perceived it. The deva seemed to accept that role with the same resignation that he regarded the battle for Occipitus. Cal knew, of course, that Saureya had suffered in a way that he could not even begin to comprehend.

He sighed at the memory of it. They had not gotten off to a good start. Saureya had greeted them within a few moments of their arrival, once the hordeling and his weird passenger had veered off from their diving attack. They had the Warder to thank for that; the statue, barely identifiable as anything other than a rough-hewn pillar, was the source of the golden light they'd seen from the far end of the canyon. Cal had not had time to study it long. The figure occupied the rear of the cavern formed between the shield wall and the overhang from the mountain behind, thirty feet tall, a massive warrior whose features had to be left to the imagination. But the glow coming from it was real, as was the potent antipathy effect that blanketed the Bastion, driving away all that was chaotic and evil.

After what had happened in getting here, Cal might have hoped for a general mood of relief, but Beorna had immediately challenged the deva. “I am surprised to see you here,” she had said. “I would have thought that you would have turned your cloak again by now.”

Cal had winced, although the gesture had not been obvious in the silver dragon form he’d polymorphed into. But the deva had not responded to the dwarf’s challenge. He’d merely nodded to himself, as if noting their presence on a tally sheet in his mind, and then handed them over to his adjutants for assignment to quarters within the citadel. Even the dwarves had been too stunned (and beat up) to react before the deva departed with the Voice, the latter delivering his report as they left.

Everything after that was sort of a blur. They’d been fed, bland but nourishing food that satisfied the needs of their bodies. Then rest, at least for him; Mole had headed off almost at once and he suspected that Lok, at least, had probably spent most of the last half-day helping the defenders on the wall. He hoped that Umbar and Beorna had at least had the good sense to get some sleep; they would need the spells of the clerics before this was done. The demons were probably suffering heavy losses in their ongoing low-intensity assault upon the fortress, but he knew that they were just marking time until the main force of Graz’zt’s armies reached them.

At least in that sense, Graz’zt’s lock gave them some respite; if the demons could have teleported, the battle for Occipitus would have been over in a matter of minutes.

Of course, this way it was just a delay of the inevitable. Given the current odds, Cal could not see how it could turn out any other way. With that assumption, there were only a few options left to them, none of them very pleasant. He had some ideas, but he wanted to speak to the others before he made any commitments, even in his own mind.

His musings were interrupted by a potent thrumming, a vibration that momentarily shook the very core of the mountain in which the Bastion lay. So much for the lull, he thought, leaping up and reaching for his gear.

Chapter 567

The canyon that culminated in the white shield wall of the Bastion was crawling with demons, a dark mass that surged forward in an all-out attack upon the citadel.

Arrows, hurled stones, and other missiles flew down into the massed demons, accompanied by the occasional flash of a spell. But the defenders were few, far too few, to halt the onslaught. Only a few dozen angels, archons, half-celestials, and inevitables held the wall, slaying demons that were instantly replaced with fresh attackers from the horde.

From within the demonic host came the thrum of a trebuchet, a sinister device crafted of black metal, dragged here from some unknown source by the fiends. The engine was far enough back to avoid counterattacks from the defenders atop the battlements, and every few minutes the evil machine leapt into action once more, hurling a boulder—or occasionally, a demon or two—at the Bastion. The trebuchet was wildly inaccurate, and thus far had inflicted little damage, but several cracks in the shield wall suggested that time and persistence would lead to additional destruction.

Small groups of chasmes made passes above the wall, casting unholy blights and other destructive magics into the ranks of the defenders. Occasionally one would flutter to the ground, pierced by holy missiles, but for the most part the demons were content to flit quickly back out of range, recovering position for another hit-and-run attack. Those few defenders with bows and ammunition, led by the half-celestial avariel, Abringen and Callendes, targeted the fly-demons when they could, but at the moment other concerns pressed for their attention.

At the base of the wall, a number of hulking forms heaved through the milling mob of fiends. They were goristo demons, seven of them, dominating their smaller cousins with their sheer size and fearsome mien. The huge bull-headed demons reached the wall and immediately started to climb, stabbing black metal hooks carried in their meaty fists into the white stone, using them to pull themselves mechanically upward. Each goristo carried several babau as passengers, the emaciated demons clinging to the larger demons' backs, screeching challenges at the defenders above.

A hound archon leaning out over the battlements spotted this new threat and shouted a warning to its fellows. Soon large rocks came plummeting over the edge of the battlements, tumbling down the nearly sheer face of the wall. One goristo took a boulder the size of a man's torso directly to the center of its face, and it lost its grip, falling back thirty feet to smack solidly into the ground, squashing a half-dozen dretches too slow to get out of the way. Several of the other goristos took hits but shrugged them off, continuing their slow but inexorable climb up the wall. Explosions of dark energies erupted along the length of the battlements, unholy blights and chaos hammers summoned by a dozen hezrous near the forefront of the demonic horde, and soon the barrage of rocks ceased, as the defenders fell back slowed and sickened by the fell power unleashed by the fiends.

From a dense cluster in the center of the horde rose a score of vrock, their wings beating furiously as they each lifted a pair of small, black-skinned demons, jovocs, in their hind claws. The vrock rose high up into the air, a hundred feet or more above the summit of the Bastion's shield wall, before cutting into steep dives down at the defenders atop the battlements. They let out terrible shrieks as they encountered the edge of the antipathy field generated by the Warder, and veered off, dropping their burdens with almost casual abandon. The hapless jovocs fell, some of them bouncing painfully off of the massive overhang that shielded the interior of the Bastion before landing hard atop the wall. A few missed even that broad target, and plummeted all the way to the floor of the canyon, another hundred feet below. Those that did manage to land atop the wall and survive the impact were immediately overcome by the antipathy effect, and fell back in disarray, toppling over the edge of the wall, or huddling miserably against the thick merlons of the outer battlement. Most of them were slain at once by the defenders, led by the compact and heavily armored form of a certain genasi warrior, but the jovocs' auras of retribution ensured that at least some of the damage wrought upon them was returned to their attackers. Lok saw three hound archons and an aasimar fighter go down, crippled by wounds that echoed those being torn in the jovocs. He himself altered the stroke he'd intended for another of the creatures, and instead smacked it hard with the flat of his axe, knocking it over the battlements to fall away into the vast open beyond.

He looked up to see a huge stone arcing almost directly toward him, and he hurled himself aside as the trebuchet stone struck the ground two feet from where he'd been standing, bouncing as it caromed into the cavern beyond the wall, stopping in a crash of stone shards and pulverized dust. Another dark shape followed it, and for a moment he thought that the demons had added a second trebuchet to their arsenal. But no, the figure resolved into the bulbous shape of a lesser demon, a filthy dretch, which flailed its thin arms and legs as it arced up over the wall, landing painfully in a heap only a few feet from him. It was not alone; others were coming now as well, mostly dretches, with a few babaus, rutterkin, and jovocs among them.

Lok could not see what was giving these demons the power of flight, but if he'd had the liberty to look down upon the demon ranks, he would have seen the glabrezu Aborathaz, summoning areas of reverse gravity into densely packed masses of lesser demons. The glabrezu's power was not enough to lift the demons all the way over the wall, but Aborathaz had a dozen bar-igura accompanying it, and as their cousins reached the apex of their vertical ascent, twitching as they floated seventy feet above the ground, they gleefully used telekinesis to roughly push them the rest of the way over the obstacle.

All Lok knew was that demons were landing all around him, as he decapitated a second dretch, and then tore into a rutterkin before it could pull itself to its feet. Again most were immediately falling back before the power of the Warder, but here and there a few managed to resist that repulsion long enough to attack, or fire off a spell-like ability against the nearest celestials. More chaos hammers went off, giving cover to those along the edge of the wall, maybe giving them a chance to regroup. A pair of warden archons, bright golden collars and bracers gleaming on their shaggy ursine forms, joined the genasi, tearing into a babau that was able to resist the power of the statue long enough to hold its ground for a moment, its body quivering in rage.

As if that wasn't enough, Lok glanced up to see at least two groups of vrock holding position outside of the radius of the antipathy effect, joined in frenetic dances of ruin. A scream drew his attention around, as one of the warden archons, already wounded with an arrow jutting from its shoulder, staggered, clutching its legs where blood poured out from deep gashes into his thick fur. Lok felt the same pang, a hot pain that felt like daggers being drawn across his thighs. There were no demons within reach at the moment, but Lok saw a trio of jovocs huddled between two of the merlons at the edge of the wall. He was surprised and dismayed to see the demons clawing at each other, opening gashes in their own legs that quickly healed, their aura of retribution inflicting the damage they suffered upon the nearby defenders. The demons regenerated quickly, allowing them to continue inflicting wounds upon themselves, and their enemies.

The genasi fighter started toward the demons, but was driven back as a pair of chaos hammers exploded right in front of him, dazzling him for a moment. As he tried to clear his vision, he heard a familiar noise, distinct over the insane cacophony of the demon host, a roar he would not soon forget.

Nax was returning to the fray.

Chapter 568

Demons tumbled off the battlements, falling to their deaths by the dozens, only to be replaced by others lifted by their flying kin, or hurled into the sky by the field of reverse gravity that shifted across the gathered mass. The majority of those failed to even reach the summit of the wall, slipping out of the narrow magical field to plummet back down to a painful impact, or failing to clear the wall and slamming hard into the battlements when launched up by telekinesis. Those that did make it over were almost always overwhelmed by the power of the Warder, or torn to pieces by those defenders of the garrison that still stood. The celestials had lost the edge of the wall, which had been turned into a deathtrap by the ongoing barrage of unholy blights and chaos hammers, and now fell back into a half-circle centered on the softly glowing statue, taking comfort in the reassuring rays of light that emanated from it.

Black arrows with pulsing red-iron heads arced over the battlements, fired from the powerful longbows of Graz'zt's half-fiend warriors, soldiers of his elite Blood Legion. The vast majority of those shots hit stone, and as many plunged into the bodies of the demons landing atop the wall as into the defenders. But while those that struck fiends inflicted little damage, those few that hit celestials ripped terrible wounds in the bodies of the assorted defenders. The hard-pressed garrison was falling back, now, overcome by the sheer violence of the fiendish assault, even though the fortress itself was still secure, bolstered by the potent aura emanating from the statue in the back of the cavern beneath the overhang. Another boulder rose up over the wall and slammed into the cavern, hitting a lantern archon that simply evaporated from the force of the impact, and then bounced into the far wall to the left of the statue, near where a pair of massive stone doors bound in brass stood open, the entrance to the interior portion of the fortress.

Out of the press of demons rose the massive form of the half-dragon hordeling Nax, its symbiant Yavuv clinging to the bony ridge that ran down its broad back. The hordeling had regenerated the injuries it had suffered earlier, but still bore scars that testified to the violence of its initial meeting with the companions from Faerûn. Now it spread its broad wings and flew, driving back dretches and other smaller demons with the backblast from its flight. As it ascended into the air, it drew up a framework of metal bars fixed into a half-moon shape, to which over a dozen lesser demons, mostly babaus, clung. The extra weight slowed the hordeling considerably, but sheer hatred fueled it, and soon it was rising toward the battlements of the Bastion. One babau lost its grip and fell back into the press, but it was just another casualty that was more than replaced by the ongoing rush of new demons that continued to pour into the canyon from the far end.

Lok started toward the knot of jovocs again, ignoring the pain that stabbed through his body. He was tired, but he drew upon that deep reservoir of fortitude that had stayed him through so many battles in the past. While several of his companions had spent time with the defenders on the wall, cutting into the ranks of the demons with arrows and spells, he alone had spent the full time—six hours? Eight? Ten?—since their arrival joined with the defense. Unlike the others, he had no spells to recover, and while Cal had urged him to take his rest while the ongoing demon assault had been more moderate in its intensity, he found that he could not simply withdraw while the celestial warriors were fighting and dying on their behalf.

A trumpet archon had restored him at one point, but he'd since used up the fresh energy granted him by the spell. He could not see the celestial among the defenders now, although he had not seen it fall. There had been no shortage of losses on their side; he'd seen a kolyarut inevitable firing off enervation rays from the battlements get hit by six chaos hammers in quick succession, leaving only a smoking heap of gears and rubble. The bodies of other celestials were strewn about the top of the wall. Those were the fortunate ones; a number of the defenders had fallen from the wall, and a few of those had survived long enough to be torn to pieces by the demons pressed up against its base. Everywhere he looked he saw death and destruction; here a zelexhut creaking mechanically on its side, half its body crushed by a glancing blow from a trebuchet stone, there a hound archon that lay where it had fallen, a violated unholy arrow jutting from its left eye socket.

They were few and getting fewer, Lok thought, ducking under the swing of a rutterkin, bringing his axe around into its back as he passed. The demon crumpled, its spine severed, but Lok was already focused on the jovocs. The demons shrieked as they saw him coming, but there was no place for them to run as the genasi barreled hard into them, driving them off the edge of the wall and into the open space beyond. Lok felt a pain jab through his upper body as the reflected force of the impact rebounded on him, but it was just a minor tally against the serious wounds he already bore.

The genasi caught himself well before he would have followed the demons into that void, but was still given a panoramic view of the battlefield that made his breath catch in his throat. Even with the losses they had taken, the canyon was crammed with demons, thousands of them, maybe tens of thousands. To his left and right, demons continued to mount the wall, as the rocks continued to shuttle more up to the top, and others rode up on a violent plume of reverse gravity and telekinesis. The wall shuddered beneath him, and he stole forward enough to see the nearest of the goristo climbers just fifteen feet below him, looking up with unconcealed malice shining in its eyes. The babaus riding upon it chortled in glee, their claws tightening in anticipation of rending his flesh.

And then he saw Nax, rising up with its burden of demonic passengers, already almost at eye-level with him, and for a split-second he was overwhelmed by the enormous intensity of it all, the chaos of a siege more dramatic than any he could have imagined upon—or under—the surface of his own world.

“Um, you might wanna, y’know, get out of here,” a voice came, from directly above. He glanced up, but saw only the merlons to either side, and the sky, empty for the moment, directly above.

Then a form shimmered, and Mole appeared for a second atop one of the merlons, winking at him before she became invisible again. “Sheesh, you’re going to draw their fire, clumsy!” her voice came. “Like I said, I’d back it up!”

Almost as if on cue, an unholy blight exploded around him. He fell back, picking up speed, just avoiding a second blight, and then a third, which erupted in close succession where he’d been perched.

More demons dogged his steps. He ignored for now the bulk of them, the ones that were falling back in disarray toward the edge of the wall, overwhelmed by the antipathy effect. A dretch bounced hard on the stone behind him and caromed off his hip, screaming in Abyssal as it tried to arrest its momentum. A lantern archon blasted it with a pair of white beams, ending its torment. He passed the same rutterkin he'd taken down a moment ago; the fiend was dying from his stroke, but it still tried to grab his ankle as he ran past it.

"Behind you!"

He still couldn't see Mole, but he acted reflexively, weaving to the side as a babau came flying down from the sky, claws extended toward him. The demon landed awkwardly, the snap as its left leg broke under it clearly audible, but still it lunged at the genasi, gibbering madly as the antipathy washed over it. Lok readied his axe, but there was no need, as an arrow buried itself to the feathers in the demon's throat, and it collapsed in a quivering heap.

"At them!" came a familiar cry, followed by a dwarvish invocation to battle.

Reinforcements had arrived.

Arun, Beorna, and Umbar rushed forward to bolster the line of defenders, their armor hastily strapped to their bodies, but their weapons held at the ready to unleash carnage upon the attacking demons. Dannel fired another arrow from his fiendbane longbow, striking a vrock a moment before it was ready to drop another pair of squirming jovocs. The impact causing it to drop one of the black demons short, to smack into the wall and tumble down to its destruction below.

It was a slaughter, with the demons slain almost as quickly as they could reach the top of the wall. With the majority of them unable to advance against the aura projected by the Warder, the demons could not engage the defenders effectively. However, neither could the garrison advance back to the battlements of the wall, due to the magical attacks from the demons below.

"Where is Saureya?" Cal asked a nearby archon. The canine-headed creature shook its head, not knowing the answer, only that its hated enemies were nearby, needed to be destroyed. With a growl, it rushed at a rutterkin that had actually managed to regain its feet, having landed off to the far left end of the wall.

A hezrou materialized upon one of the merlons atop the wall, having flown up in gaseous form. It alone of its fellows had resisted the antipathy effect to get even this close of its own volition, and it quickly spoke a word of blasphemy. Not all of the defenders were within range of the dread utterance, but a pair of lantern archons were vaporized, and one of the warden archons and an aasimar cleric fell to the ground, paralyzed. The two avariels, who had retreated to the back of the cavern, almost to the feet of the statue, immediately opened fire upon the demon, but it withstood their initial barrage, letting out a triumphant croak at the damage it had wrought. The two paralyzed celestials were dragged back by their fellows, of whom only a little over a dozen remained.

Arun rallied Umbar, Beorna, and Lok, and led a charge toward the hezrou's perch. Unfortunately, their rush coincided with the completion of a vrock dance of ruin high above, and a twisting storm of unholy energy slammed down into them, inflicting heavy damage.

The blast failed to extend back into the cavern, where most of the rest of the defenders were gathered, but the hound archon that had rushed the left flank had been caught in the open, and was scorched into a blackened heap.

The hezrou cackled and hit the beleaguered dwarves with a chaos hammer, but all of them were able to resist the worst effects of the blast. Its glee evaporated as Dannel shifted his aim upon it and unleashed a rapid-fire barrage of arrows that slammed hard into its body. It took the first hit with a grunt, then the second, and a third, and finally a fourth that caused it to stagger back, slipping on the edge of the parapet. It hung there for a moment, off-balance, before a fifth arrow punched square into its chest, and it toppled over backward off the wall.

The respite was only temporary, as a meaty arm appeared over the edge of the wall to the right, followed by a trio of babaus that leapt up, hissing as they reached the edge of the antipathy effect and came to a halt. A second goristo drew itself up to the left, but it too could not advance against the power of the Warder.

The dwarves marked both foes, but before they could respond to the new threat, Beorna lifted her sword and shouted a warning. The combined forces of the garrison saw the huge figure of the hordeling Nax rise up over the wall, its wings beating furiously as it fought for more altitude. Another babau fell from the frame it clutched in its hind legs, but that still left nearly twelve others dangling from the crude conveyance. A few arrows flew out at the creature, but there were mere pinpricks as it lurched forward, swinging the lower half of its body forward, launching the construct and its passengers up over the battlements. One babau was run through by an iron rod as the contraption came apart from the impact, and the others screamed as the golden light from the Warder spread across them. One called upon an aura of darkness that shrouded them, but that did not protect them from the potent antipathy generated by the statue.

Nax, meanwhile, seemed content to hover in mid-air, perhaps kept at bay by the antipathy effect. Dannel shot it in the meat of its left bicep with a shot that had to hurt, but the creature merely roared, fixing all of the defenders with a contemptuous stare.

“What’s he doing?” Abrigen asked. Both of the half-celestial avariel had depleted their supply of arrows, but Dannel paused to toss the nearer of the two his reserve quiver, before returning to his own barrage.

Cal, shrouded within greater invisibility just a few paces from the elves, was thinking the same thing. A dark suspicion clouded his mind. The power granted to him by the god Azuth came to him without conscious thought, and although none of the mortals could see it, his eyes began to glow with a soft blue radiance as his sight extended deep into the realm governed by the Weave.

It did not take him long to see what he’d been looking for. But even as he tried to shout a warning, he knew it was too late. Within the web of glamer that hovered directly behind and slightly above the stationary hordeling, a powerful evocation was taking form. The spell materialized as a stream of intense, concentrated sonic energy that disrupted the air around it as it streaked over Nax’s shoulder, blasted across the cavern, and impacted the solid form of the Warder.

Chapter 569

Sound filled Cal's ears, the unleashed vibrations stabbing through his joints as he staggered back. In addition to the full force of the blast, which had impacted the chest of the statue, secondary detonations were erupting throughout the cavern. A hound archon simply exploded as the sonic pulse hit him, while Abrigen was flung backward, knocked unconscious as a blast erupted at his feet. Cal himself was fortunate, as the nearby door to the open tunnel beside him partially shielded him from being hit by the full force of the evocation. Even so, he felt a painful ringing in his skull, and could feel a thin trickle of blood draining down from his nostrils.

Sonics, he thought, grimly. Clever. A regular chain lightning would have had no effect on the celestial defenders, he knew, and a skilled caster could easily direct the blast to avoid any allies in the area of effect.

Of more concern was the effect upon the Warder. Cal could see a wide crack across its chest where the sonic blast had hit it, but the golden glow emanating from it seemed to be steady, for now.

Well. No time for half measures, then.

Cal immediately grabbed his rod, but almost at once reconsidered. While a disintegrate could take out the enemy caster, his arcane sight could not pierce the spellcaster's greater invisibility, only give him a general idea of where he was. Given also that he was partially shielded by the huge hordeling, the chances of a successful hit were balanced slightly against him.

Dannel took careful aim and fired off a seeker arrow, the empowered shaft slicing just over the hordeling's left ear before it suddenly stopped hard in a point in space. That shot decided him; Cal knew that one arrow would not do the job, and that it was likely that none of the defenders had the ability to see invisible objects, at least not with augmentative magic.

His greater dispel had the desired effect, ripping away the hidden spellcaster's magic. Their enemy was revealed as a youthful human, perhaps in his early twenties, with fair skin and fiery red hair pulled tight around his scalp, down into a braid that drifted behind him as he flew. He was clad in a skirt of silvery metal scales that flowed upward over his body as he became visible, reforming until it shrouded his torso and neck. Cal's spell had clearly not been either accurate enough or powerful enough to completely sunder the youth's magical wards; the gnome could identify a field of death armor and a shield spell about him, in addition to whatever spell or item gave him the power of flight. An arrow jutted from his hip, although it did not look to have penetrated far through the protective armor.

The youth sneered, and fired off a second chained sonic.

The spell was just as destructive this time, and Cal was expecting it this time, dodging back again behind the cover of the door a split instant before the full force of the secondary blasts hit him. For the celestials, however, the second sequence of blasts was absolutely devastating. Abrigen had barely gotten back up before a burst exploded just over his left eye, knocking him back to the ground with a rough finality. Callendes fell, dead or unconscious, and Dannel avoided a similar fate only by leaping back into the relative shelter of the passageway behind him. The other celestial defenders lacked that avenue of escape, however. Only a handful of the original garrison were left standing; one of the warden archons stood over the blasted body of its fellow, and a chiseled hound archon bearing a flaming greatsword tried to help a crippled equinal guardinal that lay thrashing on the stone floor of the cavern, bright blood pouring in torrents from its ears and nostrils. The lesser archons, lanterns and hounds for the most part, were all down or obliterated, and those few aasimars, guardinals, and inevitables that had joined them had likewise fallen.

The dwarves, along with Lok, found themselves in a no-man's-land between the deadly sonic explosions and the line of demons repulsed by the power of the Warder. The four of them had not been caught in the eruption of secondary blasts from Malad's spells, but they were far from intact. In addition to the devastating blast of a vrock dance of ruin, they'd been hit with a number of chaos hammers, unholy blights, and the damage feedback from jovoc auras of retribution. Demons continued to land around them, hurled over the battlements by spell, mechanism, or host carrier, and while few landed in any shape to offer effective challenge to the four companions, they just kept on coming.

"We have to take him out!" Arun urged, pointing up at the comparatively little figure darting around behind the hovering hordeling. Umbar tried to follow the paladin's command, summoning a flame strike that came cascading down to engulf both the sorcerer and the hordeling. But while Nax's shriek indicated that the blast had at least inflicted some damage upon it, the flames cleared to reveal both foes holding their position, relatively intact.

Malad spared a contemptuous glance for the dwarf cleric, but it was clear where his focus lay, as he lifted his gaze again at the far side of the cavern, and the statue which continued to defy him. Nax seemed more upset, and actually started to turn toward Umbar and the others, but the sorcerer stopped him with a harsh command in Abyssal.

Cal knew that another blast would be coming, and another, and again until the Warder was destroyed. For all the power in that rough-hewn representation of a warrior, it was still just stone, and could only take so much abuse. And it was the only thing holding back the demonic horde, at this point.

Even now, Cal could see that the power of the Warder was beginning to falter. A goristo surged forward against the golden aura, the ground shaking beneath it as it stomped toward the battered quartet at the forefront of the rapidly collapsing defensive line. Arun did not wait, charging forward to meet it, his blessed warhammer held high above his head. The fiend swung a huge claw around to greet him, but Arun just raised his shield and took the strike hard, barely slowing as he came in under its reach and brought the hammer up in a powerful arc that drove solidly into the center of its pelvis. The demon let out a colossal roar and fell upon the paladin with an incredible series of attacks, laying into him with claw and horn and bite, hitting with such intensity that a blow from its claw that glanced off his shield struck the ground hard enough to open foot-wide cracks in the solid stone.

The goristo was among the strongest among the demonkind, yet somehow Arun Goldenshield held before that onslaught, even as his plate armor buckled beneath the titanic force of those impacts. The demon roared in anger and lifted both hands to smite the defiant knight of Good that defied it. But Arun did not give it a chance to unleash its attack. The paladin's hammer swung from the left, and then back again from the right, the two blows coming so quickly that the head of the weapon was a soft golden blur. The goristo staggered beneath the force of those hits, and as its head sagged, the hammer came up in a precise arc that culminated in the center of its skull. A loud thunderclap momentarily silenced the gathered foes, and then the demon tottered backward, landing hard and splaying out upon the ground, stone dead.

"Who's next?" the paladin spat, flecks of blood spraying out from his broken lips.

Cal knew that another chained sonic would utterly overwhelm them. But even though the sorcerer was now visible, he certainly didn't have an easy shot, especially with the hordeling still providing good cover in front of him. But they were running out of good options.

Cal lifted his wand, and fired off an empowered disintegrate.

For an instant, it looked like a dead-on shot. But then, at the last instant, the hordeling shifted slightly in its flight, as if prodded slightly by the wind, and its head slid into the path of the beam.

The green ray blasted away a swath of flesh, starting from the creature's left ear, and then passing along its head until it met the creature's eye. The eye, the surrounding socket, and a part of the skull beneath simply vaporized, transforming the hordeling's already fearsome visage into a true monstrosity.

Nax screamed, a primal sound of pure agony that was torn from its gut. Blood seeped from severed vessels that had been whole an instant previous, and an ugly gray mass was visible through the gap, almost a foot across, in its skull.

And yet somehow, the creature lived.

But any commitment that the hordeling had possessed to its mission evaporated. Its wings pulsing off-beat, the demon collapsed backward from its position above the wall, diving back into the open air of the canyon. For a moment it looked as though its flight would end in a doomed crash into the demonic horde, but a black shape rippled up its back and covered the terrible wound, and the creature seemed to regain enough control to manage an erratic but controlled flight from this place of ruin and destruction.

Malad, separated from his fiendish shield, hovered there in mid-air, and Cal knew that another evocation was coming. But a faint hiss from the adjacent corridor announced that Dannel was not out of the fray; in fact, the elf had been waiting for this moment to resume his assault. His arrows flew with pinpoint precision at his target, punching through the tiefling sorcerer's shield and the sentient armor he wore, piercing deep into his torso. He managed only two hits before the sorcerer recovered enough to slide back, with the third shot glancing off of the magical ward to fall uselessly into the canyon below.

But Malad, while possessed of a certain durability hard-won in the trenches of the Blood War, was not a front-rank fighter. The sorcerer spun and dropped, avoiding a fourth arrow that knifed narrowly over his head. In the instant before he fell below the level of the battlements, however, he smiled maliciously, and hurled his hand forward, launching a sonically-substituted fireball directly into the core of the cavern. The missile—a tiny flare of intensely concentrated energy—streaked inches above the heads of the dwarves, over the corpses of the dead celestials, and straight into the legs of the statue, where it exploded in a rush of pure sound.

Cal was blasted back by that impact, and he felt a fresh surge of pain envelop him. But even through that rush of power, he heard another noise that sent a true stab of dread through him.

Stone, cracking, giving way to a loud clatter of falling rock.

Chapter 570

The demons that had been cowering among the massive stone teeth of the battlements surged forward, eager for blood as the antipathy aura of the Warder collapsed along with the statue. With the defense of the Bastion in utter disarray, there was little standing in their way.

But that little included four in particular who were not going to do down without a fight.

Arun, Lok, Beorna, and Umbar met the first wave of charging demons, holding their ground, and for the first few seconds it was the latter who gave way, collapsing backwards to flail out the last instants of their lives upon the cold stone. Arun's hammer crashed left and right like the regular workings of a machine, and with each blow, a demon was crushed. Lok's sonic axe let out its thunder only occasionally, as the genasi scored a critical hit, but even the lesser blows left demons deeply gashed, or sent a limb flying. Beorna, calling upon the power of Helm, slew fiends with grim abandon, while Umbar swelled with righteous might, becoming a giant who crushed lesser fiends beneath his boot.

Yet even those incredible four could not hold long against the onslaught, and were soon falling back. Of all things it was a dretch that brought Lok low, seizing the genasi's ankle even as it died, putting him off balance for just a fraction of a second. That tiny interval was just enough to keep him from dodging out of the charging rush of a goristo, which slammed a heavy fist into the warrior's face. Lok, already beaten, battered, blasted by fiendish energies, crumpled. Arun quickly stepped in to defend the fallen genasi, slamming the goristo with a series of powerful blows that forced it to turn aside and engage him.

A babau leapt at the paladin's unprotected back, but Beorna was there to meet it, cleaving it in half with a single powerful blow of her sword. But the assault cost her as well, as the adamantine blade, too heavily damaged by the many engagements with the acidic slime covering those demons, snapped off just above the hilt as she completed her stroke.

She barely had time to draw her dagger before a pair of demons, a jovoc and a slaving rutterkin, were upon her.

Umbar's greater size made him a prime target for arial demons, including a quartet of vrock that dove eagerly at him, too impatient to continue their assignment of shuttling demons from the canyon floor to atop the battlements. The cleric held his ground, using his enhanced reach to smite the first demon with a two-handed blow with his axiomatic hammer. The vrock was knocked roughly backward, stunned by the force of the blow, and the other three quickly became much more wary, circling above as they summoned mirror images.

Cal pulled himself up, shaking his head in an attempt to clear it of the ringing that seemed to have taken up permanent residence inside his skull. One glance at the ruins of the Warder—now just broken stone, with nothing remaining above the statue's knees—and at the onrushing demonic horde, was enough to reveal the tactical impossibility of their position.

"Fall back!" he shouted. "To the tunnel!" There was little chance they could hold, but at least the corridor offered a fairly defensible position.

A rumbling announced the approach of another goristo, which loomed large as it charged straight for him, picking up speed as it came. Behind it was a small cluster of demons, babau, jovocs, rutterkin, and dretch, surging forward eager for blood. Cal saw that the demons would reach the entrance long before the dwarves and Lok, even if his friends could instantly disengage and fall back.

"And so here we are, my friend," came a voice from beside him. Cal looked up to see Dannel, an arrow fitted to his bow. Behind him, the hound archon with the burning sword lay the unconscious Callendes gently upon the stone, before taking up his blade, and coming forward to stand before the two mortals.

The only other celestial still standing, the second warden archon, came barreling into the scene, letting out a guttural roar as its charge intersected that of the onrushing goristo. The bear-like creature was clearly seriously hurt, with one arm dangling uselessly at its side, but the sheer ferocity of its attack unbalanced the larger demon, with both falling to the side, rolling over each other as they struggled for an advantage. The hound archon tried to rush to its aid, but it was forced to defend itself against a pair of leaping babau. One dug a gash in the archon's side with a sweep of its claws, but it quickly fell, an arrow jutting from its skull, while the second had barely lifted its own claws to attack before the archon took its head off with a powerful two-handed sweep of its blade.

More demons came rushing forward, but several of them were distracted by a diving phalanx of winged men, shining sword archons. The archons split and dove in a sweeping arc around the onrushing demons, drawing off several, including two of the three vrock hovering around Umbar. The archons refused engagement, instead flying furiously just ahead of the pursuing demons, both the vrock and those afoot. By the time one actually got ahold of one, its claws passing harmlessly through the insubstantial fabric of the creature, Cal's illusion had done its work, buying a few precious moments of time.

“Take him!” Arun commanded, spinning to crush a charging rutterkin even as his second goristo fell with a loud crash to the ground. Umbar turned from the vrock he’d been fighting to lift the unconscious Lok with his free hand, using the other with the hammer to keep the vulture-demon at bay. Beorna, holding off her own attackers mostly by virtue of her heavy armor and the considerable resistances granted her by her templar status, took up Lok’s dropped axe, and used it to kill the babau threatening her. The axe smoked, but fortunately held together against the caustic acid covering the creature. She avoided attacking the jovoc, which could only scratch uselessly at her armor. Still, as she turned to cover Umbar’s back as he retreated, she spared it a quick kick that sent it flying. She felt a brief stabbing pain in her shoulder as her boot connected, but she judged it worth the cost as the little black demon splayed out on the stone, momentarily stunned.

The dwarves fell back, the demons threatening them with every step, but wary of the devastating attacks of Arun and Beorna. Cal aided them with a haste spell. Dannel kept up a steady barrage of arrows, dropping demons as they closed to leap upon his companions. The hound archon tried to move to the assistance of the embattled warden archon, ignoring a handful of dretch that tried unsuccessfully to block him. But before he could reach the celestial, the goristo pulled itself up, and seized its smaller foe in both meaty claws. The bear demon still fought on, smashing the bull-demon across the face with its fist. The goristo roared in fury, and lifted the struggling celestial above its head, likely intending to smash it upon the stone at its feet. But before it could finish its foe, the hound archon Avellos leapt in, drawing his blazing sword across the demon’s gut. The archon’s blessed nature empowered its weapon, allowing it to penetrate the demon’s foul resistances, and a great gout of black ichor erupted from the wound, a gash three feet across from which its entrails bulged sick and bloated.

The goristo staggered and dropped its victim, which fell awkwardly to the ground, still dazed from the beating it had taken. Dretch and a rutterkin bearing a dire axe set upon both celestials, but Avellos ignored all, grabbing the injured celestial by the shoulder and drawing it up, using his own strength to bolster the ailing warden. He paid for that, as demons cut into his muscled body, the rutterkin tearing a bloody wound in the archon’s swordarm before the distracted celestial could counter.

And then the goristo reared up, furious and eager for revenge. Eschewing any subtlety, it lowered its head and barreled forward toward them, crushing a dretch that was too slow to get out of its way.

The warden archon tried to pull away from the hound, but it could not stand on its own. Avellos lifted his sword in salute, and took up a ready position.

Arrows slid past the hound archon, whistling mere inches past its ragged and bloodied fur on their way to the charging goristo. One slammed into its shoulder, followed by a second that grazed its left eye, opening the bulb in a gush of white fluid. The demon, now critically wounded, did not falter in its charge, and even as the flaming sword of Avellos slammed down into it, it crushed the archon’s chest with the bony ridge of its forehead, knocking the valiant celestial backward a full fifteen feet, landing half-conscious upon the stone floor of the cavern. The goristo staggered forward and then fell, stumbling as the warden archon seized its ankle in passing. It tried to get up, but another arrow buried itself to the feathers in its throat, and it finally collapsed in a gurgle of blood as it drowned on its own fluids.

The dretch had been scattered by their huge cousin's assault, but the rutterkin now came forward eagerly, lifting its heavy and awkward weapon to deliver a finishing blow to the helpless warden archon. Focused on its prey, it never saw the hulking shadow that loomed over it, or the hammer that came crushing down into its body, knocking it aside like a discarded rag doll.

The dretch cowered as Umbar shifted the unconscious Lok over his shoulder, then bent to tuck the crippled celestial under his arm. Even with his strength augmented by the righteous might of Moradin, the burden of carrying both was almost too much for him, and he struggled with the weight as he made his way back toward the relative safety of the tunnel entrance. A vrock dove down toward him, but within a range of two seconds it was hit by both an arrow and a ray of searing light from Beorna, convincing it to pause long enough to summon mirror images.

With the shielding aura of the Warder gone, demons continued to surge over the battlements of the Bastion. Another two goristo climbers cleared the barrier, loaded down so heavily with passenger demons that they'd been slowed to a crawl in their ascent. As the huge demons struggled over the barrier, babaus that had clung to the larger demons for the ride up leapt off and rushed eagerly forward. Vrocks flew over, each dumping a few smaller demons on the stone; a few returned for additional passengers, but most, sensing that the battle was coming to an end, screeched and surged forward to join the attack. Dretch, rutterkin, babau, bar-igura, and jovocs, along with the occasional hordeling or fiendish creature, continued to land atop the wall, hurled by the trebuchet, the reverse gravity surge of the glabrezu, or even by simple virtue of having climbed the sheer face of the Bastion's shield wall. Most of those arrived in disarray, especially those flung by the trebuchet, and more than a few were killed by the impact of their arrival. But that still left dozens to press the attack. Three gaseous plumes slid through the crenels and took on solid shape; hezrou demons, eager to be in on the kill. Over it all flew a pair of chasmes, their hatred evenly divided between their celestial enemies and the other demons, which they despised.

Only one thing united this discordant, chaotic horde: a lust for the destruction of their enemies. Thus motivated, the demons surged forward in a wave, running, leaping, flying, and even crawling forward to the attack.

With their allies almost entirely wiped out, and their own strength depleted, already battered and exhausted, it was the companions from Faerûn upon which this Abyssal tide descended.

Chapter 571

The wave of demons crashed into the defenders hard. Arun and Beorna were at the forefront, and they were nearly overwhelmed by at least two dozen demons, mostly the smaller and weaker sort, but no less ferocious for it. The babaus in particular were cunning, setting up for sneak attacks, moving around their fellows to gain flanking positions. A bar-igura leapt over the two dwarves and tried to assail the weakened and incapacitated foes in the second rank, but was momentarily held at bay by Dannel, who fired two shots into it at point-blank range, before ducking back out of its reach.

Umbar's oversized form shimmered and shrank back to its normal size, his righteous might cancelled by a miscellaneous dispel from within the demonic press. He saw Dannel pressed, but paused long enough to put down his two burdens, and to channel a heal spell into Lok. The hound archon Avellos had regained consciousness, but could barely hold his sword, let alone rush back into the fray. The celestial tried to revive the crippled warden archon, using an aid spell to bring the battered warrior around.

A loud crashing noise announced the arrival of the goristos, accompanied by the shriek of a half-dozen diving vrocks, the leaping hezrous, and at least a score of other demons.

It would have ended right there; even with the power that the companions had accumulated, they had taken too much of a beating to hold out against such overwhelming odds.

A clarion command issued from the passageway, and a grid of bright blue energy appeared that filled a perfect cube before the great doors. The unleashed power of order's wrath tore into the demons, slaying the lesser breeds, and briefly dazing the stronger. Several vrocks caromed off the cavern ceiling as their dives went off course, and they fell into the mass of demons below, causing more confusion.

A goristo that managed to shake off the power of the blast surged forward, intent on simply overrunning the defenders. But another figure emerged from the tunnel, a tall, scarred figure with black wings, holding a silver bastard sword that shone with a bright inner light. Saureya met the demon's charge, driving the sword named Aludrial's Shard into the fiend, darting nimbly under the powerful but clumsy swing of its claws. The sword erupted with holy power as it smote the demon, and it staggered back, staring down at the smoking hole in its chest.

Saureya looked back over his shoulder at the companions. "Back! Now!" he shouted, his voice full of the tenor of command.

The companions needed no additional urging. The demons were already coming forward again, those recovering from the dazing effects of the wrath joined by newcomers that had not been affected by it. Saureya held his ground for a few seconds, slaying fiends with the blessed sword. None could stand before him; for a moment it was as though the fallen deva and the blade were one, a storm of silver that formed a weave through which the demons could not pass.

But the companions knew that was only an illusion, one confirmed as Saureya was hit by a rapid-fire barrage of spells and other attacks. Two unholy blights enveloped him, and a pair of vrocks and a babau fell upon him, tearing at him with their claws. The injured goristo, followed by its companion, now recovered from its daze, lurched in as well, and while the gleaming sword took off one demonic limb at the elbow, a second tore long gashes in the angel's chest, driving him back.

“Saureya!” Arun urged, from the doorway. The others had fallen back, bringing with them Callendes, Avellos, and the injured warden archon. Lok, restored to health by Umbar’s magic, stood beside the paladin, holding his backup axe in a ready stance.

The Herald’s Voice started forward to join his master, but Saureya, as if sensing the sword archon’s intent, shot him a gaze that froze him in place. The deva smiled to himself, ignoring the demons tearing at his limbs. He rose up in the air, and spun, the Shard cleaving one of the goristos across the face, shattering its skull and driving back into the bodies of the lesser demons behind. Only then did the deva fall back, swooping into the corridor.

The demons were right behind him. The quickest found their way blocked by Arun and Lok, who laid into them with devastating effect. Then the deva turned, and conjured a blade barrier that filled the entry. Lok and Arun, surprised, staggered back just in time to avoid being caught by the blades. The charging demons were less fortunate, and a half-dozen were sliced to ribbons before they could arrest their rush.

“Through the tunnel, swiftly!” Saureya urged. “That will not hold them...” And indeed, the air around the blades rippled, as multiple dispels hit the magical barrier.

The tunnel was about thirty feet long, a cylinder that appeared to be simply blasted through the surrounding rock. Gouges lined the walls and ceiling, dark shadows that might have been irregularities in the construction, or part of the defenses. At the far end stood a pair of doors that were clearly built to last; three feet of stone covered in bronze plates several inches thick, set into the surrounding threshold on massive stone pivots recessed deep into the lintel. The doors were only narrowly open, and the companions headed for that opening now, and the safety it promised.

Saureya drifted behind Lok and Arun, bringing up the rear of their retreat. They’d barely made it halfway down the passage when the blades abruptly vanished, replaced by a wall of demons that surged after them. A chaos hammer exploded around them, but all of them resisted being slowed by the blast.

“Go!” Saureya urged the warriors, turning to meet a bar-Igura’s hop, the demon’s arms spread to swallow the deva up in its embrace. Aludrial’s Shard danced, and the demon fell, its left arm gone up to the shoulder. A vrock came up instantly on its heels, and Saureya gave it the same treatment, cutting into its body with a deep gash. It shrieked, but the deva was not affected by the stunning effect of that cry.

“Saureya, come on!” Arun shouted, holding position at the doors.

The deva glanced over his shoulder, and smiled a cold smile at them. The angel fell back, but slowly, as more and more demons filled the corridor. Even a goristo squeezed into the tunnel, although its bulk barely fit into the passageway. Behind it, over a hundred demons queued up to be next.

A babau leapt onto the deva’s back, tearing with its long claws. Arun started forward at once, but the deva stopped him with an outstretched hand. Ignoring the fiend, the fallen angel fluttered to the ground, where several demons immediately seized hold of him.

“Saureya!” Arun cried. He would have gone forward regardless of the angel’s orders, but several demons had slipped past the deva, and were now rushing toward him, and the door beyond. He lifted his hammer, ready to defend himself.

Saureya’s head came up. The deva smiled again, and this time there was something grim in that look, even without the gashes that marred the creature’s face. A babau tried to claw his eyes out, but even as it tore long red lines across his skull, Saureya’s eyes flashed with something unfathomable to the paladin.

“Neya!” he shouted, a command in Celestial that sounded clearly over the noise of the demonic surge.

Instantly at that call, sprays of liquid exploded out of the narrow slits in the walls and ceiling. Arun flinched as the cold fluid splashed across his face, but it was only water, pure and cleansing.

For him, at least.

The demons screamed as the holy water burned their corrupted flesh, sloughing off flesh and muscles, and even etching the black bones beneath. The demons holding Saureya simply evaporated into ruined hulks, and those behind let out a terrible wail as they tried to get back out. Unfortunately, the goristo was blocking the corridor, and while it tried to back up, splashes of holy water seared its legs and arms, inflicting a terrible agony upon it. A few of the demons tried to squeeze past it, only to be crushed by the larger demon’s struggles against the stone.

Arun lowered his hammer as he looked upon a scene of total carnage. Even with all that he had seen, he felt sick.

Saureya stood, shaking off bits of demonic hide from his body. Covered in blood and bile, his face streaked with garish red lines from his wounds, he walked toward Arun, his face expressionless.

“Come,” he said.

The two passed through the door, which swung ponderously shut, sealing with an iron clang.

Chapter 572

Benzan half-staggered, half-ran through a warped landscape of iron trees and dark shadows. His breath rattled in his chest like a coin in a glass jug, and with each step his stride grew more uncertain, as if his body was just waiting for the right moment to surrender its efforts, and embrace oblivion.

He saw a fallen tree ahead, a long gray log stretching nearly horizontal across the path. Wary, he ducked under it, careful of the razor-sharp edges that pervaded everything in this place. He found a spot bare of dagger-like needles and jagged ridges and paused to recover his breath.

He felt at the crude bandage at his side, and was not surprised to feel a fresh wetness there. He didn't want to look at the wound, worried about what he might see.

He could not stay here. The only thing that had kept him alive thus far was the fact that his adversaries did not work together. He'd seen at least four different demons that he could recognize, but that meant nothing; one babau or vrock looked much the same as another to his eyes. The forest at least offered some modicum of cover, but against demons that could teleport at will across the landscape, no place could be considered safe for even a few seconds.

He didn't know why he kept running; there was no place to go, and he already knew that Graz'zt's citadel was perched on the side of a huge metal cube floating in space, massive but finite. There was no way to get to any of the other cubes he could occasionally see floating in the sky, and short of encountering a convenient planar gate just sitting around unguarded, no way off of this plane, which he now knew to be Acheron.

But even though his body cried for relief, he couldn't just give up; it was not within his nature. The demons would likely capture him again, or maybe just kill him. Benzan was not sure which outcome he preferred.

He clutched the weapon he'd liberated from one of the many battlefields that littered the cubes of Acheron; a rusty shortsword, with a single-edged blade about two feet in length. He still had Yeela's hooked knife, as well, but even though the sword was pitted and probably useless against even a lesser demon's damage resistance, he felt better holding it.

He started to put his hand against the nearby trunk of the fallen tree, but stopped himself. Even a moment's carelessness here could be lethal, he knew.

He was lucky to be alive at all. When he'd looked up at the monstrosity holding the corpse of Kareen, he'd thought that he was dead as well. The retriever had almost casually tossed the ruined body of the succubus aside, then had turned its full attention on the tiefling. One of its multifaceted, colored eyes had focused on him...

Benzan shuddered at the memory. He'd thrown himself aside a split second before the fiery beam had raked the stone where he'd fallen. The beam tracked him, but instead of intersecting with his defenseless flesh, it had struck the winch mechanism that had continued its slow lifting of the twin portcullises. Benzan had just kept on running, hadn't looked back even as he'd heard the Abyssal construct drop to the ground and follow him.

Maybe he'd been due some luck. In any case, he'd heard rather than seen the winch give way, and even before he saw the second portcullis falling toward him, he leapt forward and dove. The noise that had followed was cataclysmic, and he'd finally turned around to see the retriever pinned under the first portcullis, the black iron spikes piercing its body across the line of its torso. Its limbs flailed against the surrounding walls, but it could not get enough leverage to lift itself free.

For some reason, he'd stood there dumbly, watching it. The mistake in that was brought home an instant later as a blast of electrical energy shot from one of the construct's eyes, twisting through the second portcullis directly at him. He'd thrown himself to the side, avoiding the worst of the blast, but he'd landed on a rock with a sharp protrusion, which had pierced his side and left him with the oozing wound that continued to seep the life out of him.

But there had been no time to ponder the rude twists of his fate. Leaving the retriever to thrash against its prison, he'd run fast and far. The demons had started appearing right after he'd reached the borders of the iron forest, and since then they'd been everywhere, teleporting through the sky and through the woods in search of him. So far he'd managed to stay a pace ahead of his pursuers, but he knew that he would not be able to keep it up for much longer. His body was worn down, even without his wounds. Kireen had not offered him food or drink when she'd released him, and there was no apparent source of either in this place. Nor was there any sign of the succubus's mysterious contact, although Benzan would have been leery of pursuing him, her, or it even if it came down to it being his only option out of this place.

A sizzling noise cut through his musings like a knife, and he immediately ducked down low behind his rough shelter. He heard rather than saw the demon, and waited only until he could confirm that it was not moving toward him before he crouched low and quickly slipped off in the other direction.

He went about another fifty yards further before the path he was following opened onto a clearing, maybe twenty paces across. A metal spire with numerous spear-like branches rose up in the center, decorated by a fringe of rusted armor, assorted bones, and broken weapons lying around its base. The outer ring of the clearing was marked by over a dozen of the smaller metal trees, forming a dense and hazardous web for the traveler.

Benzan spotted what looked like another trail, and headed immediately in that direction. He didn't get more than a few steps, however, before another sizzling noise drew his attention up. When he saw the source of the sound, his heart froze in his chest.

The babau demon looked down at him from its perch atop the spire, and twisted its ugly features into an evil smile.

Chapter 573

Benzan hurled himself aside as the babau leapt at him, its long claws extended. He felt a rush of pain a moment before he hit the ground, his momentum carrying him forward into a roll that brought him up a few feet away, trailing blood from a trio of shallow gashes in his left side.

The babau seemed to be in no hurry, taking enjoyment in the dire situation that the tiefling faced. Benzan held his sword up between them, but the demon only cackled, feinting with a claw, sniggering as its foe staggered back.

“All right then, let’s dance, you bastard,” Benzan said, leaping to the attack.

The demon lunged, but Benzan dodged under its claw, sweeping past it, slamming his sword up into its side as he slipped past. The blade hit with a solid thunk, but instead of cutting the babau’s rubbery flesh, the ancient abused metal hissed at it hit the acidic slime coating the demon. Even as Benzan tried to reverse his grip and bring the weapon back down for a backstab, the weapon snapped off just above the hilt. He fell back, but too slow to fully avoid a raking sweep of its claws as it twisted rapidly around. One claw caught on his forehead just above his right eye, tearing a vicious gash that left blood pouring down one side of his face, partially blinding him.

Benzan shifted to focus his good eye on the demon, and tossed down the broken and useless sword, drawing out the hooked knife that was his only remaining weapon.

Except for his wits, perhaps.

The demon came at him, slowly, its casual pace driven less by caution of his defenses than a desire to drink in his foe’s despair. Benzan gave ground, and led his enemy around the pillar in the center of the clearing, avoiding getting close enough to risk getting cut on the jagged edges of the branches that jutted out from the central spire.

The demon danced with him, teasing him with feinting sweeps of its claws. It too avoided getting too close to the spire, wary of exposing itself to a bull rush that could potentially impale it upon the spines.

The two combatants did a full circuit around the spire before the babau seemed to grow weary of its sport. As Benzan dodged another feint, the demon abandoned all pretense of caution, leaping at him in a rapid rush. Benzan leapt to the side, but the demon pressed him, driving him away from the pillar, out into the clearing. It had not chosen the timing of its rush idly; the area it pushed Benzan toward was marked by a surrounding ring of iron bushes and bent trees that erupted with a spiky maze of low-hanging branches, with no trail openings visible for at least a quarter-circuit around the edge of the clearing.

The tiefling realized that he was trapped, and he held his ground, holding his weapon in both hands, ready for a last desperate defense.

The babau fell into a crouch, and leapt, arms outstretched to counter any attempt by its prey to slip past it again.

But Benzan did not try to evade. Rather, he too leapt forward, if only slightly, and as he came down he slid his feet out from under him, coming down onto his back with a jarring impact. The babau drew its claws in to seize the fallen tiefling, its jaws opening wide to deliver a deadly bite with its landing. The demon came down right on top of him, and for a moment it looked as though Benzan’s maneuver had been suicide, leaving him open to the full fury of his foe.

But as the babau reached the apex of its leap and descended upon him, Benzan kicked up with both feet, catching the demon on its chest with both heels. The babau’s claws tore into his arms, but before it could get a good grip on him, he used its own momentum and kicked upward, flipping the demon up over his head. A terrible scream filled the clearing, and he struggled to his feet to see the babau impaled on one of the bushes, hanging upside down with its head a few scant inches above the ground. The demon's arms and legs thrashed as it tried to break free, but its violent moves only dug the sharp spines deeper into its body. Two long branches had pierced it entirely, jutting from its left side and right forearm, covered in black ichor, hissing as the babau's caustic gel seared the exposed metal.

Benzan didn't linger to taunt the creature or attempt to finish it off; he doubted that the bush would hold it long, and he likewise questioned his ability to harm it with the pathetic weapon he still had. Even as the babau continued to struggle to free itself, he was off and running, choosing the nearest trail opening that was opposite the one through which he'd entered the clearing. He had no idea where he was going, and knew that his reprieve was still probably only temporary, but there was no other choice, short of surrendering himself to his enemies.

And that he could not do.

The demon's cries of anger and pain faded behind him as he ran onward through the metal forest. Several times he heard echoing cries from the surrounding maze, and once something big passed above, the flapping of wings audible though the tangled thicket of branches that blocked out the sky above him. Fortunately whatever it was didn't appear to have detected him, and he only saw a dark shadow pass over before it was gone.

The battle with the babau had lent him a burst of adrenaline, but it had also added new wounds to his tally. He tried to clear the blood from his face with another piece of cloth torn from his garment, but ultimately had to give it up. His right eye was gummed up with blood, and the best he could do was wind a strip of fabric around his head, covering the new wound with a temporary bandage. His side began to throb too, both the older wound and the new scratches torn by the babau.

He knew that he was reaching the end of his strength, but he tightened his grip on the knife, and kept going.

Finally, he saw another open space ahead, but as he reached it, stepping out of the dense forest to see the open sky again, his heart sank.

This new clearing culminated a mere twenty feet away in a jagged cliff, a solid gray wall that rose up out of the forest to block his way. The cliff was only about thirty feet high, and would have been a trivial obstacle back on Faerûn, were he traveling with his friends and his usual gear. But here, it may as well have been a mile tall. Even with only one eye he could see the jagged edges that were no doubt razor-sharp, waiting for the foolish climber to attempt a summit.

A noise brought him around; creatures, approaching swiftly through the forest.

He looked for another trail, a path along the cliff to either direction, but the spiny brush grew right up to the base of the barrier, forming a dense and impenetrable thicket. He might have been able to make it past, had he been wearing full plate and helm, but even then it would have been a dicey attempt.

He fell back toward the cliff as the noise of pursuit grew stronger.

Once they saw that they had him, the demons slowed, and they came almost leisurely into the clearing. There were three of them; a thick-bodied bar-igura, some sort of fiendish hound that regarded him with intelligence in its eyes, and finally another succubus, clad in a cuirass of red iron that flowed suggestively around her lithe figure. She carried a whip, which sparkled with occasional surges of evil red energy.

“You led us on quite a merry chase, little precious,” the succubus said. “I always did think that Yeela took it easy on you; I always said that you could withstand more arduous treatment and still... persist. Now we’ll get to see if I was right.”

She flicked her wrist and the whip uncoiled, its barbed head dropping to the ground as she gestured subtly, and the bar-igura and the hound-demon came forward around her, malice shining in their eyes.

Chapter 574

The mood in the small room was thick with a tangible sense of dread, as cold as the bare stone of the walls and the rough slab table that dominated most of the space.

The companions sat wearily in their seats, sagging under the weight of defeat and exhaustion. At least they were clean, for the most part, although the smell of demons and blood still clung to them persistently like a second skin.

All of them were there, but there wasn’t any idle conversation. It was as if none of them wanted to add reality to the dire circumstances they faced by talking about it. Even Mole looked subdued, as she sat playing with something in her lap that she’d fished out of her bag of holding.

When Saureya entered the room, however, the Herald’s Voice trailing behind him like a shadow, the mood quickly shifted. Perhaps the deva was just a convenient focus for the anger and frustration in the room, or maybe it was the cold look with which he regarded all of them, his eyes a void that somehow fueled the hot passions felt by the others.

Beorna slapped her palm down on the table, as she half rose out of her chair. “Did you have some other obligation that kept you while your forces were being slaughtered? Your presence on the wall would have been... useful. Not that you ever expected us to hold the line.”

The dwarf’s attack did not alter the deva’s calm façade. “A general does not lead from the front line,” he said.

Umbar took up the attack. “General? Is that what you are calling yourself now, Fallen? Some commander, to let himself be shoved back into a corner, to await slaughter...”

“Friends,” Arun said, silencing both of his companions with a raised hand. “This serves no purpose. We knew the danger, when we agreed to come here.” Umbar nodded, deferring to the Chosen, and while the templar’s expression demonstrated clearly her feelings on the issue, she too fell back into her chair with a loud clank of her armor. Arun turned back to Saureya. “What news?”

“The demons have realized that a frontal assault upon the main doors is fruitless. They are tunneling through the rock. It’s only a matter of hours, now.”

“Is there another way out?” Dannel asked.

“No. Beyond the few tunnels that burrow beneath the Bastion, there is only an expanse of dense rock, and then, the void. The boundaries of this place are absolute to one not able to shift between planes. This bolt-hole in which we reside, the Deepest Hold, is the final place on Occipitus not overrun by Graz’zt’s legions. And soon it too, will fall before the inevitable surge of the Abyss.”

“So what would you have us do, deva? Huddle here and await our doom?” Beorna spat.

“Sometimes, one’s fate cannot be avoided,” the deva said, but as he spoke he looked at Mole, who’s eyes rose to meet his. Something sparkled in those celestial eyes, but his expression did not change. Nor did the dwarves appreciate the sentiment.

“I’ll not wait idly for the headsman’s axe to fall,” Beorna said, while Umbar, at the same instant, said, “Let them in, then, and I’ll send a thousand demons back to the pit before I go.”

“You cannot break the dimensional lock?” Dannel asked Cal. The gnome shook his head. “Even if I had a disjunction, the odds would be long. Graz’zt has sealed the effect to the plane, and only a greater power would have a chance at sundering it, even in a localized area, even temporarily.”

“What of the gods?” Lok asked.

“They will not interfere,” Saureya said with a certainty that could not be breached. “The struggle for the fate of Occipitus will be decided here.”

“Why did we come here again?” Dannel asked nobody in particular.

At that point a general argument broke out, with more recriminations hurled at Saureya, and words thrown back and forth across the table. The deva’s calm replies only seemed to fuel the anger of Beorna and Umbar, and even Arun appeared to grow impatient. Dannel made a comment that Umbar took offense at, and soon there was a four-way quarrel raging around the table. Lok was silent, his head bowed, his eyes shut. And Cal did not engage in the discussion, but rather followed Saureya’s gaze, which kept returning to Mole. The gnome’s eyes fell back to what she held in her lap, and for a moment she just looked sad and forgotten, a child in a gathering of elders.

But only for a moment. She put away her toy, and then sprang up onto the table with a suddenness that momentarily broke off the row, drawing attention to her.

“Seems like there’s only one course of action left to us,” she said.

“Save your breath, gnome,” Umbar said. “I know what you would say, but even if we could sneak out of here, there’s no place left to hide. And I will not slink away from that rabble outside, in any case,” he said, hefting his damaged hammer.”

The gnome put her hands on her hips, looking down at the dwarf cleric with a perturbed look. But Cal said, “Go ahead, Mole. Say what you were going to say.”

“As I was about to, before I was so rudely interrupted. It does seem pretty straightforward, if you ask me. Graz’zt has locked the plane, so nobody can come or go. The demons all follow Graz’zt, and they won’t stop until we’re all dead.”

“So?” Beorna asked. “This we know, Mole.”

A sudden look of realization appeared on Dannel’s face. “You don’t mean...”

Mole cut him off, a smug look on her face. “As I said, one course of action. All we have to do is sneak out of here, past a few thousand demons, make our way across thirty or so miles of demon-infested terrain, and visit the skull one last time. And then, we get inside, find the big boss demon, and kill him. Seems pretty straightforward, actually.”

She folded her arms across her chest in triumph, taking some pleasure in the stunned looks that regarded her from around the table.

Chapter 575

“This is crazy. You know that, don’t you?” Dannel said, checking the dark opening in the rock for the twentieth time.

“The dwarves approved the plan,” Cal said, doing his own check of his magical paraphernalia, including the small bags sewn into his belt that held his spell components. The gnome nodded at the three dwarves, leaning against the wall on the far side of the opening. They held their weapons at the ready, and seemed to almost pulse with anticipation. Beorna, her own weapon broken in the siege of the Bastion, now carried a bright silver bastard sword that seemed to drink in the faint light of the tunnel. Saureya had given her Aludrial’s Shard almost casually, saying that he no longer had need of it. The templar had accepted it with equal aplomb, the gift of the artifact apparently unable to overcome the suspicion that she still obviously bore for the fallen entity.

“That only confirms my point,” the elf said.

“If there were another option...” Cal began.

“Yeah, yeah, I know,” Dannel replied. “While I may not be in your league intellectually—heck, I don’t even think I’m on the same plane as you, intellectually—I have enough smarts to know that your plan is probably the best chance we have. Heck, one in a thousand is better than zero in a thousand, I guess.”

“One in a thousand? I had actually set the odds at about one in four thousand,” Cal said.

The elf looked at the gnome with a wry look, as if trying to gauge whether Cal’s comment was serious. But Cal turned away as they heard the faintest scrape of leather on stone from the adjacent opening.

“Sheesh, I can hear you guys fifty paces away,” Mole said, as she became visible directly before them. Behind her, they could see the slender form of Callendes, his wings folded tight against his back. The half-celestial was very good at moving silently, but Dannel would have bet platinum to copper that the noise they’d heard had come from the avariel’s footsteps, and not Mole’s. “You do know that this part of the plan requires stealth, right?”

“In a few moments, it won’t matter,” Lok said. “Did you find it?”

“Yes, yes, Saureya was right,” the gnome admitted. “They’re close, too; another ten minutes, and this all would have been moot. Is everyone ready?”

“Let’s do it, then?” Beorna said, hefting the Shard in both of her hands.

Everything had been discussed in advance, and there was no need for discussion as the casters quietly and efficiently summoned a few protective wards. Cal had interviewed all of them before, and had offered suggestions on how to maximize their combined abilities. They had worked well in concert in the past, and had fought several desperate battles together already, but each of them knew that the current plan would require flawless execution—accompanied by considerable luck—to even have the slim chances that Cal and Dannel had been discussing.

“Dannel, signal the archons,” Cal said. The elf nodded, falling back a short distance back down the winding, uneven shaft that they’d negotiated to get to this point. “Take us in, Mole,” he said, motioning for the warriors to precede him. They made no noise; the last enchantment summoned by Umbar had been a silence spell, which he focused on a small dirk that the cleric passed to Lok.

Cal saw that Callendes remained close to Mole in the vanguard. Ever since the death of his brother, the avariel had taken on an almost frightening intensity. Cal recognized that the half-celestial was walking a fine line between commitment and insanity, but the fact was that they needed him, needed every resource they could possibly draw upon for this mission. Saureya had agreed to give them whatever they wanted, but he himself would not leave the Bastion. The deva had only a scant handful of surviving celestials left with him, a token force that would barely slow the demons when they broke through into the last few chambers of the fortress interior. If they failed, it would not matter; the fate of those remaining survivors was sealed.

Once the warriors had proceeded far enough for the effects of the silence to pass, Cal followed them. The dark opening gave way onto an uneven shaft that rapidly approached the vertical, but Mole had helpfully strung up a rope to assist their descent. Cal could feel the tension in the line that suggested that his companions were making use of it; the others ahead were barely visible even to his keen eyes. The spell would cover the noise of any of the warriors fumbling with the rock or slipping on the smooth stone, but if one of them lost their grip and fell outside of the range of the effect, then this effort would fail before it had begun. No sense focusing on that, Cal thought; there were any of a thousand ways that things could go wrong, and they'd be better off focused on just dealing with events as they occurred. If someone fell, they'd have to adjust; there was no going back.

But nothing untoward happened, and the shaft suddenly leveled off and bent slightly to the right before culminating in a roughly spherical pocket of open space, a bubble within the mountain. The only exits were tiny cracks and sinkholes too small for even Mole to attempt. It was unlikely they went anywhere; Cal made that deduction by the simple fact that the enemy's hezrou demons would have likely found any possible entry, no matter how small, by means of their ability to assume gaseous form. None of the toad demons had appeared within the fortress, which suggested that Saureya's assurance about the interior of the Bastion being completely sealed was likely accurate.

But that was likely to change, and soon, as the gnome heard a faint scratching sound that seemed to pass through the very rock surrounding them. The demons were digging, tunneling through the mountain itself to get to the last few survivors of the celestial inhabitants of Occipitus. The others, enveloped in the silence radiating from Lok, wouldn't hear it... but that thought was belied as Lok bent for a moment, running his hand along the stone. He looked at Cal, and nodded.

He feels them coming, the gnome thought. The companions exchanged a look. There was no need to share words; all of them knew the plan, knew what they had to do.

They gave Lok some room—but the dwarves did not go far, their weapons held ready—as the genasi crossed to the far side of the cavern. He placed his feet solidly on the uneven ground, and leaned against a slanted plane of rock. He pressed his face against the stone, closing his eyes for a moment. Then he turned back and looked at the others gathered behind him, and nodded.

Everyone tensed.

Lok shifted, and stepped into the stone, vanishing entirely from view.

The companions waited; it could be seconds or minutes now, depending on what Lok found.

They did not have to wait long. Cal barely had time to count ten heartbeats before Lok unleashed another of the powers he commanded, the power of Dumathoin, into the rock. The alien stone of Occipitus obeyed his command, and an opening appeared in the stone, as he shaped it to his will. The area of effect was not great, but Lok had maximized the efficiency of the stone shape by merely weakening rather than removing the stone ahead of him. As the growing portal revealed the genasi, he slammed forward with his whole body, crashing into the seemingly solid stone ahead of him, shattering it into a thousand pieces.

Those fragments collapsed down into the tunnel being dug by the surprised demons, who fell back in disarray. There were over a dozen of the creatures crammed into the narrow space, mostly cowering dretches equipped with leather bags full of stone debris that they were trying to clear from the tunnel. At the forefront, obviously doing most of the work of digging, were a pair of muscled bar-igura, their foreclaws fitted with vicious metal talons, and a warped hordeling, a misshapen thing with a squat, almost headless body armored in bony chitin. Four thick arms sprouted from its body, culminating in huge black claws that apparently tore through rock as efficiently as softer flesh. It clearly hadn't been stinting in its efforts; those claws were bloody, and the thing wheezed terribly with every movement, only hatred—of itself, the demons, the celestials it was ordered to find—driving it onward.

The demons were caught off guard by the sudden development, but Lok didn't hesitate; without waiting for the others, he lifted his axe and leapt forward, landing in the midst of the demons in the crowded tunnel.

Chapter 576

The demons in the first rank of diggers were caught off guard by the sudden appearance of foes among them, but they were quick to respond. The two bar-igura fell upon Lok, trusting in their superior size and weight to simply overbear the genasi, to be torn apart at their leisure.

Unfortunately for them, Lok was far tougher than his size would indicate, and the two ape-demons were repulsed, bouncing off of the warrior. One tried to recoup by grabbing Lok's weapon arm, but Lok shifted his wrist out of its clumsy grasp, and drove the axe solidly into the demon's ugly face. The battle was entirely silent, but no less violent for that.

The hordeling lifted its bludgeon-shaped head slowly, white froth erupting from the gash in its face that formed its mouth. With a painful shake of its body, it extracted itself from the litter of stone that half-buried it and started to shift around to face the enemy behind it. The maneuver was aborted, however, as Arun appeared in the gap opened by Lok just a spare second before. The paladin leapt into the fray much like the genasi, but his course brought him down squarely upon the back of the hordeling. The creature opened its mouth wide and let out a silent screech of displeasure at the sudden burden, but its struggles were cut short as Arun brought his blessed warhammer down solidly into the back of the thing's skull. The hordeling was slammed down hard into the ground by the force of the impact, sending up a plume of stone dust around it. Its multiple limbs splayed out around it, quivered for a brief instant, and then fell still.

The dretch thralls clearly had no interest in remaining in the tunnel, and started to fall back in chaotic disarray, dropping their heavy burdens. They did not get far, however, before a maze of sticky strands appeared to block the tunnel. A half-dozen were caught in the web, and several others dithered before it, trapped between an unhappy choice of trying to force through the barrier, or turning back to face the deadly weapons of the enemy warriors behind them. One that hesitated too long suddenly pitched forward, the feathered end of an arrow jutting from its splotched back. That decided the others, which leapt forward, trying to pick a way through the web.

One dretch, a loathsome little creature named Uzet, had been almost to the front of the web when it had been snared. Doggedly it picked its way forward, focused on the twisting, empty tunnel ahead of it. It heard a squeal, and glanced over its shoulder to see one of its bretheren a few paces back, hopelessly tangled. Then, suddenly the trapped dretch became silent, although its struggles continued.

A dim awareness of the significance of that sudden quiet pierced Uzet's little mind, and it redoubled its efforts to break free. However, as it lurched forward toward freedom, the webs suddenly vanished, and the dretch toppled forward to land in an ungainly heap on its fat belly. The demon tried to scabble to its feet, but fear engulfed it and tangled its scrawny limbs. It turned its head to look back, and that fear intensified a hundredfold as it saw the metal warrior coming toward it, its heavy footsteps utterly silent, an implacable stare fixed in the glowing gray eyes that were visible beyond the slits of the full helm that it wore. Uzet's gaze fixed on the axe the creature carried, a terrible weapon already drenched in the blood of its kin. Not that it cared about the bar-Igura or the other dretch, but it had a certain attachment to its own hide.

Self-preservation won out over fear, and the dretch leapt clumsily to its feet. It sprang for the safety of the tunnel—let Nax deal with this terror!

The dretch was still within the radius of the silence, and thus did not hear the whistle of the arrow that tore into the back of its head, ending its pathetic existence in a quite decisive manner.

Back behind the radius of the silence around Lok, Cal slid his wand of enervation back into its sheath, seeing that it was not necessary. He knew that Lok and Dannel would make sure that none of the dretches got out to warn of their presence, so he turned to grab Umbar as the dwarf cleric started to move past him.

"This is the point of no return," he said. "Regardless of whether we succeed, no demons can use this tunnel to get into the Bastion."

The cleric nodded. "Go ahead. I will see to it." The dwarf started back toward the tunnel breach, pressing up against the side of the tunnel to allow Avellos and the Herald's Voice to pass. Part of Cal's strategy had held the two celestials back in the rear for at least this first part of the plan; while all of them were shielded against causal detection, he was cautious of the demons sensing the presence of their traditional enemies, regardless. And, he admitted to himself, he was worried about the celestials betraying themselves to their foes as well. After all, such beings were not accustomed to dissembling, and deceit was central to their success.

The sword archon looked at Cal with a calm expression on its face, not even sparing a glance for the wreckage of demon bodies strewn about the tunnel. It was getting cramped, and time was passing; Cal knew that the chances of something going wrong increased with every second of delay.

“Time for our disguises,” he said, just loud enough for everyone to hear. Everyone except Lok, of course; the genasi had taken up a position further down the tunnel at a slight bend, alert for any signs of additional demons.

The spell took only a few seconds to cast; Cal had already prepared a set of mental images based on what he’d expected to find here. He used the forms of the demons around them when possible; Arun and Lok became bar-Igura, while he and Mole took on the form of dretches. The others became a miscellany of typical demons, vrocks and babaus and other types suited to the size and shape of the individual being veiled. One of the principles of effective disguises, Cal knew all too well, was keeping things as simple as possible.

Dannel got special attention; Cal lingered a moment on him, adding a tongues spell to the veil enchantment. Mole grumbled, although there really was no choice; not only was the gnome too small for what Cal had in mind, but she was also far more useful to them as a scout. And while she wouldn’t have admitted such, Cal knew that the elf was about as good at bluffing as his slippery niece.

Cal heard Umbar’s chanting coming from back down at the breach; almost immediately a faint tremor shook the tunnel.

“Let’s go!” he urged, moments before the roof of the tunnel, weakened by Umbar’s soften earth and stone spell, collapsed, sealing the route back into the Bastion behind them.

Now, there was only one way for them to go, and no avenue of escape left to them.

Chapter 577

Nax was not pleased. The massive hordeling spat, the gob of spittle hissing as it hit a nearby boulder. A dretch cowered away from him, acutely aware of the dangers of antagonizing the more powerful fiend.

The narrow valley, settled in between a nest of jagged black peaks, was smaller now than when the demons had found it. Huge mounds of crumbling stone extracted from the tunnel were scattered everywhere. A few dretches carrying empty sacks milled about, careful not to attract the slightest attention.

The hordeling’s skull was a monstrosity, with a gruesome concavity where half its skull had been, half-formed flesh still slowly regenerating over the spot where the mage’s disintegration had hit. The terrible wound had to be causing the creature incredible agonies, but like many fiends, Nax was used to pain, even welcomed it, in a way. The pain meant, at least, that it still existed, that it clung to what it could call a life.

The hordeling’s expression darkened further as a faint rumbling sounded from somewhere deep within the mountain. Well, that might explain the delay. He’d been prepared to messily execute another of the dretch “miners” for dallying; the steady stream of the wretched little demons coming out of the tunnel, dragging their heavy bags of crushed rock, had suddenly ended a few minutes ago. Nax’s first thought was that there had been another clog; the demons were too stupid to avoid getting cluttered up in the narrow twists of the tunnel, and there wasn't enough space to send in babau overseers to keep them in line. But Yavuv had been suspicious, and the larger fiend had learned to trust the instincts of its symbiant.

The big hordeling gestured, and a quartet of babaus came forward. All bore grievous wounds that in some cases continued to ooze black ichor. The whole valley was like a giant... what?

Convalescent ward, the voice in its mind whispered. Nax nodded. It understood the concept, if not the logic of it; fiends in general and demons in particular didn't spare much concern for the wounded. In most campaigns it had participated in, such weaklings would have been torn apart after a battle, as old scores were settled... or in some cases, just for the thrill of slaughter. But Malad was unwilling to waste resources, even crippled ones, until the celestials were utterly and fully defeated. And since the sorcerer was the voice of the Prince, his mandate was obeyed. Unfortunately for Nax, that meant that it was saddled with a company of pathetic, injured demons. Fortunately they healed quickly; the cries of pain were really getting on its nerves.

The hordeling lacked the insight to recognize the irony in its feelings, given its own grievous hurts, but it felt a brief chuckle flit across its mind. Annoyed, Nax turned his attentions to the babaus.

"Go into the tunnel and investigate the delay," it ordered. Yavuv flittered across the hordeling's shoulder, and the fiend nodded. "You may feel a touch upon your minds; do not offer any resistance. Yavuv will watch through your eyes, and report back to me."

The demons clearly didn't like that command, and they offered weighing looks, as if considering their options. Nax did not stir, but simply fixed the four creatures with a cold stare. Even if they had been whole, four babaus were not a threat to him, and if necessary, he would tear these four to pieces and grab others from the milling throng scattered about the valley.

Perhaps the babaus were thinking the same thing, for they quickly skittered off toward the tunnel entrance, sending the dretches scurrying to get out of the way. But before they reached the black opening, a knot of demons emerged.

The reason for the delay was immediately obvious; the demons were covered in stone dust, and bore other obvious marks of a tunnel collapse. Several dretches staggered out and to the side, but only a small handful; from the condition of the larger demons, it appeared that most of them had not survived. As for those bigger ones, there were more of them than Nax had expected...

But the hordeling's attention was drawn to a certain figure who emerged from the press, and stepped forward. The babaus drew back in alarm, glancing back to Nax, turning the matter over to their nominal leader.

What is he doing here? Nax thought, as the figure looked around before focusing his attention on the hordeling.

“Lord Malad,” Nax said, the words rumbling deep in the fiend’s massive chest. “This is... unexpected.”

Dannel, in the guise of Malad, came forward, exuding a confidence that was considerably bolstered by his cloak of charisma. “The celestials were waiting for us; they collapsed the tunnel. You will have to begin anew.” He waved absently to the demons behind him. “I will take these with me to report.” He started to turn away, as if assuming that his command would merely be followed. And indeed, Nax would have had no choice but to comply, except for the sinuous voice that sounded softly in his mind.

Something is not right...

What is it?

He is shielded... they are all shielded...

“Lord Malad,” the hordeling thundered. “How did you get into the shaft? I have been here watching since you departed last.”

The expression of the “sorcerer” narrowed. All of the demons crowded about the valley were now watching the scene, some no doubt excited at the possibility of witnessing a clash between their liege lord and a not-quite-popular underling. None paid heed to a few dretch that slipped deeper into the center of the gathering.

“Your task is not to question me, hordeling. You will obey.”

The demons behind the sorcerer edged forward, as if eager for a conflict to begin.

But Nax merely dipped his monstrous head slightly. “As you command, lord,” he said. But the motion also revealed Yavuv, the thing that had once been a babau wrapped around the greater creature’s neck. Its eyes flashed red as it looked upon Malad, and it unleashed a tendril of power into him.

The sorcerer snarled, and raised an arm as if to launch a magical attack. But before he could act, the air around him shimmered, and his borrowed form dissolved, revealing the elvish arcane archer in all his natural glory.

Demons shrieked as the deception was unraveled. There were over a hundred in all crowded into the close confines of the valley: dretch, rutterkin, babaus, bar-igura, jovocs, and even a burning palrethee. Altogether it was a riot of sound and glistening alien bodies. Foremost among them was Nax, who recognized this archer, a foe that had stung it already. The hordeling rose up ponderously, the ground shaking beneath its massive form as it lifted its fists to smite this enemy that had been foolish to confront it for a final time.

Chapter 578

The valley echoed with the roars of demons as they leapt up, their agonies forgotten in the face of an enemy, and surged forward toward Dannel. But none were ahead of Nax, who lifted his clawed fists high above his body before driving them down in an arc that would pulverize the arcane archer into elvish paste. The veiled warriors rushed forward to intervene, but there was no way they could reach Dannel before that blow struck.

But an instant before Nax's attack landed, Cal cast his first ninth-level spell.

To the companions, all they saw was a haze of insubstantial forms that exploded outward from the gnome. During the exchange between Nax and Dannel, Cal had taken up a position roughly in the center of the compact valley, in the midst of the gathered demons. They ignored him, seeing only a pathetic, simpering dretch.

But now, those same demons saw terrors starker than even the worst nightmares of the Abyss. Demons are bullies by nature, but in their hearts they are motivated by fear as much as by the lust for violence. Their screams redoubled, but now they were cries of stark, unrelenting horror as Cal's weird took hold.

It lasted only a few seconds. When the images had dissipated, and the cries of the demons had faded, the little gnome mage from Faerûn was surrounded by the wracked bodies of nearly a hundred demons, their faces frozen in terrible rictuses of abject fear, the fear that had killed each and every one of them.

Nax was not slain, but even it had been seriously affected by the spell. The weird hit it in the middle of its attack, and it staggered to the side, its fists smacking harmlessly upon the bare stone several feet to the left of Dannel. The elf darted back from the stunned hordeling, speaking a word of command that caused his magical quiver to eject his fiendbane longbow. He took hold of the weapon and fell back beyond the charging warriors, stringing it with a practiced ease.

Nax recovered quickly, but not before Lok, Arun, and Beorna slammed hard into him, driving their weapons into his huge body. The hordeling possessed an incredible toughness and vitality, even injured as it was, but even it was hard-pressed against that onslaught. Lok's axe and Arun's hammer drove hard into its torso, and when it tried to knock them aside with a powerful sweep of its arm, Beorna stepped in with a two-handed swing of Aludrial's Shard, taking the limb off at the elbow.

A few of the other demons that had survived the weird—a half-dozen babaus, and the palrethee—began to stir, shaking off the stunning effect of Cal's spell. But they were broken, and any thought of continuing the attack fled their still-addled minds as they watched their champion being dismembered. The only routes out of the valley were treacherous, twisting paths up the sides of the valley that led to narrow gaps between the surrounding peaks. The wounded demons made for these exits, pushing each other out of the way when necessary, intent now on escape.

"None of them must get word out," Cal said calmly, blasting Nax with an enervation from his wand.

Dannel and Callendes nodded, and began plying their bows. The Voice had started toward the greatest foe, the hordeling and its symbiant, but Cal's words reminded it of its duty, and it flew across the valley to block the escape of a trio of fleeing babaus. The fiends threw themselves upon the celestial with a furious desperation, but the sword archon quickly demonstrated the futility of their efforts.

Umbar and Avellos rushed up to join in the pounding upon Nax, but the hordeling had clearly had enough of this one-sided melee. Its wings pounded as it started to lift into the air, narrowly avoiding a sweep at its legs from Arun's hammer.

"For Helm!" Beorna cried, as she lifted Aludrial's Shard in her hand like a spear, and hurled it into the hordeling's body.

The weapon buried itself to the hilt in the hordeling's chest. Nax screamed, its remaining claw clutching at the wound. Its wings continued to pound at the air for a few moments, and then the crippled creature plummeted straight down, landing with a colossal impact that shook the ground under the companions' feet.

The death of the hordeling brought a sudden quiet to the mountain valley. The last babau had fallen, pierced by four arrows, and none of the demons left scattered upon the uneven rocks stirred. Beorna went to recover her weapon, while Cal gestured for everyone to gather quickly around him.

"We don't have very long... even if they didn't hear that, these mountains are probably crawling with demons; a vrock or a quasit could fly over at any second."

They knew their roles, and their assignments; the companions quickly split into two groups, with half gathering around the Herald's Voice, and half around Umbar. The cleric began casting, and the sword archon closed its eyes as it called upon its own divine power.

Cal was casting as well, and just before the others finished he laid a seeming upon all of them, layered over the veil. Their demonic forms did not change in substance, but took on a pale, almost translucent coloration, and soft white robes appeared draped around them.

"Remember, stay together, and stay focused on the objective," he said, a moment before the wind walk spells took hold, and the companions began to dissolve into vaporous form. Within thirty seconds the transformation was complete, and the ten of them shot off into the sky, darting in between the gap between two of the rising peaks, and rapidly vanishing into nothing as they sped toward their destination.

For at least a full minute after they departed, the valley was silent. But then, a dark shadow shifted within a cleft in the rocks, half-hidden by the fallen mound that had been Nax. Red eyes gleamed within that amorphous mass, staring with malice at the point where the wind walking heroes had disappeared.

Chapter 579

Two tight phalanxes of vaporous forms streaked across the sky of Occipitus, making directly for the plane's dominant feature, the massive iron mountain created by its new ruler, the Demon Prince Graz'zt.

Cal was only dimly aware of the ground passing by far below them. Thus far they'd made excellent time, leaving the mountains behind and accelerating rapidly to a speed that should get them to destination in under an hour. They'd encountered a few flying demons, a few scattered flocks of vrock, an occasional lone quasit flitting on some errand, and once a pair of succubi carrying an iron chest between them. None of the demons had spotted them, though in each case they'd shifted their course subtly to avoid coming too close.

The gnome often looked back at the mountains, but so far there had been no signs that their departure had been detected, and that a pursuit had been ordered. To him it seemed inevitable that there would be one; the demons, or at least their tiefling leader, would quickly come to the realization that those who had left the devastation in the valley had not retreated back into the caverns under the Bastion. But without the ability to teleport, their foes would have a difficult time catching up to the ten raiders before they arrived at their destination.

Cal was worried about what they would find when they got there. They passed over a number of large groups of demons, most still moving in the direction of the canyon culminating in the Bastion. It looked as though Graz'zt had deployed the bulk of his army, however, and they saw no massive columns like the one that had assaulted the fortress, and breached its outer defenses. The Voice's words about the size of the force that the demon prince commanded continued to sound in his mind, and he wondered if they would arrive at the skull to find an impenetrable ring of defenders, including wary fliers equipped with true seeing. Or for that matter, if Graz'zt even now was watching them, preparing for their arrival at his sanctum.

There were defenders, that much was obvious even now, with miles left to go until they reached their destination. This far, all he could make out were tiny specks hovering in the air above the fortress, and black shapes that spread out across the ground at its base like splotches of ink, trembling slightly with movement.

Well, they would find out what was there soon enough.

Cal's musings were interrupted by a sudden unexpected to the side. He turned in time to see a wispy form, one of the four traveling behind the Voice, break formation and start descending in a steep dive. He couldn't quite make out its identity, with the distorting effect of the wind walk, but it was too big to be Mole, and probably not Dannel; the elf would not have broken with them without getting the attention of all of them first.

So it had to be Callendes or Avellos, the hound archon. Cal darted ahead of his group to get the attention of the others, and then pointed down. The other group had slowed as well, uncertain how to react. Already, the lone figure was almost halfway to the ground below, almost invisible against the stark backdrop. They were on the edge of one of the fibrous forests that appeared on the landscape of Occipitus like wild tufts of hair, but other than that there were no obvious features to indicate why this section of the plane was special.

Damn it, Cal thought. He was tempted to ignore the break and press on, but before he could make a decision, the Voice spread its insubstantial wings and started down, the others following behind.

Hoping that they weren't making a big mistake, Cal followed them.

* * * * *

A dozen babaus cavorted the clearing, celebrating a climax of blood and suffering with an enthusiasm that only true demons could muster. The fibrous stalks of the weird Occipitan "forest" surrounded them, some still crusted with dangling gobs of ruined demonic flesh. Some of the slain demons had been strung up from some of the thicker fibers around the perimeter of the clearing, the garish decorations hanging several feet above the ground. A thick stench of battle and ruin absolutely filled the air, like a fog that the demons danced through as they experienced what for their kind passed as joy. Altogether the setting made the place a scene of horror, even if one did not consider the feature that dominated the clearing.

But even the gory scene and its grisly participants paled before the suffering embodied in the figure bound spread-eagled to a cluster of fibers at the far end of the clearing. The demons had lashed together over a dozen fibers to support the captive, but still they sagged heavily with its weight, until its feet dangled a mere pace above the ground. Blood both old and new puddled beneath it, the crusted splatter occasionally augmented by another drop that fell ponderously free from the ruined form. A babau would occasionally break from the circle and rush the dangling form, tearing new gashes in its already ruined legs and body with a sweep of its claws before rejoining the dancers, licking the bloody gore from its claws.

The disfigured captive was no longer identifiable as the leonal Ediir; even one who had known the celestial would have been hard-pressed to identify it. Most of the skin covering the leonal's legs and arms dangled in long strips, flayed from the limb by babaus careful not to unduly sever the blood vessels beneath. The celestial's torso had likewise been painstakingly cut open, the flesh and muscles parted layer by layer until the organs beneath glistened wetly in the open air. And the face—that was a sight best avoided, for there was little there now that reflected the strength and quiet dignity that had once been possessed by the noble warrior.

Distracted by their pleasure, the first warning that the demons got of the threat was when a loud cry drew their attention around, and the hound archon Avellos leapt into the clearing. The celestial was still covered by Cal's veil, giving it the appearance of a muscled humanoid fiend, but its hostile intent was immediately evident. The first babau still had a dumb look of surprise on its face when the celestial's flaming greatsword crushed into it in a mighty power attack. The demon's head came apart like an overripe melon, and the fiend fell to the turf in a gory heap.

The babaus shrieked and immediately fell upon the archon from all sides, but even as they rushed Avellos death began to rain down upon them. Arrows shot out from the fibrous forest, burying themselves to the feathers in the emaciated bodies of the demons. An explosion of holy energy erupted in the clearing, the holy smite blinding the fiends with its intensity even as the pure deluge of power seared their corrupt flesh.

Arun, Lok, and Beorna came charging into the clearing on the heels of the archon, but even as they started hacking at the disoriented babaus, Mole's voice sounded from somewhere, shouting a warning.

"Over on the right... incoming!"

The defenders had just enough time to look in that direction before the thicket of fibers spread open, and another dozen babau surged into the clearing, accompanied by a pair of massive howlers, each easily fifteen feet in length. The newcomers announced themselves with a ferocious roar that accompanied a violent charge, as they leapt across the clearing into the fray.

Chapter 580

Faced now with almost two dozen babau and a pair of oversized howlers, the companions found themselves engaged in yet another desperate battle.

The howlers relied on their sheer size and the momentum of their rush as they bowled into the melee, bearing down enemies and allies alike. The first slammed hard into Beorna, knocking her prone and pinning her under its several thousand pounds of bulk. The second tried to do the same with Lok, but the genasi brought up his shield and stepped aside, taking a hard but glancing hit that separated him from the babau he'd been fighting. He set his feet to counterattack, but before he could strike a pair of babau leapt upon him from behind. Twisting, he shook free the first, but bad luck confounded him and his boot caught in a corpses's ribcage as he turned. The second babau took advantage at once by dragging the genasi down to the ground.

Arun rushed forward to Beorna's aid, catching the howler's attention with a powerful swing of his hammer that caught the creature solidly on the side of the head. The howler responded by lashing out at the paladin with a violent thrashing surge, its movements grinding Beorna into the ground beneath it. The creature's bite failed to connect, but one of the sharp spines that jutted from its neck impaled the dwarf's weapon arm. Arun grimaced, but merely tightened his grip on his holy avenger, his jaw tightening in a promise of divine retribution. A pair of babaus recovering from the smite tore at him from his flanks, but he ignored them for now, focused on the larger foe.

Avellos continued to sweep his huge sword about with raging abandon. The babau were resistant to the flames that engulfed the magical blade, but that did not spare them from the edge of the divine steel. But despite the aid from the others, the hound archon was still assailed by five of the foul, cackling demons, which came on him from all sides. Their claws found vulnerabilities that they exploited through cunning sneak attacks, and within just a few seconds the celestial's fur was matted with its own blood, draining from deep gashes in its arms and torso.

The second wave of babaus came crashing into the melee on the heels of the howler rush; or at least some of them did, for a few found themselves distracted as they crossed the clearing. One suddenly found its legs tangled up beneath it, and it pitched forward to land in an awkward heap upon the ground. One of its fellows turned to see a small figure leap up at its face, darting past before it could react, its rapid passage leaving a reminder in the form of an explosion of pain in its left eye. The demon let out a violent scream and spun around to attack its tormentor, but saw only another of its fellows, likewise twisting around trying to find the streaking foe.

Then a loud whistle drew both demons around, to where a mere dretch stood grinning at them ten feet away.

"Well, you guys coming, or what?"

The demons, joined by the third as it picked itself up off the ground, snarled and rushed toward the veiled Mole.

The last knot of babaus—four of the snarling demons—diverted their rush toward the far edge of the clearing, where the barrage of arrows continued to knife out at their fellows. Hoping perhaps to ambush the archers, they instead found themselves confronted by a dwarf cleric and another archon. Umbar, delayed slightly as he augmented himself with the divine power of Moradin, intercepted the leap of the foremost demon with his axiomatic hammer, crushing its chest and reversing its momentum to land hard on its back. The Herald's Voice moved forward to join him, its hovering sword materializing in the air before it, but Umbar forestalled it before it could join the melee.

"Help the hound!" he urged. "I'll deal with these wretches!"

The celestial nodded and lifted into the air, while the babaus, disappointed in losing a shot at one of their hated enemies, took out their frustrations on the dwarf.

Lok's kept an iron grip on his axe as he pushed his fist into the spongy turf, slowly levering himself up. The babaus grappling him were spurred into a frenzy as they tried to keep him down, but they may as well have been clawing at a stone wall for all the effect that their claws had on his heavily armored body.

Of more concern was the howler, which turned on him with a vengeance. Before it could unleash a full attack, a black beam shot out from the surrounding forest and struck it, weakening it. But that did not stop it from attacking; if anything its furious assault seemed to double its earlier effort. Its jaws closed on Lok's shield, tearing it from his grip and nearly taking his forearm with it, and a spine lodged in the shoulder joint of his left arm, poking through the layered mail and digging painfully into his flesh.

Lok ignored it all, and placed his feet with deliberation under him. His head came up, slowly.

This was his spot.

Arun felt a pain stab into his left hip as one of the babaus raging on him finally managed to work its sharp nails under his armor. The howler reared up, briefly revealing Beorna's struggling form under its chest.

"Get this damned thing off me!" she shouted, slicing her dagger out of its scabbard before the thing came down on her again.

The howler opened its jaws and twisted its head around, apparently intending to simply gobble up the defiant paladin.

Arun was waiting for just such an opportunity.

The holy avenger warhammer swept up and down in a blur, striking the howler solidly on the side of its jaw. Bone snapped under the impact; the howler started to rear back, but Arun wasn't finished. Stepping past the babaus as if they weren't even there, he drove the head of the hammer into the left front knee of the monster, pulverizing that joint, and causing the howler to tip over onto its side. The thing lifted its head and screamed, a sound that abruptly ended as the paladin brought the hammer up one last time, for a third consecutive power attack that crushed its throat. Now crippled, gurgling as it tried to breathe, the howler flopped over backward, sliding off of Beorna. A babau immediately leapt onto her, but she grabbed it and slammed her mailed fist into its face.

"I... am... not... in... the... mood!" she yelled, punching it with every word that tore through her lips.

Arun, seeing that she had the matter in hand, turned to deal with his own enemies. The babaus shared a look, and fled.

Avellos was now in a truly desperate situation. He had slain another babau, but four still threatened him, exploiting his open position to launch nasty flanking attacks. And his greatsword was smoking from more than the burning magic that infused it; the babau acid was having its corrosive effect.

But even as the demons gleefully chortled in anticipation of another fallen foe, the situation abruptly shifted. A long arrow caught one of the babaus in the back of the head, slaying the already-wounded demon. And then the Voice appeared, landing in a flutter of white cloth and soft wings, its sword coming down in a strike that cut another of the demons near in twain. The sword archon took up a protective position adjacent to the stricken hound, preventing either of them from being effectively flanked by the two remaining demons.

But faced with celestials, the demons did their best, and one actually managed to get its claws around Avellos's throat before the hound broke free, and drove his sword through the creature. Unfortunately the attack was too much for the battered blade, which snapped off just above the hilt.

Lok, meanwhile, met the howler's rush. The creature slammed into him again, but the genasi had taken up a defensive stance, and the howler's head was driven up as Lok took its weight upon him. The image of the huge monster, thousands of pounds of abyssal horror, held up by a five-foot warrior, was almost comic. But then, Lok heaved, and the howler's feet were lifted up off the ground. The creature flailed for a moment, confused by this unexpected turn.

But then, Lok started hacking at its belly.

The melee was already starting to shift, sliding inexorably into a rout. The demons, confronted by the furious power of their enemies, started to fall, first by the handful, then in a deluge. Umbar, facing four babaus, slew two and had started on a third when his magical hammer, almost covered in glistening red slime, finally succumbed. The cleric spat a dwarven curse and grabbed the injured demon's head, blasting it with an inflict wounds spell that caused it to shudder in agony. Snapping its neck for good measure, he turned to face his last foe.

He was too late, he saw, as the demon was on the turf. It was hard to see the arrows in its chest; only a bit of the feathered ends was visible.

Those facing the dwarves were the first to break. Even as Lok dropped the dying howler to the ground, the two babaus attacking him decided that maybe they'd picked the wrong opponent. They fled, one unfortunately taking a path that led it too close to Arun. The demon went down, its skull crushed like an eggshell beneath an armored boot. The other one got away, disappearing into the fibrous forest, running with an abandon that probably didn't flag until it reached the far side of the plane.

Mole's foes were probably the last to realize that the battle was ending. The gnome had led the three of them on a merry chase around the entire far half of the clearing, over and under and around the fibrous stalks, making their swipes look clumsy as they grabbed only air. The gnome barely bothered to attack, managing a few minor swipes with her dagger that poked and prodded the demons into a greater fury. Each time the demons rushed her, they seemed to get just almost close enough to grab her, before she twisted or leapt or tumbled out of reach.

"Ah, it's been fun, but I think I'll sit out the next dance," she said to them, finally, coming to a stop in the middle of the clearing.

Behind her, Arun, Beorna, and Lok stood, covered in demonic ichor, their weapons bare and bloody in their hands.

The demons, enraged beyond the dictates of common sense, leapt to the attack.

And then, it was over.

As silence returned to the clearing, and the companions checked themselves and their gear for damage, Avellos approached the devastated form of his commander. The hound, its wounds forgotten, lowered its gaze, its hand opening to drop the broken sword to the ground.

There was no chance of any other fate, but the Voice verified it anyway, briefly brushing the leonal's hand with a gentle touch. The sword archon sighed, and lowered its head.

The great warrior Ediir was dead.

Chapter 581

A great sadness hung over the scene of carnage in the clearing within the fibrous forest. But there was also a fair degree of anger.

"What was that all about, celestial?" Umbar said, coming forward. Beorna was only a step behind him, grimacing as she favored limbs crushed by the weight of the howler.

"We don't have time to delay," Cal said, coming forward into the clearing, sliding one of his wands into the case at his belt. "More demons will be on us at any moment; don't think that the ones that got away won't be back with friends."

"I think we need to resolve this, and now," Beorna said, tucking her thumbs into her belt. "If we cannot rely upon a member of the team, we need to know it, before he gets us all killed in a crisis situation."

"Ediir was one of the great ones," the Voice explained. "Avellos was his second, and was ordered to leave him when one of the gates opened..."

"We do not question your loyalty, hound archon," Umbar interrupted. "But greater things are at stake in this than one man. If I were to fall, I would expect you to leave me, without hesitation, for the greater good. I would have thought that an archon, an embodiment of Law... duty... order... would understand this above all."

A few of the companions shared looks as the dwarf spoke. The archon, however, merely nodded in acquiescence. "Your words speak truth. I have twice failed in my duty," it said, its eyes falling to the shattered weapon at its feet.

Arun looked at Beorna, and there was a hint of reluctance in the way she met his gaze. "You would leave me behind, Beorna?" he said, quietly.

"Damned straight, paladin," she said. "And I would expect nothing less from you. I do not often agree with mister high holiness over there, but in this he is one hundred percent correct. Duty trumps all."

"Oh, for the love of..." Dannel said, coming forward, exasperated. "What is it with you lawfuls? I swear, I've seen orc drinking contests that weren't as competitive as this whole 'who's the most noble' crap! So Avellos spent some time with a leonal, and some independent thinking rubbed off on him. Good! Cripes, loyalty to your friends isn't a weakness, guys!"

"This is not some fairy elf game we are playing at, archer," Umbar began, "There is too much at stake..."

Lok interrupted him by stepping forward, and smacking the ground before him with the top of his axe. “Nobody gets left behind. Period. Some of us may not survive this quest, but we abandon no one while they yet breathe.”

For a moment, there was only silence, then the sword archon spoke. “Well said, voice of the Mountain.”

“Yeah, sheesh, what’s with you guys?” Mole said, but the others were already moving on, gathering their weapons, casting healing spells to treat the wounds suffered in the brief but intense battle. Umbar turned around and walked away, grumbling. Avellos had turned back to the slain leonal, and laid a hand gently upon its battered body.

“Go forward in peace, mighty warrior.”

The Voice gestured for the others to fall back, and then called down a flame strike that engulfed the leonal. The holy flame embraced the slain celestial, and although it burned for only a few seconds, the twisting white pillar left behind nothing but ashes and a few stunted stalks when it dissipated.

“Let’s get moving,” Cal prodded.

Beorna and Umbar quickly started healing the warriors damaged in the fray, while the Voice attended to the dire wounds covering Avellos. The others cleaned their weapons as best they could, careful of the damaging secretions that had come off of the babaus. As they were getting ready, Dannel came up to Umbar.

“I see you lost your weapon,” he said to the cleric.

“I do not need an elvish blade,” he said, with a nod to the longsword at Dannel’s belt.

“I had something else in mind,” he said, whispering a word of command to his magical quiver. The device produced his quarterstaff, which he offered to the cleric. “It’s name is Alakast,” he said. “It... well, let’s just say that it doesn’t like fiends much.”

The dwarf nodded, recognizing the potent runes etched into the length of the weapon. “I will see that it is put to good use.” Resting the weapon against his shoulder, he went over to confer with Arun.

“A good choice,” Cal said.

Dannel nodded. “I haven’t had much need for it of late. Although I am getting a little worried about arrows.”

“I thought you brought spare bundles in Mole’s bag of holding?”

“Yeah, ten bundles, two hundred shafts. Shot those, and the extra ones in my pack,” the elf said. “And I’ve already borrowed extras from Lok and Arun. I do go through them pretty quickly, and we’ve been in at least six major engagements since we arrived here. I also gave two bundles to Callendes, before we left; he ran out before the end of the battle at the Bastion. I'm down to the ones left in my magical quiver; I've got a good fifty or so left, but once those are gone, my combat effectiveness is going to drop significantly."

"I think Beorna has a few left," Mole said suddenly from behind him, causing the elf to jump in surprise. "I'll go ask her." Smiling innocently, the gnome turned and walked over to the cleric.

Dannel grimaced. "I think she's gotten bored with just needling the dwarves," he said. "Bad luck for me, I think."

"I think maybe we're due for some good luck," Cal said earnestly. Dannel nodded, and turned as the others approached, still looking garish in their gore-encrusted armor. "Everyone ready?" Cal asked.

"Let's go," Arun said, already starting to become insubstantial as he drew upon the power of the wind walk once again. The companions became insubstantial, and quickly left another gory battlefield behind, speeding off toward the iron mountain in the distance, where ugly red clouds continued to roil in an uncontrolled storm of Chaos.

Chapter 582

Graz'zt's Iron Skull dominated the center of Occipitus like a boil upon a scabrous hunk of flesh. In just a few days of subjective time, the slow progress of the plane away from corruption had been undone, at least here, where the power of the Demon Prince reigned supreme. The once-golden sky had been completely obscured by a permanent storm of red and black clouds that spiraled in a wide halo over the place. Blue lightning flashed within that mass, accompanied by rumblings that sounded like the tremors of a building earthquake. Black specks filled the sky, wings of flying demons that included vrockes, chasmes, succubi, quasits, and fiendish humanoids mounted upon winged creatures that looked like a combination of dragons and giant dire bats. Altogether, it was a scene out of a nightmare.

The citadel itself was a terrible, garish pillar that still bore a rough proximity to its original shape, augmented now by jagged edges, sharp spikes, and leering fiendish faces cast in iron. Some of those decorations were not merely ornamental, as occasionally a fearsome-looking figure that appeared to be cast in black metal would shift position, staring out over the plain below with eyes that glowed an evil red. Every inch of the fortress was covered by the abyssal iron that Graz'zt had conjured with his epic spell, and no means of entrance were visible anywhere, save for the massive doors set deep within its base, surrounded by murder holes and dark slits beyond which shadowy figures occasionally moved. As if that were not enough, a pair of massive glabrezu, each standing nearly twenty feet tall, stood before the doors. The chiseled bodies of these fiends were covered in runes that glowed a feral red, and each wore an open-faced helm of black iron that sprouted a forest of bristling spikes.

Spreading outward from the spire in a chaotic mélange was a massive camp; or rather series of camps, for there was no overarching order or sense to the arrangement of gatherings that covered the plain, nothing other than the presence of the spire in the center to give them any sense of common alignment at all. The camps ranged from small clusters of demons that appeared to have simply stopped at a random point upon the plain, to a more substantial enclosure walled in by a stockade of iron longswords driven deep into the spongy turf of Occipitus. These gatherings combined features of military outposts and refugee camps, and collectively contained over ten thousand fiends, nearly all demons, although a sprinkling of hordelings, yugoloths, daemons, half-fiends, tieflings, and others rounded out the anarchy. Only one thing kept this host together, one thing bound it to this unfamiliar and unforgiving place.

That one thing was the resident of the metal spire, the once-lord of Azzagrat, here to make his bid for a return to the ranks of the great masters of the Abyss.

Demons were what they were, however, and the camp was roiled with a constant din as the pure chaos and evil of its inhabitants played out. Every hour dozens of beings met their end in the camps, as old rivalries exploded and new ones were born, sometimes out of something as casual and stupid as a stray look or a slight bump in passing. Graz'zt's enforcers were out in the camp, a trio of hulking Nalfeshnees that each commanded a dozen hulking half-fiends encased from head to toe in dark red plate. Their task was to ensure that none of these conflicts exploded into a general conflagration. But these lords of demonkind were nevertheless of a kind with their fellows, and bribes occasionally passed to ensure that the patrol would be elsewhere, when the time for revenge came at hand.

The companions watched it all with stares of horrified amazement. They hovered high above the scene, about a mile out from the citadel, just outside the edge of the huge cloud. This was far enough away from the orbiting fliers so that their insubstantial forms made them virtually undetectable, but that did not give any of them any sense of security. The spell did not give them the power to speak, but no words could have expressed the diverse feelings that passed through them at this point. Each of them, mortal and celestial alike, battled a surge of feeling that combined fear and anger, hatred and resignation.

One of the ten, one of the smallest among them, drifted a bit ahead of the others. Deception and sneaking had brought them this far; from here on out, their approach would be... different.

Cal lifted his hand. The air around the wind walkers stirred, gathering in anticipation.

The gnome lowered his hand, and the ten of them shot forward, heading directly for the skull.

Chapter 583

Seconds passed, each one ticking off loudly in Cal's mind, like the rattle of the broken Lantanese clock that his aunt had insisted on keeping on the mantle of the Calloran home in Waterdeep. Tick... tick... tick.... At about a mile distant, he figured it would take about a minute for them to cover the distance from their initial vantage to their destination.

It would be the longest minute he'd ever experienced in his life.

Fully ten ticks of the clock had passed, almost enough to give him a giddy hope that they might beat the odds, when the cry of a vrock shattered that musing.

None of the companions shifted from their tight formation, two phalanxes centered around Umbar and the Voice. Well, the formation was mostly intact, Cal saw, as he glanced back and saw that Mole was pacing him, her grin evident even through the wind walk. More seconds passed, as the companions streaked at high speed toward their destination. Several demons had changed course to intercept them, although the vrock that had first spotted them was already behind, and trailing further, unable to keep up with their rapid flight.

An unholy blight exploded ahead of them; gritting his teeth Cal shot through it, followed immediately by the others. None of them had flinched, and most of them, warded by layered magical protections, including circles of protection from evil, resisted the worst of the blast's effects.

Looking down, Cal scanned the massive camp below. They were still almost three hundred feet above the ground, out of range of most forms of attack, and likely impossible to see against the backdrop of the roiling storm above. With the chaos of the demonic horde, there was no way to tell if they were responding to the general alarm, or if they were even aware yet that an incursion was taking place.

He looked back up to see a pair of succubi swooping down from up ahead. He grimaced, bracing himself for an attack, but instead of assaulting the wind walkers, they drew up just close enough to fire off charms at several of them as they shot past. Cal felt a moment of uncertainty; if one or more of them succumbed, it could throw a wrench in their plan. But again the willpower of the companions, bolstered with magic, prevailed. By the time that the succubi were ready to strike again, they were past.

Another blight erupted, but this one was slightly off to the left, and they easily avoided it. Cal let himself hope that this was because the caster was getting farther away, and could not easily mark their position with the speed with which they were traveling.

The iron mountain was now looming up ahead of them, its jagged spires filling Cal's vision as they dove straight toward it. Several forms had detached from the structure, lifting into the air on metallic wings, red eyes gleaming as they fixed upon the intruders.

Gargoyles, Cal thought. Bad news; their claws can cut through our damage reduction.

But the incredible speed granted by the wind walk came at the price of maneuverability. And slowing down was not an option; if they eased their speed, then the demons would be on them in moments. And if the mass of ground-based demons mobilized before they were in...

Then there was no more time to think; the gargoyles were upon them.

The companions shot through them in a flash, but not without being blooded. A claw slammed into Cal, penetrating his wispy form as though he were solid, but he was wearing a stoneskin, and the blow had no effect. But Avellos and Umbar were hit hard, the archon slowed momentarily as the impact from the gargoyle knocked it out of formation. But despite their efforts the gargoyle attack could not disrupt their passage, and they were through, with nothing ahead but the sharp spikes jutting from the summit of the skull.

Cal turned the lead position over to Mole, who led them down. Their course shifted into a steep arc as they sped into a powered dive, straightening out into an angled descent that took them within a stone's throw of the citadel walls. Mole led them into a narrow gap between a jutting tower and the main bulk of the citadel, the others slicing through the space toward the ground that was very rapidly coming up to greet them. They knew where they were going; the lower entrance to the citadel was the same one they had used to access the place long before, when Arun, Dannel, and Mole had come here to confront the Test of the Smoking Eye.

The ground in front of the recessed entry was clear of demons; the nearest camp was a healthy hundred yards or so away from that key location. The demons in the camp were starting to stir, now, although there still wasn't any clear sign of organization, or an obvious response to the threat. One of the nalfeshnee wardens, accompanied by its ring of armored guards, was moving toward the entry, although it was still a good distance off.

Cal had lost his count, but he knew that only a tick or two remained. He prepared himself...

And saw the two glabrezu guardians step out from the recessed entry, their gazes coming up as one to fix the diving heroes with cold malevolence.

Oh, crap...

Chapter 584

The unexpected appearance of two advanced glabrezu guards threw a twist into Cal's plan, but with the wind walking companions descending toward the ground at sixty miles per hour, there was no time for anything other than gut reaction.

Within the tiniest fraction of a heartbeat, Umbar and the Voice released their wind walk spells. With a sudden, jarring lurch, the companions materialized fully, still diving directly toward the ground—and the waiting guards—at an extremely rapid pace.

It was up to Cal now, and everything seemed to slow down around him as his magic flowed through him. The plan was for him to invoke the spell immediately after the wind walk ended, but with the glabrezu already starting to react, it was time to take a chance.

He heard a scream behind him, but his brain didn't have time to register the identity of its source as he invoked the feather fall, barely twenty feet from the head of the first glabrezu. The uncontrolled dive instantly became an easy descent, and Cal slid past the nearer of the two glabrezu to land in an easy crouch upon the turf.

The warriors followed only a second later, and unlike Cal, they had focused their dive directly upon the demon guardian. Arun hit first, although the demon's longer reach let it slam him with a long pincer-claw that should have sent the paladin flying. Instead, the gold dwarf twisted and took the hit on his shield, shooting past close enough to deliver a solid blow to the demon's shoulder as he fell. The demon roared as the holy avenger warhammer send a pulse of driving pain through it, but that hurt became all the more intense a moment later as Beorna drove Aludrial's Shard into its chest, opening a long, terrible gash down its left breast. Lok and Umbar landed behind it, the genasi failing to connect with a swing at the edge of his reach, the cleric striking it across the back with Alakast as he fell.

The group accompanying the Herald's Voice came down upon the second glabrezu. Dannel and Callendes were firing as they fell, and Mole unfolded her cloak, controlling her descent to swoop down behind it for a sneak attack. Avellos fell too far away to get in an initial attack, but the Voice dove directly at it, its sword materializing in the air before it.

For a moment it looked like they had secured a victory, but then, as it so often did, the initiative shifted against them. The first glabrezu invoked a reverse gravity, the potent magic overwhelming the spell resistance provided by Arun's hammer as both the paladin and Beorna went streaking back up into the air.

And five paces away, the Voice was likewise overcome as the second guardian hit the archon with a power word. The celestial plummeted hard into the ground at the glabrezu's feet, stunned.

Chapter 585

With Arun and Beorna at least temporarily out of the fight, and the Voice helpless before one of the glabrezus, the tactical situation had turned decisively against the favor of the companions. Together they still outmatched the two elite guardians, but that was not the problem that preoccupied Cal. The gnome felt the passing of seconds acutely, but could not help a quick look around.

Above. The gargoyles that they had engaged near the top of the spire were diving, their claws extended in anticipation of rending the foes that had gotten past them. They were just the first wave; behind them came vrocks, succubi, chasme, and other flying demons.

Behind. The demons in the surrounding camps were just stirring, but already at least several dozen were starting to move toward them, belatedly realizing that there were foes here to be torn apart. Cal's gaze landed on a nalfeshnee ringed by warriors in heavy plate bearing halberds of red steel, but they were not the immediate threat; there were several groups of babau, bar-Igura, rutterkins, hezrous, jovocs, and others that would be on them in less than a minute. Before that minute was out, there would be thousands of demons bearing down upon them, an unstoppable wave that would break against the fortress walls, obliterating anything in its path.

And forward. Cal's gaze came back around to what lie ahead, pushing past the raging battle with the guardians, to the massive steel doors recessed in the shadowy black tunnel that penetrated into the interior of the citadel.

Focusing himself to ignore the glabrezus, Cal started forward.

The glabrezu standing over the dazed sword archon lifted its massive pincer-claws to crush its enemy mercilessly. Its attack was interrupted by the snarling charge of Avellos, who leapt over the fallen form of its superior directly at the demon. The archon carried one of the group's backup weapons, Arun's adamantine battle axe, but the glabrezu's superior reach let it strike well before the archon got close enough to use it. The glabrezu slammed Avellos with a solid blow from its left pincer, knocking the archon roughly aside and slamming him to the ground. The demon brought its other pincer-arm around to finish the job, but Avellos shook his head and leapt up, darting under the demon's sweep and slamming the axe hard into its hip, the highest point on the fiend's body he could reach. Black ichor sprouted from the wound, but it was clear that it would take far more than that to bring down this foe.

The other demon, having taken two of its enemies out of the fray, turned to deal with the others. But its attack on Arun and Beorna had given Lok and Umbar a few precious seconds to prepare, and now they each unleashed a full attack upon the foe. Umbar drove Alakast into the fiend's left leg, smashing its knee with a powerful two-handed strike, and then following that up by snapping the weapon up into its calf. The glabrezu's armored hide cracked as the staff, specifically enchanted to harm fiends, unleashed its power in complete harmony with the righteous strength of the cleric.

And then Lok, standing by the creature's other leg, laid into it.

The genasi unleashed a full attack, hewing at the demon's leg like a mad lumberjack hacking down an offending tree. Lok abandoned subtlety, throwing his strength into the powerful swings. The first blow carved a deep gash in the glabrezu's armored knee joint, followed at once by a backswing that tore fully through the armored cap plate, exposing the pulsing red tendons of the joint. The genasi spun around, letting out a mighty yell as he brought the axe into the knee with the full force of his momentum and the strength of his arm behind it. A cacophonous retort erupted as the thundering axe unleashed a blast of sonic energy to accompany the force of the steel. Lok fell back, amazed himself by the perfect force of that blow.

The glabrezu was also impressed, as it suddenly felt its leg give out under it. The demon toppled over to the side, while its leg, no longer attached to its body, remained rooted where it had been standing.

Dannel landed gently on the turf fifteen feet away from his foe, another arrow already drawn and aimed at the other demon. The moment his feet touched the ground he released, the shaft joining the two others that already sprouted from the fiend's upper body. The missiles themselves did little damage through the glabrezu's damage reduction, but each hit was infused with the fiendbane power of the elf's bow, driving a tendril of magical hatred through the demon with each impact. The demon snarled and turned toward the elf, recognizing him as a greater threat than the hound archon hewing at its legs. Its long reach meant that only a single step would bring the elf within range of all of its attacks, and there were few creatures that could withstand a full assault from a glabrezu.

Unfortunately, as it took that step, pain exploded through the limb, knocking it off balance, the demon roared and shuffled to the side, crashing up against the armored wall of the adjacent fortress. Jagged abyssal iron cut into its thick hide, further enraging it. It looked around for what had hurt it, but only saw a tiny, streaking form that darted out of reach, tumbling backward in a series of effortless backwards somersaults.

Cal strode forward, ignoring both glabrezu, heading straight for the doors of the citadel. The one still standing spotted him, and a black memory of a whispered command penetrated the battle-rage that filled its mind.

NONE SHALL PASS...

Pushing itself off from the wall, the demon slashed at the gnome as he passed with a pincer-claw. Cal was at the edge of the demon's reach, but nevertheless was clipped hard on the shoulder, hard enough to hurt even through his stoneskin. The gnome staggered and fell forward, clutching his magical rod.

But when he lifted the device and summoned his magic, it wasn't toward the demon.

Callendes had not joined Dannel and the others; the avariel had instead flown back upward, intending to recover Beorna and Arun. The two dwarves, hovering at the top of the reverse gravity effect some fifty feet above the ground, grabbed the hands that the winged elf extended to them, pulling them toward the edge of the area of effect.

A harsh cry drew his attention up briefly; the gargoyles were diving fast, now less than sixty feet above them.

"I cannot carry both of you down!" the avariel said.

"Slide us out of the effect, and drop us!" Arun ordered.

"That way... toward the glabrezu!" Beorna added.

The elf nodded, and complied, dragging the two to the edge of the effect. The success was immediately clear as the three of them plummeted straight down. Callendes held them for a second longer, directing them toward the demon, slowing their flight slightly as the air beat at his wings, then with a grunt he released them and followed them down.

Dannel fired more arrows at the glabrezu, scoring a pair of hits that slammed hard into its body. The demon, enraged by the painful pinpricks, turned and stabbed a pincer around the elf's torso. Dannel cried out as the demon dragged him up, tearing at him with the smaller claws protruding from its chest. The arcane archer, still holding his bow, tried to fit one last arrow to his string, but the demon reached out with its other pincer, and seized his left arm just below the elbow, crushing it in a tight grip. A scream was torn from Dannel as the demon crushed his bracer and the bones beneath it, and pulled. For a moment the limb held, then there was a sick pop as his shoulder was wrenched out of its socket.

The glabrezu's huge jaws opened, and the demon lifted its victim toward that waiting maw, intending to snap the elf's head off.

Chapter 586

"Aaaaahhhrrrrr!"

The scream brought the glabrezu's attention up from its victim, in time to see Beorna coming straight down toward it, Aludrial's Shard a shaft of silver fire in her hand. The demon brought its free arm up to intercept the descending dwarf, but was too slow to stop the templar, who slammed hard into it with the full force and weight of her adamantine-clad body, smashing through its iron helm and driving the blessed blade down to the hilt into the center of the demon's forehead.

The glabrezu fell hard, slamming into the wall, and going down like a discarded ragdoll.

Cal was taking fire as he pulled himself up, surrounded by a buzz of arrows as dark figures fired from beyond the arrow shafts that flanked the entrance of Graz'zt's citadel. A few struck him, chipping off from the stoneskin. While the spell held, protecting him from the hits, some had additional magical effects laid upon them that penetrated the magic. His arms burned from where corrosive acid had exploded from the point of two of the impacts, and he felt a sick twisting in his gut from a violated arrow had pricked the left side of his torso. But he ignored them, and the glabrezu that had struck him a moment ago. Lifting his rod, he channeled his power through it, unleashing a green ray of disintegration that struck the great steel doors about six feet above the ground.

The doors began to glow green, and then a round opening about eight feet across simply vanished, the destroyed metal turning into a coarse powder that drifted down across the gap.

"Go, now!" he urged, moving for the gap. Something shot past him toward it, which he sensed rather than saw to be Mole; the other gnome was moving too fast for his eye to clearly follow her. The roar behind him was becoming deafening, as demons drew nearer to them; a dazzling searing burst marked a chaos hammer that went off behind him, engulfing several of the warriors.

Umbar and Lok grabbed the stunned sword archon, carrying him between them as they rushed toward the gap in the door. Arun, limping slightly, had picked up Dannel, who lay where he'd been dropped by the glabrezu. He was followed by Beorna, who finally freed her sword from the glabrezu's skull with a mighty lurch, and Avellos, who brought up the rear.

Cal reached the opening in the door, and looked into the blackness beyond. He could already hear fighting ahead; it seemed that Mole had run into more guardians. Well, they'd expected this to be a hard slog...

As he looked back, he saw the warriors rushing forward, carrying their burdens. Behind them came a wall of demons, hundreds of them at least, with the promise of thousands more behind that. Gargoyles swooped down under the overhang that led into the tunnel, and dove at them with a loud screech. Avellos started to turn to face them, his axe coming up, but Arun barked a command, and the archon turned and ran for Cal's exit.

Cal moved through, and stepped aside to make room for the others. A pair of misshapen rutterkin armed with halberds with serrated edges were dancing with Mole; that was the only word he could think of to describe their futile efforts to come to grips with the gnome. As he watched another pair of the creatures, accompanied by four half-fiend humanoids clad in red metal breastplates and armed with longbows, emerged from around a curving tunnel that appeared to lead in the direction of the arrowslits he'd run past earlier. Lok and Umbar appeared through the opening just a moment later, and after laying the stunned archon down they rushed to engage the guards.

"Hurry!" Cal urged, as Arun, Beorna, and Avellos came rushing forward. Callendes dove above them, avoiding a gargoyle that still managed to tear a series of long gashes in his back. The avariel folded his wings, landed, and darted through the opening, followed a second later by Arun with Dannel, and the Beorna. Avellos was the last, harried by several gargoyles that tore relentlessly at the archon as he ran.

Cal knew that it had be now; the first ranks of onrushing demons had already reached the threshold of the entry tunnel, and they would be on them in just a few seconds. As he called up his magic, he thought, How much did you know, of what we would face? There had been three spells inscribed in the small blue leather book, and now he cast the second, and wondered at the meaning behind the last one, which still burned in a dark corner of his mind.

A gargoyle's claw clipped Avellos solidly across the face, gashing his forehead and stabbing into his right eye. The archon howled and toppled forward, half-diving, half-falling into the gap in the doors. A gargoyle, perhaps the same one that had crippled the celestial, appeared in the doorway just behind it, screeching in fury as it regarded them with a hateful stare. It clung to the edge of the six-inch-thick metal, and tensed to hurl itself forward, with a thousand demons just behind it...

Chapter 587

Magic poured out from Cal, coalescing into a barrier of bright, shimmering colors that blocked not only the gap in the door, but stretched across the entirety of the tunnel to seal off the side exits to the chambers that flanked the entrance of the citadel. Immediately the sound and sight of the onrushing demons were cut off completely.

Their side of the prismatic wall, however, was far from quiet as the companions did battle with a handful of guards that had emerged from the side chambers prior to the casting. The rutterkins were tougher than their usual kin, but they were easily taken down by powerful blows from Umbar and Lok. The armored half-fiend archers were a bit more durable, but they found themselves quickly outnumbered as the rest of the companions joined the fray. Mole tumbled behind one, coming up behind its knees as Lok bull-rushed it, toppling it head over heels to splay awkwardly upon the stone. Its momentum pushed its left arm into the prismatic wall; the creature let out a scream that suddenly and abruptly ended as a flash of colors exploded around his body. When they could see clearly again, there was nothing left of it other than an ugly splotch on the ground.

One of the other archers tried to grab Mole and toss her into the wall, but it may as well have been trying to catch quicksilver in its hands. As Mole leapt on its forearm and vaulted over its back, Arun smashed the fiend in the chest with his hammer, knocking it down and leaving a round hole three inches across and a full inch deep in the middle of its breastplate. The archer tried to get up, but an arrow slammed into its throat, and it collapsed in a gurgle of blood and air.

Within a few more seconds, the corridor was quiet, save for a few momentary disruptions in the middle of the prismatic wall.

“They’re trying to get through,” Beorna said.

“Will they succeed?” Arun asked.

“No,” Cal said.

“What about a dispel?” Lok asked.

“That won’t be of any help to them, not with this. No, we’re safe for the moment, at least from this direction.”

“How long?” asked Arun.

“Just under four hours. But I wouldn’t depend on that; there may be other ways into the citadel that we don’t know about.”

“We’d better get going then,” the paladin said. He turned to Beorna, who was helping Dannel. With a cure critical wounds poured into him, he looked a lot better, although he was still favoring his savaged right arm.

“Are you okay?” Cal asked.

Dannel nodded. Through it all, he had not relinquished his grip on his bow, and as he switched out a new string, Cal could see the marks where the arcane archer’s fingers had actually left a slight impression on the dark wooden shaft.

“Well, at least you don’t have to worry about arrows anymore,” Mole said, bringing him two quivers stuffed with arrows she’d taken from the slain half-fiends. Dannel took them, offering one to Callendes, who shook his head.

“I will not use violated weapons,” he said. “Those are beyond foul; their corruption makes me feel dirty just being near them.”

"I think some of them are corrosive, rather than specifically evil," Cal said. He held up an arm, showing where holes had been eaten through his sleeves by the acid-tipped missiles. "In any case, take what you want, leave the rest, but let's get moving." He turned to the Herald's Voice, who was being helped to his feet by Avellos. "Are you okay to go on?"

The celestial nodded. "I am prepared."

The Voice eased some of their hurts with a mass cure moderate wounds; since all of them had taken at least some damage in the desperate surge to get here, that relief was welcome. Dannel tested his new string, and shoved a handful of arrows into one of the fiends' quivers, which he slung across his shoulder. Checking their weapons, the companions moved into the dark tunnel which they knew wound steeply upward in concentric circles, up into the center of the mountain. As they walked, those wearing boots made a soft clang on the iron floor with every step.

"It even covers the floors," Umbar remarked. "The quantity of metal here used in this place..."

"It wasn't this way last time we came," Mole said. "Remember last time, with the pulsing waves? Zenna said later it was like we were in the inter... intest..."

"Intestines," Cal said.

"Yeah, the insides of a giant monster or something. Creepy stuff. I don't know if I like all the iron any better, though. Hey, did you see how I took down that glabrezu, out there? Pretty darned impressive, if I do say so myself... set it right up for ol' Beorna to take out..."

"Quiet," Dannel said.

"Well, sheesh, just because you don't..."

"No, quiet," he hissed, holding up a hand. "Do you hear that?"

They came to a stop, listening. There was a faint groaning noise that had been evident since they'd entered the citadel, as if the metal that encased the entire place was twisting under some strain. But then they heard what had alerted the elf, a rattling noise, as though someone was dropping pebbles upon the metal, from very far away.

But it was getting louder.

"Incoming," Arun said, lifting his hammer. The sharp and constant bend in the corridor made it impossible to see more than fifty feet or so ahead of them, but it also meant that any foes coming from that direction would not see them either, until they were right on top of them.

"Form a defensive wall," Lok suggested. "Spellcasters and archers to the rear."

The clattering noise grew louder as the companions took up defensive positions, forming a line across the entire width of the tunnel. Avellos took up position in the front rank, up against the right wall, while the Voice came up behind him. Lok, Beorna, and Arun made up the rest of the front rank, with Umbar just behind the paladin. Spells were cast, wards were laid.

“Damn, it sure sounds like a lot of them,” Mole said, hopping up to get a better look than she could get peering around Lok’s squat frame. “Maybe I should go take a look...”

“NO!” Beorna, Arun, and Umbar said as one. “Hold the line,” Arun added. “We’ll see what’s coming soon enough.”

The paladin’s words seemed borne out as the noise intensified, accompanied now by a gibbering din that seemed to amplify off the iron walls, until it echoed about them like the rumble of an avalanche. The companions waited, staring at the dark place where the corridor ahead rose and bent out of view.

They did not have to wait long, although the fifteen seconds after Arun’s comment seemed to last an interminable expanse of time.

And then, just as the pounding roar of sound seemed to reach an almost deafening crescendo, the wave broke over them.

Chapter 588

A flood of demons appeared around the bend, rolling and charging and crashing forward in a disorganized but overwhelming surge. They were vicious, alien things. Foremost among them were dozens of bulbous orbs about six feet across, with stubby legs and four thick arms, and huge jaws that literally erupted jagged teeth. Sleek, nimble demons that vaguely resembled emaciated apes—a semblance that instantly vanished when one got close enough to see their ugly hairless bodies or the heads that sprouted a snapping maw that ran from the top of their foreheads to the tips of their snouts. And within the dense center of the horde, huge hyena-like things the size of ponies, with greasy, matted brown fur broken by random black spikes, and a long tail that lifted high over their bodies, culminating in a nasty hooked stinger.

The abyssal creatures filled the tunnel, crowding together in a chaotic mass that actually hindered their advance. A number of the creatures stumbled and were instantly overrun by the horde, the demons idly trampling their brethren in their lust for blood and violence. The screams of the creatures redoubled as they spotted foes ahead, filling the chamber with an echoing roar that was enough to cause pain to the defending companions.

The warriors, however, were calm as they set their shields and weapons, established their stances, and met the onrushing horde. A terrible sound erupted as the front line hit, trying to simply overwhelm the defenders—and failing. The line held, and demons died as the warriors unleashed counterattacks with their deadly weapons. Arun and Lok, at the center of the line, held demons back with their shields held high even as they hewed and smashed below at the bodies behind the grabbing claws, the snapping teeth. The abyssal maws tried to seize limbs with their huge jaws, but none of them were able to get a grip on the armored bodies of the defenders in that initial surge.

But the demonic mass continued to press forward even as their van was obliterated. Demons piled atop their slain fellows, and others piled atop them, so that in a few cases the defenders faced attacks at their legs from below, and at their heads and arms from a second demon stacked above. This hindered the demons greatly, but they seemed not to care, simply focusing on the attack.

The second rank of defenders unleashed their own attacks into the mass. Arrows from Callendes and Dannel sliced past the warriors and plunged deep into the bodies of demons. Umbar thrust Alakast over Arun's shoulder, toppling an abyssal maw that was trying to leap over its fellows and come down upon the paladin. The Voice invoked a prayer that fortified them, while sapping the will of their foes. Cal spotted an abyssal stalker crawling up over the wall, poised to leap, and hit it with a ray of exhaustion from a wand that caused it to stagger and drop back into the second rank, knocking down an abyssal maw as it fell.

A wall of fallen demons built up in front of the defenders, as more of the creatures leapt into the carnage. Beorna on the left and Avellos on the right swept deadly arcs with their weapons, holding the surge at bay for the moment. One of the maws had gotten a grip on the hound archon's leg, tearing with its teeth, opening a vicious wound and threatening to bring down the celestial. But the Voice struck, driving its insubstantial sword through the body of the fiend, giving Avellos a chance to break free and regain his position as two more maws trampled the still-struggling body of their kin in an effort to get to the enemy. Their efforts only tangled them up with each other, leaving them open to blows from Avellos's axe, but neither was willing to withdraw, instead offering ineffective bites that the hound easily avoided.

In the center, Arun and Lok now had to focus most of their efforts upward, although they had to be careful of the occasional grabbing claw from the bottom of the mass of dying fiends in front of them. At least a dozen demons were now bleeding out their last upon the stone, their blood forming a slippery trail that ran down the slope of the corridor, staining the boots of the companions, splashing on their legs as they moved. Still the creatures came on, and still they died. The warriors hewed at the fiends almost mechanically, holding nothing back even as they dug deep into their reserves of strength and endurance.

"Look out!" came a warning from someone, and both Lok and Arun shifted their shields slightly to look up at the demonic wall.

The heap of abyssal maws rose almost up to the tunnel roof now, as the creatures piled atop the bodies of their kin both dead and living alike. Behind that line, the tunnel was packed with struggling demons, with the weakest or unluckiest crushed by the weight of their fellows. A few maws at the bottom of the pile apparently decided to eat their way out, and angry cries of pain emerged from the press, accompanied by the occasional spray of black demonic blood.

But the warning was directed at the center of the crowd, where a phalanx of fiends larger than the rest were pushing through. Even as Lok and Arun tensed, a quartet of abyssal ravagers leapt from the pack, piling hard into the front rank of attacking demons from behind. Their weight toppled that wall forward; Arun and Lok vanished beneath a half-dozen bloated maws, and Beorna and Avellos were cut off as the surge spilled forward around them. The ravagers, flying forward with the rest, leapt again as the pile fell, and landed in the midst of the defenders in the second rank. Callendes took a stinger through the chest and was knocked back ten feet by the impact, while to his left Dannel had to dive to the side to avoid a similar fate. Umbar lifted Alakast to strike, only to be taken down under the weight of another ravager, while the last spun as it landed, thrusting its stinger toward the back of the Voice.

With the defense now completely collapsed, the demons now surged eagerly forward to finish the job.

Chapter 589

The defenders in the second rank found themselves facing four advanced abyssal ravagers, and with the warriors cut off or buried by abyssal maws, there was no immediate help forthcoming for them.

Dannel rolled and came up to his feet as the ravager that had almost hit him spun and snarled, its stinger dipping forward as it rushed him. The elf shot and fired, but even though his shot hit the demon in the shoulder, he almost immediately had to dodge again to avoid its rush. The demon slammed hard into the tunnel wall, but quickly recovered and shot out after its prey.

Callendes's chest burned, and he felt his strength flowing from his body as the ravager's poison did its work. His celestial heritage gave him a good resistance to venoms, and ravagers were generally considered among the weaker of demonkind. But these things... they were possessed of a fury and strength he'd rarely seen. Something had bolstered them beyond the usual potency of their kind, and he had a pretty good idea of what that something was.

But there was no time for idle musing right now, as the creature that had stabbed him came charging forward to finish him off. Biting back the pain, he rolled to his feet, drawing his sword just in time to meet that charge. He only narrowly missed getting stung again, and his counterattack, weakened by the poison, glanced harmlessly off the ravager's thick hide.

The Voice, separated from Avellos by the surging rush of demons, turned to deal with the ravager threatening him. The demon's sting glanced off his chest, but failed to penetrate his silver breastplate. The sword archon's blade in turn tore through the substance of the fiend, cleaving deep into its shoulder. The demon shrieked in rage, and bore down on the celestial once again. Once again its thrust failed to harm its foe, but the Voice in turn found itself distracted as a pair of abyssal stalkers wrapped themselves around his legs, tearing at its flesh with their nasty claws. The Voice had to shift to defense as the ravager came forward yet again, threatening to push him over.

Umbar struggled beneath the weight of the last ravager, which kept him pinned beneath its considerable weight. Its stinger shot down from the side, jabbing into the gap under its body, trying to pierce the dwarf's armoured torso. Trapped as he was, the dwarf could not bring Alakast to bear, and his first attempt to heave the demon off him failed.

The dwarf was in great difficulty, but suddenly the fiend reared back, shaking its head violently to reveal an eyesocket that had suddenly become a bloody ruin. The sudden movement gave the dwarf a brief opening, and he levered Alakast up so that the demon impaled itself on the weapon's shaft as it fell back down. The staff quivered but held as a loud crack announced that the demon, rather than the weapon, was the first to give.

"Coming through!" Mole cried, becoming visible as she leapt from Umbar's foe into the chaotic knot of demons that had collapsed onto Arun and Lok. A maw saw her too late to react as she landed upon it; its jaws opened wide and it tried to grab her with its stubby claws, but she was already gone, leaving behind a deep stab wound that jetted black blood in a thin spray up into the air.

The gnome danced around the press of demons, hopping from one fat body to another, with as much ease as a child skipping across a schoolyard. The demons were all too aware of her now, and she was forced to leave off sneak attacks and focus on avoiding the snapping jaws, the claws that tried to snatch her out of mid air. She barely avoided one leaping maw, twisting her body in mid-jump as the uneven teeth snapped together an inch from her body. The demon landed off-balance and toppled into one of its kin, and both collapsed on the uneven pile.

Mole landed smoothly in a crouch on the fat corpse of a dead maw, and smiled. The maws snarled and turned toward her together, but before they could rush her, the pile suddenly heaved. Several more maws lost their footing and fell awkwardly. The pile moved again before they could stagger up again, and a golden flash briefly appeared beneath the press, followed quickly by a hiss of pain.

"Sorry guys, I can only spare one dance for you," Mole said. "But my friends will keep you entertained." While she spoke, an abyssal stalker had crept up behind her and now darted forward, claws extended. But Mole merely hopped back, spinning in mid-air to land on the fiend's knobby back. Before it could realize what had happened, she'd sprung back, disappearing over the wall of slain demons.

A loud boom sounded from beneath the pile as she left, indicating that Lok's axe, too, was still at work.

In the rear of the battleground, the defenders were likewise still dishing out the hurt to their foes. Dannel's foe followed the elf as he retreated down the tunnel, picking up speed as it charged. But the archer's ploy shifted as he suddenly stopped and spun, an arrow fitted to his bow. The ravager snarled and hurled itself forward, willing to take a hit to get to its prey.

But it could not have anticipated what happened, nor could it understand what happened with the song filled Dannel, infusing him and his bow with magical power, binding archer and weapon together. The elf's hands moved in a blur, and it seemed that with each step the demon took, another missile sprouted from its shoulders or neck. Finally the demon just leapt forward, stinger flashing ahead of it; but the elf fired once more, the arrow piercing the demon's left eye, vanishing entirely as it exploded through its skull into what passed for its brain.

The sting fell limp as the creature collapsed dead at Dannel's feet.

Callendes found himself hard-pressed by his own foe. Unable to bring his own bow to bear, too weak to fly out of its reach, he held off the creature with feeble swings of his sword. His arm bore another bleeding gash, from a grazing hit from the stinger which had thankfully failed to inject him with additional poison. But his own strikes were having little effect upon the creature.

A twisting violet beam lanced out from a point in space behind the creature, piercing its hide. At once the demon's violent movements became less certain, as a considerable portion of its strength was drained away. The demon snarled and twisted to see who had attacked it, its stinger already poised to strike. But there was nothing there, only empty space and demon bodies. It could smell something there, and it was canny enough to know that a hidden enemy was nearby, but even its powerful senses could do only so much over the reek of blood and gore that crowded the tunnel.

Given another moment it might have noticed the bloody footprints in the ground that betrayed Cal's location, but before that moment passed Callendes lunged in and stabbed his sword deep into the demon's neck. The ravager spun and returned its attention to the more immediate threat.

That proved to be a poor strategy a moment later, when a second beam hit it from behind, enervating it.

The Voice tried to surge forward through the press of demons toward the trapped hound archon, ignoring the fiends that continued to press the attack upon it from all sides. A wounded maw rose up before it, blocking its advance, and the stalkers continued to tear at its legs, their claws leaving the pristine celestial flesh ragged with bloody slashes. The ravager had fallen back, critically wounded by the celestial's blade, but as soon as the Voice had turned away it returned to the attack, stabbing it again with its stinger, this time avoiding its armor as it pierced one of the thick muscles of its wings. But the Voice was a pureblood celestial, and the toxin imparted by the sting held little threat for one such as it. Even so, there was a limit to how much abuse the archon could take, and once more it was forced to defend itself.

Just a few paces away, the piled heap of abyssal maws shifted again, those few that were still alive tumbling away as their footing became unsteady beneath them. Most of those that remained were dead, their bodies cut open or smashed into unrecognizable lumps. A few still struggled within the press, still biting at the two warriors crushed under the weight of the pile.

And then, finally, one side of the mound bulged outward, and two dead maws toppled away to reveal Lok, covered in gore, his axe thrumming with power in his hand. One maw reached for him, weakly, only to draw a backswing that split its body wide open, ending its efforts for good.

The genasi turned to help Arun, tugging away the corpses piled atop the paladin.

The demonic surge had begun to abate, and while there were demons still alive beyond the initial wall of slain attackers, most bore injuries that hindered their mobility, or were trapped under the bodies of their kin. A few maws and stalkers clambered up over the wall of their dead to join the attack, but they found themselves under renewed attack from below. Callendes and Cal had delayed the ravager threatening them long enough for Dannel to finish it, and now the arcane archer's deadly arrows found demons that belatedly joined the attack, knocking them from their precarious perches back to where they'd started. Umbar had gotten free of his foe, finishing it with a final crack to its neck, and he quickly helped the Voice by snapping the spine of the last ravager, before moving to aid Arun and Lok.

Of Beorna and Avellos, there was still no sign; the two were still cut off from the rest of the group by mounds of demons.

Demonic shrieks, accompanied by occasional comments from Mole, continued from the far side of the corpse barrier, as the gnome continued to harass the foe. She'd gone to help Avellos, but there was no sign of the archon.

It took the better part of ten minutes to find out what had happened. Arun and Lok had to physically heave away a half-dozen maws before they saw Beorna, pinned under the weight of three of the creatures, her face twisted in a grimace of pain. One had come down head-first onto her when the wall of the slain had collapsed, engulfing her entire upper body in its jaws. She'd cut her way out with Aludrial's Shard, although bits of the creature still clung to joints in her armor, and a long, broken tooth jutted from the visor of her helmet. Another maw had gotten a firm grip on her leg, and while her armor had kept it from tearing off the limb, its crushing jaws had broken the bone. Unable to move, she'd still managed to kill another two maws and a stalker that had thought her easy prey.

On the other flank of the tunnel, they found Avellos. Like Beorna, the hound archon had been crushed under the weight of several demons.

But unlike the templar, the celestial had not weathered the assault as well.

The first sign was a slain maw, clearly killed by repeated blows from an axe. When they lifted the creature off the pile, they found Avellos under it. At first, the archon appeared to be relatively unhurt; there were puncture wounds in its left leg, and one ear had been torn off by a maw's eager bite. But when they gently lifted Avellos's body, they found that its right arm was missing at the shoulder. Eventually, they found the limb in another of the maws, crushed deep under the pile by the weight of its allies. They never did find the axe; it was probably buried in another creature deeper under the pile, and none of them felt up to that level of excavation, not with the minutes darting swiftly by.

While the companions lifted the slain celestial from the wreckage, Mole stood atop the tallest point in the heap of demon corpses, high enough so that she could have touched the ceiling with only a bit of stretching. Looking around, she counted over eighty demons, and that was just the ones she could see. The corridor was so cluttered with them that they'd had to climb over the slain just to make it further down the passage.

"Damn," she said, shaking her head as she hopped down to join the others.

Wrapping Avellos in a blanket, they laid him within one of their larger bags of holding. They lingered only a few moments longer to heal their injuries, and then made their way down the open tunnel, rising higher into the interior of the Skull.

Chapter 590

“There was a clay golem in here last time... remember?”

Dannel nodded in response to Mole’s question. “I remember,” he said. He and Arun had escaped serious damage in that encounter, but Morgan and Hodge had taken a beating from the construct, before Kaurophon’s magic helped them overcome it.

The chamber was much the way they remembered it, save for the new skin of iron plates that covered the floor, walls, and ceiling. There were even some clay fragments scattered along the perimeter of the chamber that might have been remnants of that battle. The later celestial inhabitants had apparently not made any efforts to rehabilitate this part of the citadel. There were plentiful signs of the new owners, however, including a layer of disgusting ooze that gathered in clumps about the floor, and a stench that was almost thick enough to see.

“This way,” Mole said, directing them toward the spiral stair that rose upward at the far side of the room.

“Hold on,” Arun said. “No rushing off ahead. This is serious stuff, Mole.”

The gnome looked back at him. “Just because I don’t act scared, doesn’t mean I’m not.” She shrugged. “I’m the scout... I’ll go scout.”

The others followed her, making their way to the stair, then starting up.

“There is a nexus of dark power within the chamber above,” Dannel reported. “Last time, we confronted a lich there, which took shelter within it.”

“Let us hope that it currently stands as empty as this chamber,” Cal said. “The main chamber is the next one after that, correct?”

Dannel nodded.

“Then he’ll be there, most likely,” Umbar said, pausing momentarily to adjust the straps holding one of his greaves in place.

“He must know we are here,” Lok said. “I wonder why he has not taken action against us?”

“Are you forgetting the legion of fiends that we just slaughtered?” Umbar asked.

“No, Lok’s right,” Cal said. “We’ve faced the Prince before... he’s tricky, be ready for anything.... Look, Mole’s signaling.”

They looked up to see the gnome at the top of the stairs, stepping into the light cast by their weapons and items for a moment to wave an all-clear, then she vanished from view.

“Well, here we go again,” Dannel said, bringing up the rear as their column wound its way up the stair.

The dark cavern at the top of the stair was dark, and there was something malevolent about the darkness, as though the shadows around the edges of the uneven chamber were actively resisting the press of their light. The nexus that had dominated the center of the room was gone now, and Mole stood in the middle of the room near where it had been, facing away from them. She did not turn as they entered, nor did she move forward, just standing there as if her boots had suddenly become rooted to that particular spot.

“What is it, Mole?” Cal asked, sensing at once that something was wrong. But before the rogue could reply, Arun and the Voice both shouted, “Taint!” and “A foulness is here!”

The companions tensed, weapons and spells at the ready, as something moved in the shadows at the far end of the room. The darkness seemed to bleed away slightly, revealing a quintet of individuals regarding them.

They were an unusual grouping. Some were immediately familiar to the companions, such as the sleek, bat-winged succubus, or the leonine and sinister lamia. A woman that was obviously a tiefling was clad in armor of black laquer that seemed more seductive than protective, revealing as much as it warded. The woman beside her wore almost nothing save for an intricate costume of beads, metal strands, and bangles, which almost certainly contained various magical enhancements. Her skin was blue, her eyes a solid aqua, and she was likely a genasi, or some similar alien elemental being.

The last of the group, however, defied description. She was so slender as to suggest that a casual gust would catch her up and bear her away. Faint wings of the lightest gossamer drifted from her back, and her hair likewise fluttered loosely around her head, although there was no breeze in the chamber. But her face belied the soft grace of her form, with blood-red eyes that shone with malevolence, and slightly pointed teeth that protruded noticeably from her pouting lips.

All five were beautiful beyond belief, radiating a seductive air that gave all of them, even the celestials, pause. But then the Voice lifted a hand in warding.

“Your foulness gives your appearance the lie, deceivers!” the sword archon intoned. “Let the Light reveal the truth of you!”

The archon’s power rippled through the chamber, a shimmering glow that tore through the magical shadows, and with them the illusions that covered the five women. Their identities remained unchanged, but where there had been beauty, now there was utter corruption. All five of the women were disfigured, their faces ruined, bearing marks of acid, fire, the blade, or a combination of all three.

The lamia unleashed a readied spell. The iron walls within the recessed opening that led back to the spiral stairs began to swell, closing and coming together to form a solid wall blocking the exit.

The companions were quick to act; Dannel lifted his bow and took aim, while the dwarves were already starting forward, their weapons at the ready. But the half-fey thing whispered, and a cold swirl of air stirred through the room, bearing with it sinister whispers that drifted deep into the consciousness of everyone present.

You cannot succeed... there is no hope... throw down your weapons... submit to the Master...

That sinuous call was echoed by the others, who added their own power to the weaving of the first.

no hope... submit...

Someone cried out. A loud clatter of metal on stone echoed in the room, as Lok's heavy axe landed on the floor. Dannel and Callendes dropped their bows, while Alakast fumbled from Umbar's grasp. The Voice staggered, its magical sword dissipating. Even Arun stumbled to one knee, his hammer trembling in his hand, although he did not release his grip upon the weapon.

Beorna's response was rather more direct. Snarling, she shouted, "For Helm!" and she charged, lifting Aludrial's Shard high.

The succubus smiled. She lifted a clawed hand, which held a small metal orb. With a casual flick of her wrist she tossed it at the onrushing templar. Before Beorna could react, the ball exploded into a cascade of iron rings, which descended over the body of the dwarf woman. The iron bands of binding instantly tightened around her, claspng her arms against her body, and locking her legs together. Aludrial's Shard fell from her grasp as she fell hard to the ground, helpless.

The succubus chuckled and drew out a long whip; as it uncoiled dozens of tiny barbs in the weave began to twist eagerly, as if they could sense the distress of their victim.

Chapter 591

Seeing Beorna incapacitated seemed to shake Arun out of his lethargy; with a dwarvish invocation of battle the paladin hefted his holy warhammer and rushed toward their foes. The tiefling cleric hurled another spell at him, but this time the paladin's spell resistance held, and he shook off whatever fell effect was inherent in the hostile magic. But before he could reach the spellcasters, the water genasi darted forward to intercept him. The woman moved with an incredible speed and grace, and bore a pair of silver sais that spun around her hands as she moved, as though they themselves were alive. Without armor, though, and obviously giving up a lot in strength and weight to the dwarf, it looked like a one-sided clash.

Arun did not hesitate, stepping into a smite that should have crushed this foe in a single colossal impact. But the genasi woman darted smoothly inside the paladin's reach, catching the haft of the hammer with one of her sais, and directing it harmlessly around her back. She slid past the surprised dwarf, and almost casually punched her other weapon into Arun's side as she passed. Arun tried to spin around to catch her, a move that was itself impressive as the charging dwarf arrested his momentum and brought his hammer around in a quick backswing. But the woman was gone; she'd matched his movement, knifing across his back as he turned, and coming up on his far side. The sai in her left hand was slick with bright red blood down most of its length.

Cal's instincts had kicked in the moment he'd realized that this was an ambush, and even as the five women had appeared he'd covered himself in greater invisibility. The lulling whispers of the fey creature's mass suggestion had tugged powerfully at him, and he nearly succumbed to its lure. He had to marshal the full force of his own considerable will to overcome that lure, but he saw that most of his friends were not so fortunate.

As Beorna and Arun rushed forward, he tried to neutralize the enchantment with a greater dispel. But he found that the creature's magic was incredibly potent. The spell itself was obvious within the weave; it was well within his own potential, and he sensed that its caster's power did not exceed his own. But somehow, his efforts dissipated against the tendrils of energy that fueled the suggestion, and his own magic could not overcome the bindings that held his friends in their sway.

Then he looked up, and saw the gaze of the fey woman fixed upon his, and he knew.

She's countering me!

Beorna lay immobile upon the floor, held helpless within the iron bands. She quivered with effort as she tried to break the restraints, but even with the divine strength granted by her patron, they were just too much for her to sunder.

The lamia slunk forward toward the imprisoned cleric, an evil look on her face as she slid a long dagger from a black leather sheath at her side. The templar could do nothing but watch as the creature knelt beside her, drawing off her helmet and tossing it aside. As she leaned down to deliver a coup de grace, Beorna spat in her face.

With a smile, the lamia stabbed her knife toward the templar's left eye.

Arun was not in a position to intervene. Belatedly realizing how dangerous his opponent was, the paladin had abandoned power attacks and shifted to a more balanced assault. The genasi matched him pace for pace, but now her face was furrowed with concentration as she tried to dodge the deadly rain of blows from the dwarf's hammer. She dodged a quick swipe but failed to anticipate a sudden reversal as Arun jammed the haft of the weapon toward her face. She spun back out of the way, but the paladin's mailed fist clipped her shoulder, knocking her briefly off-balance.

But before the paladin could exploit his momentary advantage, a sudden crack announced a new threat, followed by an immediate explosion of pain as the succubus's barbed whip lashed around his throat. The barbs dug through his gorget as though the armor was not even there, piercing his skin, nearly overwhelming him with waves of agony that radiated outward through his body.

The genasi duelist smiled and came at him again. He lifted his hammer to defend himself, but she easily avoided the ungainly sweep of the weapon, stepping once again inside his reach. Her right sai caught the haft just above his fist, and she stabbed the other into the dwarf's elbow joint. Arun's hand spasmed as the wounding weapon drained him again, and with a snap of her off-hand, the holy hammer went flying off to the side, far out of reach. The genasi leaned in close, close enough for him to feel her breath through the slot in his helmet.

"And now, paladin, it's time for pain."

Chapter 592

"And now, paladin, it's time for pain."

The genasi's left sai came up, but before she could slide it into a vulnerable spot, Arun's mailed fist shot out, catching the duelist solidly in the face. The blow, backed by a smite evil and by the righteous power of order's wrath, knocked the much lighter woman onto her back. She was fast, very fast, to recover; snapping her legs up as she flipped onto her feet less than a second after she'd hit. But Arun, ignoring the tug of the whip still snared around his throat, followed her, and as she got up he snapped his fist around her throat. The duelist, blood pouring down her terrible face from her broken nose, stabbed him mercilessly with her wounding sai as the paladin got a firm grip and squeezed. A hissing noise came from the genasi as her air supply was cut off, but she was quick to recover, bringing her legs up, and kicking off the paladin's armored chest. The two combatants separated, with Arun staggering back, and the genasi cartwheeling back into a ready—but now wary—stance a few paces back.

Beorna could not stop the lamia from stabbing her, but she invoked the power of a protective ward upon herself. But even she was not willing to trust entirely to Helm to save her; as the sorceress thrust, she snapped her head forward, head-butting the oncoming blade. She screamed as the dagger—poisoned, she realized—tore a long gash along her temple, laying her scalp open to the bone. But the weapon failed to penetrate her thick skull, and she lived, for now.

The lamia drew back with a hiss of frustration, and immediately began spellcasting.

"She's helpless... Get the wizard, you fool!" the succubus shouted, wrestling with the weight of the paladin on the other end of her whip.

Cal's mind raced as he faced off against the fey spellcaster. He knew that he could probably overcome her counterspelling if he persisted, but he also knew that even Arun would not hold out long against the other four women for long. For the moment he seemed to have escaped their notice, but he knew that an attack would quickly draw their attention to him—and he doubted that greater invisibility alone would shield him from detection.

The succubus's shouted warning destroyed anything remaining doubts.

So the gnome reached back to his magical haversack, and drew out his lute.

The instrument felt somewhat foreign in his hands; it had been some time since he had played. He'd almost forgotten the way that the notes felt when his fingers plucked the strings, but after the first few chords, the chaos of the melee fell away from him, and he felt the music surround him, filling him with the memories of more pleasant times.

His fingers danced across the strings, playing a song of camaraderie and true faith. The harmonies cut through the false whispers of the fey creature, destroying her suggestion, restoring their freedom of action.

They were quick to respond, grabbing up their weapons.

"They are free!" the succubus warned. The fey creature lowered her head, her wings drooping as if weighed down with a sudden sadness. But when she spoke, her whispers became a soft prologue of dread, and the lilting tenors of before became a promise of destruction as she hit them with a wave of crushing despair. Again Cal tried to rally them, intensifying his playing, but this time he was less successful, and most of them could feel the weight of the dark emotions buried in the spell seep into them, stealing their resolve.

But it was not enough to stop them. The Voice invoked divine power and stepped forward, ready to engage the genasi duelist, while Lok took up his axe and started toward the lamia. But before either of them could reach their objectives, the tiefling thrall summoned a blade barrier, cutting the room, and its inhabitants, in two. The lamia bolstered this with another wall, this time a coruscating wall of fire, the surging plane overlapping with the storm of spinning blades, the surging red tongues flaring with violated energy that made the fire seem almost alive, and malevolent.

And unfortunately, leaving Arun, Beorna, and Mole alone with the five servitors of Graz'zt on the far side.

Chapter 593

Mole felt a stinging pain that cut through the haze that had fallen over her senses. She remembered coming up here to the room where they'd battled the lich; the nexus had been gone, that she'd noticed at once. The place seemed otherwise empty, although the darkness... well, there was something odd about it. She'd started to investigate, but then, the ground where she'd stepped had suddenly started to glow. She glanced down—mistake!—and saw something inscribed there, some sort of symbol...

After that, it was all kind of vague. Someone had said something to her, and she'd done what it said, standing there in the middle of the room, serving as bait...

The pain came again, hitting her with as much force as the realization of what had happened. That symbol had been a spell! But she had a more immediate problem, as another gash cut through her shirt, slicing deep into her arm. And it was hot, too. Really, really hot.

She was standing in the middle of a blade barrier, with a wall of roaring flames right behind it, sizzling hot against her back.

“Oh, crap!”

She leapt forward, and found herself in the midst of chaos. There were four—no, five Bad Guys, she saw... no wait, Bad Gals, looked like—what was up with that lady with the wings? Later... There was Arun, being beat on by a number of the Bad Gals. He didn't have his hammer, for some reason; that might explain why he was looking as badly off as he did. A few of the others were hanging back, spellcasting. Beorna was on the ground, imprisoned by some sort of metal wrappings.

Mole saw a blue-skinned woman running at Arun. The gnome leapt into a forward somersault and came down charging, her little rapier snicking out of its scabbard. With a battle cry—or a gnomish approximation of one—she bounced into the air, her rapier extended ahead of her like a spearpoint toward the duelist's face.

The genasi smoothly sidestepped, and Mole went flying past. The gnome flipped forward and landed in a roll, her momentum slowing until she came back up to her feet about seven feet away.

Arun grabbed the long strand of the whip that connected him with the succubus, but drew his hand back as the long barbs dug through his gauntlet into his hand. His neck felt like it was on fire, but the rest of his body was starting to feel numb. The wounds inflicted by the duelist's weapon continued to throb. Even with the bolstering power of order's wrath filling him, he knew that he could not take much more punishment.

“Give up, warrior,” the demon hissed at him, the words backed up by the power of another magical suggestion. “Yield, and you will be shown mercy.” The barbs in the wounds around his neck twisted, as if promising him a dire alternative.

“Not bloody likely,” Arun growled, resisting the effect. Avellos had used his backup weapon, an adamantine battleaxe; they never did find the weapon after the violent melee with the maws. That left him only a non-magical light hammer.

Well, that would suffice, if need be. The paladin started toward the succubus, but was drawn up short as the water genasi returned, stabbing him deep in the side with her sai. Arun grunted and turned, too slow to avoid a second blow that rang hard against his helmet, narrowly missing one of the narrow slots that would have meant big trouble.

“Arun! Heads up!”

He looked up to see a welcome sight; his holy avenger, flying right toward him. Mole's move against the genasi had not been an attack at all, but rather had placed her directly at the spot where the blessed weapon had fallen. The genasi's sai shot out to intercept the warhammer, but she was just an instant too slow. Arun's fist closed around the haft and brought it down in one motion. The genasi saw it coming and tried to get out of the way, but the hammer clipped her—hard—on the side of the jaw, and she twisted into a spiral that ended with her on the floor, coughing up blood.

The lamia came forward again, intent upon finishing off Beorna once and for all. But she was distracted by a low rumbling, which became a roar of battle as Lok exploded through the layered blade barrier and the wall of fire. Ignoring the painful effects of both, he charged into the lamia. The fell creature darted back and to the side, but could not avoid a slash that tore deep into her shoulder. She stepped back and hit Lok point-blank with a violated cone of cold. The white blast, infused with swirling black tendrils of negative energy, enveloped the genasi, covering him from view for a long second. The angle of the cone intersected the wall of fire beyond, causing a violent explosion of gray steam that engulfed most of the chamber, instantly dropping visibility to only a few feet.

But the lamia L'haxia did not get a chance to appreciate the consequences of her action, for the next thing she saw was an axe that exploded out of her cone, followed by the frost-rimed form of the armored genasi. There was no time for any more spells as the warrior slammed that axe into her torso, once, twice, then once more again.

And then it was done.

The succubus snarled as the steam hit her, hiding the battlefield from view. The noxious, tainted vapors offered no threat to her, of course, but the concealment offered by L'haxia's foolish action provided a tactical advantage to their foes. But she still had a connection to one of them, at least, as she drew the taut strand of her whip toward her.

The dwarf paladin appeared, his golden warhammer ready to strike. He swept the weapon around in an arc that caught the succubus solidly in the stomach. The holy power of the weapon drove her back, and she crumpled, falling into a crouch. But she did not release her grip on the whip, and when she looked up again, an unholy smile appeared on her face as she licked her bloody lips.

"A solid blow, champion of Good," she said, drawing out a long black blade the size of a shortsword from a sheath strapped to her right thigh.

Arun lifted his hammer again, but before he could strike, the succubus blackguard beat her wings and lunged forward, stabbing the sword into Arun's chest, smiting him. The cursed steel pierced his breastplate, piercing the flesh beneath, entering his lung. Blood spurted from the wound, covering the succubus's hand. With a feral look on her face, she wrenched the weapon free. Arun staggered back, his hammer falling from his hand, but the demoness gave her whip a hard yank, and the paladin fell on his face at her feet.

"Evil triumphs," she hissed, lifting the sword to finish him.

Chapter 594

One of the five Servitors had been slain, the lamia sorceress L'haxia hewn by the earth genasi's axe. But the other four were still very much in the fight, and with two strong adversaries down, and most of the rest separated from the battle by magical barriers, the outcome of the confrontation with the last champions of Good on Occipitus still teetered upon a stark precipice. Under different circumstances, these diverse creatures, brought together only by the fact of their service, would have slunk off into the shadows, to regather their strength and strike again at their enemies' weakness. But their mandate this time was clear; none were to pass this chamber to the Great Hall above, on pain of torments far worse than simple expurgation. And so they attacked, unleashing all of the considerable magical and physical arsenal they possessed upon the foe.

The tiefling cleric cast another spell, adding the potency of divine power to the multiple protections that she already wore. With wards now layering her in defense, she unclasped a light mace from her belt. With a twist of her wrist, wicked steel spikes snapped out from the head of the weapon, each smeared with a deadly toxin extracted from the venomous fauna of the Abyss. Jahaela was a creature of intrigues, deception, and sensuality, but sometimes more direct means were necessary, and when those times came she did not shy away from the occasional blood and gore of violent melee.

The fog confounded her darkvision, but she could hear the sounds of battle to her right. She started toward the warrior that had confronted L'haxia, but was interrupted by a stabbing pain that erupted in the joint of her right knee. The priestess staggered, but recovered in time to avoid a fall, and turned to see a diminutive creature standing before her. It was the same gnome thief who had fallen victim to her symbol of persuasion, earlier.

"Your sting is sharp, little thief... but mine has claimed many more!" She feinted with the spiked mace, but that was just a cover for her real attack, as she summoned the dark energies of her patron. A faint black glow began to shine around the fingers of her left hand. She waited for the gnome to attack, and it came almost at once, the little creature offering a feint of her own that was followed by a sudden leap high into the air. The girl moved fast, there was no denying that, and there would have been no chance to bring her mace around in time to catch her.

But using her weapon was not Jahaela's plan. She let the gnome get her strike—somehow, she found a weakness, and her little blade painfully pierced her shoulder—and quickly shot out her hand. All she needed was the slightest touch... but somehow the gnome managed to twist in mid-air, narrowly avoiding her hand. Jahaela followed her as she fell, thrusting at her again, again just missing as the gnome suddenly bent over backwards, the back of her head brushing the iron floor as the extended fingers swept a spare inch over her body. Before the cleric could adjust and strike again, the gnome had sprung back, just out of reach. The cleric waited, but this time, the gnome made no attempt to rush in.

"You are wise to be so wary, little thief," Jahaela hissed. "For my touch is death..."

Scyla, the water genasi duelist, rose to her feet in a barely-contained rage as the steam cloud washed over her. She did not need to see to know where that paladin was; she could hear him, from the clank of his armor to his labored breathing. Vrin'kaa had him, but she was damned if she was going to let that bitch fiend take her kill...

But she was not so focused on her prey to ignore more immediate threats. The foes on the far side of the Jahaela's blade barrier and L'haxia's wall of fire were coming through, heedless of the damage wrought upon them. Calyxia's weavings hadn't held them... but then again, Scyla was one of that few of Graz'zt's favored servants who had not specialized in enchantments, and she held little above scorn for spellcasters in general.

A broad shadow materialized out of the fog, and Scyla did not wait for it, darting in, lashing out with her twin sais. The foe—excellent, a celestial, with wings replacing arms—did not falter before the blazing speed of her assault, and soon she had it bleeding from a number of nasty punctures.

The celestial spoke the words of a spell, and Scyla chuckled inwardly; resisting magic was something she was very good at. But the spell turned out to merely be healing magic, closing most of the archon's wounds.

"I can kill you faster than you can heal, celestial," she said, launching another full attack that led her in a tight circle around it, her sais darting in and out in a blur. Within seconds, the holy creature sported a whole new set of wounds, including deep, draining punctures from her wounding sai.

The archon merely nodded, and summoned forth its hovering sword. Disarming it would be a challenge, at the very least.

Scyla smiled in anticipation of the dance.

The half-fey creature Calyxia rose above the melee on her gossamer wings. Her lips pursed into a frown as the hot steam swirled around her, scalding her delicate flesh. Without making any apparent effort she drifted over the battle. The fog held no secrets from her; to her senses, each of the living creatures in the room shone like a beacon. So many of those flickering flames she'd snuffed out in her terrible life, both in service to Graz'zt and in satisfaction of her own corrupted lusts.

She drifted over the genasi warrior, the one that had slain L'haxia. This one was strong... incredibly so, with a lifeline that extended outward beyond her ability to sense. He would give even Vrin'kaa trouble, she sensed.

Well, that was easy enough to handle. Drifting over him, she summoned her power, and enveloped him in a weave of whispers that seeped into his thoughts, building a wall of inaction around his conscious mind.

Held, Lok couldn't even look up as the creature flew over him and ascended up into the center of the room. The blade barrier had gone down, she saw, and as she watched the wall of fire joined it, sundered by magic. She could see the source of that as well, the gnome archmage that had disrupted her song earlier.

Well. Her whispers would not call to him, but there were other ways of dealing with such.

Her musings were interrupted as a driving pain pierced her. Calyxia released a terrible scream as the seeker arrow tore at the very fabric of her, a vicious, nasty arrow infused with hatred of all that she was. The half-fey shifted her attention to the archer... or rather, two of them, although the first was much stronger, she saw. He had been the one who had fired the arrow, although it seemed he had lost her, now, his aim shifting through the cloud. There was something else about him... a song to match her own, but shining with a soft light, a contrast to the dark energies that fueled her own sinister melody.

The pain of her wound energized her, and she dragged that song into a place of agony and discordance. The harmonies of the whispers that she used to insinuate her control into the minds of others shattered, replaced by a terrible pulse of sound that exploded out of her like a stream of bile.

The greater shout hit the three with an obvious impact, knocking them back, the shining light of their life-force disrupted by the terrible disruption of the sound. Content that they were at least temporarily removed as a threat, she spread her wings and rose higher, almost brushing the ceiling as she brought her will to bear once again, rebuilding her harmonies into a song of discord.

All of these events swirled around the center of the room, where the succubus Vrin'kaa stood triumphant over the battered form of Arun Goldenshield, unable to save himself from the blackguard's victory.

"Go back to the pit, you evil bitch!" Umbar yelled, leaping forward over Arun's prone form to engage the fiend with Alakast. The staff shot out and clipped her on the forearm, knocking the handle of her whip from her hand. But the succubus was quick to respond, slashing out with her shortsword, the weapon crunching into his armored side, hurting him even through the layers of plate and padding that he wore.

"Your faith is weak, dwarf. Kneel before me, and yield to my dark Master!"

The command was backed by another suggestion, but this time the cleric's willpower was strong enough to resist, and he answered only with another sweeping strike from Alakast.

"I'll give your Master your head, when I see him!" the dwarf said, swinging the staff around again. But this time the end of the staff glanced off one of the curved adamantine plates that protected at least part of her body, and inflicted no damage.

The succubus snarled and met him again in a violent exchange of blows. It was hard to determine who had been hurt worse, but it was clear that the cleric, already damaged by passing through the blade barrier and the wall of fire, was in increasingly dire shape.

"You cannot stand before me alone, holy man," the succubus said, taunting him, her sword's point dancing in her hand as they circled.

"Perhaps you are right," the cleric said. He turned and knelt, opening himself up to the demon's thrust. He took the hit, which crunched hard through the armor covering the back of his right shoulder, but it did not stop him from unleashing a powerful healing spell into the prone form of Arun.

The paladin stirred, his hand finding, and tightening, around the haft of his warhammer.

The Herald's Voice healed itself again, drawing a contemptuous snicker from its adversary. Thus far, the archon had not been able to land even a single hit upon the darting form of Scyla. The duelist, on the other hand, even fighting defensively, had been able to inflict a number of additional wounds upon her foe. Long trails of blood ran down its body, and its movements now left bloody prints upon the iron floor.

"At least the paladin was a worthy foe," she said. "It is time to finish this farce." She shifted her stance as she came in again, lifting her earlier cautious advance, and focusing now on the attack as she came in with both sais diving in ahead of her.

The Voice did not retreat. It took several devastating hits, with droplets of blood spraying out around it as the sais worked their deadly work. But it got what had been waiting for; with the duelist no longer fighting defensively, she was at least slightly vulnerable. Scyla kept a close eye on the hovering sword, but the blade did not move, did not even flinch.

By the time she realized that something was wrong, it was too late.

The archon sighed, and dropped its wings down across its body. One brushed the duelist's shoulder, just slightly...

As it spoke a word of dread power, calling upon the power of Destruction to unleash a harm spell into the genasi.

Scyla screamed and staggered backward. Her body wrenched painfully, and blood exploded from her ears, nostrils, and mouth as the terrible spell wracked her form. Speed and skill were her weapons, not durability, and the spell took her to the brink of death.

The Voice looked up, fearsome with blood running down its perfect body, its wings unfolding to reveal a stern expression that brooked no mercy.

The celestial started forward.

The duelist ran, or at least tried to.

As the first discordant sounds of the half-fey's song of discord began to echo through the chamber, Dannel looked over at Cal.

"We've got to stop her!"

"Counter the song!" Cal said, already calling upon his arcane sight to find the source of the magic through the concealing fog. He saw the creature almost immediately; she was a beacon of magical auras, her very nature infused with magic, and layered with wards both recognizable and unfamiliar. The tug of her song impacted his consciousness, prodding him toward violence, threatening to steal away his volition. But Dannel's voice cut through that haze, the elf's sharp harmonies clashing with the discordance of that other song. She would quickly realize that Dannel was blocking her, and would counter. They did not have much time.

But Cal only needed a few seconds, as he lifted his rod, and disintegrated her.

Mole fell back as the tiefling cleric pursued her relentlessly, her charged slay living spell needing only the slightest touch for release. The gnome could have easily lost the priestess in the obscuring fog, but she knew that her friends were very, very busy right at the moment, and that the sudden reappearance of the thrall in the fray could turn the balance against them. She had narrowly avoided a sweep of that hand that had been so close she could feel the air from its passage against her cheek. Now, as she backed away from that near miss, the iron walls of the room closed in around her, and she realized that the nook she'd been chased into had only one exit.

And the tiefling stood in the middle of it.

“A merry chase, little thief, but it ends now... my sisters will require my aid.”

Mole heard something in the fog, and whistled loudly.

“What...”

She too heard the clank a moment later, and turned just in time to take a solid blow from Lok's axe to the center of her torso. The blow was partially absorbed by her armor, but it clearly hurt her. She touched Lok on the face, unleashing her spell; but against Lok's fortitude, she may as well have tried to slay a brick wall. Seeing that the spell wasn't stopping him, she brought up her mace, and smashed it against his shoulder. One of the spikes jabbed under his shoulder plate and drew blood. Jahaela's confidence started to return as she yanked the mace free and saw that; the poison on the weapon was strong enough to lay a dire elephant mewling upon the ground.

But Lok merely grunted, and brought his axe up one more time.

“Ah, you see, he's really, really tough to kill,” Mole said, walking forward as the genasi unleashed a full attack into the priestess. The gnome was ready to add in a sneak attack to finish her, but it wasn't necessary.

Vin'kaa staggered as another blow from Arun's hammer came crashing down into her body. The succubus was the one falling back now, her body already battered and bruised from the hits she'd taken. Her sword was slick with his blood, but with each exchange it seemed as though the holy warrior got stronger, and the demon got weaker. Finally, the succubus snarled, “The Master will destroy you!” and lifted her sword for one more desperate strike.

Arun cut her off with a swing that stove in her skull.

The room grew quiet. The steam was already beginning to dissipate, revealing a scene of utter carnage. The blood spattered liberally about the place was in good part that of the companions, but it was the five Servitors—well, four in any case, as the half-fey was just motes of dust floating in the air—that lay slain. The lamia and tiefling lay in hacked up heaps, the succubus's skull was a bloody mess, and the water genasi lay in a pool of spreading blood, an arrow from Callendes's bow buried in her back.

Arun and Lok turned to help Beorna from the iron bands; without knowing the command word for the device, they had to destroy it to free her. They had taken an incredible beating; this time none of them had escaped serious injury. Beorna's face was a mask of blood, the white of her skull showing where the lamia's knife had cut away her scalp. The other warriors had taken serious damage; Umbar could barely stand on his own, and as the surge of battle faded Arun had to prop himself up with his hammer to avoid falling. The Voice's wounds still trailed blood, even after an initial healing; all of his more powerful spells had been drained. Dannel, Cal, and Callendes had avoided the melee, but their hides were scorched by their proximity to the wall of fire, and blood trailed from the nostrils of all three, the effects of the fey creature's great shout. Even Mole was covered in gashes from the blade barrier.

"One more room," Arun said, taking up his hammer. His own healing was expended, but Beorna touched him and channeled positive energy into him, helping him even before addressing the terrible wound she herself bore.

"I'm completely out," Dannel said, as he used his song to weave a minor healing spell around the heavily battered Lok.

Cal nodded. "Don't hold anything back," he told the others. "Heal what you can, then let's go."

Mole had started looting the bodies. "We don't have time for that," Umbar frowned, as he went through his remaining spells, converting them into healing for himself and the others.

"I will be done by the time you are," Mole said simply. "And better that we have this stuff, than the demons that will come after us." She went on efficiently divesting the slain of their items, putting them into her bag of holding after only a cursory evaluation.

With the Voice adding his strength to Beorna and Umbar, they were able to heal the worst of their injuries. But as Cal had said, they didn't hold anything back, and so their powers were depleted as they companions gathered again, lifted their weapons with tired arms, and ascended the spiral staircase at the far end of the room.

Toward the Great Hall, and their final confrontation with Graz'zt.

Chapter 595

Flying demons screamed as they circled the Iron Skull, their cries amplified by the loud din coming from below, where the press of thousands of their kin pressed around the base formed a scene of pure chaos. Hundreds of demons had already perished trying to force their way through Cal's prismatic wall, and the attempts of others to tear away enough of the mountain to get around it had likewise failed. Demons hung impaled from the spikes that jutted from the fortress, and others lay trampled into the ground, crushed by their own kind. Order was threatening to break down entirely among the ground-based majority of the demon horde, with even the nalfeshnees appointed by Graz'zt barely able to assert any kind of order among the gathered mass. The heavily armored enforcers had created a perimeter around the entrance for now, their dictat enforced by the jagged weapons of abyssal steel that they brandished. Within that circle the higher-order demons continued to work at the barricaded entrance, although it looked as though nothing would be entering until the wall's duration expired.

A new figure appeared in the sky above the fortress, flying fast from the direction of the Bastion. A wing of demons ascended to meet it, ready for battle, but they withdrew when the newcomer got close enough for them to identify. A few shouted queries at the intruder, but he ignored them all, flying directly toward the summit of the Skull.

Malad, mounted upon a fiendish griffon, descended upon that jagged peak. Once there had been an opening here, the Smoking Eye from which plasms had risen into the roiling sky. That had ended with the defeat of Adimarchus, and now with the ascendancy of Graz'zt the opening too was gone, sealed by an implacable barrier of iron. There wasn't even a clear place to land, as spikes and jagged ridges protruded everywhere from the fortress's apex. Malad barked an order to his mount, and as the creature hovered he leapt free, using his own powers to carry him safely down to a precarious perch on a jutting ledge ringed with spikes.

The tiefling bent into a crouch, and ran a hand along the rough surface of the structure. He felt a momentary sting as a small jutting edge sliced open his hand; there was nowhere on the Skull that was truly safe. But the sorcerer's focus was on other things, and he barely felt the pain as his blood oozed out over the metal.

I cannot feel Him, he thought. He closed his eyes and extended his perceptions, letting Synesyx feed him sensory input that went beyond what even his augmented senses could discern. But he did not detect anything more than the obvious and potent energies of Occipitus itself, which was focused on this place. Could that overwhelming aura be masking the presence of Graz'zt?

Of one thing he had no doubt; the intruders from the Prime were here, inside the Skull. Malad doubted they had already found his Master; that he would have felt, no matter what the distance or intervening obstacles filled the space between them.

The tiefling felt a tingle and shifted his attention to a particular spot. Idly he nodded; as always the sentience within his armor had anticipated his thoughts.

He spread his arms and rose slowly into the air. The griffon, sensing that something unpleasant was about to occur, immediately lifted off and flew away. A number of the flying demons had also begun to circle immediately overhead, curious about what was happening.

Malad seemed to vibrate with power, and the air around his hands began to shift and distort. The tiefling did not waste time reveling in his magic; unlike his dark lord, he was much more practical in his application of power.

He flung one, then a second, sonically-substituted fireball at the spot that Synesyx had indicated, where a seemingly impenetrable iron plate buttressed a squat, uneven tower. The structure jutted from the top of the skull like a wart, and seemed to have no purpose, lacking both windows and doors to the interior. But one familiar with Occipitus might recognize its location as perched atop what had once been a gaping opening in the skull, the “smoking eye” that had been the plane’s most recognizable landmark.

The echoes of the blast exploded through Occipitus’s turbulent sky. Demons shrieked and drew further back, confused. Malad did not cease, firing off a sonic chain lightning that ran along the perimeter of the bulkhead, and then another sonic blast, and then another chain lightning.

The air around the target point was rippling with the distortions released by the tiefling magic, but the surface of the Iron Skull resisted the assault.

Malad began to slowly drift downward, firing off more blasts as he descended. Three more sonic explosions, and his last chain lightning, and then a rapid-fire stream of sonic rays that ended with him almost atop the bulkhead, blasting it at point-blank range. Blood was streaming down the tiefling’s face from his nostrils, as the backlash from the released energy washed over him. But the sorcerer’s expression was focused entirely upon the spot that he was hitting, pouring destructive magic against the iron bulkhead.

And the metal was clearly reaching its breaking point. The bulkhead was crushed inward, the iron rivets holding it in place twisted and cracked. A loud and ominous creak that sounded even over the energy of the sonics rose from deep within the structure, as the weight of the tower above began to exert an additional pressure upon the ravaged iron plate.

Malad fired off one last sonic, so close that he could almost have stretched out to touch the metal.

The bulkhead exploded inward, vanishing into the darkness beyond. The creaking noise became an angry screaming, as the full weight of the tower superstructure began to tilt over the new gap.

Malad did not hesitate, vanishing into the void.

A number of demons, watching the entirely scene, dove after him. A pair of vrocks reached the dark gap at almost the same instant, which was also the same moment that the tower collapsed, thousand of tons of iron toppling over in a crescendo of destruction. The vrocks were utterly obliterated, smashed between implacable masses of iron. The other demons drew back in alarm, one chasme failing to react quickly enough to avoid being spitted on one of the long spikes that rose from the new summit of the Skull. The others rose up and continued their orbit, looking for gaps that did not exist. The falling tower had completely covered the gap, leaving the fortress of Graz’zt as impervious as it had been a few minutes before.

Chapter 596

Malad slowly drifted to the ground, his bare feet touching the cold iron floor. The crushed bulkhead lay a few feet away, twisted into an almost unrecognizable mound of ruined metal.

The tiefling sorcerer did not have to search for his Master.

The Prince of Shadows, the former Argent Lord, the demon known as Graz'zt and a hundred other names on a thousand different worlds, lay insensate in the arms of his massive throne. His huge corrosive greatsword lay propped awkwardly against the step at the foot of the throne, and his long limbs were draped almost casually over the chair's protruding arms, as if he'd been tossed into it. The demon's head lay tilted far to the side in what would have been an extremely uncomfortable position, if he could feel discomfort. But it was immediately obvious that Graz'zt was feeling nothing whatsoever. His good eye was shut, and within the bare socket of his right, the Heart of Axion slumbered too, a dull gray orb deep within its nest.

Malad approached the seat of his Lord. The iron floor felt like ice beneath his feet. That was one difference that gave the lie to this place, which at the same time was so familiar and yet so alien to him. It would never be the same, he knew, no matter whether Graz'zt succeeded in his gambit here, no matter how far he went in trying to recreate what had been lost.

"My Lord, your enemies are upon you."

The unconscious demon did not react. The effort of his twin casting, the strain of unleashing a pair of incredibly potent epic spells within the space of a minute, had drained him. Piled upon that incredible effort, the struggle against his son, while it had ended in victory, had pushed the demon beyond his limits. It had been Malad who had placed him here, in this chair, and he had not stirred from this position since then. It might be hours before he recovered, or years, Malad knew.

The sorcerer stood before the throne. Even with Graz'zt incapacitated, he felt an almost overwhelming urge to kneel, to prostrate himself before the being that he'd served since he was old enough to discern the nature of reality. A part of him that had always been there whispered that a chance was being offered here; Graz'zt would never be as vulnerable as he was now. Perhaps a new Prince could be raised in this very room...

From deep within the Heart of Axion came a flicker of light.

Malad's expression tightened. He started forward, but suddenly froze in mid-movement as Synesyx flowed down over his legs, the scales claspng tightly to his muscled limbs. The sorcerer frowned and focused, but he could not move. Graz'zt was almost close enough to reach out and touch, but instead of leaning forward, the tiefling drew himself up and relaxed. The armor loosened enough for him to stand easily, but did not withdraw from its grip upon his lower body.

Malad closed his eyes, and made an offer.

The scales fell away, forming a loose skirt that flowed around Malad's legs as he came forward and knelt at the demon's feet. Reaching out, he touched Graz'zt's hand. The perfect skin felt cool beneath his touch. Malad took the hand, and lowered his head, settling the six long fingers upon it.

Synesyx stirred, but did not interfere.

Malad began to speak, muttering dark syllables that seemed to twist and refract, although his voice was not really loud enough to echo off the adjacent walls. The words he spoke were not the arcane speech of magic, but rather more ancient and sinister syllables that had been born ages ago in the deepest pits of the Abyss. They formed the basis of a ritual that Malad had only seen enacted twice, but which had burned into his memory like a brand. He had thought that he might someday participate in it, but never in the role that he was currently enacting.

But he did not pause, the words growing stronger, fueling the connection between himself and the Prince. The fingers upon his skull began to tighten, the long black nails digging into his skin. Wisps of black energy began to form around those points of connection, and still Malad spoke on, repeating the cadence of corrupted sounds, drawing deep upon the ancient heritage of the dark lords of the Pit.

Graz'zt stirred.

Malad's face twisted into a snarled rictus of utter agony. Yet still the words trailed from his lips, each syllable torn from between clenched lips.

Synesyx tightened around Malad's body again, but this time it was to keep the sorcerer from collapsing.

Finally, the flow of sounds failed. Wisps of black smoke rose from the shrunken body of the tiefling. Malad slumped to the ground, leaving streaks of flesh affixed to the demon's long fingers. He was naked.

Graz'zt's left eye opened.

The Prince smiled.

Chapter 597

The companions emerged from the final spiral staircase onto a scene of horror and wonder.

The chamber at the top of the Skull had been completely transformed. Only the presence of the burning pillar on the far side of the room identified this as the same place where they had completed the Test of the Smoking Eye, the same place where they defeated the demon prince Adimarchus.

The chamber now resembled a great hall, with huge thirty-foot pillars buttressing the vaulted iron ceiling above. Dark and sinister forms had been carved into the pillars, which separated huge windows of stained glass that depicted intricate scenes of vice and depravity. Those panes were utterly dark; the originals had opened onto the unholy skies of Azzagrat, but these were backed only by layers of thick stone and iron.

To either side recessed alcoves appeared to open onto further galleries. This was an optical illusion; the Skull simply did not have the physical capacity of the Argent Palace. But it gave the chamber the impression of being much larger than it actually was.

The room was not empty. To the left, a row of six massive figures stood, giants with thick wings spreading out from their backs, visages wreathed in smoke, and massive weapons in their hands—a whip in the left, and a burning sword in the right. These were Graz'zt's generals, six of the mightiest of the balors, the Fingers of the Dark Lord's Fist. They were so realistic that for a second several of the companions lifted weapons and spells to defend themselves... before the ruddy red glow of the pillar revealed them for what they were, representations formed in iron, copies frozen in poses of respect to the Great Throne.

Of those six lords of demonkind represented in metal, two had been in Zelatar when the Disaster had struck, and had been vaporized along with much of the city. Another had been slain seventeen seconds later, when a gate on one of Graz'zt's vassal worlds had opened, and sixty cornugons had stormed through. One had actually been missing for years; it was believed that it had been trapped by mortals upon one of the Primes where Graz'zt had been struggling for dominance. The last two balors, true to their kind, had turned coat the moment the magnitude of the Disaster had become known, switching allegiance to two of the Prince's many rivals.

On the other side of the hall, another row of creatures recreated in iron paid homage. These statues were less distinct: twenty mariliths, their features only vaguely represented in the metal. These effigies too represented the fallen, either in the Disaster or in the desperate struggles that had followed, when Graz'zt's legions had been fallen upon by eager foes from every quarter. Few of those had even survived long enough to betray their allegiance.

There was a last group slightly behind the throne, to the side. They represented only a small fraction of Graz'zt's fabled harem, but their features were precise, their faces perfectly captured in the cold iron. They were the only fully distinct features in the chamber; everything else was slightly off, warped and imperfect. All of those depicted had been destroyed within the first second of the Disaster.

The throne itself was empty, although there was a shriveled husk of something on the floor beside it.

"He's here," the Voice said, moving into the room, the celestial's sword hovering in the air before it.

"Spread out," Lok whispered, walking slowly forward, his axe at the ready. The others followed behind, their eyes and their magic peering into every corner, every shadow.

"Show yourself, demon!" Arun shouted, his voice echoing in the sepulchral emptiness of the hall. "Or do you fear suffering the same fate as Adimarchus?"

"I am here," came a voice from everywhere, echoing throughout the chamber, and inside their heads. All eyes turned to the throne, where the air rippled, and a tall figure stepped through the distortion to face them.

It was the Prince, his wrecked face revealed, his wavy-bladed greatsword dripping acid in his hand. The gray shine of the Heart of Axion shone from the cavernous socket of his ruined eye, and a suit of silvery scales rippled over his muscled torso; Synesyx had found a new Master.

“I have long waited for this confrontation,” the demon said. “At last the architects of my downfall are within my grasp. Along with a new set of champions, who cheated me out of enjoying the torments of my favorite rival.”

“You brought your fate upon yourself,” Lok said. “All we wanted was our friend.”

“And you lost him as well, in the end,” Graz’zt said. “For nothing that is Mine shall I relinquish, even unto its utter destruction.”

“Looks like you lost a big chunk of your fa...” Mole piped up, only to trail off as the demon’s one eye fixed upon her.

“Your rule is at an end, demon,” the Herald’s Voice said. “Occipitus rejects you.”

“Occiptus is mine. As are you.” His gaze shifted slightly, to Cal. “Your thoughts already betray your despair. Do not place hope in your missing companion; the priestess of Selûne has already fallen into a snare that I laid, with your little demonspawn boy as bait.”

“You’re forgetting something, fiend,” Beorna said, lifting Aludrial’s Shard. “We’ve already taken down one Prince, in this very room. One more won’t be that much of a bother.”

“We will finish the job that Delem began,” Lok said, with finality.

“Yeah! Ah... you’re toast, Grazy!” Mole added.

The Prince chuckled. “Mortals. You are always so amusing.”

“Delem was mortal,” Cal said. “And yet he destroyed the world that you’d created. Centuries of effort, torn down in an instant.”

“Millenia,” Graz’zt responded. “And that is how long I will extend my torments of each of you.”

“Might as well get started then,” Dannel said, lifting his bow and firing his readied arrow in a single fluid motion.

The missile streaked across the room toward the Prince, its path perfectly aligned to intersect with the demon’s remaining eye. But Graz’zt spoke a word of power, the Heart of Axion flared, and a surge of dark energy erupted outward from the fiend. Dannel’s arrow hit that wave and froze; the missile hung in midair for a split second before it shattered and evaporated. The spellsurge hit the companions like a wave, knocking each of them down.

Graz'zt seemed to hover within a black halo of roaring energy that swirled around him like a breaking tide. "THE HOUR OF YOUR UNDOING IS AT HAND!" he said, each word filling the chamber, echoing off the walls and building until they formed a crescendo that drove all else, including conscious thought, fleeing before them.

Chapter 598

Benzan clutched his pathetic little knife, and stood his ground before the impenetrable barrier of the cliff behind him. "All right, who wants to die first?" he snarled, sweeping the weapon menacingly before him, his gesture of defiance undermined somewhat as he staggered under a sharp new wave of pain from the puncture in his side.

"Oh, bravo," the succubus chuckled. She gestured, and the bar-Igura came at him, lunging at him to snap him up in its long arms.

Benzan screamed and leapt, accepting the agony that his body inflicted upon him for the movement. The ape-demon, surprised, tried to intercept him, but the tiefling got within its reach, the hook-knife jabbing up and catching it on the corner of its jaw. As he darted under its right elbow he yanked hard on the weapon. It must have caught on something tender, for the demon roared in pain and twisted around after him.

The tiefling tried to slip the knife free as he got around the bar-Igura, but the point was snagged on the hard bone of its lower jaw, and he had to let go to avoid a backswing from a muscled arm. It hit him anyway, the demon's forearm slapping him so hard across the back that he nearly fell flat on his face. But that impact probably helped him avoid being pinned by the hound, which slammed hard into him a moment later. The hound's neck contorted as it snapped its head around at a violent angle, and as it flew past it locked its jaws onto Benzan's left hand. The two foes spun for a moment, connected by that bloody link, and then the hound's jaws came together in a meaty crunch, and Benzan and the hound fell back.

Benzan tried to rise, but his head felt woozy, his movements lethargic as a red haze began to fall over his vision. He looked down and saw that his left hand was missing three fingers.

His world returned to clarity a moment later as a new, intense pain exploded in his chest, driving away the welcome fog of semiconsciousness. He looked up to see the succubus grinning ferally at him, then he looked down to see the ruin of his chest. The blow from the demon's whip had taken a strip of flesh six inches long across his left breast, including his nipple, leaving torn muscles that oozed bright red blood.

"Such passion," she said, the way that a starving man might comment about a haunch of roasted beef placed before him.

The bar-Igura—spitting out the hook-knife—and the hound demon circled him, wary of any more tricks.

For Benzan, it was too much. He slumped back to his knees, unable to even summon concern as the succubus drew back her whip for another strike.

“Get your filthy hands off of him,” a familiar voice sounded from behind him.

“Well, well,” the succubus said.

That voice had a power for the tiefling; he had heard it thousands of times since his capture, whispering promises of hope deep within the hidden recesses of his mind that Graz’zt’s minions had sought to extinguish. He turned, painfully, to see Dana, beautiful and terrible with the soft glow of layered magical wards about her, framed in the shifting chaos of a gate that had opened directly in front of the cliff wall.

“Pleased you could join us at last, Dana Ilgarten,” the succubus crooned. Benzan turned back, and saw what he’d sensed before confirmed. His time of captivity had given him some insight into the thoughts of the demons that served Graz’zt; he realized that the succubus’s words were not bravado; she had not been surprised by Dana’s appearance, and if nothing else, she was... pleased.

“Dana, no,” he croaked, turning back to his wife. “It’s a trap...”

Dana did not shift her attention from the demoness, her face a barely constrained map of determination warring with fury. The bar-Igura grunted and leapt at her, but she shifted her gaze upon it, imploding it.

“A bit of overkill,” the succubus commented.

“I am just giving you a chance to see what I am going to do to you,” the priestess said.

Nonplussed by the fate of its comrade, the fiendish hound crouched and leapt at Dana from the opposite side. Its leap suddenly arrested in midair, and it hung there a moment, snarling and thrashing, before it flew across the clearing, landing in an iron bush that collapsed in an eruption of sharp thorns and jagged-edged branches. Laertes Leonidas appeared as his invisibility faded, the werelion’s claws bloody.

“And you brought a friend for us to enjoy as well,” the succubus commented. She had still made no move to attack or defend herself. “How nice.”

Dana hit the succubus with an implosion, but the power of the spell flared against an amulet that the demoness wore around her neck, and dissipated. The succubus smiled. The werelion started forward, but Dana stopped him with a raised hand.

“Tell Graz’zt that we’ll be back for him,” Dana said, coming forward to stand protectively beside Benzan.

“You can tell him yourself,” the demoness said, as she brought her hand up.

“No!” Benzan cried, but it was too late.

A beam hit him, enveloping him with a soft green glow that seemed to sink into his skin, permeating him. He looked up and saw that Dana had been hit by one as well. He had enough experience with magic to recognize a dimensional anchor, and as he looked behind his wife he saw the gate close as well, dissolving to reveal the cold implacable reality of the cliff wall behind.

Several female demons appeared in the sky above, half-fiends or succubi by the look of them, clutching wands.

A familiar hiss sounded around the perimeter of the clearing, as demons teleported in. Ten of them, all hezrou demons, fat and leering.

Another noise drew his gaze up. Atop the cliff, a familiar noise of eight massive legs scraping on metal.

The retriever appeared at the edge of the cliff, its beam-eyes pivoting in their sockets as they fixed upon the mortals below. The creature was flanked by another pair of fiends, massive thick-bodied humanoids the size of ogres, armed with longbows and greataxes. They had barbed arrows with heads the size of his fist drawn and ready to fire.

Turning back, Benzan met the cold stare of the succubus. “Did you think you could just creep away from the grasp of our Master, little tiefling? No... this is just the first task you will perform in the service of the Great Lord. And as a reward...”

Her gaze rose to meet Dana’s. “As a reward, you will get to watch the suffering of the woman you love, knowing that you betrayed her to us.”

The demons all started laughing, a sinister sound that filled the clearing, echoing off the cliff face until the distorted cackles surrounded them on every side, stealing hope like the thrust of a blade.

Chapter 599

The Voice was the first to recover, rising and spreading its white wings as it lifted off and dove straight for the Prince. Its sword rematerialized in front of it as the usually-calm face of the celestial took on a tinge of righteous rage against this embodiment of everything that it stood against, this most foul of demons. The archon moved with great speed, the sword singing as it clove the air, striking the demon in the chest.

Black energy roiled as the blade of holy energy intersected Graz’zt’s unholy aura. The archon was rebuffed, the backlash of power overcoming it, but it quickly recovered, its sword coming up again to strike.

But Graz’zt did not give it the chance. The demon lifted his massive sword in both hands, and with an exultant snarl he clove the blade downward, through the celestial’s body. The Voice did not even have a chance to scream as the great sword ended it, cutting a vertical slash through it from the center of its skull through the bottom of its torso. The two halves of the archon fell apart, landing in a heap of white cloth and red blood and flesh that continued to sizzle as the acid from the Prince’s sword continued to eat away at it.

“By the gods!” Dannel exclaimed, overwhelmed despite himself.

“Take him!” Arun urged, taking up his hammer and rushing forward. Beorna was already a step ahead of him, with Lok only a pace behind. As they ran, they picked up speed, as Cal’s haste spell lightened their steps.

The Prince smiled, lifted his sword, and waited for them.

Beorna had called upon the divine power of Helm while Graz’zt had addressed them earlier, and her booted feet seemed almost to fly across the floor as she charged. With divine strength flowing through her, she rushed straight at the Prince and smote him.

But the blow never landed. Whether through a moment of self-doubt that distracted her from her attack, a dark power inherent in the desultory glance from the Prince, or merely a slip on the slick trail of the Voice’s insides splattered across the floor, the templar fumbled her swing badly. Aludrial’s Shard hissed through empty air, the dark trails of the unholy aura barely stirred by its passage. Off-balance, Beorna stumbled and fell, the sword clattering loudly upon the ground.

“The champions of Good,” Graz’zt sneered. “How very impressive.”

“Burn in the Pit, fiend!” Arun shouted, slamming his holy warhammer solidly into the Prince’s side. The blow rang hard through the unholy aura and struck sparks as it clashed off of Synesyx. Had Graz’zt been a mortal, the blow would have caved in his torso and knocked him flying across the room.

The Prince merely grunted as he turned to face the paladin.

“My pretties might enjoy the embrace of such as you,” he said, smacking the dwarf in the chest with an open palm, and heaving.

Arun went flying, lifting into the air and traveling almost fifteen feet to slam hard into the iron figures of Graz’zt’s harem. Several statues were heavily damaged by the impact of the armored paladin, and an arm broken off of one of the female images went skittering across the floor. Arun was not seriously hurt, but as he started to pull himself free from the wreckage, he felt resistance on his arm.

Looking down, he saw that one of the arms of the statues had twisted around his own.

And with a creak of metal, he felt another solid grasp tighten on his right leg. Looking up, he saw a sculpted face turn slowly to face his.

Lok had to divert his charge to get around Beorna and Arun, but he swung around to come at the demon from the flank, his thundering axe ready to strike. His weapon lacked the holy powers of those wielded by the dwarves, but Beorna had aligned it as they neared this chamber, in the hopes that this would give him a chance at penetrating the Prince’s considerable damage resistance.

But while the genasi's first swing was a strong one, the axe glanced harmlessly off the demon's armored torso, inflicting little more than a light sting.

Arrows knifed across the room, but the first shots from Callendes and Dannel likewise seemed to have little or no effect upon the demon lord, bouncing off his body or vanishing within the unholy aura, leaving no mark upon him.

Umbar had hesitated during the initial rush, not from doubt, but rather to call upon the power of Moradin to fill him with righteous might. As the dwarf grew to over ten feet in height, he started forward, lifting a greatly-enlarged Alakast to strike down the demon lord.

Beorna, spitting a curse, grabbed the Shard as she rose to one knee, thrusting it up into the demon's side. A white flare of light erupted from the weapon as its head drove through the unholy aura, penetrating the armor and the thick hide beneath. Graz'zt snarled and turned back to her; as her weapon tore free from the wound black ichor smoked upon the tip of the blade.

"You dare to strike me, bitch!" he snarled, whipping his own sword around. The greatsword slammed into the side of her head with enough force to both dent her helmet and knock it flying from her head. Staggered, blood oozing from a deep gash in her scalp, she nevertheless managed to bring up Aludrial's Shard to meet a follow-up thrust that was aimed for her throat. The holy bastard sword clanged against the abyssal steel, and while she could not fully parry Graz'zt's thrust, she did manage to avert the killing thrust. The Prince's sword still drove through her shoulder, piercing both the front and rear plate of her armor. Beorna screamed, and was driven to the ground as the demon kicked her in the chest, knocking her off the blade.

"A pity you are so unbelievably ugly," the demon said, as Beorna, half-conscious, mewled in pain.

Ignoring Lok's attacks, which continued to be ineffective, the demon turned to face the charging Umbar. The cleric, looming over the Prince, brought Alakast down in a potent blow that erupted in a white flash as it glanced off the demon's head. But if Graz'zt was harmed by the attack, it wasn't obvious to look at him.

"Have you slain many fiends with that staff, priest of Moradin?"

"I'm about to slay one more, demon!"

Umbar swung the staff in an all-out strike, but Graz'zt moved faster. The Prince brought up his sword, and with a powerful swing of his own he sundered Alakast. The staff released a sick crashing sound as the abyssal steel clove through it, driving through to smash into the base of Umbar's breastplate. Umbar was knocked roughly back, stunned, his breath driven from his lungs by the force of the blow.

"I thought you dwarf priests were supposed to be tough."

A dark green beam lanced out across the chamber, slicing past the stunned cleric toward the fiend. The ray looked like it would hit the Prince in the chest, but at the last instant it curved, vanishing into the Heart of Axion. Cal's disintegrate had no effect.

"Spell absorption," the gnome cursed. "Magical attacks won't hurt him!"

"Well, we'd better find something that will!" Dannel said, firing another arrow that vanished harmlessly into the unholy aura.

Lok roared as he laid into the Prince from behind, unleashing a full attack at point blank range. Even Graz'zt could not merely shrug off such an assault, and as the second blow exploded with a thundering critical hit, the demon actually was driven a half-step forward.

"The mighty warrior," Graz'zt said, turning his gaze toward the genasi. "What do you fear, Lok? What stirs the terrors that creep within your soul?"

Lok felt a surge of dire, unrelenting panic flow over him. The last time that Graz'zt had held him and his companions, he'd tormented them with images of their personal fears and doubts. Then, he'd experienced firsthand a drow attack on the home of his people, the urduunnir. In the vision, the attack had succeeded because he'd abandoned his people to help others. Now, what he saw in that moment of connection was far more dire; the West in flames, with demons pouring through gates to lay waste to the lands of Faerûn. Over it all, Graz'zt watched, reveling in the destruction that was his personal payback to the realm that had produced his more dire enemies.

And all because Lok had been too weak to stop him.

The genasi was a dedicated fighter, but he could not resist the power of the demon's gaze. His axe fell from nerveless fingers, and he staggered back, his arms lifted to shield himself from that relentless stare. He fled, cowering in the alcove behind the Prince's throne.

Graz'zt laughed. "And you would become a god? Such bravery."

Umbar rushed up and grabbed hold of the demon, snapping his enlarged fists around Graz'zt's arms. The cleric's strength had been augmented considerably by the righteous might of Moradin, but it seemed almost trivial for Graz'zt to shake himself free, and slam his sword up over his shoulder. The point of the blade pierced Umbar's breastplate, the impact driving him back again. A fountain of blood erupted from the terrible wound as Graz'zt pulled his sword free, and the cleric fell hard to the ground with enough force to shake the hard iron surface.

He did not stir.

Graz'zt turned around. "You are pathetic. None of you fools are even a minor threat to such as me. Enjoy your last few instants of free thought, for soon, even your dreams shall belong to me."

The demon lord laughed again, a terrible and deadly sound that promised worse to follow.

Chapter 600

Dana uttered a holy word.

The power of the blessed syllable blasted out from the priestess... and died, as the hezrous countered it by the utterance of numerous blasphemies.

The succubus's eyes glowed with an almost feral intensity as she regarded the priestess. "The Great Lord is quite familiar with your tactics, blessed of Selûne." The way she said it, the appellation sounded like a slur. "Your fate was set the moment you decided to come for your little pet there."

Something flashed in Dana's eyes. "You are not the only one to know your enemy," Dana said. She made a small gesture with her left hand.

There was a noise in the clearing behind her, accompanied by a slight rush of air as something filled that space. The succubus was the only one to have seen the other invisible figure that had come through the gate with Dana; a diminutive creature, smaller even than a Halfling, clad in a simple cloth tunic, carrying a hammer somewhat too large for him, tucked through his belt. The demoness had watched the creature intently, expecting some sort of surprise from it. But even she was not prepared for the little thing to suddenly grow to over twenty-five feet tall, putting it almost on eye-level with the demons atop the cliff. It became visible as it lifted a muscled hand and uttered a cry that shattered the mottled sky of Achaeron.

The titan Corumbos was ready for battle.

"Destroy them!" the demoness snarled, but her minions were already rushing to attack. Most of the hezrous leapt forward, several of them hurling chaos hammers and unholy blights at their foes. The energy surges unleashed confusing storms of energy that filled the clearing, but did little real damage against their heavily warded enemies.

Benzan lacked such protection, and while the hammer failed to affect him, the blight was enough to nearly do him in. But then the pain of his wounds suddenly fled, and he looked up to see Dana kneeling beside him. She had a sword in her hand, which she thrust into his.

"Can you fight?"

"You'd better believe it," he said. Although getting up proved a bit more challenging than he'd expected, he was still on his feet when one of the hezrous leapt at him, reaching for him with its huge claws.

The clearing exploded into a chaotic melee as the demons and their enemies engaged with every spell and weapon they had at their disposal. The succubus tried to sunder the enchantment that had bound the titan to service, but despite her considerable magical abilities, those paled before those of Dana. The titan completed his spell as the demons atop the bluff blasted him with arrows and energy beams. Two hezrous leapt onto his legs, tearing and clawing. But Corumbos was one of the Ancient Scions, an entity of surpassing power, and not likely to fall to the initial attack of a few demons.

Laertes Leonidas tried to charge the succubus, but was forced to defend himself as the fiendish hound, its matted hide covered in slashes from its encounter with the iron bush, leapt back into the fray. The werelion ripped his arm free of the hound's jaws before it could get a solid grip, and in turn seized it around the throat, and twisted. The hound struggled and thrashed for a few moments, before a loud snap announced the end of that confrontation.

Like the hezrous that had hung back, keeping readied blasphemies to counter another holy word, the flying demons above had orders to remain vigilant, to maintain the anchors on Benzan and Dana lest they try to dispel the enchantments and escape.

But escape was not on Dana's mind, as she unleashed her own magic upon their enemies. Demons all around her screamed as her inflict critical wounds spell tore into them. Three hezrous crowded forward and surged over her from the front and sides. As they pressed her, however, a glow that surrounded her like a halo began to brighten, building in intensity until the demons howled in pain. Two managed to hit her despite the holy aura, although both immediately fell back, blinded by the intensity of the light.

The succubus hit her with a spell, and Dana felt wracking pains erupt in her lower body, threatening her equilibrium. But the priestess had passed through trials of agony and terror to get to this point, and she merely ignored the pain, pushing it to the side like an unwelcome thought.

Stepping away from the hezrous attacking her, she turned to Benzan. Her husband was giving as good as he got with the hezrou he was fighting. The sword he had was a decent magical weapon she'd picked up in the household of Barrat Ghur, but with the align weapon she'd laid upon it shortly before opening the gate, it sliced open the demon's flesh as effectively as a normal blade might that of your typical ogre or orc.

Thus far, she'd kept herself walled up within an iron wall of discipline. She could not let herself accept the reality of Benzan being right next to her, close enough to touch. If she did, the hard shell she had constructed around herself might break, and if that happened, then they would all be lost.

So she touched him, but only to deliver a spell.

"It's going to get real hot in a moment, love," she said, then shouted, "INFERNUS!"

Corumbos heard the shouted word, and nodded. A streak of blackened char marred his tunic across the breast, and a half-dozen arrows jutted from his upper body, including one that had pierced his cheek. But the two rocs he had summoned had snared the flying demons and flown off with them, and the retriever listed perilously, two of its legs smashed in from a devastating blow from the titan's massive hammer. The two archers he'd recognized as merely half-fiends, rather than truebloods, and the quickened chain lightning he'd hit them with had been more than payback for the arrows they'd shot him with. The hezrous tearing at his legs he had ignored; neither had managed to hurt him yet.

At Dana's command, though, he summoned his magic, and called down a fire storm.

The succubus Brajia staggered back through the inferno, her earlier certainty shattered. Her demons were being torn apart, and Dana Ilgarten had been far from the easy prey she'd expected. In a part of her mind, she was already anticipating the terrors that her Master would inflict upon her for failure. While she could imagine her own failure, conceptualizing the defeat of Graz'tz, even with the example of the Disaster fresh in the minds of all who served the once-Argent Lord, was beyond her grasp. Such was the power of the being known as the Lord of Shadows to shape the realities of those around him.

But Brajia was not without resources. Even as his flesh began to crinkle from the raging flames all around her, she reached into her pouch and drew out a scroll. The parchment was flayed from the hide of a devil, but even so it almost immediately began to smoke as the heat hit it. But she only needed a few seconds to read the incantation scribed upon the scroll.

A shadowy form emerged through the flames. Brajia did not need to see her clearly to know it was Dana Ilgarten. She was untouched by the flames. A pair of nunchaku dangled from her right hand.

"Time to end this, demon."

Brajia laughed, a cruel sound that changed as the spell took hold. Her body began to shift, her limbs contorting in unimaginable pain as the magic coursed through her. The spell that had been upon the scroll was similar to the transformation spell practiced by mages upon Faerûn, but this incantation had been born deep within the bowels of the Abyss, where incanters did not feel the need to spare the caster the price of invoking powers beyond their ken.

The flesh covering the succubus's arms, legs, and back split open, revealing armored plates of chitin that oozed an ugly black slime. The bones of her hands grew and burst from her fingertips, forming jagged claws that formed razor-sharp blades at their ends. Her muscles swelled until the skin covering them began to snap under the strain. And her face... the once-beautiful face of Brajia, that became the monstrous visage of... something else.

As Dana Ilgarten looked up in horror at what her foe had become, the demon-thing started forward, logical thought replaced by a feral desire to taste the flesh and blood of the woman standing before it.

Chapter 601

As Graz'tz tormented his foes with promises of destruction, a tiny figure slid across the ground, coming up alongside Beorna. The dying templar's struggles were growing weaker, and her entire left side was covered in the blood that continued to flow from the terrible wound in her shoulder.

Mole had a tiny vial in her hand, which she upended into the dwarf's mouth. "I kept a little holdout for emergencies, don't tell the others," she whispered.

Graz'zt detected Mole, of course, but as he turned to deal with her an arrow caromed hard off his forehead. The shot had penetrated his unholy aura, and as the arrow clattered to the floor a few paces away—its head seemingly melted—a small gash could be seen trailing ichor from the good half of the demon's face.

The demon snarled, as more arrows pinged off of his armored body. Callendes and Dannel were firing arrows as quickly as they could fit them to their strings, and while the avariel had yet to penetrate the Prince's defenses, Dannel's fiendbane bow gave his shots enough added potency to do at least some damage. A second arrow thudded into Graz'zt's arm, penetrating a fraction of an inch through his tough hide.

The demon's malevolent gaze shifted slightly. A gray beam erupted from the Heart of Axion, splashing over the body of one of the iron balors, the last one in the line of Graz'zt's honor guard. The ray lasted only a fraction of a second, but the result was immediate, as the huge construct shuddered and came to life, its metallic body creaking as it turned and slowly, ponderously started toward the archers.

Beorna returned to consciousness, groaning as she tried to lever herself up. The wound in her shoulder had stopped bleeding, but it was clear that she was not far from death's door.

"Heal yourself first," Mole whispered. "You can't face him now."

But Beorna shook her head; she had no healing magic left to her, no spells at all, save for a few weak orisons. Ignoring the gnome, she reached out and closed her hand upon the hilt of Aludrial's Shard. She knew that Mole was right, but Duty held her in an iron grip as she pulled herself slowly up into a crouch.

A familiar roar sounded from the far side of the demon, as Arun returned to the fray. Behind him, the statues of Graz'zt's harem lie in an unidentifiable wreckage. The paladin sported a few new wounds; some of the animated statues had jabbed him with sharp edges of metal left from sundered arms and legs. But that didn't stop him from charging headlong at their enemy, sheer will driving him forward against seemingly impossible odds.

Graz'zt turned to meet him, but before either could strike, Beorna thrust Aludrial's Shard deep into the demon's back.

A scream of utter horror erupted from the demon as the blade sank a full foot into his body. As he stood there, transfixed, Arun leapt forward, with his hammer sweeping before him toward the center of the Prince's head. Despite his horrible injury, Graz'zt managed to intercept the paladin's swing with his blade, deflecting it. Graz'zt drove the sword down into Arun's shield, hitting it hard enough to leave a deep dent in the metal. Arun grimaced as his arm absorbed the force of the impact, but he refused to give ground.

Another arrow sliced past the demon's head, clipping his ear, but doing no real damage.

Cal knew that they were fast running out of options. He had tried to dispel the magical fear affecting Lok, but his spell had failed against the potency of the Prince's magic. The demon was insanely powerful, and augmented by at least one artifact. With his arcane sight, Cal could see the true power of the artificial eye in the demon's right socket, and he recognized the shifting suit of armor he wore as the former possession of the tiefling sorcerer that had participated in the assault upon the Bastion.

The archers continued their fire against Graz'zt, calmly shooting even as the animated statue drew close enough to strike. The statue creaked loudly as its massive sword came down at them. At the last instant Dannel leapt aside, and the weapon slammed hard into the iron floor, opening a six-foot gash in the plating. Callendes went the other way, falling back, flapping his wings to help give him clearance.

The balor loomed over Cal as it lifted its sword ponderously from the damaged floor, preparing to strike again.

Graz'zt stared down at Arun, who met that cold gaze through the slits of his helmet. Amusement flickered through the anger that shone in its one living eye.

"Say goodbye to your love, Arun Goldenshield."

Arun's eyes widened, and he lunged forward, his hammer coming down into the demon's body. But while his shot connected, he could not stop the Prince from pivoting his upper body almost full around, his sword continuing where his torso had to stop. Beorna was still trying to thrust the Shard deeper into the demon's back, and while she saw the swing coming, she could not get out of the way quickly enough.

"NO!" Arun screamed, as the blade of the Prince smote the templar on the side of her head, just above her left ear. Her head came apart in an explosion of blood and bone, and after hanging for a split second in lifeless animation, her body collapsed upon the cold iron floor of the chamber.

Chapter 602

Benzan dove into the storm of fire, coughing as the acrid smoke burned his lungs. Around him, the iron undergrowth of the metal forest was melting into glistening pools, and the thick branches of the surrounding trees were beginning to soften and droop. Fortunately Dana's protection from fire ward held, and he was not harmed by the raging flames of the titan's fire storm.

The screams of the hezrous began to fade behind him. The demon he'd been fighting had been hit hard by the initial surge of flames, which had overwhelmed its fiendish resistances. One of the others had tried to grab him as he'd headed after Dana, but Laertes intercepted it, delivering a punishing blow to its side.

Corumbos finally released his magic, and the flames quickly died. The smoke remained, obscuring Benzan's view, but he was drawn forward by an ominous sound of something big moving ahead.

As he stumbled forward the haze parted, and he saw a creature of nightmare battling Dana.

The thing was humanoid in only the vaguest sense; armored plates covered its arms, legs, and torso, and sharp blades protruded from its fingers. Wings jutted from its back, but were obviously far too small to have any chance of lifting the huge thing aloft. It walked huddled forward, its spine bent at a sharp curve, but even so it had to stand at least ten feet tall. Its face was a horror, with thick ridges of protruding bone over its eyes and along the lines of its jaw, which spouted curved teeth that jutted out a good six inches or so from its face.

Dana was moving like a zephyr, avoiding the powerful but clumsy swings of the creature as she slammed it with her adamantite nunchaku. She still shone with the bright light of her holy aura, but that did not seem to faze the demon as it relentlessly dogged her evasive movements. She was wounded, he could see; bright red gashes showed in her left torso as she spun around and leapt over another vicious swing.

Benzan ran forward, a guttural cry sounding in his throat, his sword at the ready. The thing either did not detect him or did not care; it lunged at Dana, bringing one long arm down to block her path, its claws digging into the hard ground. The priestess darted back, but the fiend brought its other arm down behind her, giving her the choice of full-on retreat, or facing it head-on.

The priestess, dropping into a crouch, looked up at the monstrosity looming over her, her nunchaku swirling in one hand.

The other hand started to glow red.

The fiend lunged, its head darting down, its jaws opening wide.

Dana grinned, and leapt to meet it.

Its jaws snapped shut, closing hard... on empty air.

The fiend reared up, revealing Dana, the chain of her nunchaku looped over one of the teeth protruding from its jaw. Swinging around, she touched it with her other hand, unleashing her harm spell.

Tendrils of negative energy surged outward from her touch, opening vicious wounds in its throat and chest as the potency of the magic spread. The creature seemed to sag before the onslaught of power.

But then it abruptly snapped its head forward, sending Dana flying into the open air before it.

Benzan reached the demon, and slammed his sword hard into its knee. His stroke avoided the dense armor plates that protected its thigh and calf, but its hide was like boiled leather, and he barely managed to gash the skin covering the joint.

The demon, focused on Dana, ignored him. Its jaws split open wide, the flaps of its cheeks folding back, revealing an opening large enough to swallow a human skull. Dana reached the apogee of her flight and began to fall...

Three long tentacles shot out from that dark opening of the fiend's jaws. Each terminated in a small sucking maw surrounded by several inch-long fangs the color of ashes. Dana tried to shift in mid-fall, but could not avoid being impaled by two of them, which stabbed into her body. The last twined around her ankle, yanking her roughly upward, her feet lifting above her head as it turned her upside down.

Dana screamed as currents of black energy trailed from her into the creature, as it sucked life energy from her. She tried to break free, but her movements were feeble, and she failed to untangle herself from the iron grip of the suckers digging into her torso.

Benzan hacked again at its knee, desperation adding strength to his swing. The blow cut deeper into the joint, releasing a jet of steaming ichor, but the damage was not enough to cause it to lose its footing. It swept its arm around, hitting him hard in the gut with its elbow. The tiefling went flying, his sword clattering from his grasp as he landed hard on his back.

Looking up, his vision was filled by the sight of Dana, dangling from the monster's grasp, her life fueling its dark strength.

Chapter 603

Arun screamed and swung his hammer with all his strength at the demon prince. The powerful blow was poorly aimed, however, and Graz'zt's scale armor seemed to gather to meet at the point of impact. The head of the hammer glanced harmlessly away, doing no damage.

Graz'zt, meanwhile, returned with a backswing that easily penetrated the paladin's guard, the head of the weapon crunching solidly into Arun's arm. The plate protecting the limb buckled, and Arun was knocked sideways, nearly losing his grasp on his hammer. The sizzle of burning flesh filled the air as the acid coating the demon's blade fed eagerly on the dwarf's arm and neck where it had splattered.

"You are pathetic," the demon said. "You are so easily manipulated, it is barely worth the effort it takes."

Arun let out a ragged growl that did not sound like anything a normal creature would make. His broken shield fell from his grip, and he brought the hammer up to strike again, telegraphing his intent.

Graz'zt almost casually brought up his blade to block.

At the last instant, Arun shifted, and brought the head of the hammer down onto the sword, just above the hilt. A flash of energies erupted, accompanied by a spray of acid and a sound like the cracking of the world. The two combatants fell apart, and when the glow faded, Graz'zt was revealed holding only the hilt of his shattered sword.

A loud clang filled the room as the rest of the blade clattered noisily upon the cavern floor a few feet away.

“I do not need a sword to put you down, dwarf!” the demon hissed. It came at him in a sudden rush, its claws growing and thickening until they formed long black tendrils that hung at its sides. The Prince’s hiss, like Arun’s earlier growl, was something basic and bestial as he lashed out at Arun. The black claws pierced his armor as though the shining mithral was woven lamé, digging deep into his flesh, drawing out blood and life in equal portions. Arun was staggered; no mortal, not even the divine champion of Moradin, could have taken that assault and not faltered.

The rest of the companions were in little position to intervene. Callendes went down hard as the balor statue’s backswing clipped one of his wings, the jagged metal that represented a flaming sword snapping the bones and tearing half of the wing clear off him. The statue walked with a slight limp, where Cal had blasted it with a disintegrate, but the thing—construct, animated object, fiend, whatever!—had apparently resisted the bulk of the effect, for the spell had only vaporized a small portion of the leg where Cal had hit it. The statue ignored the invisible archmage, focusing upon the archers. While slow, the thing had a reach equivalent to a real balor, and it used it effectively as it swung its huge weapon at the nimble elves.

Dannel had darted back out of its way, but as he saw Callendes go down, he immediately spun and ran back toward it, firing as he went. Several cracks already spread across its chest where the arcane archer had scored hits, but the damage did not appear to impair the animated monstrosity.

“Dannel, the leg!” Cal urged.

The elf saw immediately what the gnome had indicated; at the point where the golem-thing had been blasted with Cal’s disintegrate, its limb had been shorn until only a concave band of metal supported its weight.

The song filled him as he drew and fired. The corrosive arrows he’d taken from the guards below slammed with precision into that weak point. The statue lifted the leg ponderously as it stepped forward to deliver a finishing blow to Callendes, but as its full weight settled upon the damaged limb, it snapped with a loud crack. The iron balor started to fall, but as it went down, it lunged forward in a last attempt to take at least one foe with it.

Callendes, crawling away, put on a last burst of speed, and darted out from under a smashing blow that again cracked the iron floor with the force of it.

The statue collapsed under its own weight, lifeless once more.

As soon as he saw that the avariel was clear, Dannel spun back to Graz’zt. He called upon the power of his quiver, and an arrow popped out, ready to be fitted to his bow. Almost reflexively, he checked within, where the ends of arrows within the extradimensional space could be tallied with a glance.

Only three missiles greeted his query.

Three shots left.

Arun felt his strength draining from him as Graz'zt dug his black claws deeper into his body. But then the dwarf's expression hardened, and Arun pulled himself up, staring into the hateful eye of the Prince.

"You have strength," the demon said. "I like that... it means you will be of that much more use to me when you finally break."

"I may break, demon, but I will never yield," Arun said. But as Graz'zt probed deeper, the black tendrils twisting inside the paladin's body, a scream was torn from him.

But then Graz'zt stiffened, and his claws were yanked out of the dwarf's body as his body arched. Behind him, Mole had taken up Aludrial's Shard, and dragged the heavy blade across Graz'zt's hamstrings. In the diminutive hands of the gnome the sword did not cripple the demon lord as had been her intent, but the sneak attack had nevertheless provided a slight opening for the beleaguered paladin.

Before Graz'zt could recover, Arun brought his hammer up in a sudden motion that struck the demon at the base of his ribs. The blow straightened the demon, but it did not knock him off his feet.

"NOW!"

The hammer came down, slamming into the Prince's left leg just above the knee. The blow landed with a solid thwack, but the limb held.

"YOU!"

Arun snapped the hammer up, driving it into Graz'zt gut. The fiend's armor absorbed part of the strength of the blow, but as the holy energies of the weapon blasted through the Prince, he grimaced slightly.

"DIE!"

Arun all but screamed the last word, as he whipped the hammer around in a short arc that culminated in the demon's face. Graz'zt's head was knocked around, by the force of the blow, and he actually staggered back a step. When he turned back to face the paladin, the demon's face was further marred by a trail of blood from the corner of his mouth, and a gap in his smile where several teeth had been jarred free.

"Your anger is delicious, paladin. But like everything else, ultimately futile."

Arun roared and leapt forward with the hammer coming up yet again. But before the dwarf's first step could land upon the floor, the Heart of Axion came to life.

Time seemed to slow to a crawl.

A gray radiance exploded from the gem in the demon's eye socket. It seemed somehow... alive, the shining glow overlaid with what seemed like wisps of spirit that twisted in protest as the light drove them outward. They expanded outward and took on cohesive form, forming sinuous cables that connected the Prince and his foes as they plunged into the bodies of Arun and Mole. The dwarf and the gnome stiffened and screamed, paralyzed by the touch of that raw power. The gray tentacles flexed and pulsed with energy that flowed from the bodies of the two adventurers, through the Heart, and then into the body of the Prince. As those pulses flared out through Graz'zt, enveloping him with an echo of that gray shining light, his wounds began to knit shut. The demon lifted his head and shouted in exultation as the power of another epic spell filled him, the cost paid by the life force of his son, trapped in the Heart of Axion.

Or now, perhaps, the Heart of Athux.

The radiance, fueled by the energy stolen from Mole and Arun, continued to spread. It found Lok, covering behind the throne. It found Dannel, even as the elf fired one of his last arrows. It continued to spread, its light dominating the great vaulted hall, forming a hemisphere centered on the Master of this place.

And within that sphere, Graz'zt laughed, as the doom of Occipitus was sealed.

Chapter 604

The titan Corumbos felt a piercing chill spread through his chest as another beam from the retriever penetrated the last lingering remnants of fire and stabbed into him. The insectoid construct seemed to have grasped through whatever weird intellect that it possessed that he was not vulnerable to fire, so it was focusing exclusively on cold blasts as it skittered back and forth across the cliff top on its damaged limbs. The titan had extended the area of both fire storms to include the top of the cliff, but the thing had backed away and had managed to avoid being snared in the second.

The half-fiend archers, on the other hand... Well, there wasn't much left of them; a second quickened chain lightning on top of the two fire storms had converted them into greasy smears on the iron stones.

The two flying fiends had likewise never come back; one could hope that the rocs had enjoyed their repast in the brief moments before they returned to their plane of origin.

The titan had taken his own share of abuse, however. The hezrous clinging to his legs had sank their vicious teeth into the muscles at the backs of his knees, inflicting painful wounds even despite his considerable resistance to physical damage. Both had survived the fire storms, and a third kept harassing him with unholy blights that kept popping up around his head, doggedly trying to penetrate his spell resistance.

But first, the retriever.

The titan raised a hand into a fist, and with a white flash a shaft of cracking energy formed, poised to hurl. Corumbos threw the javelin with unerring accuracy, piercing the spidery construct through, knocking it backwards into an ungainly heap.

With that threat taken care of, he turned to the little demons worrying at his legs. One of them was working at the lower parts of his half-plate armor, trying to get to something vulnerable.

With a grimace of distaste, Corumbos slammed the head of his gargantuan warhammer down into its skull.

The second one looked up just in time to get swatted like an annoying fly.

Another blight exploded around the titan's head.

Annoyed, the titan started to look for the last demon. While he'd taken a good amount of punishment, they weren't a match for him, not really.

But they were keeping him busy.

Benzan pulled himself to his feet, fighting a sudden surge of disorientation that threatened to pull him back down to the ground. But the sight of Dana, caught in agony in the grasp of the giant fiend's tentacles, gave him the strength he needed to overcome that weakness. He bent to recover the sword Dana had brought him, and staggered toward the monster's flank.

Dana could feel her life energy ebbing from her body, drained along with her blood by the tentacles that pierced her. Most of her higher-order spells were gone, depleted in the battle or in the preparations she'd undertaken before opening the gate. Each day for the last tenday she'd begun with the same ritual, trying to determine Benzan's location through powerful divinations, including discern location. Just a few minutes ago, she'd finally succeeded, getting a positive lock on his presence here, upon one of the floating cubes of Achaeron. It had taken all of her will not to immediately open the gate and charge through at that instant. But she'd learned much about Graz'zt from her interrogations of Barrat Ghur, and so she forced herself to be deliberate, casting spells for almost a full minute, culminating in one gate through which she'd called Corumbos, before opening a second directly to Benzan's location.

But now, it seemed as though all her preparations had been for naught; the creature that had been created from the succubus was incredibly strong, and she lacked the power to defeat it.

That wayward thought caused her to snarl, and all doubts disappeared as she drew a new and intense focus.

Summoning the power of Selûne, maintaining her concentration through a supreme effort of will, she grabbed one of the tentacles holding her and unleashed an inflict critical wounds into it. The twisting appendage turned black and withered, leaving a tattered remnant that drooped from the creature's jaws. The tentacle around her ankle tightened its grip in response, and as the other attached to her body continued to drain her, weakness began to creep over her like a warm exhaustion.

No! her mind screamed, as she refused to give in to that soft and deadly call. With a cry of pain she grabbed the edges of the tentacle piercing her side and tore it free. Blood—her blood—sprayed out from the terrible wound, and the long pincers slashed at her hands, already trying to reestablish the connection she'd broken.

Before she could attempt another escape, however, the creature lifted its arms and closed both hands around her, crushing her body, its claws digging into her flesh. Dana tried to summon the power of Selûne, but that pure source of energy seemed to be on the far side of a vast haze of pain that clouded her consciousness. She knew she was diminished, drained by the demon's touch, but there seemed to be nothing she could do to stop it.

Benzan was thinking the same thing, as he came up behind the demon. He knew that he would have only one chance to strike; from the force of the glancing blow he'd taken before, the demon could tear him to pieces in a few seconds. The sword felt heavy and alien in his hand, and his reflexes felt awkward; after all the time he'd spent in the "care" of Graz'zt's minions, he felt like a child taking its first steps.

But then he caught sight of the humanoid lion that had been at Dana's side earlier. The were-creature was covered in blood, but rushed forward at the demon with a clear purpose, its claws poised to strike.

The demon saw him too, and transferring Dana to its left claw, it slashed down at the lycanthrope with its right. The werelion leapt forward, absorbing a pair of long slashes down its back as it darted under its arm and came up directly before it. The creature did not hesitate, letting its momentum carrying directly into the demon, leaping up onto its chest, tearing and slashing with both its fore and hind claws.

The demon, however, was more heavily armored than the most splendidly outfitted knight, and the werelion's violent assault merely dug gashes into the hard chitinous plates that covered its torso in a thick belt. The demon drew its right claw back in, seizing the werelion around the neck, tearing it off of its body. Dana tried to use the distraction to break free again, but her movements were growing feeble, and all she could do was pound uselessly against the thick fingers that held her pinned.

But the werelion's sacrifice had bought Benzan a second's opening, and he used it to good advantage as he rushed up behind the fiend. He unleashed a furious yell that invoked all of the rage and frustration that had built up during his torment, slamming the sword to the hilt into the gap in the creature's armor at the base of its spine that he'd marked.

The demon jerked up, and as its body straightened its vertebrae locked around the blade of the sword, tearing it from Benzan's grasp. It lurched forward, a terrible scream exploding from its jaws. Laertes and Dana went flying as it released them suddenly. The creature fumbled about like a drunken man, as its body tried to adjust to the reality of its nearly severed spine. Finally, however, it stumbled and toppled over onto a half-melted tree that had sagged almost to the ground. One final hiss was torn from it, as it fell limp, impaled upon the iron branches.

Benzan managed to make it to where Dana had fallen, and he all but collapsed at her side. “Dana! Dana!” He dragged her into his arms. The priestess was pale and limp, and he started to dig in one of the pouches at her belt for a healing draught when she groaned.

“Stop shaking me so,” she said. He looked to see her conscious, if still woozy.

“Gods, that was crazy,” he said, as relief flooded into him. He opened his mouth to say... what? He was literally overwhelmed, and a dark, nagging whisper continued to menace at the edges of his thoughts, insisting that this could be yet another trick of Graz’zt’s, to further break down who he was, to do to him what had been done to Delem, those years ago.

But now, with Dana in his arms, he didn’t care. He tried to say that, but his wife stopped him with a hand raised to his lips.

“We’re not safe here,” she said, her face taking on a look of intense concentration as she fought through the fog brought on by the battering she’d taken. Finally she uttered words of power, and a flush of life reappeared in her skin as she restored herself.

“Help me up,” she said.

“Dana...”

She silenced him with a raised hand. “First we get out of here. Are you badly injured?” When he shook his head, she healed herself, and all of her wounds instantly closed.

The werelion had gotten to his feet, likewise somewhat the worse for wear, and it now came over to join them. “Are you all right?” she asked him.

“I’ve been better,” the creature said, his voice—human, even somewhat cultured—sounding odd to Benzan coming from its bestial mouth. “And you would be Benzan, I presume?” he said, offering a claw to the tiefling.

Somewhat bewildered, Benzan shook it.

The werelion grasped his forearm. His grip was like iron, although he was careful not to scratch Benzan with his claws. But he did not release the tiefling, and after a moment Benzan began to feel a sudden sense of unease.

He turned to look at Dana, surprised to see a fearsome intensity in her eyes. “Dana, what...”

He never got a chance to finish his question, as Dana unleashed a blast of white fire directly into his face.

Chapter 605

Within a storm of power, Graz’zt exulted.

Cal watched in horror as the expanding radiance engulfed each of his friends, paralyzing them, drawing their life energy along the insubstantial but very real links that connected them to the demon prince.

He had a dispel left, but he recognized the magic being wrought as an epic spell, and knew that his own paltry powers would have no chance against it. If only his patron had seen fit to include a disjunction in the blue book, then he might had a tiny fraction of probability...

Unless...

There had been one more spell in that book, an incantation of the highest valence, the summit of magical power that few mortal mages ever met. That spell now burned in his memory, taken in anticipation of this confrontation. But while he could possibly save one of his companions with it, what would that gain? There was nowhere left for them to escape to, no place they could run to hide from the dark lord of Occipitus.

But then, he looked deeper.

Callendes, lying on the ground, his ruined wing hanging over him in a bloody mess, stiffened and screamed as the wash of the epic spell caught him. Cal was now the last, and the gray radiance continued to expand, a last tendril of energy already creeping outward to engulf him as well. That sphere filled his vision, with the Prince just a dark blotch deep within.

There was no time left.

Cal cast the spell.

The spell vanished into the maelstrom. It was drawn to the Heart of Axion, the currents of magical power vanishing into the tiny gray orb, which flickered with the life of a tiny sun trapped within.

Cal sagged as the strain of the casting left him drained, and he stumbled back, falling upon his backside. He could only look at the light that expanded over him, promising oblivion.

But then, the power of the Heart flickered.

For Cal had cast his spell not at Graz'zt, but at the Heart itself. A spell that was the culmination of all of his years of study and craft, a spell of the highest arcane valence.

Freedom.

The epic surges around Graz'zt exploded outward in a new violence, but now they were wild, uncontrolled. The Prince screamed as several of the gray tendrils pierced his body, cutting swathes through the very core of his being. A gray fire surged from the Heart, which blazed now with an unrestricted fury and intensity, like a smoldering fire that had suddenly found a cache of fresh fuel.

The surviving companions were hurled back as the connection between them and the demon was suddenly and traumatically sundered. They rolled to a stop in an expansive ring around the Prince, whose screams grew as he clawed at the raging inferno burning within his eye socket. The skin around that opening began to melt and run, the ruined flesh abused once more by the intensity of a greater power. Graz'zt began to rise, drawn up by the flows of power, which grew more insistent and substantial as the entity within the Heart escaped the bonds that had held it captive.

And then, all at once, the glow, the surrounding power surge, it all just abruptly vanished. Graz'zt fell back, and something fell from a bloody claw, plummeting toward the ground.

The Heart of Axion struck the iron floor, and shattered.

Arun was the first to stand. Reaching down, he picked up his hammer, the heavy head sliding on the floor as he slowly started toward the crippled demon.

But before he could reach Graz'zt, the Prince stumbled back, falling into the embrace of his throne. The demon drew aside the iron seat, and manipulated something in the hollow space beneath.

Arun brought up his hammer, and charged.

Graz'zt turned, and hissed something, a sound that bubbled between the ruined hole that had been his mouth. The flesh covering the right side of his face had melted, dripping in long trailing bulbs that occasionally parted to reveal the white skull beneath. There was no way he could have still lived, had he been a mortal creature. His other eye was thick with a milky film, but somehow he still sensed the approach of danger. A dark opening appeared in the air beside the throne, which the demon hurled himself through, vanishing from view. Arun rushed forward, apparently intent on pursuit regardless of where their foe fled, but just before he reached it, the portal slid shut and dissolved.

Graz'zt was gone.

* * * *

Author's Note:

Regarding Graz'zt: I used the version in the Book of Vile Darkness as a starting point, with some modifications. I gave him the same DR as Adimarchus; i.e. 15/good + cold iron. Beorna and Arun could do full damage when they hit, but everyone else almost needed a crit to do anything more than token damage. He was weakened somewhat from epic casting and his fracas with Athux; draining Malad's life force brought him almost back to full strength, but he still had 5 negative levels when this encounter took place. He did not have his magical shield; this was lost in the destruction of Zelatar, and I bumped his natural AC bonus down a few points. This was more than compensated for by the addition of Synesyx, which in addition to its intelligence is a suit of +5 morphic light fortification scale mail.

Finally, the Heart of Axion was obviously a major artifact in its own right. In addition to possessing the power of a rod of absorption and a gem of seeing, it provided a constant mind blank effect and could fuel the casting of epic spells, as we saw in the story.

So Graz'zt ended up being a pretty tough hombre in the end, even diminished as he was. As he appeared here, I would have put him around CR 25. His AC was in the low 40s even without his unholy aura, and even with the negative levels factored in he could still muster 4 attacks per round that were almost guaranteed at least 3 hits against any of the companions. Basically, anything that faced a full attack from him was in serious trouble.

Chapter 606

Benzan tried to pull away, to dodge, to evade, but with the werelion holding him fast, the creature's own strength far outweighing his own, there was nothing he could do.

The white fire did not burn, but it pierced him with a chill that plunged down to the core of his bones. He would have fallen, had not the lyncanthrope continued to hold him firmly.

And then it was gone, although it took a few more seconds for him to be able to see clearly through the brilliant afterimage of light that blazed across his vision. The werelion released him, and as he did Benzan could see that a soft white glow lingered around him, replacing the ugly green nimbus of the dimensional anchor.

Dana was there, the aftereffects of the spell on his vision giving her a white halo as well. Or was she glowing too? He could not be certain, but he thought he saw relief in her eyes, shrouded within a hard exterior that she kept carefully neutral.

"Why?" Benzan asked.

"I'm sorry. We... I... had to be sure. The moonfire reveals all falsehoods; I'm sure I don't have to explain further, given our foe."

Benzan nodded, but a lingering twinge of disquiet lingered. Clearly he hadn't been the only one changed during his captivity; Dana was like a dagger, its hard steel edge barely constrained in its sheath. He wondered what had happened to her, what had happened to all of his friends, in the time that had passed since he'd been taken. For that matter, how long had that been? His own mental processes had become a jumble, and he knew enough to understand that the process of being tortured had likely stolen a good part of his reason, his sanity. At times, it felt as though it had been mere days that he'd been in Graz'zt's fortress, but seconds later, it seemed like it had been his entire life, with the memories of what had come before just vague outlines.

"Come on, let's get back to Corumbos," she said, leading them back toward the clearing, the werelion at her side. Benzan followed.

The clearing was still shrouded in haze, lingering wisps of smoke from the fire storms clinging to the ground. Globes of melted iron that had been part of the foliage of the cube formed a rough hemicircle around the blasted interior, where the bodies of demons lay splayed in scorched and bloody poses.

The titan was there, waiting for them. Corumbos had returned to a smaller form, only slightly taller than Benzan, a perfect human ideal with features chiseled and defined. His half-plate was gone, replaced with a flowing white tunic, and despite having been in a violent clash just a few moments ago, there was not a spot of blood or gore upon him. He still bore his hammer, though, the oversized weapon at rest in his right hand.

“Is it done?” he asked, his voice melodious.

“It is done,” Dana said. “Open the gate to the Prime as I specified, and then our compact is concluded.”

The titan nodded and gestured, summoning a swirl of magic that even Benzan, with his limited magical abilities, could see like a beacon. Corumbos directed that magic into a tight wedge that sundered the barrier that separated worlds, opening another gate.

Without further comment, Dana took his hand and led him through, followed by the werelion. Benzan glanced back to see the titan already casting again, and then the gate closed, revealing a blank wall behind it.

He turned around and stared in amazement. They were in a vast, open chamber, beneath an ivory dome that reached its apex nearly eighty feet above them. Huge pillars of white marble rose up to support the dome, the space between them filled with huge open windows that let in soft natural moonlight, or arched corridors that led to additional wings of the building.

The place looked somehow familiar to him, but he could not identify what it was.

His attention was distracted as he saw that the great chamber was occupied. A dozen figures, men and women of several races, clad in silver robes, looked startled to see them—understandable, Benzan thought. A few cast spells, surrounding themselves with pale auras or summoning globes of glowing white light around the intruders. As Dana threw back her cowl and stepped forward, Benzan could see that her appearance had an equally dramatic effect upon them.

“Dana Ilgarten!” an elven man exclaimed. “What are you... I mean, why are...”

“Benefis, rouse the High Priest at once, and have him gather the Court of Stars in this chamber. I want a dimensional lock on the temple sanctuary, and magical shielding on each of us.” Almost as an aside to herself, looking at the shafts of pale moonlight that shone through the high windows, she added, “Highmoon would be better, but I guess we’ll take what we can get of the Lady’s blessing.”

The elf was just standing there, his mouth drooping open. “Well, did you hear me?” Dana exclaimed. “At once!”

The elf turned and ran, followed by the other acolytes. Benzan had finally realized where they were, as his eyes drifted up to see the sigil etched into the dome above, a glowing design in silver that shone brightly in the reflected moonlight.

They were in the Moontemple, in Iriaebor, Dana's city of origin. In the Western Heartlands, in Faerûn, on the world Abeir-Toril.

Home. Just the thought of it almost overwhelmed him.

Dana did not turn back to him. The werelion walked a short distance away.

Benzan did not know what to do. The woman standing before him was like another person, one he had never met. She lacked the soft warmth he remembered of his wife, replaced by an iron shell of cold, emotionless purpose. He remembered how hard she had taken the loss of Delem, and the thought that he might have been the reason for that change broke something deep inside him.

"I had to do it," she said, as if responding to his thoughts. "I had to focus on one goal, one thing alone, and drive out all else. I would have gone insane, otherwise."

"Dana..."

"All that matters is that I got you out," she said. "You're safe, and..." She trailed off, and Benzan could see that her body was shaking.

Suddenly, none of it mattered. None of the torments, the anguish, the wall that had been driven between them by that terrible tragedy. He took her into his arms, just holding her.

"It'll be all right," he said, and for the first time in a long time, it felt true.

"Oh, Benzan!" she cried, the tears bursting out of her, as the shields and defenses she'd painstakingly built around her loss and grief came crashing down. Benzan found himself crying too, and with each tear it felt as though a part of the stain clouding his soul was washed away.

She turned into his embrace, and held him there in the soft moonlight, under the silver dome.

Chapter 607

Graz't was gone.

A terrible quiet returned to the great hall. Arun fell to his knees in front of the iron throne, his body shaking. Dannel and Mole stood, a bit unsteady still from the aftereffects of the power of the Heart. Lok slumped to the ground, freed from the grip of the terror that Graz't had cast into his heart, replaced by an overwhelming weariness. Callendes lay where he had fallen, amazed to still be alive.

But for the others, there would be no respite. The Voice, torn asunder by the Prince's black blade. Umbar, returned now to his natural size, lying in a pool of his own blood, his heart pierced by a deadly thrust. Beorna... Their gaze did not linger there, until Mole mercifully covered her head with a spare cloak.

Cal came forward. The others turned to him, all save Arun, who did not move, his head bowed in grief.

"It's gone," Cal said. "The dimensional lock on Occipitus."

"So we can go home?" Mole asked.

Cal nodded.

"This was supposed to be the end," Arun said, not lifting his head, his voice pitched low so that the others had to strain to hear. "It was supposed to end here."

"Arun..." Dannel began.

"This was supposed to be over!" Arun shouted, his rage exploding out of him as he leapt up, his hammer springing into his hand. "It was supposed to be over here!"

The paladin lashed out, slamming his hammer into the throne. The iron buckled before the holy power of the blow. The companions could only watch as the paladin unleashed strike after strike, with all of his strength behind each impact. Within moments, all that was left of the throne was wreckage, until there was nothing left to destroy but a misshapen lump of metal. Arun sagged to the ground, his hammer falling from his fingers to clatter on the ground.

"We can raise them," Cal said. "Umbar and Beorna..."

A faint tremor shook the chamber.

"Uh oh," Mole said.

The tremor returned, building in strength. The floor began to shift beneath their feet, and a loud creaking of protesting iron sounded all around them as the movements of the Skull tormented its iron skin.

"What's going on?" Dannel asked.

"This place," Cal said. "It too was held together by the epic magic... it's coming apart!"

Dannel helped Callendes to his feet, and turned toward the exit. But the iron plating surrounding the spiral stair was already beginning to buckle. "No time... we need to get out of here right now!" the elf cried.

"To me! With the lock broken, I can teleport us out of here!" Cal shouted.

“Not without them!” Arun said, gesturing toward the limp bodies of Umbar and Beorna. The noise around them was becoming deafening, until even their shouts could barely be heard. One of the iron balors toppled over, crashing loudly upon the floor.

“I cannot take everyone!” Cal replied.

“The bag of holding!” Lok exclaimed as he rushed over to rejoin them, already holding the large cloth sack.

“Quickly!” Dannel urged, as Arun and Lok slid Umbar head-first into the bag. He barely fit, but once through the mouth of the sack he quickly vanished into the extra-dimensional space within. They turned to Beorna, but were nearly crushed as a large plate fell from the ceiling, smashing into the floor a few feet away.

“Never mind!” Cal shouted. “Hold her... I think I can get all of you! Mole, get back, join the circle!”

The gnome rejoined them, dragging Aludrial’s Shard behind her. She’d also grabbed a black gem that had emerged from the ruins of the throne when Arun had destroyed it; that prize vanished into a pocket as she reached the others, touching Lok just as Cal was summoning his magic.

“If this doesn’t work, we’re going to have a real big problem,” Dannel said, looking up as a massive segment of the ceiling buckled and began to collapse downward.

The air shimmered, and they disappeared just as thousands of pounds of metal came crashing down, obliterating the chamber.

Chapter 608

The companions materialized on the open plain of Occipitus, with the cracked marble columns and crumbling walls of the celestial cathedral forming a backdrop behind them. Their gaze was drawn to the skull, which was continuing a general collapse, its iron skin sloughing off in great pieces that plummeted down to the ground below. Demons by the thousands were being crushed by those massive shards, and more were charging away in a blind, chaotic rush.

“Looks like they haven’t figured out that they can teleport again yet,” Mole observed.

“They will,” Dannel said. He looked up at the sky, where knots of flying demons could be seen in scattered groups in every direction. “And they’ll know we’re here, in a moment or two.”

“I have one more teleport, and can take us to the Bastion,” Cal said. “Maybe Saureya can plane shift us back home...” The archmage silently cursed himself for not memorizing the spell himself; both Umbar and Beorna had possessed it, and he had not planned on a contingency when both of them had fallen, and yet he remained alive. He could gain it from his spellbook, given time, but time was likely something that was not going to be available to them in great quantities.

“If he’s still there,” Dannel returned. “If anything’s still there.”

“Even without Graz’zt, his legions remain a potent force,” Callendes said. The avariel had lost his bow in the battle, and with Dannel supporting him, he looked thin and frail.

“If they come at us, we’ll deal with them,” Lok said, tightening his grip on his axe. Coming from anyone else, the statement would have been bravado, but from the genasi it was a simple statement of fact.

“Look!” Mole shouted, drawing their attention back to the Skull.

White flashes erupted in the sky around the collapsing mountain. When those bursts faded, they revealed white-winged beings that shone with a golden radiance that was clearly visible even miles away. Their nature and intent was immediately obvious, as the newcomers and the demons started to exchange holy smites and unholy blights even as more of the flashes continued to disrupt the Occipitus sky.

“Celestials!” Dannel said. “Dozens of them...”

“But... who is bringing them? Did Saureya get a call for help out?”

Callendes shook his head. “No,” he said. “The Herald.”

A loud noise like an earthquake reached them, drawing their attention back to the mountain. Slowly, but picking up momentum as it progressed, half of the upper portion of the Skull broke away and slid down the ruined mountain’s face. As it fell clear, the pillar of burning fire within became visible as a bright flash that extended upwards into the sky. The pyre twisted and touched the dark clouds that had gathered around the dark presence of Graz’zt, and as the flames pierced that shroud, the darkness fell back. The sky above, streaked red with chaotic surges of energy just a short time before, was revealed as a golden dome that unleashed a soft pleasing radiance upon the plain below. As that light fell upon the fleeing demons, they grew disheartened, and fled cowering. There were dark flashes as those that could teleport realized that they could escape, and they vanished from the mass to seek shelter in the far corners of the plane.

Unfortunately for them, there was no place upon Occipitus where the gaze of the celestial host could not find them.

The companions watched in amazement as the demonic horde was routed, as the celestials, now numbering over a hundred that they could see, unleashed righteous destruction into their ranks.

“I don’t believe it,” Dannel said. “We did it... we won!”

“Heh, I never doubted it,” Mole said, with a wide grin.

But Arun did not smile, and his gaze did not shift from the ruins of the Iron Skull, his fists locked around the shaft of his warhammer.

Chapter 609

The name of the world was Agamatheo, which in a now-dead language meant, “Orb of Beauty.”

If anyone alive had still spoken that tongue, they would have thought the name ironic, or at the very least tragically inappropriate. The world Agamatheo was mostly ocean, with only a few rocky spires where the tips of great mountain chains jutted out from the vast expanses of blue. Under those waves lay the ruins of civilizations, places where quiet and somber humanoids had lived out their lives in the way of most sentient races across the multiverse. That was before the waters had risen, as the world’s rising temperatures had melted the great sheets of ice that had floated atop its poles. The people of Agamatheo, while they lived upon the land, had been creatures of the sea, building their towns and cities upon the border of land and water, enjoying the many and diverse fruits of the great ocean of their world.

Now, nothing was left of that race, and little survived within the planet’s waters. The few things that remained were twisted and warped monstrosities, foul creatures that remained in the lowest depths, living in a state of constant and voracious hunger, with only each other to prey upon.

Great slicks traveled across the ocean currents, and where they went a great stench accompanied them, and nothing lived. Some of them burned as they moved, filling the sky with great plumes of black smoke. Violent storms covered the sky, blasting what few land masses remained, and churning the ocean into an angry froth as they crossed back and forth across this ruin of a world.

The largest of the remaining land masses was a vast black spire that rose up out of the waves on the world’s southern hemisphere. It had no name; back in the old days of Agamatheo it had been a sacred place to the world’s inhabitants, but that reputation had fled long before its current inhabitant had arrived here. The mountain was cold, barren rock, and nothing clung to it save for toxic black sludge and acrid crusts of minerals that burned bare skin. The highest point atop the mountain was a jagged spike that rose a thousand feet above the waves, overlooking a jutting bluff a mere few hundred feet high, perhaps a thousand yards square. Upon that rare bit of flat terrain stood a fortress of black rock.

The place was well-suited to the surroundings of Agamatheo, with stark, angular walls surrounding a trio of thick towers that formed a tight cluster within. The only openings were narrow slits in the walls and high upon the towers, all of which were sealed with heavy iron shutters, and a dark passage at ground level that was deeply recessed into the base of the wall, a dark mouth that seemed to radiate malevolence. No lights shone from the shuttered windows, no guards patrolled the walls or crenelated tops of the towers. The place seemed deserted, a lonely and eternal witness to the death of an entire world.

The empty solitude of the place was shattered as a portal opened in the air a few inches above the rough wind-swept surface of the bluff. Eight individuals stepped through the gate, which closed behind them.

“Dana?” Lok asked.

“He’s here, or he was when I opened the gate,” the priestess replied.

“He’s here,” Benzan said, almost in a whisper.

“Want me to go inside and take a quick look?” Mole asked.

“The entire fortress is warded against magical transportation,” Dana said. “Or I would have taken us directly to him myself.”

“If he knows we’re here, he may have already fled,” Dannel said.

They looked to Cal, who was already casting. The gnome had brought with him a short staff, perhaps four feet in length, which he placed before him on the rough black stone. The staff, which appeared to be crafted of a pale, gnarled wood, stood perfectly balanced as he withdrew his hands and wove them in a complex gesture before him.

The spell took almost a full minute. Finally, the gnome clapped his hands together, and sagged backward, almost falling before Lok gently caught him. “Are you all right?” the genasi asked.

“Sorry. I guess I’m still not used to these epic spells.” The wind gusted, and toppled the staff; as it fell it dissolved into a fine ash that formed a plume across the bluff, and then was gone.

“Will it hold him?” Arun asked.

“I don’t know. I think I got the entire perimeter. You were right about the wards, Dana; they are infused into the very fibre of this place.”

“It won’t help him,” the priestess said, leading them toward the dark opening that gaped before them.

Mole sidestepped to avoid a small puddle of black goop. “Ugh, this place stinks,” she said.

“Agamatheo was once a place of beauty and peace,” Dana said, her voice taking on a distant tone. “Another world destroyed by Graz’zt, just to satisfy the evil lusts of his corrupt ego.”

“It is in the nature of fiends,” Beorna said. “They destroy all that they touch.”

“It’s worse than Karoth,” Dannel said. “I thought that I would never see a sight more depressing than those corrupted trees, but this place, somehow... it’s more sad.”

"I miss Umbar, he'd have something pithy about 'duty' to say right about now," Mole commented, as they drew near the entry. Dana slowed, letting the others fall in close behind her.

"Cauldron needs him more than we do," Arun said. The paladin looked troubled.

During their absence upon Occipitus, the troubled city had befallen new woes that threatened the success of its rebuilding, and it needed strong leadership more than ever. None of those present questioned Arun's commitment, or Beorna's, to their quest. If anything, Arun had become all but obsessed with tracking down and destroying Graz'zt. But as the chase had continued across the planes, with the fallen prince leading them from one bolt-hole to the other, it had become obvious that Arun's focus was masking a deeper weariness, or even a blossoming despair. After Graz'zt had escaped them in the sinister forest of Karoth, Arun had insisted that Umbar remain behind, to help those who were working to rebuild Cauldron. Beorna shared his concern as well; not only had the humanoid incursions from the Alamirs intensified, but there were reports that another access point to the Underdark had been opened near the city.

Umbar had not taken the news gracefully, but ultimately an order from a Chosen had to be obeyed. As for Beorna... well, Mole's comment that the argument between her and Arun could be heard in Almraiven was not that far off.

"Well, let's get this over with," Dana said, starting toward the entry.

"Wait," Benzan said. The companions froze, weapons and spells held in readiness.

"What?" Mole asked, after a long pause.

But then they heard it, a faint creaking that sounded deep within the bowels of the fortress. Fully alert, they waited for a long minute, but the noise faded and nothing emerged from within to menace them.

"All right, let's go," Arun said.

The dark tunnel was oppressive, the air thick with a musty dampness that clung to the bare stone walls. Fully thirty feet inside they encountered a set of huge doors of black metal, which stood slightly open. They creaked loudly as Lok pushed them wider, enough for them to pass into the space beyond.

"Not very good security," Beorna said. "You are sure he's here?"

"He had the power to block the spell, before, but I don't know of anything that can send a false positive for a discern location," Dana said.

"Again, he might have left when we arrived, leaving a trap for us," Dannel said.

"If it's a trap, we'll find out soon enough," Arun said, pushing past Lok into the chamber beyond the doors.

The room was roughly circular, with a very low ceiling around the edges that rose to a buttressed dome in the center maybe twenty feet above. Dark shafts penetrated the ceiling around the perimeter, from which a constant drip of moisture sounded. The floor was uneven, with dips and ridges forming a miniature landscape that was slick with frequent puddles. The construction was all of huge stone blocks, slammed together with rough edges that the builders hadn't bothered to trim. The only exit, other than the potential of the narrow shafts, was a recessed doorway opposite the entry. An iron portcullis had apparently once blocked that route, but now only rusted remnants of broken metal lay smashed on the floor.

"Creepy," Mole said, summing up the feelings of the companions quite effectively.

The situation got a whole lot creepier a moment later, when a scraping sound drew their attention to the dark doorway.

"Something's coming," Arun said.

"Y'think?" Mole said, before she shimmered and vanished. Benzan, too, disappeared, as he cloaked himself in greater invisibility.

Communicating only with a few subtle gestures, the warriors spread out facing the doorway, while the spellcasters remained back in the cover of the entry. They had layered multiple wards upon the group prior to coming through Dana's gate, but in anticipation of combat they quickly summoned a few more short-term magics, including a haste spell from Cal.

Dannel infused one of his arrows with a light spell and fired it into the shadowed archway.

The arrow embedded itself into the stone a short distance beyond the arch, its radiance revealing a broad staircase that descended as far as they could see. As the darkness receded, it revealed the source of the noise they had detected.

It was a creature, formed roughly like a great cat, albeit one that stood six feet tall at the shoulder. Its body was covered with silvery-gray scales reminiscent of dragonhide, covering massive muscles that rippled under its hide as it moved. Its face was an expression of ferocity, dominated by huge jaws that trailed gobs of saliva that sizzled when they hit the damp floor. It moved with a sinuous grace, and by the way its claws clattered loudly on the floor with each step it took, it had to be incredibly heavy.

Revealed by the light, it appeared unconcerned as it slowly treaded forward toward them. Its stare was nothing short of malevolent, and it impossible to mistake the creature's intent.

"Only one... we'll take its charge, and strike from the flanks," Arun said, lifting his hammer. The other warriors nodded.

"No... wait!" Dana cried, but before any of them could react, and creature opened its jaws wide, and unleashed an incredible roar.

The blast of sound reverberated out of the tunnel and resounded with incredible potency throughout the chamber. The very stones of the fortress shook, and each of the companions was staggered, stunned by the intensity of the sound.

None of them could react as the creature leapt forward. It seized Arun in its jaws, lifting the paladin from his feet as it jerked him to the left and right, its teeth crushing deeper into the metal plates covering his torso. Then it snapped its body suddenly around, releasing the dwarf and sending him flying across the room. Arun crashed into the wall with a loud crash of metal on stone, and then slumped to the ground, dazed.

The monstrous beast had already turned upon its next foe. Lok tried to bring up his shield to deflect it, but the creature merely brushed the feeble defense aside with a claw. It bore the genasi down, digging its claws into his shoulders, its weight driving the points through his armor. Lok could do nothing as the creature drew back, but only long enough to seize the genasi's left leg in a solid bite. It snapped its head up and down, slamming the warrior into the ground once, twice, three times, before hurling him aside much as it had done Arun, launching him to the opposite side of the room to land in a heap.

Having taken down two of the group's most powerful warriors in a matter of seconds, the creature fixed its attention on where Dannel, Dana, and Cal stood bewildered in the entryway, just inside the metal doors.

Chapter 610

The creature coiled to leap, but before it could resume its deadly assault Beorna roared and laid into it from the side. She had returned Aludriel's Shard to Saureya before leaving Occipitus, but her new blade, a bastard sword of solid adamantine, acquitted itself well as she slammed it into its flank. The hit, backed by the templar's considerable strength, should have crippled it, but the sword merely opened a shallow gash in the monster's thick hide.

And what was worse, it almost immediately started healing, the edges of the wound knitting shut almost as soon as it had been opened.

But Beorna had definitely gotten its attention, as it spun and launched itself at her.

"What in the hells is that thing?" Dannel said, as he shook his head to clear it. He fired an arrow at it, but even though the shot was nearly perfect, it glanced off of its armored skull without any apparent effect.

"It's a sirrush!" Dana exclaimed, having guessed the identity of the being from the brief education she'd received on Sigil.

"What?" Dannel asked, as his second arrow duplicated the ineffectiveness of the first.

"Dragonstalker! The thing eats dragons for lunch, very tough, Very Big Trouble!" Cal said. The gnome hit it with a disintegrate empowered by his rod, but was not surprised when the beam dissolved on impact. "It's got damned good spell resistance," he announced, in case any of them had missed the obvious.

Arun and Lok had gotten back to their feet, somewhat the worse for wear from the nasty greeting they'd gotten from the sirrush. Their armor had been dented by the force of the creature's bite, and Lok grimaced as he put weight back on his savaged leg. But neither warrior faltered, rushing immediately back in to reinforce Beorna, and rejoin the melee.

A small figure leapt out of the shadows and appeared suddenly atop the sirrush's back. Mole rushed along its armored spine as if she'd been strolling a country path, smoothly adjusting to its rapid movements as it attacked Beorna. A final skip took her up to the top of its skull; the gnome's hand darted down, and she stabbed her rapier toward its eye.

The blade nicked the bony protrusion above its eye, doing no damage. The creature reared suddenly to knock the unwelcome passenger free, but Mole merely somersaulted backward, landing perfectly balanced once again upon its back.

Beorna lifted her sword to strike again, but the sirrush slammed its head back down, smashing her in the face with its heavy chin. Beorna staggered back, followed by the creature, which reared and slashed her with first its left claw, and then its right. Its claws did not penetrate her adamantine armor, but the impacts clearly had an effect, crushing the heavy plates against her ribs. The last hit knocked her clear around, and she fell to one knee. Blood splattered on her breastplate as she met the thing's terrible stare; the bash to her face had crushed in the front of her helmet, splitting her lip.

"Come on then, you bastard!" she snarled, lifting her sword.

Arun and Lok hit it from opposite sides, slamming their weapons hard into its body. Lok's axe, even augmented by Dana's greater magic weapon spell, could not penetrate its hide, but Arun managed a solid blow that penetrated its resistances. The sirrush felt that one, but it kept its attention upon Beorna, who smote it across the breast, to little effect. She followed with a backhand that came up at its neck, but the creature's armored torso formed a tight seal against its throat that protected it like a gorget. Her blow clanged harmlessly off that shielded joint. The sirrush exploited the attack by twisting its head around and biting down hard on the templar's head. Her helmet, caught in its jaws, crunched as the adamantine buckled before its incredible strength. Beorna screamed as she was yanked off her feet, before the strap gave and she was torn free. Falling to the ground, blood pouring from several gashes in her skull, she was almost decapitated by a claw stroke that still grazed her head, knocking her to the ground.

The sirrush's momentum carried it forward, and it stomped on her back with another claw, crushing her with its weight.

"Aaaah!" she screamed, blood spraying from her mouth upon the black stone floor.

Arun, driven to fury by watching Beorna's decimation, unleashed a furious full attack upon the sirrush. As order's wrath filled him with righteous power, he slammed his hammer down into it in a flurry of powerful blows. Only one really hurt it, but that one was a critical hit that shattered a rib. The sirrush snarled in pain, and turned from Beorna to surge at the paladin once again. Its movement almost, but not quite, dislodged Mole, who was still trying to find a vulnerable spot for her rapier. An arrow glanced off its head, scratching it, but Dannel's effort failed to divert it. A clang rang off its hind quarters as something bounced off its hide, but that too did not distract it from its foe.

A shimmering in the air solidified into a trio of avorals, who turned at once to Dana.

"Distract the sirrush, but ware its attacks," she ordered. "All others are allies; heal them if you can."

With an joint cry of assent, the three outsiders leapt into the air. They started blasting the creature with magic missiles, but none of them penetrated the sirrush's spell resistance.

The sirrush descended upon Arun like an avalanche. The dwarf raised his shield, but the sirrush's jaws closed on it, crushing it as if it was a piece of bark, rather than a slab of magical steel. Only the fact that the straps gave way saved the paladin from losing his arm along with the shield. As he tore free from its grasp, he lifted his hammer to strike it in the head. But before the blow landed, the creature's left foreclaw came down hard on his left knee.

Arun screamed as his leg twisted, and he went down hard. The creature clipped him with its other claw, driving him down. Arun fought to hold on to consciousness with his leg bent under him at an angle that hurt just to look at.

Cal felt a momentary thrill of anticipation as his magic penetrated the creature's spell resistance. But he could feel his baleful polymorph run up against a solid wall.

Damn, the thing has the fortitude of a god! he thought, trying to think of a way he could affect the creature.

The sirrush seemed to be gloating as its wedge-shaped head loomed over the broken body of its adversary. But before it could finish Arun, Lok drove into it from the flank, smashing it under the chin with his shield in a gesture that did not harm it, but which drew its attention. Just in case that wasn't enough, the genasi followed that with an uppercut with his axe that did manage to cut a small notch in the side of its jaw. A sharp tooth, jarred loose from the impact, went flying, but the creature still had an ample supply of those to spare. It was continuing to regenerate. Although it had taken a serious amount of punishment from the attacks that had penetrated its armored hide thus far, the thing seemed little fazed by its wounds.

The genasi's attack had the desired effect, drawing the creature's attention away from the crippled paladin. But even as he established a defensive stance, the creature lifted its head, and opened its jaws to unleash another stunning roar.

A roar that none of them could withstand.

Chapter 611

The sirrush prepared to roar again, but as it lifted its head Dana was already moving. “Dannel!” she yelled, causing the elf to hesitate as he drew another arrow to his cheek. The elf held his shot, glancing at her sidelong as she came up to him.

“Don’t miss,” she said, touching the end of the arrow, and uttering a spell.

A globe of silence enveloped them, but quickly disappeared as Dannel fired his arrow. Perhaps it was luck, or perhaps the elf had drawn deep into another reservoir of skill, for this arrow pierced the sirrush’s hide, stabbing into the flesh of its back just behind its armored neck. The creature’s jaws stretched open, but nothing came out, just a silent roar that failed to penetrate the bubble of Dana’s magic.

“Well, that shut it up, but how in the hells are we going to stop that thing?” Dannel asked.

“We have to overwhelm it, just mangle it faster than it can regenerate,” Cal said. “With our spells of little use, we’re going to have to support the warriors, and hope they can bring it down.”

But with two of the warriors down, that looked to be a difficult prospect. Arun, at least, was still conscious, although he could not stand with his broken leg. The paladin, blocked from reaching Beorna by the bulk of the creature, dragged himself away from the sirrush’s reach before he used his lay on hands power to heal some of the injuries he’d suffered. Arun grimaced as he straightened he mangled leg to let the healing magic restore the crippled joint.

Lok faced the creature’s full fury as it unleashed another full attack upon him. The potency of the assault was not diminished by the fact that it was utterly silent; if anything, to those watching the blows that fell upon the genasi seemed more powerful than before. But Lok stood his ground, tearing free from a bite that snagged his shoulder, absorbing punishing rakes that added more damage to the heavy armor covering his body. Somehow, when it was over the genasi held his stance, although his armor was covered with streaks of his own blood, and a thin trail of red ran down his left leg from a deep puncture somewhere beneath his torso plates.

A wise combatant would have withdrawn at that point, but Lok knew that while he could not withstand another full attack, his friends were likely to die if he backed down. So he stood his ground, and took the attack to the monster, hacking at its legs with his axe. The thundering power of the weapon would not function within the silence, but the edge was sharp enough, and within a few seconds Lok was not the only one trailing blood.

Mole, still holding court upon the creature’s spine, ran forward again to the bony ridge of its neck. But her rapier was in its sheath, and instead of trying another futile attack, as she leapt up over its head, she whipped something out from her bag of holding. It was a heavy cloak, which she swept across the creature’s eyes, using it as an anchor as she swung beneath its head, catching the far end and holding on, keeping it taut.

Her lips moved soundlessly as she shouted something clever, a bit miffed that the silence kept her friends from fully appreciating the maneuver.

Under normal circumstances, the sirrush would not have been inconvenienced in the slightest by being blinded; its senses, honed by hunting dragons many times its size, were incredibly sharp. But the silence neutralized its keen hearing, and there was a musty, earthy smell that infused the cloak, making it difficult for the creature to sort out the distinct odors of its enemies.

Snarling silently, the sirrush darted forward, snapping its head to the left and right, trying to dislodge its unwelcome passenger. Mole held on, swinging up to avoid a claw that tried to knock her free. One of the avorals swung down and raked at the creature's back, but its claws might as well have been scratching the stone floor for all the effect they had upon it. Another landed beside Beorna, and tended to the fallen templar. Lok slammed it again with his axe as it passed him, but while he added another gash to its tally, the wounds it had taken were clearly not especially serious.

And it continued to regenerate.

Dana, just outside of the bubble of silence, cast a mass heal. At once the wounds of the companions knit shut, and the vitality lost to the creature's claws and bite was instantly restored. Beorna recovered her sword and charged, while Arun, his leg fully recovered, came at the creature from the opposite side.

The sirrush dropped its head solidly on the floor before it. Mole swung around, avoiding getting pinned, still holding onto the flapping ends of the cloak. But the effort was made moot a moment later as it pulled its claws down over its armored face, shredding the garment. Mole fell free and tried to somersault backwards away from it, but the creature swept its head sideways, butting her solidly and knocking her roughly across the room. She landed on the far side of the chamber, flipping at the last instant to land on her feet, grimacing where a cracked rib throbbed in her side.

The creature's gyrations had failed to dislodge the silenced arrow stuck in its neck, and once again no sound followed as the warriors charged into the distracted creature. Arun, Lok, and Beorna, reenergized by Dana's potent spell, laid into it with a violent fury of attacks. The paladin pounded it with his hammer, while on the far side of it Beorna's adamantine blade cut gouges in its scaled body. Lok, meanwhile, continued to hew at its legs with its axe. Dannel's arrows continued to zip into it, until a small forest of feathered shafts jutted from its back.

Cal focused his arcane power and reached out with his magic. Using one of the newer secrets of arcane lore that he had discovered, he extended that link between himself and Arun, laying a displacement ward upon him without having to touch the paladin. Once again, such a mundane ruse would not normally have fooled such a canny hunter, but with its hearing obscured, its claws passed harmlessly through the false image raised by the spell.

The sirrush was starting to show the effects of its wounds, now, as the three warriors launched full attacks into the creature from all sides. The sirrush still had a lot of fight left in it; as Beorna scored a critical hit upon its flank, it suddenly spun around and unleashed a devastating series of attacks upon her, driving her back. But a moment later the templar's wounds closed again, as Dana channeled another mass cure into them.

The sirrush seemed to be possessed by a furious rage as it focused on Beorna, pressing its attack. The dwarf held her ground, hewing at the creature's armored head with her sword. Her blows glanced off its thick hide without effect, but her efforts still paid off as her allies punished the increasingly savaged hunter. Arun drove his hammer into it, one two-handed overhand strike after another, while Lok had laid one of its hind legs nearly bare, with its ruined scales oozing blood. Even Mole got back into the fray, darting under its hindquarters, and stabbing her rapier into a slightly more tender spot.

The sirrush started to flail about it almost blindly, still scoring hits on its tormentors, but failing to overcome any of its foes. With a final stroke of his axe Lok took off the leg he'd been working on, and the creature staggered and fell. Still it attacked, trying to seize the genasi in its jaws. But Lok tore free as Arun brought his hammer down onto its spine. They didn't need to hear the crack to know that the blow had done serious damage; the creature quivered and began to spasm.

Dana approached the creature from behind, her hand glowing red. She touched it and unleashed a harm spell. The potent magic failed to overcome its spell resistance, but it increasingly appeared that this was unnecessary. Dannel, too, had approached to almost point-blank range, and now was sending one arrow after another into a gap where a scale had been torn away from its body.

With her face covered in her own blood, a fearsome look etched upon her features, Beorna stepped up. The creature sensed her and started to turn to face her, sweeping out a claw. The claw gashed her armored belly, but she ignored the blow as she lifted the sword high above her head, and brought it down into the center of its face. The blow did not appear to penetrate its skull, but the creature's body shuddered once, a mighty tremble that shook it like an earthquake, and then it slumped down to the ground, defeated.

Chapter 612

The companions did not let down their guard, nor did they assume the fact of their victory until Arun had wrenched the creature's head aside, exposing enough of its neck to allow Lok to hew the head from its body. Only then did they relax—or more accurately, all but collapsed.

Arun found the silenced arrow and plucked it, tossing it aside. "By the fire of the Forge!" he exclaimed, leaning up against the creature's flank as he fought for breath. "That thing could take a beating!"

"And dish it out, as well," Lok said, wiping blood from his face with an old rag.

"What in all the Hells was that?" Beorna said, likewise slumping back against the wall. The warriors looked like they had been hurled into a grinder, with the plates of their armor bent and punctured.

“It was a sirrush,” Cal explained. “They are hunters... their favorite prey is dragons, which they take down in packs.”

“Wonderful,” Beorna said.

“Let’s just hope that there aren’t any more of them,” Dannel said. “It was almost invulnerable to magic, and only Dana’s quick thinking kept us from being stunned again by its roar.”

Benzan became visible as his greater invisibility faded, a look of disgust on his face as he hurled his sword to the ground with a clatter. “Damned useless,” he said. “I may as well have stayed home, for all that I added to that fight.”

“We can do without your whining, tiefling,” Beorna said. “We all knew when we agreed to continue this chase that there would be things that tested us.”

Benzan’s eyes narrowed, but Dana interrupted them. “Benzan... we’re here, in the now... we need to come together, against this threat.” Her voice was soft, cool, and she fixed the full force of her presence upon him, like a hunter trying to calm an angry beast.

For a moment the tiefling looked about to respond in fury, but then his shoulders slumped, and his eyes admitted defeat. “I am sorry,” he said. “We had better get going, before the Prince sends another one of those after us.”

As he turned, Cal and Dana exchanged a glance. Dana had done her best to ease her husband’s return from captivity, but they had all experienced enough of Graz’zt’s “hospitality” to know that Benzan’s suffering would not soon ease. With his wife’s blessing, Cal was working on a spell that would selectively blot out Benzan’s memory, allowing him to move ahead with his life without forever dwelling under the shadow of what had been done to him. It might be the only solution, Cal thought, but for now, they had to press ahead.

“Ah... sorry about your cloak, Mole,” Dannel said, as he offered her the shredded remnant of the garment.

The gnome shrugged. “S’okay... It was Umbar’s, anyway. I never remembered to give it back to him.” She grinned, as the companions formed up and headed warily into the dark exit, and the stairs that descended deeper into the fortress.

Chapter 613

A massive set of double iron doors stood within darkness. Rust and time had pitted the thick metal slabs, in some cases carving out depressions over an inch deep. But this did not steal anything from their imposing durability; if anything, the doors seemed eternal. Multiple reinforcing bands were affixed to the heavy slabs with thumb-thick iron rivets, culminating in not one but two bars, thick slabs that rested in long grooves built into the substance of the doors. These were portals designed not only to withstand siege, but a cataclysm.

A muted clang penetrated the doors, then another. The metal quivered, but held. But then the stone threshold to either side and above began to shift, the black granite moving, drawing back, as if abandoning the barrier it had supported for so long. As the retreated stone revealed the recessed hinges, the doors clanged loudly again, and pocked iron creaked as it gave way before a superior force. The bars held, but the doors in their entirety tore free of their weakened moorings, plunging down to slam onto the ground below with a terrible noise.

Lok was the first to step through, with Arun and Beorna flanking him. All had their weapons at the ready, the others close behind.

The chamber beyond the doors was much more irregular than those in the rest of the fortress, more like a natural cavern that had been generally shaped and expanded than a proper chamber of worked stone. The air was thick with dampness, and the slightly irregular floor was broken by frequent pools that ranged from a few paces across to as wide as eight feet. The water was dark and brackish, and shone with a glistening slick in the light cast from their spells and weapons.

The place extended backward for quite some distance. Cal lifted a hand and uttered a brief melody that called a light spell into being along the ceiling. The light drew back the darkness, and while the long shadows could have concealed much, they could now see what occupied the rear of the chamber.

The Demon Prince Graz'zt sat upon a throne that resembled a knot of coral. The demoni did not seem to notice them, despite the flickering light that played upon his features.

"Wow, he's really in bad shape," Mole commented.

The gnome's assessment was impossible to deny. The Prince was only barely recognizable as the fiend that they had battled inside the great iron skull on Occipitus. His features still bore the mark of the eruption of the Heart of Axion; half of his face was melted like a wax candle left too close to the hearth, with a puckered black sore gaping empty where the Heart had once resided. His other eye stared blankly out into space; the orb was a milky white, and it was doubtful whether the Prince could see at all. Graz'zt still wore Synesyx, although the scales only covered a narrow strip between his belly and his hips. The rest of his flesh was drawn tight against his bones, and a red sheen covered his skin, as though he had been sweating blood.

"It's a trap," Dannel said quietly, an arrow ready in his bow.

"Well, naturally," Beorna said. "But do we spring it from here, or get closer?"

"I will do it," Dana said, as a silver glow sprang into being around her. She lifted her hand, and a surge of white moonfire erupted from between her fingers.

Cal, who had called upon his arcane sight as soon as they had come in, tried to stop her, but was too late. The blast of energy formed a knife that lanced across the chamber, pulsing toward the supine form of the Prince. But as it neared the coral throne, the moonfire sprayed against an invisible barrier, a shield that flickered in striations of deep aqua and sinister black. The flows of power interacted for a second, and then both faded, leaving the scene as it had been a moment before.

Dannel had lifted his bow to fire, but on seeing the failure of Dana's effort, he held his shot.

Graz'zt looked up. His voice was a faint rasp, but somehow the companions heard each syllable clearly from fifty feet away.

"So. You have come to finish your work, have you?" Just the very act of speaking seemed to drain the demon, and thin streams of viscous fluid trailed down his mangled chin with the words. "You are persistent, and your hatred of me has given you strength. But I am not without resources, and I will not passively await the slaughter!" The last words were spoken with a hint of the Prince's earlier fire, but that faded as the demon bent in the chair, caught in a violent spasm of coughing.

"Lo, how the mighty have fallen," Dana said, her voice echoing through the chamber without need of magical augmentation. "It is you who have let hatred consume you... and it has brought you to this end, fiend."

"Have you identified it?" Dannel whispered to Cal.

"It's analogous to a cube of force," the gnome responded. "Emitted from the throne, I think."

"Can you teleport through it?"

"No. It extends through the ethereal... and even if I could, my lock still holds."

"There's no place left for you to run, fiend," Beorna said, lifting her sword with one hand, the point of the heavy blade steady as it pointed straight at Graz'zt's chest. "Your enemies have taken what little you had left, and soon you will be naught but a memory, a foul taste in the mouth."

Graz'zt laughed. "I do not think I will be forgotten so quickly." His eye—seeing or not—focused on Benzan, and his chuckle took on a sinister undertone. The tiefling, almost overcome with emotion, began to tremble.

"I will forget you, demon," Benzan whispered.

"I see you restored your ugly wench, paladin," Graz'zt said. "A pity... I believe that my blade improved her appearance."

"Enough banter!" Arun shouted. Lifting his hammer, he started forward, Beorna at his side.

"So how do we get through it?" Dannel asked.

“We hit it with everything we got,” Cal said. He put his words into action, lifting his rod, and channeling a disintegrate through it. The green ray splashed against the shield, which roiled with chaos as it absorbed the destructive energies of the spell.

The companions added their strength to Cal’s effort. Dannel’s bow sent arrows infused with electrical energies into the shield, while Benzan, his own fiendbane bow restored to him as well, sent several shots into it as well. The warriors formed a wedge and rushed forward, their weapons lifted high to send sheer strength and determination against the barrier. Dana walked behind them at a slower pace, a dark look on her face, and Mole, naturally, was nowhere to be seen.

“The fury of Agamatheo take you!” the demon screeched, and he held up a claw that was still scorched black where the fires of the Heart of Axion had blasted it.

Dark waters rushed up through the holes in the floor at the Prince’s command, surging into the chamber with explosive energy.

“He’s trying to drown us!” Dannel exclaimed.

“No... look!” Cal said, as the waters rose into discrete shapes, massive figures that were like crashing whitecaps that had been frozen into a roughly humanoid form. They were the ancient spirits of the seas of this world, once pristine and somber, now corrupted into foul mockeries of what they had been by the being that now sat broken in the coral throne.

The huge creatures, a half-dozen in all, surged forward to attack, while Graz’zt, secure behind his shield, cackled madly.

Chapter 614

By unspoken agreement, Beorna and Lok turned to face the onrushing elementals, while Arun surged forward toward the shield protecting the Prince. Several of the creatures surged forward toward the warriors, who looked insignificant in contrast to the massive walls of water descending upon them, filling the room almost up to the cavern roof forty feet above.

Dana spoke a holy word, but the power of the utterance could not overcome the ancient potency of the warped elder elementals. One of the creatures slammed into her, carrying her off in a wild surge.

“Dana!” Benzan exclaimed. He rushed after her, but the elemental plunged back into one of the gaping holes in the floor, dragging its captive down with it.

“Look out!” Dannel warned, as another elemental rose up behind Benzan, sweeping forward like a black tide. The elf fired several electrically-charged missiles into the elemental, which kept on coming toward its target.

Cal had considered and discarded the prismatic wall; while the spell would have likely kept several of the elementals at bay, it would also have been easy for the others to bull-rush his friends into the barrier. And it was likely that the holes in the floor were all connected with a larger body of water below, which would have made the wall an only temporary obstacle. He did, however, have another new spell, one which was particularly suited to this circumstance.

He hit the fiendish elementals with a horrid wilting, blasting through their spell resistance easily. The spell vaporized a good portion of the creatures' substance, and they seemed to pulse with what might have been agony, had they been normal mortal beings. The last of the elementals had been surging toward Cal and Dannel, but it now drew back from the tiny but deadly archmage, a primordial instinct for survival overcoming the urge to destruction that filled its being.

That didn't help Benzan, however, as he turned around to take a punishing blow from a heavy surge of water that plunged into his face and chest, knocking him down. The water that made up the creatures was thick and polluted, and where it splashed against the tiefling's skin, it seared his flesh like acid.

Beorna and Lok likewise came under heavy attack. The templar cut a deep swath into the first surging wave with her sword, but was struck hard and overborne by an impact that knocked her roughly back. Lok, facing the opposite direction, set his feet heavily upon the stone, taking up a defensive stance. Two elementals surged into him, but while the waves crashed against his shield and armored body with the force of a tsunami, they broke to reveal the warrior, holding his ground, hewing at the substance of the elementals with his axe. Like Benzan, both were affected by the caustic touch of the water, against which armor and clothing were of only marginal protection.

Arun splashed through water that had risen to his knees, and lifted his hammer. He had marked where the shield began, and slammed the holy weapon into it with the full force of his considerable strength behind it. The shield flashed but held, rebuffing him as a backblast of energy surged through the weapon into the paladin. Arun fell back, staggering to one knee. Within the shield, Graz'zt sat waiting, his features indistinct through the distortions still trembling through the shield from the fury of the dwarf's attack.

Grimacing, he lifted the hammer and came forward again.

"Get the shield... I'll keep them off!" Dannel said to Cal, as he unleashed a rapid-fire barrage of missiles into the nearest of the elementals. He continued to target the one that had attacked Benzan, sending arrow after arrow into it, aiming high so as not to threaten the tiefling, who was all but immersed in its bulk. The substance of the watery creature roiled madly as the empowered missiles tore through it. Critically wounded, it turned toward the elf, but then suddenly sagged, and disintegrated into a spray of water that quickly drained toward the nearest of the holes in the floor. As the elemental came apart, Benzan was again revealed, swinging his sword blindly around him. The rapidly receding waters pulled at his legs, dragging him down again. Dannel was there in a moment to help him up. He looked to be in bad shape, his eyes swollen and red, his skin seared a harsh pink from the pollutants in the water.

“Dana...” he managed to say.

“She can handle herself, trust me,” the elf said. And in any case, there’s nothing we can do for her, he didn’t add.

Lifting his bow, he shifted his aim toward the next foe.

Lok was surrounded by a vortex of swirling water as the elementals continued to bash at him. One reared up over him, forming a white crest that brushed the ceiling, but that huge wave disintegrated as Lok slammed his axe through it, opening a gash that tore through its entire “body”, slaying it. The other surged through the gap and buffeted the genasi heavily, but his stance held, and he maintained his position even as the caustic water rushed around him and sizzled against his armor.

Beorna was in a less enviable position. Her foe had knocked her down in the initial clash, and the elemental continued to smash at her, dragging her toward the hole in the floor through which it had emerged. Thus far, only the templar’s considerable weight, a fair portion of which was comprised of the adamantine shell that she wore, had kept her from suffering Dana’s fate. But the elemental was strong, and each surging rush of water drove her closer to the dark opening.

She tried to stand, only to stumble again as another wave overbore her, and the rushing water around her feet made standing difficult.

“Bloody bast—“ she began, only to be cut off as a surge of water flushed over her face. Tendrils of smoke were rising from her, as the toxins in the liquid seared her gear and skin. The water withdrew, but she was another three feet closer to the hole. Looking up, she saw the wall of water reforming again, with twin points of blackness in the surge that seemed to stare at her with a cold malevolence.

“By HELM!” she shouted, invoking the divine energies of her patron. The power of righteous might filled her, and she rapidly grew in size, feeling the strength pulse through her body as the magic took hold.

The wave rushed in, twin “arms” of water extending to pummel her. She did not even bother to try to stand, instead sweeping her now-larger bastard sword around in an arc that slashed through the base of the elemental. The creature quavered as the sword tore through its life-essence, and while it still managed to unleash its attack, the blows landed ineffectively upon the templar’s armored legs.

Pulling herself up, she said, “Now we see what’s what, you oversized sludge-bucket!”

The elemental swept forward, trying to knock her down again, but it found the task considerably more difficult with Beorna’s enhanced size and weight facing it. She held her ground, and as the core of the elemental blasted her, she swept her sword through it. The blade intersected something that resisted the blade’s tearing path, and then it just came apart, draining away into the gaps in the floor.

While he was not insensitive to the melee that raged around him, Cal's attention was focused on the shield protecting Graz'zt. Drawing out a wand, he touched it to his arm before sliding back into the magical quiver at his belt. Rising a few feet above the swirling, unstable ground, he started forward across the room. As he watched, Arun readied himself for a second attack upon the ward. Above him to his right a threatening wave gathered, but Dannel blasted it with a rapid-fire barrage of arrows, each punching a fist-sized hole in its center as the potency of the arcane archer's magic tore into it. Still it came onward, but Benzan met it with a running slash of his sword, cutting a swath eight feet long in its base. The wave toppled over, coming apart as it hit the floor. The tiefling and elf were pulled from their feet by the explosive surge of water, but it only splashed the gnome's robe as he pressed forward.

Lok, meanwhile, was doing for his second foe. The elemental, already shorn of huge swathes of its substance by the genasi's axe, abruptly abandoned its assault, falling back to the nearest gap in the floor, and then vanishing through it. The genasi turned to see if Beorna needed his help, but the templar had already handled her opponent, and was now moving toward the last elemental, which wisely elected to join its companion in retreat.

Arun took hold of his hammer, and unleashed another all-out attack upon the shield. Once again, the invisible barrier took on solid form for a moment as the clash of energies sent roiling waves of black and aqua across its surface. But it held, and again Arun was driven back.

But Cal had been waiting for that moment. Before the shield could reform itself, he blasted the same spot that Arun had hit with another empowered disintegrate. The green ray spread outward from the point of impact, forming striations in the ward that thickened and twisted through the threads of the barrier. Behind the shield, Graz'zt threw up his arms.

And then, after a second that seemed much longer, the shield collapsed.

Arun strode forward, his hammer at the ready. But Graz'zt drew out his good hand from behind his back, something concealed in his fist.

The paladin hesitated, wary of another devious stratagem.

"You shall never have me!" the demon screeched, hurling the object he'd hidden. As it left his hand it split, into a spread of tiny balls that scattered outward. None of them reached as far as the paladin, landing in little splashes upon the puddled floor.

At once things began to grow from the fell seeds. The little balls swelled, sprouting long, segmented legs, and ugly gray hairs. They took on oblong shapes that became distinct, with a head emerging from the front, dominated by multifaceted eyes and huge, dripping fangs.

Graz'zt, leapt from the throne, and darted toward a hole in the floor a short distance from the coral seat.

Within the span of a heartbeat over a dozen monstrous spiders, each larger than the paladin, stood before Arun. As soon as their explosive growth had finished, they let out a collective screech and rushed forward, moving faster than a charging warhorse.

Chapter 615

Arun lifted his hammer to defend himself, but never got the chance.

“Enough!” Cal shouted, his voice echoing loudly despite his small size. Electrical energy erupted from his fingertips, as he hurled a shadowed chain lightning at the surging vermin. The anarchic spiders, while far tougher than their mortal kin, were nevertheless utterly obliterated by the devastating cascade of secondary blasts that streaked through their ranks.

Arun rushed to intercept Graz’zt, but the Prince had too much of a lead on him. As he reached the seeping gap in the floor, however, a spray of water exploded from the opening, and Dana appeared, hovering in the air above the hole, blazing with the white light of a holy aura.

“Going somewhere, Your Foulness?” she asked.

Graz’zt tried to dart around her, but the hole was blocked by the bulk of a celestial orca, which had propelled her up through the opening.

“You will pay!” he screeched, spreading his hands and unleashing a spray of black energy into her. The tendrils flared against her holy aura, and died, somewhat to Dana’s surprise.

“Aaargh!” Graz’zt screamed, as Arun slammed him with his hammer from behind. The blow knocked the Prince roughly sideways, to land in a heap against the nearby cavern wall. He lay there squirming in pain, his right arm dangling limp at his side at a clearly unnatural angle.

The rest of the companions came running up as Dana and Arun faced the fallen demon lord.

“That was too easy,” Arun said.

“That magic he threw at me, it was barely up to the strength of a nalfeshnee,” Dana said, wary for any more tricks. But Graz’zt seemed to have had the fight knocked out of him, at least for the moment.

“It’s not him,” Arun said. “Another trick. Once again, the bastard has eluded us.”

“No,” Cal said, as he floated up to join them. His arcane sight had enabled him to discern the truth. “That is Graz’zt... or what remains of him.”

The demon snarled, but the movement caused another surge of pain to shoot through him, and he twisted again in agony.

“The Prince had to invest a great deal of himself into the assault upon Occipitus,” Cal said. “The loss of Azzagrat, and of the seat of his power, had already diminished him. And the exercise of so much epic magic, even with the augmentation of that artifact, further drained him. He had hoped to restore much of what he had lost by binding himself to Occipitus, but that clearly didn’t work out quite as planned.”

“You fools!” Graz’zt hissed. “I shall rise again... One such as I cannot be so easily obliterated!”

“He seems rather... pathetic, now,” Beorna said, looming over them still in her enlarged form.

“Look at that,” Dana said. She gestured to Arun’s hammer, which the dwarf lifted to reveal an ugly red slick hissing as it ate away at the metal. Then back at the demon, whose emaciated form, his black hide stretched tight over a bony frame, was now familiar to them.

“He’s a babau,” Lok said. “That’s all he was, what he began as, and to what he has returned.”

“Eww, yuck,” Mole said. The gnome, inconspicuous during the battle with the elementals, had reappeared among them, her nose wrinkled.

“It is time to end it,” Arun said. He took a step forward, but paused.

Turning, he offered the haft of the hammer to another.

Chapter 616

Benzan took the proffered weapon. The holy weapon seemed heavy and awkward in the tiefling’s hands, but as he approached Graz’zt, the sigil of Moradin burned into the head began to glow. As he stood over the demon, the glow became a shining radiance, brighter even than when Arun wielded the hammer against evil foes. It cast Benzan’s features in stark effect, and to the others it seemed as though a golden halo surrounded the tiefling’s body.

Graz’zt shielded his eyes from that glow with his good arm. “No! You cannot...”

“Oh, I think we can,” Beorna said. The companions had spread out, alert to any treachery, blocking any possible route of escape.

“There are others who plot against your world! Do you think that I am the only lord of the Abyss who covets your Forgotten Realms? Orcus forgets not his humiliation of Bloodstone... nor Tiamat’s successor... nor the bitch queen of the spiders! And these are only the ones that you may know of... there are other Powers of the Darkness, entities known only to me, that plot to bring you and all you love under their control! My knowledge is infinite... I can aid you, give you what information you need to defend yourselves! Strike me down, and you put to risk all that you hold dear!”

“Those who would plot against us shall learn from your fate,” Lok said.

“Zenna!” he exclaimed, focusing on Benzan. “Your daughter... I know where her soul is. I can give her to you. Do not be hasty, Benzan.”

For a moment, Benzan hesitated. In that instant the demon’s fear transformed into a sharp look, and he drew something out from the small of his back, beneath Synesyx. It was a dark blade, which dripped foulness. Behind the radiance coming from the hammer, none of the others saw the maneuver.

“He is lies, Benzan” Dana said, softly. “Remember Delem.”

Graz’zt tensed; the dirk was hidden by his body, ready to strike.

Benzan lifted the hammer; the demon’s hand shot out with the dagger.

But Benzan, suddenly, was not there. The blade passed through empty space. The demon fell forward, splaying out upon the ground. None of the companions moved.

Twisting his head around, Graz’zt saw Benzan step up to him. Anticipating Graz’zt’s attack, the tiefling had dimension doored a few feet away. Graz’zt tried to stab him with the knife, but Benzan smashed the hammer down onto the demon’s fist, crushing it.

“Aaaa!”

“Now it ends,” Benzan said.

“No, wait! I can—“

The demon’s protests ended abruptly as Benzan brought the warhammer down onto the center of his skull.

“Vengeance,” Mole said.

“No,” Arun said. “Justice.”

Chapter 617

EPILOGUE

The last rays of the setting sun laid a splendid glow upon the walls of the city of Cauldron. Far to the west, the bright ball was just fading beyond the seemingly endless green line of the Forest of Miir. The people below, toiling in the city, were just vague specks at this distance, but Mole imagined that she could see her friends, far down there.

The gnome sighed. Her perch allowed for a magnificent view, although most sane people would have felt terrified rather than exhilarated being perched on a rocky outcrop that jutted above a gorge that fell several thousand feet into rocks and swirling water below. Normally Mole would have smiled at the thought, but at the moment, the gnome was in a rare introspective mood.

The city looked a lot better than the last time she'd seen it from a distant vantage. The bridge was finished now, a glorious span that had seen more than a bit of magic infused in its fashioning. Lok's people, a full two score of the mysterious urdunnir, had visited the city for a little over a month, adding their unique skills with the crafts of metal and stone. They joined the ranks of over a thousand shield dwarves, humans, moon elves, and others who had come to Cauldron to help in the rebuilding of the city. Mole knew that there were still ruined buildings to be rebuilt, sewer lines to be relaid, and a thousand other myriad tasks for the city's leaders to attend to. But from way up here, it all looked perfect.

She finally did smile. Arun and Beorna were going to be busy. Both of them had refused the title of Mayor, but the fact was that they were the defacto leaders of the New Cauldron. Their marriage had been a happy event that had given the people of Cauldron hope in the future; Mole had counted at least two thousand people at the reception that Dannel and Cal had organized. The new joint temple to Helm and Moradin was the largest in the city, and two other new structures had joined it, centers of worship for Selûne and Azuth.

Arun and Beorna were still down there, somewhere, but it seems like the rest of them had just drifted away, over the last few months. Umbar had gone back to the Great Rift, intent upon clearing Arun's name. Arun had actually been glad to see him go, she thought; hero worship could be a burden at times, and Arun was much too modest to take all this Chosen business too seriously.

Dannel had left as well, returning to the Wealdath. He'd seemed sad since they had returned, and Mole thought she understood. Dannel needed time to sort things out, but she hoped that he'd be back, someday. If nothing else, she could always go visit him.

Lok had returned with his people to their home in the far North. He'd married the shield dwarf cleric Gaera, and while he too was not much for titles, she gathered at the wedding that his people were referring to him now as the Warder Under the Mountain. Something to do with their religion; she wasn't really all that sure. The urdunnir were all right, but pretty dull; she hadn't stayed there long.

She and Uncle Cal had traveled the length and breadth of Faerûn, for a time. Archmage Calloran was becoming quite the muckety-muck in the Waterdeep Guild, and she'd gotten to visit a number of interesting places in his company. But after a while he had to return to Waterdeep to attend to Very Important Business, and while she imagined she'd return there eventually, she'd asked him to drop her off here, at Cauldron, for a time.

She kicked at a protruding rock, sending it over the edge of the outcrop. She watched it fall for a moment, but it was quickly lost in the shadows that were deepening in the gorge.

A figure walked up from behind her, and sat down next to her on the edge of the outcrop. The newcomer was a young-looking gnome, clad in a practical but festive tunic and trousers in deep colors that caught the rays of the shining sun.

For a minute, the two enjoyed the view in silence.

“You know, I’m rather cross with you,” Mole finally said.

“Oh?”

“Yeah. I mean, all my friends, they’re all Chosen. What do the gnomes get? Well, Uncle Cal got Azuth, I guess, but he’s pretty much a human god, right?”

“I’m not so much into that whole ‘choosing’ thing. Sort of believe that mortals should choose for themselves, don’t you?”

Mole grunted something noncommittal.

“In any case, I’d say you’ve had a pretty unique path. Even for a gnome.” The last was said with a smile, belying the content of the statement.

There was another pause.

“So what now?”

The other gnome leaned back, putting his hands behind him on the sun-warmed stone. “There’s always more to learn, more to explore, new bad guys to be shown up.”

Mole considered.

“You don’t agree?”

“I guess I’m sort of down on exploring. I mean, I’ve been in on killing two demon princes, dracoliches, elder undead, dragons, giants, fiends, a bunch of Cagewrights...”

“You’ve had a busy year.”

“Yeah, well. I guess after all that, searching an old ruin for some magic trinkets, running a thieves guild, or putting down a bandit ring... none of it really seems to do it anymore.”

“So what do you want to do?”

“I don’t know. Settle down, maybe.”

The other gnome raised an eyebrow.

Mole chuckled. “Yeah, maybe not. I don’t know.”

“Well. It’s not for me to set your path, Mole. I don’t really do that, you know.”

“Yeah, I guess I’m just getting a few thoughts out there.”

“Hmm... yes. Well, there is one thing you might consider.”

“Oh?” Mole said, trying to appear disinterested, and not fooling the other in the slightest.

The other gnome smiled. “There are other realities beyond those that you know. Other games with different rules.”

Mole looked uncertain. “What you’re talking about... I’d have to leave my friends.”

“Not forever, Mole. We’re not talking about that kind of trip. You could come back, visit this Prime whenever you wished. Although time might move a bit differently than you are accustomed to.”

“I don’t know. Maybe.” But as she looked back toward Cauldron, there was something of a farewell in her eyes.

“Well then, maybe I can offer another incentive. Not that I’m trying to make your decision for you or anything.”

“Because you don’t do that.”

“Right.”

“What is it? One of those cloaks that lets you fly? Because I could really use one of those.”

“It’s not an item, Mole. Rather, an old friend who’s been waiting for you for some time.”

Mole turned, and saw that the area at the far end of the overhang had become indistinct, a soft blurring beyond which only a gray oblivion extended. She could sense the reality of her world around her, but in that one direction, something e/se existed, another reality beyond limits.

And in that fog, a slender figure was approaching.

Mole looked at the other gnome, who nodded with a soft smile. The girl leapt up and ran into the shroud, which embraced her. For a moment she too was vague and indistinct, but then she broke through some kind of barrier, and she was in that other reality. And the figure she’d perceived was there, real, solid when she leapt up and wrapped her arms around her.

“Zenna!”

“Glad to see you, too.”

“I missed you... Where have you been? What happened to you?”

“I was lost for a while, Mole, really lost. But I found my way back, with the help of some friends.”

“So much has happened... Oh, I have so much to tell you!”

Zenna looked down at her with eyes misted with tears. “And I want to hear it all. We’ll have plenty of time to catch up; I have no plans to go away again anytime soon.”

They turned as the other gnome appeared. Behind him, Cauldron and the rest of Faerûn faded from view. “Are you ready, Mole?” he asked.

“Can she... I mean, can both of us, together, ever go back to Faerûn?” Zenna, still holding her, looked as though she was waiting for the answer as well.

“Perhaps someday,” the gnome said, after a brief pause. “That part of the story is still unwritten.”

“Like my uncle’s book,” Mole said. “I don’t think he’s ever going to finish it.”

“Exactly,” the gnome said. “But for now, at least, another chapter comes to a close.” His eyes sparkled. “And what lies ahead... well, that will be something now, won’t it?”

Mole jumped down from Zenna’s grasp, and taking Garl’s hand in one of hers, and Zenna’s in the other, the three turned and walked down a new road that stretched endlessly before them, until they had faded completely from sight.

THE END OF THE SHACKLED CITY